The mechanism by which conduct fiscal incentives can be described starting from the impact of a levy on any market. The presence of a tax in any transaction causes a disjunction between the price paid by the buyer and the price collected by the seller. This difference between the taxes and / or all payroll taxes and the tax price, collected by the government and social, is called "tax wedge". According to economists the welfare cost of taxation is higher than that single puncture of monetary value, because by changing the system of relative prices, the tax also alters economic behavior. If we distinguish the effect of income resulting directly from the levy on resources officers the substitution effect that comes from the new arbitration or reallocations that occur after the change of the signal transmitted by prices, the excess tax burden is the latter substitution effect. That's why one of the conditions for an efficient tax system is that it minimizes the excess tax burden.

There are several reasons that can not reach this ideal situation for tax efficiency. Fiscal instruments required may not be available. Above all, the markets themselves can not be effective.

[8] http://www.europa.eu/European fiscal strategy 2011 qe-198-en.pdf

This of course raises the problem of imperfect competition but also that of the presence of externalities. There is externality when the action of an economic agent is positively or negatively on the value of at least one other agent, without this interaction goes through the price mechanism.

References

- Robert Solow (2002) "Can we use fiscal policy? Is it desirable?" Revue de l'OFCE, No. 83
- Agnes Benassy-Quere, Martine Carré-Tallon, Matthieu Crozet - A competitive tax system in a competitive world, Report for the Council Levies Obligatory CEPII, October 2009
- Vãcãrel Iulian - coordonator, Finanţe publice, Editura Didacticã şi Pedagogicã, Bucureşti 2003
- http://www.europa.eu/European fiscal strategy 2011 qe-198-en.pdf
- http://www.mfinante.ro

THE IMPACT OF MANAGEMENT CONTROL ON THE HUMAN FACTOR AND CONSEQUENTLY ON ENTERPRISE PERFORMANCE

NICOLETA CRISTINA MATEI [*]
MARIN ȚOLE []
DUMITRU MIHAI NEDELESCU []

Abstract
The current economic environment where enterprises run their activities is characterized by diversified, competitional supply, superior to the demand; a supply that is heterogenous, unstable both quantitatively and qualitatively; comprising numerous technical as well as technological mutations. Under these circumstances, enterprise managers must ensure the achievement of objectives and performance. In order to accomplish these, human, financial, material resources are to be used.
The limits imposed by the usage of financial and material resources can be compensated for by means of the creativity and innovation pertaining to employees, therefore, the success of an enterprise becomes closely related to the capitalization of staff intelligence and skills, while the human resource becomes important for the management control by means of which an enterprise makes sure that its activities run according to plan and that objectives are met.
The paper presents the impact of management control on the human factor and further to the enterprise performance, strategies of employee motivation, aspects regarding the use of plans as objectives, as well as aspects concerning the use of control techniques regarding the assessment of results.

Keywords*: performance, management control, control techniques, strategies of employee motivating.*

Introduction

The main objective of an enterprise is performance, creating added value, i.e. a positive value obtained from the running of activities after the remuneration of all participant factors, including the enterprise capitals.

'Performance […] can have at least three meanings or connotations: success, the result of an action or the action itself […]. Performance shows capacity for progress, due to constant efforts. The term performance is the bearer of an ideology of progress, effort, of always striving for the better.' (A. Bourguignon, 1997)

For an enterprise to be performant, it needs to set up and have the capacity to reach strategic objectives by means of efficient usage of all current means, or, to put it differently, to be simultaneously efficient and efficacious.

Reaching strategic objectives can be achieved by doing certain activities by the enterprise employees under the managers' guidance. 'The process meant to motivate and incite the people in charge into doing activities conducive to the reaching of organization objectives' is management control. (R.N. Anthony, 1965)

The creation of affluence involves the consumption of material, financial, human and informational resources. Human resources are the ones making the difference between enterprises having similar financial and material resources because of the employees' educational and professional qualifications, skills, abilities and knowledge that can be turned into value, thus influencing the enterprise profitability in the long run.

[*]Senior Lecturer, Ph. D., Nicolae Titulescu University, Bucharest, Romania, (email: cmatei@univnt.ro).
[]Professor, Ph. D., Romanian-American University, Bucharest, Romania, (email: tole.marin@profesor.rau.ro).
[]Senior Lecturer, Ph. D., Romanian-American University, Bucharest, Romania, (email: nedelescumihai@yahoo.com).

Transforming employee knowledge into value also depends on the managers' capacity to influence their subordinates' work and guide them into reaching the objectives.

Contemporary Japanese management considers that the success of an enterprise is closely related to putting to good use of the intelligence of every employee.

In order for the enterprise of the future to continue its activity and be performant it will have to focus, among other things, on the degree of employee satisfaction so as for the latter to enjoy work and be committed to it.

'The enterprise's human elements are the ones able to learn, change, innovate and create if they are rightly motivated, being the ones that ensure the company survival in the long term'. (N. Bontis et al.,1999)

The right motivation, the use of the intellectual capacities of the personnel with a view to reach the objectives will ensure both the survival of the enterprise as well as the creation of value. Pursuing the reaching of objectives and the setting of employee motivation strategies can be achieved by means of management control.

This study objectives are to present the role of management control in the creation of value, the results' assessment, personnel motivation strategies and the indicators proposed to be used as performance evaluation instruments.

1. Management control and its role in creating value

Managers of any enterprise consider three parameters when running the business: objectives, means and results.

Objectives must correspond to the the aims pursued by the enterprise in the long run. Means are represented by the resources used in the running of objective-reaching activities, and the results represents the consequences of the actions undertaken in order to reach the ojectives.

There is an interdependence relation between objectives, means and the results obtained by enterprise. Objectives are set in accordance to the means available to the enterprise as well as to the expected results, means will be allotted depending on the objectives settled and the results pursued, while the actual results will be the consequence of using the means efficiently and efficaciously. At the same time, the results obtained will be compared to the initially settled objectives in order to find out the deviations or the degree of achievement of the latter.

"The process by which people in charge make sure that the necessary resources are obtained and used with full efficiency and effectiveness in order to reach the objectives set by the enterprise"[1] is management control. Therefore, the role of management control is to ensure the correlation of the objectives to the resources; to set up a system of indicators that would allow the decision-makers to monitor the evolution of the enterprise; to adjust the behaviour of the factors with a view to reach the objectives.

"Management control helps the managers to guide the actors into getting organized for performance." (C. Alazard, S. Sépari, 2001). Consequently, management control urges the people in charge to act as the enterprise needs, to use the means available in order to reach the objectives settled, to assess the results of the activities undertaken and compare them to the ones initially settled, and if the former are not up to the expectations, to take corrective steps so as the global activity may ensure the creation of value.

Management control does not have the role to sanction, but to recommend, suggest, notify. Thus, the control system will be regarded as an assistant to the managers and not as a supervisor.

The purpose of management control is the provision of information useful to the managers' decisions. The information will be synthesized and presented by control panel boards, scorecard balances, various reports, depending on the informational needs of the management of the enterprise and it has to meet the following characteristics: to offer a representation as faithful as possible to the reality; to be provided in due time; to indicate all the elements that would allow the decision-making process; to be adapted to the issue under investigation; to be accessible.

[1] Dictionnaire fiduciare, organisation et gestion, La villeguerin Editions, Paris, 1991, p.9

Management control by means of its instruments mentioned above (control panel, scorecard balance, reports, etc.) informs the management with respect to the way in which the resources are used and the objectives are reached, thus contributing to the decision-making with the view to create value. It is equally a system of regulating the behaviours of the enterprise employees and guiding them towards performance.

2. Control techniques and results evaluation

Results evaluation involves the comparison of the objectives settled to the actual achievements and if applicable, the finding of deviations. It can be achieved by using the budget control and the control panel.

"Budget control represents one of the management control techniques that allows, by starting with a decentralization of responsibilities, the existance of a control in the framework of a budgetary exercise (generally one year), of the whole system of enterprise activities, translated into monetary units. It consists of a permanent comparison of results and objectives, in order to: inform the various hierarchical levels;

Look for the differences'causes;

take the necessary corrective steps or exploit the favorable differences; appreciate the activity of the budgetary managers." (C. Alazard, S. Sépari, 2001).

Monitoring the activity of the enterprise and comparing its results to the objectives in the framework of the budget control implies the existence of budgets.

The budget, as a provisioning document, is elaborated over the period of one year and it settles the allotment of resources to each department, sector, centre of activity in the enterprise. It equally influences the ones using it by means of the responsibilities of each one.

The budget does not have a standard form, it can feature various forms and contents according to the informational needs of the persons using it and the professional judgement of the specialists that draw it up. However, the information supplied needs to be presented in a logical order, neither too numerous since it might affect the meaning and exactness of the data, nor too scarce because it might lead to the incurring of expenses too low or too high due to the user's lack of perception of the limits presented in the document.

By means of budgets, the management control seeks to obtain data with the purpose to know, plan and understand the important events that have an impact on the enterprise. At the same time, the indicators calculated and presented in the budgets help to assess the efficiency of the activity run by the budgetary centre, as well as its performance, allowing the evaluation of the results of the managers'actions and, at the same time, of the behavioral influence of the management control over the actors.

The evaluation of the results of the activity of an enterprise can be done by means of the control panel – an instrument measuring the performance and whose construction starts from „ the mission, vision and the key factors of success". (M. J. Epstein and J. Manzoni, 1997; L. Vilain, 2003).

The control panel gathers and presents a system of indicators linked by the important decisions and objectives of the enterprise and, at the same time, it makes comparisons between targets and achievements, highlighting the differences. „Highlighting deviations for the significant indicators and their analysis allows the identification of sideslips, errors and it represents a prior condition for the correction of the enterprise trajectory and of the modification of the enterprise projects". (N. Albu, 2005)

The indicators presented in the control panel allow the people in charge to know the evolution stage of the activity centre they run, future trends and therefore to take decisions regarding the corrective steps with a view to reach the settled objectives.

The results obtained by various centres of activity are actually the results of the activity of the employees, and the level of the indicators calculated and presented in budgets or control panels represent the degree of their performance. Consequently, budgetary control techniques are useful, among other things, for the employee evaluation which needs to be correct, fair, and made with the purpose to motivate, to stimulate them towards reaching the strategic objectives.

3. Employee motivation

Performance is built by permanently monitoring the activity, comparing the objectives and setting up the corrective measures. This action involves, among other things, the analysis and guidance needed for the human behavior to reach the expected results.

Management control participates to the process of analyzing human behavior by providing information regarding its results by means of the indicators calculated and presented in various instruments (control panel, budgets, reports, etc.). At the same time, management control participates to the process of guiding the employees' behavior by motivation.

A motivated employee is an employee who will contribute to the creation of value, to the enterprise's increase in performance. Thus, an enterprise that wishes to be perfomant must be interested in the employee degree of satisfaction.

Under the current economic context, namely the economic crisis, not only will material incentives not be offered on a continued basis, but they will fail to motivate employees in the long run. A big remuneration does not necessarily make an employee enjoy doing their activity and contribute to it by working more and better for the increase in performance of the enterprise, but it is the work environment, the relations with the superiors or peers that will achieve this.

Motivating every individual to reach the set objectives represents the managers'or the activity centres'duty, sometimes as a consequence of the notifications issued by the management control after signaling deviations.

Stimulating employees by management control could be achieved by means of:

evalutions and fair incentives, not necessarily monetary; organizing management control in a flexible way that would allow decentralization, a certain degree of autonomy and initiative on the part of the managers in setting up the objectives assumed by the centre they run; dialogue, permanent communication between the management and the operational personnel regarding the achievements and the objectives to reach.

Involving the employees in setting the objectives makes them more responsible and motivated to reach them.

At the same time, the perspective of long-term career development, the promotion of values can represent methods of stimulating the increase of employee performance and, consequently the enterprise performance.

Management control is a system of subsequent decisions that need to focus on the active participation of employees with a view to setting up the objectives, by motivating employees and thus leading to the manifestation of an invisible control model.

4. Indicators regarding human resources to be pursued in the performance measuring instruments

The development of human resources by lifelong learning, the involvement in the setting of objectives, the making of decisions regarding the corrective measures to be taken when non-favorable deviations from objectives' achievements are recorded, generates value for the enterprise. This value involves the definition of a set of indicators to be pursued in the framework of performance measuring instruments (C. N. Albu, 2008) as it follows:

indicators targeting productivity:

value added as percentage from the remuneration cost – offers a more faithful representation of the productivity of each employee;

the level of implicit knowledge per employee – knowledge inside an enterprise appears and develops as a result of social interactions that transform individual knowledge into collective or implicit knowledge, and the latter are the ones on which the organization can build competitional advantages. The indicator measures the degree in which the enterprise manages to incorporate knowledge;

the relative increase of individual knowledge compared to the formation costs – it represents a degree of the enterprise concern for the preservation of a certain level of knowledge; indicators targeting processes:

degree of communicating the strategic information;

life-long learning – the employee participation to life-long programs reflect the degree of commitment for increasing or at least maintaining the level of their professional knowledge; indicators targeting employees:

the degree of employee preservation – a high level of the indicator reflects a good working environment that will contribute to the employee motivation and the increase of performance;

the employee satisfaction – considers the acknowledgement obtained by the employees for the work done, the acccess to the necessary information necessary for work, the employee involvement in the decision-making process;

the degree of current employees preservation - this indicator can be used together with the degree of employee preservation in order to find out the extent to which their loss would have a negative effect on the enterprise's capacity to raise the value of its implicit knowledge; indicators targeting the financial aspects:

the value of the employee knowledge;

knowledge per employee – offers information both on the employee perception on the knowledge formation and development process, as well as on the quality of human resources management; employee knowledge as percentage of the total number of assets – offers information regarding the importance held by human resources in the whole system of the enterprise resources.

The above mentioned indicators can be used both for establishing the value of the employee knowledge for the enterprise, and the degree of satisfaction and involvement in obtaining performance.

Conclusions

In the current economic context where a wide ranging supply exceeds the demand and consumers are losing purchasing power, it can be said that it is not the enterprises that select their customers, but the latter choose the former.

It is customers that choose to buy the goods and services that cater to their needs and that offer the best quality-price balance.

Customers' income represents the revenue source for the enterprises as well. Therefore, in order to survive and create value it is essential to keep the current customers and attract new ones, and consequently enterprises will set up certain objectives which they are going to try to reach under efficient circumstances.

Reaching the objectives involves the use of the means available to an enterprise at a certain time. The most important resource used in the running of its activity by an enterprise is made up of the human resources and, more acurately, their knowledge, educational and/or professional qualifications. The more an employee is motivated the more they contribute to the increase of the organization performance. Consequently, enterprises must monitor the deviations of the achievements from the initially established targets and motivate the employee with a view to reach the strategic objectives. Deviations' monitorization is made by management control techniques like budgetary control, but also by means of the control panel which equally allow the managers of activity centres to know their level of evolution and implement corrective measures, if unfavorable deviations are ascertained.

To conclude with, management control has a significant role for the motivation of the employees of an enterprise with a view to reach the strategic objectives and create value. Management control should feature certain indicators in its performance-measuring instruments that would show the degree of employee satisfaction as well as the impact of the latter's knowledge over the enterprise performance.

References

- Albu C. N., Measuring Performance-Indicators for the Intelectual Capital Management, Accounting, Business Expertize and Audit, no. 10/2008
- Albu N., A Contingent Approach of the Use of Strategic Managerial Accounting Instriuments, Bucharest, 2005
- Bontis N., Dragonetti N.C., Jakobsen K., Roos G., A review of the tools available to measure and manage intangible resources, European Management Journal, vol. 17, no. 4, 1999
- Bourguignon, A., „Sous les pavés la plage…ou les multiples fonctions du
- Caraiani C., Dascălu C., "Managerial Accounting: Integrated Accounting Technologies of Reporting and Decision", A.S.E Publishing House., Bucharest, 2010
- Dictionnaire fiduciare, organisation et gestion, La villeguerin Editions, Paris, 1991
- Dumitrana M., Caraiani C., "Management Control", Universitară Publishing House, Bucharest, 2010
- Epstein, M. J., Manzoni, J. , „Balanced Scorecard and Tableau de Bord – translating strategy into action, Management Accounting, August, 1997 prospectif", thèse professionnelle, Mastère Spécialisé HEC, Ecole des Mines de Paris, 2003
- Vilain, L. , „Le pilotage de l'entreprise : l'utilisation d'un tableau de bord vocabulaire comptable: l'exemple de la performance", Comptabilité, Contrôle, Audit, March, 1997

AUGUSTINIAN MODEL IN THE BYZANTINE POLITICAL THINKING. CASE STUDY: THE ELEMENTS OF POLITICAL AUGUSTINISM IN THE CURRENT ROMANIAN MENTALITY

ANDREI TINU[*]
CĂTĂLIN BOBOC[]
ANDREI-SEBASTIAN DUMITRESCU[]
VIOLETA IOSEFIDIS-SERGHEI[*]

ABSTRACT
The byzantine society, de jure and de facto heir of the Greco-Roman world, has it's own philosophy, it's own structure model and policy thinking. Without doubt, for the New Rome this model is that sprang from the Christian teachings, and as a philosophy it harmoniously blends the legacy of the Roman world with Blessed Augustine's thinking about man and city which itself is a symbiosis between the acquired pagan knowledge and Christian experience of the latter. The Byzantine fortress (The Empire-n.n.) will use religion as the main instrument for political and social consolidation. Religion (Christianity – n.n.) is, for the Byzantine monarchy , the path to divinity, immortality... The Byzantine Christianity is not just a "phrase invented by them" as in the words of Eminescu, but a complex mechanism which represents the totality of good concepts about the world and about life of the constantinopolitan city.In preparing this study we started from the model offered by St. Augustine, "De Civitate Dei", a model which compares the two types of cities - people's city, with all its flaws, and the City of God, personified by the Church to which the Christian Roman Empire provides the Regnum. Our study tries to reflect how the model of the two cities becomes a political ideology of the Byzantine Empire and, arch over time, how it is manifested in the public and political mind of the Romanian society. This research tries to increase the understanding of the mental archetypes amongst those who are active participants in public life in Romania. However, we want our message to be disseminated in a wider public and to provide the possibility of assimilation, as much as it can, of the participatory political culture. Thus, the study becomes an attempt of reporting the Byzantine society, respectively the current Romanian society, to the model of the three types of political culture offered by Almond and Verba - participatory, parochial and dependent.

Keywords: political thought, political culture, Augustin, Byzantine Empire, Romanian mind

INTRODUCTION

This study emerges from "Augustinian paradigm in the byzantine thinking and the political culture", one of the authors' dissertation work. The novelty is reflected in reporting to the mental and historical evolution of the Romanian people, especially in the current times, of the researched aspects in the mentioned work.

The study analyses the implementation of the Augustinian theory in the byzantine public philosophy and, arch over time, has does not have an influence on the balcanic mentality in general and Romanian mentality in particularly. In the same time, the study tries to follow and identify the ways the Augustinian teachings, especially the ones in "De Civitate Dei", influenced the religious, political and day-to-day life of the whole Medium Eve, especially the relations between the Church and the State in the Occident and in the Byzantine Empire[1], and the way it manifests in Romanian

[*] Ph. D. candidate "Ovidius" University of Constanta (emai: andrei_tinu@yahoo.com).
[] MA "Ovidius" University of Constanta (email: catalinboboc_constanta@yahoo.com).
[] Master student , University of Bucharest (email: as.dumitrescu@yahoo.com).
[*] MA "Ovidius" University of Constanta (email: violeta_serghei@yahoo.com).
[1] Ibidem, 4.

present, how and how much it kept its Augustinian paradigm in the XX – XXI centuries, and what are the distortion elements of Happy Augustine's message.

The research models used in this study are: descriptive, wich deals with the fundamental aspects of Augustinian philosophy, and comparative, with which we tried to apply Agustin's model to the praxis of political philosophy or the Dark Ages and also in the contemporary world. We umnst note from the beginning that our research theme relates to the broader area of political utopias.

Specialized historiography includes many titles among which we selected the ones we consider to be the most important: De Civitate Dei[2], A History of Byzantium[3], Civic culture: Political attitudes and democracy in five nations[4], Identity in rift: postwar Romanian mentalities[5], A burning culture: about Schism, Ludic and Balkans[6], History of Byzantine philosophy[7], The philosophy of St. Augustine[8] or the Christian paradigm of freedom between ontic and meonic[9].

1. Augustinian paradigm

Nothing is lost, but everything is transformed, is inherited, continues ... History of the Byzantine Empire has a special place in medieval history, a special case from several points of view: it is a bridge between ancient Rome, whose heir and religious reformer line is, and the Ottoman Empire, which continues the Byzantium in a politic perspective. If the historians agreed that the Constantinopolitan era ended in the middle of the fifteenth century, when the Rome of Orient was conquered by the osmanlâi (romanian term. otoman) (May 29, 1453), the birth of the Christian Empire still leaves room for controversy.

Although the chronological limits and continuity of history do not currently play an important role, there are epochs in which, after achieving a certain degree of civilization, past accumulations produce a visible transformation that gives a new turn in the whole world[10]. According to specialists, a such culminating period took place in the history of the Roman Empire in the early decades of the fourth Christian century during the reign of Constantine the Great (306-337 AD), about which JB Burry said it represented "a new era, in a more profound sense than the reign of Augustus, the founder of the empire"[11].

Certainly, Burry refers to what, by edict of 313, Constantine the Great granted the Christian religion to become lawful. Tradition says that the son of Helen and Constantius Chlorus would become favorable to Christianity due to events during the struggle for succession against Maxentius in 312, when "his victory would have been announced by the Christian symbol of chrismei, represented by the first two Greek letters of the name of Christ"[12]; but the conversion was to come much later, on his deathbed, but even then it was not out of pure conviction.

---

[2] Augustin, De Civitate Dei (Editura Ştiinţifică, Bucureşti, 2002).

[3] Stelian Brezeanu, A History of Byzantium (Editura Meronia, Bucureşti, 2005).

[4] Gabriel A. Almond, Sidney Verba, Civic culture: Political attitudes and democracy in five nations, (Editura Du Style, Bucureşti, 1996).

[5] Sorin Alexandrescu, Identitate în ruptură: mentalităţi româneşti postbelice (Editura Univers, Bucureşti, 2000).

[6] Aurelia Satcău, O cultură în flăcări: despre Schismă, Ludic şi Balcani, vol. 1 (Carpathia Press, Bucureşti, 2006).

[7] Nikolaos Matsoukas, Istoria filosofiei bizantin (Editura Bizantină, Bucureşti, ISBN 973 – 9492 – 49 – 5).

[8] Anton I. Adămuţ, Filosofia Sfântului Augustin (Editura Polirom, Iaşi, 2001).

[9] Adriana Claudia Cîteia, Paradigma creştină a libertăţii între ontic şi meonic (Editura Cetatea de Scaun, Târgovişte, 2007).

[10] J.B. Burry, History of the Later Roman Empire from the Death of Theodosius I to the Death of Justinian (Istoria Imperiului Roman târziu: de la moartea lui Teodosie I până la moartea lui Iustinian I), Volumul I, Publisher: Dover, New York, 1958, p.1, apud http://www.questia.com, consulted on the 27th of May 2011, 21: 45.

[11] Ibidem.

[12] Jean Carpentier şi François Lebrun (coord.), Istoria Europei (Editura Humanitas, Bucureşti, 2006), 85.

Whatever the nature of his conversion (belief or political pragmatism!), Constantine the Great will protect the followers of Jesus Christ, Christianity being gradually transformed into a Christian "history, ecclesiastical, based on public obligations"[13]. It made the transition from Roman to Byzantine Christianity[14]. In fact, Christianity was the locomotive that pulled the train called the Roman Empire to a new world, even if not all wagons have reached the finish line. The transfer was made from the disordered and pagan Rome to the New Rome located in the old capital of Byzantium, who now wears Christian clothes. By its monotheist nature , Christianity has provided the unity of the empire for more than a millennium .

Byzantine society, de jure and de facto heir of the Greco-Roman world, has its own philosophy, its own pattern of structure and of political thinking. Undoubtedly, for the New Rome, the model is emerged from the Christian teachings and, as a philosophy, it harmoniously blends in the heritage of the Roman world with Blessed Augustine's thinking about man and city, which itself is the symbiosis of the pagan knowledge and the Christian experience acquired by the latter.

The Byzantine citadel (Imperial-o.n.) will use religion as its main instrument of political and social consolidation. Religion (Christianity - o.n.) is the Byzantine monarch's gateway to divinity, immortality... Byzantine Christianity is not just a "phrase invented by them" as Eminescu said, but a complex mechanism, which represents the synthesis of the totality of good concepts about the world and life of the Constantinoplitan city

Some considerations on the notion of political culture

The term of political culture is, like many other concepts and terms, one very new, being first used by the german illuminist Johann Gottfried Herder, in late eighteenth century[15] (the century of lights - o.n.), although the term, in the sense of political thought, is extremely old. Raisa Radu believes that political culture related items are included in the Veterotestamentar writings[16], stating that "The Bible contains oracles, paraenesis and anathemas of the prophets in wich they refer to different qualities and inclinations of the Amalekites, Philistines, Assyrians and Babylonians"[17].

The evolution of human society, from the pre-state organization to the political organisation, is pointed, in this type of writings, by the listing and analyzing the rights of the political leaders - kings, military commanders, archons, nobles - on subordinates. Greco-Roman Antiquity writings are eloquent in this respect. "Histories" of Herodotus contain particulars of different ways to understand politics and how to relate to it. By idealizing the democratic model of state management, Herodotus claims that "the Athenians showed initiative and zeal when these qualities served as a benefit of all"[18].

Interesting is, for the demonstration on how the Antiquity relates to the concept of political thinking (culture), the work of Origen, "De principiis" which examines the Bible as a body of laws that orchestrates Christianity in the philosophical sense. [19] Origen believes that three ways of the Old and the New Testament exist - historical, mystical and moral - which he calls "the body of the text (the message to the simple people), the soul of the text (the moral significance) and spirit of the text (which allows initiation of the supreme truth)"[20].

Byzantine political philosophy is an intermediate phase between classical philosophy and modern political thinking. Therefore the bases were placed in the golden age of Hellas of Socrates,

---

[13] Adriana Claudia Cîteia, Paradigma creştină a libertăţii între ontic şi meonic (Editura Cetatea de Scaun, Târgovişte, 2007), 27.

[14] Ibidem.

[15] Raisa Radu, Cultură politică (Editura Tempus, Bucureşti, 1994), 10.

[16] VETEROTESTAMENTAR adj. wich belongs to the Old Testament (ex. Veterotestamentar prophets). (lat. vetero „to make it old") - cf. http://dictionare.edu.ro/, consulted on the 27th of May 2011, 22:15.

[17] Raisa Radu, op. cit., 10.

[18] Ibidem, 12.

[19] Anton I. Adămuţ, Filosofia Sfântului Augustin (Editura Polirom, Iaşi, 2001), 37.

[20] Ibidem.

"who dropped down philosophy from heaven and brought it within the walls of the cities, introducing it in households, and he was the one who forced it to inquire the lifes and customs of the people and the good and bad things[21]. "Consequently, the subject of political philosophy is the City and the Man, in this case the relations between the soul (man) and place (city).

1.1.1. The beginnings of political thinking in Europe

The notion of political culture in ancient Greece can not be separated by what city means. The people's lives, the way of thinking and political steering, the good (in the sense of good and right - nm) are synonymous with the very existence of the city, which accompanied the whole history of Hellas.

Plato and Aristotle, considered to be the founder of philosophy in the service of the polis[22], are the most important thinkers of the Greek area. "Republic" of Plato, considered a "rigid work"[23] gives us an ideal city, which implies ideal citizens. "Politics" of Aristotle is an exposure of personal experiences, presented in a realistic way. Plato is an idealist, an incurable dreamer, while Aristotle is "a cold logician, whose fantasy is not allowed to take any step without being controlled by reason opposed with reality"[24]. Regarding the administration of the city, Plato argues that a good leader needs good education, the knowledge of the Goodnes, and to acquire Wisdom ... The prerequisite for acquiring it is free time, "which means the one who have to work for a living can not acquire the wisdom, but only those who have independent livelihood"[25].

As mentioned, Aristotle's political philosophy identifies its fundamental axis in historical reality. Aristotle is not an adept of equality, but believes that "a governing is good if it pursues the good of the whole community"[26], identifying three good regimes (monarchy, aristocracy and politea - the constitutional government) and three harmful forms of government (democracy, oligarchy and tyranny)[27]. The purpose of political philosophy is to create the best political system, but this goal is virtually impossible as long as people-citizens will be anchored in existing policy, however identifying an ideal leader, Hippodamos, about which we find that he was the first political philosopher, a brilliant city planner and a proponent for the order, giving attention to the way he dressed and enjoying to have as much knowledge about the universe. Hippodamos proposes a city that revolves around the number 3: 10,000 citizens divided into three groups, a territory divided into three sections, three types of laws and three reasons that lead to initiation of trials to the Court of Justice.[28]

For the Antiquity, the city is the only place where one can live, there is nothing else beyond, beyond are barbarians, eternal enemies, Tartary ... The first to sees otherwise this issue of foreigners is Cicero, who, in the first century BC, stated that <<the whole foundation of human community>> is threatened when an unfavorable treatment is applied to foreigners compared with that applied to Roman citizens "[29]. The thesis (the argument) of Cicero is a form of political culture, in the sense of reporting the speaker to the state policy and to the general mentality of the Roman Republic.

---

[21] Leo Strauss, Cetatea şi omul/ trad: Radu Pavel Gheo (Editura Polirom, Iaşi, 2000), 21.

[22] Vasile Muscă, Aristotel sau filosofia în slujba polis-ului, în Vasile Muscă şi Alexander Baumgarten, Filosofia politică a lui Aristotel (Editura Polirom, Iaşi, 2002), 73 – 93.

[23] Ibidem, 76.

[24] Ibidem.

[25] Bertrand Russell, Istoria filozofiei occidentale, volumul I (Editura Humanitas, Bucureşti, 2005), 124.

[26] Ibidem, 208.

[27] Ibidem, 209.

[28] Leo Strauss, op. cit, 26- 27.

[29] Robert D. Kaplan, Politici de război: de ce necesită conducerea politică un etos păgân (Editura Polirom, Iaşi, 2002), 42.

Almond's and Verba's[30] accepted meaning to the concept of political culture is a particularised distribution "of patterns in the orientations to political objectives, as it is done between members of the nation" or community. Divided into three main categories (participative, parish and dependent), political culture may or may not be "in harmony with the structures of the political system."[31] If we would try to identify the type of political culture of Athens, we would be turning to a participatory culture. The participation of all citizens in the debates in Agora was not only a right but a duty, decisions being taken following discussions that took place three times a week. Valuable information in this respect we have from Thucydides, who, in the "Peloponnesian War" refers to a speech of Pericles on the benefits of democracy.[32]

Unlike Aristotle and Plato, who seek the ideal city or try to identify the best form of political organization, Thucydides puts us in the everyday reality of the city, irrespective of how severe or abject reality is. By "Peloponnesian War", Thucydides brings a new image of the ancient city, whatever it is: Athens, Melos or Sparta. Carefully analyzing the historian's work, we can distinguish the three types of political culture theorised by Almond and Verba. Thus, when the city is not under threat of war or unwanted constraints (lack of democracy - a.n.), we can talk about a political culture of obedience to divine will, people leaning towards the past, towards the traditional values, praising moderation and submission.[33]

Rome's expansion will bring "a political organization, a lifestyle, a culture (including political - a.n.) - based mainly on Greek elements - which are strong unifying factors"[34]. If the type of political culture, in which we consider that Athens is, consists mainly of a predominantly participatory political culture, imperial Rome has a dependent one, in the sense that the emergence of the empire and the relocation of Roman institutions' operating mechanisms have contributed to "a gradual decline of the role of the people's assemblies"[35] and to an increase of the imperial powers. Thus, the emperor was Imperator (commander of the army and the possessor of the judiciary and the legislative), pontifex maximus (high priest) and protector of the people (Pater Patriae), which gave him various gifts: the establishing of the imperial cult by Augustus will result not only in the replacement of the dictum VOX POPULI, VOX DEI (voice of the people is the voice of God) but rather the weakening of the institutions of republican Rome. The fundamental principle of political culture of imperial Rome was the phrase "bread and circus" within the meaning of food and show. The emperor increased his powers in the detriment of the people, which he turned into a mere tool, in a mass for maneuvres.

Therefore, the emergence of the Christian community in Judea Province and the rapid expansion of faith in the resurrection of Jesus Christ in the entire imperial space have confused both the Roman administration and the simple citizen who could not conceive to have a life led by the modesty imposed by the Gospel and by the preachings of the apostles; this triggered the violent reaction against Christians in the first three centuries of our era. In terms of thinking, Plotinus (204-270 AD) is considered to be the last of the great philosophers of antiquity, "as it helped to shape medieval Christianity and Christian theology."[36] With Plotinus start the rumours about salvation by philosophy, by reference to the mystic of One, who can not think and can not create the perfect way, everything in the world appearing through illumination, through emanation, like the relationship

[30] Gabriel A. Almond şi Sidney Verba, Cultură civică: atitudini politice şi democraţie în cinci naţiuni (Editura Du Style, Bucureşti, 1996)
[31] Ibidem, 50.
[32] Raisa Radu, op. cit., 12.
[33] Leo Strauss, op. cit., 249.
[34] Jean Carpentier şi François Lebrun (coord.), op. cit., 70.
[35] Ibidem.
[36] Bertrand Russell, op. cit., 305.

between fire and heat. [37] In Russell's view, Plotinus is, in cultural terms, the end of a world - the Greek one - and the beginning of another - the Christian world.

"For the ancient world, tired becouse of the centuries of disappointment, worn out by despair, his doctrine could have been acceptable, but it couldn't have been stimulating. For the barbaric world, where reckless energy needed not to be stimulated but contained and regulated, what was able to penetrate out of his teaching was good, because the real evil was not apathy, but brutality.[38] "Therefore, Plotinus's philosophical inheritance, which entered the Christian theological concept, will also enter the way of functioning of the New Rome's institutions, and hence it irradiated the whole life inside and outside the empire.

1.2. Byzantine political culture

We can not talk about the development of the Byzantine Empire without observation on the transformations that took place throughout the european space, in the human mentality and in the functioning of the institutions in the transition period from Antiquity to the Middle Ages. The political culture of the following one, de jure and de facto, of ancient Rome is in line with the coordinates imposed by Christianity, not just a religion or a philosophical current but fundamental axis of the Medieval world.

We must admit that the Medieval European world and, especially, its civilization is founded on principles emerged from the teachings of the Gospel, in other words, on Christianity. Unique, by reference to Jesus Christ, and yet different, with a flourishing world of cathedrals and universities in the West, and conserving both the Greek and Orthodox traditions, Eastern Europe remains original in many respects, being, as related to the religious phenomenon, the only continent entirely christianised.[39] Christianity has influenced life in all of Europe, be it religious life, whether we refer to the functioning of institutions. Clothed "with a broad white mantle of churches"[40], Europe will see a development which, without any real break, leads from the ancient city to the medieval one, from the Greco-Roman pantheon to the Christian era.[41]

As Jacques Le Goff says, the medieval man, whether king or subject, the patriarch, pope or Christian, citizen or peasant, merchant or intellectual, is Christian by excellence, rarely happening for an individual not to be animated by the teachings of dogma, whether Orthodox or Catholic. If, however, existed, this human should have been excluded from the medieval world picture, as was one who didn't know God, or, worse, did not recognize God[42]. "The fool says in his heart <<God does not exist!>>" [43] is the foundation of Augustinian and post-Augustinian poorly-understood paradigms of a theology which, in the name of Jesus Christ, has killed. From this verse in Psalms rise all the prelates of the Dark Ages, in their convenience and greed. The people of the Middle Ages are people without universe, without opening ... People are limited, depending on the category, they belong to the field, the village or, in the happy case of monarchs and high prelates, to the Eurasian space.

The introduction of Christianity, first as a lawful religion (313), and then as the imperial religion, while prohibiting pagan cults, was a turning point in European history. The great migrations also contributed to this mutation, which was the cause of the division of the colossus with clay feet in

---

[37] Anton I. Adămuț, op. cit., 37.

[38] Betrand Russell*, op.cit.*, 316.

[39] Jean Carpentier şi François Lebrun (coord.), op. cit., 141.

[40] René Rémond, Religie şi societate în Europa: secularizarea în secolele al XIX- lea şi XX (1780 – 2000) (Editura Polirom, Iaşi, 2003), 27.

[41] Jean Carpentier şi François Lebrun (coord.), op. cit., 88.

[42] Jacques Le Goff (coord.), Omul medieval/ trad: Ingrid Ilinca şi Dragoş Cojocaru (Editura Polirom, Iaşi, 1999), 8.

[43] Psalmi 14, 1, apud Jacques Le Goff, op. cit, 8.

the Western Roman Empire and Eastern Roman Empire (395 AD) and the disappearance of the first, in 476, with Odoacer's[44] deposit of Romulus Augustus.

In this context of socio-political and cultural-religious mutations, the European civilization transfer takes place to a more complex form of organization, which can be understood by "the opposition of an Oriental Europe, where Roman structures maintained and developed in the Byzantine Empire, and Western Europe, whose development depends on the distribution of power between barbarian kingdoms and contacts between the two forms of culture, Roman and German"[45].

On this bidimensional mold (the fight between good and evil, the confrontation between the Byzantine civilization and the existing danger beyond the Danube limes, but also the fight from within Christianity, between different schools of thought) will be and will persist what today we call the Byzantine Empire. The reduced Roman Empire, who focused it's whole political and administrative power in Constantinople, lasted a thousand years, and for a long time was the most powerful state in Europe, even if surrounded by enemies and grinded by internal strifes for life and death.[46]

Throughout the world's Medieval thinking about man, we dyscover the paradigm of the two cities not only regarding to the outside world, Babylon and Jerusalem being perfectly integrated in the universe represented by the human individual. Thus, the same being is inhabited by two entities: one virtuous and another sinful. The first is created in the image and likeness of God, the other one being no more than the heir of the original sin of Adam and Eve, being punished with death penalty. So, what Gnostics identified with spirit and matter, Christians related to the two cities: one, full of virtue, "condemned" to eternal life, and one that is doomed to the burning wich transcends time. And in terms of human's image, we have to deal a bivalent aspect: between centuries IV - XII the prevailing image is one of a man both weak and vicious, knelt before God to ask forgiveness, while the image of creative-creation, able to continue the work of Trinity in the city's terrestrial space and to save, imposes since the twelfth century.[47]

Augustine referred to Rome when speaking of Babylon as a prototype of the human city and to the Church when talking about Jerusalem. Official theology, both Eastern and Western, considered the two cities as the same individual, in the nature of the sin, the flesh, and in the nature of the virtuous, the spirit.

Byzantine history, recorded in documents, will encounter distinct stages of its evolution, from the expansion period to decline, and from there to the empire that gave apparent signs of recovery, but a pseudo-recovery, which is rather the chance of history.

The end of Greek-speaking Roman Empire is admirably captured in the work of Palamas - "Death of Byzantium": "... The turks are coming, the turks are here, we are surrounded by Karaman, the destroyer of the world, the one that wastes peoples, Asia's ruler. And acriţii are the histrion's mockery. Silvered lances are rusty, gold saddled battle horses are red becouse of lice ... and Nichifors alone, and the rulers and the impetuous Tzimisces and Bulgarohton centaurs aren't only smoke anymore, cloud and ashes, the great Dighenis Acritas was sipped by Caron, in the depths and darkness, the heart of Hellenism died"[48].

Byzantinism survived after the fall of Constantinople and other imperial centers, basic elements of law, culture, theology and political ideology, consolidated in more than a millennium, will radiate throughout the space Orthodox in Russia, Armenia and Georgia to northern Africa and Serbia. A special case is that of the Romanian Principalities, where continuity of Byzantine forms

---

[44] Odoacru – German leader (b. ca 430 - 493 m.), an officer in the Roman imperial guard of 472 , commander of the barbarian militia formed by heruli, scirians, rugians and turcilingi, position of the leading events of 476 – cf. *Enciclopedie de istorie universală (Editura All Educational, Bucureşti, 2003), 959.

[45] Jean Carpentier şi François Lebrun (coord.), op. cit., 89.

[46] J.B. Burry, op. cit., 3, apud http://www.questia.com, consulted on the 31th of May 2011, 12:45.

[47] Jacques Le Goff, op. cit., 9.

[48] Apud Eugen Barbu, Săptămâna nebunilor (Editura 100 + 1 Gramar, Bucureşti, 1996), 5.

experienced particular issues because of the Greek aristocracy exile which began in the XIV century and continued in the centuries XVI and XVII. Whether we refer to Greek language, as the language of school and office during the phanariot reigns, to taking over Byzantine legislation, political ideology and mentality, which is preserved until today, "it is outlined a laborious adaptation of the law to the socio-economic needs and political changing of the Romanian society." [49] It is significant in this regard that romanian rulers claimed to be considered legitimate heirs of the Byzantine emperors.

1.2.1. Christianity - a fundamental element of Byzantine political thought and culture

Life, during the Byzantine Empire, including citizens reporting to the political act, is indestructible related to the Christian religion. Christianity was the entire Byzantine political ideology, founded by Eusebius of Caesareea. According to this imperial theological doctrine, the result of "a long political and philosophical developments of concepts of East and Roman world"[50], "the Empire is the emanation of divinity itself and has a providential mission on Earth, which is to subject all the people of the universe and to impose faith in Christ. [51] "Therefore, the entire nation will be subject to the ruler of the empire, which, according to the same theory, is the chosen (anointed) of God. King is God on earth, and everything is connected to it is sacred, "the Finance Minister will become, as soon as the king's wealth is identified with the wealth of the empire, <<committee of sacred spending>>, head of the imperial wardrobe, <<committee of sacred clothes>> etc ".[52]

Since the second half of the fifth century, in the same time with the power of the emperor, the political power of the Church increases; in 457, we assist the king's coronation ceremony by the patriarch, an "act that gave authority to the election of political bodies and translated into practice the idea that imperial power is of divine origin." [53] Church became thus, the soul of the empire, which ensured the geographical area for preaching the Word of God.

Starting from Almond and Verba's division of political culture, we can easily identify the membership of the Byzantine political culture to the type of depent culture; the Byzantine state is extremely well organized, the old Roman magistracies are replaced by a bureaucratic apparatus, composed of officials appointed and carefully supervised by a despotic imperial authority. Here we can fit the links between the emperor and Byzantine different population groups. As Stelian Brezeanu said, "public relations between the old Roman prince and the magistrates who surrounded him gives way for links in course of <<privatization>> between the despot (Dominus) and officials, officials wich were turned into his trusted people (comites) and, finally, the Roman citizen, a member of a free comunity, is replaced by the Byzantine subject (doula)"[54].

In fact, with the establishment of Christianity as the only religion of the Roman Empire, philosophy, political thought, morality and law were unified into a single body... The Church became the Empire, a dual unit of the 2 cities, "of which pnly one will reign forever with God, and the other will be in eternal torment with Satan"[55] in the sense that the Church's role will be the Christians' mobil to eternal life, to the City of God, as it is defined by St. Augustine. The city Augustine of Hippo speaks about is different from the city of people in wich the "principles and those who subjugate nations are dominated by passion to dominate." [56] However, the existence of the binomial empire - church must be understood in letter and spirit of the Christed dictum "Give therefore to

[49] Stelian Brezeanu, op.cit., 329.
[50] Stelian Brezeanu, op. cit., 17.
[51] Ibidem.
[52] Paul Lemerle, Istoria Bizanţului/ trad: Nicolae Şerban-Tanaşoca (Editura Teora, Bucureşti, 1998), 33.
[53] Stelian Brezeanu, op. cit., 18.
[54] Ibidem.
[55] Bertrand Russell, op. cit., 376.
[56] Augustin, De civitate Dei, XIV, 28.

Caesar what is Caesar's and to God what is God's."[57] Administration and Byzantine church hierarchy used freely both biblical precepts and ideas arising from Augustinian thought, which they turned into augustinism. Byzantine subjects had no other choice than to comply with the will of his master, no other freedom than Christianity, acording to which they could reject the political city's strenght, "by choosing the desert cities."[58]

The status of official church led to a profound change in the functioning of the empire, whether we talk about politic life or the everyday life. Greco-Roman Pantheon was often used as an instrument of policy, but its value was rather symbolic. This (the use of pagan religion as an instrument of imperial policy - a.n.) did not involve any theory about the universe, no dogma that could share people's thinking and generate disputes, but rather was consistent with most pre-Christian religions and beliefs. Christianity destroys, simultaneously with the destruction of a world of fornication and abundance, the belief in a pantheon of gods with human weaknesses of the city. Once adopted as the state religion, Christianity turns, slowly but surely, in a political, imperial dogma, which had to define and consolidate itself. In this manner the christologic fights in the first centuries must be seen, and so has to be analyzed the second stage, one of the battles between iconoclasts and iconoduls. Church, now in power, denied the other cults' right to manifest, forgetting the moments when it asked freedom for itself.

A great problem of both the Christianity and the empire was, without doubt, that of christologic fighting. In the context of an immense religious freedom and intense theological activity, the Church was faced with developing a strong controversy between various schools of thought within it.

In the fourth century, a new heresy grows - Arianism - due to Arius, a servant of the altar in Alexandria. It emitted the idea that the three persons of the Trinity would not be equal, as Son, unlike the father, is a creation, a creature of cells without the body and timeless. Arius denied the consubstantiality of Jesus Christ and thus, indirectly, the divinity of the Son. Is excommunicated by Athanasius, Bishop of Alexandria, which led to the division of the whole Christian Orient. The situation determined Constantine to intervene for the first time in disputes about dogma, to ensure internal peace of the empire. Consequently, he summons the First Ecumenical Council of Nicaea in 325. On this occasion a number of fundamental elements of Christian dogma are established (consubstantiality of Christ, Sunday, etc.), Nicaea having a particular importance, politically, because, "for the first time, the imperial power intervenes in a dogmatic matter"[59] placing the "foundation of the future establishment of relations between temporal and spiritual."[60]

Another heresy was the Nestorian heresy, from the name of Nestorius, patriarch of Constantinpolului, that human nature of Christ outweighs the divine nature as the Son is nothing else but a man who became God. This doctrine was sentenced in 428 by Celestine, Bishop of Rome and Cyril of Alexandria ordered Nestorius to accept the orthodox teaching, threatening him with the deposition as Bishop.[61] To avoid a worsening of the situation, Theodosius II convokes the Council of Ephesus, in 431,, the Third Ecumenical Council. Following this, Nestorius is removed as a Bishop and Cyril was in management of the whole Christian Orient.

Two rationalist doctrines of Arius and Nestorius are opposed to Monophysitism, which emphasizes the divine nature of Christ, leaving human nature in the background . Monophysitism is condemned at the fourth Ecumenical Council (Sinod), in Calkedon, 451.[62]

---

[57]  Noul Testament, Matei 22, 21 (vezi şi Luca 20, 25).
[58] Adriana Claudia Cîteia, op. cit., 7.
[59] Paul Lemerle, op. cit., 23.
[60] Ibidem, 25.
[61] Ibidem, 47.
[62] Maria Georgescu, op.cit., 81.

Byzantine philosophy is based, in the opinion of Nikolaos Matsoukas, on three factors, three basic archetypes: Gnosticism, Judaism and Hellenism.[63]

Gnosticism, the syncretistic thinking of the pre-Christian era, is influenced by Christianity, but without losing the fundamentals. Gnostic philosophy is distinguished by two large categories::

dualism[64];

gnosis (knowledge) of universal and unitary reality, as a necessary and saviour movement.

Gnostic dualism aims the combining spiritual and material elements, stating that "the matter is the reality of lower and perishable (corruptible), while the spirit, or the intelligible element, is the high and incorruptible world"[65].

Judaism also influenced Christian-Byzantine philosophy. The triadic monotheism of the Old Testament (religious foundation of the chosen people), Judaism is the base of Christian theology but, with the loss of Triadic God Himself (by not recognizing the divine nature of Jesus Christ - a.n.), it becomes the main source of heresies, and Jews become apostates. In the conception of many historians of dogmas and theologians of the Bible, Christianity relies radically on Judaism, while for historians and theologians of the Church Christianity is a superior form of Judaism.

Hellenism is considered to be a different cultural matrix of Christianity, especially in terms of hierarchy.

Despite the fighting and the opposing elements of Gnosticism, Hellenism and Judaism are found in Christian theology, being assimilated by Christianity and integrated to his own interest.

A special place in the recivilizing of the Roman world it is the dogma. The concept of dogma asserts its supremacy in the Middle Ages, during the time when people "used to say that, if Lot challenged by the shine of the feasting, Job by patience, Abraham by faith, and Simeon by hope, after that, Solomon was challenged by the teaching (dogma)."[66]

As stated, the doctrine will play the primary role in the Middle Ages, even if the obstacles in understanding the different meanings of the word persists today.

The greek meaning of the word, derived from the verb doxein ("to think", "to imagine", "to have this or that opinion") wich designates doctrines (principles) of different schools of thinking, recieves new meanings after the appearance of Christianity. In the first centuries after Christ's resurrection miracle, "dogma was the expression of what Christians accepted to confess"[67], the expresion of reality within the Church, not just a simple statement.

There are several types of interpretation of the dogma. Ferenc Eduard proposes the analyzing of the dogma in a triple perspective:

Interpretation as a verbum rememorativum - an evocative interpretation of the facts of God;

Interpretation of the verbum demonstrativum, in the sense that biblical precepts are an illustration of the divine will;

Interpretation of the verbum prognosticum - prophetic value of the Christian dogma.

The reign of Constantine the Great represented a very beneficial time for Christians and Christianity, which, though it was equal in terms of legality with other religions, it earned an ascendant against paganism, being placed, in the late fourth century AD, to final defeat of the latter.

---

[63] Nikolaos Matsoukas, Istoria filosofiei bizantine/ trad: Constantin Coman şi Nicolae Deciu (Editura Bizantină, Bucureşti, ISBN 973 – 9492 – 49 – 5), 49 – 76.

[64] DUALISM – The use of two heterogeneous irreductible Principles (sometimes conflicting, sometimes complementary) to analyze the knowledge (epistemological dualism) or to explain the reality of the whole or general aspects of it (metaphysical dualism). Examples are the existence and epistemological dualism mind or subject and object, metaphysical dualism are examples of good and evil, God and world, body and spirit. Dualism opposes monism and pluralism.– cf. Enciclopedia Universală Britanică, Volumul 5: Dante – Evans (Editura Litera, Bucureşti, 2010), 190.

[65] Nikolaos Matsoukas, op. cit., 51.

[66] Anton I. Adămuţ, op. cit., 7.

[67] Ibidem.

After a brief period in wich the successor of Constantine, Julian the Apostate, gives an edict to reopen temples and offerings to pagan deities are allowed and Christians are removed from key positions in administration and education, Christianity regains force to the final blow on paganism, all culminating in the Edict of Thessalonica, in 380, that the only official religion is Christianity, and the edict of 392, which bans pagan sacrifices and ceremonies, including the entering into temples.[68]

1.3. The Augustinian model in Byzantine political thought

Around the year 400, Augustine was already talking about the city of the wicked and the saints, mixed by bodies, but separated by will. In "The Republic", Cicero says that Rome is a way for iustitia, a quality wigh is not enough to Augustine of Hippo, who claims that lost iustitia wil to lead the transformation of empires in latrocinia magna (large robberies).[69]

Full pages of City of God leave the bad impression that Augustine hated the Roman Empire and its political institutions, considering them as power-hungry organizations, created by the the ones with influence with the purpose of controling by their own will.[70] The foundation of the city of God is Christ, and the fundamental principle is love; the domain is this world the world beyond in terms of their spiritual connections; its law is divine will and its purpose is the victory over the terestrial city.[71]

On the other hand there is the human city. It is organized on the principle of abundance, comfort, power, lechery and domination - perishable values, limited in time and space; the terestrial city has, therefore, as a basis the devil, as purpose the intention to destroy the divine order, as finality the eternal punishment, and the principles are selfishness and contempt of God.[72] Augustine claims victory of the divine city against the human city, assuming that the Church has seen many empires disappearing, while no empire ever didn't see the Church disappearance. Thanks to Augustine, the public good, proclaimed by the Roman mentality, was transferred to the doctrine of universal salvation, the reference system moving from the human city to the City of God.[73]

This paradigm is the basis of the political philosophy of the Middle Ages, called the political augustinism - a hybrid of Christianity and pagan traditions. Political Augustinismul can be summarized in three different objects[74]:

The principle of a supernatural society different than the state, but comparable to it;

The practical consequences deduced by Augustine from the first principle, under the impact of Rome;

The practical consequences deduced by other Christian thinkers.

Written between 412 and 427, De Civitate Dei was meant as a response to the pagans, who saw in the adopting of christianity the giving up of the pagan pantheon, because of the disaster of Rome, namely the eternal City predation by Goths[75]. For Augustine, pagan worshipers' justification was meaningless; he exemplifies the fact that many of those who blamed Christianity were found, during the attack on Rome in 410, in churches "which the Goths respected, because they were Christians"[76], and as a counter-example are the events during the conquest of Troy, when the temple of Juno was not saved from disaster, concluding that "the Romans never spared the temples in the [68] Anton I. Adămuț, op. cit., 42.

[69] Ibidem, 173.
[70] Henry Chadwich, Augustin (Editura Humanitas, Bucureşti, 2006), 135.
[71] Anton I. Adămuț, op. cit., 174.
[72] Henry Chadwich, op. cit, 137.
[73] Adriana Claudia Cîteia, Instituţii eclesiastice pe litoralul vest-pontic, în lumina izvoarelor arheologice, literare şi epigrafice în secolele IV – VII (Editura Muntenia, Constanța, 2006), 209.
[74] Anton I. Adămuț, op. cit., 174.
[75] Betrand Russell, op. cit., 371.
[76] Ibidem.

cities they conquered; in this, predation of Rome was milder than most of the past devastations and the slowdown was a result of Christianity"[77].

Roman Empire was, in the Augustinian view, always a sinner, always devoid of virtue and that is why it will be destroyed by God, as its leaders, not wanting to know the true God, "they claimed to be wise and went crazy "(...)" and worshiped and served the creature rather than the Creator, who is blessed forever."[78] Unlike the Roman emperors who worshiped pagan gods, kings of the Christians are virtuous, because their virtue is eternal joy, and the city will endure as long as these leaders will be virtuous, giving the example of the Jewish kingdom, which "lasted as long as Jews have joined the religious truth."[79] St. Augustine believes that both Constantine and Theodosius I have been fortunate and full of virtue.

In this key must be seen throughout the life of the Church in the Middle Ages. The Church is therefore land area of the City of God, and the Byzantine Empire will be, in the conception of augustinian epigones, the geographic Church. It is found the theoretical justification of Church policy, particularly in Western Europe. The sine qua non condition of the membership of the empire/state of the eternal space of City of God is to obey the Church, a requirement fullfilled only in the East, where the king will control the Church, being obeyed to the Patriarch only in matters of christian piety.[80] This is especially true during the periods of intensified political crisis; the king, who was the absolute master of the visible world (inhabited), became deeply religious at this stage of political instability.

Augustinian thinking is confined to the idea that the church is the highest representative of the supreme republic, "embedded in a political organization (the state), called Regnum"[81]. According to this view, the Church is superior to the state; it has an indirect power over the empire, while the empire (the state) has a direct power over ecclesiastical institutions, in the virtue of the right of the ruler of basileia to be a bishop for matters outside of the Church.

In the Byzantine political thought, in wich the cultural layers of the Greco-Roman and Christian were perfectly combined, the emperor is of divine essence, by assuming the entire earthly power, which he holds from God, also assuming the spiritual power held by the Church. If the Pope is the successor of St. Peter, the Byzantine emperor is the deputy of the high priest in Heaven, and the Patriarch is the heir of Jesus Christ. The Relationship between the king and the patriarch should be ideal, as is defined in Epanagoge, the harmony between the throne and the is keept with some concessions. Constantine the Great identified Christianity as the best tool to achieve absolute power, by the principle of "One God, one authority, one law";[82] The Church comes into the proposed game by consolidating its power by blessing the emperor, "a bishop of the outside" and "a protector of the Church," as Olivier Clément says.

While St. Augustine sees the Byzantine empire as an anti-model of the of the City of God, yet the enounced principles resist in the Byzantine political thought, as his work includes few original ideas, as it is "of Hebrew origin and entered into Christianity by Apocalypse"[83], while the doctrine of predestination and election belongs to St. Paul, and the distinction between the two types of history (sacred and profane) may be sought in the writings of the Old Testament. Augustine's merit is the

---

[77] Ibidem, 371- 372.

[78] Rom. 1., 21 – 25, apud Aurelius Augustinus, De Civitate Dei /Despre Cetatea lui Dumnezeu (413 – 427), în De la Cetatea lui Dumnezeu la Edictul de la Nantes (izvoare de istorie medievală, secolele V – XVI), editori: Alexandru-Florin Platon şi Laurenţiu Rădvan (Editura Polirom, Iaşi, 2005), 176.

[79] Bertrand Russell, op. cit., 373.

[80] Ibidem, 378.

[81] Adriana Claudia Cîteia, op. cit., 210.

[82] Jean-Claude Eslin, Dumnezeu şi Puterea: teologie şi politică în Occident/ trad: Tatiana Petrache şi Irina Floare (Editura Anastasia, Bucureşti, 2001), 99.

[83] Betrand Russell, op. cit., 378.

unifying and the putting in line with the evolution of his own time. Therefore, the Augustinian paradigm[84] can be considered the starting point for both the Catholic West and the Orthodox East.

In the political thought of the East European medieval, the founding of Constantinople on the old foundation of Byzantium is the divine sign of the beginning of the Christian empire. The fall of Western Roman Empire in 476, will strengthen the power of Constantinople, Eastern Roman Empire remaining "the bastion of Christianity and the refuge of the Greco-Roman culture."[85]

The entire existence of the Byzantine Empire will be restrained to the dispute between two principles: "a realistic and Oriental one, who wants at all costs to maintain the Roman territory remained in the empire, and its evolution, within its borders, of the Byzantine population and the other, idealistic and Western, that aspires to recapture the West from the barbarians and the return of the brothers within the great Roman nation."[86]

The two fundamental principles of Byzantine ideology are the order (taxis) and economia (oikonomia), both referring to the goals of the empire and those of the Church. Another principle concept of the Byzantine theocratic doctrine is that there is no truly independent state, for the authority of both the land and divine is unique, which means that there can be only one empire: "of the Orthodox romans"[87].

Economia - wise wisdom - is the quality of the king to find and apply the best possible rule, theory which we find today in the Orthodox religion mentality states in the phrase "the lesser evil".

Taxis is an expression of the class that dominates relations between people, nature and society, the term being confused, in Byzantine thought, with that of hierarchy. Byzantine fortress, in terms of organization, is the fair view of the city of God. Heavenly hierarchy pyramid has God on top, while the king is on the highest step of the Byzantine hierarchy, which makes explicable the names of Cosmocrator (master of the world) and Cronocrator (master of the time), attributed to the Emperor by the Byzantine ideology.[88] By decoding the symbolism of the Byzantine institutional language, we find that the relation between the order (taxis) and economie (oikonomia), which replaces the old meaning of the term Sophia (wisdom), represents the foundation of the thinking of Pseudo Dionysius the Areopagite, and also the foundation of the whole theocratic imperial thinking. According to it, the emperor is lord of the entire area, while the patriarch is the one who gives legitimacy to imperial power.[89]

The fundamental principles of the Byzantine political thought are linked to the relationship between church and state. The state, represented by the king, and the Church, represented by patriarch, were the basic pillars of the existence of New Rome. In the opinion of Ahreweiller H., the relationship between church and state, between the temporal and spiritual authority, have profoundly influenced "political guidance of the ideology of each age and conditioned the behavior of Byzantine people"[90]. This was prophesied by Augustine, who, while seeing a counter-example of the Divine City, "accepts the cooperation between the two powers for the good of humanity"[91].

In the Byzantine Regnum, collaboration between Church and State was compulsory, virtue that the king was subordinated, even if only out of Christian piety, to the patriarch, wich was subordinated by the king, as an inhabitant of the city, otherwise, both would be crashed. This situation was summarized by king John Tzimisces, when he said: "I am aware of two powers on earth and in this life, priesthood and empire; the Creator gave the care of souls to the first, and to the [84] Paradigmă – example, model, teaching, , cf. http://dexonline.ro, consulted on the 5th of June 2011, 22: 33.

---

[85] Hélène Ahrweiller, Ideologia politică a Imperiului Bizantin/ trad: Cristina Jinga (Editura Corint, Bucureşti, 2002), 15.

[86] Ibidem, 16.

[87] Alain Ducellier, Bizantinii: istorie şi cultură/ trad: Simona Nicolae (Editura Teora, Bucureşti, 1997), 100.

[88] Hélène Ahrweiller, op. cit., 129.

[89] Adriana Claudia Cîteia, op. cit., 270 – 271.

[90] Hélène Ahrweiller, op. cit., 121.

[91] Adriana Claudia Cîteia, op. cit., 212.

second gave the authority over the bodies, if these two parts do not suffer any curtailment, then good reigns in the world."[92]

This happy relationship between the state and the Church will exist since the early begining of Byzantium, being noticed, also in terms of imperial law, starting with the fourth century AD. In the time of Theodosius I, 150 decisions are issued in defense of orthodoxy, as shown in the Book XVI of the Theodosian code, compiled between 429 and 439.[93]

But in the virtue of the augustinian challenges, the Church and the emperor have identified the Hebrews as the new inhabitants of the terestrial city, becouse they knew God, "they didn't glorify Him, neither were thankful, but became addicted to false thinking and their foolish heart was darkened."[94] This is the sense of the antisemitic politics of the Byzantine emperors. In 408, the Jews were denied the right to judge Christians, because in 431 to be called "supernae maiestati et legibus Romanis inimici, denying them the access to civil positions"[95].

As in other cases, the king has involved, as bishop from outside, in the application of a judicial system in the State-Church relations, including public law, starting with the fifth century, elements of the sacred law.[96]

1.3.1. Byzantine imperial institutions and their reporting to the Augustinian model

For the Byzantine Empire, legislation and hierarchical organization of the state and the church played a key role. King, Court and Senate were the main institutions in the Byzantine Empire, in a centralized political system.

The Emperor. The concept on the imperial position is that the top hierarchy of the system is the basilea[97], the absolute master of oikonomia as it was considered the "deputy of God" and "friend of Christ".[98] Due to these qualities, the Byzantine emperor leads the empire by virtue of divine emanations, being, apart from political leader of the state, confessor of the Orthodox faith, its defender and an "equal of the apostles"[99], which gave him the right to control what happend inside, but especially outside the Church. After the victory against the Persians, Heraclius takes the title of "a basileu who has faith in Christ", which will become the exclusive privilege of the true sovereign of New Rome. Thus, Roman philosophy was integrated into Christian ideology, resulting in a new imperial doctrine, maintained by successors like Constantine II.[100]

According to Nicholas the Mystic, the emperor of Constantinople "is above all terrestrial powers and the only power established on earth by the master of heaven"[101], while others are "younger brothers" (Carol the Great), "Beloved sons" (Bulgarian tsar) or simple subject - douloi (venetian dog and armenian rulers). This type of christian oikonomia hierarchy is called the doctrine of the family of kings, as we find out in De ceremoniis aulae byzantinae (On the Byzantine court ceremonies), written by Emperor Constantine VII the Porphyrogenet in the middle of the tenth

---

[92] Apud Hélène Ahrweiller, op. cit., 123.

[93] Henri-Irenee Marrou, Sfântul Augustin şi sfârşitul culturii antice/ trad: Drăgan Stoianovici şi Lucia Wald (Editura Humanitas, Bucureşti, 1997), 117.

[94] Apud Aurelius Augustinus, op. cit., în De la Cetatea lui Dumnezeu la Edictul de la Nantes (izvoare de istorie medievală, secolele V – XVI), editors: Alexandru-Florin Platon şi Laurenţiu Rădvan (Editura Polirom, Iaşi, 2005), 176.

[95] Adriana Claudia Cîteia, op. cit., 234.

[96] Ibidem.

[97] BASILEU (here, with the sense of emperor) - in Antic Greece, the name of the king; in Athens it was the title of the second archin wich had religious functions. It was atributed to the kings of Persia and to absolute suverans of helenistic kingdoms, being, in the constantinopoletan age, the title awarded to the byzantine emperors – cf. Enciclopedie de istorie universală*, 294.

[98] Ibidem, 315.

[99] Ibidem, 423.

[100] Emanoil Băbuş, op. cit., 85, apud. http://www.crestinortodox.ro/, consulted on the 8th of June 2011, 17:45.

[101] Stelian Brezeanu, op. cit., 135.

century. According to this book, the basileia was elected by the people and confirmed by the Senate, the role of people gradually decreasing in the favour of the army and, from the eleventh century, in the favour of the private guards of the powerful (dynatai). Leo III Isaurian, initiator of the inconoclasm, proclaims himself as "basileu and priest", an expression of cezaropapism[102]. With the ocasion of legitimacy of Constantine VII is born a new institution of dynastic principle: porphyrogennetos (the birth in the purple room). Constantine believes that porphyrogennetos is "God's anointed" when he tells his son: "God himself has chosen you and appointed you from your mother's womb to give you your royalty for excellence."[103] While affirming the right of the born in purple is a very old idea, it returns with greater force during isaurian times. This legitimacy provided by virtue of being born in the purple extends to the two daughters of Constantine VIII, Zoe and Theodora, considered to be "our mothers". They give legitimacy to the spouses and to the adopted successors. Byzantine empire does not give up the foundations of its ideology. Related to the statute of the emperor, Patriarch Anthony IV responds in 1395, to Basil I, Grate Duke of Moscow, as follows: "The Holy Emperor... can not be assimilated to an archon or a local sovereign, because since the beginning emperors considered and strengthened faith in the world, gave power to the divine and sacred canons.

He is anointed with holy chrism, consecrated for the Roman emperor, of all Christians, and his name is commemorated in all places by the patriarchs, metropolitans and bishops, wherever people are called Christians, which is no privilege for any other prince or local sovereign"[104]. In this context, it is seen that the great Comnena of Trebizond, while abandoning the traditional name of their ancestors, they do not give away the imperial name, which they adapt to reality, the imperial title is "basileu of the East and the region beyond the sea".

Central administration. The more we move away from the time of Augustine, we see that giving up the old stratification of Roman administration (magister officiorum, magistri militum and officiales), a new hierarchy appearing, headed by the king. Under Heraclius, a new stage of state organization starts, where the military and civilian power are united in the themes (a military unit, an administrative circumscription where a military unit was established – after the VII century). The first themes appeared in Asia Minor (Anatolikon, Armeniakon, Karabisiani, Opsikion), while in Europe the Helladic and the Thrace themes were founded.

Starting the ninth century, the bureaucratic and centralized character of Byzantine administration increased , everything being in relation with the palace. There is a list of honorary positions (axia) and the official (offikia) that numbered 18 spots, the first three being the dignity of Caesar, nobilissimos and curopalates, to wich only the imperial family had acces. Ninth century and the next century brings a rapid increase in importance of the parakoimomenos function, the sleeping of king's guard, wich becomes the confidant and the most important minister of the byzantine state. Locally, the number of the themes varies between 7 and 40.

In XI-XII centuries, the Senate, army and people are left behind, while kings increase their power by enriching the positions, although they were empty of content. Thus, the head of the hierarchy is occupied by the sebastocrator and inflation of functions would be evidenced by the appearance of the same functions with several steps (sebastos, protosebastos; nobilissimos, protonobilissimus)[105].

The Army. Again with Heraclius, the military is experiencing a deep reform, reflected by replacing old mercenary troops with rural militias formed by stratiotes. The army was driven, since [102] CEZAROPAPISM – a system of report between the state and the Church, in wich the public authority has powers that traditionally are reserved to the Church, with the purpose of unifying the temporal power with the spiritual one.. – cf. Enciclopedie de istorie universală, 423.

[103] Stelian Brezeanu, op. cit., 155.

[104] Ibidem, 250 – 251.

[105] Ibidem, 135 – 136.

the seventh century, by a general wich was appointed the great domestic in the latter part of history of the Byzantine Empire. Marina was led at first by military officers. Leo III Isaurian divided the imperial navy fleet, one led by the Ploimon the drongar, based in Constantinople, and one fleet of three maritime theme (Kibyraiton, Hellas and Samos).

The elements of political augustinism in the current romanian mentality

Paraphrasing Professor Daniel Barbu, we can ask how much and how tributary we are to the Byzantine mentality, what percentage of quantity and quality of the Augustinian theory resides in the current public mental, especially in the approach of and reporting to the types of political culture.[106]

Throughout its history, the Romanian people, the beneficiary of Daco-Thracian cultural elements, Greco-Roman and Christian, to which were added Slavo-Byzantine and Turan mental archetypes, was considered a keeper of tradition. This becomes a ritual role, refering to "the illustrious ancestors, the ancient habits. And these originary myths regenerates the social body, << confirms >> faith, dreamt or proved, in the existence of common roots and a shared destiny. Thus, it comes from << the double body >> and the divine origins of the kingship, (sic) or even the speeches on the sovereignty of theorists of the revolts"[107].

Based on the above, we find that, often in modern and post-modern history of Romania, the appeal to the ancestors is obvious, ritualic and timeless. The evolution of the trial and Antonescu's tragic end may have similarities with King Decebal's destiny, just as the whole life of a despotic ruler of Romania, Nicolae Ceausescu, is related to national heroes, whose heir and collector of positive energy was presented in the templates of the communist propaganda machine, but not in the collective mentality, people running a saw on him through jokes and expressions in the last years of his personal regime.

As the king was God's deputy on earth in Byzantine political ideology, in the same manner the romanian rulers were anointed of God, modern Romanian Constitution keeping the phrase "by the grace of God and national willingness, ruler of Romanians"[108].

In De Civitate Dei, Augustine transforms the Greek myth of the eternal enemy into the prototype of the human city. The sinful man, the roman citizen, doomed to perdition along with the empire he built, is opposed to the christian citizen, wich, if he wil be virtous, he will become a citizen of the divine republic. This fight between good and evil is maintained during the entire existence of the Christian Church, and the world as a whole.

For Ion Antonescu, the eternal enemy, which is neither lucky nor virtuous, will be represented by the Gypsies and Communists, deporting the first in Transnistria and imprisoning the others. Romania entered the Second World War on 22 June 1941. This was not only an act of fair reunification of the country, but also an evidence that the head of the Romanian state identified the USSR as an "Enemy of the East and North"[109], asking them to release the Romanian soldiers in occupied territories from under the "red yoke of Bolshevism"[110].

For the communist regime, the enemy is reversed and acquires new meanings. He becomes the class enemy. Capitalism, American imperialism, the decadent society are prototypes that can destroy the new divine republic, in fact a fearsome opponent of the city of God without God (own [106] Daniel Barbu, Republica absentă: politică şi societate în România post-comunistă (Editura Nemira, Bucureşti, 2004), 9.

---

[107] Pascal Lardellier, Teoria legăturii ritualice: antropologie şi comunicare/ trad: Valentina Pricopie (Editura Tritonic, Bucureşti, 2003), 107-108.

[108] Constituţia din 1866*, apud http://www.rogoveanu.ro/constitutia/const1866.htm, consulted on the 10th of January 2012, 13:04.

[109] Ordinul de zi către armată din 22 iunie 1941*, Monitorul Oficial nr. 145/ 22 iunie 1941, apud http://istoriiregasite.wordpress.com/2011/10/30/ordinul-de-zi-catre-armata-din-22-iunie-1941/, consulted on the 10th of January 2012, 13: 43.

[110] Ibidem.

construction - a.n.). In one of his speeches in 1971, Nicolae Ceausescu warned the danger of capitalist products, be it material production or of the intellectual:

"It became a habit not too good, comrades, to look only to what is done elsewhere, to call for any import. This shows that there are some - let's say - kowtow to what is foreign and especially to what is produced in the West. It is the time ... to put our own strenghts in the foreground... and only then to resort to imports. Books are printed in tens of thousands of copies that advocate bourgeois lifestyle, while good Romanian books can not be printed due to lack of paper."[111] Along with annoying the enemy, the class struggle is getting more acute: the new man is idealizes - the bulldozer-woman, heroine mother, the miner, the cooperative peasant etc., while the intellectual is a negative symbol. The image of the enemy of the working class is well summarized by Nikita Khrushchev, for wich "historians are dangerous people. They are able to disturb everything. They must be advised."[112] Therefore, the truth of the augustinian philosophy is overthrown, a new truth being born, a new religion, a new universe. We are witnessing the failure of the twentieth century millennial movements (Romanian fascism and communism), emerged as a requirement of the collective mind to see - in this world and as soon as possible - the city projected by Augustine of Hippo

During the dictatorial regimes, the degree of subordination of church to state increases, although Augustine wanted a Church superior to the human Empire. Collaboration with the communist regime of the Romanian Orthodox Church has resulted in a pact "whereby, in exchange for supporting the communist regime, R.O.C. would have received in exchange the right to freely exercise their cult."[113] So, R.O.C. adopted a double standard to survive, are rare moments in which clergy expressed opposition to the communist state. Nicolae George and Adrian Enache Petcu identify the Security's White Book, Volume II, a single document that recorded such an attitude.[114]

In addition, the paradigm of the two Augustinian cities exists both in the relationship between state institutions with opponents of the communist regime and in the Church of Christ. The Orthodox Church sees in the Catholic Church the representative of the sinful city, the vice versa being also true.

Transformations taking place during the twentieth century do not change the mentality of the citizen. We are witnessing a Byzantine doula's transhipment, limited in time, space and fact, to a human model slightly polished, but still expecting God's mercy, or state aid or illumination from Pater Patriae. The dependency of Byzantine subjects was related to the plot of land they worked on, the church and the lord. The dependency of the modern subject is anchored in a world without future, in the sense that now he lives in the past, the need to be assisted, guided and led is marking his existence.The creational universe of subjects in the last century was focused around some small activities and the type of political culture was mainly a dependent one. Moments when the collective mentality atitutudine suffers some changes, caused by psychic over-saturation of individuals are rare (see Uprising of 1907 and the Revolution of December 1989) and short term, being enough for the satisfaction of the basic needs of the community.

Regime change in 1989 did not produce structural changes in the Romanian mentality, the single perceptible change being the actors: the West, former enemy became a friend, while the Cold War ally becomes an adverse stance. Romania's democratic path is marked by semi-brakings and semi-membership, based on terms set by Raymond Aron.[115] This translates into how the Romanian

---

[111] Nicolae Ceauşescu, non vidi, apud Katherine Verdery, Compromis şi rezistenţ: cultura română sub Ceauşescu/ trad: Mona Antohi and Sorin Antohi (Editura Humanitas, Bucureşti, 1994), 384.

[112] Nikita Hruşciov, non vidi, apud ibidem, 19.

[113] George Enache, Adrian Nicolae Petcu, Biserica Ortodoxă Română şi Securitatea. Note de lectură, 11, apud http://www.comunism.ro/images/enachesipetcu.pdf, consulted on the 10th of January 2012, 15:25.

[114] Ibidem.

[115] Raymond Aron, Marxisme imaginare: de la o sfântă familie la alta/ trad: Adina Cobuz (Editura Polirom, Iaşi, 2002), 15.

society, freed from a totalitarian regime, sticks to the psycho-social ills, the recent past, as well as the original sin. Here we can fit the forms of manifestation of the Phanariot model, of Byzantine-Ottoman essence, with balkanic features (see trading perversion, culture, in the sense of the country's transformation into a huge bazaar - Ed), although in terms of leadership, we are witnessing a speech catalyst for Western values.

Amid the moral decay of the Romanian society, Augustinian paradigm becomes an instrument in the hands of the politician. The citizen of City of God vanishes from the public discourse, which is now focused only on signaling the residents of the non-virtuous city, enemies being identified according to the interests of the moment (fatty budgetary, pensioner asshole, school that produces stupid, 40% of medical diagnoses are wrong, moguls, etc.)[116]. But we also identify speeches in which the two cities appear, reminding the public positions and attitudes of Corneliu Vadim Tudor, Gigi Becali or Dan Diaconescu.

Romanian Orthodox Church continues to be one of the main institutions to influence the colective mentality, wich can be used as an instrument of control in the interests of politicians. It appears that political discourse moves in the Church, the country's leaders at all levels trying to seize the moral ascendancy of the clergy on the population, mostly Orthodox.

It is not wrong to consider that the model of the two cities of the bishop of Hippo is always present. Thus, "the recent history remained to decide the vast, immeasurable division of east / west, which was committed and remained to perpetuate the fundamental form of mental structures, those responsible, in turn, for the distance between <<civilization>> and <<barbarism>>"[117].

Conclusion

The entire existence of the Byzantine Empire, from Constantine the Great to the fall of Constantinople in 1453, is marked by Christianity, such socio-political and cultural development of the whole medieval Europe. Christianity meant not only a religious doctrine embraced by most people, as he was in the hope of a better future (albeit a future that transcends the space time, geographical and physical existence!) springs to go on, regardless of existing challenges, but the imperial official doctrine, which united the entire existing philosophical codex...

Christian philosophy summed up in its benefit of the Church and the emperor, all the pre-Christian ideas and all philosophical and political doctrines. The Byzantine political culture is one in which the subject (doulos) is entirely dependent on the senior, the master; the emperor is anointed by God and therefore has the right to life and death of the vassal. In the Byzantine culture, there is no such thing as the power of the people as it is in Pericle'S Athens, but the will of the emperor, which is common with that of God.

The reminiscences of political augustinism meet today in the romanian public mind, and the collective consciousness still keeps alive the experiences of the model of the two cities, wich is poorly understood, a common thing for the totalitarian regimes that marked the twentieth century.

Our research focused on three main directions: Augustinian paradigm presentation and classification in the category of political utopias, the analysis of how the model of the two cities was taken and used in the self-interest of the emperor, transformed by the Byzantine ideology into God's deputy on earth, and identification of the elements of political augustinism in current Romanian mental, developed in the case study presented.

The subject of attention in this paper can be a starting base for those involved in studying the phenomenon of political culture of Byzantine and post-Byzantine. Also, this study provides the uninitiated a brief information on fundamental values that were the basis for the creation and development of the Romanian political thinking.

---

[116] Elements of the speech of the president of Romania, Traian Băsescu.
[117] Aurelia Satcău, op. cit., 41.

We believe that through this study, for the first time we brought to the attention of those interested how the Augustinian model penetrated and influenced public thinking in the Middle Ages and modern times (be it dictatorial phases or stages of post-dictatorial - Ed) and also the classification of the byzantine and post-byzantine political culture in three types of political culture proposed by Almond and Verba.

We propose as future research directions the following:

Realization of a complex work (historical-sociological- and mental-psychological), in which to consider the weight of different types of political culture defined by Almond and Verba in Romanian mental structure;

Differences in approach / reporting / the Byzantine typology of Balkan peoples and populations;

Development of Augustinian concepts in the era of globalization.

To Christianity have been reported over the centuries not only different Christian denominations, but also other monotheistic religions which see their positions threatened, and totalitarian political ideologies (Nazism and Communism - sublime. Added), but which, while denying Christian truth, used the symbols of this religion.

BIBLIOGRAPHY
PUBLISHED PAPERS

- Adămuț, I. Anton, Filosofia Sfântului Augustin (Editura Polirom, Iaşi, 2001).
- Ahrweiller, Hélène, Ideologia politică a Imperiului Bizantin (Editura Corint, Bucureşti, 2002).
- Aron, Raymond, Marxisme imaginare: de la o sfântă familie la alta (Editura Polirom, Iaşi, 2002).
- Augustin, De Civitate Dei (Editura Ştiințifică, Bucureşti, 2002).
- Alexandrescu, Sorin, Identitate în ruptură: mentalități româneşti postbelice (Editura Univers, Bucureşti, 2000).
- Almond, Gabriel and Verba, Sidney, Cultură civică: atitudini politice şi democrație în cinci națiuni, (Editura Du Style, Bucureşti, 1996).
- Barbu, Daniel, Republica absentă: politică şi societate în România post-comunistă (Editura Nemira, Bucureşti, 2004).
- Barbu, Eugen, Săptămâna nebunilor (Editura 100 + 1 Gramar, Bucureşti, 1996).
- Brezeanu, Stelian, O istorie a Bizanțului (Editura Meronia, Bucureşti, 2005).
- Boboc, Cătălin, Paradigma augustiniană în gândirea şi cultura politică bizantină
- (Universitatea "Ovidius" Constanța, Sesiunea Iulie 2011).
- Burry, J.B., History of the Later Roman Empire from the Death of Theodosius I to the Death of Justinian (Istoria Imperiului Roman târziu: de la moartea lui Teodosie I până la moartea lui Iustinian I), Volumul I (Publisher: Dover, New York, 1958).
- Carpentier, Jean, Lebrun, François (coord.), Istoria Europei (Editura Humanitas, Bucureşti, 2006).
- Chadwich, Henry, Augustin (Editura Humanitas, Bucureşti, 2006).
- Cîteia, Adriana Claudia, Paradigma creştină a libertății între ontic şi meonic (Editura Cetatea de Scaun, Târgovişte, 2007).
- EADEM, Instituții eclesiastice pe litoralul vest-pontic, în lumina izvoarelor arheologice, literare şi epigrafice în secolele IV – VII (Editura Muntenia, Constanța, 2006).
- Ducellier, Alain, Bizantinii: istorie şi cultură (Editura Teora, Bucureşti, 1997).
- Enache, George, Petcu, Adrian Nicolae, Biserica Ortodoxă Română şi Securitatea. Note de lectură
- Enciclopedie de istorie universală (Editura All Educational, Bucureşti, 2003).
- Enciclopedia Universală Britanică, Volumul 5: Dante – Evans (Editura Litera, Bucureşti, 2010).
- Eslin, Jean-Claude, Dumnezeu şi Puterea: teologie şi politică în Occident (Editura Anastasia, Bucureşti, 2001).
- Ferenț, Eugen, Sursum Corda! Despre interpretarea dogmelor şi realitățile escatologice (Institutul Teologic Romano-Catolic de Grad Universitar, Iaşi, 1998).

- Kaplan, Robert D., Politici de război: de ce necesită conducerea politică un etos păgân (Editura Polirom, Iaşi, 2002).
- Lardellier, Pascal, Teoria legăturii ritualice: antropologie şi comunicare (Editura Tritonic, Bucureşti, 2003).
- Le Goff, Jacques (coord.), Omul medieval (Editura Polirom, Iaşi, 1999).
- Lemerle, Paul, Istoria Bizanţului (Editura Teora, Bucureşti, 1998).
- Marrou, Henri-Irenee, Sfântul Augustin şi sfârşitul culturii antice (Editura Humanitas, Bucureşti, 1997).
- Matsoukas, Nikolaos, Istoria filosofiei bizantin (Editura Bizantină, Bucureşti, ISBN 973 – 9492 – 49 – 5).
- Muscă, Vasile, Aristotel sau filosofia în slujba polis-ului (Editura Polirom, Iaşi, 2002).
- Platon, Alexandru-Florin, RĂDVAN, Laurenţiu, De la Cetatea lui Dumnezeu la Edictul de la Nantes (izvoare de istorie medievală, secolele V – XVI) (Editura Polirom, Iaşi, 2005).
- Radu, Raisa, Cultură politică (Editura Tempus, Bucureşti, 1994).
- Rémond, René, Religie şi societate în Europa: secularizarea în secolele al XIX- lea şi XX (1780 – 2000) (Editura Polirom, Iaşi, 2003).
- Rusell, Bertrand, Istoria filozofiei occidentale, volumul I (Editura Humanitas, Bucureşti, 2005).
- Satcău, Aurelia, O cultură în flăcări: despre Schismă, Ludic şi Balcani, vol. 1 (Carpathia Press, Bucureşti, 2006).
- Strauss, Leo, Cetatea şi omul (Editura Polirom, Iaşi, 2000).
- Verdery, Katherine, Compromis şi rezistenţă: cultura română sub Ceauşescu (Editura Humanitas, Bucureşti, 1994).

B) INTERNET SOURCES

- http://www.crestinortodox.ro
- http://www.comunism.ro
- http://istoriiregasite.wordpress.com
- http://www.rogoveanu.ro
- http://dexonline.ro
- http://dictionare.edu.ro
- http://www.questia.com

POLITOARCHEA

ANTON PARLAGI[1]

Abstract
According to the political phenomenology of law normative systems have multiple poles. From a politonomic point of view it is important for the number of communities which are poles of power to directly determine the forms and content of central power. In a one-pole system politocracy establishes, imposes and controls normative institutions for all communities (regional, local groups etc.); the advantage of this system is that it can settle disputes among those communities which pursue their activity autonomously as local power centres; the disadvantage of the system is that it limits normative autonomy of communities and it reduces their social power. As to the bipolar systems, in which there are two centres of normative power, each centre attempts to regulate the other one; the advantage of this system consists in the fact that each centre creates more and more efficient regulatory systems; the disadvantage is represented by the fact that a permanent confrontation between two forces uses up time, material and human resources. In tri-pole systems, each power system attempts to co-exist with at least one of the other two power poles or, anyway, it attempts not to conflict with the other two at the same time; the advantage consists in the fact that the normative system is the result of a legally institutionalized "compromise" between different principles and community values. Multi-pole systems have a set of rules of which the most important is the rule of not destroying the system the community belongs to.

Keywords: politoarchea, normative policentrism, territorial policentrism, power distribution, institutional policentrism.

Introduction

The concept of politoarchea is used to define the phenomenon of power distribution by which (self) regulation is ensured so that each community acts autonomously; this leads to normative polycentrism and the polarity of the legislative system.

Politoarchea defines the phenomenon of (self) regulation power distribution thanks to which each community can be normatively autonomous and determine the multiple poles of the legislative system. Political phenomenology of law reveals the fact that normative systems have multiple poles. From a politonomic point of view it is important to notice that the number of communities which are centres of normative power directly determines the form and content of central power.

According to ideonomy, politoarchea is a system of norms and fundamental principles by means of which each community elaborates its own ideology as to the way in which its organization and functioning should be regulated. According to socionomy, politoarchea illustrates the multiplication and diversification of normative institutions for every community. From a politonomic point of view, normative, legal and non-legal autonomy is accomplished thanks to the right and capacity of any community to govern itself. As far as terminology is concerned, we have used the concept of community - within the field of phenomenology of law - for defining a group (structure) which has a particular profile thanks to its normative institutions.

Political phenomenology of law illustrates the fact that the decline of legal centralism appeared as a consequence of administrative decentralization, which led to the multiplication of the legislative power centres.

Politoarchea illustrates state evolution towards the efficient organization and functioning of local and regional powers in conformity with the principle of subsidiarity according to which public responsibility must lie with the authorities that are close to citizens in accordance with their social tasks, the general interest and economic progress. Politoarchea defines a normative system which regulates social processes at different legislative levels in order to achieve public interest objectives; in Austria a formal system was set up for implementing public policies by administration structures; in Sweden the budgetary planning process is correlated to administrative structures objectives; in Germany the result-oriented management system is supported at land level; in Switzerland performance standards are established for public authorities.

[1] Ph. D. Associate Professor, Nicolae Titulescu University of Bucharest (email: antonparlagi@yahoo.com).

(a) Normative policentrism

In monopolar systems politocracy sets up, imposes and controls legal institutions in all communities; the advantage of this system is that it can settle disputes incurred beween communities which are local centres of power; the disadvantage of the system is that it limits normative autonomy of communities and that it reduces social power. In bipolar systems, there are two centres of power and each of them tries to normatively subordinate the other one; the advantage of this systems is that each centre of power creates more and more efficient regulation systems in order to impose itself; the disadvantage is represented by the fact that a permanent conflict incurred between two forces uses up time, resources and effort. In tripolar systems each power centre tries to coexist with at leat one of the three poles or, anyway, it attempts to avoid conflict with the other two power centres at the same time; the advantage is represented by the fact that the normative systems are the result of a legally institutionalized compromise between different principles and values shared by the community. Multipolar systems have a set of rules, among which the most important one is represented by the interdiction to destroy the legal system thanks to which that community exists. From an ideonomical point of view, politoarchea is a system of principles according to which each social structure can develop its own ideology regarding the regulation of its organization and funtioning. According to socionomy, politoarchea represents the multiplication and diversification of normative institutions within any community. Politonomically, normative autonomy (legal or non-legal) is manifested as the right and capacity of any community to govern itself. As far as terminology is concerned, we have preferred to use the concept of community because we intend to bring into evidence the fact that a group (social structure) is defined by its normative institutions, too. Politoarchea may be better illustrated by using the concept of community, firstly because it illustrates a certain mentality as to (self)normativity, and secondly because it expresses solidarity as (self) regulation and thirdly because it describes (self) govenment forms more precisely. Normally, a community is self regulated by its institutions (religious, cultural, spiritual etc.) which, as normative systems, are different from legal institutions. The first conclusion we can draw is that normative plurality is based upon the community norms and principles (not upon territoriality); as the phenomenology of law illustrates some communities are normatively structured according to the same professional, ethnic or sexual relations although they are dispersed from a territorial point of view and, thus, cannot be regulated only according to territorial criteria.

If we deal with normative plurality from the perspective of each community's regulations, we have to take into consideration the other side of the coin, too, i.e. the capacity of norms to modify a community's preferences. In other words, the normative force derives both from each communitys's force to elaborate its own norms and from its capacity to apply them in conformity (or not in conformity) with a centralized legal system. If all communities adhered to the principles of justice (seen as social justice), the centralized legal regulation of social relations would no longer be necessary. From a socionomic point of view, one can easily notice that the system of norms elaborated in the interest of a community does not identify with the normative centralized system which is meant to satisfy "national interest". The main problem regarding regulation autonomy focuses on the contradiction between the institution of normative "centralization" and "decentralization". If we consider that any centralized political system is socionomically dominating and politonomically opressive, then we can conclude that the system is obliged to ideonomically justify these prerogatives. Political phenomenology of law illustrates the fact that the state uses the legal system in order to oblige communities to observe certain norms such as the norms regarding individual rights and liberties; moreover, the legal system guarantees the fact that no community ever breaks the universal principles of law, among which one has to mention the defence of individual rights. On the other hand, normative centralism would limit the tendency of communities to become tyrannical and to restrain individual rights and liberties. One should mention here "lenient communitarism" according to which state confinement policy should be replaced with policies that encourage community norms which can ensure the emergence of plural normativity. To solve this socionomic dichotomy governmental policies include, among others, institutions and resources by which certain social groups can be reintegrated in a centralized normative system. Phenomenologically, normative multipolarity appears as a multiplication of regulatory institutions (systems) which, paradoxically, regulate the same types of social relations differently, depending on the type of each local community. It is useful to refer to the programme of gentrification (Engl. gentry = person with a high statute), characterized by: the recolonization of old city centres with residents who have a high social statute; rehabilitation of the built areas and the introduction of new local services; bringing persons who have the same culture, customs, language or traditions in spaces which are especially designed for this purpose; economically reordering property values. Ideonomically, another form of pluralism may be illustrated by the multiplication of virtual communities which, even if they exclude direct (face to face) relations, they are "real" communities as regards their capacity to form, regulate and support a certain community type. Such virtual communities do not rely only on technical computer-based communication means (CMC), but also on a set of common norms and values which set forth specific behaviour norms. Thus, Facebook does not only facilitate communication between individuals, but also coordinates social and political movements; at least in the sphere of ideonomy the set of norms used and officially accepted does not agree with the problem of dispersing "ideal" power centres within a society. We consider that the spread of Internet isolates the individual from the community since more and more often and more and more deeply people get lost in cyberspace or better said become alienated. Lastly, a conflict arisen between virtual (online) community and the real (offline) community brings about the question of politically recognizing the rights of each community. Thus, we can use as a work hypothesis the fact that an ideonomic community can ensure socionomic politoarchea thanks to the fact that conceptual identity determines individuals to conform to a regulation system.

Phenomenology of law deals with normative plurality which it regards as an effect of each group's (community's) manifesting its own will, thus, trying to regulate its own (adequate) system of norms, principles and institutions. Ideonomically, self-regulation requires being aware of the existing normative, legal or non-legal norms, principles and values, which are valid for the entire community. Normativism without subjectivism (understood as an inherent will of any person) would be impossible; let us remember Abraham Lincoln's statement according to which no man is sufficiently good to govern another man, without the latter's consent. Although the fact of being aware of a norm is not a coercitive (phyisically speaking) process, as Dennis Wrong points out, awareness generates a certain tension; according to Freud, the fear to lose someone becomes a threat, so it is coercitive. Ideonomically speaking, being aware of one's obligations is essential for a decentralized normative theory; each attempt to break a norm generates a risk. The problem of legal deconcentration has been ideonomically dealt with avant la lettre by Max Weber who considered that - for the members of the legal profession - norms have value only if they reflect the idea of justice; this approach is different from the sociologists' perspective, according to which norms have social value only if they can be used. Ideonomically, the existence of a decentralized normative system relies on the idea that individuals can become aware of their obligations and thus the observance of norms is simpler and quicker for them in comparison with the situation in which norms would be imposed on them from the outside. According to Kohlberg's theory, there are three levels which mark the evolution of any person's moral judgement; on the first level, the "pre-conventional" one, individuals observe laws for fear of a penalty or because they have a certain interest to do so; on the second level, the "conventional" level, individuals observe the law because they understand that moral principles represent a necessity; on the third level, the level of "abstractization", individuals observe legal norms, contractual obligations and justice considering that they are rational forms of existential regulation. Normative polarity is socionomically revealed by the distribution of the regulation capacity among more social power centres; however, ideonomically the situations is different for it is the individual's consciousness that adopts, rejects or is neutral to the social norm. A. Lipietz adopts the same perspective. He states that progress by itself must not be obtained by any means unless it ensures the progress of the individual and collective options; from this point of view, he suggests a form of solidarity which can be accomplished by granting subsidies to "self-organized" or social utility actitivities. Thus, ideonomically, normative pluralism requires the existence of institutions that allow regulation centres and autonomous institutions to interfere; this is particularly important for it ensures solidarity and community development. If we agree with the premise that any comunity has its normative system and that this system constitutes the "law" of the community, we can draw the conclusion that politoarchea illustrates the lawfulness of law's self-regulation. Ideonomically, politoarchea is the cognitive dimension of a community and it represents its vision regarding the system of norms which ensures its existence; in this context, community norms are landmarks for the evolution of the legal system, for the modification, regrouping or the replacement of certain law principles. From a socionomic perspective, the dimension and importance of individual, group or collective interests imposes a path dependence upon the values and principles of the legal system. According to politoarchea, a system of norms, once settled, distributes normative power among different regulation centres according to community norms, values or principles, which are more or less socialized.

The dissemination of the regulation power among communities illustrates the fact that normative policentrism is indisolubilely linked to trans-community relations. Starting with the Middle Ages corporatism has proved to be a phenomenon which distributes socio-economic power among corporations and crafts organizations that were meant to regulate and control industrial and commercial activities and which, besides the clergy and the noblemen, formed the third socially important category in the state. The corporatist phenomenon is much older; thus, we can mention Titus Livius who used the phrase corpus civitatis to designate the community and Sallustius who used the phrase corpus fabrorum to designate the iron smiths craftmanship. According to the phenomenology of law, corporative normativity is important for us from two points of view: from a sociocratic perspective, since it reveals that these two non-state organizations have the authority to impose generally-compulsory norms for all its members and from a politocratic perspective, since these corporations function as normative institutions which represent an interface between the state and its citizens. Although the industrial revolution surpassed this form of social organization, the idea of corporatism was embraced by E. Durkheim in sociology and it was depicted as a useful institution for the moral training of the population, for the regulation of social discipline and for reducing anomia that modern society is suffering of. From a socionomic perspective, E. Durkheim understood that the state cannot surmont anomia, first of all because it does not establish a direct link with citizens and secondly because it has a neutral position as far as the civil society is concerned. Corporatist ideology was subsequently embraced by political interwar fascist institutions, which had an ethnically strong connotation. Franco's plan to build a corporatist Spanish society was the most sustainable and probably the most authentic plan, though in Italy under Mussolini there existed a series of corporatist institutions. In Spain and Italy, national assemblies and state councils were organized in a similar way with corporations and less as constituencies or in accordance with the changeable electoral system. According to the fascist ideonomy, corporatist ideonomy was good for it avoided class disputes during democratic elections. Politoarchea affects relations between politocracy and the civil society since normative decisions are the result of conflicts between the interests, strategies and ideologies specific for different social organizations. Politocracy may impede access of other social structures to the decision-making process for saving its values and interests and this might lead to a normative blockage or to a legislative lack of decision. In this context, some European states accept the neocorporatist process of law-making according to which normative decision is the product of an institutinoalized dialogue between politocracy and the sectorial sociocracy. In this context we mention European integration as a phenomenon which implies decentralization and economic liberalization processes and which offered sociocracy ideonomic arguments for contesting the supremacy of the state in the law-making process. According to the political phenomenology of law, politoarchea determines the clash between the law-making political system and decentralized law-making systems; the unification, coordination and integration of normative systems do not depend upon the state but upon non-governmental decentralized networks. "State-sectorial corporatism", normative pluricentrism tend to be replaced with negotiated normative centralism, which is more efficient because it allows the creation and implementation of public policies that are accepted both by the state and the local or sectorial communities. Normative pluralism functions thanks to neo-corporative institutions which currently indicate that politocracy is more and more inclined to closely cooperate with sociocracy (corporations, trade unions, employers associations, etc.) in the legislative domain with a view to more efficiently accomplish its functions of coordination and political control over society. Policentrism ensures a form of state organization in which there is a limited number of power centres which are ranked and differentiated per technical, scientific, economic etc. sectors of activity. What is important from a politonomic perspective is the fact that these corporations are regulated by the state and the legal statute they acquire ensures their reprezentation monopol in the sector in which they are active; on the other hand, these corporations are subject to the control of the state, as well as to the legal forms of access to political leadership. From a politonomical point of view, neo-corporatism proposes that public power distribution, as a multiparty governing system, should be accomplished by state representatives and social partners, as well: trade unions, employers associations, professional associations, farmers. Neo-corporatism is an institutionalized political compromise accomplished through legal norms according to which social organizations accept the status-quo (by which trade unions give up salary expectations) and the government representatives offer guarantees for a certain level of social welfare (by means of social security). The beneficial effect of this compromise consists in the participation of corporations to the legislative process, as well as to a more facile implementation of social norms. Moreover, we can talk about legal policentrism as an effect of the normative system multiplication determined by the requirements imposed by corporations or public utility foundations through the legal norms that regulated the organization and functioning thereof. Politocracy allows the setting up of corporations because these institutions can regulate and offer public services in sectors in which the state does not provide them: the physicians' association, the architects' order, bars associations, public notaries associations, experts associations, evaluators associations, farmers associations etc. Obviously, neo-corporatism as a state phenomenon generates legal modifications; see the mixt legal regime of corporations, which are subject to public law and civil law. In these cases, the polinormative system is favourable because it leads to the specialization of management; the legal regulation is accomplished by specialists, by persons who have the same specialization as the people who manage the system; physicians for medical services; professors and teachers for educational services; artists for the field of art, etc.

Normative pluralism – according to the sociocratic theory – states that certain social (structures) groups are entitled to set up normative institutions within a public area. The plural character of self regulation systems – which are specific for local communities – has been borrowed from the socialist theory of self-management, according to which society must be politically organized as a system of political centres (commune / town / region councils) economic centres (cooperative societies, mutual societies, worker councils). The possibility of setting up multiple normative systems within the state is supported by the postliberal democratic doctrine which states that it is necessary to introduce ”economic responsibility”; the new structures of socio-economic power could be considered as institutions which are accountable to the community even though they are not subject to official legal norms. According to H. Gintis, a democratic control of the economic power structures would allow the collectivization (as a marxist concept) of property and the use of property for promoting individual rights. From an ideonomic point of view, we should reverse the relation between the individual and the economic organization of society in order to create a normative system in which work no longer remains a goal in itself but rather an evolution (a progress) of the individual within a democratic state. These sociocratic arguments form the basis of the theories regarding regulatory autonomy of local communities and the self-governing concept. Phenomenology of law states that local self- government cannot be assimilated with the notion of autonomy since it mirrors the executive dimension of normativity, i.e. the obligation to apply state legislation. A real autonomy of local authotities, which would give free leeway to normative pluralism, is possible only if ”executive responsibility” was transfered from these authorities towards social structures, as G. Boismenu, P. Hamel and G. Labica have pointed out. Sociocratic polarity also implies the problem of determining the subject of normative institutionalization, which may be a community (local, regional, national etc.) or an authority of public administration. One of the suggested solutions is to transfer normative power from public authorities to citizens or, more precisely, to certain citizen structures (committies). The so-called ”re-invention of governing” has as a starting point the possibility to distribute regulatory power and social control within community structures. Decentralization is more efficient than the centralization of legislative power because it allows communities to adopt autonomous decision and because it ensures the setting up of communities. Adopting such a normative structural model leads, according to M. Massenet, to the creation of a system of mutual and continuous dependence which would represent an alternative to the pyramid-like bureaucracy which is specific for the state. Sociocratic normative polarity manifests as an institutionalization of the relations between the existing different power centres: sociocratic supporters (who want to increase their profit), politocracy supporters (who want to maximize their decision-making power) and bureaucratic representatives (who want to augment their influence). Within a competitive system, distribution of regulatory power between institutions depends on the political force of each of them: according to this axiom the state is obliged to modify legislation in order to be able to counterbalance the normative efficiency of private institutions. The state which cannot (self) regulate its institutions is surpassed by private institutions: corporations, interest groups, non-governmental agencies. From this point of view, the phenomenon of ”agency transformation” is in its turn conclusive for legislative policentrism; the state ”transfers” regulation and control power towards private agencies, which it supports financially, totally or partially, by means of state subsidies. On the other hand, one cannot leave aside tehnical and scientific deconcentration thanks to which special institutions (moral persons of public law) have become autonomous - as far as their regulation is concerned - in relation to the state and territorial colectivities. Sociocratic normative policentrism must be analysed as a form of ”socialization” of normative power because it expresses freedom to adopt decisions from an ideonomic perspective thanks to the capacity to self manage socionomically and to the right to self-government.

First of all, politoarchea seems limited by legal centralism which is justified most of the times by the obligation of the state to ensure ”general interest” as opposed to normative decentralization that gives free leeway to group or individual interests. Ideonomically, the theory of normative centralism is difficult to support with arguments simply because ”general interest” is an ideal goal and it can be accomplished both in a centralized and decentralized system at a community level. The ideal of normative centralization is to centralize a community ideal so that no normativity is necessary. Socionomically, it is however proved that a right is ensured in a ”centralized” way to the extent to which the political system guarantees it as a ”decentralized” right, which means that the right is guaranteed at local level, even if by means of the confining force of the state. The state guarantees individual freedom as any other right of general interest; however, this ”general interest” can be accomplished in a centralized way as well as in a decentralized way (under certain conditions). J. Chevallier sustains that general interest theory is used as an ideological weapon to harmonize the adherence of public administration to the state policy. Thus, legal centralism is ideonomically justified by general interest which stems out of the Christian ideal of the ”common welfare” and out of the ”general will” principle. Legal centralism comes to an ideonomic deadlock when it tries to legitimate, by means of the general interest, both normative power (the right to regulate) and normative autonomy (the right to self- regulate). Political phenomenology of law states that general interest paradoxically represents an ideonomic contradiction: on the one hand, it justifies obediance to political power (the only legitimate power which is entitled to define a collective interest) and, on the other hand, it represents the basis for political freedom (the only force which is entitled to limit power). From a politonomic point of view, we can notice that only authorities which are invested with public power are entitled to consider that an activity represents a public service; moreover, not any activity of public interest is a public service; consequently, we must accept the idea that public service expresses the will of the state, which illustrates the political nature of law. Politoarchea is meant to prove that political power attempts to establish what rights and liberties concur to the accomplishment of public interest and it also attempts to legally enforce them. The idea that general interest is a political basis for normative institutions comes to support the theory developed by politoarchea because normative institutions are in extremis normative ”services” meant to serve general interest. Thus, the normative service constitutes a legal version of the general interest concept; justice, administration, national defence, etc. are institutionalized forms of normative services that are subject to general interest. Socionomically, one can regard ”general interest” as a premise for the decentraliztion of normative power so that the state can implement its policy regarding individual rights and liberties in a centralized way at all levels. Politoarchea is not concerned with normative centralization or decentralization, but with the fair or unfair effects of normative power; from this point of view, the right of central authorities to take fair measures is preferable to the right of decentralized authorities to take unfair (discriminatory) measures and vice versa. Normative power cannot justify any discrimination though in administrative law certain discriminations are accepted under certain circumstances and under the obligation to observe the principles of eequality and proportionality. Decentralization of normative services has permanently faced with ideonomic centralism: as the state decentralized regulatory power within the community sphere, it had to justify its normative power. That is why the normative system is still centralized in areas like education, communications and information services with a view to supporting ideocracy. From a socionomic perspective, decentralization is necessary because an absolute decentralization is not possible from a social point of view, which does not mean that centralization cannot be maintained by deconcentrated institutions. The setting up of such institutions (the prefect is the typical example) has a double purpose: on the one hand, to maintain the normative power of the state through the exercise of legality control over local authorities acts and, on the other hand, to maintain state cohesion by coordinating contradictions between centralized power (territorial state administration) and local power (local administration autonomous authorities). From a politonomic perspective, the correspondence between legal decentralization and normative deconcentration is determined by the fact that administrative units have the same territorial limits as local collectivities. The more numerous deconcentrated jurisdiction prerogatives of state institutions, the bigger in number normative attributions of local powers. Thus, politoarchea refers to the transfer of normative power from the state to the deconcentrated institution level; deconcentrated structures have an ever increasing regulatory competence on socionomic level in comparison with central authorities which are confined to the ideonomic (concept, design, evaluation, etc.) perspective.

(b) Territorial policentrism

From a territorial point of view, normative pluricentrism implies the distribution of the regulatory power by the local (regional) collectivities which from an ideonomical point of view makes regulation to be mistaken for local autonomy. At territorial level, normative pluralism is relevant for the phenomenology of law because it mirrors the divide et impera (i.e. organize in order to govern) governing principle; this principle illustrates the territorial delimitation of a state out of political reasons; we should not forget that the root of the word ”territory” - jus terrendi refers to the right to frighten (to terify). With its modern connotation, the term ”territory” is an ideonomic representation of political frontiers and it started to be largely used after the French Revolution in 1789 as a political and legal system for the administrative coordination of the nation-state; e. g. in the French doctrine territorial units were considered as internal spaces of the national territory. Phenomenology of law illustrates the fact that territorial organization is just an application of the Roman political principle (not the application of a legal principle) because its role is basically a politocratic one. Normative multipolarity proves that the organization of the state does not depend on criteria like: ”population” or ”territory” but on political criteria. If parts of the territory were ”sovereign”, they would become states, a fact which would anihilate political power at central level (politocracy) and politocracy has always perceived itself as the sole sovereign authority. At territorial level the polarization of the legal regulatory power is mirrored by the normative regionalization phenomenon according to the principle of organizing the state into territorial administrative units which are smaller than the state and bigger than local collectivities. The policy of regionalism has evolved in several stages and it was determined by the development of national states within multinational empires such as the Austrian-Hungarian Empire and the Russian Empire. Regional organizations were interested in administrative, cultural and political autonomy for promoting the rights of certain nationalities. Starting with the 8th decade in the 20th century, regionalism has been more valued as a consequence of the European integration which leads to the creation of consociative democracies; at this point in our paper one should mention Denis de Rougemont, who noticed avant la lettre that regionalism is an element of the new European construction because it pushes federalism towards regionalism. Regionalism related to the political polarization of normative systems is important for several reasons: firstly, because regulations mirror the unbalance existing between the different parts of the national territory; secondly, because normative systems allow differences to exist between different territories as regards the regulation of cultural and linguistic rights; thirdly, because local normative systems are opposed to the normative centralism of the state. Normative plurality implies the existence on large geographical areas of many regional decision-making institutions, which comprise several territorial administrative units of the state. From a politonomical point of view, regionalism mirrors a certain territorial configuration of the state, which is easier to manage by means of local administrative structures. Consequently, from a politonomical point of view the essence of regionalism consists in applying a political principle regarding the administration of the territory on several local communities which are grouped in so-called ”development regions”. We can notice that regions are in fact institutions which have their own self-regulatory systems; from this perspective it would be relevant to mention the fact that at European level there are two forms of territorial division: normative regions, created by establishing borders according to legal and administrative criteria and analitical regions which function thrgough the association of geographical complementary areas or as homogenous regions (they are created through the aggregation of areas which have similar characteristics).

Phenomenology of normative policentrism proves that those forces which vehemently require the modification of normative systems in accordance with the principle of regionalization were and still are local (”peripherical”) political parties because they represent the interests of ethnic and cultural communities. The analysis of party systems which pursue their activity in European states proves that the setting up of new normative institutions is the result of the opposition which exists between political trends which support decentralization and those which support normative decentralization. In unitary states, excessive concentration of political power has led to the emergence of conflicts between center and periphery, which led to a revision of constitutional principles through the extension of territorial and administrative decentralization types. The clash between center and periphery makes the object of the confrontation between centralists, unitarists or nationalists on the one hand, and regionalists, autonomists or federalists, on the other hand. If we accept the hypothesis that the center is the state, then centralism means maintaining a unique regulatory system within peripheries, too, though local communities are different from each other from an ethnical, linguistic, cultural and religious point of view; that is why national parties support legal centralism in contrast to ethnic-regional parties which support decentralization. Legal policentrism socionomically mirrors the capacity of local communities to autonomously regulate themselves, while politonomically legal policentrism mirrors the right of local communities to set upt their own regulatory institutions. This type of legal policentrism socionomically illustrates an administrative decentralization which does not affect politocracy directly especially because it does not imply political power but the functioning of normative institutions; on the other hand, politocracy is rather interested in the way in which normative institutions accomplish their political mission than in the way in which politocracy is organized and it functions. Since local (regional) public authorities are led by political party representatives, decentralization may also imply a transfer of normative but not political power; although the right to make decisions is decentralized, paradoxically, the content of decision is centralized: no matter the legal form the decision act may have, that decision is going to illustrate the local political parties representatives' will simply because party representatives are obliged to comply with the party policy. Consequently, the transfer of attributions (including the legal regulation law) from the cental to the local level cannot be regarded as political decentralization. Since this normative decentralization does not affect politocracy, the legal system is permissive for it recognizes the right of local sociocracy to set up organization and functioning norms for its own institutions. That is why politarchea as Robert Dahl defines it should not be assimilated with a multiplication of command centers or with the dispersion of power but rather with self regulatory systems in which public authorities are influenced by sociocracy and in which citizens can control their leaders. In this respect*, The European Charter of Local Self-Government* (Art. 3 section 2) states that the autonomy right shall be exercised by councils or assemblies which are made up of members elected by free, secret, equal, direct and universal vote and which can use executive and deliberative bodies that are suborinated to them; moreover, autonomy implies the right to organize citizens assemblies, referendum or any other form of citizen direct participation. The election of public authorities is legally regulated by politocracy; furthermore, citizens' direct participation is ideonomically a way of self-government. For politocracy it is difficult to accept a parallel, external or competing form of government which might have different results, as it is difficult to accept an enlargement of the democratic frame determined by the mitigation of government resources that might be used to defend the opposition or to accept a confinement of the democratic frame through the mitigation of the opposition resources. Consequently, from a socionomic perspective, territorial decentralization may be legally regulated through norms that reduce the volume of workload from the "center" and allow the functioning of more "peripheric" local power centres. From a politonomic point of view, territorial decentralization may be legally regulated though it cannot be politically justified as long as sovereignty implies the unique character of power (rather than its multiplication). In conclusion, we can say that legislative policentrism mirrors a normative autonomy which is politically regulated while the very power of autonomy is legally supported.

Phenomenology of law brings into evidence the fact that normative polarity has at territorial level a politonomic character since normative policies are elaborated and implemented in the territory in accordance with political will. We should not forget that the notion of "territoriality" became important during the French Revolution thanks to Paul Allies who used it to directly refer to the natural representation of political frontiers to which the legal significance of state administrative organization was added. From an ideonomic perspective, territoriality is only a compromise between the elective principle and the bureaucratic principle, according to which political authority functions only through the agency of administration; this is the reason why ideocracy attempts to argument territorial delimitation by non-political institutions and consequently legitimate state authorities at local level. From a socionomic perspective, territorialization means dividing the state according to politocratic criteria and transfering public authority to local elites, i.e. sociocracy; thus, a "peripherical" power is created and it is exercised by local representatives and public officials etc. who must accomplish the general (state) will at territorial level. Territorial political polarization is accomplished through deconcentration governmental policies at local level; political polarity of normative systems is accomplished socionomically through self-governing institutions which are specific for any local collectivity; finally, political polarity is ideonomically justified through the theory of the local welfare which prevails over general interest. This multicentrism is considered by P. Gremion as a manifestation of "peripherical" power since both high officials and local civil servants guarantee the accomplishment of general interest since they represent the state in its deconcentrated structures. From a politonomic point of view the notion of "peripherical" power is improper because by definition power seen as a form of exercising social dominance is centralized. According to the phenomenology of law, J. C. Thoenig's opinion regarding the fact that all local collectivities acquire the statute of legitimate spaces for integrating public policies is much more useful for understanding normative polarity; in fact, the way regulatory power (and not the territory) is used may be legitimate or illegitimate in a state. Thoenig refers to the French type of territorial state when he defines the new forms of collective power institutionalization at the level of of "communes" and "departments" from a socionomic perspective. Normative polarization reveals at different territorial levels that legal institutions and regulation procedures of the "local interest" are different and often come in contradiction with state institutions which promote "general interest". Political polarity of normative systems is determined by the content of regulation; e. g., in the Anglo-Saxon doctrine, different terms are used to define territoriality of a public policy: local government, urban governance, policy networks or alliance for development. Consequently, at ideonomic level, institutions which are regarded both as a central and as a local normative authority come to be considered legitimate. The distribution of regulatory power among a central and a local authority led to paradoxical situations such as the coexistence of two different authorities in the same individual – this is the case of "competition" generated by normative decentralization between different authority positions; moreover, this competition can be noticed with persons who occupy two public positions, one at central level and one at local level (see systems that allow a person to simultaneously occupy more public positions). According to the phenomenology of law, political polarity is important for it determines the subject of a regulation in a particular case – e.g., in some legal systems, such as the French one, a Member of Parliament can also be a mayor. In this respect, O. Duhamel comes with a socionomic solutions, i.e. to neglect the political dimension of normative acts since decentralization refers to the executive system not to the legislative system. Such an approach cannot be ideonomically supported for normative acts always illustrate a certain political ideology; moreover, the solution cannot be politonomically argued for normative acts generate effects only if they are guaranteed by a political and legal system.

From a phenomenological perspective, politoarchea can be set up through the distribution of regulatory power in the elaboration of local policies by the state through the investment of local authorities with different powers. In fact, the phenomenon of politoarchea appeared in the European states once local development principles were created; let us not forget that public authorities were entitled and ogliged to facilitate relations between enterprises and local institutions in order to ensure the economic and social progress of the local collectivity. As the process of decentralization spread, forms of politoarchea improved so that regulatory power became "specialized": e.g. in France, regions have regulatory power in territorial planification, professional training, etc.; departments exercise their regulatory authority in healthcare, social security, transport, education activities a.s.o.; communes exercise their regulatory power for commune urbanism, schools etc. In a negative sense, politoarchea illustrates that the implementation of ”central” legislation depends on a multitude of ”local” application norms; e. g., let us take into consideration environmental legislation in which there are a large number of technical instructions which illustrate a certain political connotation to application norms. Normally, dispositions issued by local public administration authorities comprise interdiction norms, preliminary authorizations, fines which hinder the application of central legislation. In a positive way, politoarchea implies regulations which stimulate the implementation of central legislation and contracts whereby the state associates with local collectivities for accomplishing common interest projects. The normative capacity of politoarchea is illustrated by the augmented regulatory power of local collectivities which - beyond the normative frame established by the central power - have created specific ways of adopting decisions: within towns communities, regional councils, trans-border development committees, etc. The phenomenon is illustrated in the American economic doctrine which approaches local development through the perspective of ”administrative” regions because both state and private institutions can benefit from these decentralized structures; all towns can be administrative regions and can ensure what is known as a relational economy. Politoarchea is also illustrated by a large number of econonomic structures which are autonomously organized at local level; moreover, from an ideonomic perspective, these decentralized structures are known as ”focal point regions” even if they are not recognized as legal persons from an administrative and territorial point of view. The concept of focal point region implies the idea that there are regions within other larger regions which have the same regulation form, e.g. commercial regulation. Phenomenology reveals the fact that politoarchea is also illustrated by ”public conventions” which are normally concluded at regional or local level between public administration authorities and private legal persons as public-private partnerships. From an ideonomic perpsective, the public-private partnership defines a rule which refers to the research, designing and creation of normative acts that could not be accomplished if the public and private sectors acted separately; as a socionomic institution, public-private partnership requires a set of rules as to the share each one is entitled to obtain from the resulted benefits and the responsibility each party has; politonomically, partnership is a form of settling social and economic disputes and of controlling normative policy making. What is of interest for the phenomenology of law is the fact that by public conventions several types of contractual relations – which are different from private and administrative contracts since they have a political rather than legal nature – become official.

Phenomenology of law has recorded essential modifications at all territorial levels; ideonomically, one can notice a change in the mentality of local authorities, which is illustrated by the issuance of normative acts that are specific for a certain community and, thus, different from the acts that are applied for other communities; socionomically speaking, one can notice the modification of community regulatory systems according to the interests of local pressure groups; politonomically speaking, one can notice that regulation for the ”public interest” is a construct limited to a territory and a community, without any interference with the ”general (or national) interest”. If we take into consideration the politonomic criterion, territorialization actually indicates a deconcentration of the public power as a reply to legal state centralism; to politocracy the aim of territorial administrative delimitation is to facilitate the exercise of power and not to apply the descentralized principles. In reality, these plans interact so that the phenomenon of legal regulation appears either as a manner of justifying a normative policy at territorial level or as a necessity to solve territorial problems by an adequate normative policy. Phenomenology reveals that the limitation of the state normative power started when legislative autonomy of certain deconcentrated institutions was recognized; subsequently, this phenomenon extended to public authorities which are elected by the citizens; finally, the state ”tutelage” was reduced to its a posteriori control as regards the legal nature of normative acts. Paradoxically, to allow decentralization the state enlarges legal limits in order to defend individual freedoms by means of centralized institutions: hierarchical administrative (or tutelage) control; the control exercised through the initiative of the aggrieved person; the conciliation procedure through the agency of the Ombudsman; civil administrative liability, etc. Legal policentrism has a series of supporters of public choice who consider that public institutions are set up, evolve and disappear under the influence of the exchanges between individuals. Taking this opinion as a starting point, another hypothesis was developed according to which the most important factors of normative deconcentration are not political decision factors, as E. Kiser stated, but rather the administration representantives (agents) and the administered persons who regulate administrative activity as a consequence of their interaction. The idea of coparticipating in the regulatory activity was borrowed from the public option theory by state representatives for improving regulatory services and also for adapting to budgetary limitations imposed by governments. Supporters of public authority autonomy and subsidiarity consider that the application of the ”public option” principle at the level of deconcentrated institutions is opposed to the traditional bureaucratic model by which civil servants were obliged to confine themselves to executing political decisions. The results of researching ”public options” have substantially contributed to the reform of regulatory systems: they have led to transformations in law enforcement besides social extranormative regulation, to free election management systems which stimulate state agents adopt innovations, conventions, collaborations, etc., to focusing controlling budgetary expenses on public utility services and to improving citizens-beneficiaries relations by introducing new communication and decision- making systems. Actually, the theory of public option does not contradict the fact that politocracy determines the nature and functions of the normative system; in this respect, normative policentrism illustrates content diversity and public policy application. Public option policy can be accomplished as an option for certain normative policies which can promote policentrism or on the contrary confine it. We can give a single illustrative example in this respect: the state still prefers to centralize social security policy and support expenses for offering unemployment payments though it could use the same sum for subsidizing enterprises which offer workplace to the unemployed. From a socionomic perspective, a decentralization of state obligations means an extension of normative policentrism by setting up non-state structures which can assume both social rights and duties. From a politonomic perspective, policentrism is supported by a ”modular policy”, a concept which was introduced by E. Gellner to define the flexible structure of political opportunities in forming (modifying) collective identities which are specific for modern societeis. Modular policy has first of all an ideonomic significance for it refers to multiple collective identities, mixes, interdependence and combinations thereof which influence political phenomena. Modularity – which is specific for territorial policies –socionomically determines legal policentrism because it imposes upon normative systems rules that are specific for ethnical, racial, sexual, professional and associative communities and that determine the so-called ”volatile colective identities”, according to Krieger’s terminology.

(c) Institutional policentrism

Multipolarity of normative services does not exclude the unique nature of regulating service standards; in this respect, we mention the right of government to exercise authority in maintaining uniformity (standards) services at national level, in domains such as: educational policy in France, the Austrian higher education system or the British social security system. Politoarchea illustrates the regulatory centres multiplication process which is determined by the political and legal decentralization process; the legal effect of this process is the legitimate possibility of each power centre to self regulate. Self-regulation politonomically represents a transfer of the state regulatory power towards institutions, basically local public authorities. Sociocracy (local political and administrative elites) will never give up the power that has been granted to them by the state; in this respect, the most important sector is the normative one. The state, in its turn, is interested in legal decentralization for avoiding political responsibility and transfering the task of social problem regulation to local level; multiplication of decision levels represents an insignificant cost in comparison with politocracy evasion. Thus, the welfare state yileds normative activity to local communities or, more precisely, to local sociocracy; consequently, territorial elites (represented by politically appointed persons or by persons elected by the citizens, as well as by a part of the high officials) become directly responsible for local problems. Politoarchea destroys state monopoly over social regulation and it makes society a democratic one because it distributes decision-making power to lower levels. Although Robert Dahl used the concept of ”poliarchea” only with a politonomic connotation, as a form of public authority control over government policies (except for ideonomy and socionomy), one has to appreciate his contribution to defining procedural democracy. A form of ”structural” politoarchea has started to be more and more used as a consequence of legislative authority decentralization from the state to regions and other territorial administrative units besides transfering legal responsibility from governmental to the local authorities level. Structural politoarchea is socionomically legitimized by the fact that decentralization allows (self)governing institutions to be more democratic, on the one hand, and more efficient, on the other hand, thanks to subsidiarity. It is known that within a legal bureaucratised system the activity is pursued in conformity with the norms established by the central power, which hinders the evolution of law firstly because political management is limited to controlling conformity of institutions and the system and, secondly, because it limits institutional innovation. According to politonomy, normative authority decentralization is necessary for the rule of law state to function, that is why many governmental policies have as a political objective the transfer of the regulation right towards local authorities; from a socionomic point of view, one can notice that community normativity is more efficient if it is accomplished through citizen institutions, simply because it expresses the others' interests. Normative power decentralization does not anihilate the power of central authority but it distributes regulatory responsibility between different political decision-making levels. Politoarchea creates a systems of distributing legal responsibility between different public authorities, system in which a central authority is entitled to monitore the way in which local authorities ensure uniformity; obviously, citizens must be equally treated by the law and this requires a limitation of the regulatory power entrusted to local authorities.

Politoarchea has become an ”institution” as a consequence of the fact that regulatory power was decentralized leading to the multiplication of normative public institutions and services. The distribution of normative power is a reaction to the tyrannical state which dominates civil society and imposes legal formalism. According to the phenomenology of law, politoarchea illustrates the fact that the regulatory keynesian model, i.e. centralized control of social institutions from top level management to the lowest hierarchical level, is still being debated. Politoarchea is the reaction to a political voluntarism which imposes a one-direction conception as to public policies and the way they are implemented in order to obtain the effects a wholly integrated system expects to obtain. Abandoning trust to the superiority of the state centrist system is the socionomic effect of legislative decentralization and institutional deconcentration. Paradoxically, the state intended to apply deconcentration because it is the quickest method for implementing political decisions and the most permissive form of political control. Once institutions are deconcentrated, the state has lost the right and capacity to regulate more specific domains. It is obvious that a legal decentralization is preferrable to an excessive legal system that rejects any community regulatory form or method; however, refuse to centralized legal control implies the risk of setting up anarchy for this refusal is opposed to the state and it leads to organizing ad-hoc regulatory forms. In order to conciliate state legally formalized institutions with normative autonomy, some authors, such as J. Donzelot, suggested (without using the term) an institutional politoarchea (formal meeting) which would ensure adhesion of social partners to a certain normative system. These decentralized ”institutions” are an alternative to state formalism and allow original societies, regions and even individuals to exist so that social and economic problems could be solved. Phenomenology of law reveals that institutional politoarchea was first of all created in the sphere of ideonomy; if the meaning of ”public regulation” phrase was initially correlated to collectivity, subsequently the phrase was interpreted as signifying regulation no matter what form regulation takes. Secondly, from a socionomic perspective, politoarchea illustrates the multiplication of regulatory services distribution criteria; initially, a public regulatory institution was preferred because it implied free of charge services; however, subsequently, institutions that offer paid services were preferred (because they proved to be more efficient) even if they were set up as private persons. Finally, at politonomic level, normative decentralization created a politoarchea of corporations; public notary services, as well as legal assistance / mediation / consulting services are examples of regulatory power distribution from the state to corporative level. From a phenomenological point of view, one can notice a movement away from centralized normative power to multipolary regulation forms, i.e. towards the policentrism of regulatory communities.

To the political phenomenology of law politoarchea is also very important; its forms are set up by formalized cooperation agreements concluded between different social structures in order to obtain common objectives, including in the domain of self-government. The idea of setting up a conventional politoarchea is present in Leopold Kohr's theory; according to Kohr the ideal of state organization creates a conglomerate of organizations, towns or smaller regions because they are more efficient and more creative than a huge state. According to Kohr, bigger states must transform into smaller ones which need to organize themselves as a federal system, like Switzerland, which has more equal and autonomous cantons. In its turn, R. H. Tawney pleaded for the radical democratization of society by dispersing power with a view to becoming aware of the "common welfare"; one of the ways in which power can be dispersed is regulating social and economic equality. Even if power must be concentrated, the process must be justified by "general interest". Tawney actually replaces the politonomic meaning of power with its ideonomic significance when he states that power is founded on the idea of "welfare" because power, understood as authority, can enjoy more legitimacy and social recognition in consequence.

Ideonomically, self-governing supports politoarchea because it ensures the autonomy of local collectivities; this significance is illustrated, e. g., in common law, through the concepts of local government or self-government. From a socionomic point of view, the principle of self-government implies the decentralization of administrative and financial competences from governamental level to the local public administration authorities level. The socionomic character of decentraliztion derives from the fact that public power which is exercised by local authorities is circumscribed by a political convention, i.e. delegated (or separated) competences. In other words, the degree of decentralization depends on the limits imposed by politocracy. These political limits define the content of decentralization, the territory / population size, the volume of resources and autonomous authorities. According to the phenomenology of law, the vulnerable point of conventional politoarchea is represented by the fact that any transfer of normative attributions towards local collectivities – in the context of maintaining the right of the state to pass laws – cannot generate political effects.

Institutionalized politoarchea is characterized by the fact that it centralizes power and it decentralizes its execution function; in this respect, legal centralism is the most eloquent example for the way in which public authorities, services and institutions implement centralized normative state policy in the territory. Legal centralism illustrates politocracy, the effort of government members to elaborate and implement normative policies by which certain legal principles or values could be justified. One has to recognize that legal centralism was avant la lettre defined by Thomas Hobbes when he stated that without a sovereign a society faces anarchy; we should not forget that in Hobbes's society it was not possible to have a non-legal social control system; today we have this possibility thanks to the existing ways of imposing normative decentralization. Both social and legal norms constitute premises for social order, which means that institutional politoarchea must ensure the correlation thereof; first of all, because fair social norms mitigate the public authorities intervention for enforcing the law; secondly, laws which ensure social equity are more easily enforced; finally, because laws which satisfy social interests have more chances to be applied. Politoarchea, thus, requires the organization of decentralized institutions that would allow power concentration be maintained; even if an institution is set up in order to increase the efficiency of political power, this institution does not survive unless it confines itself to concentrating its power. As Alan Minc points out, social factors (especially psyhological and cultural factors) play a more important role in establishing precedents than in expressing subsequent appreciations that might influence the individual's decisions (or the decisions of the social group) to avoid risks; economic factors are also important for the phenomenology of politoarchea because they direct the individuals' decisions towards low risk investments. Legal centralism obviously implies normative policies to be adopted at central level; however, this does not cancel the right of individuals or social groups to make decisions autonomously; for example, environmental regulations entitle enterprisers to independently choose their own methods for reducing pollution.

Conclusions

Politoarchea is limited as far as deconcentration is concerned because regulatory power distribution is accomplished at local level by means of public institutions which are meant to implement a unique political power and maintain legal centralism and because they are invested with decision-making power in a domain which is strictly legal. Deconcentration as a way of organizing administration allows politocracy to maintain its right to adopt decisions at central level, including the right to adopt power-like prerogatives, to appoint or remove from office those in charge with the running of different institutions and deconcentrated services, to impose compulsory obligations on the institutions in the territory, to control or even to be subject to the activity pursued by these institutions etc. It is obvious that these institutions cannot be defined otherwise than politonomically since from a socionomical point of view it is difficult to justify the functionining of similar institutions while there are different legal regulations. Politoarchea grants a local institution the power to legally regulate at territorial level though politically this institution is subject to central power. Politoarchea implies institutional deconcentration since politonomically it illustrates the right of politocracy to set up its legal institutions.

The most illustrative example is the right of central authorities to appoint political persons in managerial positions within public institutions; governments appoint representatives in the territory to coordinate the deconcentrated public services for central administration. This leadership concept has, from an ideonomic perspective, a political significance since the prefect, e.g., exercises his authority in the name and interest of accomplishing the government political programme. Politoarchea illustrates the political transfer of social (state) leading powers at the level of communities in conformity with the existing legal norms and procedures. Socionomically, a decision adopted by a public local authority generates legal effects on the whole collectivity though it is not issued by a sovereign authority but by a local public authority: land assembly, regional committee, county or local council, etc. Politonomically, the interpretation, amendment or application of law is a formal positive legal source thanks to the political character of local autonomy and not to the legal character of self-government.

Bibliography

- Boyer A.Mark şi Rorke T. John. World Politics – International Politics on the World Stage. McGraw-Hill/Dushkin, 2002.
- Ellickson Robert. Order without Law; How Neighbors Settle Disputes. Cambridge: Harvard University Press,
- 1991.
- Amitai Etzioni. Societatea monocromă – Normele sociale, rubiconul ştiinţei sociale. Iaşi: Polirom, 2002.

- Jobert Bruno, Muller Pierre. L`etat en action: politiques publiques et corporatisme. Paris: P.U.F., 1987.
- Alain Minc. Maşinăria egalitară. Bucureşti: Du Style, 1997.
- Dahl, Robert. Polyarchy: Participation and Oposition. Yale: Yale University Press, 1961.
- Dahl, Robert. Dillemas of Pluralist Democracy: Autonomy versus Control. Yale: Yale University Press, 1982.
- Lascoumes Pierre, Le Bourhis J.P. „Le bien commun comme construit teritorial. Identites d`action et procedures", Politix 42 (1998).
- Thoenig Jean Claude, Ashford Douglas*. L`Administration des routes et le pouvoir departamental. Vie et mort de la vicinalite*. Paris: Cujas, 1980.
- Duhamel Olivier. Le povoir politique en France. Paris: Seuil, 1993.
- Nicolae Popa*. Teoria generală a dreptului*. Bucuresti: Editura C. H. Beck, ediția a III-a, 2008.
- Braibant, Georges. Le principe de proportionalite. Paris: L.G.D.J., 1974.
- Huntington, S.P. Ordinea politică a societăților în schimbare. Iaşi: Polirom, 1999.
- Durkheim, Emile*. Les Regles de la methode sociologique*. ed. a XXI-a, Paris: PUF, 1983.
- Meares, Tracey, Dan*,* Kahan, „Law and (Norms of) Order", The Inner City, Law & Society Review 32 (1998).
- Kohlberg, Lawrence*,* „Moral Stages and Moralization, în Thomas Lickona. Moral Development and Behavior. New York: Holt, Rinehart and Winston, 1976.
- Boismenu, Gerard, Hamel, Pierre, Labica, Georges*,*. Les formes modernes de la democratie. Montreal: L` Harmattan, Les Presses de l`Universite de Montreal:, 1992.
- Rawls, John. A Theory of Justice. Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1971.

INNOVATIVE DELIBERATIVE DEMOCRATIC APPROACHES IN TRANSITION: THE CASE OF UKRAINE

DMYTRO VOLODIN[1]
MAKSIM MOSKALOV[2]

Abstract
The article dedicates with the problem of deliberation democracy mechanism formation and development, especially for post-communist countries. Moreover, some opportunities for deliberation development according to intellectual capital of public administration are observing.

Keywords: deliberative democracy, democracy deficit, intellectual capital of public administration, post-communists countries

Introduction

Nowadays under the conditions of socio-economic downturns it seems so, that the democratic triumphalism that took place since the collapse of the Soviet system is almost over.
However, we need to underline that examples of Arab uprising are about seeking of and looking for a democracy, so it is still the organizational model that many countries aspire to, but of course, it has its problems and limits. A lot of scholars argue that today we have a "deficit" in developed democracies (M. Warren and H. Pearse, 2008). And we can clarify such "deficit" with a lot of examples but one of the most biggest debates in this sphere was when the EU constitution project encountered opposition, and practices and scientists attributed that to a democratic deficit in EU institutions.

And of course, such question becomes again very actual in times of economic disturbances.

So we need to find a way how to "repair" our democratic institutions and one of the most popular trends in political science now is the model of "deliberative democracy", which is currently becoming the fastest growing trend in the field.
The concept of deliberation, of course, is not new. We can remember for example, Aristotle, who argued that ordinary citizens debating and deciding together can reach a better decision then experts acting alone (A.Gutmann, D. F. Thompson, 2004).

Moreover, Athenian direct democracy - is practically the only one case in the history when the state was running by not elected representatives, but the majority of citizens.

Of course, Athens was a typical slave state, where the dominant part of the rights, including the right of lawmaking, belonged only to citizens. Direct democracy in a such form was possible primarily because a limited population of the city-polis (even in times of prosperity, the population of such independent cities did not exceed 25 thousands of people)

With such a small population, it was very easy to organize a general assembly, and conduct voting just by show of hands, moreover it was simple calculated.

History of the Athenian democracy shows that direct democracy is possible only where citizens can freely communicate with each other in real time. Technical possibilities did not allow such activities in communities larger than a polis, but in the XXI century, because of new forms of communication inventing, it becomes more possible to implement some elements of direct democracy.

[1] Graduate student, LUISS School of Government, Italy (email: volodindmytro@yahoo.com).
[2] Researcher, Chernivtsi Institute of Trade and Economics, Ukraine.

But we cannot associate an Athens direct democracy and deliberation democracy, en rapport of all differences of ancient Greek regime.

Historically, for the first time, "deliberation" as a term was used in 1489 to refer a political discussion and further developed mostly in the UK, specially as parliamentary discussions (for instance, Edmund Burke in his "Speech to the electors of Bristol" mentioned that "Parliament is a deliberate assembly" (Payne, 1990)).

In future, the concept of "deliberation" was used by many political scientists, sociologists and philosophy scientists and scholars. But only in 1981 the term "deliberation" was used together with definition of "democracy". It was in the work of Joseph M. Bessette "Deliberative Democracy: The Majority Principle in Republican Government."(Bessette, 1981)

Hereafter, the number of scientists working with the theory and models of deliberative democracy is tremendous.

The main goal of this paper is to analyze examples of the deliberative democracy in the "old" democracies and countries in transition and to develop some proposals for its inoculation in such post-communist state as Ukraine.

In my work, I will adhere to such aggregate definition of deliberative democracy such as:

"Deliberative democracy is a systematical approach where citizens (not just experts or politicians) involved in public decision making and problem-solving, can produce collective decisions by offering reasons to one another for the sake of consensus, or perhaps to illuminate conflicts". (Fung 2005, Parkinson 2006).

So, how deliberative democracy is used in the "old" democracies and how they fill the democratic deficits? Such deliberative instruments can be: participatory budget; citizens assembly, deliberative polls etc.

For example, in the US, the Minneapolis Neighborhood Revitalization Program (Fagotto and Fung 2006), was an effective instrument (participatory budgeting) to solve local problems, increase cooperation between authorities and citizens (so improve a democracy through improving people participation) and in a result to achieve a real goals of local communities (local development). In the British Columbia citizens assembly example (Warren and Pearse2008), we can see, how such efficient process as elections, can be under discussion of common citizens. In AmercaSpeaks case, we can observe that even such technical decision as decreasing of country debt deficit proposal can be produced through people participation in deliberation process.

In general, deliberation and deliberative democracy can significantly increase a level of people political literacy; expand level of participation and credibility between authorities and citizens.

Timelines of topic

But the question of deliberation and deliberative democracy is actual not only for "old" democracies, but also its implementation can be very important for countries where democratic institutions are not so strong and must be improved. Especially, it can be very important for post-communist countries. However, deliberative democracy practices are spreading in non democratic societies, for example China. And even here, according to the deliberative democracy instruments, we can solve a current problems of local communities (for example – see deliberative poll in China, Fishkin, He, Luskin, Siu 2010).

Today, it is clear that the political development of post-communist countries can go in many different directions. Considering the post-communist and post-soviet landscape, we can observe examples of consolidated democracies (mostly successful, for example Poland, Hungary, Czech Republic etc.), some new authoritarian states (Russia, Kazakhstan, Uzbekistan), dictator (Belorussia) regimes and a number of hybrid regimes (Morlino 2009), "stuck" in the transition process (Ukraine, Kirgizstan, Armenia, Moldova).

In some countries we can observe the final steps of liberal democracy consolidation, in others – democratic institutions are combined with non-democratic, authoritarian, in the third - the formal democratic procedures are used as a facade behind which new varieties of autocratic rule are hidden. By themselves, the political institutions, even if they are designed for optimal democratic scheme do not guarantee the success of democratization (examples of this we can observe in more post-communist countries, in Ukraine for instance). A stable and consolidated democracy is not only an institutional framework, in addition to procedures, it should be based on certain structural foundation for the supporting socio-economic system rooted in society and the norms and values of democratic citizenship, in, special kind of "social capital" (see, for example. Inglehart 1999).

Deliberation could not replace a democracy itself, but can be an effective instrument of its improving.

Analyzing the experience of leading democracies (for example, for the US, we can refer to the long tradition of self governance reflected in the New England town meetings, as documented by Tocqueville) and successfully transformed post-soviet and post-communist countries (for example in Poland), we can underline that one of the most important factors of their development is implementation of deliberative democracy instruments. In Polish case, we can remember that even first Polish post-communist constitution was successfully adopted mostly because of efficient deliberation among citizens were the first role had “Solidarność” and church.

Can an implementation of deliberation mechanisms in such a system be a real driving force which helps these countries into a way of transition to democracy?

Why is it so important to concentrate our attention in deliberative democracy in analyzing post-communist countries in general and in Ukraine particularly? I can provide here some my ideas:

It is a first world example when more than 25 countries together began a transition to democracy (and for most of them such process was successful. Here the main difference from post-colonial African transition, was that this transition mostly failed)

Post-communist countries which were definitely similar before the process of transition to democracy today are very different especially from the level of democracy institution development. Here we can observe such examples as “triple” transition, like in Poland or so even “quadruple” transition, like in Ukraine (Kuzio, 2001);

In many post-communist countries the level of public institution support is very low (especially in Ukraine. According to the last enquiries, the general public support for state government – 22.9%; Parliament – 18.7%; police – 17.4%; courts – 14.3%, for details see http://www.spa.ukma.kiev.ua/konst/article.php/20110311134938704/print), so deliberative democracy in such countries (because of wide people cooperation) can justify citizens decisions and improve legislation and accountability.

Implementation of deliberative democracy instruments will significantly improve the level of political education among citizens and create a strong “social network” (Diani & McAdam 2003) in society. The deliberation process probably could not create new democratic values but no doubt, can increase moral satisfaction and agreement among people.

Historically in Ukraine, we can observe a lot of examples of direct and deliberative democracy.

To begin with, establishing of certain democratic traditions were consistent to the nature of European political evolution in Ukraine during the Kievan Russia state (IX - XIII cc.) It was expressed in the form of concluding agreements with the newly elected knyazh (prince) and when he took nationwide oath.

A nation-wide candidate for the knyazh throne "calling", is a practical implementation of the formulated much later, idea of national sovereignty, because the community here is the source of power 24.

Moreover, in the Kievan Russia, as a form of direct democracy, a veche (town's meeting in medieval Russia) was existing. However, slavic tradition of veche is difficult to identify with the ancient tradition of the national assembly not only because of extraordinary role of veche, but also because of poor process handling and the unpredictability of its results and consequences, which sometimes had a radical nature.

During the Cossack Ukraine (XVI - XVIII century.), the general government was a military council - "meeting of all troops." It convened to address critical issues, elections of Hetman, General Government, etc. In this way direct military democracy was working. In general, this mechanism of direct meeting of all troops was working fairly effectively.

Moreover, we need to underline that all officials that time were elected and accounted for their activities to voters.

By the way, in this time, the most European states were absolute monarchies and often have very limited self-government even at the level of local communities.

So in the days, when Ukraine was the sovereign state (IX - XIII century, XVI - XVIII century), it tended to establish a democratic system and often the level of democracy was ahead the most European states.

Ukraine was among the first countries where a constitution was adopted and the absolute monarch sovereignty was rejected. This was realized by the P. Orlyk Constitution (1710), so it was for 73 years earlier than the adoption of the American Constitution. Unfortunately, its provisions were never implemented in practice.

In current independent period (post-soviet), deliberation democracy system did not become a permanent effective system of country political live development.

However, deliberation mechanism in Ukraine was considered as very necessary, especially after “Orange revolution” (2004). For instance, in the White Book (official document about the democratization of decision-making process, prepared and published by the Secretariat of the Ukraine Cabinet of Ministers in 2006), one of the main problems and obstacles in transition to democracy was recognized as the absence of a citizen involving mechanism in the management of public systemic issues through consultation. And after this conclusion some elements of deliberation democracy were implemented. Here I can mention such examples as creation of civil boards at all ministries. With their assistance, a big part of legislation were modernized and transformed according to EU practice (for instance: "The law on the police", "Law on the Prosecution" etc.) Moreover, at more local level, were create a lot of citizens boards with voting privilege. But with new president (Yanukovich), mostly of those boards were disbanded. Why? The civil society in Ukraine is rather fragmented; ties between its separate elements are not wide enough and not intensive enough. This may be a reason why civil society is not ready for constant dialogue, furthermore - for equal partnership cooperation with the government. And for today the position of civil society in Ukraine cannot be clearly defined. From one side, civil society exists and functions in the tideway of democratic developments of last decades. From the other side – it is still too weak to fulfill its functions to the utmost, to guarantee real involvement of citizens to formation of national policy.

Furthermore, in Ukraine (like in mainly of post-communists countries) there is a lack of theoretical and methodological deliberation framework, taking into account national peculiarities of local conditions and fast changes. This together with inadequate regulatory framework is one of the main problems of deliberative democracy development.

Differences appear sometimes even in very similar practical cases, for example, in Poland according to Euro-2012 preparation, deliberation polls were conducted (For example, deliberative Polling in Poznań consulted the public about the future of the stadium, a major investment connected to the city’s preparation for the EURO 2012 tournament. Therefore, a decision was made to subject the long-term strategy of managing and financing the facility to public consultation[2]) and in Ukraine, which will host the same championship too, such activities were ignored absolutely.

In fact, even in nowadays deliberation is not new for post-communists countries, but this process can be fundamentally different not only from stable democracies examples but even from post-communist countries realities. Moreover, we can observe many examples of deliberation but not deliberative democracy. For instance, previous Kyrgyz President Kurmanbek Bakiyev announced in 2010 a shift from a democratic form of government based on elections and human rights to «national deliberative democracy". As Bakiyev said: " in our kurultai, which is enriched by people's views and opinions, I see a pattern to deliberative democracy....elections are nothing more than a "marathon-for- oligarchs"...the ideology of human rights gives rise to individualism and selfishness, which leads to a decline of public morality..." (Artemjev, 2010). According to his idea, the main legislative body of such system should be kurultai (regularly meetings of patriarchs).

But such decision brought to dissatisfaction of local political elites, so experiment broke down and was one of the reasons for further revolution [1].

Conclusions and proposals

The experience of leading democracies showed that deliberation democracy mechanism can help the public administration institutes and private sector to launch an effective and long-lasting cooperation system and improve credibility and legislation.

However, during the transition to the "knowledge based economy", we need to use new methods for deliberation too.

We propose to undertake research in the area of deliberation process, especially on the basis of the intellectual capital system creation and development in public administration. Even if we are used to mentioning intellectual capital theory from the economics point of view, it can be very important in the sphere of public administration development, especially at the process of cooperation between private and public institutions. We can formulate such definition:

Intellectual capital of public administration - the sum of all the knowledge, information and experience of a public body, workforce that can create new knowledge, wealth or provide competitive, efficient and new services (or its modernization). Such new knowledge, which includes both tacit and explicit knowledge, grows with the learning process that takes place within the organization and as a result of the shared interactions between the company and its customers, partners and suppliers. It is an aggregate value and consists of three main elements: human capital, organizational capital, capital of relation.

For public non-profit organizations, this effort has special potential for increased productivity. This is so for several reasons. These sectors are human capital intensive. Human capital is the primary source for organizational innovation and renewal. Finally, we are acquiring a better capacity through ongoing brain research to tap this potential resource.

There are a lot of differences in such mechanism creation and implementation, according to national specifics.

For Ukraine such mechanism (and elements of it), in particular, can be:

At the level of villages and towns (micro level):

- election of the district police officer (sheriff) in rural areas (U.S. experience) as well as some other positions on local and district level, for example such as: district surveyor, medical superintendent, and a heads of others public utilities (equivalent experience of zemstvo (district council in Russia in 1864 - 1918) in the Russian Empire);
- electivity of local judges (U.S. experience);
- reducing the number of village and town councils deputies, together with recall and the mayor "direct impeachment" mechanisms implementation (domestic experience of military democracy XVII ct.).
- the abolition of district councils in rural areas and their replacement by voluntary cooperation of local communities (Czech experience);

• development and introduction of regular public discussion about important projects decisions at the local level through modern processing facilities and transfer of information (the experience of Italy and the UK);

• introducing the practice of mandatory accountability of local elected official (the experience of many European countries).

At the city level:

• strategic decisions for regional development must be based only on local referendum;

• creation of the municipal police and a electivity for city level officials implementation (for example, chief architect, chief of public enterprises etc.);

• introduction of regular reporting of elected officials.

At the regional level (except the Autonomous Republic of Crimea):

• "governors" electivity (experience of U.S., Russian Federation etc.);

• rejection of the proportional election system for regional councils.

At the national level:

• improve the mechanisms of national and local referendums, in particular - working out the mechanisms of constitutional referendum and deliberate (national and local) referendum (experience of Switzerland, Italy, Great Britain);

• recognition of the referendum as prescription of direct action, that does not require any implementation (experience of many democratic countries);

• introduction of a new mechanism of judges and courts officials election for all levels (judges of first instance courts can be selected by local residents (according to the jurisdiction of these courts). Heads of courts and judges of higher courts can be chose by judges);

• significant expansion of ombudsman rights for the abolition of regulations and judicial decisions which violate human rights;

• introduction the position of locally elected ombudsman;

• reducing the number of parliament members (MPs);

• reducing the term of Parliament, local councils and elected officials (except the President of Ukraine) to 2 - 3 years;

• development and implementation of electronic voting and other activities aimed at reducing the cost of citizens voting, and in parallel - decreasing the probability of technical fraud;

• establishing a system of voters' evaluation for activities of executive authorities and their officials (civil servants) who are appointed (experience of the EU);

Moreover, for more effective implementation of deliberative democracy elements in Ukrainian realities, we need to provide some activities in the economic sphere too. It can be, for instance:

• promotion of the "middle class" position by giving priority for small business and self-employment developing and supporting by the state (EU experience);

• transition to the socially oriented proportional income tax system (specially for enterprises, on the principle: greater profitability - bigger tax rate (experience of Scandinavian countries);

• strengthening of governmental control over big business and monopolies on the domestic market an in parallel – to increase state support for Ukrainian business on foreign markets;

• implementing a real estate tax, increasing of land tax (rent).

Notes

Here I mean a “Second Kirgiz revolution” in the 7-th of April, 2010 after which president Kurmanbek Bakiyev escaped to Belorussia.

The first deliberation pool was conducted in Poznan (Poland), where local inhabitants discussed the possible uses of a stadium and infrastructure at the conclusion of Euro 2012

("Poznaniacy decydują o przyszłości stadionu" - http://poznan.gazeta.pl/poznan/1,36037,7281267, Poznaniacy_decyduja_o_przyszlosci_stadionu.html, the date of last access – 10/12/2011);

Bibliography

- Артемьев, Александр, 2010. Киргизбаши и его "совещательная демократия", (Available at: http://www.elections-ices.org/russian/publications/textid:4013/;
- Bessette, Joseph M, 1981. Deliberative Democracy: The Majority Principle in Republican Government" in How Democratic is the Constitution?, ed. Robert Goldwin and William Shambra (American Enterprise Institute);
- Diani, Mario and McAdam, Doug, 2003. Social movements and networks, Oxford University Press;
- Dryzek, John, 2002. Deliberative Democracy and Beyond: liberals, critics, contestations*,* Oxford University Press;
- Fishkin, James, Baogang,He, Luskin, Robert and Siu, 2010. Deliberative Democracy in an Unlikely Place: Deliberative Polling® in China, British Journal of Political Sciente (Available at: http://cdd.stanford.edu/research/papers/2010/fishkin---bjps---china.pdf)
- Fung, Archon, 2005. DEMOCRATIZING THE POLICY PROCESS, The Oxford Handbook of Public Policy, p. 669
- Gutmann, Amy, Thompson, Dennis Frank, 2004. Why deliberative democracy?, Princeton University Press;
- Inglehart, Ronald, 1999. Trust, Well-Being and Democracy, in Democracy and Trust, ed. Mark E.;
- Kuzio, Taras, 2001. Transition in Post-communist states: Triple or Quadruple?, Political Studies Association, Vol. 21 (3);
- Morlino, Leonardo, 2009. Are there hybrid regimes? Or are they just an optical illusion? European Political Science Review;
- Parkinson, John, 2006. Deliberating in the Real World: Problems of Legitimacy in Deliberative Democracy, Oxford University Press;
- Payne E. J., 1990. Speech to the Electors of Bristol Indianapolis, IN: Liberty Fund;
- Surowiecki, James, 2005. The Wisdom of Crowds, Random House Inc.
- Warren, Mark E., and Hilary Pearse, eds. 2008. Designing Deliberative Democracy: The British Columbia Citizens' Assembly. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

THE SOLUTIONS OF EURO ZONE CRISIS – A NEO-GRAMSCIAN CRITIQUE

MIHAIL CARADAICĂ[1]

Abstract
This paper belongs to the area of critical studies of European Integration and tries to analyse the nature of the European states' response to euro zone crisis, during the negotiation of European Fiscal Pact. The theoretical approach is neo-gramscianism, which is focused on social forces agency in the process of integration and super-structural dimension of European Single Market. Since 1980, the interests of big capital, gathered in the European Round Table, shaped a neo-liberal dimension of the European economy, adapting it to the context of globalisation.
But this neo-liberal project was also able to capture social-democratic, trade union and centrist demands into a neo-liberal European order, called by Bastiaan van Apeldoorn "embedded" neo-liberalism. This European model has also his limits because it puts the interests of capital in front of social policies through the assurance of market efficiency by EU. My purpose here is to see if during nowadays crisis, the European elite will apply the same economic principles of the embedded neo-liberalism trying to envisage rescue plans. To achieve this, I will follow the theoretical approaches of neo-gramscian authors like Apeldoorn, Bohle or Gill and analyse the state negotiations outputs during the European Council meetings.

Keywords:European Integration, neo-gramscianism, European Fiscal Pact

Introduction – The limits of classical debate

In the beginning of this article I will try to argue the necessity of a new theoretical approach in the field of integration studies. I am going to do this by showing the limits of the classic and middle-range theories, and how they fail to explain the process of European integration as a whole. The proof could be seen in the evolution of those theories. "When the integration process was going well, as during the 1950s and early 1960s, neo-functionalists and other theorists sought to explain the process whereby European integration proceeded from modest sectorial beginnings to something broader and more ambitious" (Pollack 2010, p. 17). But between 1960s and 1980s, when due the petrol crisis European integration lost its strength, "intergovernmentalists and others sought to explain why integration process had not proceeded as smoothly as its founders had hoped" (Pollack 2010, p. 17).

The main critique of the mainstream theories[2] is that, because of conceptual design, they are unable to understand the real nature of power in the European Union, and by this I mean that they cannot conceptualize the power relations which are part of capitalist market structures. "In other words, these mainstream theories fail to account for the structural power that determines the particular trajectory of European integration"(Apeldoorn, Overbeek and Ryner 2003, p. 17).

Neo-functionalism, with Ernst Haas as the main author, represent the dominant approach in 50's and 60's and state that European integration occurs because of supranational institutions, European bureaucracy and spillover process. The idea is that, once established, the new institutions tend to modify the interests, beliefs and expectations of the socioeconomic national actors which shall unite at supranational level (forming European interests groups) to influence European policies, supporting in this way the continuity of integration process (Apeldoorn, Overbeek and Ryner 2003, p. 21). Here is the first critique of neo-functionalism - that it cannot focus on the internal and external power of those groups - and because of this it cannot understand why some groups are more powerful than others in the process of establishing European Agenda (Apeldoorn, Overbeek and Ryner 2003, p. 22). Even if it recognises their existence and importance, this theory is not able to offer many details about the nature of groups. Another problem of the supranationalism in general is that many aspects remain under-theorized. For example, "there is no explanation of where transnational interests come from and why they would be so powerful" (Apeldoorn, Overbeek and Ryner 2003, p. 23), and this is possible because no explanation of how social forces shape socio-economic environment is available.

[1] Ph. D. candidate at the National School of Political Studies and Public Administration (email: mihai.caradaica@gmail.com).

[2] The mainstream theories are neo-functionalism, intergovernmentalism and liberal intergovernmentalism.

Intergovernmentalism, represented by Stanley Hoffman, is a European integration theory with the roots in international relation realism. Hereby, state interests are determined by the balance of power from the international anarchic system, while inside it is still a black box. The critique here is that "These national policy preferences are, however, not explained, but are taken as given" (Apeldoorn, Overbeek and Ryner 2003, p. 23).

The liberal intergovernmentalism of Andrew Moravcsik opens the state black box, establishing a theory of the national preferences formation. The nature of European integration can vary "depending upon which domestic groups are more successful in setting the agenda in the respective states" (Apeldoorn, Overbeek and Ryner 2003, p. 24-25). However, Moravcsik analyse does not go beyond the weaknesses and power of what he calls production groups, although it is obvious that they are favoured in front of consumers, tax payers or third world producers. In other words, "there is no interest in the structural inequalities that are constitutive of the balance of social forces and how these forces change over time" (Apeldoorn, Overbeek and Ryner 2003, p. 25). Theory is bounded by state-society relations, without consider any historical approach about the emerging of social relations. Another problem with the Moravcsik theory is that "social forces are contained within the boundaries of national states" (Apeldoorn, Overbeek and Ryner 2003, p. 25-26), almost an impossible issue in a European society more competitive and integrated in global economy.

The new approaches of European integration, middle-range theories, are by definition excluded from my analysis. "As the name suggest, middle-range theories do not have totalizing ambitions; they seek to explain aspects of a phenomenon rather than its whole" (Rosamond 2010, p. 108). My aim in this article is not to describe aspects of European integration, but the entire process. According with this, middle-range theories are no longer relevant.

The necessity of a new theory

The limits of the classical European integration theories have been located by Marxists authors since the European Community started to function. I would like to remember here Ernest Mandel, Nicos Poulantzas or Peter Cocks. The most important of them, in my opinion, is Peter Cocks due his article "Toward a Marxist Theory of European Integration" written in 1980. In this article, he tried to discover if and why integration occurs using a historical analysis of the capitalist development.

His analysis begins with a critique of the orthodox integration literature which is called fundamentally ahistorical, because of its incapacity for providing an adequate account of the roots of nowadays European integration. "Consciously or not, they avoided the question of whether integration is qualitatively different in different socio-economic formation, why it emerges at some historical periods and not others, and what the connection is between different levels of integration in distinct social systems" (Cocks 1980, p. 2). Following these basic questions, the duty of Marxist scholars is to investigate why specific patterns of integration arose in specific European eras. Cocks is trying to do this and state how those social, political and economic integration dynamics are shaped by the capitalist system. The configuration of these three phenomena, in time, "depends at minimum on the specific phase of capitalist development, the technological and administrative state of knowledge, the level of political consciousness of the masses, and the perception and activities of the dominant political and economic classes" (Cocks 1980, p. 35).

Since its beginning, capitalism presented distinct practices like: working in a wage system, private ownership of the means of production or the fragmentation of life. But more important, it created an ideology to justify its activities and to maintain its power structure. "The bourgeois mind thus to endorses individualism, the holding of private property, market relations, acquisitiveness, competition and profit, which are incorporated as values in everything from law, to education, to religion, to literature" (Cocks 1980, p. 35). Gramsci calls this "ideological hegemony" and it represents the next step for my research.

The neo-Gramscian theory continues the Marxist tradition in European integration studies and focuses on two central concepts: super-structural[3] dimension and social forces agency. It tries to capture a real picture of the integration by showing the real forces which shape the European decision-making process (market forces) and the nature of ideological hegemony.

Adam Morton, a neo-Gramscian author, wrote that "hegemony within the realm of civil society[4] is then grasped when the citizenry come to believe that authority over their lives emanates from the self" (Morton 2007, p. 93). Further, the dialectical relation between economic structure and ideological super-structure produces, as Gramsci state, the historical bloc. In classical Gramscianism, the historical bloc is the alliance between working class and bourgeoisie realized through the cultural hegemony. In nowadays European Union the ideological hegemony is represented by neo-liberalism. But as I already mentioned, this specificity of super-structure should be based on a specific arrangement inside of the economic structure, which is shaped by social forces.

The social relations, or force relations as Gramsci called them, are in fact relations between different social groups. Thus, the relations of force operate on three interconnected levels: structural[5], political[6] and strategic[7]. Methodologically, the object of the analysis is historical situation, and the method of analysis is the observation of force relations (Gill 2003, p. 51). In other words, the dynamic of force relations produces certain historical events. For example, it is difficult to elaborate a general theory which could explain in the same time the emergence of the European Community[8] and European Union[9]. To conclude, those social forces are in fact market forces like: lobby groups, banks, corporations or even unions.

Taking into consideration all this concepts, European integration process can be analysed using the relation between structure and super-structure[10]. The economic structure is understood here as being shaped by the social forces agency, while the ideological super-structure is characterized by the neo-liberal model.

---

[3] In Marxist theory, structure engulfs all the social relations of production, or the economic base. Super-structure symbolizes the effect of economic arrangement of a society in ideology – ideological super-structure.

[4] Gramsci divides the society in two parts: civil society and political society. "Political society includes the public sphere of government, administration, and law and order, as well as security. Civil society includes those elements normally considered private, such as free enterprise, political parties, churches, and trade unions" (Gill 2003, p. 65).

[5] It represents the formation and alignment of groups in relation to production. "This enables the examination of the question of whether the necessary and sufficient conditions exist in a society for its transformation"(Gill 2003, p. 51-52).

[6] "This involves an assessment of the degree of homogeneity and political consciousness among different classes and political groupings"(Gill 2003, p. 52).

[7] "This primarily involves the relation of military forces, which from time to time is immediately decisive"(Gill 2003, p. 52).

[8] It was established by the Treaty of European Coal and Steel Community.

[9] It was established by the Treaty of Maastricht.

[10] In classical Marxism, structure determines super-structure. But many neo-Marxists show that also the super-structure can influences many changes in the economic structure of the society.

"Embedded" Neo-Liberalism

For a better understanding of the embedded neo-liberalism, it is necessary to go back in the history of the European Union. Thus, we can find out two periods defined by two different historical blocs. The first one, characterized by the Fordist[11] type of capitalism, is known as Keynesian period "during which the general European regulatory framework—as defined by the Treaty of Rome and subsequent directives, regulations and decisions—primarily aimed at supporting national socioeconomic models and their development by providing an advantageous, growth and employment-friendly economic environment" (Bieling 2003, p.205). Since 1970s and 1980s, with the project of Single European Market, it was obvious that the old economic structure was changing. Then, Keynesian policies were being replaced step by step by "a new, more aggressive configuration, which basically is neoliberal, i.e. in favour of broadened and intensified market competition and monetarist anti-inflation and austerity measures" (Bieling 2003, p.206). In other words, the nature of the new economic model - neo-liberalism - is based on a reduced state intervention and a freedom of market forces.

The question now is whose interests were behind Single European Market and its neo-liberal model? The answer is simple and lays in the Gramsci concept of force relations. It is well known that neo-liberal restructuring of the European Union was possible because of European transnational corporations. "These forces, in close co-operation with representatives of the European Commission, often bypassed national governments in designing the next steps of European integration" (Bohle 2003, p. 20). The most important transnational market force was probably European Round of Industrialists (ERT), a business group founded in 1983 which contains the representatives from the biggest transnational corporations. "Through intense lobby activity at national and supranational levels, regular official meetings with the highest EU representatives, and strategic reports on burning issues of European integration, ERT has acquired privileged influence in European policymaking" (Bohle 2003, p. 21).

Using neo-Gramscian theory, it becomes clear how a historical bloc, who wants to establish the hegemony of transnational capital, is pushing forward for the European integration dominated by a neo-liberal model. "In Western Europe, social-democratic political forces, organised labour and political forces of the peripheral countries have been incorporated into the historical bloc, albeit in a subordinated position. As a result, a precarious hegemonic constellation of 'embedded neo-liberalism' has emerged"(Bohle 2006, p. 78). This embedded neo-liberalism has been understood by other authors as the European socio-economic model, something that separate the old continent from the other economic models of the world, something that make European Union unique.

Another interesting point of view comes from the founder of the concept, Baastian van Apeldoorn. He claims that "embedded neo-liberalism is here seen as a hegemonic project inasmuch as it seeks to advance neo-liberalism through a strategy of incorporating, and ideologically neutralizing, rival projects"(Apeldoorn 2009, p. 22). But there is also a contradiction between social policies and freedom of capital, both being included in the same European hegemonic project. Further, this contradiction has its mirror in the nature of the European multi-level governance. Thus, the process of European integration has created "a supranational internal market (and later a monetary union), thus transferring 'policies promoting market efficiencies' to the European level, whereas policies 'promoting social protection and equality' have remained at the national level" (Apeldoorn 2009, p. 26).

This structural arrangement of European internal market, understood as the asymmetric governance of the embedded neoliberal European order, "makes states adopt supply-side oriented national competitiveness strategies, which, rather than offering any shelter from the discipline of the European market, promote a thorough neoliberal socio-economic restructuring" (Apeldoorn 2009, p. 27). The result of such strategies is an economic nationalism race where member states are competing to provide the best conditions for the mobile capital. It means that social policies are occupying the second place in the states preferences.

[11] Gramsci called Fordism, the economy based on mass production (assembly line).

The European Fiscal Pact

In this part of the article I will analyse the nature of the European states' response to euro zone crisis. I chose this case study because it is the most recent of European legislative act and because it is a reaction to the global crisis. Thus, I will focus on reform measures of the European economic governance which appears as a necessity to save and consolidate European single currency. All of those changes were implemented because European Union is not a state, and it doesn't have competences in fiscal policy: "cannot redistribute resources, issue state bonds, print money and it has no sovereign tax basis" (http://euobserver.com/7/114308).

To avoid a fundamental change of Lisbon Treaty, European leaders managed to sign a new international treaty of euro zone, where not all the EU countries are involved. "The new treaty - an intergovernmental agreement after the UK last month refused to allow full EU treaty change - is supposed to calm markets by forcing its signatories into improved budget discipline" (http://euobserver.com/82/114787). On the 30 January all the EU member states, excepting this time United Kingdom and Czech Republic, have agreed on a final form of the new Treaty on Stability, Coordination and Governance in the Economic and Monetary Union. "The Treaty aims to strengthen fiscal discipline through the introduction of more automatic sanctions and stricter surveillance, and in particular through the balanced budget rule"(http://www.european-council.europa.eu/home-page/highlights/the-fiscal-compact-ready-to-be-signed-(2)?lang=en).

In order to have a better image on the treaty reform, I will detail the main changes regarding fiscal dimension. The economic convergence and governance specifications will be skipped because of the low relevance for my conclusions.

The general budgets of the governs should be balanced or in surplus; to respect this principle, the structural deficit should not exceed 0,5% from GDP. In other conditions, member states shall propose a self correction mechanism based on European Commission principles.

If the Commission notices that a country deficit exceeds 3% there will be automatic consequences. Only the majority of the euro zone could cancel the decision of European Commission.

The public debt of the member states should be under 60%, otherwise another correction mechanism should be enforced. (European Union 2012, p. 5 - 8)

All of those measures become obligatory for the participant states because of the Court of Justice involvement. For example, the treaty specify the "obligation to transpose the "Balanced Budget Rule" into national legal systems through binding and permanent provisions, preferably constitutional, should be subject to the jurisdiction of the Court of Justice of the European Union, in accordance with Article 273 of the Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union" (European Union 2012, p. 2).

Considering now the purpose of this treaty, it is supposed to be designed to "promote conditions for stronger economic growth in the European Union and, to that end, to develop ever-closer coordination of economic policies within the euro area" (European Union 2012, p. 1). In other words, through budgetary discipline, a better coordination of economic policies and improved governance in the euro area, the treaty is set to support "the achievement of the European Union's objectives for sustainable growth, employment, competitiveness and social cohesion" (European Union 2012, p. 4). Beside economic austerity measures, the social purpose is also present in the text of the treaty.

The main question is now, why was this fiscal union so important? Why was it forced to pass negotiations even if UK and Czech Republic were set to stay away from it? The rush to adopt this document was obvious and contrasts all the history of dialogue and cooperation in the EU. The stake was clear: "if the euro zone were to break up, many German and French banks would collapse, hence the Franco-German push for fiscal union" (http://roarmag.org/2011/12/eu-summit-uk-fiscal-union-banks-city/). Germany has pointed out that short time bail-outs do not represent a real solution, but a long-term overhaul of the rules. "Germany is using market turmoil as a cudgel to force more spendthrift European countries to adjust to their straitened circumstances by reducing spending and ushering in a period of austerity"(http://www.nytimes.com/2011/12/10/business/global/european-leaders-agree-on-fiscal-treaty.html?_r=2&ref=global-home).

By adopting this plan, German chancellor Angela Merkel, propose an austerity club defined by balanced budget rules inserted in every national constitution. "Germany, now the indisputable European hegemon, will use this fiscal union to extract full repayment for its banks, while London can freely position itself as an offshore banking paradise"(http://roarmag.org/2011/12/eu-summit-uk-fiscal-union-banks-city/). Uniform application of the budgetary discipline could instead have deep implications for Eastern Europe, locking the periphery into a permanent depression. The former socialist states would not have the economic tools, as well as strength, to compete with a more developed Western Europe.

I can conclude that, for this situation, the European banks are the main force in shaping the integration process. The problem was never in the public spending of peripheral countries but in the private lending of core banks. "With hundreds of billions of Euros in excess liquidity sloshing around the system, French and German banks greedily bought up Greek, Portuguese and Italian bonds and pumped truckloads of foreign capital into the Irish and Spanish housing markets" (http://roarmag.org/2011/12/eu-summit-uk-fiscal-union-banks-city/). Paradoxically, in a global crisis created by banks, states support and work with banks to maintain a neo-liberal economic system.

Conclusions

European Union finds itself today in a very difficult point of its existence. The Single European Market and the European Monetary Union, established after the Maastricht Treaty, drove European integration on a historical path that could not be modified due to the big pressure of transnational capital. The analyse of the Treaty on Stability, Coordination and Governance in the Economic and Monetary Union reveals that neo-liberal super-structure, shaped by the agency of the social forces like corporations or banks, is still the pillar of the European historical bloc. Even more, during the global financial crisis provoked by American banks, when euro zone confronted the biggest challenges from its short history, the general answer to those problems was more austerity.

For example, the budgetary discipline imposed by the new treaty could lead, in the internal affairs of member states, to austerity measures. The reduction of public spending, just to achieve some budget benchmarks, can raise unemployment levels in the public sector and reduce investment in infrastructure. The hegemonic way is simple: states and European Union should do everything to assure the best condition for the private sector, no matter what the costs are. But, as I said, if they maintain the best condition for the capital, they could disadvantage the social groups already touched by financial crisis: the poor people (who survive because of state social services) and the workers from public sector. This reality sounds like a paradox, but Gramsci's thought teaches us that this is just the result of a neo-liberal successful hegemony.

On the other hand, Apeldoorn embedded neo-liberalism is also present in the new treaty, through social purposes like sustainable growth, employment, or social cohesion. Those aspects show its hegemonic nature which is trying to encompass the socialist political dimension of ensuring prosperity, facilitating freedom of capital. But, as I already mentioned above, the primacy of capital remains the main characteristic of the treaty reform, validating Apeldoorn's arguments. I conclude this article saying that if the neo-liberal way was adopted as the only way possible to solve the crisis, it means that its hegemony succeeded. This conclusion comes to solve a recent debate in the field of European critical studies, which question whether or not the neo-liberal hegemony managed to establish the nowadays European historical bloc.

Bibliography:

- van Apeldoorn, Bastiaan, Henk Overbeek and Magnus Ryner. "Theories of European Integration: A Critique", pp. 17-47 in Alan W. Cafruny and Magnus Ryner, "A Ruined Fortress? Neoliberal Hegemony and Transformation in Europe". Rowman & Littlefield Publishers. New York: 2003
- van Apeldoorn, Bastiaan. "The Contradictions of Embedded Neoliberalism and Europe's Multi-level Legitimacy Crisis: The European Projects and its Limits" in Drahokoupil, Jan, Bastiaan van Apeldoorn and Laura Horn. „Contradictions and Limits of Neoliberal European Governance: From Lisbon to Lisbon". Palgrave Macmillan. New York: 2009.
- Bieling, Hans-Jurgen. „Social Forces in the Making of the New European Economy: The Case of Financial Market Integration". New Political Economy, Vol. 8, No. 2, July 2003, pp. 203-224.
- Bohle, Dorothee. "A Cold Welcome: The Unequal Terms of Eastern Enlargement", in Global Dialogue, Vol. 5, No.3, Summer/Autumn 2003, pp. 19-29.
- Bohle, Dorothee. "Neoliberal Hegemony, Transnational Capital and the Terms of EU's Eastwards Expansion". Capital and Class, Issue 85, 2006, pp. 57-86.
- Cocks, Peter. "Toward a Marxist Theory of European Integration". International Organisation, Vol. 34, No. 1 (Winter, 1980), pp.1-40.
- European Union 2012, "Treaty on Stability, Coordination and Governance in the Economic and Monetary Union", Bruxelles, available on http://www.european-council.europa.eu/media/579087/treaty.pdf, accessed on 05.02.2012.
- Gill, Stephen. "A Neo-Gramscian Approach to European Integration", pp. 47-71 in Alan W. Cafruny and Magnus Ryner, „A Ruined Fortress? Neoliberal Hegemony and Transformation in Europe". Rowman & Littlefield Publishers. New York: 2003.
- http://euobserver.com/7/114308, accessed on 04.02.2012.
- http://euobserver.com/82/114787, accessed on 04.02.2012.
- http://roarmag.org/2011/12/eu-summit-uk-fiscal-union-banks-city/, accessed on 07.02.2012.
- http://www.european-council.europa.eu/home-page/highlights/the-fiscal-compact-ready-to-be-signed-(2)?lang=en, accessed on 05.02.2012.
- http://www.nytimes.com/2011/12/10/business/global/european-leaders-agree-on-fiscal-treaty.html?_r=2&ref=global-home, accessed on 07.02.2012.
- Morton, Adam David. "Unravelling Gramsci: Hegemony and Passive Revolution in the Global Political Economy". Pluto Press. London: 2007.
- Pollack, Mark. "Theorizing EU Policy-Making", pp. 15-45 in Helen Wallace, Mark A. Pollack and Alasdair R. Young. "Policy-Making in the European Union". Oxford University Press. New York: 2010.
- Rosamond, Ben. "New Theories of European Integration", pp. 104-122 in Michelle Cini and Nieves Perez-Solorzano Borragan. "European Union Politics". Oxford University Press. New York: 2010.

THE PRESSURE GROUPS RELATIONSGIP IN THE ROMANIAN ENERGETIC SECURITY PROBLEM

COSMIN GABRIEL PACURARU[1]

Abstract
Romania and the European Union started to accord serious attention to energetic security for just a few years. Although the United States warned the European states that they can become energetically dependent of USSR and later Russia, these ignored the national security.
In 2004, with Traian Basescu's rise to power, we can say that Romania elaborated a serious energetic policy, which is updated in accord with the growing changes that intervene on the gas market and in a geopolitical context.

Key Words: energy, strategy, legislation, alternative sources, securitized subject

Introduction

The energetic security is an annalistic theme that has existed for approximately ten years in the spotlight of the institutions in the domain, of the European Commission's administrative states, even though in the 60s commercial contracts of exchange with the natural gas subject were signed. The subject became of increasing importance due to the fact that observations were made about a correlation between the supply transport of raw materials and the political and economical advantages won by those who uphold the raw materials and transport. The dynamics between the economic and political international relations make the energetic security to be "Subject of the Day" more and more often on the European agenda.

Romania approached the energetic security as a matter of national security starting with 2005, in parallel with the change of power and its implication in the European plans for the research of alternative options of energy supply. Unfortunately, only the Supreme Council of Defense and the Romanian President are the centers of focus that decided the national security strategy in the energetic domain.

Traian Basescu secured the energetic security subject, becoming the only person to introduce the subject in the public agenda, and the only person to come up with initiatives. We appreciate the President's efforts, but we think that only one approach is not sufficient and we also think that the existence of more than one center would bring more value to the documents elaborated by the Romanian state. Also, the existence of few documentation possibilities and of few annalistic works confirms the necessity of more implication in the domain.

Studying official documents, press releases, interviews with actors, personalities from the diplomatic, business and administration domain, literature of specialty or complementary, studies realized by organizations in the domain and of the information obtained by the press, can bring us to form a number of conclusions about the connection between the gas prices and Russia's relations with the important states.

International relations fluidity in the last decades

The last 30 years brought drastic changes in international politics. The fall of the Communist Block and the Soviet Union brought a reconfiguration in the influential spheres. A large number of east-European states in the influential sphere reoriented to the North Atlantic Treaty and the West European poles. With little effort, these countries were welcomed in the newly configured European Union. After a short period, the newly formed Russian Federation, after reconfiguring the internal politics, was experiencing an economic boom. This brought to the comeback of strong friendships and the elaboration of foreign policies through which states the comeback of the old economic and political influential zones[2]. In today's situation and using the only reliable instrument, the energetic weapon[3] , adapting the American policies from the 50's – 60's, brought to Latin America and the Middle East, Russia created new vassals.

[1] Journalist, retreated in communication, and PR. From 2008, he manages the website www.sigurantaenergetica.ro. He is now a Ph. D. Candidate at UBB Cluj with his work "Romania's energetic security in European context" (email: cosmin_pacuraru@yahoo.com).

From the 60's, USSR wished that European states should become dependent of the energetic resources that it detains. The first big economic contracts that stated the construction of gas pipes for Germany, Austria, Italy, and France were signed at that period of time, in exchange for technology and money. Although the CIA warned the Common Market countries of the risks of becoming dependent of Siberian gas[4], its administrations signed contracts under the pressure of the large multinational companies. After years, we found that the dual speech of the 4 European states (GFR, France, Italy, and Austria): On one hand they were criticizing the USSR for its policies in Afghanistan and Poland, and for its arms policies and the fact that they disobeyed the human rights, but on the other hand, they were encouraging the large corporations to sign contracts with the USSR and to provide technology (which was under American license and broke every embargo).

In 1991, the Soviet Union left the newly founded state an inheritance of 160.000 km of pipe systems, 350 compression centers and dozens of gas storage reservoirs. The most important resources were left to Russia (80%), but over a third of the pipelines were in Ukraine (32.000 km) which realized the export to the west (100 billions of cubic meters per year).

Vladimir Putin's rise to power represented a reconfiguration in the Russian foreign policies taking in account the fact that the old tsarist and soviet principles were adapted for the 21'st century. The "European energetic pliers" strategy was perfected with the North Stream and South Stream components that today are realized in northern Europe, South Stream being in the unfunded project state because of the International crisis. The directory lines of the new foreign Russian policies can be concluded in:

1. European Union countries should become more dependent of Russian gas
2. Gigantic investments in pipelines
3. Market diversification by extending its exports to China
4. Growing the transport capacity from the ex-USSR countries: Turkmenistan, Uzbekistan, and Azerbaijan to the west
5. Creating intermediary firms in the west European states which would deal with gas imports.
6. Gazprom's association with "old business partners" in a number of firms.
7. Complete acquisition or shareholding national companies for transport and distribution of gas, for railway producers for extraction and gas transport industries, or for infrastructure firms (communications, railway transport, etc.) from as many European countries, especially in the EU in exchange for a smaller gas price.

---

[2] Detinguy, Annde - Moscow and the rest of the World, The Ambition for Greatness: An Illusion?, Bucharest, "Minerva" Publishing, 2008, 8

[3] Ibidem, 187

[4] Ougartchinska, Roumiana; Carre, Jean Michel - Gas Wars- The Russian Threat, Timisoara, "Antet" Publishing, 2008, 39

We can observe that all these directions can be found in the actions of the foreign Russian politics in the last 10 years. If we analyze every detail we can affirm that European countries are very dependent of Russian gas, as shown in the chart below.

Chart: The European Union countries' dependency of Russian gas

Country	Dependency rate
Bulgaria	100%
Slovakia	100%
Finland	100%
Estonia	100%
Letonia	100%
Greece	100%
Denmark	100%
Belgium	100%
Lithuania	100%
Austria	75%
Czech Republic	75%
Hungary	75%
Poland	67%
Romania	52%
Slovenia	51%
Germany	42%
Italia	33%
France	23%
Holland	12%

Non EU countries

Serbia	100%
Croatia	88%
Turkey	76%
Switzerland	12%

Sources: Eurostat- 2007 report, CRS- Congress Report- the European Union's Energy Security Challenges, 2008, ECFR – Beyond dependence, 2009

Taking in consideration the investments made by Russia with its partners, the major projects finished: Bleu Stream with 3.2 billion dollars, having stockholders Gazprom, ENI, and Botas, and North Stream with 8.8 billion euros (Gazprom 51%, BASF SE 15.5%, and Gasunie and GDF SUEZ each with 9% of the actions), we can conclude that Russia realized with success a big part of what it proposed in 2001. We can add to this operation that at the beginning of 2006, a contract was signed that foresaw 2 gas transport route; on to China, parallel to the Pacific coast already being used, and one route that passes through western Mongolia and is still under construction.

The legislation overlooking Romanian policies in energetic security

Energetic security is a subject recently appeared on the Romanian authorities' work agenda. In 1998, the CDR governing adopted a Government Ordinance (GO 52/ 1998) overlooking at Romania's defense strategy, which was transformed into a law in 2000 (law 63/ 2000) in which the Romanian President's obligation is set to realize the National Security Strategy of Romania (NSSR) and to present for approval in front of the Parliament[5]. As said in article 5: "Romania's national security strategy includes: defining its own security interests and objectives, evaluating the foreign security environment, identifying the risk factors in the national and international environment, the ways of action and the main means for assuring Romania's national security. The strategy has an evaluation horizon on a 4 year term and a long term perspective including the estimation of Romania's assigned resources to achieve its security and defense objectives. The first strategic security plan was adopted in 2001." This was modified through Law 473/2004[6] and is complete because Article 2 defines "The defense planning domains are: a) planning the force; b) planning the armament; c) planning the resources; d) logistics planning; e) command, control, and communication planning; f) civilian emergency planning."

The first National Security Strategy was elaborated in 2002. In this no element reminding the energetic problem appears but it is said that risks can appear from entities or groups from the inside of a state that is orienting its actions in threatening other states.

Until 2006, Romania did not elaborate a separate chapter destined for energetic security in the National Security Strategy. After Traian Basescu's rise to power and his prime-minister Calin Popescu Tariceanu, more and more analysis were achieved and elaborated studies that were at the foundation of the new security strategy, including energetic, successively elaborated in all these years. We can affirm that the adherence debt to the European Union and NATO, foreign political exchanges of Russia, Ukraine, European Union and its component states, EU water body access countries, Turkey and the Caspian states in the Middle East, Romania was obligated to review a few times its energetic strategy.

In 2007, the "Tariceanu government" elaborated a document that exclusively refers to this domain for the 2007-2020 period: ROMANIA's ENERGETIC STRATEGY FOR THE 2007-2020 PERIOD[7].

The directory lines that define the future energetic strategies are: energetic security growth by insuring the necessary energetic resources and limiting the dependency of imported energetic resources, diversification of import sources (energetic resources and their transport routes), growing the adequacy level of national transport routes of electric energy, natural gas, and petrol, energetic efficiency growth, promoting energy production using alternative sources, developing competing markets in electric energy, natural gas, petrol, uranium, green certificates, greenhouse effect gas emission certificates and energetic services, liberating energy transit and assuring permanent and anti- discriminatory of market and transport routes participants, international distribution and interconnection, continuing the restructuring process and privatization in electric energy , thermal energy, and natural gas sectors[8].

---

[5] „Legea 63/2000 pentru aprobarea Ordonanței Guvernului nr. 52/1998 privind planificarea apararii nationale a Romaniei", site de legislatie romaneasca, http://www.jurisprudenta.com/lege/lege-63-2000-6v622/ Art.

[6] "Legea Nr. 473 din 4 noiembrie 2004 privind planificarea apărării", site-ul Ministerului Apararii, http://www.mapn.ro/diepa/planificare/legea_473_2004.htm

[7] "Strategia Energetica a Romaniei pentru perioada 2007 – 2020", site-ul Centrului pentru promovarea energiei curate si eficiente in Romania - http://www.enero.ro/doc/STRATEGIA%20ENERGETICA%20A%20 ROMANIEI%20PENTRU%20PERIOADA%202007-2020.pdf

[8] Strategia Energetica a Romaniei pentru perioada 2007 – 2020", site-ul Centrului pentru promovarea energiei curate si eficiente in Romania - http://www.enero.ro/doc/STRATEGIA%20ENERGETICA %20A%20ROMANIEI% 20PENTRU%20PERIOADA%202007-2020.pdf

In Prime Minister Emil Boc's Governing Program, there is a chapter 17[9] that deals with Energy and Mineral Resources. Comparing this document with "Romania's Energetic Strategy for the 2007-2020 period, we can affirm that nothing new is added.

Beginning with 2008 new elements appeared that boosts the production of alternative energy in the Romanian legislation (continuation of the EU Directive 2001/77/CE)[10]. In 2001, the Minister of Economy, Commerce, and Business Environment along with the National Authority for Regulation in the Energetic Domain showed in a public debate a draft entitled "Energetic strategy elements for the 2011- 2035 period- Strategic directions and objectives in the electric energy sector"[11]. This specifies "Romania's energetic policy should be correlated with similar documents existent on a European level to assure the convergence of our country's policy with the European Union's one in the domain."[12]

We can affirm that the Romanian Parliament does not dispose of experts in the energetic security problems, resulting that the Romanian legislation is not coherent in the domain, just in the Government's proposals, having at its foundations the National Security Strategy, the Governing Program, and the European Union's Directives and Regulations.

Analyzing and comparing NSSR, the Government's Program and energetic strategy elaborated by the Minister of Economy, we can conclude that these are elaborated by a single group of experts because they are almost identical. This group's uniqueness can bring wrong interpretations of the processed dates, implicitly at the elaboration of strategies, policies, laws and erroneous legislative proposals.

Romanian pressure groups and the energetic problem

In the Government before 2004, no politician or political party stood out through a discourse in which the energetic problem is underlined. We can remember two actions: in the communist period, an independence from the USSR was tried, by building hydro-electric power plant and coal, petrol, and natural gas power plants, and beginning the atom-electric power plant in Cernavoda. The Adrian Nastase Government privatized 51% of PETROM, a national company of oil extraction and processing which contributes to 66% of the national natural gas production[13], to the Austrian company OMV. This means that Romania cannot make a decision over the production, distribution and fuel price policies found in Romania's soil. We have to mention that the Austrian legislation allows residential firms not to declare its shareholding[14]. If no Russian corporation is a shareholder in OMV[15] (not being able to find the shareholding component for 48.1% that transacts freely), OMV and Gazprom are old business partners and together are important shareholders in large European energetic companies, with strategic importance being Central European Gas Hub (both with 30%,

[9] "Strategia de Guvernare, Cap. 17 Energie si resurse minerale – site-ul Guvernului Romaniei: http://www.gov.ro/capitolul-17-energie-si-resurse-minerale__l1a2074.html

[10] "Legea nr. 220/2008 pentru stabilirea sistemului de promovare a producerii energiei din surse regenerabile de energie" – site-ul Avocat.net; http://www.avocatnet.ro/content/articles/id_13709/p_2/3.html

[11] "Elemente de strategie energetică pentru perioada 2011 – 2035 - Direcţii şi obiective strategice în sectorul energiei electrice, DRAFT I; http://www.minind.ro/anunturi/strategia_energetica_20112035_20042011.pdf

[12] Minister of Economy, Commerce, and Business Environment- Strategic energy Element Draft for the 2011-2035 period- Strategic directions and objectives in the electric energy sector, page 3

[13]"Cat de tare putem sa ne suparam cu Rusia – Cosmin pacuraru" – site-ul dedicat securitatii energetice; http://www.sigurantaenergetica.ro/wp-content/uploads/2009/05/Cat-de-tare-ne-permitem-sa-suparam-Rusia.doc page 4

[14] KUPCINSKY, Roman - GAZPROM'S EUROPEAN WEB, Jamestown, Jamestown Foundation Library, 2009, page 18

[15]"OMV Group – shareholders structure" – OMV.com http://www.omv.com/portal/01/com/!ut/p/c4/04_SB8K8xLLM9MSSzPy8xBz9CP0os3gDf1OLQC9HZyNXA3dPD18PN19DAwjQD07N0y_IdlQEANNJ1nE!/

Weiner Borse and Centrex Europe Energy and Gas AG with 20%, but Centrex is controlled 50% by Gazprom)[16]. Central European Gas Hub wishes to be "Europe's gas scholarship", a place where transactions take place and Russian imported gas prices are set. In other words, Gazprom has access to any information regarding PETROM and can stop any efforts to import gas from the Middle East or the Caspian Sea area[17]. Remarkably, nobody opposed to that privatization, even the opposition voted in Parliament the privatization contract. Analyzing the SNP assets in the privatization day[18], we can conclude that Romania's energetic security was put in danger. Other aspects of the privatization contract's legalities are found in the Senatorial Investigation Commission Report with the purpose of investing PETROM's privatization and in SRI's informational Note "Landmarks of SNP Petrom's privatization" both in 2007[19].

In 2006 though, after the first gas crisis generated by Ukraine, President Traian Basescu brought in his discourse the injustice of PETROM's privatization contract, this speech being used by all the MPs in power at that time (The Alliance for Truth and Rightfulness formed by PNL and PD), which generated the reports mentioned earlier. The subject is being debated even in 2011, when the Romanian Senate instituted an investigation committee that analyzes the contract's post-privatization ongoing. Also, Prime Minister Emil Boc declares in May 2011 that "PETROM's privatization represents a threat to our nation's security"[20].

Another subject overlooking the national security theme is represented by alternative natural gas resources. This way, President Traian Basescu affirmed in 2006-2010 that one of Romania's priorities is to develop the Nabucco project. Because of the misunderstandings between the governments of the participating countries at this project, the firms that enter as stockholders in the company[21] that wishes to carry out this project, President Traian Basescu iterated project AGRI as the main target[22], which according to Energy Global publication analysts, could stop Nabucco[23]. According to the Romanian Foreign Ministry website, both of the projects are on the priorities list of the Romanian Government[24].

Traian Basescu launched the phrase "smart boys mafia of energy", which was immediately used by the press.

Another important actor is the press and should have the role of information distribution in society and to fine or to legitimate the political actions and decisions. Unfortunately, in the last 10 years, we can affirm that the Romanian press unprofessionalized and is subordinated to the patron's interests. Three out pf the 5 big press trusts had or has patrons implicated in energy transactions or

---

[16] KUPCINSKY, Roman - GAZPROM'S EUROPEAN WEB, Jamestown, Jamestown Foundation Library, 2009, page 19

[17] Kupcinsky, Roman – gazprom's European Web, Jamestown, Jamestown Foundation Library, 2009, page 19

[18] Senatorial Investigation Commission Report with the purpose of investing PETROM's privatization, page 3-4, www.lumeajustitiei.ro http://static.luju.ro/files/iulie/21/PETROM_Raportul_Comisiei_de_ancheta.mark.pdf

[19] Romanian Information Services – note information http://static.luju.ro/files/iulie/21/PETROM_INFORMARE_SRI_pag.1_001_resized.pdf

[20] "SRR – political site – www.politicaromaneasca.ro" http://www.politicaromaneasca.ro/boc_privatizarea_petrom_un_atentat_la_siguranta_nationala-4387

[21] "Shareholders of Nabucco Pipeline: http://www.nabucco-pipeline.com/portal/page/portal/en/company_main/shareholders_link

[22] "Five companies bid for AGRI gas project study" – News.az http://www.news.az/articles/economy/37113

[23] AGRI project could sink Nabucco pipeline, Energy Global; http://www.energyglobal.com/sectors/pipelines/articles/AGRI_project_could_sink_Nabucco_pipeline.aspx raw materials: Dan Voiculescu's Intact Trust, Sorin Ovidiu Vantu's Reality Media Trust, and Dinu Patriciu's Adevarul Trust. Also, these press trust proprietors are implicated in politics, Dan Voiculescu being the honorable president of the Conservative Party, Dinu Patriciu being considered an informal leader (in the last few years) of the National Liberal Party, and Sorin Ovidiu Vantu being in good relations with the Social Democratic Party's leadership. In various media analysis realized by professionals affirms that the Media Pro Press Trust is nobody's political partisan and the patron is not implicated in other patronages except for press. All these private press trusts have in their component influential economic publications, one of them holding a powerful press agency (Mediafax that is part of Media Pro). To all these, we can also add the media channels held by the state: TVR, SSR and Agerpres.

[24]"Dosare de actualitate – Securitatea energetica; Romanian Foreygn Ministery" http://www.mae.ro/node/1602

We can consider that besides influential economic publications (Ziarul Financiar, Financiarul, Bursa, Capital, Saptamana Finaciara, money.ro, econtext.ro, e-nergia.ro, focus-energetic.ro, businesslive.ro) that are read by the decision factors in the state and the private administrations, to which we can add the press agencies (Mediafax and Agerpres) we can enlist that the influential quality channels (Adevarul, Jurnalul, Gandul, Romania Libera, Evenimentul Zilei, zire.com si Hotnews.ro) and the news TV channels (Money Channel, Realiztatea, Antena 3, TVR Info). The problem is that very little of these journalist employees or collaborators specialized in the economic problem and even less in the energetic one and very little editorial managers understand the information in the domain. In other words, the role of these publications in pressuring the authorities is very small; the journalists remain to the approach of subjects tied with energy that has a social connotation, to rewriting of the press releases received and information management from pres conferences. We can remark the fact that there are very rare press- releases regarding the firms that occupy with energy transaction.

This does not mean that the big energy firms do not realize, through media, public relations campaigns, which can sometimes affect national security. A concluding example is the GdF Suez case (gas distribution firm in the south-east of Romania) that in May 2011 carried a campaign of this sort that took place in Bucharest through letters addressed to the citizens and through purchasing unmarked advertising space in quality press and TV news channels. This campaign filmy guided[25] citizens to give up the centralizes heating system and to install individual apartment heating systems motivating that in the actual conjuncture, with the growth of gas prices, individual heating systems are more profitable. Knowing the fact that that in Bucharest live 15% of Romania's population and more that 10% of the homes are here, that individual heating systems are more expensive that centralized heating we can consider that GdF Suez's action to raise its profit through the growth of gas consumption constitutes a threat to the citizen's address and a threat to the energetic security.

Subject securitization in the energetic domain

Right above, we saw that the main actor in the energetic security is Traian Basescu. His securitization problems can be classified in order of the audience whom he addresses.

One subject is that of "corruption in the transaction system of electric energy". The addressed audience were officials form the Economy Ministry that facilitate these contracts disadvantageous to the Romanian state and the employees of institutions that specialize in the ability to document, research, and prepare criminal folders and from lawyers. Motivation is a better action in the management of national wealth and boosting the audience shown above and to act in this domain. The form that these subjects appeared in public debates is "discourse".

[25] „Piata romaneasca - invadata de oferte de centrale de apartament", Adevarul newspaper; http://www.adevarul.ro/actualitate/Piata-romaneasca-invadata-centrale-apartament_0_63595098.html

The second subject is that of "supply of energy from alternative sources other than Russian ones". The audience that is addressed with this theme is represented by decision factors in foreign and economic policies from EU states, countries on the coast of the Black Sea, and Russia. The subject's motivation approach is to give a certain predicament in the future evolution of the foreign policies of Romania.

Even though certain roughness between the President and the press exist, it mostly took with objectivity the themes referring to the energetic security, not bothering them.

Conclusion

We conclude that the only credible political figure because of the messages in the energetic security problems are not distorted, and is the speaking tube of the national policies in the energetic security politics, is President Traian Basescu. From one point of view it is expected from the governing parties not to occupy advertising space on a subject approached by Traian Basescu. The fact is taking place because PDL, UNPR, and UDMR do not have members that are specialists in the domain or if these specialists exist, they do not wish to argue with the President.

The poorly understood fact is that the opposition does not have a point of view on these subjects. We are certain that at least ex-Ministers and state secretaries from the Ministry of Economy in which we add ex-directors from the ministry and the domain agents that have the expertise to formulate informed opinions, to criticize or praise today's position taking in the domain. The explanation can be the following: the ones that withheld positions in past governments are marginalized by today's heads of PNL and PSD that do not take part in the expertise and experience in the domain.

Analyzing Russia's situation (where more centers of analysis and decision making exist) or Poland (European Union country) that invests and takes in consideration independent analysis centers (with Centre for Eastern Studies as an example) we can conclude that it is not recommendable that in a country with Romania's energetic and geostrategic potential to exist a single group of experts to analyze and elaborate all documents referring to Romanian energetic strategies and one politician that approaches these subjects.

References

- Romania's national security strategy
- European Union's security strategy
- National strategy overlooking a durable economic development, MO 297/2000
- Miroiu Andrei, Ungureanu Radu Sebastian- International Relations Manual, "Polirom" Publishing, Iasi, 2006
- Sava, Ionel Nicu- Security studies; "Centrului Roman de Studii Regionale" Publishing, Bucharest, 2005
- Pr. Stern Jonathan - The Future of Russian gas and Gazprom, Centre of Strategic and International Studies, Washington DC, 2006
- Strumer, Michael- Putin and the New Russia, "Litera" Publishing, Bucharest, 2001
- De Tinguy, Anne- Moscow and the World, Ambition for greatness: An illusion?, Bucharest, "Minerva" Publishing, 2008
- Fuerea, Augustin- Guide to the European Union, "Univers Juridic" Publishing, Bucharest, 2004

- Geopolitics - The Asymmetry of energetic resources, Topform, 2008
- Hlihor, Constantin- Political security in the contemporary international environment, the Energetic Domain, "Institutul European" Publishing, 2008
- Ganga, Daniela-Paula- EU-Russia relationship, the Energetic Problem, "Institutul European" Publishing, Iasi, 2008
- Kupcinsky, Roman - GAZPROM'S EUROPEAN WEB, Jamestown, Jamestown Foundation Library, 2009
- STRATFOR, ECFR Analysis.

THE FUTURE OF DIGITAL ACTIVISM

MARIA CERNAT[1]

ABSTRACT
One of the first moments when the new information and communication technologies were used in a political protest was the Orange Revolution that took place in Ukraine from late November 2004 to January 2005. Ever since that moment social media proved to be an important tool of political revolt. The London protests, the Arab Spring or Moldova's Twitter Revolution are only a few of the most representative moments when digital media were used in organizing political protests. Obviously, the new communication tools paved the way for a new type of organizing collective action and political uprising. Once the Orange Revolution took place, media theorists and political philosophers emphasized the role of the new media in political reform. Most of today's articles analyzing this phenomenon share a rather optimistic perspective on the role the new social media is playing in political reform, offering a "microphone to the masses". My perspective is rather pessimistic. I think that, before enthusiastically embracing the benefits of the new digital media, we must acknowledge the indisputable dangers that threaten the ideal of liberating technology. What I try to prove in my article is that there are two types of challenges when it comes to the role the new information and communication technologies play in political protests. First of all, there are state regulations used by the political leaders to restrict access to the new technologies, to identify those opposing their regime and to use the new media as a propaganda tool. These bear direct negative influences on the way the new digital media are used. But, as I shall try to prove in my article, there is also another type of challenge that could endanger the ideal of liberating technology. The neoliberal deregulation of media led to a so-called "feudalization" of the Internet, whereby huge media trusts try to control important parts of the information market, transforming it into a closed and controlled environment.

Keywords: social media, political protest, feudalization of the Internet, liberating technology, oppressive technology

Introduction

Recent political events such as the Arab Spring or Moldova's Twitter Revolution were individualized by the use of the new information and communication technologies. The mainstream press reporting on social networks and social media emphasized the merits of these new communication technologies in building a collective action and political protest. The optimist wave of social media supporters created a so-called "techno-utopianism" assigning technology the central role in social progress. The main assumption of those supporting the idea that technological progress in the communication area could lead to social progress is that better technology equals better society. This type of reaction was balanced by more realistic studies focusing on the actual impact of social media on the political reform. It seems that the enthusiasm following the Arab Spring events was not entirely supported by statistical data. Only few of the people living in North Africa or the Middle East have access to the Internet. This is why Jon B. Alterman thought that "the revolution will not be tweeted"[2]. In fact, according to Alterman, "(…) what is striking about the political movements of early 2011 is no so much the power of the 21-st century media, but rather the power of 20th century media. (…). It was not Twitter and Facebook, but television that was absolutely fundamental to the unfolding of events, playing a decisive role in expanding protests of thousands into protests of millions".

[1] Lecturer Ph. D., „Spiru Haret" University, (email: macernat@gmail.com).
[2] Jon B. Alterman (2011) "The Revolution Will Not Be Tweeted", The Washington Quarterly, 34:4, 103–116.

As tempting as it may seem, it is not my intention to provide the ultimate answer to the question regarding the role of digital media in the recent political events. My concern is with a more general problem regarding the current challenges digital activism has to face. My article is an attempt of listing and classifying all the things endangering the use of the new communication and information technologies for democratic purposes. I side with the skeptics when it comes to the liberating force of the new technological tools. I think that there is no such thing as technological determinism. New technologies are but mere tools and their use is by no means sociologically shaped. As other media researchers have showed, liberating technologies can also be oppressing technologies allowing authoritarian governments to use them in order to trace down and repress political opponents more efficiently.

In the first section of my article I shall focus on the characteristics of the new communication and information technologies and their many uses in political conflict. Many theorists compare these new technological tools to the Guttenberg Revolution, since the Internet is thought to become a "microphone for the masses". There are multiple facets to this new technology allowing people with a cell phone to become "citizen journalists", to analyze the political events, to communicate more efficiently, to organize political protests and to broadcast their actions.

The current enthusiasm for the techno-determinist perspective can be justified if we look back into the history of technology. In the second part of my paper I shall focus on several arguments that can explain the current techno-determinist perspective. It is the merit of researchers such as Tim Wu[3] or Evgheny Mozorov[4] to focus on the idea that the historical perspective on the evolution of technology is the best way of understanding today's optimistic perspective on the liberating potential of the Internet. The third section of my paper starts from Wu's endeavor of finding a certain pattern in the way new technologies are developed, enthusiastically accepted and, then, after the industrial factor takes control over the innovation one, disappointingly abandoned, provides the setting for the third section of my paper.

It is my intention to prove that there are mainly two types of challenges digital activism has to address, namely the indirect danger represented by the neoliberal deregulation perspective allowing the Internet to become a highly restricted and almost "feudalized" environment, and the direct and obvious dangers authoritarian regimes bring forward when trying to transform the liberating technologies into oppressive ones. In the second section of my article I shall examine several situations where authoritarian regimes transformed the so-called liberating technologies into oppressive ones, using them to trace down and repress political opponents. are The case of the 2009 Iranian presidential elections or the (in)famous case of China are very good examples supporting my argument. The inventors of new technologies cannot develop them by themselves. They need the support of major private companies that in time will take over the control of the new technology, transforming it from an open access one into a restrictive and closed environment. It is common sense knowledge that the Internet was first developed as a free way of sharing information. Once huge corporations such as Google entered the scene, the Internet became one of the most successful businesses of all times. Unfortunately, this led to a sort of "feudalization of the Internet", where several Internet providers dominate the information market and the public is not the first one to gain something from this way of organizing the information environment. The neoliberal deregulated media market could by no means offer the suitable background for an objective, rational and balanced digital agora. "Rather than being an ungoverned realm, cyberspace is perhaps best likened to a gangster – dominated version of New-York: a tangled web of rival public and private authorities, civic associations, criminal networks, and underground economies".[5] When information is transformed into a mere commodity there are no ways of providing a rational place for political debates. Better algorithms can be developed in order to prevent disseminating one-sided biased information by filtering information. But who is willing to pay for such a project? Certainly not the authoritarian regimes or the software companies dominating the world wide web.

[3] Tim Wu (2010) The Master Switch: The Rise and Fall of Information Empires: London, Atlantic Books, 366 pp.

[4] Evgheny Mozorov (2011), The Net Delusion: How not to Liberate the World, London, AL, 408 pp.

The many faces of digital activism and digital divides

In 2009 Moldova, one of the poorest countries of the Ex-Soviet Block, was the scene of one of the most effective political protests organized using the Internet. After nine years of economic crisis, the Communist Party was enjoying majority in the Parliament. In April 2009, the journalist Natalia Morar and other members of an NGO tried to organize a flash mob using Tweeter and other Internet-related communication tools. Here is what she said for the BBC news report:

"It just happened through Twitter, the blogosphere, the Internet, SMS, websites. We just met, we brainstormed for 15 minutes, and decided to make a flash mob. In several hours, 15,000 people came out onto the street. None of us could imagine that such a thing could happen, but it shows there exists a very big protest inside society and within young people. Moldovan youth are not pleased with what is happening in Moldova. Liberty is a great thing for us and we don't want to live in a Soviet kind of society."

The first remark I would like to make is that we should not fall into the trap of believing that the gathering of 15,000 people in a central square is the sole result of the use of Tweeter. The nine years of economic crisis and the dominance of the Communist Party were undoubtedly key factors in bringing people to the streets of Chisinau.

There is a big difference between digital and real political activism. It is common sense knowledge that signing up an online petition is not the same as actually participating to a political revolt. The so-called "dotcauses"[6] are surely more appealing since they do not require their supporters to leave the comfort of their homes. Most sociological studies focus on the use of the Internet for political purposes by reporting the Internet users to the total number of the population and then establishing the sociological profile (age, gender, income, etc.) of the users. It is equally important to notice that for the Internet to count as a liberating technology it has to influence a wide variety of people, not only those who are already politically active offline. Recent findings[7] prove that online and offline activities are often correlated in participative cultures but, it takes other factors besides online communication to have a real political protest.

What is important in Natalia Morar's statement is that it clearly shows that digital activism can take many forms. First of all, there is the possibility of easily communicating to thousands of people. Then, digital activism allows the live broadcasting of important events taking place. This is probably the main reason why some media researchers considered the Internet as a "microphone for the masses". In 2009, at the G20 London meeting, as in the case of the Romanian 2012 protests,

[5] Ronald Deibert, Rafal Rohozinski (2010) "Liberation versus Control: The Future of Cyberspace", Journal of Democracy, 21:4, 43–57.

[6] John D. Clark, Nuno S. Themudo (2006) "Linking The Web and the Street: Internet-based "Dotcauses" and "Anti-Globalization" Movement", World Development, 34:1, 50–74.

[7] Fadi Hirzalla, Liesbet van Zoonen (2011) "Beyond the Online Offline Divide, How Youth's Online and Offline Civic Activities Converge", Social Science Computer Review, 29:4, 481–498.

several footages of police forces savagely beating protesters proved how violent the boys in blue can be. In 2009 a businessman provided The Guardian with a mobile phone footage showing a police man assaulting a passing-by citizen who collapsed in the street. This and other video-documented moments of the political protests made it impossible for the authorities to portray the people in the street as violent troublemakers. From that moment forward it was no longer possible for the authorities to control the information reaching the public. The Internet is the place of many divides[8] but the "power of the medium is that profound tweets also appear side by side with banal ones – second by second, minute by minute, and hour by hour. It is from this perspective that Twitter affords citizen journalists the possibility to break profound news stories to a global public."[9]

These are of course important reasons to be optimistic about the many uses of the new communication and information technologies. We are now witnessing a very important moment in the history of the mass-media: a lot of people have access to it. It is no longer dominated by an elite – the professional journalists – every citizen with a cell phone can gain access to it. It is a very cheap form of communicating globally. But there are still many obstacles to be surpassed.

As expected, the fact that the Internet is not a free way of communicating with each other generates another type of digital divides[10]. First of all there is the racial divide. Marginalized populations often lack access to the new technologies of communication and information (ICT). Moreover, closely related, there is a lack of technological skills necessary to operate ICT devices. Technological illiteracy is widely spread among marginalized social categories. The poor, the elderly, women are less expected to know how to use these new communication tools. While proving to be an important source of information, there is still a long way to go before "Tweeter" could be indeed assigned the role of a "microphone to the masses":

"(…) there remain persisting digital divides in many Western countries which keep marginalized and vulnerable populations away from Twitter and are generally amplified by Web 2.0. Though new social networks and communities of knowledge are supported by Twitter, they are strongly socio-economically stratified. This keeps Twitter inaccessible to much of the news reading public, relegating the medium to the more technologically literate 'Twittering classes'. Furthermore, cases of hoaxes and patent misinformation on Twitter can have disastrous ramifications on marginalized and vulnerable populations. Ultimately, it is critical that we look beyond the Zeitgeist of Twitter and similar mediums as its cool, en vogue gloss masks the fact that Twitter is highly stratified."[11]

But the sociological findings are not the only things preventing us from becoming supporters of the techno-deterministic perspective. A glimpse into the recent history of technology may put things into a more realistic perspective.

The Net Delusion – a historical perspective on the use of technology

At this point I think it is very important to place the new communication and information technologies into a historical context. If we want to understand some of today's exaggerated reactions toward them, it is not enough to focus only on the things that differentiate them from other types of technology. As stated earlier, it was Tim Wu that provided a theoretical framework for understanding the way in which technology is socially received. The main concept he proposes is [8] Dari E. Sylvester, Adam J. McGlynn (2010) "The Digital Divide, Political Participation, and Place", Social Science Computer Review, 28:64, 63–76 .

[9] Dhiraj Murthy (2011) "Tweeter: Microphone for the Masses?", Media, Culture & Society, 33:5, 779–789.

[10] White J.C., Mannon S.E. (2010) The Internet and Social Inequalities, New York: Rutledge.

[11] Dhiraj Murthy (2011) "Tweeter: Microphone for the Masses?", Media, Culture & Society, 33:5, 779–789.

that of "cycle". In the first stage of the cycle inventors develop a new technology fulfilling human needs. At this stage, whether it is electricity, radio, telephones or television, we witness a lot of experiments and enthusiast perception. Wu is not the first to emphasize the powerful reaction toward new technology. It is common sense knowledge that magical powers were attributed to electricity for example. After the first stage it becomes clear that in order to reach as many people as possible the invention itself is not enough. This is why, in the second stage of the cycle, the inventors themselves no longer have the full control over their inventions, since the exploitation of the new technology requires several types of other resources, the most important being, of course, the financial ones. Wu calls the first stage of this cycle the "open" stage. The second one is less appealing, since the "open" systems move toward "closed" ones dominated by a few "centralizers" which can be a single corporation or, as several cases proved, a cartel. This stage can be ended by new emerging technology or by regulation.

The Internet regulations: the two sides of the coin

There is no good answer to the question whether we should regulate the Internet or not. It is the main purpose of this article to show that no simple answer could be given to this question since whatever course we may take, we are likely to run into troubles. The future of digital activism lies uncertain, since the freedom of the Internet itself is very difficult to be guaranteed. Thus, if we adopt the neoliberal stance and transform the information into a mere commodity while deregulating the information market, we may have to accept that telecommunication and software companies establish all sort of financial constraints generating the above mentioned "digital divides". On the other hand, if we accept the fact that the Internet use must be regulated, we face the danger of arbitrary political decisions even more restrictive than the financial ones. China and Iran surely regulate the use of the Internet, especially when it comes to political digital activism, but who would agree to such restrictive and punitive regulations? I think it is fair to say that nowadays the freedom of the Internet is disputed between the authoritarian regimes and some huge telecommunication companies.

There is a little place for hope since there are notable exceptions to this rule. Although there is a lack of evidence that access to the new communication and information tools can actually improve the democratic climate, the Swedish government embrace enthusiastically the idea of finding ways to encourage digital activism. Gunilla Carlsson, the Swedish Minister for International Development Cooperation is the author of a very favorable article towards digital activism, published in one of Sweden's most popular newspapers, the Expressen. The title of the article is more than relevant: „Net Activists Are the New Democracy Fighters". As a result of the large scale use of Tweeter in the Arab Spring, as well as in other political revolts, Gunilla Carlsson launched a call for proposals having as main topic the way in which the new information and communication technologies would lead to democratic change in developing countries. She also offered generous amounts of money for the purpose of improving the freedom of speech and democratization. The Swedish government can be accused of being too naive and of adopting an almost techno-utopian perspective on the liberating powers of the Internet. Christian Christiansen[12] is quoting what might seem a very optimistic and encouraging government speech praising the use of social media in the democratization process only to criticize the naive perspective of the Swedish government:

„The speed with which the Swedish government appeared to accept popular discourse regarding the role of social media in the North African and Middle Eastern uprisings, and then converted this acceptance into a public call for project proposals on net activism, suggests an opportunistic, ad hoc political strategy."[13]

[12] Christian Christiansen (2011) "Discourse of Technology and Liberation:State Aid to Net Activists in an Era of"Twitter Revolutions", The Communication Review, 14:3, 233–253 .

Maybe Christiansen is right in accusing the Swedish government of opportunistic strategies, but, opportunistic or not, this initiative proves an interest in the development of future digital activism. And, compared to other types of political perspectives, this is a rather positive one. Unfortunately, not all the governments are so open when it comes to digital activism.

In what concerns the Internet Regulations, the debates are more heated than ever. Ranging from full acceptance to total rejection, the opinions regarding the Internet regulation are very passionate since we are probably witnessing the moment when the future of this new technology is decided. Many researchers think that the myth of deregulation, as appealing as it may seem, leads only to lack of freedom of expression. Quoting a personal communication from Harold Feld[14], Sascha Meinrath manages to present a very vivid point of view regarding the Internet regulation:

"The Internet managed to evolve quite nicely over the last 30 years because, contrary to popular myth, the Federal Communications Commission (FCC) regulated the … out of it. Specifically, until the Bush administration took over, the FCC required the companies that owned the lines over which the bits traveled (the phone companies) to leave the traffic alone — no getting in the way of customers and the information they want to download, the applications they want to run, or the devices they want to attach to the network."

If regulating the Internet has such positive effect, why not adopting it? The problem with state regulation is a very controversial one. The freedom of the Internet equals the freedom of speech, the freedom of online association, and it is not at all easy to protect those things. The fact that the authorities regulate the use of the network offers no guarantee whatsoever that abuses will not occur. Technology cannot offer by itself the settings for a more democratic society. The case of Iran is typical here. Ever since 1996 the number of Internet users in Iran has increased at an incredible rate. The number of Internet users in Iran has mushroomed from only 600,000 users in 1996 to 36,500,000 in 2011.[15] According to the Internet World Stats, Iran has one of the highest penetrations of Internet use in the world. The virtual world served the Iranian people well, being a place where especially youth and women could express more freely than the conservative society rules compelled them to do. This offered hope for the supporters of the techno-deterministic perspective. The U.S. government's obsession with regime change in Iran made them provide technological „support" in the information war taking place in Iran. The U.S. government gave license of distribution for a program designed to bypass Iranian censorship. The program proved to be a total failure, allowing the Iranian authorities to track down its users more efficiently. The high rate of Internet penetration in Iran does not represent much by itself, since the regulations are restrictive and punitive. Once digital activism threatened to move from the online environment to the real world, the authorities have developed very strict regulations. In 2000 the Iranian authorities launched an organized filtering of websites. Internet providers were forbidden to have direct connections, they had to obtain license to operate and then begin to filter the „anti-Islamic" sites. The state control expanded and all Internet providers were controlled by the state. In 2002 a Committee in Charge of Determining Unauthorized Sites was formed, its task consisting mainly in censoring those trying to express critical points of view. Advanced filter programs were acquired from governments sharing the same fears (China) and up to this day Iran has one of the most elaborate set of regulations regarding the Internet use.

[13] Loc.cit. p. 19.

[14] Sascha D. Meinrath, Victor W. Pickard (2011) "The New Net Neutrality: Criteria for Internet Freedom", on line document : http://www.saschameinrath.com/files/The%20New%20Network%20Neutrality%20v10.pdf

[15] http://www.internetworldstats.com/stats5.htm

This is a very important example of how regulation can be developed and implemented against Internet Users. The „open-access" supporters and the „net neutrality" supporters should bear this in mind when asking for more state regulations.

4. Conclusions

There are mainly two important dangers digital activism has to face: political or corporate control and there are no simple answers to the question regarding the Internet regulation. Only a truly democratic political government could develop regulations favoring the public. Offering the state's authorities the power to control the Internet providers is by no means less dangerous than the formation of monopolies and cartels. The deregulated information market protects the intellectual rights to the direct benefit of major media corporations while creating „digital divides" and placing the marginalized population outside the world wide web. The state control over the Internet providers protects mainly the political leaders. This leaves very little room for the public willing to freely discuss political topics in the digital arena.

References:

- Alterman Jon B., (2011): "The Revolution Will Not Be Tweeted", The Washington Quarterly, 34:4, 103–116.
- Clark, John D. and Themudo, V. S. (2006), "Linking The Web and the Street: Internet-based "Dotcauses" and "Anti-Globalization" Movement", World Development, 34:1, 50–74.
- Christiansen, Christian, (2011) "Discourse of Technology and Liberation:State Aid to Net Activists in an Era of"Twitter Revolutions", The Communication Review, 14:3, 233–253 .
- Deibert, Ronald and Rohozinski ,Rafal (2010): "Liberation versus Control: The Future of Cyberspace", Journal of Democracy, 21:4, 43–57.
- Dhiraj Murthy (2011), "Tweeter: Microphone for the Masses?", Media, Culture & Society, 33:5, 779–789.
- Hirzalla, Fadi, and van Zoonen, Liesbet (2011), "Beyond the Online Offline Divide, How Youth's Online and Offline Civic Activities Converge", Social Science Computer Review, 29:4, 481–498.
- Meinrath, Sascha D. and Pickard, Victor W. (2011), "The New Net Neutrality: Criteria for Internet Freedom", on line document : http://www.saschameinrath.com/files/The%20New%20Network%20Neutrality%20v10.pdf
- Mozorov, Evgheny (2011), The Net Delusion: How not to Liberate the World, London, AL, 408 pp.
- Murthy, Dhiraj (2011), "Tweeter: Microphone for the Masses?", Media, Culture & Society, 33:5, 779–789.
- Sylvester, Dari E. and McGlynn, Adam J. (2010), "The Digital Divide, Political Participation, and Place", Social Science Computer Review, 28:64, 63–76 .
- White, J.C., Mannon S.E. (2010), The Internet and Social Inequalities, New York: Rutledge.
- Wu, Tim (2010), The Master Switch: The Rise and Fall of Information Empires: London, Atlantic Books, 366 pp.

THE MESSAGE OF THE ROMANIAN CULTURE IN THE POLITICAL AND SPIRITUAL CONFIGURATION OF THE CONTEMPORARY WORLD

MARIA PESCARU[1]

Abstract

The analysis of the fundamental features that could define a message of the Romanian culture in the political and spiritual configuration of the contemporary world is a major concern because the Romanian culture occupies a special position in Europe. I t has a valuable past enough to have confidence in itself.

In the contemporary stage, the Romanian culture is a positive factor in the planetary spiritual and artistic evolution, giving it a universal destiny.

In the process of culture creation two factors attend: the individual and the society. But culture is not the same everywhere, because depending on the state of society and cultural values developed by individuals, it is understood that vary with different forms of society.

The Romanian culture occupies a special position within the European continent, as it has a valuable past enough to justify the confidence in it self and ensure a welcoming audience on behalf of the past.

The major European cultures appeared on the universal scene and they had a global influence at a time because of synchronies, the matching condition of their historical specificity and the universal imperatives of a certain age. Not geography, not demography, not weapons were determined to share the universal destiny of nations created by specific cultures, but their ability to formulate and meet the needs of a particular historical development, in which other peoples and other cultures were involved.

Keywords: culture, cultural values, society, creation, spiritual evolution

In a time when the Romanian presence in terms of major political and moral debate involved in the genesis process of a new world has become objective, we are asking which are the fundamental characteristics that could define a "message of the Romanian culture".

One of the features is "the availability for universal"[2], the ability to intuit the universal structures of past historical and cultural reality as an inner necessity of self-definition and self-assertion. Today the Romanian culture has the largest inner freedom from the old structures, as appropriate as to join and contribute to develop new structures heavily.

The second key feature of Romanian culture and our spiritual structure itself is "the realism"[3], which is the inner willingness to perceive the reality of life beyond just abstract patterns; to continually keep contact with it, to see and discover the deep structures of reality behind the phenomena.

Synchronies and affinities existed in the secular traditions of the Romanian culture and they invite us to meditation on its own genius, trends, aspirations, and sometimes dramatic search of the contemporary world.

The Romanian culture-European synthesis

To understand the evolution of the Romanian culture, setting the place, the role and the value of the Romanian creations within the civilization of our continent, we must start from the training reality in the Middle Ages, of the two areas of culture in Europe and of two types of civilization.

---

[1] Senior Lecturer Ph. D., University of Pitesti, (email: mariapescaru@yahoo.com).

[2] Dan, Zamfirescu, *Romanian Culture European synthesis, (*Bucharest: International Letter Publishing, 2002), 21.

[3] Idem, 22.

The first is the dominant religious culture area of the Roman Catholic Church, using Latin as the main means of expression to the emergence of the national literatures, and living the glorious memories of the Roman Empire, who unified to the late Antiquity, the Mediterranean civilization. All non-Latin peoples belong to this area, except the Romanians, and it integrated- in the 5th-9th centuries- Germanic and Anglo-Saxon peoples, further promoting the great modern spiritual revolution which was the Reform.[4]

A second culture and civilization area revolve around Byzantium, combining, in an original synthesis, the idea of the Romanian state, territory of the Eastern Empire, Greek culture as a cultural tool, and cultivating the memory and pride of the more pregnant Greek heritage from the 9th century.

The Romanian people appears later than other European nations on the stage of history, after an anonymous existence for centuries, whose main virtue was to ensure its duration, therefore, to maintain the difficult circumstances the being of the people, the language and even the name (the Romanians are the only people of Latin descent who kept the name the Romans). Mentioned by sources only in the 10th century, and living until the 14th century, the state forms of life do not allow a large deployment and any large-scale of cultural action, Romanians are building their strong state lives and the written culture flourishes only in the 14th century and a new political culture starts only with the fifteenth century. Then we started a Romanian chapter in the history of European civilization, but the Romanians, as descenders of two peoples, wrote their names deeply in the antique history and civilization.

The Romanian culture in the European culture

The entire human progress can be analyzed from two points of view: invention-creation, the latter resulting in the collective effort of those who agree with the creative genius and turns his revolutionary dream into a work servicing the humanity. Without the hard working hands of the genius assistant, without the calculation of Gorjan engineer and without the money investment of those who sponsored the work, both the highly complex art of Targu Jiu and the Sistine Chapel or the foundations of Stephen the Great would have remained mere sketches on cards creators.

The creative gesture is, then, with all its social conditionings, a social act. The company can stimulate or inhibit the progress from the acceptance and dissemination of new findings, to the creation of an entire environment that magnetizes creative energy producing real explosions, real geniuses waterfalls, or from the disinterest and bantering of the creator to climbing him on a scaffold. Hence, the possibility that the study of the individual and historical conditions appears and the stimulation or inhibition occurs by different nature to the creative act. Thus, an autonomous science is born.

The prestige of a culture never comes from outside. It is a climate irradiation from within, of pride, dignity, self-safety which the creative people emit at a time. Creators do not write for awards or abroad recognition, but write only to serve their nation which is in a happy moment for historical affirmation. The prestige of a culture does not derive from good or bad translations, but derives from the need that I feel, at some point, other cultures to enrich the spiritual power to treasure and experience that culture.

The moment that today's Romanian creator will penetrate deep down to his greatness, dignity and culture that is the actuality, he will not find other places and certificates will bear up before all those who will marvel.

Romanian cultural integration in the new European reality

Even if "the european ideea" is deeply and actively interested in just an intellectual elite, city, civic, quite small, we have no doubt that this idea will grow over time as the structure and living conditions of the country will change. From a predominantly intellectual phenomenon, the "European spirit" will become more and more public reality, treated in depth. Together with all democratic forces of the country, it will determine a new policy of a Christian or liberal democrat type. It is, in fact, the only real and effective alternative to current nomenclature State. Ultimately, the report must be fundamentally reversed to the centralized state, which leads, coordinates and distributes in order to stimulate and protect. Its function is only subsidiary. As the civil society develops, its role gradually narrows: minimal state-European state, as the product of a new historical development. This requires a profound change of ideological, political and social angle.

[4] Vasile, Miftode, and others, European integration and interculturalism. Development of ethno-cultural communities, (Bucharest: Lumen House, 2008), 78

The left, right or center culture means axiological balance of values, liberalism, humanism, said Europeanism and active convergence and even synthesis of national and universal values, rationalism and critical spirit.

Three very clear intellectual attitudes can be predicted: permanent connection to the values, ideas and European culture, serious European documentation (library, university, museums, etc...), the extent of any dilettantism and amateurism, cultural achievements of Europe (like writing and value), the Romanian environment, and the people of Romanian culture.

European cultural integration, coupled with the taking of the spiritual identity, begins to increase. If until 1940, it had a predominantly "historic" and "philological" character, through important contributions in these directions, sometimes "artistic" under the totalitarian pressure began to escape, as well as in the entire socialist camp and in the "literary" and "literary studies" area.[5]

From the perspective of the new European reality (by which we understand both the present, as a result, in particular, the collapse of the communist dictatorship in Europe) and, especially, of the future one, the factors that can facilitate the cultural integration of Romania in the new European reality are essentially internal: first, a real European integration policy, taken consistently, constantly and tenaciously under the pressure of external factors, mostly the economic ones. Secondly, it requires a radical change of public spirit, leaving the isolationist mentality, specific, traditionalist, etc. ethnical, cultivated for decades here in Romania by the nationalist right, since the two world wars. Thirdly, an active policy of cultural contacts, as a necessary consequence of mood changes described above: the constant and active participation in various international bodies and literary cultural associations, congresses at international conferences (scholarships and travel), the organization of such events in our country (a long-term investment, high return but cultural) co-editing financing and translations in foreign languages (a very important objective of any active cultural policy).

Particular literary, editorial and individual initiative of the writers, men of culture, plays an important role. They can not expect only a hypothetical support of the official bodies (which often it is not coming), but they must try to integrate themselves. Some examples can also be given in this sense (in literature, criticism, literary theory, comparative), but they are still few and without external prestige and circulation. Only writers like M.Sadoveanu and L. Rebreanu, between the two wars, began to be concerned about these issues and to be translated into some languages. A persistent concern in this regard appeared, seemingly paradoxically, only during the communist dictatorship as a form of escape and direct manifestation of European consciousness repressed.

Looking deep, beyond the external factors, the key issue of European integration is essentially in Romania, the fundamental social structure. A rural and inevitably ethnic, conservative, isolationist, traditionalist, "semanatorist" Romania will not ever feel the need for Europe. Instead, it will perceive it as a serious threat to maintaining "national being". Only a city, urban, open, permeable to foreign influences, and prone to "cosmopolism" phenomena Romania can have real aspirations and "European" needs. Romania's current structure is still essentially rural, with all its negative phenomena. Only mid-range future, urban, Romanian, can effectively absorb and cultivate the European idea. It is now maintained by the Romanian intellectual remnants of the old aristocracy and bourgeoisie, how many could be saved. It is an ongoing, long, lasting, and in the current political and economic conditions still undecided. Between "Europeanization" and "privatization" it is a direct indissoluble Romanian relation, because only economic independence provides effective liberty thinking and cultural relations. In a strictly centralized state, European integration is seen as an attempt at independence and "national suverainty".[6]

[5] Andrei, Petre, Sociological Works, Volume II, Sociology of politics and culture, (Bucharest: Academy Socialist Republic of Romania, 1975) 139.

Some blocking, rejecting or docile and lacking personality alignment "European" psychological factors are very considerable. The inferiority complex is still raging.

It can not be overlooked some irritating attitudes of Western "superiority complex". Some deeply mediocre, lack of competence cultural officials in the services of some embassies, institutes, libraries, unfortunately sometimes have a superior attitude, distance, some would say even "neo". The reaction of the writers, people of Romanian culture in Europe is actually consciousness, in some cases, inevitable and natural restraint, reserved, of non-cooperation.

Although the cultural gap of reference and erudition is still immense, in some specific cases, rare indeed, but existing, the question is why a Romanian author would be eternally "forced" to cite only foreign references, and a foreign author, in a certain precise issue, is not interested, in turn, in what has been published and new? Including, sometimes, foreign languages, even on the same subject? Why these references would be, in principle at least, of virtually equal quality?

The studies of "comparative literature" have, as a vocation, the study of literary relations in two ways. Why they would carry only "Eurocentric" one-way? The current European scientific and literary mentality is fragmentary, strictly specialized on strict partitions. Study and life often edit only a single author, etc... Many critics consider European comparative generalizations, summaries, general theories as dilettantism phenomena and even inferiority, etc... It is obvious that things, in some specific cases, at least, are completely different.

The uundoubtedly sincere, genuine failure to perceive the real, objective, aesthetic reactions is visible especially in the ideological sphere. Researcher and western reviewers, formed in a democratic, liberal type, where these realities are introduced for a long time and lived in the most natural way in the world, simply can not understand how, in the East, there is (or was) possible to invoke the idea of freedom, human rights etc.. He thinks, in his view (and so is) that it actually forces the open doors unnecessarily.

The Romanian foreign cultural device (but the situation is characteristic of all former communist countries to some extent) is not at all appropriate, as mentality and methods of European integration of Romanian values. Bureaucratic mentality, centralized, on the other hand makes it unable to adapt flexible total diversity in a free Europe society of literary relations, journalism and publishing. free Europe.

"Integration" does not threaten the existence of "national character" in any way. This "specific" evolves, is enriched, and is nuanced by all fertile influences and purchases of "integration". This alarm is maintained artificially and especially by the conservative traditionalists. The process of assimilation, osmosis and interdependence is universal and the Romanian literature (like any other) can not escape, according to its specific historical context and conditions.

For Romania to be made known, introductory works, reference guides, the history are needed for the general public. "In the editorial, the order would be this: novel, essay, drama. ..... Unfortunately, we relied almost exclusively to poetry.

The changing the editorial landscape is in a sense, radical. There was, first, the foreign literature category of consumption, mass, high circulation, totally unknown, for example, before 1989. This kind of translation is by far dominant. Another new category is the emergence of political essay translations, political works of reference, the liberal-democratic, and it completely unknown before. A new species is the category of memoirs, diaries, memories (including detention), unpublished correspondence. Another unusual category: large quantities of literature, esoteric, occult, more or less dubious. The phenomenon is, however, inevitably, after a very vulgar militant atheism. Great success and some novels or stories are full of real or alleged revelations about the "old regime", "revolution", "security", etc… It continues to appear literary and critical type operas, so called, traditionalist, but without the sales and listed audience categories. Some magazines prize the original literature today, without a great echo and influence especially on the commercial market the book.

[6] Anton, Nicolescu, National sovereignty and European integration , (Iasi: Polirom 2002,) 142

The Romanian literature adapts to these needs with great difficulty and, so far at least, without success, hence the desperate calls for sponsorship and grants, denouncing "cultural crisis" appear.

The cultural integration can be facilitated (and assumed) by intense culture exchanges (contacts) between Romania and Western European countries (cultural agreements, scholarships, participation in international cultural events, etc...) The activity of the government bodies, institutions or other is not sufficient for this purpose. The lack of funds is a great handicap. But the biggest obstacle is the spirit of anti-Western, anti-liberal and anti-pluralist. Everything has been done can be done by the Romanian culture and Romanian culture is not simply the Ministry of Culture, but is almost exclusively the result of private, informal initiatives.

The Romanian culture between Est and West

The Romanian culture, namely the modern Romanian culture from the 18th and 19 to go directly to fund problem-is the product of Western fast synchronization. At the same time, traditional background, history, the late Middle Ages, remains very strong. The result is a characteristic situation: the confluence of two cultural spheres, without real affinity, deep, between them, modern Romanian culture is full of interference, the ambiguities and even inevitable conflicts.

Faced between West and East, the Romanian culture is dominated since the last century, by two major complexes: the west (Western) and Eastern (Oriental). "Between isolation and escape, chauvinistic and proud nationalism, the exacerbated nationalistic anger and western docile, even humble alignment, knocking on all doors in the western continent, Romanian cultural consciousness has not yet found, unfortunately, the balance and peace of mind and creative spirit."[7]

The Western psychology of seduction, of emigration, of the flight at all costs, has reached deep layers of the population. It needs a collective effort for a real political culture, including cultural distribution abroad. Objectives as competent, honest and free instruments and organs as organized, skilled and active must guide the presentation of Romanian culture and literature through systematic acts of knowledge and dissemination. We need competence and professionalism, spirit of cooperation throughout the EU, to participate with equal rights. It indicated the spirit of cooperation and team spirit in the new Europe that is necessary and that we can not ignore it or boycott it. Thinking and acting so far means not to be integrated in synchronous rhythm of the contemporary world.

The European and universal culture requires communication and circulation of free culture, continue to stimulate and intensify the exchange of values everywhere.

The European culture requires and stimulates cooperation and mutual influence. It promotes a permeable, responsive, sensitive, and open to creative and differentiation assimilations literature. Fostering friendly relations, mutual tolerance are correct and moral imperative and literary needs and outstanding.

We ask ourselves: what kind of culture is better? In what direction is the Romanian culture to turn? To develop? To be nurtured and supported? The answer depends, for a long time, our entire culture and political advancement, both official and especially the private.

We lived for decades under a culture of "left". Its effects are still felt heavily in legislative and administrative measures in language skills and clichés. Most obvious and dominant notes are the collective values, social order and norms, where the authority of a unique idea, the centralism, conducting, planning, control, uniformity, intolerance are. The state is and remains the great patron-owner, the great administrator of culture. There is a ruling class and culture of a cultural nomenclature. It exercised censorship and cultural policy and reject pluralism as totalitarian order, split, dissidents, so the culture of hate left, fights cultural pluralism, private initiative, intellectual freedom with all its consequences: the expression of personality, originality, experimental, out of time. The principle of individual creativity essentially denies the left culture. Left ideal of culture is that all people of culture to be and remain the state officials to be better employed, directed, supervised, controlled and punished.

[7] Adrian, Marino, For Europe. Romania's integration. Ideological and cultural aspects, (Iasi: Polirom, 1995), 77

In Romania, the whole right ideology came back to the surface and dominated the current Romanian culture. Its exponents are philosophers, essayists, writers of great value, from Nae Ionescu to Emil Cioran, from Mircea Eliade to Constantin Noica.

Between these two compact blocks the Romanian center, frail, intimidated, isolated, without great traditions date, caught between two fires, under pressure from the left and right-wing extremism culture is a very difficult position. The center cultural values are hated in both directions, left or right: axiological balance between values, liberalism, pluralism, humanism, Europeanism, convergence and even synthesis of national and universal values, rationalism and critical spirit, a "common sense" that extremists despise, adherence to human rights and citizen[8], civil society by integrating nostalgia, direct participation and responsibility of the individual are still perfectly legitimate aspirations of any post-totalitarian society.

In Romania, in the countries of the East in general, this type of thinking and culture is neither obsolete nor exhausted, nor utopian. He is a great need, a real alternative, which alone can oppose extremes. Culture is the center but spiritual freedom, truth and real integration in democratic Europe.

The Romanian "lights" and Europe discovery

At the end of 18th century and the beginning of the 19th century, the novelistic intellectuals make a true "crisis" of European consciousness, spiritual solidarity with the first signs of civilization, culture and history of Western ideas and values, style and design dates back to life that time. The need to be in Europe, to bring it to our home was acute and urgent. This magical notion contained a global concept: admiration and inferiority complex, emulation and envy, hope and rebellion, and integration ideal, desire and progress, regeneration and rehabilitation. The true spiritual mutation, Romanian crucial moment in the history of consciousness and experiencing first phase of modernization, the discovery of Europe by the "lights" Romanian crucial raises cultural and comparative history and ideas.

European lights were indeed fertile and creative both in the spiritual and cultural Romanian space, because they determine the revelation of our own beings, reveal us in front of our own consciousness. European lights Romanian decisively help the Romanian spirit to discover its identity, to form its own aspirations, beliefs and European dimension. It suddenly had the revelation and conscience of being European. Cultural exponents of the Romanian people proclaim that they are Europeans, are in Europe, speak a European language and live in a European country.

The fundamental reality of time is as follows: for the Romanian Enlightenment, Europe was essentially a geographical or geopolitical notion but a cultural, spiritual pole. It expresses values, creations, original ideological trends: a new culture and literature, new and advanced social and political institutions, achieving a high level of progress, culture and civilization. This concept was tied to the belief that Europe radiates and gives new impetus to a cultural process, high quality of [8] Human rights are classified according to various criteria, but the classification is used which is based on two international human rights pacts. Thus, according to those documents referred to, human rights can be divided into the following broad categories: political, economic and social, cultural. (For more details see Cristina Otovescu FRAS human rights in contemporary society, Romanian Writing Publishing House, Craiova, 2009, p. 22-23) everything the Romanians knew before. Its meaning is equivalent to a real break, mutation and spiritual revolution.

Europe has all the characteristics of a cultural "model" in its fundamental meanings: "normative ideal, a force-idea, which proposes models, examples, paths to follow, imitate, assimilate, ideological system that organizes a whole, according to a structure basic data that fall within its scope, theoretical, abstract, autonomous plan functioning according to its internal logic, even if the image data does not take account of all Western reality ".[9] The European idea operates uniformly in all Romanian countries, with specific features, but in the same system of thought. How Romanians find, adapt and make their own picture of Europe, through a spontaneous act of adhesion, is itself functioning of the European model.

The study of the Romanian Enlightenment essentially needs a new and direct reading of the sources. They corrected many schemes, unverified general, outdated teaching exposures, repetition of commonplaces.

Much higher frequency of direct and indirect contact (reading, translation, travel, business education institutions, foreign teachers, intellectual atmosphere) is that "European model" to clarify and to state power in the first Romanian countries, Moldova and Walachia, and the end of the 18th century.

Legătura între iluminare, integrare şi recunoaştere europeană constituie un adevărat principiu ideologic. Iar aceste participări-concepute, în principiu, pe picior de egalitate-vor deveni tot mai frecvente pe măsură ce cultura română se dezvoltă în ţările noastre şi se dovedesc tot mai capabile de iniţiative şi manifestări pe plan internaţional.

The relationship between light, European integration and recognition is a real ideological principle. And these designed participations, in principle, on an equal footing, will become increasingly common as growing Romanian culture in our countries and prove more capable of initiatives and events.

Conclusions:

The basic concern for the message in the Romanian culture is the affirmation of European culture, defining, defending and popularizing the broad intellectual circles of the "European idea". By extensive and rigorous political and history studies, "European idea" needs affirmation and dissemination, clarification and strengthening of solidarity and deepening in the receptive Romanian consciousness. This preparatory and introductory stage is strictly indispensable. It still requires the removal, at least in part, an obvious gap in our journalism: methodical discussion of the "European idea" in its triple dimension: cultural - literary, ideological and political, as it reflects the culture and cultural Romanian realities.

Four objectives have priority in this respect: an affirmation of Europe's energy and adherence to this ideal in a novelistic perspective, by taking personal charge, a European point of view properly when you go through history, a militant attitude and style by the propagation of active and sometimes controversial ideas, expressed in a civilized and urban manner, exclusive idea polemics and not a people polemics, to bring a "European home" with as many ideas, values and attitudes. The basic program is being at the same time Romanian and EU in all fields of activity and with full conviction and energy.

This paper is suported by the Sectorial Operational Programme Human Resources Development (SOP HRD), financed from the European Social Fund and by the Romanian Govemment under the contract number SOP HRD/89/1.5/S/59758.

Title and intellectual and industrial property rights on the placement results belong to the Romanian Academy postdoctoral research

[9] Dutu, Alexandru, Romanian culture in modern European civilization, (Bucharest: Minerva Publishing House, 1978), 186

References

- Dutu, Alexandru, Romanian culture in modern European civilization, Bucharest: Minerva Publishing House, 1978
- Marino, Adrian, For Europe. Romania's integration. Ideological and cultural aspects, Iasi: Polirom, 1995
- Miftode, Vasile, and others, European integration and interculturalism. Development of ethno-cultural communities, Bucharest: Lumen House, 2008
- Nicolescu, Anton, National sovereignty and European integration, Iasi: Polirom, 2002
- Otovescu Frasie, Cristina, Human rights in contemporary society, Craiova, Romanian Writing Publishing House, 2009
- Peter, Andrew, Sociological Works, Volume II, Sociology of politics and culture, Bucharest: Academy Socialist Republic of Romania, 1975
- Zamfirescu, Dan, Romanian Cultural European synthesis, Bucharest: International Letter Publishing, 2002

A TRADITIONAL FALSE PROBLEM: THE RIGORISM OF KANTIAN MORAL AND POLITICAL PHILOSOPHY. THE CASE OF VERACITY

MIHAI NOVAC[1]

Abstract
According to many of its traditional critics, the main weakness in Kantian moral-political philosophy resides in its impossibility of admitting exceptions. In nuce, all these critical positions have converged, despite their reciprocal heterogeneity, in the so called accuse of moral rigorism (unjustly, I would say) directed against Kant's moral and political perspective. As such, basically, I will seek to defend Kant against this type of criticism, by showing that any perspective attempting to evaluate Kant's ethics on the grounds of its capacity or incapacity to admit exceptions is apriorily doomed to lack of sense, in its two logical alternatives, i.e. either as nonsense (predicating about empty notions), or as tautology (formulating ad hoc definitions and criteria with respect to Kant's system and then claiming that it does not hold with respect to them). Essentially, I will try to show that Kantian ethics can organically immunize itself epistemologically against any such so called anti-rigorist criticism.

Key terms: political philosophy, ethics, categorical imperative, practical principle, veracity, perfect duty, mendacium, falsiloquium

A very frequent objection to Kant's moral and political philosophy concerns its alleged rigorism. Thus, we are told: Kant's moral and political philosophy does not allow for any exceptions and this would constitute its fundamental flaw. In what sense however? Does it not allow for exceptions that, for one reason or another, it should allow for, or does it not concede of admitting exceptions when, in fact, doing so? Schiller[2] is a classical exponent of the former alternative, Benjamin Constant[3] of the latter (although indirectly). More clearly stated, in the latter case, the point of the objection would consist in saying not so much that the Kantian moral-political system does not allow for exceptions, but quite the opposite, that it does so, but it fails to admit it; given the case, I am quite puzzled by the fact that these two, argumentatively opposed, critical positions joined together in this anti-rigorist anti-Kantian alliance. I will not deal here so much with the Schiller type objection, i.e. the one linking Kant's alleged rigorism to his apparent rejection of any possibility for granting moral value to the actions which are accompanied by inclinations (feelings), criticism which, though frequent, I find rather shallow.

Kant does not hold, as his romantic critics would have it, that there is an essential and irredeemable conflict between reason and affectivity (i.e. that the opposition between the two is equivalent to the one between morality and immorality, so that any morally right conduct would necessarily lead to unhappiness, while any emotionally gratifying action would be doomed to unrighteousness). Kant only says that, when aiming at performing moral actions, we should not seek

---

[1] Assistant Professor, Ph. D., „Nicolae Titulescu" University, Bucharest (email: novmih@yahoo.co.uk).

[2] Namely in his On the Esthetic Education of Man. The point of his criticism of Kant is well summed up in the following lines: Gerne dien' ich den Freunden, doch tue ich es leider mit Neigung,/Und so wurmt es mich oft, daß ich nicht tugendhaft bin,/Da ist kein anderer Rat, du musst suchen, sie zu verachten,/Und mit Abscheu alsdann thun, wie die Pflicht dir gebeut. (I gladly come to my friends' aid, although i do it by inclination,/ And so I am often troubled, by the thought of not being virtuous,/There is no other way, you must try to oust them,/And indignantly hold to what duty commands – my translation). Sattler, Alexander, Schiller-Briefe über die Ästhetische Erziehung des Menschen, Norderstedt, Grin Verlag, 2009, p.56.

[3] Constant, B. (1998), "Des réactions politiques", in Écrits de jeunesse (1774-1799), L. Omacini and J.-D. Candaux – (eds.), Tübingen, Max Niemeyer Verlag.

their moral value in the feelings, of any nature, accompanying those actions. He neither says that we should not feel if we want to be moral, nor that if feeling, while being moral, we are moral no longer. Roughly speaking, according to Kant, we can feel whatever we want to feel as long as we do not guide or value our morally aimed actions by those feelings. Why? Basically because morality, as Kant sees it, has to be necessary and universal while feelings, no matter how altruistic in intent, are always contingent and particular and, quite obviously, we cannot ground something necessary and universal on something that is contingent and particular.

Essentially, his point would be that any feeling, however selfless in its aim, is selfish in its nature, i.e. by its very nature of being subjectively felt, lacks the kind of universality which is required for a moral principle. We would not want to have to do, on the other hand, with a feeling which would not be subjectively felt. Correlatively, feelings change, that is good natured feelings do not necessarily ensure good natured actions: love, however good natured in its being-felt, can very well lead to morally condemnable actions. On the other hand, Kant holds, neither do the real positive results of a conduct guarantee its moral character. Why? Because the actual results of an action are not in the full control of the agent performing the action. One could very well hurt somebody while trying to help, just as one could help him, while trying to hurt him. Just as we should not be condemned for doing the wrong thing for the right reasons, we should not be (morally) commended for doing the right thing for the wrong reasons. How our intended actions actually turn out depends on a multitude of other factors over which we have limited control, or even none whatsoever. But if neither the feelings had while performing an action, nor the actual results to which it leads afterwards, account for its moral value, than what does? Kant's answer: the intent behind it, that is, knowing of wanting to do the right thing for the right reasons. And which are the right reasons? Those reasons which, given the context, could lead any imaginable human being to the same intent. Only actions intended through such reasons have moral value. But feelings, as we have seen, do not possess this sort of unilateral necessity with respect to the actions they lead to. They are in a state of perpetual flux, namely, they are so changing that not only different people feel different things in the same context, but the same person can feel different things in the same context and, all the more, the same person feeling the same thing in the same context could want to do quite different things. That is not necessarily bad, quite the contrary, it accounts for the feelings' vital value, i.e. for the intimacy, spontaneity and authenticity the lack of which would make human existence not just dull, but rather improbable. But precisely this vital value which makes feelings worth being had is what makes them also unfit for serving as moral principles. When, given a specific context, we intend to act morally in a specific way, we should consider strictly those reasons of which we know that would lead any other human being, real or imaginary, to the same intent in the same way and, consequently, myself at any other time when meeting the given context. Only purely rational reasons are capable of doing that and that is because reason is the only trait of the human being which is universally shared in the same way. That is what we could call, in Kantian terms, the universalizability of our maxims[4] and this notion runs through his entire moral and political philosophical system:

Act only according to that maxim through which you could at the same time will that it should become a universal law.[5]

(The Categorical Imperative, the first formulation, Variant i)

Act as if the maxim of your action were to become through your will a universal law of nature.[6]

[4] Approx. reasons for acting in a certain way in specific situations.

[5] Kant, Immanuel, Groundwork of the Metaphysics of Morals, Cambridge, Cambridge Univbersity Press, 1998 p. 88.

(The Categorical Imperative, the first formulation, Variant ii)

Act in such a way that you always treat humanity, whether in your own person, or in the person of another, never simply as a means, but always at the same time as an end. [7] (The Categorical Imperative, the second formulation)

All maxims proceeding from our own law-making ought to harmonize with a possible kingdom of ends as a kingdom of nature.[8]
(The Categorical Imperative, the third formulation)

Right is…the totality of conditions, under which the will (Willkür) of one person can be unified with the will of another under a universal law of freedom.[9]
(The Principle of Right, variant i)

Every action is right which, or the maxim of which, allows the freedom of the will of each to subsist together with the freedom of everyone.[10]
(The Principle of Right, variant ii)

Basically and paradoxically, we could say that Kant rejects affectivity while stressing reason as moral principle precisely because the former is not empathetic enough[11] for such a position, while the latter is. That's about it with the former, Schiller type anti-rigorist objection to Kant. The basic idea is that this type of criticism lacks sense because it accuses Kantian ethics of lacking something which it was precisely designed to lack, i.e. exceptions. That is exactly what the entire Kantian moral project was about: offering a systematic model of morality provided with necessity and universality, i.e. explicitly not admitting exceptions. Exceptions in what sense? In the sense of moral grounds for breaking, or at least not observing, the moral principle (whatever that may be). On the other hand, we could understand by exceptions, exceptional circumstances under which feelings could provide moral value to certain actions. An objection to Kant's moral philosophy based on such an interpretation of the term exception falls again short because of simply being superfluous. Any type of morally acceptable action has its corresponding rational maxim, by this not meaning however that it is forbidden to also have positive feelings about it. As previously said, according to Kant, we can have all kinds of feelings we may like during our moral conduct as long as they are only a non-essential companion of our actions and not their determining factor. Moreover, not all actions have moral relevance: there are also actions that are neither moral, nor immoral, they simply don't have anything to do with morality and in their respect humans are morally permitted to act by virtue of their feelings. In short, there is no necessary incompatibility in Kantian ethics between (rational) morality and affectivity and, as such, there is no need for the concept of exception in such an interpretation.

In short, this type of criticism is doomed to nonsense, basically because it addresses empty notions, by this meaning that the conceptual domain relevant to Kantian ethics (i.e. by the very definition of the terms) excludes the concept of exception (not so much in the sense of not being considered, but in the sense of being considered precisely in such a way that it does not have any constitutive consequence or effect on the moral system as such). In a Wittgensteinian formulation we

[6] Ibidem p.89.
[7] *Ibidem p.*96.
[8] *Ibidem p.*104.
[9] Ibidem p. 230.
[10] Ibidem.
[11] I.e. universally empathetic.

might have it that the logical domain defined by the totality of the atomic objects /names (i.e. of the basic concepts within Kant's moral system) and by the sum of all their potential combinations excludes the concept of exception. If you will, we could say that accusing Kant's moral system of not admitting exceptions is like objecting to the meaning of the term unmarried on the grounds that it doesn't admit exceptional cases in which unmarried persons could be married. More to the point, that is to say: in Kant's moral philosophy, the concept of exception is referred to in relation to the moral law precisely in order to define the latter in such a way as to exclude it.

Now for the second, Constant type, objection to Kant. As previously stated, this kind of criticism has to do not so much with Kantian moral system not admitting exceptions, but rather with the fact that it actually admits exceptions while not acknowledging it. Therefore, the accuse here is not so much of rigorism but rather of incoherence. I will attempt to show that this approach is also doomed to lack of sense as tautology. Basically, that is because, previous remarks being considered, any perspective accusing Kantian moral philosophy of not admitting exceptions and wanting to avoid the fate of addressing empty notions, must say that on the basis of its own, homemade understanding of the notion of exception. But this however is argumentatively both circular and ad hoc: it comes up post hoc with its own definition of exception and then accuses Kant of not adhering to it.

Let's be more specific. First of all, we could differentiate between two generic understandings of the term exception with respect to the Kantian moral system: what we could call empirical exceptions, on the one hand and moral exceptions, on the other.

In the former case, saying that Kantian moral theory admits empirical exceptions, would amount to observing that in actual life nobody fully lives up to the Kantian moral standards: no real human being has ever respected to full amount in his actual conduct either the categorical imperative, or its political counterpart, the principle of right, quite the contrary, these norms prove far more often to be disregarded than observed. The Kantian response to that is quite obvious, having to do with the difference between the descriptive and the prescriptive dimension of reason. The main difference between the theoretical reason (knowledge) and the practical reason (morals) lies in the fact that while the task of the former is to, so to say, represent reality, that of the latter is to normatively mould it, more specifically to determine our behavioral reaction to it on the basis of our specific nature (reason). Therefore, while the availability of the empirical judgments is, to some degree, affected by the measure in which they correspond to the empirical, sensible, reality, that of the practical judgments is not. That is because while in the theoretical field of the empirical knowledge reason depends in its activity, at least on some degree, on something other than itself (i.e. the matter of the phenomenon or the sensible content of our experience), in the practical one it does not. With respect to the practical realm reason is, so to say, in itself and must operate as such. Therefore, while what we know depends in some measure on what we can know, what we want, i.e. intend, to do does by no means depend on what we can do. In final analysis, for Kant, as far as pure reason is concerned, we know what we can and do what we must. These are the terms on which Kant established, in a more general sense, the (philosophically) famous principle of the preeminence of the practical reason with respect to the theoretical one: what we know (more specifically the necessary preconditions of knowledge in general[12]) supervene on what we must do (intend). That is why Kant specifies in his Groundwork of the Metaphysics of Morals that he does not aim to provide us with a moral anthropology, i.e. a comprehensive description of our moral customs (which are always culturally dependent), but with a rational practical moral system, i.e. an apriorily defined set of interlocked duties which are universally valid, that is independent of any empirical (i.e. cultural, social, historical, psychological or biographical) factors. Hence, it is quite obvious that Kant's moral philosophy is completely impervious to this reading of the notion of exception, namely as empirical exception.

[12] The so called Ideas of the theoretical reasons: the existence of an immutable subject of knowledge (the ego cogito), of an immanent unity of the entire experience (Nature), of a transcendent unity of the entire experience (God), of our transcendental freedom etc..

Now for the latter interpretation of the notion of exception, ie. as moral exception. As previously noted, these type o exceptions should be prescriptive and not descriptive in nature. In other words, this notion corresponds to the idea that one could find certain moral grounds for breaking, or at least, failing to observe determinate moral duties resulting from the categorical imperative. More specifically, the claim is that, on strictly Kantian grounds, we could come up with contexts in which the observance of a certain moral duty stemming from the categorical imperative leads to the breach of another moral duty deriving from the same principle. This would be a serious threat to the coherence of the Kantian moral system indeed. On the other hand, we must take account of the fact that Kant himself considers such situations, his solution being to say that in such cases the so called breach is not a breach at all but something completely different. Simply put, for Kant, failing to abide by a certain duty for the sake of respecting another is not the same as plainly breaking it, but another act altogether, which is morally irreproachable. But how do I decide in such contexts, how do I come to know in keeping with which of the two (or potentially more) duties I should direct my actions? At this point, at least in my opinion, the Kantian moral thought would prove to be very resourceful in offering us solutions. For example, first, we could distinguish between the duty as such and its various implementation strategies and in many cases, on thorough analysis, find that the apparent inter-duty contradiction is not so much a conflict between two distinct duties but between two alternative ways of performing one and the same duty, second, if needed, we could establish a hierarchy of duties so that the infringement of the inferior one for the sake of the superior one does not come out as morally condemnable. That is precisely the case with what I have earlier called the Constant type objection to Kant. More to the point, Benjamin Constant formulates in his previously mentioned work[13] a context in which he speaks of a so called right to lie out of love for humans as an alleged exception to the perfect duty of veracity (truthfulness). As such, according to Constant's example, suppose that a friend of hours shows up one night at our door asking us to provide him with shelter as he is followed by a villain. We accept. Afterwards however, the villain himself shows up and asks us if we saw the one he is looking for. What should we do in order for our action to be morally sound? Of course, we could do what regularly any normal person would do in such a case and claim that we didn't see him. However, on Kantian terms, this would allegedly constitute a lie and consequently represent a breach of the perfect duty of veracity. On the other hand, if we told the truth, we would endanger the life of another human being. To this would amount the sort of moral ground for breaking a perfect duty I was earlier speaking of and as the Kantian moral system would seem to treat this type of conduct as morally unacceptable would mean that there is something flawed about it, or at least so the objection goes. Basically, my pro-Kantian response would be that this type of untruthfulness does not constitute a lie, i.e. a moral breach of the perfect duty of veracity, but a completely different act. There are two interrelated sets of distinctions which Kant makes in this respect: (i) the one between mendacium (consciously making false statements after explicitly claiming to tell the truth) and falsiloquium (consciously making false statements without explicitly claiming to tell the truth), respectively (ii) the one between veracity and open-hearted-ness. With regard to the first distinction, it must be said that Kant characterizes only the mendacium as a breach of the perfect duty of veracity, i.e. wrong, while treating the falsiloquium as morally indeterminate, i.e. neither good, nor wrong (in his terms, only congruous with the duty, but not out of duty[14]).

[13] See note 3.

[14] This is one of the classical distinctions in Kant's moral philosophy. The basic idea would be that in evaluating the moral value of an action, one must take into account not just the deed as such (all the less it's actual results, as it has already been pointed) but its maxim, i.e. it's reason. The point is that there are some actions that, although they do not breach any moral law as such, they have no moral value because the reason behind them is not morally valid, i.e. strictly rational. In pseudo-Kantian terms one might characterize them as contingently moral as opposed to the genuine moral actions which are necessarily so. The former are contiguous with duty, while the latter are out of duty. The most famous example is the one in which one supposedly sees a needy person begging on the street. Now, if he/she helps him/her just out of peaty, the former's action is contiguous with duty (i.e. not unmoral), however it

Therefore, in the aforementioned dilemmatic context I could still choose to help my friend and not tell the truth by committing falsiloquium and not mendacium (technically speaking most of our real life so called lies are falsiloquium and not mendacium). Of course, to be completely honest, there still remains a problem because although not an unmoral deed, the falsiloquium is not a moral one as well and this would mean that in this situation, on Kantian terms, the act of helping another human being (perhaps saving his/her life) has no moral value. However, I do not think that this is an unsolvable problem, at least so long as we have sufficient imagination to think in the Kantian spirit and not unilaterally in his letter, so to say.

As for the second distinction, Kant says: All that an honest, but refrained (not open hearted) man says, is true indeed, despite of not telling the entire truth. As opposed to him, someone who is dishonest says something the falsity of which is known to him. The statement of the latter bears the name of lie in the theory of virtue. And be it completely harmless, it is still not inoffensive; in fact it is a serious harm brought upon one's duty to himself, namely to an indispensable one, the breaching of which diminishes the human dignity in our own person. [15] In other words, although the perfect duty of veracity compels us to tell the truth, it doesn't compel us to tell the entire truth. Consequently, in the aforementioned context, I would still have the morally legitimate option of being vague and imprecise in my affirmations, thus, hopefully, saving my friends' life.

Hence, by repeated uses of falsiloquium and this limited open-heartedness I could come up with a strategy that is both practically useful (in saving my friends life) and morally permitted (though not morally valuable).

Now, in the end, I would like to address a most common objection to Kantian ethics. When faced with this kind of moral theory most people react by claiming that nobody would ever react in real life in such a way, at least not completely. This is the basis for both the intuitionist and the utilitarian criticisms of Kant. Point taken, but this is not what Kant attempts to do, in fact, from his perspective, this is not what any moral theory in general should attempt to do, that is provide an accurate description of our moral behavior. As previously stated, according to Kant, moral theory should be prescriptive with respect to our empirical reality, that is, provide a set of idealized standards on the basis of which we can (i) direct our moral actions and (ii) evaluate the moral value of our actions. Behind this claim lies the stoic moral assumption of his philosophy that surely doesn't sound quite as extravagant as his other claims, namely the notion that we should be held morally accountable only for those aspects of our being (actions, situations in which we partake, attitudes, reactions etc.) that are in our complete control. On common sense level we tend to agree more with this fact as I'm sure that everyone has at least once in his life found himself in the bitter position of having wanted to do the right thing (help someone for example) only to find that by this he made matters worse, due to unexpected factors. So as the real world outcome of our actions is always determined by a lot of other factors than the ones we can control, what actually matters for the evaluation of the moral value of our actions is our intent and not their outcome. As such, if we wanted to renounce the ideal-prescriptive character of the Kantian theory in favor of a more down to earth (i.e. descriptively accurate) moral conception, we should be ready and able to morally cope with the idea of blaming someone for something that wasn't dependent on him on the first place, we would have to, so to say, find it in ourselves to blame Oedipus for his (predetermined) destiny. How would a political model built on such moral grounds look like, I dare not imagine, but I'm sure it is no genuine moral action as peaty is a feeling and feelings are not valid moral grounds (considering that the same feeling can sometimes lead to morally good actions and sometimes quite the contrary). In this context, only the former's rational respect for the needy as a human being (directly derived from the categorical imperative) is a reason that can provide moral value to the action of helping him/her. For further detail you can consult Kant's Groundwork of the Metaphysics of Morals.

---

[15] Kant, Briefwechsel, Vol.II, Müller, München, 1996, p.564 (my translation).

would be less democratic than both the utilitarian and the intuitionist critics of Kant would appreciate.

References

- Constant, B. (1998), "Des réactions politiques", in Écrits de jeunesse (1774-1799), L. Omacini and J.-D. Candaux – (eds.), Tübingen, Max Niemeyer Verlag.
- Sattler, Alexander, Schiller-Briefe über die Ästhetische Erziehung des Menschen, Norderstedt, Grin Verlag, 2009.
- Kant, Briefwechsel, Vol.II, München, Müller, 1996, p.564.
- Kant, Immanuel, Critica raţiunii practice, Bucureşti, Ed. Iri, 1999.
- Kant, Immanuel, Groundwork of the Metaphysics of Morals, Cambridge, Cambridge Univbersity Press, 1998.

A NEW FRAMEWORK FOR COOPERATION IN EASTERN EUROPE: THE EASTERN PARTNERSHIP

MIHAELA PĂDUREANU[1]

ABSTRACT
Following its enlargements towards East, the European Union found itself near a complicated zone, which influences its security environment. Launched in 2009 at the Prague Summit the Eastern Partnership aims to provide a new framework for cooperation between the EU and other six Eastern European and Southern Caucasus countries: Armenia, Azerbaijan, Belarus, Georgia, Moldova, and Ukraine. In the same time, the Eastern Partnership attempts to provide the conditions needed to improve political association and economic integration between the European Union and these countries. In this paper I analyze the way in which the Northern Dimension and the Southern Mediterranean dimension of the European Neighbourhood Policy are influencing the political discourse found at the European level regarding the security issues. More precisely I want to identify the tools used to choose which interests are more important: those regarding the Southern Mediterranean or those concerning the Northern Dimension and how they are ranked. Further, I look at the way in which those interests are shaping the framework for the Eastern Partnership and for cooperation between the states. Are there similar approaches to the problems or different goals for this Partnership? I am interested to find out how different perceptions regarding security – those from the North, South and East are aggregated to provide an accurate framework for cooperation in Eastern Europe.

KEY WORDS: European Union, European Neighbourhood Policy, security, Southern Caucasus.

INTRODUCTION

In this article I will use EU's European Neighbourhood Policy to see the way in which it helps to formulate an European response to the security problems found at the regional level, within the context of its foreign policy. My theoretical approach is a neo-liberalist one, and I argue that the European Union it seeks to establish good trade relations with the countries found in the Eastern neighborhood in order to promote Western values such as a democratic political regime, the rule of law and the enforcement of human rights in order for it to ensure a peaceful environment. The article aims to present in a systematic way the instruments used in order to establish rules and institutions for the both participants in the negotiating process, and I mean by that for the European Union, and for the eastern and/or northern countries. The second aim is to show the ways in which domestic interest in the member countries influences the EU's foreign policy and interests' prioritization.

1. Looking for common interests

In the aftermath of the Second World War, some European leaders such as Jean Monnet and Robert Schuman returned to the idea of a "European Union", which was exposed in 1929 by Aristide Briand in front of the League of Nations[2]. To ensure peace on the continent Europe needed to learn to cooperate, and in order to achieve this it had to identify common interests, in order for all the states to work towards them. The first document which placed great importance on cooperation was Franco-British Defence Treaty signed in 1947 in Dunkirk, followed by the signing in 1948 of the Brussels

[1] Mihaela Pădureanu is a 2nd year Ph. D. candidate at the National School of Political Studies and Public Administration (NSPSPA), Romania. She is Beneficiary of the „Doctoral Scholarships for a Sustainable Society" project, co-financed by the European Union through the European Social Fund, Sectoral Operational Programme Human Resources and Development 2007-2013 (email: mihaelapadureanu@gmail.com).

[2] Bărbulescu, Iordan,: UE de la economic la politic (Bucureşti: Tritonic, 2005), p. 62.

Treaty, by France, Britain, Belgium, Netherlands and Luxembourg[3]. It should be noted that France, and especially Britain were the only European countries that also hold powerful armies that could be considered as subjects of a treaty relating to defense. The signing in 1948 of Western Union Treaty, which was created in order to obtain "economic, social and cultural collaboration and collective self-defense"[4] in Brussels on March 17, and amended by the Protocol signed in Paris on October 23 1954, reinforced this position. Member States have decided to integrate their air defense and to have a common command for joint exercises. This move was seen as the necessary step for greater involvement on the U.S. part in its relationship with Europe and with its defense and security, in this framework, special attention was paid to the role of West Germany in the new architecture of security and defense. In October 1950, in order to facilitate the integration of Germany, France proposed an European army which would have been under NATO's command. Further, this put the foundations for the "European Defence Community (EDC) in which Belgium, France, Italy, Luxembourg, the Netherlands and the Federal Republic of Germany were due to participate"[5]. The Treaty was signed in May 1952, but in August 1954 the French National Assembly refused to ratify the Treaty.

So here is that despite the general perception that the European idea started in order to satisfy the economic needs, the entire European project had the primary goal of meeting the security needs of the Western European states. What followed was but the continuation of this approach, but on the contrary. The defence dimension was blocked due to the personality of leaders, and I am referring to French President Charles De Gaulle, either because of shifting resources to other sectors, and I refer to the implementation of the Marshall Plan. One of the communities that would have to safeguard the continent was the European Defence Community, but it failed to become a pillar of European construction and remained for almost 50 years to wait for the attention of European leaders. The most common explanation for this is that NATO was an alliance which managed to coagulate expectations and interests of its members and provide both North America and Western Europe, security for more than six decades. The article's structure requires us to mention a brief theoretical explanation for Alliance's role in the context of bipolar system which emerged after the end of World War II. My approach here is a regional one, so the actions taken by a player at this level are possible and allowed, but not conditioned, in relationship with the system and therefore I consider it appropriate for clarity to say that the Alliance was responsible for providing security through systemic lens, but at the regional level the Europeans were able to decide that they have other interests. Let's remember that even today, U.S. and Russian Federation remain by far the most significant players in terms of nuclear capabilities, but this is not the subject of this article. What I am looking for is to explain how the EU is seeking to ensure security in the eastern neighborhood and to clarify its interests.

Even before the end of the Cold War, the Western European Union (WEU) was reactivated, although the Genscher-Colombo initiative failed in 1981 to expand the European Political Cooperation (EPC) beyond the economic aspects of security and defense sphere, but at least brought into attention this weakness in the European construction. Thus, in Rome under the guidance of French and Belgian governments have a meeting of Foreign Ministers and Defence Ministers, which adopted on 26/27 October the "Rome Declaration", reads the restart WEU. The plan aimed to "define a European security identity and the gradual harmonization of policies in the defense of members (…) continuing need to strengthen European security and the recognition that better use of WEU will contribute not only to West Europe's security, but also to improve links to common defense states the

[3] Howorth, Jolyon,: Security and Defence Policy in the European Union (New York: Palgrave Macmillan, 2007), p. 4.
[4] http://www.weu.int/, accessed on 15.01.2012.
[5] http://www.weu.int/, accessed on 25.01.2012.

Atlantic Alliance"[6]. I think the Rome Declaration is important because it stress that crises in other parts of the world might have implications for Europe. Thus, this statement allows WEU Council to decide which would be the consequences for Europe and to act accordingly. From that date, the Foreign Ministers and Defence Ministers, the Member States were to have annual meetings at conferences of WEU.

In the meantime at the systemic level, U.S. and the USSR began to discuss the withdrawal of nuclear missiles and at the regional level, through this meetings and fund actions we can understand that the European players tried to formulate coherent response in order to ensure their own defense. Thus, WEU Council and its Special Working Group produced a report specifying the criteria and conditions for European security and European specific responsibilities within NATO. Based on this report it was adopted at Hague in 1987 "Platform of the European Security Interests" which establishes the general conditions for a future work program and stating in its preamble: "We reaffirm our commitment to building a European Union in accordance with the Single European Act who was signed by the members of European Community. We believe that achieving an integrated Europe will not be possible unless it includes security and defense". The European security was seen as indivisible, while the Ministers committed themselves to take actions in order to obtain the "European pillar of NATO"[7]. Also in Hague the WEU had continued to attract members of the Alliance, and decided to open negotiations with Portugal and Spain which became members in 199

In this period, European security story is the story of coalition's efforts on both sides of the Atlantic, to harmonize and streamline the military defense strategies of deterrence and war in Europe. Through these years for Europe, the security threat is perceived as especially political and less military[8].

2. The end of the Cold War and its impact on the European security

After 1990, the Soviet Union's dissolution and the U.S.'s victory in first Gulf War, the U.S. now had a different position, as the undisputed hegemon of the international system. The international system had become unipolar, so it had one powerful state that had the resources to intervene wherever and whenever to defend its interests. Meanwhile, the U.S. tried to encourage and strengthen attempts to formulate a defense and security policy in Europe and the end of the Cold War brought changes not only at the systemic level, but also at regional level, where the Maastricht Treaty was signed in 1992 in through which the European Union had emerged. The economic dimension of the European construction had almost been achieved and in 2002 when the Euro was introduced, as the symbol of economic unity. Certainly an incentive in this process was and the end of the Cold War, which allowed for Germany's reunification. Putting things in a new economic phase allowed European leaders to rethink the policy of defense of the continent, and the old political project of a European defense community has been re-launched.

Another variable that affected the EU security was - at the regional level- , the disintegration of Yugoslavia. While the Cold War was named by Deutscher as "an ideological confrontation, great competition between democracy and totalitarianism, between capitalism and socialism"[9] in the early 90's the world, and especially Europe had faced a different kind of conflict, one that Mary Kaldor called "new wars". This form of conflict occurs due to pressure that globalization exerts on some authoritarian states. Such wars are fought "through networks belonging to state and non-state, often without uniform, wearing distinctive signs (....) battles are rare and most violence is directed against civilians, as a consequence muster tactics against riots or ethnic cleansing. In these wars are diminishing taxation and financing of the war is robbery, illegal trading and other income generated

[6] http://www.weu.int/, accessed on 25.01.2012.
[7] http://www.weu.int/, accessed on 15.01.2012.
[8] Kolodziej, Edward A,: Security and International Relations (Iaşi: Polirom, 2007), p. 121.
[9] Kaldor, M.,: Human Security (Cluj-Napoca: CA Publishing, 2010), p. 16.

by the war (...) as opposed to old wars, which ended with a victory or a defeat, no new wars end occurs as quickly"[10]. These new security challenges are related to the development of the phenomenon called globalization and the challenges it brings to the state. In this case, the state, the fundamental unit in analyzing the phenomenon of international relations must be able to meet these challenges.

When we want to analyze security we use most often a relational definition. This is explained by the fact that the state of security or insecurity is by reference to an external object which is in the state of security or insecurity. In most cases we should operate with a generally accepted definition of security and in most times it is referred to as lack of threats or, more precisely, as A. Wolfers said: "Security points to some degree of protection of values previously acquired"[11]. He also identifies two dimensions for conceptualizing the term. We have an objective approach and a subjective one: "an objective sense, measures the absence of threats to acquired values, in a subjective sense, the absence of fear that such values will be attacked. In both respects a nation's security can run a wide gamut from almost complete insecurity or sense of insecurity at one pole, to almost complete security or absence of fear at the other"[12]. Security refers to the individual and the main object to which it target is that the State it can be managed into independent sectors: social, political and economic. Defining the security interests is made by policymakers and in defining what they are the perceptions they have regarding threats, risks and vulnerabilities are important. These perceptions are subjective and what a policymaker can perceive as a threat to another may be an opportunity because the environment in which an individual operates can lead to "inevitable pressure"[13]. Other important concepts when we define security are threat and vulnerability. Security can be achieved by reducing vulnerabilities and preventing or reducing threats[14]. Threats can be defined as imminent dangers to national security and they come from outside the state. If threats were perceived to source outside the state, vulnerabilities arise due to the internal structure of states. Due to existing weaknesses in the structure, the state becomes vulnerable to an external threat and that is why when institutions and their operating mechanisms are developed, state vulnerability will decrease. National security and citizen security is not necessarily the same thing. Citizen may be subject to threats that have as source state[15] and the wars in former Yugoslavia could not be demonstrated more clearly so. States with a strong institutional structure and a clearly defined idea of state were appointed by B. Buzan as powerful states, the antithesis, weak states are the least institutional developed and "are structured diffuse compared with their companies"[16].

The weak and the strong states are vulnerable to threats from unconventional fields such as the ecological, economic, social and combining the threats and vulnerabilities results insecurity[17]. Threats exist in the international system because there is both anarchy and competition. The risks, they are difficult to operationalized, while also being difficult to identify and have a low probability to occur. But as a threat to turn into a threat to national security it must be of a certain type and be perceived as such by policy makers:

"Specifying its intensity, its approach in time and space, the probability of performance, serious consequences, and whether or not the perception of threat is amplified by historical

[10] Ibidem, p.13.

[11] Wolfers, A. 1952: "National Security" as an Ambiguous Symbol, in Political Science Quarterly, Vol. 67, No. 4 (Dec., 1952), pp. 481-502.

[12] Ibidem, p. 485.

[13] Buzan, B.,: People, States and Fear (Chişinău: Cartier, 2000), p. 34.

[14] Ungureanu, S. R.,: The Concept of Security in A. Miroiu şi R.S. Ungureanu (coord.) The Handbook of International Relations, (Iaşi: Polirom, 2006), p. 120.

[15] Buzan, op. cit. p. 54.

[16] For details regarding the difference between weak states and strong states see Buzan, B.,: People, States and Fear (Chişinău: Cartier, 2000), pp. 105-7.

[17] Ibidem, p. 120.

circumstances. The more intense the threat, the more legitimate national security is invoked in response to it."[18]

Weak states are susceptible to vulnerabilities that have developed institutions to ensure their operation. The combination of two factors: weak state and low power leads to a very high vulnerability and examples of such countries as Ethiopia, Uganda, and Mozambique. Real threats are difficult to identify and measure because threats are dependent on subject-object dichotomy, and that's problematic distinction between what is truly a national security threat to which results naturally from participation in the international threats prove to be difficult to control. Not all threats can be classified as national security threats. Natural threats can be assigned attributes as usual normal frequency - as threats to national security may be attributed adjectives such as dangerous, unusual[19]. The classification decision maker considers these threats primarily political criteria. Establishing threats is a difficult and extensive because if their number is high use of resources results in an unjustified paranoia and attitude type. On the other hand, if their number is lower just because were not properly identified may be greatly hampered response to these threats.

The '90 have forced the international community, and especially Europe to bring an answer to the atrocities in Bosnia, and this response was humanitarian intervention. Destabilization of the area would have been a direct threat to the European Union, and new wars tended to expand through criminal networks, refugees and the promotion of exclusive ideologies[20].

3. Towards a Common European Security Policy

In December 1998, the Franco-British summit held in St. Malo, had founded a new European policy that would be known as the European Security and Defence Policy. This Summit marked a change in Great Britain's position to the European common defense and managed to improve its proximity to the European Union. At the summit in St. Malo, it was decided to be obtained autonomous EU military capabilities, laying the foundations of European defense policy. In the Declaration of St. Malo talking about the need for EU to become an autonomous and unified on the international scene, which involved application of the Treaty of Amsterdam, the European Council was given the opportunity to take decisions on common defense within the framework of Common Foreign and Security Policy (CFSP) by the method of inter-governmentalism. To initiate the work which requires a common defense policy, the EU should build its own military force that can act in a clearly defined period of time and able to respond to international crises. This approach does not exclude obligations that Member States, namely those arising from membership of NATO and the declaration reaffirms the need for armed forces to be supported by technology and defense European industry. Although, currently insufficient, European armed forces can be extended and nuclear weapons of France and Great Britain could provide some independence for WEU[21]. Intergovernmental conferences, as the main instrument which sets out new decisions in the Union, demonstrated the difficulty in taking these decisions in areas where both individuals and states are sensitive. Conference prior to the Maastricht Treaty, which took place after removal of totalitarian regimes in Eastern Europe, showed deep differences between member states' interests.

Delegation of sovereignty was made to the Commission and to Parliament for the economic field, while the sovereignty for the field of security will be towards the Council of Ministers and that is why the national veto will lose its role. States that have fewer resources, or are on a lower position in terms of resource allocation for assuring security will be willing to cooperate or to cede sovereignty in comparison with those who have more resources.

---

[18] Ibidem, p. 142.
[19] Ibidem, p. 123.
[20] Kaldor, M.,: Human Security (Cluj-Napoca: CA Publishing, 2010), p. 16.
[21] Conry, B. The Western European Union As NATO's Successor, Cato Policy Analysis No. 239, September 18, 1995, available at http://www.cato.org/pubs/pas/pa-239.html, accessed on 10.01.2012.

Main principles of CFSP can be summarized in: promoting and defending peace abroad, democracy and human rights - the fundamental values of the Union, Union's participation in building a society based on international law as a method by which the foundations of world development based on peace and stability, use "cooperation" as opposed to "taxation" - that means that conflicts can be managed and resolved international opportunities offered by multilateral cooperation, economic and social model European export due to the effects it has had to the competitively and solidarity as well because this model has kept "society" before state and market. And the last principle is that of using power as a stability factor[22].

It can be seen that especially the last principles' focus is on methods of meeting modern safety variant and not the classic model that emphasizes hard power and military factor: democracy for preventing political threats and market economy, but ensuring solidarity in order to prevent economic threats. These principles were common vision of states in terms of foreign policy. It can be argued quite simply that these measures were accepted because they are shared by all Member States, the reflections of principles that must be met to be part of the Union, being the working group and taken by the Presidium. Unlike Laeken, in discussions within the Working Group did not use the term foreign policy or the common foreign policy, but the term joint action. The difference between external action and foreign policy is significant. Action has a weaker effect compared to politics. Policy needs objectives and targets, instruments, budget and program coherence and to apply. Common foreign policy had been designed by European federalists on the similarity of the Common Agricultural Policy this is chin by European Parliament resolution on the powers of the Commission and asked it in a document dated May 2002[23].

To initiate the work, which requires a common defense policy, the EU should build its own military force that can act in a clearly defined period of time and be able to respond to international crises. This approach does not exclude obligations that Member States, namely those arising from membership of NATO, and the declaration reaffirms the need for armed forces to be supported by technology and a European defense industry.

This new direction that the European cooperation took was deemed essential not only for the EU but also for the transatlantic partnership. Thus, a few months later, U.S. Secretary of State Madeleine K. Albright was to provide an official position on how the partnership it will evolve under the influence of the new approach. The speech preceded the NATO summit in Washington in April 1999. Her article, entitled The Right Balance Will Secure NATO's Future[24] it reaffirms that the primary purpose of the Alliance as defense against aggression and encouraged greater autonomy in managing their defenses and possible development of a European army. This approach is complementary to NATO and facilitates its mission, but the Americans allies assessed from the perspective of NATO, considering that it is his contribution to the efficiency of its activities and calling for strengthening its practical side. A step in this direction was taken when he developed "extraction force" under NATO's command, but made up of European power and is available to the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe. As the article had appeared in the aftermath of Kosovo, the author points to important lessons that could be learned by the European leaders, namely the need to reach a political agreement and high attention to be given to the political will. It seems that a case study was the war in Georgia, were have been applied the lessons in the former Yugoslavia. Another important finding of the Secretary of State is that NATO and the EU should avoid three potential problems: decoupling, duplication and discrimination. This is why the article has come to be known as "the three D". Decoupling refers to the avoidance of a fault between the U.S., EU and NATO as an organization to maintain involving sovereign states.

[22] The principles appeared in Bărbulescu, I. op. cit., p. 251.
[23] Ibidem, p. 256.
[24] Available at: http://www.iss.europa.eu/uploads/media/cp047e.pdf, pp. 24-27, accessed on 10.01.2012.

Second, duplication mainly aimed at eliminating the dissipation of resources that are used for defense, such as action planning forces, operational command structures that would not be found in both blocks. The third and final recommendation was to avoid discrimination between countries that are members of NATO, but not of the EU. The Alliance will be important for the European defence, but not central to it. Its goals will be related to the development of responsibility for the new democrat states. The idea of community and extending it to appear particularly strong in this article, and the Eastern dimension of the possible future community is also mentioned by stating that the outstanding partnership with Ukraine. Russia's role remained unchanged, but unlike the late '90s, when the article appeared, now the focus is no longer put emphasis on the Western Balkans, but the Caucasus. In terms of what in the statements of the St. Malo Declaration, we find that the European policy and security policy are perceived as a political element that has institutional coherence, however, one of its main instruments, the Eastern Partnership is seen as a way to resolve conflicts in the Eastern part of the continent[25]. We cannot mention E.U.'s autonomy in managing its security issues, without mentioning the importance of the events of September 11, which certainly had a major role in realizing the need to define and prioritize perceived threats in a framework different from NATO, but complementary to it. Probably due to the safety and predictability offered by the North of the continent, it was launched in 1999 the Northern Dimension of the policy, which includes four main actors: the E.U., Russian Federation, Norway and Iceland and covers an area stretching from Europe to the Arctic and sub -Arctic Sea to southern leaf, the Member under and near, and north-western Russia in the east to Iceland and Greenland in the west[26]. Therefore, the Northern Dimension focuses primarily on promoting and strengthening the economic dimension of cooperation between the E.U. and partners in order to achieve sustainable development. The success of this approach led in 2006 to extended areas where partnerships have been concluded as follows: medium (NDEP), Public Health and Welfare (NDPHS), culture (NDPC) and transport and logistics (NDPTL). Also, the renewal of cooperation, which took place in 2006, had set up common institutions: Institute of the Northern Dimension and the Northern Dimension Business Council. To what extent the political and economic areas helped existing institutional success of this first instrument belonging to foreign policy and security policy remains to be learned.

The E.U.'s south border was approached by the European officials in 1995 when the Barcelona process was launched, the then 15 Member States, together with 14 Mediterranean countries laid the foundation for Euro-Mediterranean Partnership. The main purpose of this policy is to ensure the security partnership by developing a common area of peace and stability based on respect for the UN Charter and Universal Declaration of Human Rights[27]. Among the common threats that the document identifies and that were agreed upon by the political representatives were: fighting terrorism through strengthening international instruments, the fight against expansion and diversification of organized crime and combating drug trafficking issues, joint efforts to prevent nuclear proliferation and harmonized action with others in order to enforce regional disarmament agreements such as areas free of weapons - including verification regimes to achieve a Middle East Zone Free of Weapons of mass destruction, nuclear, chemical and biological. After ensuring these objectives then it will be developed the economic cooperation because no economic prosperity can be achieved in an area. Measures to ensure free trade area were taken through the Euro-Mediterranean Association Agreements, which will be supported by financial assistance of the Union. The Barcelona Process –as these agreements are known proved to be a success and was renewed in 2008. Decisions in this partnership are made by sector-specific Ministerial meetings and the meetings of Foreign Ministers, who are those who set priorities. Since 2005, it has been agreed by at Barcelona summit that terrorism can be better prevented and obstructed by adopting Euro-Mediterranean Code of Conduct for Countering Terrorism and migration which has become the fourth pillar of the partnership, along with free trade area and cooperation in relevant areas of economic and financial assistance. The Partnership's funding was supported by the European Commission through the Community budget being allocated so far amount to 16 billion euros. Also, the European Investment Bank has allocated annual loans of up to 2 billion.

[25] Huff, Ariella. The role of EU defence policy in the Eastern neighbourhood, May 2011, Occasional Paper, European Union Institute for Security Studies http://www.iss.europa.eu/uploads/media/op91-The_role_of_EU_defence_policy_in_the_Eastern_neighbourhood.pdf.

[26] http://eeas.europa.eu/north_dim/index_en.htm, accessed on 28.12.2011.

[27] Barcelona declaration adopted at the Euro-Mediterranean Conference, available at: http://trade.ec.europa.eu/doclib/docs/2005/july/tradoc_124236.pdf, accessed on 27.12.2011.

Building on the success of this partnership and expansion prior to 2004, in March 2003 was introduced the concept of Wider Europe. Since then the number of Member States has reached 25 and the number of inhabitants to 450 million. Different from the '90s the language in this document uses new terms that are used to refer to geographic areas that are re-defined as follows, thus, Ukraine, Moldova and Belarus used the Western Newly Independent States concept (WNIS), and for Algeria, Egypt, Israel, Jordan, Lebanon, Libya, Morocco, Palestinian Authority, Syria and Tunisia phrase applies Southern Mediterranean.

E.U. used as the key- term for its relations interdependence, saying the E.U. has thesame duty towards its citizens and towards those who are citizens of neighboring countries and provide them with social cohesion and economic dynamism. Also, to achieve political stability and economic development is necessary to promote cooperation at regional and sub-regional level which is built on common values. Through this approach, E.U. aims at forming a circle of friends to be part of in a stable security environment. In exchange for this stable climate, prosperous and inclined to favor cooperation, member states will benefit from the perspective of economic integration through access to the E.U. market and the four freedoms of the people, goods, services and capital. However, it will not pursue a possible EU accession of these states, but building the necessary environment cooperation. To encourage this partnership it mentioned the success that had with the Mediterranean policy and how the states included in free trade agreements have harmonized rules in the Union. They were-opening approach these partnerships were Russia, Ukraine and Moldova, with them being signed Partnership and Cooperation Agreements.

Based on the concept of Wider Europe it was created the European Neighbourhood Policy (ENP), which refers to a strategy adopted in 2004, driven by the fundamental decision of enlargement towards east, which caused the Union to be faced with challenges to which it had to find solutions. Through ENP it specifies and reinforces cooperation at regional and sub-regional level and at the same time proposing ways for its development. New neighbors in the East were at the same time those that could produce new threats to European security. ENP Action Plans together with each state included in the concept of Wider Europe - Eastern Europe and Mediterranean states. Programs under the Neighbourhood Policy will be supported by the European Neighbourhood.

Launched in 2009, with the summit in Prague Eastern Partnership is an initiative of Poland and Sweden and is based on the concept of common interests and respect for international law, democracy human rights and added market economy, sustainable development and good governance to its base. Its purpose is to encourage political association and economic integration between the EU and Member States. Based on the stated purpose of the Partnership, we can raise the question how can we define the interest of the E.U. as long as every state seems to have its own national interest? Even more, we known how a state is defined, but can we operate with a similar definition for the E.U.?

The Partnership is the instrument that will address especially to the eastern side of the European Neighbourhood Policy, in order to ensure no conflicts and to enforce the principles and norms of international law. To achieve these goals, will promote regional development and social cohesion, aiming at including the gap between Member States and consistency between the regional approach and what happens to the system through international instruments.

For states that wish to reach these goals will be concluded Association Agreements, and they will provide the formal framework in which cooperation will take place and will focus primarily to the economic dimension by creating free trade areas, which will create a synthesis between liberalization and regulation. Turn the adjustment shall be made by applying standards agreed by the E.U. through the European Commission. Besides the economic dimension of cooperation, EaP uses institution building, which will be completed by each participating country and will aim to improve the administrative capacity in various ways, such as for example technical assistance, training. With regard to citizens, PAE provides increased mobility of citizens and supports the lifting of visa facilitation agreements to take back their. Lifting visa will be an objective that will be discussed individually with each state participating in the Partnership and will be addressed in partnership with another initiative of its Global Approach to Migration. Since the Partnership addresses the Eastern dimension of E.U.'s border, the place where it supplies the largest amount of energy, the sensitive issue of energy security has a special place in the cooperation of the partners. Security in this field will be made by pursuing a lasting supply that is safe and stable, using this sense to better organize and streamline the process by using renewable resources. Understanding energy as an interdependent resource could be said with clarity that the Association Agreements should be based on the energy policy of the Member States and on the E.U. Strategic Energy. Decisions to be taken in this regard will be common and will lead to building an environment that will facilitate the exchange of experience and information for those countries that are moving towards reform and modernization. In turn, this multilateral framework of cooperation can form common positions and actions. The four steps of action that the Commission will take for development cooperation are: democracy, good governance and stability to economic integration and harmonization with E.U. policies, energy security and contacts between people. Comprehensive and harmonized approach to the region is strengthened by the mentioning in the Partnership Framework Document of the Black Sea Synergy as a special place, probably due to proximity to a link to east. For each State will be selected that instrument that could bring the most benefits.

Conclusions

Involving a large number of actors both state and non-State in the problems of the region is also followed during this orientation towards the East, probably in order to realize the importance and implications of problems in their area. With them are ministries and agencies, parliaments, civil society, international organizations - such as the OSCE, Council of Europe and OECD, international financial institutions, private sector and social partners. Based on the overwhelming success had by the implementation of policies regarding the Northern and Southern borders of the E.U., European Commission through to attempt to repeat this winning strategy in Eastern Europe. It remains to be seen whether such an approach by the most direct and important so far, the Russian Federal will get the same results. It is very probable that the Arab Spring will put pressure on the way in which interests are prioritized.

References

- Bărbulescu, Iordan EU from economic to politic, Bucureşti: Tritonic, 2005.
- Buzan, B. People, States and Fear, Chişinău: Cartier, 2000.
- Christou, George. "European Union security logics to the east: the European Neighbourhood Policy and the Eastern Partnership." European Security 19, no. 3 (September 2010): 413-430. Academic Search Complete, EBSCOhost.
- Conry, B. The Western European Union As NATO's Successor, Cato Policy Analysis No. 239, September 18, 1995, available at http://www.cato.org/pubs/pas/pa-239.html.
- Howorth, Jolyon Security and Defence Policy in the European Union, New York: Palgrave Macmillan, 2007.

- Huff, Ariella. The role of EU defence policy in the Eastern neighbourhood, May 2011, Occasional Paper, European Union Institute for Security Studies http://www.iss.europa.eu/uploads/media/op91-The_role_of_EU_defence_policy_in_the_Eastern_neighbourhood.pdf.
- Kaldor, M. Human Security, Cluj-Napoca: CA Publishing, 2010.
- Kolodziej, Edward A Security and International Relations, Iaşi: Polirom, 2007.
- Wolfers, A. 1952 "National Security" as an Ambiguous Symbol*,* in Political Science Quar
- Ungureanu, S. R. The Concept of Security in A. Miroiu şi R.S. Ungureanu (coord.) The Handbook of International Relations, Iaşi: Polirom, 2006.
- Documents
- http://www.easternpartnership.org/
- http://europa.eu/index_en.htm
- http://www.consilium.europa.eu
- http://eeas.europa.eu
- http://www.weu.int
- http://www.iss.europa.eu
- Annual report from the High Representative of the Union for Foreign Affairs and Security Policy to the European Parliament on the main aspects and basic choices of the CFSP, http://eeas.europa.eu/cfsp/docs/2009_annualreport_en.pdf
- A SECURE EUROPE IN A BETTER WORLD EUROPEAN SECURITY STRATEGY
- Brussels, 12 December 2003, http://www.consilium.europa.eu/uedocs/cmsUpload/78367.pdf
- Wider Europe— Neighbourhood: A New Framework for Relations with our Eastern
- and Southern Neighbours, http://ec.europa.eu/world/enp/pdf/com03_104_en.pdf.
- European Neighbourhood Policy STRATEGY PAPER, p. 4, disponibilă la adresa: http://ec.europa.eu/world/enp/pdf/strategy/strategy_paper_en.pdf.
- http://eeas.europa.eu/north_dim/index_en.htm.
- http://trade.ec.europa.eu/doclib/docs/2005/july/tradoc_124236.pdf.

IDEOLOGISTS AND DOCTRINAIRES OF INTER-WAR RIGHT-WING INDEOLOGY

ALINA COSTEA DORLE*

Abstract
In the socio-political context of inter-war Romania, an ample dynamic of proliferating right-wing ideology ideas was noted, emphasized by the radicalization of the intellectuals' attitude and especially of the young generation's attitude, having clear nationalist feelings.
In this sense, a nationalist ideological, militant, and uncompromising direction is being set, focused on several definitive aspects, that mainly targets the promoting and preserving of the endemic characteristic. Thus, in his statements in the '30s, Mircea Eliade shapes a nationalistic ideology from philosophical positions, based on the sentiment of a historical spiritual mission of the generation, Vasile Marin expresses himself in offensive radical terms, specific to a repudiation campaign of the existing political models and to promoting of a new form of political expression, and Nichifor Crainic elaborates a nationalist doctrine from Orthodox-theological point of view.
All these ideological attitudes, in spite of the inevitable limitations and traps of the political-ideologist scene of the 4th decade in the 20th century, remain, even though in time they have become repudiated and abandoned by even their authors, exciting milestones of a moment having an intense spiritual feeling.

Keywords: Right-wing ideology, Nationalism, Orthodox spirituality, Anti-democracy.

Introduction

The socio-political Romanian climate after World War I knew an intense and dynamic discrepancy of the ideological systems, focused mainly on the frameworks of ways of thinking and of reaction of a fervent nationalism, declamatory and offensive, born on the basis of political instability and ethnic and economic incongruence of the era.

In this context, the intellectuals' attitude, and especially the young generation's radicalize with deep nationalist feelings and nationalist manifestations and organization are born to promote ethnicity and to capitalize the national specific.

Leon Volovici[1], in his work Ideologia nationalista si problema evreiasca in Romania anilor 30 (Nationalist Ideology and the Jewish issue in the '30s' Romania), establishes two big directions of nationalist ideology during the inter-war period, having important consequences for the political and intellectual life. Thus, one line is represented by constructive and cultural nationalism, illustrated mainly by Nicolae Iorga or C. Radulescu-Motru, in the terms of an organic nationalism, moderate and tolerant towards the ethnic and social intrusions of the allogene element and, in the same time, critical and refractory regarding extremism and western values. The second direction, radical and militant, taken from Eminescu's and Hasdeu's nationalist vision, is the one of the new nationalism, theorized and supported through a rich journalistic activity, by Nichifor Crainic, Nae Ionescu, and a significant part of the young generation of intellectuals, (reminding here Mircea Eliade, Emil Cioran, Constantin Noica, Petre Tutea, Vasile Marin).

This ideological direction, adopted and cultivated by the young generation, having a true interest in the political area, is focused on certain defining aspects, that mainly targets the promoting

* Ph. D. candidate North University of Baia Mare (email: alinadorle@yahoo.com). The study is elaborated under the observance of Professor Ph. D. George Achim, North University of Baia Mare.

[1] apud Leon Volovici, Ideologia nationalista si problema evreiasca in Romania anilor 30 (Nationalist Ideology and the Jewish issue in the'30s' Romania),Published by Humanitas, 1995 and preserving of the national specific: repudiation of the existing parliamentary system and the promotion of a new form of political expression, the revival of national consciousness, based on the sentiment of a historical spiritual mission of the generation, and the resizing of Christian spirituality, having deep accents of Orthodox mysticism.

From this perspective, the present paper extensively discusses, as it is outlined in the era's journalism, the socio-political and cultural vision of certain intellectuals of great importance in the configuration of nationalist ideology and of the right-wing political ideas during the inter-war period: Mircea Eliade, Vasile Marin si Nichifor Crainic.

Paper contents

The literary and scientific works that made Mircea Eliade famous as a writer and historian of global religions, does not wholly and exclusively represent the amplitude and depth of his way of thinking. His intellectual personality shows also another aspect, having as basis a rich journalistic activity, an ideological one that proved to be, in spite of mystifications and numerous future polemics, a fundamental stage in his cultural and spiritual development. Without a doubt, he proved to be a representative of great sharpness and visionary spirit of his generation.

Being one of the most influential young intellectuals of the era, honorary assistant of the charming professor Nae Ionescu, Eliade expressed, with an exceptional idea-generating force, the historical mission and decisive role of his generation, in the historical action.

The first generation of intellectuals after the creation of Romania Mare (Greater Romania), spirits of scope where Eliade establishes himself as one of the generation peaks, establishes itself early on, around the age of 20-22 on the stage of Romanian culture.

One of the phenomena specific to the cultural context of the inter-war period was precisely the hatching of this generation of young elite intellectuals, who, to the offence of older contemporary writers, will seize a great extent of the Romanian cultural life of the 3rd and 4th decades. Alongside Mircea Eliade, in this regard, Emil Cioran, Constantin Noica, Eugen Ionescu, Mircea Vulcanescu, Mihail Polihroniade, Haig Acterian, Dan Botta, Vasile Marin, Mihail Sebastian, Petre Tutea, etc. stand out.

Through his articles published during this period, in different prestigious cultural and political journals, especially in Nae Ionescu's Cuvantul (The Word), Mircea Eliade wins himself a leading position in his generation, constantly offering the rhythm his erudite and visionary thinking. The leading personalities of that era recognise, without any reservation, his intellectual capacities, his disposition towards ideological debate, as well as his passion for the dynamic of philosophical ideas, of religious and metaphysical origin.

As early as the 3rd decade, Mircea Eliade has a rich journalistic activity, intensified in the '30s, when he imposes, through an opinionated attitude and public statements, his great capacity of doctrinaire synthesis and of visionary political coherence.

In spite of the fact that he was accused and blamed of ideological wandering, through his act of joining the Legionnaire Movement (later, under different exterior pressure, he reaches the point of denying his paternity to other articles), Eliade brought a significant contribution, through his publishing during those years, to the clarification and understanding of the psychosocial and spiritual mechanism of the actions taken by the right-wing extreme.

His inclusion in the ideological context of a generation that will lead to the configuration of a vision having a certain extremism regarding politics, must be understood from the point of view of the intellectual and cultural climate of an era having a fundamental intersession of instinctive polarization of the intellectuals into antagonistic ideological areas (right-wing/left-wing). Moreover, the phenomenon can be found, even radicalised, on a large European level.

Eliade's journalistic and ideological activity from the 4th decade, disputed and unfavourably judged in the perspective of his entire intellectual representations, that has consequences practically reflecting on the reduction of the recognition of global reputation of the scholar[2], presents itself, regarded attentively and without prejudices, as a reflection of a historical mission and, in this sense, as a continuation of national cultural values, firmly fixed on the ideological line articulated by Eminescu and Hasdeu, Nae Ionescu and even Lucian Blaga.

The first series of far-reaching articles was Itinerariu spiritual (Spiritual Itinerary), the circle of 12 columns published in Cuvantul (The Word) in 1927, by means of which Mircea Eliade configures the main spiritual lines of his generation. This series of articles outlined the ideological and cultural programme of young intellectuals, on which future movements and cultural associations were built, such as the famous association and journal Criterion.

The ideas and directions of the Itinerariului spiritual (Spiritual Itinerary) are co-substantial with the values of right-wing ideology, underlining, beyond the imperative of action and the direct experience, the spiritual primacy and the criticism of sufficient reasoning, of Cartesianism and scientific positivism, as well as promotion of mysticism and Orthodoxy, in the sense of reassertion of national singularity. Eliade outlines an apology of the experiences, that have as aim "the fertilization of the consciousness and its its transformation into a nimble one (...) in order to provoke attitude and these attitudes - spiritual positions"[3] and he speaks of a "spirit of the present generations", in which dominates the integration of mystical experience and the reduction of scientific rationalism, in order to achieve a complete knowledge, an authentic, harmonious, and balanced synthesis. Great importance is also given to culture, understood as "a bundle of spiritual seeds, mostly created by religion"[4]. Culture develops in the spiritual matrix of a nation, mostly formed on the framework of religion or of a mystical experience. From here comes the need to resuscitate Orthodoxy as a means of accessing the metaphysical and of revealing the sacred. On the other hand, the praise given to Christianity culminates in the taking one of the tragedies of Christian life, ambivalent and creative, ("humanity's greatest blessing is based on this dualism flesh-spirit: the personality"[5]) which is concentrated into the unification of contraries, "in an original synthesis of the two adverse tendencies".

The young generation of remarkable intellectuals firmly proclaims its founding role, predominantly, of an intellectual medium, able to generate culture: "We believe that the unity of consciences, the creation of a cultural medium, having the same preoccupations and the same values - will be achieved only by the present generation (...)". [6]

The seeds of this vision regarding the imperatives of his generation will develop in the following years in the outlining of what Eliade calls Romanianism, conceptually regarded as a nationalist ideology of spiritual essence, incorporated and thoroughly appropriated by the inter-war right-wing movements, which, in the first ears of the 4th decade, will absorb a large part of young Romanian intellectuals. The so called "conversion" phenomenon was however achieved gradually, a major influence in this sense had Nae Ionescu, whose seduction force and charisma was a great weight factor in the development of right-wing nationalist and Orthodoxizing beliefs of young intellectuals.

The doctrinaire articles of Mircea Eliade proved to have a prolific and reverberant impact, today being grouped in the volumes Profetism romanesc (Romanian Prophecy)[7] and Texte legionare

---

[2] apud Alexandra Laignel-Lavastine, Cioran, Eliade, Ioenscu - Uitarea fascismului (Cioran, Eliade, Ioenscu - Forgetting Fascism), Published by Humanitas, Bucuresti,

[3] Mircea Eliade, Itinerariu spiritual (Spiritual Itinerary), in Profetism romanesc (Romanian Prophecy), vol I, Published by Rosa Vanturilor, Bucuresti, 1990, pg.38

[4] idem, pag. 40

[5] Ortodoxie (Orthodoxy), in Mircea Eliade, op.cit., pg. 58

[6] ibidem

[7] Mircea Eliade, op.cit.

sau despre romansim (Legionnaire texts or about Romanianism).[8] Titles such as Romania in eternitate (Romania in eternity) or De ce cred in biruinta Miscarii Legionare (The reason I believe in the Legionnaire Movement's victory), Revolutie crestina (Christian Revolution) or Comentarii la un juramant (Remarks on an Oath) indicate uncompromising attitudes of the assertion of the nationalist ideal and especially of the configuration of the Romanianism concept, regarded as a new spiritual dimension of the nation.

The intellectual, term used excessively in that era, having meanings that started to degrade and to "become political", so this intellectual which is "pure", authentic, not enslaved to any traditional political party, represents, in that period's concept of Eliade "the only invincible force of a nation (...) the forces that sustain a country's history and feeds its mission (..)"[9]." Moreover, the intellectual has a avant-garde role, being able to give birth to a system of ideas and values that can create and stimulate social dynamic. So that - says Eliade "any political movement has its roots in the ideas of an intellectual or a group of intellectuals". Claiming his superiority and elitism, a prophetic aspect of revolutionary prediction is attributed the pure intellectual, since "fundamental changes are felt at the beginning by the country's intellectual elite, that a revolution has its roots not only in the demands of a social class, but also in the elites' critique of values and spiritual experiences."[10] The author additionally highlights the mission of the elite of creating superior values that are specific to a nation and of justifying its historical mission, making it eternal through the ability of creation. The preservation of the national particularity and the continuation of Romanian archaic values is given, in the essayist's opinion, by the two extremes of social class, the peasants and the cultural elite: "Peasants have defended the field and the people. Intellectuals defend our rights for spirituality, its autonomy, and its universal, human values. A nation's historical mission is verified by two things: 1) the power to defend its field, its freedom and rights, 2) and the vaguer to create values. The classes or groups that fulfil these essential functions are the only ones that can be called vital groups, without these a nation risks to disappear from history..."[11]

The intellectuals' imperative is thus, in the writer's opinion, the fundamental value of the national spirit's survival. Being the only means of assertion against foreign influences, creation is perceived as an organic, imperative need, which should reflect not only on the process of contemplation, specific to the elite ("by contemplating, these include the world, they turn it upside down in its soul, they enrich it through their creation")[12], but also on the event or action, understood as "spiritual bearing" and as an interior balance of harmonization.

In the sense of creation need as a means of survival, Mircea Eliade extends his vision to the level of the state and of the doctrine of nationalism. Creation means "thirst for eternity", and nationalism validates itself through creation, thus through eternity, in the sense of permanence in value in time and space. By contrast, Romania is situated among the nations that constantly renounced its creative seeds. The firm and valid direction towards a nation's "eternity" is considered to be the nationalist creators, writers, philosophers, people who create culture and not the heroes or political leaders[13], who only have a role of leading the historical path.

Especially the social insufficiencies and the minuses of the political class push through in the pages of the articles, sometimes having a mild tone, other times having a polemical and denigrating tone, but the entire ideological vision, with emphasis on missionary work and spiritual revolution, is outlined not only as an effect of ideological reverberation strongly felt at European level, but rather

---

[8] Mircea Eliade, Texte legionare sau despre romansim (Legionnaire texts or about Romanianism), Published by Dacia, Cluj-Napoca, 2001

[9] Mircea Eliade, Profetism Romnesc (Romanian Prophecy), vol.II,…, pg.32

[10] idem, pg. 70

[11] idem, pg. 101

[12] idem, pg. 64

[13] idem, pg. 128

as a reaction to the unfavourable internal context towards spasmodic socio-political evolution of inter-war Romania.

The revolt against politicking reaches maximum peaks when the prestige of the Romanian nation and culture is slandered, having a strong effect on the drastic decrease of the national spirit's ability to assert itself.

But what is inexcusable and surely fatal for a nation, is, in the author's vision, "the loss of governmental instinct", strongly felt in "the entire political incapacity" and in the concrete absence of an ample, anticipatory, and reforming vision, specific to the entire Romanian political spectrum after World War I. The governmental perspective's obtuseness of the politicians, suggestively called by Eliade "blind pilots" who "don't see, don't hear, and don't feel any more" and who, in the menacing and tempestuous context of revolutionary Europe, plot "with an unchanging voluptuousness the slow collapse of the modern Romanian state"[14], induces Eliade the tragic, almost apocalyptic, prediction of the nation's disappearance: "But a nation in which a leading class has such a way of thinking, and who speaks to you about qualities of foreign people - does not live for a long time. It, as nation, does not however have the right to measure up to history."

However history acquires, in Eliade's concept, a much deeper sense, that needs to be perceived in an existential perspective, of the development of "the national being". "There is a history that is made and a history that is consuming itself"[15], claims the exegete. If "the history that consumes itself" is limited to the exterior, prosaic act of the political or economical intercession, "the history that is made" has a metaphysical description and focuses on a spiritual, transfiguring, and organically progressive action, directed towards finding a "sense specific to its historical existence".[16] That is why Eliade considers that "it is more necessary and prolific the pure spiritual activity - rather than a political one", since "the thing that now interests more is not the political - but the historical. We are not interested in the victory of a political group - but the reintegration of Romania in its historical lines"[17]. The historical perspective thus requires, in this sense, being aware of a spiritual destiny of the nation and its orientation towards its specific matrix direction of its historical and spiritual existence, direction born, as a cosmic condition of every being, out of a critical soteriological need, "out of a great inner thirst for redemption"[18].

"The reintegration of the nation into the historical lines" is thus achieved, firstly, through perspective and register change of the entire Romanian political spectrum, which "crumbles" a historical fact perverting it into "political incidents", and the recapitalization, in the same time, of "the historical nationalism", understood as an "act of spiritual creation" of a nation that has "the consciousness to participate in a long lasting history"[19]. The nationalism, in Eliade's vision, thus relinquishes itself from the political bonds and firmly structures itself on the primacy of spirituality and on the creative act of "national forces" able to imprint the nation with the sense of eternity and universalism.[20]

In this context, the battle of nationalism against the political sterility, the borrowed forms, and the false values, is identified with "the historical mission" of the young generation, a spiritual mission, materialized in a "spiritual revolution", Christian revolution, initiated with the aim of accession to "the salvation of the Romanian nation". "The young movement from 1927 was born with

---

[14] Mircea Eliade, Texte Legionare (Legionnaire Texts)…, pg.52
[15] idem, pg. 93
[16] Mircea Eliade, Profetism romanesc (Romanian Prophecy) …., pg. 197
[17] Mircea Eliade, Texte Legionare (Legionnaire Texts)…, pg. 94
[18] Mircea Eliade, Profetism romanes (Romanian Prophecy), Vol II…pg. 155
[19] idem, pag. 193
[20] Mircea Eliade, Nationalismul (Nationalism), in Profetism romanesc (Romanian prophecy), vol.II, pg.196: "The hardest battle and in which a nation's force of creation is verified, takes lace after the victory of nationalism." This means the hour whenit tries to become universal."

this historical mission's consciousness: to change Romania's sole, subordinating all the values to only one supreme value:" The Spirit."[21]

As a result, excessive politicking and the precarious forms of political intercessions, can be counter-balanced, in Eliade's conception, only through a predominance over the spiritual and the Christian values, and from here comes his advocacy, in the sense of a spiritual, ascetic action, of self-accomplishment. Hence we can speak about an imperative of acting, but not in a political sense, but in a spiritual sense ("The political sense of a battle falls on a secondary plan. The battle, the action, the effort (...) receives now its new Christian, mystical sense"[22]), that later reverberates itself in the larger domains of society: "Only now, the sense of this Christian revolution is starting to be understood, a revolution that tries to create a new Romania, creating first a new man, a perfect Christian - and that replaces the old political life, through civil life, that means it restores the humanity and Christian relations within the same blood community"[23].

Eagerly claimed in the '30s b the "Romanian youth", more precisely by the nationalist-Christian branch of the intellectual elite, the primacy of spirituality becomes, in the European context of nationalist right-wing movements, the fundamental privilege of distinguishing the actions of the Romanian right-wing extreme, in this case the Legionnaire Movement. Embedded, after the quasi-totality of historiographical interpretations, in the influential areas of western totalitarian movements, legionnareism is not, in Eliade's opinion in 1936, just a simple imitation of the latter, as it was often speculated in that era, but it reveals an essence "so profoundly mystical - that its success would mean once again the victory of the Christian spirit in Europe". [24] In addition, referring to the invoked loans of ideological and political doctrine from other areas, the essayist rejects promptly and concludes, "our doctrine must result from our Romanian realities"[25]. In his opinion, the legionnaire movement, unlike Fascism, that emphasises on the state or, unlike Nazism dominated by racial Chauvinism, proposes a revival of the endemic fund and the implementation of a new Romanian consciousness, based on the unchangeable values of Christian morality: "if Nazism is founded on People and Fascism on State - then the Legionnaire Movement has the right to claim itself the only Christian mysticism able to lead human settlements, (...), it is first of all a Christian revolution, a spiritual, ascetic, and male revolution, as Europe has never known before." [26]

The emphasis on spirituality will however lead to a new approach, on Romanian field, of the long time circulated concept of "the new man", exploited then with a maximum insistence and by the communist totalitarianism. Quotation Eliade.

The concept of "new man", promoted by the Legionnaire Movement, acquires, as it was expected, clear spiritual connotations. The primacy of the spiritual, that inevitably leads to revelation, to a mystical feeling and to a new religious approach, deeply rooted into ascetic Christianity, has as a main result the cleaning of the being of selfishness or of instinctual impulses. "The new man", in the Romanian nationalist ideology, is hence an individual that accepts and knows, on the highest level, the dimension of suffering, of the permanent self-battle and self-sacrifice.

All these attitudes are, in fact, the corollary of a serene and often fatalistic acceptance of the tragic: "Giving up earthly pleasures - says Mircea Eliade[27], in his article Comentarii la un juramant (Notes on an Oath) - is not a lessening of the being, a sterilization of the substance - but, on the contrary, a frantic increase of the spiritual being, a victory of the real against the fleeting, illusive, despairing human joys". Asceticism and moral purification are regarded, by transcending or sublimation of distress, as being determined for the accession towards the dimensions of interior

[21] Mircea Eliade, Texte Legionarei (Legionnaire Texts)..., pg. 50
[22] idem, pg. 44
[23] idem, pg. 51
[24] ibidem
[25] idem, pg. 95
[26] idem, pg. 46
[27] idem, pg. 45

freedom, devoid of psycho-social gearings or of individualistic limits: "When the new man's centre of gravity falls on salvation and on spiritual development - the man becomes free. Free to contemplate and to judge work of art as it should be. Free to practice a science or technique, to research a philosophy, to value a work of art - without feeling his human being completely engaged in this activity." The soteriological vision[28] of the new man, falls on the social, in the terms of a nationalist revolution that should restore moral order and replace the structure of a stale political life with new civil frames of life, created under the Christian sign of mystical living. Essentially, the spiritual lines of "the new man" converge towards restoring "the existential, historical sense" of the nation: "a united and strong Romania"[29], "in an organic, national state", able to capitalize its creative forces and its national spiritual specific. The anticipated victory of nationalism was supposed to broaden these spiritual outlines towards far away horizons of universalism.

From the positions of a fervent nationalism, Eliade's attitude in the '30s, influenced mostly by the right-wing ideology, strives to configure a Romanian spiritual paradigm put under the sign of a spirit that wants to be prophetic and transfiguring.

Despite the fact that Eliade's journalism with a nationalist militant theme was denied or silenced by the essayist, becoming famous in the inter-war exile years as a historian of religions, "the imprudent acts and errors of youth"[30], cannot be omitted during the attempt to configure the spirit of the inter-war era, because, states Z. Ornea with an obvious sincerity: "Eliade was too big and too important for his generation to ignore his writings and attitude taking"[31].

*

Among the young intellectuals grouped around the Axa journal, having a considerable cultural impact in the '30s comes to the fore Vasile Marin, venturesome and bright, having a promising political intelligence. He was part of a prestigious circle of intellectuals, such as Mircea Eliade, Mihail Polihroniade or Victor V.Vojen, whose publishing and intellectual activity had an important role in the propagation of the right-wing ideology within the spiritual climate of inter-war Romania.

The group from Axa constituted in intellectual elites of the Legionnaire Movement, which had a journalistic and ideological contribution and which succeeded in penetrating into the so-called cultural aristocracy, imprinting the distinguished nature of the prestige to the Movement. "Bright, ironical, and even impertinent - said Francesco Veiga[32] in his work The History of the Iron Guard - the members of the group, sons of middle and high bourgeoisie, overall had an unparalleled glamour, which was refined and modern". Of course, the solid knowledge in different academic subjects (Political Science, Law, Philosophy), the rich argumentation and oratorical ease made them unique, triggering, as it was expected, a great emulation, especially among the knowledge-thirsty youth and students.

---

[28] Eliade develops the significance of two concepts Soteria and Sympathia, understood as two spiritual tendencies for "the reconciliation of the soul with the world": "Soteria" reflects "the attempt of rescue, salvation, getting out into the world", and sympathya - "the attempt to find support in the worls, to love the world, to search for harmony with all its existence", in Mantuire, Istorie, Politica (Testimony, Historym Politics), in Profetism Romanesc (Romanian Prophecy), vol.II, pg.152

[29] idem, pg.163

[30] In his Memoriile (Memoires) Eliade, being constrained by certain circumstances, that slowed down in a certain manner the assertion of his prestige or his assertion on the European cultural stage, confesses: "the imprudent acts and errors made as a young man forms a series of misunderstandings, that will follow me my entire life", Memorii (Memoires), vol.II, (1937-1969), Published by Humanitas, Bucuresti, 1991,pg.49

[31] Z. Ornea, Anii Treizeci (The '30s). Extrema dreapta romaneasca (The Romanian right-wing extreme), Published by Fundatia Cultural Romane, Bucuresti, 1995, pg. 211

[32] Francesco Veiga, Istoria garzii de fier 1919-1941 (The History of the Iron Guard 1919-1941), Published by Humanitas, Bucuresti, 1995, pg. 160

In this context, the captivating personality, marked by vitality and impetuousness, of Vasile Marin is outlined, a first class intellectual, considered by his generation's colleagues and by historical analysts, one the most intelligent ideologists of right-wing nationalism. In this respect, some of his journalistic texts stand as proof, texts that remained in the archives of the era's journals, as well as a biographic portrait masterfully elaborated by Mihail Polihroniade and published in the reverential issue of Cuvantul studentesc (The Words of the Students) from January 1937, as a requiem to the one year commemoration from his death, in the Spanish front-line.

Unfortunately, the number of Vasile Marin's sources and notes is very low, and his death, that came at an age when his personality was in full efflorescence, had suddenly disrupted the completion of a stupendous mind, who, in his small amount of articles, announced himself as a potential visionary. His intellectual capacity and his sharp intelligence could have made its way to celebrity and could have assured him the posterity's absolute reception, just like Eliade, if his destiny had not enrolled him on the line of heroic sacrifice for the proclaimed ideology, with all its contextual and historical limits.

Vasile Marin was born on the 29th of January 1904, in Bucuresti, and attended the courses of "*Sfantu Sava" and "*Gheorghe Sincai" high-schools. He stands out through his passion for reading, even through erudition, highlighting his firm vocation for ideological and political debates. He chooses the courses of Law School, where he gets involved in the student movements, on the lines of ideological nationalism. Publicist Mihail Polihroniade[33], his friend from his student years, recalls: "A small literary circle was formed, where, besides Marin, Carandino, and I, the following also participated: N.N. Matheescu, Mircea Eliade, Ion Anghel, Balan, Petrisor Viforeanu, and so on (...). I remember even now Marin's first work, if my memory is right; it was called Pamfletarii reactionari francezi *(The French Reactionary Pamphleteers). He spoke about Leon Bloy and Leon Daudet. At the age of nineteen, Vasile Marin was a formed man. He had a maturity in thinking, a certainty, a precision that we hadn't reached yet. The basis of his culture had also been established (...).*" He substantially assimilated his knowledge about the era's ideologies, about Marxism and Fascism, manifesting a unique inclination towards anti-modern doctrine, "reactionary" dogma of Charles Maurras, with whom he also maintained correspondence.[34] His works always caused lively debates, his personality dominated by rational, relentless thinking, common for the judicial field, and by clear argumentation, based on scientific premises, is replenished with an obvious aesthetic sense, easy to recognise in his arborescent and well-elaborated sentences, in his metaphoric expression, and his fine irony, that used to offer a note of allusive subtlety to his articles and filled them with a discrete lyricism of evocation. After his graduation, he starts his career as lawyer in Ion Lugosianu's practice, Minister of Romania in Rome and respectable member of the National-Peasant Party. He is noticed for his intelligence, talent, and political spirit, for which, in 1927, when the National-Peasant Party comes to power, Vasile Marin holds the position of Chief of Staff of his master, who now is Under-secretary of State. He defends his Ph.D. thesis in 1932, with his work Fascism and he is offered the title of Doctor of Laws. The book presents the constitutive organization of the Italian Corporate State. At that time, Vasile Marin's book was the only work that substantially approached Fascism, as a doctrine and political practice.[35]

Along with his enrolment in the Legion in the autumn of 1932, Vasile Marin was completely dedicated to the legionnaire belief and ideal, carrying out a ample journalistic activity at Axa journal, then, being observed by Nae Ionescu, he is employed as editor at Cuvantul (The Word). In addition, the great amount of trials the Legion experienced, due to altercations, often violent one, with the Government's institutions, have established him as "the Legion's Lawyer". "As lawyer, he brings, without exaggerating, huge service to the legion. All of us remember what the spring and summer of

[33] Mihail Polihroniade, Vasile Marin, in Vasile Marin Crez de generatie (Generation Belief), pp.95-203
[34] Vasile Marin, Crez de generatie (Generation Belief), Published by Majadahonda, Bucuresti, 1997
[35] idem, pag. 197

1933 meant. The Vaida Government (...) started a destruction battle against us. Slander, injury, insults, hits, torture, arbitrary arrests descended upon us. And finally, even though we endured - by the order of the Captain - with resignation any hit, still we were the ones on trial. The trials proceeded. From one corner of the country to the other, "the Legion's Lawyer", Vasile Marin was summoned."[36]

In 1933, when the Iron Guard is dissolved, he is arrested and locked up at Jilava, where he becomes close friends with Ion Mota, the Legion's founder and commander, translator of Protocoalelor Inteleptilor Sionului (Protocols of Zion). The strong spiritual affinity between the two will continue until their death in 1937, in the Spanish front-line at Majadahonda. Together with other six legionnaires, Vasile Marin insisted on leaving for Spain, to participate, "in the name of the Christian crusade", in the battle against the "atheistic communism" revolutionary movement. The duty of honour for protecting Christianity, otherwise a fundamental value of the legionnaire doctrine, was sensed as a fatidic calling, as an inner drive to the testimony of his belief, and it culminated in the uncompromising decision to leave for battle as a volunteer in the front-line. But his decision was sealed, even though unconsciously, by the premonitory enunciation of the sacrifice: "Don't let Mota leave without me. I'm signing up for the seventh coffin."[37] The death of the two strongly shook not only the Movement, but also the entire public opinion from Romania. Serving as a power of example, the Legionnaire Movement saw, after the funerals, that otherwise were extremely ceremonial, of great ritual brilliance and reverence, an ample popularization and consideration, thus revealing its hidden power, just like the invisible part of an iceberg. Armin Heinen[38] writes in his study Legiunea Arhanghelului Mihail (The Legion of Archangel Michael). The social movement and political organization "*The official condolence declarations of important personalities from the Romanian society (and from abroad n.n.) have boosted the Legion's prestige. In the same time, they constituted proof of the fact that no other right-wing party can ever compete against the Legion. (...) During the funeral ceremonies for Mota and Marin, the Guard has demonstratively stated its power (...)".* On the other hand, there are testimonies regarding the impressive number of participants at the ceremony, 20 churchmen and tens of thousands of people, the convoy being one and half hour long.[39] Deeply moved by the loss of Vasile Marin, Nae Ionescu sees in his death a divine punishment: "So when He decided Vasile Marin's death, God wanted to scold us. That is why our pain is dark.[40]

The synthesis of his doctrinaire attitude is presented by the volume Crez de generatie,[41] (Generation Belief) issued in February 1937, as a selection from the statements and theoretical articles of the young "martyr". The anthology is accompanied by a praising panegyric, signed by Codreanu and with an ample foreword from the mentor of the entire "philosophy of life" generation, Professor Nae Ionescu.

In the foreword of the book (a collection of articles, letters and diary notes), the philosopher considers Marin "an authority of the legionnaire doctrine", emphasising his attributes of quality and precision.

Most of Vasile Marin's articles concisely and sometimes even educationally present the theory of nationalist doctrine in contrast with the weaknesses of parliamentary democracy of the era, considered to be corrupt, decadent, and internationalist. This antinomy, nationalism-democratism, is a constant of its ideological theme, upon which sit the fundamental lines of its socio-politic

---

[36] idem, pg. 199

[37] Ion Dumitrescu Borsa, Cal Troian intra muros (Trojan horse intra muros), Published by Lucman, Bucuresti, pg. 186

[38] Armin Heinen – Legiunea "Arhanghelului Mihail" (The Legion of Archangel Michael). Social Movement and Political Organization, Published by Humanitas, Bucuresti, pg. 292

[39] apud. Armin Heinen, quoted work

[40] Nae Ioenscu in the foreword of Vasile Marin's, Crez de generatie (Generation Belief), Published by Majadahonda, Bucuresti, 1997

[41] Vasile Marin, quoted work

argumentation. Notable articles: Democracy, the enemy of nationalism, Between democracy and the totalitarian state, Bourgeois state and the national revolution, What is nationalist politics, Abdications of the democratic state, The two student bodies, Politics or The nation against de import state, articles that were published between 1927-1936, in the journals Axa, Cuvantul (The Word) or Cuvantul Studentesc (The Word of the Students).

In his opinion, the democracy, having roots in the French Revolution of 1789, is founded on instruments that exclude the possibility of promoting and preserving an authentic nationalist spirit: universal suffrage, partidism and financial power, means that entail legal formalism and economic and social individualism. These elements appear, in the author's vision, as being totally incompatible with the national fund and with the Romanian nation's interests, which are still unconsolidated. Moreover, a newly formed state, in its unification processes needs "aggressive national politics, strongly central, pulled out from under the fluctuations of electoral orientations"[42], because "state management is a specialization that cannot be left to the discretion of masses"[43] and "electoralism does not allow selection, since the masses do not have the instinct of value hierarchy."[44] On the other hand, the democratic regime favours the parties' battle for power, politicking, and corruption, and it mainly regulates the individual interest of the officials.

Another weak point of democratism would be, according to his assertion, electoralism, based on a crass materialism, as well as the universal vote, to which we due "the tragic consequence of crumbling the national body", while "behind the curtains, the international finance pulls the strings and settles its affairs having the complete certainty of success: Divide et impera*"*. This entire politics of electoral game inevitably leads to "the degradation through unification of the collective life, and the nation that is numerically and quantitatively designed looses the sense of real and eternal value", issue that determines Vasile Marin to consider democracy "the solvent of nationalism".[45] So democratism proved to be o formula that contrasts with the development process of a nation, considering the fact that the nation is in a continuous making and needs an organic evolution, followed in time as a living organism, self-conscious, while "the geometricians' democracy, the adorers of the Rousseau cult, the state and the society are not natural products, but something artificial, a social contract, a fundamental pact, signed between individuals, who, in their turn, are equal and identical. The life of a society, of a nation, is neither logical, nor symmetrical. It cannot be restricted in formulas and nor can it be cast into patterns".[46] The democratic individual, equal with himself, universal and abstract, is opposed to Vasile Marin's man, who is rooted in "our land, in our history, in the national consciousness, in the adaptation of national necessities"[47], and the principle of quantity, regarded as validation criterion, is opposed to the principle of quality and ethnic and ethic bases. At one point, Charles Maurras, who analysed the realities of democratic France, also stated: "Under the name of parliamentary democracy, we have the reign of the power of money, controlled by a sort of bankers' government".[48]

In his article Politica[49] (Politics), Vasile Marin strengthens his argumentation regarding democracy as a possible solvent of national state congruency, presenting the example of the Austrian-Hungarian Empire, which, due to the democracy that favoured the strong offensive of the subjugated nationalities, had prepared its imminent dissolution. "The politics of the nationalities

---

[42] Vasiel Marin, Democratia, dusmanul nationalismului (Democracy, the enemy of nationalism), Crez de generatie... (Generation Belief), pg.50

[43] Vasile Marin, Note (Notes), quoted work, pg. 60

[44] Vasile Marin, De la formalismul democratic la nationalismul constructiv (From democratic formalism to constructive nationalism), quoted work, pg.168

[45] ibidem

[46] idem, pg. 167

[47] ibidem

[48] Vasile Marin, Extremismul de dreapta (Right-wing Extremism), op.cit., pg.182

[49] Vasile Marin, Politica (Politics), quoted work, pg. 143

enclosed in a State that is not the natural expression of their historical and ethnic being - concludes Vasile Marin - cannot be other than democratic politics. For there is no stronger instrument for the dissolution of a state, than democracy. Numerically and quantitatively designed, abstracting ethnicity, standardizing the specificity on the basis of man's universality, democracy is the ideal regime of internationalism." In the same article, the legionnaire ideologist bursts out ironically and quizzically, charging the parliamentary life and the democratic institutions: "The unripe fruit, picked by the revolutionaries of the Pasoptism from the principle garden of the '89 Revolution, have been brought to mature and to make seeds in the Romanian greenhouse." The results have been disastrous for the country and its people".

The democratic regime, considered to be detrimental for the young nations, recently created, can have other consequences in countries that have a rich nationalist past and which, along their secular evolution, have given birth to a solid culture, such as France for example: "Over the work of 40 kings can stretch the gloss of integral democratism. The national institutions, created to last forever, resist and further develop through their own lives, in the contempt of the fleeting existence of the present forms. What about us?"[50] The ideologist estimates that the only chance to consolidate the Romanian nation would be the one given by strict nationalist politics, capable of valuing the national specificity, as a principle of the state.

Vasile Marin speaks, in this sense, of a constructive nationalism, creative nationalism, that has its definition given by Maurice Barres: « Le nationalisme ordonne à juger tout par rapport à son pays natal. » In contrast with democratic regime, constructive nationalism implies a form of governing created according to the historical context and to the social and economic needs of the nation, under the authority of individuals elected, having an exponential level, who "summarize the characteristics and the aspirations of that respective nation", with will and spirit of sacrifice. Being pro-monarchy, nationalism develops the framework of the society's pyramidal structure, unlike "globalism and cosmopolitanism, which are nothing else than covers, behind which plots for the dynamiting of monarch authority and nationalist fundamentals are woven."[51].

The ideological system promoted by Vasile Marin, develops fundamental aspects of the nationalist theory: the political, the social, and the spiritual. In his article Ce este politica nationalista (What is nationalist politics)[52], the author defines the political character as well as the character of the State, the psycho-social character as well as the spiritual one, from the point of view of an ethic and axiological paradigm. Thus, nationalism is "an offensive and assertive policy. Its roles must be materialized in a national state, that shouldn't be available to the citizens It must be a prestigious state, having a historical, cultural, civilizing mission. Nationalism is a new ethic and a hierarchy of values. It promotes the national spirit above the civic one; it conditions through the national primacy all the other state related roles."

From spiritual point of view, nationalist politics develops a set of values that are strongly transfiguring, generically named by the author national mysticism. The fundamental lines of this "mysticism" converge all of them to the supreme aim, the creating of a human character that is totally disengaged from materialism and the era's triviality, who passed through "the school of heroic permanence." National mysticism forms "the man of cardinal virtues: the hero, the priest, the hermit, (...) the soldier". Perceived as a true religion, with the imperative force of profound conversion, nationalism obtains missionary accents, almost religious and military-like at the same time: "The national army is a religious order. Our nationalism will dissolve the policy of personal interest. The term "enough" will disappear. Nobody is enough, but everybody is sacrificing himself. It's a sacrifice when you command; it's a sacrifice when you obey. The development of cardinal virtues in a man,

---

[50] Vasile Marin, De la formalismul democratic la nationalismul constructiv (From democratic formalism to constructive nationalism), quoted work, pg. 169

[51] idem, pg.170

[52] Vasile Marin, Ce este politica nationalista (What is nationalist politics), quoted work, pg. 52

this is the reason and being of our nationalism. (...) Nationalism can also be a social system to the extent that it is an instructive school of high idealism." As regards leadership, it must be subordinated to the idea of purity and idealism. Beyond the sense of responsibility, complete disinterest is imposed regarding personal, material or vain interests and a serious commitment is imposed regarding the ascetic commitments, reaching the highest quota of abnegation and renunciation in regard to any telluric instincts. "The leading of the state must be done by people who have nothing. The elite is not a noble elite, but an elite of pure individuals. The rest of the society can indulge itself in the practice of old institutions, the leaders cannot. Out of them, the instinct of seizing and the wish to enjoy earthly goods must disappear. A state cannot be founded on the ethics of the gorged ones."

This interior transfiguration, that crowns the legionnaire morale, practised with perseverance by the elite of the Movement, imposes another perception on life and on the value of sacrifice, going up to the liberating revelation. The author himself confesses in an emotional confession of faith: "I have the impression that this simple, definite appreciation imprints a sort of high transfiguration to our being, which cannot be seen or touched by any personality tribulation, agitated by complexity. (...) I cast away something every day, and there were so many before! I have never suspected the immense burden of uselessness that I used to carry on by back. However, it's the first time when the unloaded burden does not produce an immediate sensation of ease, but rather a sensation of suffering. (...) I am now awaiting my big day: the day of the man in me, the man that I cramped inside for so many years. I'm just as afraid of it as a man should be when he is perfectly conscious of the thought of a second birth."[53]

The primacy of suffering, of self-battle, leads to spiritual perfection, giving nationalism a deep sense of spiritual mysticism, often invoked also by the Captain in The nest chief's booklet: "We pursue the spiritual reform of man, on the line of our Romanian man, to his natural being, the one that a century of another structure falsified"[54].

Beside the spiritual dimension, nationalism involves, in the author's opinion, other aspects too, that trace defining lines of constitutional, ethical, and ethnic nature (especially the anti-Semitic character). In the Conference held on the 3rd of February 1936 on the subject The national status in relation to the national movement [55], Marin analyses a series of notions, establishing the connections and subordinations between them, so as all the aspects of nationalism be debated with sharpness, progressively, and systematically. In the process of evolution, from the people to the nation to the national state, nationalism stands out as a primary bond, "the only guiding thread".

Thus, starting from the term people ("a larger gathering of people who have the same origin, who have the same religious beliefs, who stand on a determined territory, who speak the same language, and are agitated by the same spiritual metaphysics"), he defines the nation, as a group of people who became aware of itself", being the only reason of the existence of a group of people, which, in order to affirm itself, creates a culture, and in order to relate to other nations, to materialize by validation, it transforms in a national state. "From people, to nation, to state, there is only one guiding thread", exclaims Vasile Marin. "Nationalism is the attribute through which a certain group of people commits through a certain nature, through a certain expression in relation to the others. It's an element of identification; the representation model of a nation is its own."

In an ample article, State and culture[56], Vasile Marin systematises the idiom culture-civilization, from the perspective of the national state. The trilogy "nation-state-culture" forms, according to his perspective, the foundation of the Romanian phenomenon. The nation, understood as a human entity, an organic whole, needs its integration in a national state, in order to promote a

[53] Vasile Marin, Note (Notes), quoted work, 56

[54] apud Vasile Marin, quoted work

[55] Vasile Marin, Statul national in raport cu miscarea nationala (The national state in relation to the national movement), quoted work, pg. 69

[56] Vasile Marin, Stat si Cultura (State and Culture), quoted work, pg. 139

specific, national culture. The state is "its capitalization instrument, the essential principle of its force of affirmation" and culture is "the superior form of life of a nation", the means through which "it maximizes its attributes (...) through culture a nation survives its physical being".

Correlating these defining lines, without ignoring the imperative of the fact and the historical missionary role of the young generation, "of giving the united nation, the state it deserves"[57], nationalism appears as "an organic whole that binds heaven and earth", being able to spiritually distinguish the nation.

Regarded in a historical perspective, one can reproach to Marin, as face Z. Ornea[58] does, the fact that "he battle democracy for a long time" and he stood on smooth positions of anti-democracy attitude, in the strict spirit of right-wing extreme.

*

One of the main dimensions of inter-war nationalist ideology is Orthodoxy, regarded as a spiritual-religious matrix, that concentrates in it, integrally and representatively, the essence of Romanian national specific. The ideologist, that highlighted and built around this axis a real doctrine of the nationalism, was found alongside Nae Ionescu, Nichifor Crainic. Poet and theologian, talented journalist and formidable polemicist, Nichifor Crainic represented a strong influential point on the student years and on the intellectuals of the era. In his recent book Capcanele Istoriei (The traps of history). Elita intelectuala Romaneasca inrte 1930 si 1950 (The Romanian intellectual elite between 190 and 1950), Lucian Boia considered Crainic one the biggest "gatherers of young people" or directors of consciousness, we could say, alongside Nae Ionescu and Dimitrie Gusti.[59]

Crainic's name is however associated with the journal Gandirea* (Thinking), the systematic centre of his ideological debates and polemics, the matrix of thinkism, ideological, artistic, and literary current, that promoted vigorously the conservatory nationalist concepts.

Being strongly traditionalistic, the journal initiated great debates of ideas on the subject of national specific and on the spiritual origins of Romanianism, having the declared intention of asserting a Romanian spiritual status and of consolidating its distinctive, unique values.

Nichifor Crainic was one of the most fervent journalists of the era, a great name in the writer's guild. Global and comprehensive, Nochifor Crainic's ideology predicts the mingling of the national spirit with the religious, Christian, and Orthodox spirit. Hence an entire argumentative plea on different scientific and artistic areas, searching for evidence in theology, ethnology, and ethnography, anthropology, art and folk aesthetics. But from all of these, the idea of the religious person stands out as a foundation of the socio-political cultural existence and model. Essentially, Crainic's contribution stands in the unbinding of the religious background of tradition, according to George Achim's phrase[60], who otherwise summerizes his place in the configuration of inter-war ideology: "Nichifor Crainic wss the main ideologist of what can be called, using Basil Munteanu's phrase, "militant traditionalism", orientation that associated, from right-wing nationalist positions, the national idea with the religious idea of matrix Orthodoxy, a style creator in the field of culture."

---

[57] idem, 178

[58] Z.Ornea, Z. Ornea, Anii Treizeci. Extrema dreapta romaneasca (The Thirties, Right-wing Romanian extreme), Published by Fundatia Culturala Romana, Bucuresti, 1995, pg. 56

59 apud. Lucian Boia, Capcanele istoriei. Elita intelectuala roamenasca intre 1930 si 1950 (The traps of history. The Romanian Intellectual Elite between 1930and 1950), Published by Humanitas, Bucuresti, 2011

[60] George Achim, Revolte si consimtiri (Revolts and Consents), Published by Dacia, CLuj-Napoca, 1995, pg. 261.

The volume Puncte cardinale in Haos,[61] (Cardinal Points in Chaos) cumulates the main valences of his ideological vision, and in order to be able to rebuild the guidelines of his concept we will appeal directly to some of the important essays of the writer: Tineretul si crestinismul (Youth and Christianity), Sensul traditiei (The sense of Tradition), Puncte cardinale in haos (Cardinal points in chaos), Rasa si religiune (Race and Religion), Marturisire de credinta (Statement of faith).

One of the subjects that Crainic approaches in order to contextualize the problems of the era, is the one of the youth, regarded as a main recovery factor of national and traditional values, lost in assault of western decay. The problem of the youth is largely debated in Mircea Eliade's era and others "from the generation" such as Crainic recapitalizes the subject and gives it a new extension, by reporting it to the religious dimension.

Religion and the religious phenomenon is interpreted firstly from ethnic and governmental point of view, in the sense of systematic consolidation of the national specific, aspect that invariably gives it the capacity of authorizing and purifying collective force, in the same time on a secondary plain the relation of the individual with the transcendent. Orthodoxy represents, from ethnogenetic point of view, the security and un-altering basis of the Romanian nation, its specificity mark, thus Crainic exclaimed enthusiastic - the Romanians are the only Latin Orthodox people and the only Orthodox Latin people". Thus, Orthodoxy is considered as being the only primordial principle of the Romanian spiritual order, cardinal point of orientation, verified and validated by history: "in the multi-ethnic complex of present Romania, the eastern ritual of the two national Churches is the formula for preserving the majority of the Romanian block. (...) Orthodoxy will be the key for understanding this history."[62] If the historical artefacts of the Romanian people have a rich religious representation, the folk culture and art are, in their turn, born out of a creative consciousness dominated over the years by living the religious event, which confirms "the strong presence of Orthodoxy in the Romanian soul"[63]. The organic link between religion and culture is extensively debated by the essayist and undeniably argued: the popular creation dominated by the Byzantine style, the fine arts, profoundly spiritualized, as well as the musical and poetic rhythms answer back over centuries to the echoes of a specific Byzantine style, deeply implemented in the collective Romanian consciousness.

Religion represents, in Crainic's opinion, the matrix pot from which the cultural phenomenon and the geo-anthropological symbolic representation develops and evolves.

Nationalism is born from "the substance of this Church mixed everywhere with the ethnic substance".[64] In the doctrinaire spirit of right-wing ideology prevailing during this era, the mentor of this thinking naturally intertwines the ethnic and the religious regarding them as a fundamental categorical duality for the governmental statute of the Romanian people: "The new spirit that blows over Europe is a nationalist and religious one in the same time, meaning that it wants to take into account both the organic and diverse realities of ethnic nature, and the transcendent reality of religion (...) Nationalism is the key condition for the rebirth of every nation, as its lack is the sign of decadence and death".[65].

The revolutionary spirit and the vitalist, spontaneous, and deliberate force specific for this age, renders the youth with an enthusiastic manifestation towards extremes, towards infinity, determining the youth to adopt radical, irreconcilable, and polarizing attitudes. In the Romanian context, and not only there, as we have also seen in Eliade's articles, the social dynamic is in full

[61] Nichifor Crainic, Puncte cardinale in haos (Cardinal points in chaos), Published by Albatros, Bucuresti, 1998

[62] idem, pg. 73

[63] idem, pg. 75

[64] idem, pg. 79

[65] idem, pg. 102

extremist reconfiguration, and the opposing lines formed (Christian nationalism and Atheist internationalism, the soviet equal of right-wing nationalist movements), immanently imply the taking of a position regarding the religious idea. "Christianity and atheism are the peaks that demand the tumultuous psychology of the young generation - Crainic says, and - the problem of the relation between youth and Christianity is not only today a problem of catechism and a pastoral problem where the church has the initiative, but rather a problem of attitude enforced on the youth having that era's extremist spirit."[66] In this sense, the Church acquires a stabilizing and ordering role within the massive accession of the right-wing youth, though this reviving its vital functions and its secure place in social life. Although in the shadows, trivialized and entirely formalized as a result of the western virus penetrating in the collective psychology, with all its material and commercial imprecations, Crainic's concept restores his vital force and his redemption, and on this basis he will formulate within nationalism "*an integral concept of life in which (the youth, n.n) can save its sole from the ruins that pile up all around.*" "The Church remains with the task - the theologian firmly points out, using the adequate styles that betray his talent and poetic expression - to capture and filter the positive waves that burst over its threshold or to dam up the negative and rebel waves the hit its coast."[67]

Conclusions

The inter-war period knew one of the most expansive and influential socio-political materialization if the nationalist ideology. Supported by the largest part of the elite intellectuals of the era and theorized in nuance, depending on the tackled scientific and cultural paradigms, the national doctrine involves several facets that ideationally express the cultural personality and political thinking of its ideologists.

Thus, Mircea Eliade develops a nationalist ideology from philosophical and spiritual positions, based mainly on the metaphysical and historical dimension of the nation. In his turn, Vasile Marin represents the political offensive of nationalism, in a combative manner, undeniably marked by the limits of his ideological position. Regarding Nichifor Crainic, his doctrine is coagulated on a theological assumption, an Orthodox-spiritualistic one.

References

- George Achim, Revolte si consimtiri (Revolts and Consents), (Cluj-Napoca, Published by Dacia, 1995)
- Lucian Boia, Capcanele istoriei. Elita intelectuala Romaneasca intre 1930 si 1950 (The traps of history. The Romanian Intellectual Elite between 1930and 1950) (Bucuresti, Published by Humanitas, 2011).
- Ion Dumitrescu Borsa, Cal Troian intra muros (Trojan horse intra muros), (Bucuresti, Published by Lucman).
- Mircea Eliade, Profetism romanesc (Romanian Prophecy), vol I si II, (Bucuresti, Published by Roza Vanturilor, 1990)
- Mircea Eliade, Memorii (Memoires) (1937-1969), vol.II, (Bucuresti, Published by Humanitas,1991).
- Mircea Eliade, Textele „legionare" si despre „romanism" ("Legionnaire texts" and about Romanianism), (Cluj-Napoca, Published by Dacia, 2001).
- Alexandra Laigniel-Lavastine, Cioran, Eliade, Ionesco, Uitarea fascismului (Cioran, Eliade, Ionesco, Firgetting Fascism), (Published by Est, 2004).
- Armin Heinen, Legiunea Arhanghelului Mihail: o contributie la problema fascismului international (The Legion of Archangel Michael: a contribution to the international Fascism issue), (Bucuresti, Published by Humanitas, 2006).

[66] idem,pg. 2
[67] ibidem

- Marin Vasile, Crez de generatiei (Generation Beleif), (Bucuresti, Published by Majadahonda, 1996).
- Z. Ornea, Anii treizeci. Extrema dreapta romaneasca (The Thirties, Right-wing Romanian extreme), (Bucuresti, Published by Fundatia Culturala Romana, 1995).
- Francico-Veiga, *Istoria garzii de fier 1919-1941. Mistica ultranationalismului (The History of the Iron Guard 1919-1941. The mysticism of ultra-nationalism), (Bucuresti, Published by Humanitas, 1993).
- Leon Volovici, Ideologia nationalista si problema evreiasca in Romania anilor 30 (Nationalist Ideology and the Jewish issue in the'30s' Romania), (Bucuresti, Editura Humanitas, 1995).

PUBLIC PROJECTS BETWEEN NECESSITY AND IMPACT

EMILIA CORNELIA STOICA[1]
ANDREI CRISTIAN STOICA[2]

Abstract
The main objective of public projects is to purchase one or more social benefits, targeting communities in which public authorities responsible for implementing these projects were elected. Unlike public projects, the main purpose of the projects undertaken in the private sector consists of maximizing the profit obtained by increasing the activity and / or minimize costs. Therefore, in order to analyze in economic and social terms the impact of development projects it is required, together with analysis of common issues, highlighting the differences between public and private projects. In this sense, we see greater difficulties in evaluating public projects, which should aim at minimizing the costs - as well as private projects - also achieving significant benefits and correctly targeted to the needs of the population, meantime taking into account economic and social present situation. Cost – effectiveness analysis is more difficultly to do, as it involves to estimate some indicators, expressed in monetary units, defined by a series of mostly social meanings, such as the cost of life, the improvement living conditions benefits, etc. The choice of discount rate and project operating life involves higher risks than in the private sector, at least for large investment projects, given that these designs achieve highly valuable public assets, which have to operate a long time for the community benefit. Public authorities responsible for public projects must choose the most suitable variant of proposed projects according to the respective communities present and future priorities set, based on a thorough socio-economic analysis, highlighting the increasing usefulness for society by implementing the project and also taking into account its specific activity.

Keywords*: budgetary funds, grant, indicators, present value, public projects, ratio, social benefits*

Introduction

Classification of public projects

Public projects can be classified according to the nature of the domain wherw its will be implemented:

- social services development of any kind - health, public utilities etc. - designed to increase the quality of community life, without creating negative externalities;
- education and research and development that aimed increasing the level of education, training and professional skills, achievements in applied and / or fundamental scientific innovation etc.;
- protect and / or exploitation of the natural resources;
- security and civil protection by improving the activity of the army and police, judiciary system adaptation to cyclical demand and strategic imperatives, etc.;
- economic development of the geographic area to which it is addressed by creating conditions for implementation of leading industries in terms of value added (industrial engineering, quarrying and manufacturing, chemistry and petrochemistry, food, light, docks, etc.) or social utility (agriculture, forestry, fisheries, energy infrastructure, the IT etc.)

[1] Associate Professor Ph. D., Nicolae Titulescu University (email:liastoica@gmail.com)
[2] Ph. D., Ministry of Finance (email:andrei.cristian.stoica@gmail.com)

Content

2. Comparison of public projects versus private projects

As technical and economic approach, between public projects and the projects made by the private sector for its own purposes, there are, naturally, many common elements, but at the same time, exist many important aspects that distinguish them as follows:

- the main purpose of a private entrepreneur is to make a profit and for this it improves its endowment, creating new jobs, etc..

Public project mainly aims to provide essential public services to the community of the highest quality and in sufficient quantity;

- funding sources present significant differences. While private projects are financed from own resources (self-financing), the loans obtaind from the financial sector and grants for the project which proves that is eligible for these grants, public projects are financed primarily from budgetary allocations, which are public funds established by the redistribution of taxes and administrative charges. Also, like private projects, the public projects can obtain loans (repayable) and / or grants, if the conditions of eligibility are fulfilled;

- the life of the projects in the private sector, the overall average, is much shorter than of the public projects. Thus, public projects in areas such as transport and communications infrastructure, civil engineering, energy, etc.. are designed to operate for long periods and therefore must meet much higher technical conditions;

- whether for a private project divergent objectives are infrequent, usually a public project must find a solution to balance the interests of the public institution and those of community, generally those adjacent to which development and / or operation of the project can be an externality negative.

For example, building a dam to control water flow can adversely affect some land and public authority which is responsible and the project beneficiariy will have to compensate losses of the affected population;

- in the political impact of projects, those private is unsignificant - perhaps only in creating new jobs and, for this, public authorities, both local and the national need to provide an appropriate environment, while respecting the law of competition. Public projects produce, however, important political effects and, consequently, public authorities have to account for, on the one hand, the interests expressed by pressure groups and, on the other hand, for the conditioning imposed by natural environment, and also political, economic etc. interests of national and / or community society, temporary or medium term, but also for the financial constraints of the project;

- private projects determined as measure of effectiveness, the rate of return on invested capital, which, technically speaking, is relatively easy to do, but, for public projects, the evaluation of efficacy is very difficult to perform because you have to be taken into account a number of social issues that can not be precisely described by measurable indicators in physical or / and in monetary units. In response to these goals, scientists have developed various models of cost-benefit analysis, which approximates the specific indicators of economic and social aspects of life.

Evaluation difficulties

Evaluation difficulties in assessing the community benefits produced by public investment projects are caused by many aspects that have to be considered, such as, for example, the following, not limited to:

- identify all the beneficiaries and all gains and losses that that project can generate and also its monetary evalation;

- poor relationship that can be drawn between public projects and the communities in whose heritage get these projects;

-absence of both national and international standards to be used as a measure of effectiveness;

- public projects are subject to, in most cases, some legal and functional restrictions, for which, to overcome them, have to be undertaken costly actions (eg, expropriation, etc.);
- public funds that is necessary to be allocated to the project must be included in the beneficiary public authority budget and thus will be subject to political influence. In addition, the design and selection of investment projects are approved by the budget authorizing officers, who are leaders of public institutions dependent on government power applied policy;
- motivating the human resources that are involved in the achievement and implementation of development projects is ignored, in general;
- the discount rate used for the analysis and selection of public project, based on financial ratios, is difficult to calculate, given the uncertainties introduced by forecasting inflation, financial market interest rates and other macroeconomic indicators.

3. Eligibility analysis indicators of the public projects

Toor analyze and select the investment projects are built based indicators - in physical and / or monetary units - and financial indicators, which are calculated using updated methods that take into account the time value of money.

In the first category of indicators are found based indicators for all investment projects, regardless whether its are determined by public or private sector, as follows:

- total amount of capital invested;
- the period of the implementation of the investments;
- the operation period of the respective investment objective;
- specific investment;
- payback period;
- the coefficient of economic efficiency of investments;
- the equivalent or converted values of the investment expences;
- economic efficiency of investments;
- etc.

Among the financial indicators, the most relevant are related to:

- the net present value (NPV), which presents the financial profitability of the project, using the updated nominal values;
- recovery period (TR) needed to cover total costs generated by the project, under the update method;
- internal rate of return (IRR), as a measure of financial risk posed by the project.

All financial indicators are calculated taking into account the trend in the currency in which other indicators are expressed, a trend that is determined depending on the chosen discount rate to determine the eligibility of the project, which in turn is dependent on cost of capital that funds the project.

Forecasted cost of capital for a public project or public / private investment must take account of some features related to public sector involvement, as follows:

- if the project financing is ensured only by the taxes and public charges, the cost of capital - equivalent to a social discount rate - will be zero;
- when public funding is ensured by budgetary allocations coming exclusively from loans contracted by public authority, the cost will reflect the effective interest rate which it pays;
- it must take into account the opportunity cost (the greatest gain that could be obtained by using another version than that objective) charged by the investment of the private sector that pays taxes and administrative charges required;
- also, it will be considered the opportunity cost of public investment, due to the budgetary constraints it faces.

In the economic and administrative literature states that in the public investment projects, capital cost must be greater, at least than the effective rate of return of the government securities issued as long-term public borrowing.

The life of an investment project in the public sector is generally tens of years, for example for a hydro dam comes to 50 years. This feature makes it obligatory to take into account the residual value that will target investment after a relatively brief period, to analyze its feasibility.

The cost-benefit rate is a crucial indicator in a public investment project. As economic and financial analysis, a public project is no different than a private one, but it is necessary to bear in mind that it never does not seek profit making but obtain benefits for the population, these benefits beeng rarely in a monetary form, at least in a first approach. Hence, one of the major challenges facing the public projects is evaluation of monetary social benenefts for the local and / or collectivities, as a result of implementation of those projects.

In termes of this key indicator for selecting public investment projects, namely the cost-benefit, it can provide three objectives:

- maximize earnings due to a specific cost items;
- maximizing net benefits, when both costs and revenues vary;
-minimizing costs to achieve a given level of benefits. This latter method is known under the appellation of cost - effectiveness[3].

The cost-benefit indicator is defined as the ratio berween the net profit project created and costs, also net generated by the project. The net benefit is determined by deducting from the sum of all gains of the all losses incurred for the beneficiaries as a result of project implementation. Net costs, known as equivalent expenditure, covers all expenses implementation, and also operation of investment obioectivului.

Accordingly, to calculate this indicator, it is necessary to identify the benefits - of any kind: economic, financial, social, etc. - and to be assigned to each items a monetary value.

Also, it will be taken into account the wide variety of costs. They can be grouped into four categories:

- costs which is attributable to internal activity of the entitity that implements the project;
- costs caused by the external environment, regarding both the technical and technological features, and production and consumption of goods and services registered by operation of the respective investment objective;
- the market development and of the monetary indicators which characterize primarily inflation and reference interest rate;
- the expected changes as a result of project implementation, about supply and demand of goods and services of the community concerned, together with the indicators that express those authorities resources and relevant inputs in the area analyzed.

A very important aspect is to determine if the proposed project is an independent one or a mutually exclusive projects. Thus, when an independent project, the eligibility methodology involves several basic steps:

- identification the net benefits and quantification its monetary values;
- determining the costs of implementation;

[3] Efficiency = results / effort, where the result is the fruit of actions taken after consumption of various resources and effort are consumed resources (materials, people, time, money);

Effectiveness = the result / outcome of planned (desired).

Effectiveness without efficiency is beneficial because consume too many resources (especially time), even if eventually get the desired result. No effective only does not pay - remove nothing best result of the resources they have at hand if you get something closer to the desired result.

Sources: http://scri.ro/eficient-sau-eficace-1001.html

- calculating the present value of benefits and net costs using an appropriate discount rate. The acceptance of the project will be make according to the budget constraints, and if the report benefit / cost in terms of updating values, is higher, at least equal to unity.

If, to achieve an public investment objective - for example, implement a program of road infrastructure, a public authority may approve several independent projects, for the different sections of the road – it will be selected only those projects that presents a benefit / cost report greater than unity.

If, to achieve an public investment objective there are several projects that meet the eligibility requirements, but only one of these should be selected, the analyst must choose which among those predicts it will bring the greatest social benefits. This project is not necessarily one that presents the greatest benefit / cost, but the analyst must justify each marginal cost with a marginal benefit / cost report higher than unit. Also, the public authority responsible for the investment project may agree to pay an additional subsidy, under the condition to provide a benefit / cost ratio greater than 1, calculated on the basis of cost growth.

In case of the presentation of projects that exclude each other, after eliminating projects that would affect competition, it is calculated for all remaining competing projects the benefit / cost ratio, that must exceed the unit to be eligible. To select among the projects remaining, they are listed in order of increasing costs and it is calculated for each pair of projects – the project$_i$ to the project i-1 from the list, the report as follows:

$$\frac{Net\ Benefit_i - Net\ Benefit_{i-1}}{Net\ Cost_i - Net\ Cost_{i-1}} = \frac{\Delta B_{i/i-1}}{\Delta C_{i/i-1}}$$ selecting from each pair of projects the second, if the ratio is greater than unity or vice versa.

Incremental increased benefits and costs will always be the same ranking of the mutually exclusive projects, whether they are used to select the criteria such as net present value, internal rate of return or the recovery period to date.

Effectiveness analysis - cost pursues several aspects, taking into account both the benefits and costs can be accurately measured with difficulty and, consequently, their monetary expression is uncertain. For public investment projects to satisfy the conditionality on the effectiveness, benefits and costs must be considered net, i.e. the benefits will lower the nominal loss of benefits and investment costs will be deducted from any income that the operator may obtain from the project.

Difficulty in determining the correct ratio benefit / cost gains are to identify and / or additional costs. Thus, in some cases, an additional benefit may be added or dropped from the cost benefits, but this interpretation leads to a different value for the benefit / cost, although it produces no effect on the acceptance or refusal of a project.

Effectiveness - cost analysis

In some public projects, benefits and losses of benefits can be measured in monetary values with difficulty, directly or indirectly. Analysis must express the benefits and costs in terms of efficacy and the method benefit / cost is often identified with it.

In this respect, analysis of effectiveness - cost ratio must seek the fulfillment of conditions:

- analysis of benefits and costs must express in terms of effectiveness and benefit method - cost is often identified with it;
- effectiveness - cost analysis must meet several conditions:
- to identify targets, shown feasible by the studies presented;
- to provide more options that achieved the objectives specified by the contracting public authority requirements;
- to define the constraints related to the project, regarding the costs, the execution and operation project period, etc..

Effectiveness – cost analysis will be accomplished in several phases:

- defining objectives;
- diagnostic analysis which presents the strengths and weaknesses points of the area are going to implement the project;
- detailing possible options;
- establishing the scope of effectiveness and the discount rate for the monetary values;
- select one of the options, in accordance with:
- established efficacy, that project choice that best achieved the objectives at least cost;
- the determined cost, i.e. the present value or equivalent annual costs for a given level of effectiveness;
- determining the efficiency of each variant;
- graphical representation of yields;
- analysis of various options against the criteria established, which will eliminate the option / options that tend to dominate;
- perform a sensitivity analysis, which estimated outputs to inputs major changes;
- development of a synthesis of all previous analyzes and conclusions

4. Conclusions

In the countries with democratic political system it is stipulated by the Constitution, as general government, under powers granted by the national constitution, are obliged to justify public investment decisions, including budgetary costs arising from these decisions.

Projects of a public nature are different from those performed solely for the private sector in that the entities responsible - whether central or local public institutions, financed wholly or partly of budget allocations, etc. - are forced to consider methods of funding; lack of obligation to pay corporate tax; political and social factors; etc.

Evaluation criteria and implicitly, by selecting public investment projects are currently affected in a decisive manner, by the results of the analysis of benefits - cost that used update information entry.

Also, responsible public authorities are considerably based on the benefit – cost method, because it takes into account, along with monetary benefits, also non-monetary ones - allowing a better understanding of the value added by labor, i.e. labor productivity.

It is important too to note that the benefit - cost report produces a relevant information relating to the importance of public investment priorities for the project, only if it is able to specify and to define in terms of budget impact of that project, given the budgetary constraints it is forced to cope. In this respect, if the submitted projects are independent, they will be subject, first of all, to a threshold of acceptability, only then will have to be within the limitations imposed by the responsible funding.

References:

- * * * A users' guide to measuring public administration performance, United Nations Development Programme, Oslo Governance Centre, Norway, 2009
- * * * Prospective Evaluation Methods, United States General Accounting Office, GAO Program Evaluation and Methodology, Division, 1990

RIGHT TO FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION ANALYSIS OF THE ANGLE OF PRACTICE EUROPEAN COURT OF HUMAN RIGHTS

GEORGETA MODIGA[1]

Abstract

European Court affirms the idea that democracy is not about majority rule opinion, but also implies a respect for minorities, tolerance of isolated events or eccentric approach requiring individual-community relationship from a liberal perspective. Meanwhile, the European Court's view, freedom of expression serves a dual goal: that of the fulfilment of each individual, thus representing an aspect of the general principle of individual autonomy in relation to society, at the same time, freedom of expression has a significant function instrumental, providing an extremely useful tool to ensure proper functioning of an open and pluralistic societies, and particularly a representative democracy. As will be seen in the paper, this second explanation seems to weigh heavier, causing it increased protection that the Strasbourg court to release a discussion of issues that are of public interest.

Objectives approach refers to the extremely wide range of manifestations of law, including material and technical means used for its exercise, analysis of forms of limitations on freedom of expression, whether measures which restrict freedom of expression, margins of discretion available national authorities to restrict freedom of expression that has a variable extent depending on the message content of the right holder and the value of the state a legitimate claim to justify the need for interference.

Keywords: freedom of expression, forms of expression, restricting freedom of expression.

Introduction

Freedom of expression is one of the oldest and most important freedoms, is known under this name or under the names of its aspects: freedom of speech and press freedom. Freedom exists only if it is not limited, but the lack of restrictions is not sufficient, freedom must also have a positive content to be supported by the values embodied in action. If freedom of expression necessary for someone to listen, to have dialogue and consequences of dialogue: normal and moderate consequences, but both necessary and predictable. Otherwise, freedom of expression can lead to no dialogue, but to chaos. The link between words and reality can be seen, for example, well into the civil society, nongovernmental organizations.

Developed in the Council of Europe signed in Rome on 4 November 1950, Convention on Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms (known as simplified by the European Convention on Human Rights) has gradually become one of the most effective instruments of defence human rights worldwide.

She is such a tool for two main reasons: on the one hand, place the law of the Member States which have ratified the Convention (currently forty-five, forty-six soon), a place that explains the profound influence exerted the Convention on legislation, jurisprudence and practice of these states, and, on the other hand, the fact that unlike other international instruments of human rights, European Convention on Human Rights has its own supranational judicial mechanism, which requires Parties High contracting and ensures an effective, compliance with the proclaimed rights.

Of course, this system of human rights is not universal, but European. It is also true that it only covers the rights and freedoms which are essentially oriented individual rights, civil and political rights of man, excluding a few exceptions, economic and social rights (which are guaranteed by other tools such as the European Social Charter). However, the two limits mentioned above, the geographical and material does not diminish the special legal and political importance of the European Convention on Human Rights.

[1] Associate Professor Ph. D., "Danubius" University, Galati (email: georgeta.modiga@yahoo.com).

This is why the Convention is vital to know at present: it may be invoked before the national courts must apply the ultimate control of the European Court of Human Rights, which occurs not as a judge of the third or the fourth court, but a European supervisory body. The Convention is therefore founded on the principle of subsidiary, better known in general public international law.

The exercise of these freedoms, since it carries with it duties and responsibilities, may be subject to such formalities, conditions, restrictions or penalties as are prescribed by law and are necessary in a democratic society, national security, territorial integrity or public safety, prevention of disorder or crime protection of health or morals, protection of the reputation or rights of others to disclosure of confidential information contravenes or for maintaining the authority and impartiality of the judiciary".

Content

Freedom of expression, Article 10 devices, has a special place among the Convention rights. Indeed, it sits right at the notion of "democratic" system of values that summarizes the Convention is built. The particular importance of Article 10 was highlighted by the Court for the first time because Handyside v. United Kingdom (1979), the idea being constant in all cases and then resumed later. Thus, "freedom of expression constitutes one of the essential foundations of a democratic society, one of the essential conditions of progress and individual fulfilment and its members. Subject to paragraph 2 of Article 10, it covers not only" information "or" ideas " that are received favourably or considered inoffensive or indifferent, but also those that offend, shock or disturb the State or a segment of the population.

These are the demands of pluralism, tolerance and broadmindedness without which there is no "democratic society". European Court affirms the proposition that democracy is not confined to rule the majority, but also implies a respect for minorities, tolerance of isolated events or eccentric approach requiring individual-community relationship from a liberal perspective. Meanwhile, the European Court's view, freedom of expression serves a dual goal: that of the fulfilment of each individual, thus representing an aspect of the general principle of individual autonomy in relation to society, at the same time, freedom of expression has a significant function instrumental, providing an extremely useful tool to ensure proper functioning of an open and pluralistic societies, and particularly a representative democracy.

As we will see below, this second explanation seems to weigh heavier, causing it increased protection that the Strasbourg court to release a discussion of issues that present a public right guaranteed by Article 10 but not absolute. Paragraph 2 allows restricting its exercise if the use of freedom of speech is directed against certain values, which the state can legitimately defend, or even against democracy itself. Restrictions on freedom of expression will be controlled by the European Court but by applying a series of principles of interpretation of Article 10 of the Convention in the jurisprudence crystallized on them. Although the Strasbourg bodies (Commission and Court) have not always followed in the present case solutions approach announced in favour of freedom of expression because Handyside, is sometimes criticized the doctrine of specialty for this prominent role of freedom of speech was constantly said at least in principle, he must guide any analysis of any restraint of that freedom.

The main feature of the way defined by the Commission and Court on freedom of expression, in terms of Article 10, is their tendency to include within the scope of paragraph 1 an area of extremely large expressions of law, including means and technical materials used for its exercise. Basically, the Strasbourg organs very easily accept framing the scope of paragraph 1 and will differentiate the legitimate forms of expression that the state is able to suppress on the basis of the restrictions mentioned in paragraph 2 (restrictions must be provided by law internal, pursue a legitimate aim exhaustively listed in paragraph 2 and to be necessary in a democratic society to achieve those goals).

Right protected by Article 10 includes, in the words of the ECHR, "freedom of opinion and freedom to receive and impart information and ideas without interference by public authority and regardless of frontiers".

It should be noted that were considered interference in exercising that freedom very different situations such as punishment of journalists for various statements published in newspapers or television shows made during the refusal of the authorities to distribute a certain magazine in military barracks, detention of persons protesters handing out leaflets during a parade or a conference on military topics, a person denied access to confidential information concerning them held by authorities, confiscation by the authorities of the paintings of an artist shown at an exhibition, a film broadcast ban the dismissal of a teacher because of his political activities in the German Communist Party, unable to create investor-owned radio or television because of state-owned monopoly in this area, denying access to the country of a foreign political leader to prevent to attend a meeting that had been invited, and others.

In the case Groppera Radio AG v Switzerland (1990), that the decision by Swiss authorities to prohibit the broadcasting company applicant to resubmit cable broadcasts issued in Italy, the government argued that Article 10 does not cover broadcasting of programs whose content, especially popular music and advertising, does not fit the notion of "information and ideas".

The Court rejected this argument and stated that Article 10 (1) is applicable and should not make any distinction based on the content of programs.

Freedom of expression occur all categories of objective, pluralist and all original creations and ideas, in any form, media or their purpose. Since she has not only mass media but also all citizens and creators of scientific, literary or artistic. Included within the scope of protection of Article 10 so words, images, sounds transmitted through printed media, the radio, television, film, etc.. Although there is still no jurisprudence in this respect, it is clear that electronic information broadcast over the Internet will be covered by Article 10.

As shown, the scope of the liberty protected by the Convention is very broad, including all forms of artistic discourse, shopping or on public issues. Of course, given the effective protection of Article 10 varies in the sense that the legitimacy of state interferences in exercising freedom of expression will be evaluated according to different value which the Court granted different messages sent by the right holders. For example, as we shall see below, forms of advertising included in the commercial speech will have a much lower protection to political speech. Important to note however that these differences are made on the land of paragraph 2 of Article 10, which obliges the state to comply in all cases rather strict conditions imposed by it.

Paragraph 2 of Article 10 allows the state to provide limitations of forms of freedom of expression provided it complies with the requirements of the Convention impose for their validity. Once established the applicability of Article 10, after it was found that there was a applicant's right to freedom of expression, the Court said that state limitations on this right is contracting Convention if fulfils the three cumulative conditions listed in paragraphed 2: to be provided by law, to at least one of the legitimate aims specified in the Convention and be necessary in a democratic society to achieve that goal. When there is failure of one of these conditions, the Court will find no violation of the Convention to pursue his other.

Interference with freedom of expression must be based on existing legislative provision in law. Of the Strasbourg jurisprudence has established that must be understood by the term "law" will be one of the so-called "autonomous concepts" whose content differs from that which could be the law of different States Parties to Convention.

Thus, the "law" means the legislative act of general normative value emanating from legislative power and a lower norm with legal force of law in the formal sense. It covered the concept of "law" under the Convention including case law, and this applies not only to countries that have a legal system of "common law".

Especially in the latter case, the Strasbourg organs have held that the "law" under the Convention can understand both the written and unwritten law. Also, because Autronic v. Switzerland (1990) were considered as "law" under the Convention and rules chair belonging to international law.

Important is that the law which provides an interference with freedom of expression must meet two basic conditions: the availability and predictability. In their absence, found by the Strasbourg Court, Article 10 will be violated even if the interference is provided by law in force in the domestic legal order, emanating from Parliament.

European Court had the opportunity, if the Sunday Times v. the United Kingdom (1979), to affirm the basic principles which define notions of accessibility and foresee ability of the law. Thus, "it is mainly the" law "to be sufficiently accessible; citizens must have sufficient information, considering the circumstances, in connection with legal rules applicable in a given case. Second, there can be considered "law" than the norm formulated with sufficient precision to enable citizens to adjust their conduct to legal requirements, using competent advice if necessary, he must be able to provide a reasonable degree of accuracy taking into account the circumstances, the consequences that may result from an act committed by him caused.

These consequences need not be foreseeable with absolute certainty, this experience proves impossible. In fact, although certainty is desirable, sometimes it causes excessive rigidity, or the law should not be able to adapt to changes in situation. Thus, inevitably many laws using formulas more or less vague, the interpretation and application depend on practice.

The ambiguity of existing laws can be compensated by the law of the state in a consistent judicial practice, allowing achievement of the desired condition that affects freedom of expression as are prescribed by law, and thus remove the arbitrary and avoid granting a discretionary state authorities. There are areas which by nature does not allow a perfectly rigorous regulations, so that is inherent in the existence of texts with a more general law. Court accepted that in terms of, for example, defends moral or legal rules governing the field of unfair competition, the situation in which repression by these plaintiffs could be provided due to existing case law in that area.

If Steel and Others v. R.U. (1998), the European Court suggested that the mere provision in domestic law is not a sufficient, is necessary and compliance with the Convention.

After finding that interference with the freedom of expression was prescribed by law, the European Court check it following a legitimate exhaustively listed in paragraph 2 of Article 10. In this regard, it should be noted that European courts are not satisfied to accept the existence of alleged legitimate state purpose, but done themselves an assessment will be identified after which one of the objectives listed in paragraph 2 that is most relevant in the circumstances.

When you check the condition of the pursuit of a legitimate purpose is fulfilled, the European Court to take into account that inspired interference emanating from authorities at the time of its establishment, and not to the respondent State could reconstruct it later to justify As the proceedings in Strasbourg.

Possible and be retained in the same case several legitimate reasons to justify state action. For example, if Barfod v. Denmark (1989) in which a journalist was sentenced for two judges accused of lack of impartiality in the way they solved a tax dispute, the court held as legitimate in terms of paragraph 2 "the reputation of judges" and indirectly "safeguard the authority of the judiciary".

This is the most important requirement that the state must meet when they restrict freedom of expression of individuals. Strasbourg bodies have established a number of principles concerning the interpretation of this notion, because it is often decisive for establishing conclusions or violation of the Convention. Analysis need measures that affect freedom of expression, to bring to conclusion Convention compatibility with the need to highlight that it answered a "pressing social need" that caused its adoption. Also, the measure must be proportionate to the legitimate aim pursued and the reasons given to justify national authorities must be relevant and sufficient.

Conclusions

European Court rejected the argument states that have held that the requirement of necessity in a democratic society is satisfied when the state demonstrates that it acted reasonably, carefully and in good faith. Stressing the critical importance of which should enjoy freedom of expression, the Court insisted that aspire need for restrictions must be convincingly established.

It is true that a national authority is primarily the task of implementing the Convention. They are actually placed in a more favourable position than the European courts to assess the appropriateness of certain measures that restrict freedom of expression. Accordingly the European Court has recognized discretion in this area. However important to note is that this discretion is limited. It is subject to European control and named on the final state in need of law and its enforcement decisions. Therefore, the European Court is competent to ultimately determine whether a certain extent the guarantees established by art. 10 of the Convention.

Is important to note that concrete appreciation of the necessity of the restriction is made on a case by case basis, taking into account all the circumstances of the case. Therefore, the Court concludes often determined by specific issues that case, although it is possible to extract some general principles to allow anticipation attitude Court in subsequent cases, leading to the establishment of European standards that states party to the Convention must accept as minimum obligations on freedom of expression.

Margin of discretion available to national authorities to restrict freedom of expression is variable but a stretch, according to the owner of the message content, and legitimate value that the state invoke to justify the need for interference. In consequence, the protection of the convention also varies accordingly.

As we have already stated, the Court need to protect freedom of expression based primarily on the value which it represents as a means to ensure proper functioning of a democratic society. Hence the privileged position given to the free discussion of matters of general interest, and in particular press freedom when it conflicts with other values that the state can legitimately defend. Therefore, when the objective is formed infringement complaint in Strasbourg freedom speech "political" understood in its broadest sense, the discretion of national authorities is very low.

Conversely, if the right claimed by claiming concerns a speech whose content had a predominantly commercial, so transmission of information and ideas of general interest, but purely economic interests of individual discretion is much broader. In this case the Strasbourg Court is in a lesser extent willing to substitute its own assessment on the need for restriction of the state authorities. It can also argue that discretion exists for distinct artistic discourse. Once qualified as a speech that bears on issues of general interest, the discretion given to states to restrict also vary according to the legitimate aim pursued and the extent to which we can speak of an "objective definition" of it to European scale. The Court recognized that the notion of "moral" is not seen uniformly in Europe, it vary greatly from country to country depending on the specific realities of each. Therefore, national authorities decide how to protect will be subject to less stringent than the European courts, for example, the notion of "authority of the judiciary", which can be observed if more consistent in concerning Justice and states party to the Convention.

Also, because Sürek v. Turkey (1999), the Court held that when the claims in dispute, even if they concern a matter of public interest, encourage the use of violence against an individual, a representative of the State or part of population (thus affecting national security or public order), the discretion is larger than, for example, if critical discourse directed against a politician.

It must however be stated that the idea that a certain measure was considered by the Court not to violate the Convention because authorities had acted within their margin of appreciation does not necessarily mean that is basically foreign speech protection area established by Article 10, but only that, given the circumstances prevailing at that time in that State authorities have been able to legitimately use discretion to determine whether the ban. However, it should be remembered that Article 10 of the Convention requires Member States accepted minimum standards on freedom of expression, not prevent them, according to Article 53 of the Convention, to grant individual rights law toward the increased protection provided by law of the Strasbourg jurisprudence. Thus in Handy side v. United Kingdom (1979), the Court has agreed not to violate the Convention by the British authorities ban a book on sex education to school-age children, ban motivated by moral considerations, though the same book circulating freely in other European countries.

We discussed until now how is established in the abstract extent of the discretion, depending on the nature and value of protected speech by suppressing it. To resolve the issue but a concrete, consider the European Court and other elements related to the specific example of a quality that can discourse author (journalist, member of the opposition politician, soldier, civil servant, etc.) Or injured person (politician, civil servant, judge, private person, etc..) and the means by which the broadcast message (print, television, public exhibitions, film projections, etc.) also plays an important role and specific circumstances dissemination of the disputed speech, such as, for example, that children's access was restricted material considered pornographic or not.

Last but not least, the nature and severity of the penalty for playing a key role in determining the proportionality of the legitimate aim pursued. The penalty is more serious effects on the plaintiff, the more the state will have to prove the existence of proportionality between the bond and the legitimate aim pursued.

If the sanction imposed has the effect of restricting freedom of speech more than necessary, and forms of expression affecting not threaten legitimate values apparatus, the Strasbourg organs will find a violation. Thus, the general prohibition and perpetual right to publish a person as a result of criminal conviction for collaboration with the Nazis was considered by the European Commission of Human Rights as violating Article 10 as rigid and permanently affect the individual's right to express other than political issues (causes of Becker v. Belgium, 1962).

Also, where information on the state claims it is entitled to suppress public opinion is already available from other sources, they ban can be justified in terms of the Strasbourg Court. This happened, for example, because the Observer & Guardini v United Kingdom (1991), which concerned the publication ban by the authorities by the applicant newspapers published extracts from the book by a former British Intelligence officer that contained information that was considered that, could affect national security. Since the book was published in the United States and could be readily made in the UK, the Court held that the rationale of the prohibition has ceased to exist.

Although criminal sanctions, especially those involving deprivation of liberty, are those that draw their need for strict control by the Strasbourg court because of special severity, and civil penalties can sometimes lead to exorbitant duties to plaintiffs, as happened in Because Tolstoy Miloslavsky v. the United Kingdom 1995, the applicant was convicted of libel to pay huge sums of money (1.5 million pounds).

References:

- Bercis, P., – Guide des droits de l'homme, Ed. Hachette Education, Paris, 1993;
- Berger,V. - Jurisprudența Curții Europene a Drepturilor Omului, IRDO, Bucureşti, 2005;
- Birsan, C. - Convenția Europeană a Drepturilor Omului, Drepturi şi libertați vol I, II, Ed.All Beck, Bucureşti, 2005;
- Birsan, C. - Convenția Europeană a Drepturilor Omului, Procedura în fața Curții.Executarea hotărârilor vol II, Ed.C.H. Beck, Bucureşti,2006;
- Buergenthal,T.; Weber, R. - Dreptul internațional al drepturilor omului, Ed.All Educational, Bucureşti,1996;
- Burban, J.-L. - Le Conseil de l'Europe, ed.II, P.U.F., Paris,1993;
- Dincă, R. – Cereri în fața C.E.D.O. Condiții de admisibilitate, Ed. All Beck, Bucureşti, 2001;
- Duculescu,V. - Protecția juridică a drepturilor omului, Ed. Lumina Lex, Bucureşti,1998;

- Gomien, D. – Introducere în Convenţia Europeană a Drepturilor Omului, IRDO, Bucureşti,1993;
- Macovei, M. (ed) - Hotărâri ale Curţii Europene a Drepturilor Omului, vol.1, 2 şi 3, Ed. Polirom, Iaşi, 2000, 2001,2003;
- Maior, G.C.. - Concepte de drept public european, Ed. Enciclopedica, Bucureşti, 1997;
- Micu, D. - Garantarea drepturilor omului în practica Curţii Europene a Drepturilor Omului şi în Constituţia României, Ed.All Beck, Bucureşti,1998;
- Moroianu Zlătescu, I. şi alţii (coord.) - Principalele instrumente internaţionale privind drepturile omului la care România este parte, instrumente universale şi regionale, vol. I şi II, IRDO, Bucureşti, 2004;
- Popescu, C.-L.- Protecţia internaţională a drepturilor omului, Ed. All Beck, Bucureşti, 2001;
- Popescu, C.-L. – Libertatea de exprimare în jurisprudenţa Curţii Europene a Drepturilor Omului (1999-2002), Ed. All Beck Bucuresti 2003;
- Selejan-Guţan, B. – Protecţia europeană a drepturilor omului, Ed. All Beck, Bucureşti, 2004;
- Rial, St. – Declaraţia drepturilor omului şi ale cetăţeanului, Ed. Polirom, Bucureşti, 2002;
- Robertson, A.H. şi Merrils, J.G. – Human Righs în the World, Ed. Manchester University Press, Manchester,1992;
- Sudre, Fr. – Drept internaţional şi european al drepturilor omului, Ed. Polirom, Iaşi, 2006;
- Voican, M, Burdescu, R, Mocuţa, Gh. – Curţi internaţionale de justiţie, Ed. All Beck, Bucureşti, 2000;
- Voicu, M. - Ultima speranţă pentru o justiţie deplină - CEDO, Editura Juridica, Bucureşti, 2001;
- Agentia de Monitorizare a Presei – Jurisprudenta europeană privind libertatea de exprimare, 2001.
-
- www.coe.int (European Council)
- www.echr.int (European Human Rights Court)

IMPACT OF THE REFORM PROCESS OF THE PUBLIC ADMINISTRATION ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL DEVELOPMENT OF ROMANIA

GEORGETA MODIGA[1]

Abstract

Romanian society is in a continuous process of change in which all the economic, social, political, civic saw a new dynamic in trying to adapt to specific conditions of the phenomenon of Europeanization (full member of the European Union).

The changing of Romanian society requires the public administration reform to be analyzed and disseminated on the following levels: strategic - by which to redefine the role of the state clearly, legally - using larger framework laws, organizational - administrative and fiscal decentralization, cultural - following a change of values and modes of action of public officials, non governmental organizations, the citizen / customer of public service.

The term administrative reform is trivial, repetitive and recurrent nets into change, public administration reform is invited to constantly readjust the organization and the action and to clearly state objectives, called sometimes the brakes released, blockages to overcome obstacles of the past which is manifested by the upward trend of the society.

Public administration is criticized especially by the public and less by governments in office. Almost general belief is that the administration functions poorly, fulfil its mission in an unsatisfactory manner, but nevertheless has an impact too on community life, economy and society.

This paper aims to identify the type of problems that other countries have had to solve and the need hierarchy and management combined in a single system. Understanding the types of problems encountered and they do other countries in this process will shorten the learning cycle for Romania.

The objectives of this approach is that the critical analysis of the relationship between public administration reform and administrative capacity based on the literature, outlining the operational model to assess the reform process in our country, the study of democratization (the stage of democratization) of public administration modernization strategy approach administrative system.

Keywords: public administration reform, administrative system, administrative decentralization, public service.

Introduction

The overall objective is to analyze the impact of public administration reform process on economic and social development and reducing disparities between regions for economic development, and examining the case of Romania the correlation that exists between public administration reform and improving administrative capacity. To fulfil this objective, provided that activity to develop a synthesis report on the description of public administration reform and administrative capacity based on literature

Scientific approach to research is focused on the following approach, detailed in this study:

- Analysis of specificity in relation to public organizations and private;

-Critical analysis of the relationship between reform and administrative capacity discussed in the literature;

- Evaluation of Romania's administrative capacity in the context of the Lisbon Strategy;

-Report-administrative reform administrative capacity in the context of decentralization and regional development in Romania.

[1] Associated Professor Ph. D., "Danubius" University, Galati (email:georgeta.modiga@yahoo.com).

We believe that development of research on this subject, can not be achieved without emphasizing the specificity of public administration, the system works after a series of principles ("after his own order"), but is influenced by certain developments in society that is integrated. As a tool for action financed by public funds and means by which the State exercises its own functions in the administrative system, decisions are made depending on the particular set of public authorities and not by impersonal market forces.

At the same time, these priorities can be supported by a monopoly state action, on the legitimate use of force and coercion. Although public administration, in a sense identified with the bureaucracy, is subordinated to political power and ideology default party (coalition) learned to lead a company in the world, the 80 showed an unprecedented increase in the role of bureaucracy in economic life social. "Four institutions: this economy, voters, government and bureaucracy forms a closed circle of interaction between politics and economics. Voters assess his performance and economy express satisfaction or dissatisfaction with the ruling party. On the other hand, government and bureaucracy (public administration nn) set economic policy instruments that affect the economy and how to use them."

Content

A Japanese expert (Micho MURAMATSU) stated in 1982 that, bureaucracy and bureaucrats have become political actors. Bureaucratic power has greatly increased, exerting a major influence in the political systems of industrialized countries, especially in the sphere of decision.

Most programs are influenced by government bureaucrats, they are involved in the legislative process and having control over information. They are consulted in all phases of decision making and are members of various boards.

I plan doctrine, global analysis the question of similarities and differences between public administration and private administration. In this respect were two theses, namely:

- Public administration differs from private administrations;

-Public administration resembles private administrations.

First sentence, with classic character, protects the specific nature of public administration, because it works in general service, is a unit of action of political power and so can not be confused with privately.

This sentence was pushed to the extreme, the French administration, which made a distinction between public administrations and white issue private. State governments have a monopoly on the management functions considered public in nature. Unlike other services are private in nature and even if they provide the state, this is only occasionally, inadvertently, and the state does not take individual private activities is required and if so, must do to satisfy the public interest, public.

However, public administration and political power emanates from the benefit of reserved power of rulers. Thus, it acquires particular powers and privileges, causing her to become one-sided interests, namely: power of unilateral action and unilateral implementation of administrative contracts.

Such an imbalance occurs deep gulf justified interest exists between private and public sectors. There is danger that the administration to act in his behalf and therefore require the establishment of specific legal rules to which they are subject to public office. This legal framework should include privileges, and constraints of public administration workers, staff in the private unknown. Tie between public and private is performed according to the task that meets the general interest in their employees, and to make public services can not be treated as private activity, can not be privatized.

However, reality has shown that many of the activities considered by excellent public (education, health, management) have become more efficient through appropriate privatization.

Privatization of public services was, in fact, the generator element of the two concepts, argument that the state identify with private businesses. In this perspective, public administration is nothing more than a company whose organizational structures are identical to those belonging to private institutions. Such a view particularly triumph in U.S. and is justified even by doctrinal guidelines, according to which public-private process of assimilation is subject to democratic imperatives.

Thus, if you want individual rights and freedoms and administrative autonomy is necessary for public services and their appropriate agencies be subject to common law rules. Thus, public administration must carry out their duties, the same quality standards as a private institution.

Near public administrative system is based on private reasons of efficient public sector activities. Rules belonging to private management, and must be applied to public services. Concerns of cost reduction and efficiency enhancement must enter and the public sector. These requirements lead to the identification of public administration and private administrations refusal to delineate public function, the rest of the labour market.

Derogation of common law rules and legislation creating a specific lack of initiative and encouraged the adoption of a passive attitude in public administration.

Often, discussions about reform of public administration in Romania give rise to confusion regarding the meaning of this phrase. Specifically, the reform means more than improving administrative capacity. In short, the answer is that they are two different concepts about public sector organization. However, they are functionally related.

Public administration reform is a broad concept that includes all aspects of organizing the public sector, including the remark: "architecture" general ministries and agencies, organizations and local institutions, systems, structures, processes, motivations, and how their surveillance and periodic adjustment of the system.

On the one hand, administration refers to the way it is formally authorized, ordered and organized coordination of public sector activities and on the other hand, administrative capacity is an assessment of the function of the hierarchical structure of public service personnel, and thus only one of the public administration reform.

However, administrative capacity is essential for reform and for the rule, but as we have shown, is only part of the complex vision of itself can not provide the results expected from a modern administration.

In fact, simply increasing the administrative capacity may be an impediment to getting results, because it depends partly on how it is organized and conducted, and how the staffing and their behaviour on the completion of their duties.

To support the transformation of public administration in accordance with the requirements of the reform process in this area requires a coherent set of measures to be taken in a well defined period in the civil service, which aims to create a professional corps of officers public, stable and politically neutral, in local government by continuing the decentralization/deconcentration of public services and the central public administration by improving policy formulation process.

Administrative hierarchy to combine classical and modern management, creative and results-oriented organization into a unified public sector must change the "architecture" of the overall system, various forms of public sector contract work, roles and functions of agencies, re- systems and internal decision-making processes, modes and levels of participation and inclusion in decision making and policy implementation, targeting systems, performance measurement, resource allocation, accountability, supervision and control, etc..

Public administration reform includes all aspects of state organization and each of them should be checked, tested and, if necessary, adjusted to obtain the best combination of hierarchical structure and administrative capacity and effective management effectiveness and ability to get results and performance . However, management is a key issue, represents a test case and cover all other aspects as potentially change the entire state and, in a competitive world, countries should follow the global trend as quickly as not to leave the competition.

To support a consistent and coherent reform process in the system, believe is necessary to have a stable network to promote the change process made up of the main actors. In practice, the network can begin their work of reform by trying to develop management capacity, and to find solution for inserting these capacities in existing hierarchies of the state. Step by step, the process identifies the type of problems that other countries have had to deal with each stage and will become the new concerns of public administration reform. In this way, reform will develop in time; the need combined animated hierarchy and management in a single system. Understanding the types of problems encountered and they do other countries in this process will shorten the learning cycle for Romania.

Because of global changes due to globalization and increasing interdependence between states, the traditional model of public administration was seen surpassed, unable to make good relationship between government and bureaucracy. One criticism of the traditional model was the relationship between bureaucracy and political leadership. In theory, the model assumed separation between those who give orders and those who execute. The managerial model, the main feature is that managers are responsible for its performance.

The relationship between politician and manager is more fluid and closer than before. In other words, we deal with an unrealistic formula relationship between politician and manager, but with an interaction. Perhaps one of the major qualities of a public manager is to be a bureaucratic politician, to be able to interact with politicians and outside in a way that is beneficial both for him and for the organization.

In this process, civil servants working with politicians who finally last word, but impractical separation of administration decision-making was finally eliminated. Since the 80s a vigorous public management reform movement arose and spread virtually worldwide. This reform aimed at redefining the role of the state and its relationship with citizens.

The motivation for reform was different from state to state. It comes several possible causes:

1. Lack of trust of citizens in the administration. Met in the U.S. and many Western European countries, facing a drop in confidence in government institutions. As a result they developed a severe anti-bureaucratic rhetoric and criticism of the government apparatus and the size of the state level;

2. Ideology. There and ideological dimension of the transition to reform in some Western countries, marked by the election of conservative leaders like Margaret Thatcher, Ronald Reagan and Brian Mulroney;

3. Democratization. In the fall of communism in Eastern European countries led to a profound political reform, accompanied by reform of public administration;

4. Joining the European Union. Reforms in ex-communist countries were generally followed by a second wave of reforms related to EU integration. and in other European countries to EU membership and its mechanisms have led to reforms in public services;

5. Developing. In less developed countries economic development has been and is priority number one. Under the influence of credit institutions like World Bank or International Monetary Fund, which promotes reform as a prerequisite for development, innovative ideas were spread;

6. Economic crises. Inadequate response to crises often lead states to reform. We mention the failure of the State of Western countries to manage the crisis of the 70s, Latin America repeated crises of the '90s, the economic downturn in Eastern Europe after the collapse of communism.

It can be seen that the onset of reforms have driven many causes, that in many cases there were external factors that favoured reforms (credit institutions, the European Union, etc.), public opinion and political system have come to doubt the ability of administration crisis management past or future challenges.

The word "modernize" used increasingly often in the literature, may mean, firstly, to update, try the recovery of late, moving from a state organization, characterized by inertia, one full of dynamism , adapted to an environment found in rapid transformation. The upgrade also means adapting to modernity, to adopt modern behaviours, considered innovative in relation to the previous ones.

The question is whether we should change everything through a "reengineering" total public organization. This is not realistic or relevant ... In fact, if we look in terms of responsible public establishments, such upheaval makes sense in the medium and short primarily because their concerns have in mind primarily functioning in the best conditions possible organizations them, and not "flipping and restore the world" every morning.

Of course, sometimes there are radical changes, mainly related to policy options regarding the structure, responsibilities or activities that come to seriously put into question certain ways of acting.

This does not mean that change and modernization of public bodies are inevitably dependent on these moments of rupture. Need to modernize public service come from the fact that, currently, they are subject to increasingly more competitive, and some of their results are open to criticism.

Competition grows with choice owed liberalization that took place in the public sector. As a result, public services must position themselves against competitors and to obtain the adherence of which it is addressed and may be: citizens, users and customers.

Public service, competition operates between:

-Public interest and private interest as public interest is evident even when backed by legal and financial support and is not necessarily applied.

-Between budgets of different ministries and departments when budget negotiations take place. Always question whether priority should be given education, road maintenance, health, justice, army etc., If you must pay more money to invest, or pay for education;

-The different ways in practice, public or private, public missions.

-The different benefits of public services themselves.

Among others, the competition was determined by a series of mutations that emerged in the early 90s in the environment that acts of public organizations, of which the most important are:

- Failure of planned economy countries in providing welfare;

- Globalization of the economy has forced companies; even public ones face the increased efficacy or disappear;

- Currents of thought ultraliberal taking important worldwide and which were translated by condoning systematic critical market and administration;

- Low economic growth has led companies to seek new markets and to not hesitate to take actions that traditionally belonged to the civil service (vocational training, radio, television, telephone, health, etc..)

-Limitation of available public resources;

- Developing exchanges that changed size markets, that once were only regional and national and now became European and even world;

-National and European deregulation reduced protectionist barriers and monopolies;

- Reduction of natural monopolies due to technological developments;

- Transfer of power from national to the local authorities;

-Development of power consumers and producers;

- Information and education to allow a better knowledge and appreciation of the offers available;

-Democracy which allows expression of a greater number of expectations.

These mutations of the external environment of public service must add their criticism results as:

-Weaknesses strategy and management of public organizations;

-Bad initial materialization of social intentions.

Since the 70s, especially Anglo-Saxon economists and sociologists have questioned the public intervention.

- First, they believed that public organizations are not incited to reduce the permanent and full, all production costs.

- Second, the rigidity of public services created Organizational inhibit their adaptation to a world of increasingly complex. Their status as one of their employees, was designed to protect people against the corruption of elites and the advantages it could obtain a social group over another. However sometimes became an obstacle to change.

- In addition, precariousness of employment has a majority of employees in the private sector emphasized the gulf which separates the officers, whose jobs are secured and increased demands that they have to public service employees.

- As noted, public service is in the core of the welfare state. Times, concerned social intentions in these projects were not always materialized and are subject to much debate today, and the conception of social justice that should take.

Equal Republican motto is inscribed in the constitutive principle of citizenship in a democracy.

It guarantees the right to an identical treatment of all people, to be provided by formal rules. In this vision is still very much based procedures and action of the French model of public services, like those in our country. Either this formal equality is deeply criticized the actual results obtained, advancing the following arguments:

- The principle causes that reduce bureaucratic functioning civil responsibility, favouring routine and ultimately lead to unmet user needs.

- Trying to ensure equal treatment throughout the territory, the principle means of public service to be based on the local environment to improve service.

- The ultimate criticism stems from the fact that equal rights does not lead to its democratic goals. This school has maintained the myth of democratization of knowledge and equality of opportunity, while all studies have shown that the origin family are crucial for explaining educational success.

The question is if you have to replace the concept of equality with equity. Egalitarian growth model assumes a uniform manner of legal or social rights reduce income inequality, development of social benefits for all.

This model is in decline. Actual results were not always consistent with the original intentions. In addition, new needs with increasing aging population and exclusion of a part of the population. To this is added and the stabilization of public resources available.

Hence the idea of moving to an aspiration towards equality confusing to a thorough reflection on the notion of justice. Without going into detail, an important aspect deserves to be highlighted, namely the justification of inequality in society.

According to the principle of distinction, advanced by J. Rawls, social inequalities should be those who would most benefit the most disadvantaged.

That tends to legitimize differentiate users and to identify groups likely to benefit from the best possible social treatment. Under these changes, public service agencies are concerned. They see small herds, a part of his public dissatisfaction, some abandoned their roles, loss of monopoly. They fear privatization, and therefore very book shown to a certain type of modernization that does not work in strengthening the public service. Many of them join the private enterprise model, which considers the profit motive with its consequences in terms of jobs. They do not see why public services, whose mission is to attend the public well, would be to behave like businesses, since they do not share the same objectives.

They do not see why they required certain techniques, which ignore the peculiarities of their organization. Generally, these agents of the public still do not see the need to take into account the public on the grounds that they themselves are representatives of general interest and both are experienced technicians.

Economic transformations, geopolitical, technological, legal environment that acts of public services, but their criticism results (poor management, poor social intentions materialize concerned) have challenged the traditional way public services work.

Recent research in the public sector indicates considerable interest in TQM (Total Quality Management) as a way to increase performance.

The premise is that quality production and services are central to strategies for important public and private management. The problem is how can be adopted "TQM" in the public sector, which is his way. Certainly the road to quality is not one. This can be achieved by adopting management philosophy that matches the distinctive competence.

In one sense, TQM is a management philosophy and a set of principles designed to be used in an organization for continuous improvement. In this context, two major dimensions: measuring and participation, both to make basic changes in work processes and implement, to support improvements.

Measurement and participation correlate with internal and external requirements. Thus, to identify four common elements:

1) Measurements internally focused (statistical process control to identify quality output while setting variations, etc..)

2) Measurements focused on the outside (measurements for customer satisfaction, consumers, citizens with quality production and services).

3) Internal team and participating in group work, work involving labour organization in new avenues of improvement, improvement, re-manufacturing, services and other processes of work organization.

4) Participation of overseas contractors, including suppliers involved in manufacturing, services, or "partnership" to ensure quality of output. However, the public sectors there are three obstacles to implementation of TQM or access to quality:

a) Opposition to managerial work;

b) Conflict between the budget and personnel management policies;

c) Barriers of improving the quality, on the one hand, and innovation processes / reengineering, on the other.

Romanian society is in a continuous process of change in which the entire economic, social, political, civic saw a new dynamic in trying to adapt to specific conditions of the phenomenon of Europeanization (full member of the European Union).

The democratic system imposed by integration into European structures is functional (in terms of rule of law in Romania) when the economy and successful record as far as it develops a democratic spirit in social mentality.

As a result of accession to the EU, Romania was forced to reconsider its entire institutional structure to be able to meet the needs of implementing the acquis communitaire and after the challenges associated membership.

Most literature on the Europeanization present situation of the EU Member States and the impact they had on the membership structure of national policies and institutions. Heather Grabbe presents five categories of Europeanization process that affected and / or affect the Member States: models - models of legislative and institutional money - aid and technical assistance, setting standards (benchmarking) and monitoring, counselling and twinning (twinning); access to advanced stages of negotiation and accession process (gate keeping).

In the specific case of Romania, the need for institutional reform was obvious but the size and complexity of the Romanian public administration, together with late reform measures led to a delay in the effective administrative structures, able to cope with EU membership.

Dynamic and efficient ongoing process of institutional reform will enable the transformation of the Romanian public administration in an organization who could take over the obligations and rights arising from membership of the European Union.

Public administration can not be reformed in a short time. It is a long term process that must be implemented by several governments consecutive, in a difficult environment, competitive and constantly changing.

The structural and functional modernization of public administration in Romania starts from the need for better operation of central and local organizations and esteemed being generated four categories of reasons: economic reasons, technical reasons, sociological reasons and institutional reasons. The changing of Romanian society requires the public administration reform to be analyzed and disseminated on the following levels:

Strategic - which to redefine the role of the state clearly;

Legal - by using larger framework laws;

Organizational - administrative and fiscal decentralization;

Cultural - following a change of values and modes of action of public officials, non governmental organizations, the citizen / customer of public service.

Implementation of reform policies in public administration will consider the following conditions:

- Define the legislation creating and organizing a public authority of the principles of communication, transparency, effectiveness, accountability, participation, consistency, proportionality and subsidiary and regulation enforcement mechanisms;

- Segregation of responsibilities between public authorities - public policy, finance and public service delivery;

- Introducing a simple and clear mechanism under which the policy be developed and implemented programs, projects, action plans and bills;

-Separation of policy making level of the implementation;

- Fixing the number of civil servants in relation to the definition of public service and a quality standard for this service;

- Monitoring and evaluating the effectiveness of reform measures applied.

Democratic and effective governance is the main purpose of all attempts to reform public administration. Public administration is a vast field, characterized by problems and different approaches that generated significant debate in the theoretical and academic focus primarily on compatibility concepts of innovation, knowledge transfer and best practices in public administration.

Administration is often presented as stationary by nature and incapable, in essence, keep pace with changing requirements, different approaches a government strategy which places a large scale between perception positive and highly negative image of the bureaucracy.

Research in the field of administrative reform are closely related in recent years by promoting a new type of "management" or "leadership" in the public sector tends to question the fundamental assumptions underlying the function of traditional bureaucratic administration (Metcalfe, Richards, 1990) .

The main component of the new trends mainly refers to:

-ethics that leaves managers free to coordinate, perform and administer the issues;

-implementation of explicit criteria and performance measures;

-significant weight given to the control results;

-increasing competition due to fixed-term contracts and public tendering procedures;

-to adapt the typical private sector management;

-introduction of discipline and control resource use.

Administrative organization of the territory is to, study and determination in the state geographically, a rational distribution and efficient human activities in relation to natural resources and needs of local communities.

Delimitation of constituencies territory governments have to consider interests of traditional politico-administrative, economic and socio-cultural population. In this way, can be done in a consistent, public administration. Administrative doctrine in recent years established three principles of territorial public administration organization, namely:

- Principle of centralization;
- Principle of deconcentration;
- Principle of decentralization.

These principles are trying to solve the two trends that are manifested in the governance and administration of a country: unity and diversity.

Trend is of national unity and is determined by the need to live in community. The trend of diversity (decentralizing) corresponds to diversity and a social group is determined by the geographical and historical considerations. It requires specific measures for each social group.

Centralization is the fundamental principle of organization of local government and consists solely dependent on local authorities by the central bodies. From a legal perspective, the central decision makers are only applicable in the territory, and local authorities have only their execution competence.

Principle (s) concentration is actually a form of centralization and consists in recognizing the State agency, distributed throughout the country, a certain power. Basically, there are centralized at any time, because on the one hand, central government agencies are hierarchically subordinate, on the other hand, decisions are attributable solely to the state. In broad terms, we can say that deconcentration is an administrative legal regime is between administrative centralization and administrative decentralization, as a centralized decentralization distorted or weak.

What a centralized approach is that local power holders are elected by local voters, but appointed by the centre. What a decentralized approach is that local power holders, although appointed by the centre, they have the competence to solve local problems without having to submit them for this purpose, the hierarchical superior of the centre, but they are subject to its control and forced to documents comply with their supervisor.

If deconcentration, local public authority remains part of central hierarchical system. Decisions on competence of local data are taken from the central authorities in hierarchical power. The central authority to give orders and instructions to local authority decisions are going to take, given the right to control how their execution.

So, deconcentration lies near the site of application of State policies. A demobilize means to distribute more than actions performed by the state administration from the national conception of these actions and territorial level of execution of the same actions. The territorial state, prefectures, counties both directions and county services are not legal entities; they represent only deconcentrated state administrations.

But the principle of decentralization requires the existence of local people, community designated territory, their attributions, speaking in management and administration "business" community. Decentralization as a social phenomenon signifies a fundamental process of moving power from centre to periphery. He generates a lot of effects, in synthesis, include:

A. regrouping of power relations in the local environment, which becomes the centre of gravity of the administrative process;

B. location and the intersection of these relationships cause a specific administrative system that supports local power;

C. local agencies are no longer simple executors of directives from the central administration, but they gain strategic capacity for action;

D. decentralization policy generates transfers of competence, strengthening determine the activity and development of local solidarity, creating a new framework around which the various local stakeholders will be encouraged to mobilize.

The conception of the French model, demands national unity leading to a restrictive interpretation of decentralization, being considered, and finally a "means of struggle" against the central power. The English concept, however, decentralization is a broad NRTI could understand that self-administration ("self government").

Local administrative freedom to decide and act on own initiative and responsibility, is the key feature of local governance. Administrative decentralization process means not only replacing a central decision-maker at national level with a local one, he profoundly changed the terms of reference and objectives are chosen based options and decisions. Administrative decision is, in this context, since they take the product of complex interactions with the local environment. Inserted in a certain hierarchy, local agent at the same time manifests itself as a component of political and administrative environment, which maintain mutual exchange and reversible.

The decisions he takes are product specific variables of local origin, which proves to be the central administration sometimes unable to perceive them and take them into account.

Decentralization of public administration is also a corollary of democracy. It means the administrative organization, which represents the organization of constitutional representative democracy. All these traits are, according to Max Weber's claims, the expression of a streamlining public administration, a sign of modernization.

The administrative-state model can enhance overall system efficiency as the central public administration can focus their attention on priority issues of national interest, leaving the management of local competent other.

Conclusions

Europeanization not confused with other concepts such as convergence, harmonization, integration and policy formation. Europeanization is a process, while "convergence is a consequence of it". The Europeanization should not be confused with the harmonization process, which reduces the diversity of regulations, providing a model of action. In contrast to harmonization, Europeanization leaves open the idea of diversity. The outcome of Europeanization can be variety of regulations, competition sharp or distortion of it. Europeanization is not the same with political integration. Political integration is considered to be one that gives the appearance and development of the process of Europeanization.

Location of public life, the meaning affirmation administrative decentralization and local autonomy development, allowing for a wider participation and political involvement excise citizens.

In this context, decentralization is a convenient framework for education policy, because the citizens are more involved in management and initiate their own localities, which fosters better understanding of political and administrative problems which arise at the national level.

Separation between the powers acquired by the administrative authorities and the central pool reflects the decentralized level of administrative deconcentration. Of course, decentralized regional structures designed to keep the centre reported the situation on the ground and centre to execute orders.

The fact is that the two terms should never confuse decentralization assuming a power-sharing between state and local, while the deconcentration rule and not to share power, but he is closer to citizens by installing on-site specialized services furnished with certain autonomy.

References

- Afonso A, Schuknecht , V.Tanzi – Public Sector Efficiency : An International Comparision , Frankfurt/ Main , Document de lucru al Bancii Centrale Europene , 2003
- Alexandru, Ioan, Administratia publicã-teorii, realitãti, perspective, Editura Lumina Lex,2003
- Alexandru,Ioan, Criza Administratiei, Editura Lumina Lex.2002

- Börzel, T.A. Towards Convergence in Europe? Institutional Adaptation to Europeanisation in Germany and Spain, Journal of Common Market Studies 39 (4), 1999
- Bouckaert, Geert si Pollit, Christopher – Reforma managementului public: analizã comparatã, Ed. Epigraf, Chisinău, 2004
- Bryson, J.M., Strategic Planning for Public and Nonprofit Organisations: A Guide to Strenghthening and Sustaining Organisational Achivements, San Francisco, Jossey Bass, 1995
- Burdus, Eugen; Căprărescu Gheorghita; Androniceanu, Armenia si Miles, Michael – Managementul schimbării organizationale, 2000, Editura Economicã, Bucuresti.
- Chevallier Jacques - Science administrative; Presses Universitaires de France; Paris; 1986
- Cristea, Simona, Problemes juridiques de la function publique roumaine, Editura Universul Juridic, Bucuresti, 2005
- Farnham, D., Horton, S., Barlow, J., Hondeghem, A.(ed.), New public managers in Europe: public servants in transition , Basingstoke, Macmillan, 1996
- Friedman M . – The Role of Government in Public Education in R.A Solo (ed) , Economics and Public Interest , New Brunswick, N.J., Rutgers University Press, 1955
- French, Wendell si Bell H. Cecil, jr. – Organization Development (Behavioral Science Interventions for Organization Improvement), 1999, Prentice Hall, New Jersey.
- Girishankar, Navin, Evaluating Public Sector Reform. Guidelines for Assessing Country-Level impact of Structural Reform and Capacity Building in the Public Sector, World Bank, 2001
- Golembiewski, T. Robert- High Performance and Human Costs: A PublicSector Model of Organizational Development, 1998, Praeger, New York.
- Grabbe, H., Europeanization Goes East: Power and Uncertainty in EU Accession Process, in The Politics of Europeanization, edited by Featherstone, K. & Radaelli, C.M:, Oxford University Press Inc., New York, 2003.
- Heyse, Lisbeth, Resordihardjo, Sandra, Lantnik Tineke, Lettinga Berber – Reform in Europe: Breaking the Barriers of Government, Ashgate Publishing, 2006
- Hooghe L.-The Commission europeenne and the Integration of Europe: Images of Governance, Cambridge University Press, Cambridge, 2002
- Horvarth & Partners Controlling. Sisteme eficiente de crestere a performantei firmei, Editura C.H. Beck, Bucuresti, 2007-11-26
- Kettl, David F., The Global Public Management Revolution: a Report on the Transformation of Governance, Brookings Institute, 2005, editia a doua
- Knill Cristopher – Europeanisation of National Administrations, The Themes in European Government, Cambridge University Press, 2006

THE ADMINISTRATIVE SYSTEM IN FRANCE

DOINA POPESCU[1]

Abstract

According to the Constitution promulgated on the 6th of October 1958, with the latest amendments made in 1999, France is a presidential republic. The three authority branches are broadly represented in the French administration: the judicial branch – French courts of law are divided into: judicial courts and administrative courts. Judicial courts are under the supreme authority of the Court of Cassation with jurisdiction to cancel judgments passed courts on inferior hierarchy levels and plays a central role in the appropriate performance of the activity.

The legislative body - normally, the legislation is voted by Parliament. French Parliament is comprised of two chambers: the National Assembly and the Senate. The National Assembly is elected for five years by way of direct universal voting. The Senate is elected by way of indirect universal voting by the electoral group. The election system is based on rules contained in the Election Code. The executive authority is divided between the President of the Republic and the Prime Minister. The President of the Republic makes the appointments for civil and military positions located at the highest state level. The Council of Ministers is responsible for appointing the positions of state councillors, prefect and public administration director. The central government is headed by the Prime Minister. Regional authorities – the regions are free territories administered by elected Councils. As far as the metropolitan part of France is concerned, there are 22 such territories, to which are added other four districts / counties which are located out of borders. The region's Prefect represents the state and is empowered to deploy legal actions in order to protect the state's best interest. County authorities – there are currently 96 de districts, to which four other territories located out of borders are added, as well as the territorial communities of Mayoutte and St-Pierre et Miquelon. There are also elected territorial entities, such as the Elected Assembly and the General council.

Keywords: Administration, President, Prime Minister, Regional authorities, County authorities

Introduction

The topic brought to discussion concentrates around two essential elements: on one hand, the significant influence of the French administrative system over the European administrations, but mainly over the administrative structures in Romania, and on the other hand, the controversial character that defines it, especially in the case of a nation with a rich history, discrepant and often violent.

Except for the English people, who became aware of the absurdity of absolute power with a remarkable precociousness, the French people enjoy the primacy in Europe for the courage proved against the obstacles imposed by the state as an independent system/organism, willing to developa beneficial existence for itself, regardless of the impact that this could have on the individuals that are part of it.

The appearance, themore or less ample development, and the evolution up to the remarkable present, of the French administrative law is strongly connected to the geographical limits (or benefits) specific to this nation, but moreover especially to the socio-political events that took place through centuries, convulsions that are, more often than not, useful in the general scheme for the advanced stage of modernity specific to the present-day administrative organization of the French state.

In order to reach my goals I divided my paper into three sections, the first one dealing with general aspects belonging to the structures of the public administration in European Union countries, including short presentations of certain important European countries systems, emphasizing also various aspects found both in the European administrative structures and French ones, a fact issued either from an imported phenomenon or from simply common evolution.

[1] Associate Professor Ph. D., Faculty of Law and Administrative Sciences, Pitesti University, (email: dopopescu@yahoo.com).

The second section describes in a more extensive way the French administration, starting from the central level, with the well-known institutions, continuing with the regional level, with traditional, but also recent organisms, up until the local level, regardless the limited range in which it is included. Subsequently, there follows a foray into the decentralization and regionalizing administrative process of the French state, and the events that determined themore and more strong extension of these processes. Of course,I am presenting, negative or problematic aspects as well, but the general perspective is a positive one, according to, for example, the Romanian state, would benefit from such an initiative, tending to reproduce, in conformity with the specific necessities in this area, the French administrative system.

Content

Public Administration Structures in the European Union Member Countries

E.U is not competent neither to bring under regulation nor to reform or reorganize in any way the public administrations and administrative structures of the member states, but the administrative and judicial systems of the member states are bound to adapt themselves to transposing and applying the exigencies of the community law.

The administrative politics of each state of the E.U is a determinant factor of the unitary practice regarding administration at its union level, and the great variety of the great variety of static structures represent one of the characteristic aspects of the European public administration.

Each state has a unique static structure, but we can distinguish common structural elements. In each of the member states there is at least one, but most of the time two or three administrative systems, under central government. In all member states there are many administrative levels, usually known as municipalities or villages. Regarding administrative levels situated between the central level and local level, there can be done a distinction between a regional governing level that exerts in certain states legislative competence, a provincial governing level (or department, county) and an inter-municipal governing form.

The European Union has as members federal or quasi-federal states, decentralized unitary states, but also unitary states. The EU's federal states are Belgium, Germany and Austria. In Belgium and Austria the laws issued by regions, communities and lands is not secondary in regard to the laws issued by the federal government. In Germany, there is the notion of hierarchy between the laws issued by the land and the federal laws. Spain can be described as being a quasi-federal state, although it remains a unitary state according to Spanish Constitution. The Spanish Constitution recognizes and warrants the right to auto-government of the nationalities and regions that constitute the kingdom. In practice, autonomous communities have a high level of independency. In case of conflict between the laws of the state and the laws of the local communities, the former prevail against the others always. The decentralized unitary states of the E.U are: France, Scandinavian countries and Holland. Between these states, France has four administrative levels besides the central Government, namely the regions, departments and villages. Holland, Denmark and Sweden have three administrative levels, and Finland only two.

Denmark and Sweden have two systems of counties which constitute the intermediary administrative and municipalities' system. In these two countries, the counties have responsibilities in the health care public sector. In Finland, the municipalities constitute the second level and the most important one. Holland is subdivided in provinces and municipalities. The unitary states of the E.U are Greece, Luxemburg and Portugal. In these countries, the central administration is far away from the strongest government level. There are only two levels of government in Ireland, Luxemburg and Portugal (except for the two autonomous regions Azore and Madère). In Portugal, a referendum organized in 1998 in order to establish administrative regions with executive competence did not receive the people's approval. In Greece, there are three administrative levels. In 1994, the prefectures were transformed into "prefectorial autonomous governments" based on the democratic principle.

Great Britain represents a special case. For a long time it is a unitary state in which legislative competence belong to Westminster. Nevertheless, a radical change took place recently. The process of delegating responsibilities to Wales and Scotland lead to the creation of a Welsh Assembly and to a Scottish Parliament that exert legislative competence. This process, together with creating The Northern Ireland Assembly and its executive Committee of ministers, modified the unitary character of the United Kingdom of Great Britain.[2]

Consequently, public administrations have the form ministers placed under the authority of a minister. There can be done the distinction between state members, a case in which ministries are very vast and integrated and the member states where ministries are entities with relatively small, specialized in issuing policies, while the agencies are created in order to put into effect these policies. The majority of European countries sit in the first category. Denmark, Finland, Sweden and Great Britain sit in the second category, although in Denmark and Great Britainwe find quite large ministries/departments.

The administration of Swedish government is divided in very small ministrials (or ministries) and in central administrative authorities (or executive agencies). The 270 agencies are independent of the government in areas regarding the law enforcement and exerting the authority on private sectors or on local authorities. Administrative authorities have an independent position, different from the ones that the government and the Parliament have (Riksdag), which, to a certain extent, it is similar to with the role of the courts in certain member states. When the administrative authorities enforce the law in each case, they have the right to do it without the interference of the political authorities of the state.

Great Britain, by all account, doesn't have a written constitution in the form of a single document, but it comprises three Acts, namely: Magna Carta, Habeas Corpus and Bill of Rights. The most important trait of the British Constitution is the so-called "Parliament's supremacy". This means that the parliament can adopt or reject any law that it wants and that its decisions prevail against those taken by the courts. This aspect provides the British minister and his Cabinet a lot of power because as long as they control the majority in the House of Commons, they can issue any law they want. There are states where the regional authorities of the state depend on two or more ministries from the central level, like the regional offices of the Government of Great Britain. In some member states, the political leader are assisted by their own "Cabinet", which keep the contact with the public administration. Such Cabinets can be found in Belgium, France, Italy, Spain and Portugal. The Cabinet's staff is usually very bound to their minister or to their vice-minister according to their political choice.

2.The French public administration

According to the Constitution which was promulgated on 06.10.1958, and which was last amended in 1999, France is a presidential republic. The legislative power consists of a bicameral parliament consisting of: Senate (321 members, of which 296 represent the metropolitan France, 13 the oversea territories and 12 the French from abroad) and the National Assembly (577 members, 555 in France and 22 in the oversea territories; the deputies are directly elected for a term of 5 years). The executive power is exercised by the president, who appoints the Council of Ministers, headed by a prime minister.

The Council of Ministers is accountable to the Parliament. The head of state, the president, is elected by direct vote for maximum two terms of seven yearseach.

[2] Filipescu, Ioan, FuereaAugustin, European Institutional Law, page 21, Compertex SRL Publishing House, Bucharest, 1994

For the last 10 years the modalities of the division of tasks and responsibilities have changed in France.A considerable autonomy was granted to territorial authorities (regions, districts, municipalities). In parallel, the central government delegates its responsibilities gradually, through the prefect, the representative of each district and the head of all state decentralized services. French courts are of two types: judicial courts and administrative courts. Legal courts are under the supreme authority of the Court of Cassation (Cour de Cassation), which has the power to annul decisions of the lower levels Courts, and play a key role in the proper course of work. For civil cases, there are Law Courts (Jurisdiction d'Instance), the Supreme Court (Tribunaux de Grande Instance) and the Court of Appeals (Coursd'Appel), which are 22. For criminal cases, there are police courts for committing crimes, and for other types of punishments the Courts of Correction work. Administrative courts are subordinated to the State Council. It includes simple administrative courts, and according to recent reforms, there are Administrative Courts of Appeal and Specialized Courts, especially in the financial sector: Regional Court and Court of Auditors

. The executive authority is divided between the President of the Republic and the Prime Minister. Nominations for the jobs concerning civil and military activities on the highest level of the state are up to the President of the Republic[3]. The Head of the Government is the prime minister. The Government consists of a Prime Minister, a large number of ministers and state secretaries.

The Government's structure may vary. Some ministers are called ministers state secretaries and have an important role in the government team. They may be seconded by other ministers. No member of the Government can be member of the Parliament. There are about 20 ministerial departments with administrative structures quasi-permanent. Ministers and state secretaries have their own cabinets run by assistants. The Prime Minister, who is appointed by the President of the Republic, is responsible for the actions of the Government. It organizes the activity of the government and is helped by assistants and by the General Secretariat of Government. The general Secretariat of Government has a central role in carrying out many administrative proceedings involving the government. The Structures that are under the authority of the Prime Minister are: General Directorate for Administration and Public Services, Inter-Informatics Center of Administration, Information and Broadcasting Service, the General Secretariat for National Defense, the General Secretariat for International Cooperation which correlate the work of the ministries with the European legislation and ensure the implementation of decisions of the European Union. The department-ministries can be created or dissolved by a decree and the responsibility of each ministry is established by orders of the Council of Ministers after consultation with the State Council. Each ministry is under the leadership of his own ministry, which may be assisted by ministers, delegations or state secretaries. The ministry may issue orders to implement the content of laws, but also special instructions for the administration staff. Regions are free territories administered by elected Councils. For the metropolitan territory of France there are 22 plus four districts/departments from abroad. They are regions by law: Martinique, Guadeloupe, Guyana Reunion. The government applied in Corsica has several features. In these communities outside the country, deliberative assemblies and regional councils were formed, whose members are elected by universal suffrage for six years. The prefect of the region represents the state and is empowered to take action to protect the legal interests of the latter[4]. These regions have benefited from the principle of free administration of local authorities, which was first established for villages according to the Constitution, departments and oversea territories. The principle of free administration is not in itself a source of regulatory power, unless there is express legislative provision to that effect .The normative power of the region is indeed, in view of its powers, lower than that of the villages or departments and particularly than the mayor's. The regions can neither carry out nor arrogate a trusteeship to any other local authority on their territory.

[3] Datar, Les contrats de plan État-Région, page. 94, La Documentation française, Paris, 2002

[4] Les collectivités décentralisées de l'UE (sous la dir. d'A. Delcamp), page 57, Les études de la Documentation française, Paris, 1994

Unlike the regions that have been created recently, there are still districts ever since the French Revolution. Currently there are 96 districts, plus other four from abroad and the territorial communities in Mayoutte and St-Pierre et Miquelon. There are also territorial entities such as the elected Assembly and the General Council. General Councellors are elected for six years based on an election ballot known as "Elections régionales" organized within each district. Elections are held every three years for half of the members of the General Council. Public services are developed and provided within the districts.

3. The Institutional Decentralization

The French administrative structure is formed of 3 platforms of decentralized territorial communities: the regions, the departments and the commons(the municipalities). These divisions are governed by elected territorial authorities[5]. France has 22 (plus 4 overseas) regions: 21 metropolitan regions and a special statute for Corsica, a region with its own Assembly and its own Government. Each region (the app. surface: 24.700 km2, the app population: 2. 470.000) is formed of several departments (counties, part of NUTS 2 classification). The four territories overseas (Réunion, Martinique, Guadeloupe, Guyane) derive benefit from some facilities specific to the regions. Every region is managed by a Regional Council. Its members are chosen directly through universal suffrage every six years through a mixed list of votes (majority for half of the positions, proportionality for the other half). Its President, chosen from the members of the Council, is the chief of the region's executive and the manager of the regional administrative team. Every region has, starting with 1964, a Prefect of the Region named by the Government. As representative of the state, his authority extends above all the external services of different governmental department's existent in the region. At the same time, he is also the county prefect of the region's capital. He has authority over the prefects of the region's counties, which seem to exist since 1789. France is divided in 96 metropolitan departments and four territories over the sea. A special status has the French capital, Paris, which is both a village and a department. The departments are led by a County Council, and its members are chosen half through direct universal suffrage, at every 3 years. The President is elected by the members of the County Council and he represents the executive of the department and the chief of the county's administrative team.

Villages, departments and regions collect, each for its own income, different taxes. For example, the regions collect taxes for the driving license or for the registration certificates of the vehicles, the tax for every type of vehicle (tailpiece) being collected by the departments. The actual territorial administrative organization in France (villages, departments, regions) jelled gradually after the 2nd World War, as an answer to the necessity of the constitution of the geographic field, whose dimensions could allow a real planning and politic to set up the territory and the economic development.

Conclusions

By aproaching this subject I tried to accentuate the features of the Frech administrative system, for each level, as well as the aspects that bears the institutional descentralization also on each level. Romania, although it looked for borrowing French system elements , hasn't gone on to institutionalze an administrative system yet, which, as well as the French one, to put it in the center of the European systems.

Therefore in Romania, in a future review of the Constitution, it should have in view the absolutely positive aspects of the French administrative system and in the same time it has to take into account tradition and our apropriateness when they would set measures the new country teritorially administrative organisation. For that purpose the new descentralization has to update the present system and to simplify the territorially administration by disappearing counties and setting up regions in the future years. It should allow a greater budgetary independence to the cities and villages so as the poll could better control local collectivity expenses; introducing some performance indicators of municipality, cities and villages public services The regions have to produce developing projects for the whole region in a coherent and predictable way. Regions have to coordinate in between them to assure projects coherence at a national scale among the developing regions, Not lately, regions have to take part together with the gouvern to elaborate and implement cohesion policy.

[5] Ionescu, Cristian, Op. Cit., „Sisteme constituționale contemporane", Casa de editură și presă șansa" - S.R.L. Bucuresti, 1994. page 142

References

- John Loughlin, La vision européenne du rôle des régions et de l'autonomie régionale, Pouvoirs locaux, Le cahiers de la décentralisation, no. 70/2006
- Ionescu Cristian „Sisteme constituționale contemporane", Casa de editură şi presă şansa" - S.R.L. Bucuresti, 1994
- Ioan Alexandru, - „Dreptul administrativ şi Uniunea Europeană", Editura Lumina Lex, Bucureşti, 2007
- Ioan Filipescu.; Augustin Fuerea, - „Drept instituțional european", Ed. Compertex S R L, Bucureşti, 1994
- Gérard-François Dumont, Les régions et la régionalisation en France, Ellipses, collection „Transversale Débats", 2004.

EVOLUTION OF THE JURIDICAL REGULATION REGARDING THE PENITENTIARY ADMINISTRATION IN ROMANIA

DOINA POPESCU[1]

Abstract

To deeply analyze the evolution of the regulation regarding the penitentiary administration, one has to make an incursion into the straight modalities of the executioner punishment but also to well know the conditions, treatment and modality of the execution of the punishment in prisons all together with the obvious purpose of maintaining our citizens' safety. According to our history the conception regarding the purpose of the punishment and their modalities of execution we are in permanent evolution throughout the years, this presentation is having the purpose to demonstrate this fact.

Romanian's ratification, by the Law no.30/18.05.1994, of the Convention for the human rights and the fundamental liberties, enforced high exigencies, determined by the necessity of improving the conditions for the persons that are deprived of liberty in accordance to the international standard. The period that preceded the Romania's integration into European Union determinate the necessity of realization of process of reform in the Romanian prison system, as an integrated part of this whole process of reform in the field of justice.

Although the Romanian system tried very hard to be in line with the European Union, this process will last a long while and it is very far to be closed, the new legislation and the process have to be sustained by human and material resources which represent major problems the penitentiary administration is dealing with at the moment. The proportion between the number of personnel for guarding and safety and the number of the condemned in Romania is 1/ 4,7 much lower than in France - 1/2,7, England - 1/2,4 , Denmark - 1/1,4, Finland - 1/1,4, Sudden - 1/1,4, Austria - 1/2,6.

On the other hand, while the Europeans built a lot of special prisons, depending on the applied regimes which are the followings: - opened, semi opened, closed, maximum security, Romania is still far away from this process. More than that, our prisons gather all categories of condemned, fact that makes the scientifically individualization of application of punishment privative of liberty to develop much too slowly. The administration of the prisons – being still at the beginning of a road – must fulfil in good conditions, two main objectives: safety of the citizens and reintegration into the society of the condemned ones – this two important things must be very well sustained by the state programs for the people who were liberated from the prisons.

Keywords: evolution, penitentiary administration, human rights, reform ,justice

Introduction

This paper was written with a view to make an analysis regarding the evolution of the main regulation concerning the penitentiary administration, for a better historical knowledge of this phenomenon in our country and for a better understanding of the utility that this administration represents on the society. To deeply analyze the evolution of the regulation regarding the penitentiary administration, one has to make an incursion into the straight modalities of the executional punishment but also to well know the conditions, treatment and modality of the execution of the punishment in prisons all together with the obvious purpose of maintaining our citizens' safety.

According to our history the conception regarding the purpose of the punishment and their modalities of execution we are in permanent evolution throughout the years, the next presentation having the purpose to demonstrate this fact.

A definition of penitentiary administration , from an organically point of view, it is given by law no.293/2004 concerning the public servants' Penitentiary National Administration legal status which in clause 2 pre-scients: Penitentiary National Administration and subordoneted organisation enters to public defence institutions, public array and state national sequrity and establishes, in the sense of heteronomy, Penitentiary National Administration,'. Preponderet between Penitentiary National Administration subordonated organisations, penitentiaries find their legal commitment within law no. 275/2006 concerning penalty execution and proceedings disposed by judicial organs during the capital case, which defines it as being certain places intended for executing life long prison or prison. Apart from the legal settlement we fiind a lot of definitions of prison given by different authors: ‚Institution organised to protect comunity from those who deliberately represent a risk for it.'(Hoffman,1970). ‚A place where are held persons unable to conhabit socially, because of the high awkward they have (Pro Humain Rights Association., 1983).

[1] Associate Professor Ph. D., Faculty of Law and Administrative Sciences Pitesti University, (email: dopopescu@yahoo.com).

Regardless of the definition that seems more suitable to us, it is obvious that prison has a social control function on those persons unable to conhabit socially because of the high awkward they have. It deals with avoiding these behaviours consequences and citizens sequrity underwriting.From a functional point of view, I rate that penitenciary administration represents the whole activities, managerial processes, theories and proceedings used for applying legislation concerning penalty execution and proceedings disposed by judicial organs during the capital case up to be within their competence. In the light of those presented , I consider it pertinent, below, to try to recompose , as much as i can, the evolution of penitentiary system in our country using historical sources, works and scripts that exist up to this moment and which, even if they offer very important information for the touched subject, do not present a chronological evolution including transformations in the field and Romanian legislation alignmet neccesary to Romania's inegration within the U.E's structures.

Content

1.The first wombs of judicial regulation to the XVIIth century

About the judicial system and penalty implementation in antique Dacia we don't have written news. On account of science and culture elements of this ancient people, as they are reflected in the antique writings, we can assert withought going wrong that they existed and functioned on the lines of social structure which commanded Dacian world. Servants patriarchal time which grew in Dacia before the Roman conquest was characterised by using servants for classical labours or public works , but relations with the lords were going off with certain human limits. After Dacia's conquest by the Roman Empire (101-102 and 105-106) emperor Traian asserted in this new Roman theme their law enforcement , implicit the guilty's punishment system , an evidence on this line being the Roman coliseum from Sarmisegetuza. The Aurelian back down in 274, ordered by the Roman emperor Aurelian, didn't create in Dacia a legislative blankness, Roman laws and rules continued to be enforced simultaneous with the punishments and justice manners applied as the natives did. The contact between the Roman Empire and Dacia continued through the Byzantium world to its conquest by the Ottoman Empire in 1453. This length of time meant centuries in which Byzantium legislation influenced the one from the Romanian's voievodeships, that up to the XVIth century functioned in all three regions (Moldavia, Walachia, and Transylvania) under the name of Jus Valachicums or Romanian Law, which was composed by Dacian Gets over which there was imbricated the Roman Byzatian law and to which there were added migratories rights elements that were assimilated by the natives. These were integrated on the unwritten people law or ‚people custom'. If up to the XVth century this Romanian law worked the same in all the three regions; after this date, in Transylvania, simultaneous with Hungarian feudal power reinforcing was asserted the Hungarian law for judging and punishing the guiltiest.

Apart from this unwritten people law there was also a written law based on the Roman emperors laws and Tarigrad as well as on the clerkly synod decree. There were prisons everywhere: at the monasteries, in the church's bell tower, away from administrations, but nowhere were organised. The first laws that were overwrought and which set things right to apply punishments were those from the XVIIth century: ‚The Small Law from Govora' – 1640 – worked up by Lord Matei Basarab's order (1633-1654); 'The Romanian tenet of imperial law' printed at Three Hierarchs monastery decreed by Vasile Lupu (1634-1653). Although we can't talk about Romanian prisons organization up to the second half of the XVIIIth century, their origin in our country is very old. Their incarceration and the use of some prisoners to work in salt works it is found even on the period when Dacia entered under Roman domination. Romans used to dispose incarcerated people to different works as extracting gold and other precious metals as well as salt. So, from Hunedoara's area there was extracted iron, and the salt works from Ocnele Mari along Mures keep hints of galleries from that time.

2.The evolution of penitentiary activities in the XVIIIth century. The wombs of concept, constructions, and penitentiary practice modernization.

In Transylvania in that time being under the Austro-Hungarian domination, the 61 paragraph of the penal procedure approved by Josef the Second in the year 1788 shows: "every prison must be clean, dry, must have air and light, altogether not to put the health of the defended into danger".

Being under the Austro-Hungarian domination, all the cities from Transylvania – benefited of special constructions, having served as prisons, all of them having been made during Maria Teresa reign (1740-1780) and also during Josef the Second (his son) reign, from the year 1765. In the year 1790, in Romanian Countries, the prince Nicolae Mavrogheni (1786- 1790) demands that the women should not be imprisoned together with men, and when this thing is not possible the woman should be sent to a married and good man. But in spite of all these regulations, prisons remained the same: dirty and primitive.[2] These are more common measures concerning prison organization in the XVIIIth century in our country; in comparison with what we have seen in the XVIIth century, these measures mean a real progress and a beginning of preoccupation with this field. Although they have a predominant administrative state, however disposals proposed by lords for prison will bring some improvements to their awful condition aspiring to a humanization of the state in them. All these fit in with the sight of new ideas in Europe and the establishment of the most cellular prisons in Europe.

3.Penitentiary system and reform of prisons appointed according to Organic Law and latter under Romania's kings kingship.

At the beginning of the XIX century the authorities showed a greater interest for the safe and safety of prisons. They built new buildings where sick rooms were disposed with infirmaries. During that period the prince Mihail Şuţu required to be weekly informed about the causes, situations that all the people imprisoned for, he also asked that all the people from prison to be put to do the public work, in order to be better fed. It is to underline the fact that he successively reigned from 1783 to 1802 with very short breaks, he also reigned both in Romanian Country and in Moldavia.[3]

When the Organic Regulations appeared in Romanian Country in the year 1831 and in Moldavia in 1832 they contained similar provisions and stipulations, this was a step forward in the direction of the execution of the punishment: "the leading will have the in mind that the prisons will be more secure, so that the health and safety, food, clothing, lightening and fire wood will be bought from the amount of money allotted by the state. In the year 1851 the first regulation that regards beating and insult of the prisoners is drown up in the Iasi city. It was also drown up the regulation of the prison from Tg.Ocna by Anastase Panu, manager of Ministry of Justice in that period. This opens the epoch of modern legislation of the execution of the punishment that are cons emend of liberty. [4]

The regulation follows the auburnian system and makes the first mentioned lines related to the moral education of the condemned people that is to be made through religious education, the prisoners being also obliged to learn a trade. The Regulation of the prisons regime in the year 1874 appears which governed the regime of the punishment execution until the year 1930, during period the auburnian regime of isolation during the night and work in common during the day is instituted. General regulations for the central prisons, from 24 of May 1874, did not propose as a distinct activity the resocialization of the prisoners, but it stipulates that condemned ones must work, proportional to sex, power of work, age, learning of a job, reading of the religious books, learning.

[2] Jack Missliwetz,Recht fur Aerzte und Medzinstudenten,Ed 2 Universitaettsbuchandlung,Viena,1995,p.132
[3] Prinţul Nicolae Şuţu, Notions statistiques aur la Moldavie, Editura S.N., Iaşi, 1849, p. 74.
[4] I.C. Filitti, D.C. Suchianu, Contribuţii la istoria justiţiei penale în Principatele Române, Bucureşti, 1970,54

The regime imposed was the one of total deep silence and all the games of any kind were condemned. The idea of those times was to apply a severe, drastic punishment to determinate the prisoner not to repeat the evil deed. The provisions this regulation could be compared with the Belgian Law from the year 1870 and also with the French Law from the year 1875, with even some advantages as against the last ones. According the law from 1874, the prisons were divided into: preventive prisons and sentence prisons that were at their turn divided into: correctional prisons, hard work, and detention prisons. The prisons should have been organized according to the laws but in reality they remained the same, in the primitive regime of common staying.

The administration of the prisons was under the authority of the Ministry of Interns and was managed by a General Director this situation being kept until the year 1914, when the prisons are passed under the control of the Ministry of Justice. This transition to the Ministry of Justice patronage was seen as a progress by the jurists of those times Tanoviceanu and Traian Pop. On the 1 January 1930 the Penitentiaries and Prevention Institutions Law adopted in 1929 comes into force. This law contains generally same regulations as Law from 1874, but improved by instituting of English progressive system.

This system was constituted by three phases in order to prepare the prisoners for a free life:

- Individual isolation for a period of maximum three years, depending on the quantum of punishment;

-In the second phase, the convicts were kept all together during the day and separated at the night;

-In the last phase, they worked in common during the day and were kept bedrooms at the night.

On the 21st of April 1938 appears the Regulation regarding the regime of execution of the punishment appears which the best European regulation of that period war. The idea of the social recovery of the people that were condemned was very well presented under a separate title "Educational Measurements".[5]

4.The evolution of penitentiary system up to December 1989 Revolution

Taking into account the fact that this regulation overtook developed the Law that regarded the organization of the prisons from the year 1929, one can say that quarter of a century before the publication of the Minimal Rules for the Treatment of the Prisoners (ONU, 3 August 1955), Romania had a legislation regarding the line of social recovery conformably to the subsequent next international recommendations. In the year 1944, the victory of the Allied determined the falling down of the Romanian Country under the influence of the Stalinist Russia, fact that will mean the starting point of a break for a long term, of the modern conceptions regarding the execution of the punishment. This fact was very well effected in that period of time by changing the specialty ruling personnel (majority graduates of the Law University) and by compromising of personnel by naming them servants of old bourgeoisie and also by a visible regress into applying the penitentiary treatment.

From an article that was published in the "Problems in Prisons" magazine in August 1948, entitled "Reeducation of the prisoner – one of the main aims of Prisons" results that this reeducation cannot be realized as long as "the political condemned, the fearest enemies of the work class and also of the Republic will not be treated with an appropriate hate of class and as long as moral adeptness and also the value of the condemned, victims of the old society will be neglected". The regulation from the year 1952, regarding the implementation of the regime in the prison and also the Regulation regarding receiving, guards and protection, of the condemned, from the year 1955, both approved by the Ministry of Interns, do not have any disposal related to the reinstatement of the condemned. The prison had conceptually and in actual fact the reserved mission of the physical constraint.

[5] .J.F.Auby .Les services publique en Europe,Presses Universitares de France,Paris,1998,p.219

The Regulation regarding the application of the regime in prisons approved through the order approved by the Ministry of Interns Affairs no.4045/20.11.1962 shows the followings: using the people to the work, the respect for the discipline, the educational and cultural action, stimulation, and also rewarding. By organizing this activity it was meant to assure the accommodation to the social pulse of the ones that were amnestied in the year 1964. Taking into value the Romanian experience before the war and following attentively the recommendations that were in the Minimal Rules for the Treatment of the Prisoners that were adopted by ONU in the year 1955, at the General Directive of the Prisons, two projects will be elaborated and become the Law no. 23/1969 and the applicable Regulation approved by HCM no. 2282/05.12.1969.

Regarding the disposals from the section 4 – Reeducation of the prisoners, will be realized by work, qualification, re-qualification in a job, development of a better activities, educational and also cultural, stimulation and rewarding of the ones that likes works and give very good proves that they want to became a better people. In the article 36, in prisons are organized the following activities cultural–educational: school actions, work contest, reading books, watching TV, watching movies, reading of the newspaper, sports activities, reading the present laws, the analysis of the discipline of the condemned.

The normative acts from the year 1969, respected point by point the minimal recommendations of the ONU, with one exception: religious and moral assistance. In the year 1977, when the system in prison was in a very good direction, "brilliant" idea that a socialist society does not generates criminals, will determinate a political measure by reducing with 80% from the buildings and also from the personal (from 80 out of places – prisons, remained only 16), with all the negative consequences that we all feel the effects of even today.

5.Romanian penitentiaries at the end of the XXth century and the beginning of the XXIth

Despite all criticism that we brought in the period after the December 1989, the law regarding the execution of punishment, from the 1969, was at that time a very modern regulation – internationally speaking – which developed a very good activity of execution of punishment, comparable to other European systems.

By its effects the Law no. 21/15.10.1990, brings a new trying regarding the system. The transitional period from the Ministry of Interns to the Ministry of Justice, of all personnel, was a much tensioned moment that didn't become dramatic thanks to the maintenance of all military structure, competence, responsibilities and professional education of the personnel in the spirit of the military regulation. Romanian's ratification, by the Law no.30/18.05.1994, of the Convention for the human rights and the fundamental liberties, enforced high exigencies, determined by the necessity of improving the conditions for the persons that are deprived of liberty in accordance to the international standard.

The period that preceded the Romania's integration into European Union determinate the necessity of realization of process of reform in the Romanian prison system, as an integrated part of this whole process of reform in the field of justice. This process can be appointed at the beginning of the year 2003 when the OUG no. 56, was elaborated and adopted by our Government, this law regards some rights that the prisoners have and abrogates the Regulations of the execution of the punishment from the 15.12.1969. By this law all persons' rights who are in prisons are lined to the European standards. Although the OUG no.56/2003 opened a new process, by lining the condemned persons to the European legislation, a major step was done on 28 September 2004, when the Law no. 293/2004, regarding the statue of the public persons from the National Administration of Prisons came into effect. In other words from then on demilitarization of the personal from prisons took place. The applicace of this law made that 12.000 military persons to be put as reserve and also as civilians they become public persons with distinct status. The rights of the public persons, and also the incompatibilities and restrictions in public functions are established in prisons. Besides the legal actual rights there are recognized the legal right of syndical association or in other professional organization, the liberty of meetings, protection against violence into the exercitation of work activities.

The new regulation creates the right of stability at work, and stipulates the conditions of disengagement, delegation, adjournment and ceasing of working rapports as well as disposal relate to the disciplinary system and disciplinary procedure.

Another major step in realization of the process of reform is made by the penal law modifications, the most important among these being the Law 275/2006 regarding the execution of the punishment and the measures that this last one imputes to the juridical organs during the penal process. Among the new elements that the low makes on provision one can mention the Institution of judge delegated for the execution of the punishments who controls and also assures the legality regarding the execution of punishments, and also they give a solution regarding the complains made by the persons in prison.

The law also regards the individualization of the execution regime of the punishment privative of liberty, so that a commission for the individualization of the execution of the punishment privative of liberty was set up in every single prison. Although the Romanian system tried very hard to be in line with the European Union, this process will last a long while and it is very far to be closed, the new legislation and the process have to be sustained by human and material resources which represent major problems the penitentiary administration is dealing with at the moment. The proportion between the number of personnel for guarding and safety and the number of the condemned in Romania is 1/ 4,7 much lower than in France - 1/2,7, England - 1/2,4 , Denmark - 1/1,4, Finland - 1/1,4, Sudden - 1/1,4, Austria - 1/2,6.

In reality the proportion personnel/condemned from our system is less than the countries that were mentioned before, as the personal of the National Prisons of Administration execute also missions inside and outside the prison. On the other hand, while the Europeans built a lot of special prisons, depending on the applied regimes which are the followings: - opened, semi opened, closed, maximum security, Romania is still far away from this process.

More than that, our prisons gather all categories of condemned, fact that makes the scientifically individualization of application of punishment privative of liberty to develop much too slowly. The administration of the prisons – being still at the beginning of a road – must fulfill in good conditions, two main objectives: safety of the citizens and reintegration into the society of the condemned ones – this two important things must be very well sustained by the state programs for the people who were liberated from the prisons.

Conclusions

I presented the settlements history regarding penitentiary administration, proving the fact that these developed from the moment when the punishment execution had only the role of law breakers termination to modern concepts according which to the punishment execution must come, apart from the preventively and vindicatory aspect, the role of restyling the personality and behavior of the convicted persons acting on more directions as to enhance their chances to readmission in society. It is the reason for which appeared as evident the necessity to work up a new law concerning punishment execution as well as of an adequate legislation for the category of public servants with a special status in Penitentiary National Administration. No matter how many advantages presented the military structure through which the penitentiaries were managed up to 2004 it is indisputable the adopted legislation unity concerning the penitentiary administrative employees because, on the one hand it creates the sumption of manning some specialists (sociologists, psychologists, social assistants) very necessary for reaching the challenges above mentioned, but on the other hand, it establishes adequate work conditions, leaving out arbitrary, employees overcharging and stress, act meant to concur definitively to establish some normal relations between the employees and the persons deprived of freedom with direct consequences to administrative act quality. Although Romania boasted before the Second World War of a modern legislation among the European States , the down-come of our country in the Soviet reach produced a crack whose consequences we feel even now. Without denying the achievements undertaken in the penitentiary substructures after the December 1989 revolution, nevertheless I consider that these were away from solving the problems of this system in the moment of dictatorship down-come. The legislative reform made wasn't assisted with the corresponding provision of human and material resources so the appliance of the new legislation was made difficultly by the effort of the whole employees. Adopting the new legislation without the necessary financial aid determined the appearance of other phenomena which penitentiary administration deals with now - the extreme prosecution , in many cases dishonestly, of procedural rights by the deprived persons. A particular importance in realizing the reform is a correct public opinion note. The social importance of the penitentiary system reform exceeds the strict administrative frame of the Penitentiary National Administration and even of the Ministry of Law, this system reflecting in the whole world the preoccupation with society , in its whole to provide its status of moral health, public order and order by rights. Not lastly collaboration with European penitentiary administration are to bring benefits to the Romanian penitentiary system , in the past few years noticing a constant preoccupation of the National Penitentiary Administration in enrolling the common programs with other administrations of the European member states.

References:

- .J.F.Auby .Les services publique en Europe,Presses Universitares de France,Paris,1998
- I.C. Filitti, D.C. Suchianu, Contribuţii la istoria justiţiei penale în Principatele Române, Bucureşti, 1970
- Nicolae Şuţu, Notions statistiques aur la Moldavie, Editura S.N., Iaşi, 1849
- Jack Missliwetz,Recht fur Aerzte und Medzinstudenten,Ed 2 Universitaettsbuchandlung,Viena,1995
- Dimitrie Cantemir , Descrierea Moldovei, Editura Academiei R.S.R., Bucureşti, 1973
- Doina Popescu,Drept Administrativ-curs,Editura Universitatii Pitesti ,2011

CULTURAL PHENOMENA AND PROCESSES IN CONTEMPORARY SOCIETY – DETERMINANTS OF CULTURAL POLICIES

ANDREEA MIHAELA NITA [1]

Abstract

Cultural phenomena and processes in the contemporary society, influenced by the social development models and by the fact that the constitutive elements of the culture have become the decisive factors of social change, are the determinants of the cultural policies. They are centered on the active process of cultural globalization that emphasizes besides the assimilation of the European principles, also the preservation of the cultural dialog without identity loss.

Contemporary culture cannot be appreciated unless we know the main processes and phenomena that lately have generated impressive changes in the area of technology and means of communication. Due to these transformations we witness a change of the cultural paradigms, a mutation of values.

Keywords: Culture, cultural identity, cultural policies, national identity, (the) cultural crisis

Introduction

As a set of value systems that expresses aspects of the physical and social reality, but also the characteristics of the relations between these two realities, culture, social complex integrating spiritualism and intellectualism, goes in consonance with the current global macroeconomic crisis through an unbalance.

Cultural evolution, rather the development of forms throughout time is in continuous transformation. The specialization of functions and the progressive differentiation of culture are the consequences of the social, cultural and biological evolutions of modern societies. The elements of a culture can freely go from one system to another and the social systems live through a system of institutionalized values, in regard to which its members must be strongly united and attached and must adhere in their actions.

While developing as „zoon politikon" (social animal), we discharge and receive cultural information, we polish and give us the finishing touches as creative beings, defining individual and collective cultural horizons for us. Today it is unanimously accepted the idea according to which a society cannot exist in any of the historical phases of its evolution without a cultural minimum.

We do not find a society in the history of mankind that does not build itself a cultural structure centered on the legacy determined by the degree of evolution of the production forces specific to that society.

The new thinking of systems and the different forms of artistic expression existing in the contemporary culture are generated by the fundamental changes that took place in different areas of cultural creation, technical progress and political organization. Most changes happened in science and in the space of aesthetic creation, subsequently expanding in the technical and economic plane of civilization, planes without which one cannot understand the characteristics of the contemporary world.

By means of the individual and collective communication of behavioral models, acquired attitudes and reactions, it is obvious that shaping the human personality is conditioned by culture, this being the one where through social and cognitive experiences are preserved and affirmation mechanisms of the human being are set up.

[1] Senior Lecturer, Ph. D., University of Craiova, (email: andreea_nita2005@yahoo.com).

People's ability to form personal pertinent opinions that retrospect exactly to the given reality is achieved as a result of the received education, for the latter has as specific function to methodically develop and create the capacities, feelings and tastes of the individual. From a social and economic point of view, nowadays' culture is dominated by the confusion of the right and responsible choice to the confusion everyone experiments when he/she must choose the right way or option.

The frequent legislative changes in education have generated disorientation and confusion regarding the adequate construction of a social and educational curriculum, which led to the elaboration of culturally defective text books, to the fragilization of the spiritual horizon, to the alienation of the young generations from reading and to the emphasis of the advanced electronic technologies appropriation as means of information and culturalization. The educational environment is not however the only tributary of the cultural vulnerabilization of the young generation, for the family environment has a similar importance in forming and consolidating the complex system of cultural attributes, faiths, morals, feelings and perceptions.

Individuals give originality to each country or each nation and they have determined the elaboration of their own answers to the fundamental problems of mankind. These answers are just as many possibilities to progress in science, culture and civilization. The proposed and adopted solutions have made the difference, up to now, with specific contrasts being developed among individuals: starting from the attitudes they adopt regarding a certain activity to the each one's form of sensing certain norms, values or attitudes.

Development is also a cultural process not only an economic one and the density of cultural creation, especially the scientific one, has projected certain societies in the vanguard of contemporary civilization. The interest for the problems of culture is related today to the new models of social development and the fact that the constitutive elements of culture have become decisive factors of social change.

Contemporary culture cannot be appreciated unless we know the main processes and phenomena that lately have generated impressive changes in the area of technology and means of communication. Due to these transformations we witness a change of the cultural paradigms, a mutation of values. At global level there is a certain cultural competition between societies, competition in which everybody defends and develops their own interests by means of the creative contribution they bring to community.

National identity vs. cultural processes of globalization

The 20th century has determined radical changes in the area of culture, among which we can emphasize the extraordinary successes obtained in scientific knowledge, hence the major importance given to values of science, acceleration of cultural changes, the crisis of traditional values, the increase in intensity of creation, the rapid integration of cultural values in the system of social activities through mass media, the democratization of the access to culture, the expansion of mass culture, etc.

One of the most debated themes is the one of the relation between cultural and national identity and the processes of economic globalization, having special implications for the understanding of the European integration process. It is much insisted on the problem of cultural diversity. It is extremely important the recognition and awareness of the differences and identities between cultures, while trying to have an intercultural dialogue. The expansion of the European Union represents an opportunity to know the culture of different countries and an attempt for mutual understanding, beyond the economic advantages.

In the last years the academic researches as well as the ones ordered by big companies or international structures have dealt with identifying the role culture has in social development and what impact the cultural processes or phenomena have on individuals.

The visibility of culture as central factor of the development of contemporary societies is also favored by the globalization of the economies and the ascension of the means of production and communication.

The extraordinary development of industry, agriculture, transports, science, etc finds a correspondent in culture. Today we witness an unprecedented development of culture in all areas. The last decades have made available a huge mass of cultural values, statistics showing that in the world there annually appear hundreds of thousands of book titles, an impressive number of radio and TV programs are broadcasted, there are painted and shown plays as never before. We have reached a cultural explosion, especially in production and in distribution, the individual having facilitated access to all the cultural goods, being able to choose the manner in which he/she wishes to fulfill his/her cultural needs. Some cultural goods, like movies, TV programs or books are conceived to be only a result in an industrial production.

The cultural industries in The European Union – cinematography and the audiovisual, editing, music and arts – are an important source of income and places of work. The European Union has support programs for certain industries in the area of culture, encouraging them to take advantage of the opportunities offered by the sole market and the digital technologies. Furthermore, it tries to create a dynamic environment for these industries simplifying the administrative procedures, facilitating the access to financing, contributing with research projects and encouraging a closer cooperation with partners from inside and outside the Union.

Cultural industrialization developed through the means of mass communication. Of course it had major advantages, but the tendency of product making and distribution led to self consumership. The multiplication of passions justifies the reactions to the industrialization of culture, the number of collectors, amateur artists or passionate in an area or another visibly increasing. A manner of interpreting these tendencies is the analysis of subjective participation of readers, spectators and listeners to the ideal and emotional making of contemporary art works. The convincing example is the Internet, which allows the production of large ranges of goods and by means of this channel the individual can easily consume culture. On the Internet we find cultural magazines and online bookshops, cultural publications and sites addressing the amateurs.

Contemporary culture also supposes at the same time the increase of the necessary of investments in different cultural areas, in auditoriums that need substantially enhanced improvements in regard to previous years or in libraries that must be fitted with modern and expensive electronic equipments.

In contemporary society we talk about mass culture as being the direct result of mass media action, professionals studying the audiences seeking „rather to impress the public opinion than capture it", „to influence it rather than measure it". The effect of this culture consists in the uniformization of the ways of thinking and behaviors, prevailing in this area the entertainment which keeps the individual outside the problems of society. Mircea Eliade emphasized the manner in which the whole mediatic system carries a series of wasted and unproductive myths in order to orient the community in a desired direction and to obtain invisible political effects.

Modern and urbanized societies are mass societies with urban agglomerations and compared to the traditional ones, they introduce a new style of life in which time is severely segmented. From this reason there also appeared the individual's social need to spend this free time carrying out cultural activities but amusing at the same time. Specialized cultural creations have a prevalent value system, yet when it comes to mass culture we notice an increased tendency towards the commercial side. The products of this culture must be sold and their production must be profitable.

This type of culture has become a reality in contemporary societies acquiring a more and more important role in current society. The success and attraction of the new forms of mass culture combine the informational and educational dimension with the entertainment one, becoming dominant forms in developed societies, which led to the expansion and penetration of this type of culture in societies with a peripheral economic and political statute.

Today there is also much talk about a rather classic opposition, namely, culture versus technology. The first assures the difference and the second one is seen as an agent of integration. Due to the technological explosion that clutched human community but also the way in which individuals have changed their priorities and concerns, it came to talking about the decline culture has, naming this phenomenon „culture crisis".

The term „culture crisis" belongs to each person's value judgment on culture at a certain moment, judgment that can be molded but that can be influenced at any moment according to the context we refer to. This crisis can be different, in the sense that it can exist at the creator's level, the consumer's but also the culture critic's level.

Régis Debray highlighted two reasons of cultural crisis the world is going through, namely: the rapid increase of the population, but also local retirement which the technological globalization reactivates, according to a model of inverse proportionality. The more people start to resemble, the more individuals try to differ and this last effort is done through local cultures.

Cultural consumption does not represent such a recent phenomenon as one might believe, it has been debated for a long time, it is an ancient yet new theme, a complex subject that does not include only reading or the representatives of elite culture, theatre, library, museum, etc., but also the products of technology, TV, radio, PC, etc. In a world where almost everything can be quantified, culture and people's adherence to it does not get rid of measurements. And in recession times, cultural consumption decreases. At least that is the situation of Romania, reflected by a barometer elaborated by the Centre of Studies and Researches in the Area of Culture, subordinated to the resort Ministry in Bucharest.

The cultural practices are studied by the National Institute of Statistics and Economic Studies (INSEE) within the budgetary expenses of households. The first such inquiries were initiated in the 19th century by Federic Le Play. Besides the inquiries regarding consumption expenses, in the last years many inquiries were made regarding holidays or the spending of free time.

When making a technical analysis of the current development of civilization one can notice a close connection between industry and culture, some professional authors talking about an industrialization of culture or about the culturalization of industry. The industrial revolution eliminated from people's life the aesthetic dimension that the hand - made world had. With the lapse of time, it was spread the conviction according to which technique and art irremediably separated. We can however notice the connection between artistic means and contemporary aesthetic conceptions, but also that absolute frontier where technique develops.

In the work „The culture consumers", Alvin Toffler shapes the idea according to which the increase in the number of artists imposes a competition which implicitly leads to virtuousness. Toffler states that wages in art are very low. Referring to the "industry of culture" the author shows that there are two types of cultural institutions: the ones that act in the payable area (commercial books publishing, CDs production) and others that act as nonprofit institution (theatres, opera houses, museums etc). Of these types of institutions, the nonprofit ones are confronted with financial problems, they usually activate in deficit, while the ones in the payable area can be prosperous institutions.

One cannot say one culture is superior or inferior to another culture, but we can discuss the inequalities which happened in their development. Nowadays there are different possibilities of production, distribution and access to culture between various countries due to the economic discrepancies. The cultural development of poor countries cannot be limited to preserving traditions and folklore, as those are starting to become an exponent for different occasions or for foreign tourists.

„We need a huge amount of money to produce culture*"*. Therefore "cultural industry" is organized around various half - learned who present only a material interest for culture.

CONCLUSIONS

Synthesizing, we can state that in contemporary culture the generally human, moral or aesthetic ideals found a wide reflection, the individuals cultivating pride sentiments towards the national values.

Going through a period of mutual assimilation of the national and European values, but also the permanent exercise of keeping native - born values belong to an old principle of preserving the verticality of national culture. The cultural dialogue we should be suggesting to Europe, without concessions, without identity loss, without the sentiment of marginalization should come first in detriment of the assimilation of European principles as something compulsory preassigned, even though after Romania's adheraration to the European Union we have acquired its cultural policies' principle, that of absolute respect given to cultural diversity, with accent on the European common cultural heritage.

The legislation, institutional structure and adopted programs, initiated and made by Romania in the area of culture are in full agreement with the provisions of the Treaty on the European Community, as well as those of the Parliament and Council Decision regarding the starting of the Program "Culture – 2000", provisions that emphasized the improvement of spreading knowledge about the culture and history of the European states, preserving and protecting the European cultural heritage, developing non - commercial cultural changes and supporting artistic and literary creation, including that of the audiovisual sector.

The principles and objectives assumed by Romania in elaborating its cultural policies are respected just as in all European Union member states:

· Cultural policy is considered a key component of the development strategy;

· Cultural policies promote creativity and participation to cultural life;

· Cultural policies consolidate the measures to preserve the cultural heritage and promote cultural industries;

· Cultural policies promote cultural and linguistic diversity in informational society;

· Cultural policies assure the increase of human and financial resources for the culture's development.

The main objectives of cultural policies in Romania consider all the elements that configure cultural life - contemporary creation, cultural heritage and the dissemination of culture, they balance themes and make them compatible with the principles and objectives internationally identified, but also with the national demands and traditions. Thus, cultural policy in Romania is based on 6 main principles:

· the principle of protecting the national cultural heritage, according to which the values and goods that belong to the cultural legacy have the quality of fundamental resources of knowing our past and present;

· the principle of creation freedom, according to which the freedom of artistic expression and public communication of artistic works and performances represents not only a fundamental right, but also an essential element of human progress;

· the principle of independence of cultural institutions, according to which initiating and carrying cultural programs and projects cannot be restricted or censored due to ethnic, religious, political criteria or to satisfy some group interests;

· the principle of value primordiality, according to which it is ensured the creation of material and moral conditions, it is supported and promoted the application of specific evaluation and selection criteria, the affirmation of creativity and talent;

· the principle of equal chance to culture, according to which by means of the harmonization of cultural policies at national level with those at local level it is ensured the access and participation of all citizens to culture, as well as the development of the spiritual life of collectivities, in all their diversity;

· the principle of cultural identity in the world value circuit, according to which it is ensured the protection and valorization of cultural legacy, it is supported and promoted the introduction in the national and international cultural circuit of the values of national spirituality and is facilitated the circulation inside the country of the values of universal culture.

The European Union proposes and develops important programs to preserve and valorize the intangible heritage. But the success and particularly the authenticity of the considered phenomena depend on the good intention, honesty and, last but not least, competence of those involved in such wide scope activities.

So that the European Union to be able to develop viable cultural policies we need to solidly know the past as well as to cultivate a respect for diversity. In this sense, Romano Prodi states the fact that in the moment in which Europe extends, comprising the great Slavic cultural traditions, more than ever we cannot let anything from the common European identity be lost and everything to coexist in a higher and more vigorous synthesis.

Europe is the continent of numerous national communities, with its own features, cultures and languages, a mixture of complementary identities in a vital way. Constantin Noica, in „De dignitate Europae" (1988), presents the cultural concept through the potential of constant evolution of a individuality up to the level of assessment and recognition of the general, the construction of that individuality that will obtain unity.

Preserving the national cultural identities, the heritage of identity values and identifying the values common at European level are the only forms in which the European Union will be able to keep the ideals it was founded for, proving that globalization can determine the ambivalence of the terms „European culture" and a „Europe of cultures".

A political culture of the developed countries is supported by the United Nations (UN) by means of the General Declaration of Human Rights. The society is in continuous change and the change it displays sometimes brings unbalance and instability. Many times changes are benefic and necessary, but they should also be guided by the norms imposed by every culture.

„This paper has been made within the project "Valorification of cultural identities in global processes", co - financed by the European Union and the Government of Romania from the European Social Fund by means of the Sectoral Operational Programme Human Resources Development 2007-2013, financing contract no. POSDRU/89/1.5/S/59758

References

- Alexander, Jeffrey C., Seidmann, Steven, Culture and society. Contemporary debates, Institutul European, Iasi, 2001
- Arendt, Hannah, La Crise de la Culture, Gallimard, Paris, 1972
- Bera, Mathieu, Lamy, Yvon, Sociologie de la culture, Armand Colin, Paris, 2003
- Blondiaux, Loic, La Fabrique de l`opinion, Une Histoire sociale des sondages, Seuil, Paris, 1998.
- Connor, Steven, Postmodern culture, Meridiane publishing house, Bucharest, 1999
- Ciurtin , Eugen, "Eastern Europe," in Gregory D. ALLES (ed.), Religious Studies: A Global View, London - New York, Routledge, 2008
- Eliade, Mircea, Mituri, vise şi mistere (Myths, dreams and mysteries), Bucharest, Univers Enciclopedic publishing house, 1998.
- Gellner, Ernest, Culture, identity and policies, Institutul European publishing house, Iaşi, 2001
- Georgiu, Grigore, Filozofia Culturii. Cultură şi comunicare. (Philosophy of Culture. Culture and communication), Comunicare publishing house, Bucharest, 2004
- Levi-Strauss, Claude, Introduction a l`oeuvre de Marcel Mauss, Sociologie et Anthropologie, PUF, Paris, 1950

- Otovescu, Dumitru (coord.), Sociologia Culturii – Antologie autori străini, (Sociology of Culture. Anthology of foreign authors) IInd edition, Beladi publishing house, Craiova, 2010
- Otovescu, Dumitru (coord.), Tratat de sociologie generală (Discourse of general sociology) Beladi publishing house, Craiova, 2010
- Parsons, Talcott, Edward Shils*, Values, Motives and Systems of Actions*, Cambridge, Mass: Harvard University Press, 1951
- Preda, Marian, Globalizarea politicilor sociale, (Globalization of social policies) in Pop, L. M. (coord.), 2002, Dictionary of Social Policies, Expert, Bucharest, 2002
- Prodi, Romano, O viziune asupra Europei, (A vision on Europe) Polirom, Bucharest, 2001
- Rezsohazy, Rudolf, Sociologia valorilor, Institutul European Bucureşti, 2008
- Toffler, Alvin, Consumatorii de cultură, (The culture consumers) Time Warner Books publishing house, 1995

E-LEARNING INNOVATIONS IN HIGHER EDUCATION

NICOLETA GUDĂNESCU[*]
MARIA-LOREDANA POPESCU[]

Abstract
This scientific work is presenting the ways to do computer assisted education for students, giving the good practice examples, presenting new electronic learning systems, the advantages and limits and to try to emphasize that these days E-learning is one of the most efficient way to reach education at all levels, specially higher education systems. The objectives of this paper are: to explain the contribution of modern technologies and electronic systems to educational processes, to define the concept of technology based learning, to introduce the electronic tools for education, to present good practice examples in implementing E-learning systems in higher education and corporate environment in Romania and last but not least the new electronic learning systems. Introducing the computers and ITC in educational processes facilitates them and makes the educational system modern and efficient. E - learning innovations offers a core group of professional development courses designed to help anyone achieve professional advancement and personal enrichment. The programs are founded on an extensive experience and understanding of technology-based learning environments. They focus on the most current industry practices for various learning environments and best approaches for multiple learning styles. They ensure that the students get the information and skills needed to achieve more in teaching practice and to confidently enter the distance or online classroom.

Keywords: E-learning,technology based learning, electronic learning platform, Learning Management Systems, Integrated Learning Systems.

Introduction

The scientific work refers to e-learning concept and it's introduction in higher education systems as support for an efficient learning.

The importance of this study resides in the fact that the introduction of ITC in educational processes, helps to modernize on one hand and facilitates on the other hand, this processes. The objectives of the study are: to explain the contribution of modern technologies and electronic systems to educational processes, to define the concept of technology based learning, to introduce the electronic tools for education, to present good practice examples in implementing E-learning systems in higher education and corporate environment in Romania and last but not least the new electronic learning systems.

The way of responding to the challenges of this theme is finding the new discoveries of the domain, presenting and adapting them to the requests of the large public, of teachers and students.

The authors have studied and used in practice the main electronic tools for education like: Learning Management Systems, Integrated Learning Systems, On-line forums, Web conferences.

In present we live in an era of technology. Technology has become an important component of our lives and we cannot develop diverse activities without it. Every day appears new gadgets or software that makes lives easier and improves the technology and software that already exists. Making lives easier is not, however, the only role technology plays in our lives.

The latest E-learning Innovations such as mobile learning (MLearning – Tremblay, 2010) or web based collaborative open environments (Lewin, 2011) makes the education more competitive but also saves resources now and in the future.

[*] Ph. D., „Nicolae Titulescu" University, Faculty of Economic Sciences, Bucharest, Romania, (email: n.gudanescu@gmail.com).
[]Assistant Lecturer, „Nicolae Titulescu" University, Faculty of Economic Sciences, Bucharest, Romania, (email: maria.loredana_popescu@yahoo.com).

Technology is playing an increasing role in education. As technology advances, it is used for the benefit of students and people of all ages in the learning processes.

Considering the Handbook of Human Performance Technology (J.A.Pershing, 2006), the word technology for the sister fields of Educational and Human Performance Technology means "applied science."In other words, any valid and reliable process or procedure that is derived from basic research using the "scientific method" is considered a "technology." The word technology, comes from the Greek "Techne" which means craft or art. Another word "technique", with the same origin, also may be used when considering the field Educational technology. So, Educational technology may be extended to include the techniques of the educator and educators often named Educational Technologists.

Technology used in the classroom helps students to learn easier the materials presented in different courses. For example, since some people are visual learners, projection screens linked to computers can allow students to see their notes instead of simply listening to a teacher deliver a course without any technical mean.

In the same direction software can be used to supplement class curriculum, to improve the educative process by adding practical aspects to the course. Also, the programs provide study questions, activities, and even tests and quizzes for a class that can help students continue learning outside the classroom.

Technology has also become part of many curriculums, even for other courses out of computer and technology classes. Students use computers to create presentations and use the Internet in order to research topics for papers and essays, to get tests and materials for learning. Students also learn how to use the technology available to them in any type of courses but especially in computer classes. This ensures that after graduation they will be able to use the information technology in their work, which may put them ahead of someone who didn't have access to a particular technology or software in their school.

The information technology advances yearly, so the students have better access to educational opportunities. When something new and "better" appears, the "older" technology becomes more affordable, allowing it to be used in educational processes, even when schools are on a tight budget.

Technology based learning

Technology based learning is the way of learning using the electronic technology such as internet, intranet, audio and video conferencing, webcasts etc. On-line learning and computer based learning means the learning using the computer, respective the internet and modern technology. The synonymous of Technology based learning is the e-learning concept, largely spread at all the levels of educational process in our days. .

Educational technology may be extended to include the techniques of the educator and educators often named Educational Technologists.

The time saved and also the efficiency of using technology for educational purposes recommends it as the newest trend in the knowledge based economy and society. Making a parallel between education in old economy and in knowledge based economy.

Old economy	Knowledge Based Economy
Four years degree	Forty-years degree
Training and Cost Center	Training as Competitive Advantage
Learner mobility	Content mobility
Distance education	Distributed learning
Correspondence & Video	High tech Multimedia Centers
Generic programs	Tailored programs

Geographic centers	Brand Name Universities and Celebrity Professors
Isolated	Virtual Learning Commities

Table 1. Education in knowledge economy

Source: N.Gudanescu, Using modern technology for improving learning process at different educational levels, Procedia Social and Behavioral Sciences

"Educational technology" represents the using of modern technology in educational processes, in order to improve teaching and learning. Educational technology is also known as „learning technology'' or „instructional technology'' and includes web-sites, electronic platforms, educational software, educational electronic materials, interactive blackboards and videoconference systems for distance learning.

E-learning comprises all forms of electronically supported learning and teaching. The information and communication systems, whether networked learning or not, serve as specific media to implement the learning process. The term will still most likely be utilized to reference out-of-classroom and in-classroom educational experiences via technology, even as advances continue in regard to devices and curriculum.

E-learning is essentially the computer and network-enabled transfer of skills and knowledge. E-learning applications and processes include Web-based learning, computer-based learning, virtual education opportunities and digital collaboration. Content is delivered via the Internet, intranet/internet, audio or video tape, satellite TV and CD-ROM.

Abbreviations like CBT (Computer-Based Training), IBT (Internet-Based Training) or WBT (Web-Based Training) have been used in time as synonyms to e-learning. This system is largely used today, that's why it has to be reglemented by establishing rules and principles of functioning.

E-learning principles are:

E-learning is a way of doing education that can be applied within varying education models (face to face or distance education)

E-learning is a unique form of education that combines face to face and distance education

The importance of how is technology used in the educational process and the technical level of a course

The E-learning means the implementation of innovative educational methods

E-learning can be used in two ways; the presentation of educational content, and the facilitation of educational processes

E-learning uses a standard model of courses accepted by the educational authorities from each country

E-learning offers new opportunities of education for the users

Some of the advantages that technology and electronic tools provides are:

The modernization of the educational process;

A better communication between the professors and students;

A raising participation of the students in educational programs, university courses or training sessions;

The innovation in educational programs;

Facilitates the educational act.

The limits at least in some of the countries like Romania are:

The missing of the face to face contact between professors and students;

Difficulties in the computer utilization by the older professors or students;

The evaluation process is more stressing for the students, because the grades and qualifications are generated by the computer;

Difficulties in publishing the courses (platform contents) because of the lack in author's rights legislation.

We can say that the system is useful and helps to modernize, innovate and facilitate the educational process.

E - learning Innovations is committed to professional success. Benefits of training include:

A flexible and progressive online learning format

A collaborative and blended learning environment

Immediate, practical application

Individual mentoring and coaching

Certification through a combination of selected courses

Can be tailored to specific technologies or environments

Electronic tools for education

A few of the many electronic tools used to deliver in modern conditions the education and specialization among students are Learning Management Systems (known as LMS), Integrated Learning Systems, On-line forums, and not for the last Web Conferences.

Learning Management Systems

A learning management system (LMS) is a software application or Web-based technology used to plan, implement, and assess a specific learning process. Typically, a learning management system provides an instructor with a way to create and deliver content, monitor student participation, and assess student performance. A learning management system may also provide students with the ability to use interactive features such as threaded discussions, video conferencing, and discussion forums.

In another definition a Learning Management System (commonly abbreviated as LMS) is a software application for the administration, documentation, tracking, and reporting of training programs, classroom and online events, e-learning programs, and training content. As described in (Ellis 2009) a robust LMS should be able to do the following:

centralize and automate administration of documents, students and other useful information use self-service and self-guided services assemble and deliver learning content rapidly consolidate training initiatives on a scalable web-based platform support portability and standards personalize content and enable knowledge reuse.

Some LMSs are Web-based to facilitate access to learning content and administration from distance. LMSs are used generally by universities (educational institutions) to enhance and support classroom teaching and offering courses to a larger population of learners across the country or continent but can be used very frequently for adult preparation and specialization at the work-place or in organized training sessions.

The virtual learning environment used by universities and colleges allow professors/tutors to manage their courses and exchange information with students for a course that in most cases will last several weeks and will meet several times during those weeks. In the corporate environment setting a course may be much shorter, easier to present as content and completed in a single instructor-led event or online session. The characteristics shared by both types of LMSs for universities and for education for adults and instruction are:

Manage users, roles, courses, instructors, facilities, and generate reports for any person or activity.

Generate Courses calendar

Offers learning path

Student messaging and notifications

Assessment and testing handling before and after following the course Generates automatic tests choosing different ways to combine the questions
Display scores and transcripts
Grading of coursework and roster processing, including wait listing
Web-based or blended course delivery

The soft platform is not so important for the end users, they are interested in the facilities offered by the platform, easy access, courses posted, forums, tests, case studies etc. The information posted on the platforms is known as learning content.

A learning content management system (LCMS) is a related technology to the learning management system that it is focused on the development, management and publishing of the content that will typically be delivered thorough an LMS. An LCMS is a multi-user environment where developers may create, store, use, manage, and deliver digital learning content from a central object repository. In the university environment as well as in the corporate environment the content is made by courses, case studies and practical materials of study, tests and recapitulative questions sets, training modules etc. The learning materials (learning objects) are not only written materials, but graphics, audio and video materials for courses and training support. The materials are posted by the teachers, trainers and platform administrators but also by the students on share section.

Integrated Learning Systems

Integrated Learning Systems (abbreviated as ILS) are hardware and software solutions designed to deliver instructional content. The effective delivery of that content is measured, monitored, and maintained with an array of assessment and management tools that may also be part of that system.

Comparing with static online help or even animated tutorials, Integrated Learning Systems are highly interactive and designed to provide feedback as to progress and grasp of the subject matter at hand. Built-in tools further allow professors to monitor and measure a student's progress.

Integrated Learning Systems are packages of networked hardware and software used for education. Such systems provide instructional content as well as assessment and management tools. In an integrated learning system program, each student studies at his or her level, because an adaptive testing algorithm places every student at a level appropriate for the instructional process. In a number of off-the-shelf, drill-and-practice programs, no adaptive testing occurs, and the student works at whatever "level" of the program he or she chooses.

Integrated Learning Systems require a significant commitment of implementation expense, time, and effort. Researchers remain divided on their long-term value. Students using these systems have been shown to perform significantly better than equivalent control groups. Being instructional systems can be successfully used for the adults also that are in the process of learning a trade.

An ILS is made up of two components, Computer Aided Instruction (CAI) modules (often called courseware) and a Management System.

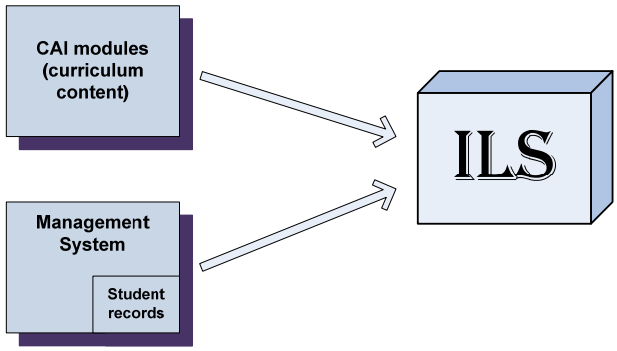

Figure 2.The scheme of an Integrated Learning System

The Management System keeps records of the students' performance and, in some cases depending on the software, moves them through the levels of difficulty as appropriate. It also allows the professors to configure all the different course options, to suit their own teaching styles and the needs of their students.

The key features of an ILS are as follows:

Each student has an individualized learning program. If they perform well, they can make rapid progress onto higher levels of difficulty. If they experience problems, they are given more practice and may also be given additional tutorials and support questions on the various skills needed to deal with a particular topic.

Professors have access to a lot of data for monitoring students' progress. This will highlight students who are experiencing difficulty and who are in need of additional support. This data is gathered automatically and can be printed out in a series of different reports.

Students performance is constantly monitored by the Management System.

Students get immediate feedback after every question. This can raise motivation and accelerate learning.

The benefits that can be achieved through the use of an ILS can be:

Significant learning gains in mathematics

Significant learning gains in English or any other language that uses the ILS

Improved motivation and attitude to work

Improved performance in all curriculum areas because of the first three benefits

On-line forums

A forum is hierarchical or tree-like in structure: a forum can contain a number of sub forums, each of which may have several topics. Within a forum's topic, each new discussion started is called a thread, and can be replied to by as many people as wish to. Depending on the forum's settings, users can be anonymous or have to register with the forum and then subsequently log in order to post messages. On most forums, users do not have to log in to read existing messages.

The talkers share their own knowledge with others, by giving them information or advices, also specialists in different domains present on the forums can give the interested ones the right data. But, in the majority of the cases when we talk about electronic educational systems, the on-line forums are integrated in LMS or ILS. These forums are administrated by the teachers and platforms administrators that manage the entire system. In the case of the teachers as moderators they have to respond to the students' questions and guide them in the way of learning the most important things for their future.

Every day, millions of users log on to their favorite online forums, communities and social spaces and interact with others to get advice and discuss everything from the latest news and trends to their hobbies and professions to whatever else strikes their fancy. Administrators have to lead these communities, deal with difficult users, manage staff members and make tough decisions. Legal constraints, spammers and technical issues can turn the excitement of running an on-line community into chaos.

The steps to create an on-line forum are:
Creating an organizational structure
Designing and launching the community
Deciding on user options like private messaging
Promoting and attracting members
Utilizing technology to members benefit
Developing and enforcing guidelines
Choosing and managing moderators
Shutting down users who disrupt and harm the community
Involving the users and keeping the site interesting and inviting Generating revenue

Web Conferences and Video Conferences

Web Conferencing refers to a service that allows conferencing events to be shared with remote locations. The service allows information to be shared simultaneously, across geographically dispersed locations in nearly real-time. Applications for web conferencing include meetings, training events, lectures, or short presentations from any computer. A participant can be either an individual person or a group. System requirements that allow individuals within a group to participate as individuals, when an audience participant asks a question, depend on the size of the group. Handling such requirements is often the responsibility of the group. In general, system requirements depend on the vendor. The service is made possible by Internet technologies, particularly on IP/TCP connections.

For interactive online workshops web conferences are complemented by electronic meeting systems (EMS) which provide a range of on-line facilitation tools such as brainstorming and categorization, a range of voting methods or structured discussions, typically with optional anonymity. Typically, EMS do not provide core web conferencing functionality such as screen sharing or voice conferencing though some EMS can control web conferencing sessions.

Other typical features of a web conference include:

Slide show presentations - where images are presented to the audience and markup tools and a remote mouse pointer are used to engage the audience while the presenter discusses slide content

Live or Streaming video - where full motion webcam, digital video camera or multi-media files are pushed to the audience

VoIP (Real time audio communication through the computer via use of headphones and speakers)

Web tours - where URLs, data from forms, cookies, scripts and session data can be pushed to other participants enabling them to be pushed though web based logons, clicks, etc. This type of feature works well when demonstrating websites where users themselves can also participate

Meeting Recording - where presentation activity is recorded on the client side or server side for later viewing and/or distribution

Whiteboard with annotation, allowing the presenter and/or attendees to highlight or mark items on the slide presentation. Or, simply make notes on a blank whiteboard

Text chat - For live question and answer sessions, limited to the people connected to the meeting. Text chat may be public (to all participants) or private (between 2 participants)

Polls and surveys (allows the presenter to conduct questions with multiple choice answers directed to the audience)

Screen sharing/desktop sharing/application sharing (where participants can view anything the presenter currently has shown on their screen. Some screen sharing applications allow for remote desktop control, allowing participants to manipulate the presenters screen, although this is not widely used.)

Videoconference (video conferencing)

A videoconference is a live connection between people in separate locations for the purpose of communication, usually involving audio and often text as well as video. At its simplest, videoconferencing provides transmission of static images and text between two locations. At its most sophisticated, it provides transmission of full-motion video images and high-quality audio between multiple locations. Videoconferencing software is quickly becoming standard computer equipment. Digital Camera afford the user easy - and cheap - live connections to distant friends and family. Although the audio and video quality of such a minimal setup is not high, the combined benefits of a video link and long-distance savings may be quite persuasive.

The tangible benefits for businesses using videoconferencing include lower travel costs and profits gained from offering videoconferencing as an aspect of customer service. The intangible benefits include the facilitation of group work among geographically distant teammates and a stronger sense of community among business contacts, both within and between companies. In terms of group work, users can chat, transfer files, share programs, send and receive graphic data, and operate computers from remote locations. On a more personal level, the face-to-face connection adds non-verbal communication to the exchange and allows participants to develop a stronger sense of familiarity with individuals they may never actually meet in the same place.

A videoconference can be thought of as a phone call with pictures - Microsoft refers to that aspect of its NetMeeting package as a "web phone" - and indications suggest that videoconferencing will some day become the primary mode of distance communication.

The latest Electronic Learning Systems

The innovation regarding the E-learning technologies is on one side the mobile learning and on the other side the collaborative open environments/workplaces.

3.1 MLearning

MLearning (Mobile learning) is the newest discovery in the field and represents the learning using mobile devices or in other definition: ‘Any sort of learning that happens when the learner is not a fixed, predetermined location, or learning that happens when the learner takes advantage of the learning opportunities offered by mobile technologies’.

Learner access to m-learning project systems and materials was via a microportal (mPortal), which consists of a series of mini web pages with navigation pointing to:

learning materials
mini web Page Builder tools a collaborative activities tool (the mediaBoard) peer-to-peer communication services (messages, chat, discussion and blogs) the learning management system simple help guides for the system links to places on the Web that may be helpful or interesting for our target audience.

The mPortal also manages the ‘behind the scenes’ integration and security.

The Page Builder tools within the mPortal allow learners to create and edit their own mini web pages for viewing on mobile devices (and also accessible from a desktop computer) in a password-protected environment.

The pages learners create can contain a number of different elements including text, pictures, movies, animations, audio, blogs (a short version of the term 'web log', meaning a publicly accessible web-based journal), conversations and links to any web pages chosen by the learner.

3.2 Virtual Collaborative open Environments/Workplaces

A Collaborative Workspace or shared workspace is an inter-connected environment in which all the participants in dispersed locations can access and interact with each other just as inside a single entity.

The environment may be supported by electronic communications and groupware which enable participants to overcome space and time differentials. These are typically enabled by a shared mental model, common information, and a shared understanding by all of the participants regardless of physical location.

Communication comes in two forms: synchronous and asynchronous. Asynchronous communication includes email and shared file systems where information is exchanged back and forth in a non-interactive, sequential manner. The popularity of synchronous forms has increased over recent years driven by improvements in processing capabilities and the widespread availability of high speed internet. These include video and voice messaging services including shared whiteboard capabilities. Program sharing has also become available to allow remote users to share much more detailed information through CAD packages, spreadsheets, etc. and have access to these in real time.

Examples of good practice in implementing E-learning systems in higher education

The e-learning concept is frequently used in our country in these days. Now in Romania all prestigious companies and universities have e-learning platforms thus contributing to lifelong learning even from long distances from the educational source.

Some examples are: Universities that implemented and use the e-learning system for students distance learning like Academy of Economic Studies from Bucharest, NicolaeTitulescu University, Titu Maiorescu University which uses for the moment a moodle platform but is implementing an European project financed from structural funds which main objective is the creation of a e-learning platform, Valahia University from Targoviste and so on. Being a express request from Education Ministry that each university that organize distance courses to have a e-learning platform, many universities from our country are searching modalities to have a such platform. Because the costs are in some cases bigger than the universities financial possibilities they write and implement European projects in order to finance an e-learning platform.

An example of good practice is the E-learning system implemented by NicolaeTitulescu University.

Figure 3.NicolaeTitulescu University site: www.univnt.ro

The students can connect to the electronic distance learning platform using a browser-based application such as Microsoft Internet Explorer, Opera, Firefox etc. at http://elis.univnt.ro/ or university site www.univnt.ro through the button "Login Student" (left side of the page www.univnt.ro). The students will enter login information into a web page similar to the following image:

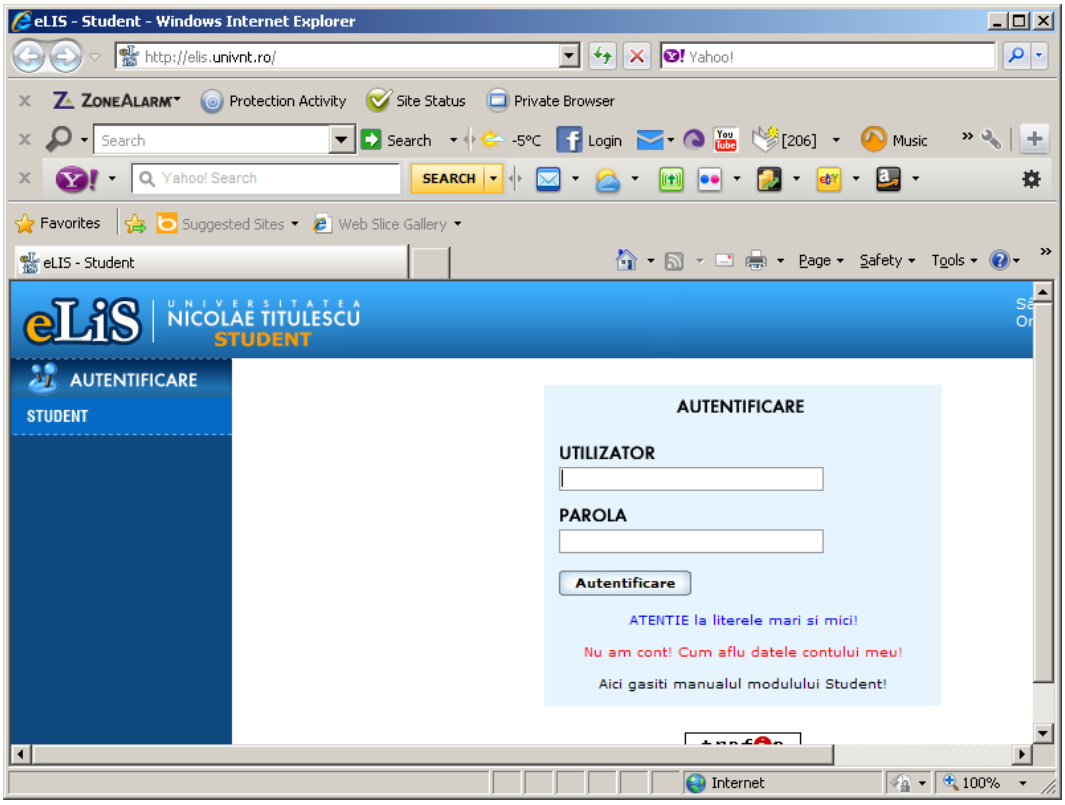

Figure 4.E-Lis Platform, Nicolae Titulescu University

Once connected to the electronic platform, students can access the following types of information:

- downloading of courses, course materials
- assessment of knowledge through online tests
- access syllabus and curricula
- the school situation
- the financial situation
- announcements at different levels (University, faculty, academic year), to provide bidirectional communication
- to address tutors, they can view their email addresses on the www.univnt.ro
- bibliography.

The advantages of electronic eLis platform are:

- the Platform enables access to the electronic course materials, assessment tests
- electronic platform provides bidirectional communication through the posts
- with electronic platform you can send messages and post announcements to the entire University, to a group or to a particular academic year. Teachers also are assigned an username and a password. They can access the electronic platform, too. Also, each teacher is assigned to a University e-mail box so this way it can ensure communication with students.

Another example of good practice is the E-learning system implemented by Ecologic University from Bucharest :

Figure 5.Start Web Page U.E.B.(Ecological University of Bucharest http://www.kopernic.ueb.ro/GUI/Desktop.aspx)

The teacher will be able to see the system access history by his students (number and login, download documents, etc.) and can choose whether it will help in establishing activating the final grade. During the course, the students have associated a teacher who will be able to view a report history for each student to access the system and can then take into account the historical mark the award. Activity Report will include student name, date and time of action (connecting to the system, disconnect, download documents, etc.).

Students can download their documents uploaded by teachers for school materials from the plan. After connecting a student in the system, among other things, will see the list of courses that is registered. When you choose a course will open a page with all the details of that course: title, description, teacher, etc. and also loaded the professor for that course.

Students can download/upload electronic files in default locations (essays, themes, etc). For each course, students can download materials and their various topics, as described in the previous paragraph. Also students will be able to upload the server various themes or essays. Once they are loaded, the teacher will receive a message informing the student that made a theme and will have a link to access that topic.

Students can ask questions to teachers in private or public system.

A student will be able to view posts related to his account and his notes for each subject.

Both students and teachers will have their mail box, where they can view past messages and they will be able to send other messages in the system. The system will also have a chat, where you can discuss general topics in real-time.

The teachers can define a set of test questions and they can choose by checking questions, those that are public, meaning that students can access as a sort of quiz to prepare for the exam.

At the date set by teachers, students will be able to pass the tests for materials studied, displaying to the final result.

Conclusions

Considering the scope and the results of this work we can conclude that the E-learning is the best way to achieve education these days, when the resources are limited by the global economic decline, because is more cheaper for the people, especially students and for the educational institutions where a small number of teachers are involved and one time buying the new technology.

Technology is making it possible for teachers to reach more to the students, allowing students the time they need to learn, accumulate, succeed, and providing our future workforce with competent, knowledgeable employees.

E-learning Innovations brings professional success and a lot of benefits.

As a future work we are designing Virtual E-learning Centers through the project "Practical training for competitiveness in the labor market". The project is implemented for the students of Economics and is created in order to meet the students' internship.

This study creates the premises to implement the E-learning type activities in the academic environment. During the ongoing project " Practical training for competitiveness in the labor market" from Nicolae Titulescu University will be put in place some of the methods described previously. This project is meant for the students from Economic Studies and implies the creation of virtual exercise firms to satisfy the internship. In this manner will be created a pilot program which lays the foundations for further research and development of future theoretical and practical E-learning models.

In conclusion the e-learning systems are useful for any type of education, at any level, but specially for higher education and adults education. E-learning systems are used also for the high school level or small children's education. The good practice example is concluding for the present work and emphasizes the importance of the information technology used in the educational processes.

References

- Lewin, T (2011), As on line courses grow, So does financial aid fraud, NY Times, Oct 13
- Stacey P(2011), Teaching Science on line, Ed Tech Frontier, Oct 6
- Tremblay, E.(2010), Educating the Mobile Generation, journal of Computers in Mathematics and Science Teaching, 29(2), Chesapeake, VA.AACE
- Leinenbach, J (2010), eLearning Management, Polirom
- Baltazar, P.H.(2010), The future of learning, FESC-UHAM
- Davidson C and Goldberg D, (2010), The future of Thinking, Learning Institutions in a digital age, Chicago, the John D and Catherine MacArthur Foundation
- Demiray, U et al (2010), e-Learning Practices. Cases on Challenges facing e-Learning and national development, Eskitehir, Turkey, Anadolu University
- Pershing J.A.(2006), Handbook of human performance technology.Principles. Practices. Potential., Pfeiffer, SF
- Weller,M. (2002). Delivering learning on the Net, UK: Kogan Page
- Ravenscroft, A. (2001). Designing E-learning Interactions in the 21st Century: revisiting and rethinking the role of theory. European Journal of Education
- Watson, D. (2001). Pedagogy before technology: Re-thinking the relationship between ICT and teaching.Education and Information Technologies
- http://www.univnt.ro
- http://www.kopernic.ueb.ro/GUI/Desktop.aspx

ADULT LEARNERS IN DISTANCE HIGHER EDUCATION

NORICA-FELICIA BUCUR[1]

Abstract
This paper attempts at identifying the main features that characterize distance higher education and adult education, respectively, in order to be able to establish to what extent adult learners can fit in distance higher education programs. The historical background of distance learning education, the factors that influence adult learners, and distance learning's key objectives, effects, issues, advantages, and disadvantages are to be briefly investigated in order to reach the purpose of this paper. Recent developments in Information Technology have led to a new approach to teaching and learning, especially as far as adult learning and distance learning are concerned. Thus, this study will also focus on the consequences of using technology for course design, delivery, and the perception of adult learners participating in distance learning.

Keywords: distance learning, adult learner, higher education, information technology, interaction

1. Introduction

Information technology has brought about change in many aspects of our lives: economically, socially and even educationally. Higher education has started to change in order to cope with new technologies, but this change has not been entirely driven by the computers era, since its beginnings can be traced quite a long time ago, in the mid-19th century with the University of London. At that time, the development of postal services made possible the foundation of distance learning that promoted the spread of higher education among the less "well-located" students. In modern times, more exactly in the 20th century, the creation of the Open University in the United Kingdom has led to the current expansion of this type of learning.

If, in the 1970s, most open universities were almost exclusively relying on radio and television broadcasts for much of its delivery, nowadays, the development of computers and the internet have made distance learning distribution easier and faster and have given rise to the "virtual university", the entire educational offerings of which are conducted online. Not only can students obtain bachelor degrees by means of this system, but they can also apply for and, in the end, graduate from master and doctoral programs. At global level, and in Romania, as well, the number of students enrolled in these programs increases every year, as the number of universities providing distance learning is on the rise.

Many of the students enrolled in distance learning programs in Romania are adults. Thus the general purpose of this paper is to establish if, at present, distance learning meets the requirements imposed by general adult learning standards. To be able to give a tentative answer to this question, one has to provide the theoretical frameworks for the two concepts to be used (distance learning and adult learning) as they are described in Romanian and international literature, and to briefly describe them from the point of view of the leading "actors" involved in this process, the tutor and the student.

2. Content

The concept of adult learning varies from country to country, as adulthood age is differently interpreted and agreed upon, mainly depending on cultural factors. In the Pre-study on the role of higher education institutions as providers of continuous professional learning and adult education (2011)[2], conducted by the Directorate-General for Education and Culture, many examples are given to support the idea that the concept of adult learner is provided various explanations in EU countries, depending on national educational systems. But, since the aim of this pre-study was to offer a review of the current volume of adult learning in higher education institutions and to raise a limited number of key questions in this area, the researchers had to define the term "adult learner" very precisely. Thus, in this pre-study "the term adult learner refers to all people aged 30 years or older." (European Commission, Reports and Studies, The role of higher education institutions as providers of continuous professional learning and adult education, 2011:4).

[1] Assistant Lecturer, Ph. D. candidate in Education, Faculty of Social and Administrative Sciences, "Nicolae Titulescu" University Bucharest, (email: norica.bucur@gmail.com).

[2] http://ec.europa.eu/education/more-information/doc/2011/higher_en.pdf

Age is not the only characteristic that has to be taken into account when referring to adult learning. According to Kasworm (2003), when approaching adult education, the following two aspects have to be considered as well: the status of maturity and developmental complexity (acquired through life responsibilities, perspectives, and financial independence) and the status of responsible and often-competing sets of adult roles (reflecting work, family, community, and university student commitments).

Knowles proposed a theory of adult learning, pedagogy for adults, called Androgogy (Knowles et al., 1998). There are six principles of Androgogy for adults. The first principle is the learner's need to know: "how learning will be conducted, what learning will occur, and why learning is important" (Knowles et al., 1998). Second, self-directed learning is the ability of taking control of the techniques and of the purposes of learning. Then, prior experience of the learner impacts learning in creating individual differences, providing rich resources, creating biases and providing adults' self-identity. The fourth principle is readiness to learn. Adults become ready to learn when their life situations create a need to learn. The fifth principle is orientation to learning. In general, adults prefer a problem solving orientation in learning. In particular, they can learn best when knowledge is presented in real-life context. Finally, the sixth principle is motivation to learn. Adults have high motivation to learn when the learner can gain the new knowledge to help them to solve important problems in their life.

Even if the standard vision regarding adult learners has been based on the unfounded stereotype that adults are less effective learners simply because they are adults (their learning problems being linked to loss of memory and lack of the necessary flexibility to adopt new perspectives), this theory has largely been rejected by research[3]. It has been demonstrated by research studies that adult students can make a valuable contribution in teaching and learning, and more specifically in class discussions. Academic staff often remark that adult students perform better than younger students and that they have a positive influence on the courses they read, in particular in tutorial contributions. They can also be more adept at examining and exploring their prior experience in order to make sense of new information and new situations, and at a „meaning" instead of a „surface" approach to studying[4].

One also has to establish what makes adults want to pursue higher education. Kasworm (2003) suggests that there might be three types of motivators: internal life developmental changes, external planning to create a different future life in their adult world, or a mixture of the two life-context motivators. So, adults may choose to enter university because of a divorce, children entering school, a recent job loss, or a denied job promotion due to the lack of a university degree, because they seek new life choices that will provide greater benefits and rewards or because of mixed motivators between the first and the second set enumerated.

Distance learning has gained ground in institutions of higher learning because of its flexibility and availability to learners and teachers, regardless of geographic location. The distance-learning environment has a major contribution to make to the educational requirements of the 21st century by encouraging general acceptance of the concept of knowledge as a vital element in social development and economic growth. The authenticity, quality, and competitive standards of such programs should come from reputable institutions so that those in higher education can confidently say that it will eventually lead to economic growth.

[3] Kasworm, C., and Blowers, S. Adult Undergraduate Students: Patterns of Learning Involvement. Report to Office of Education Research and Improvement, Department of Education, Washington, D.C. Knoxville, Tenn.: College of Education, University of Tennessee, 1994.

[4] Richardson, J. T. E. and King, E. (1998) "Adult students in higher education: Burden or Boon?" The Journal of Higher Education, vol.69(1), pp. 65-88.

Keeping pace with changes in technology and meeting the increasing demands of the knowledge-based economy will require a highly skilled and educated workforce capable of working collaboratively to find solutions to diverse economic, social, and environmental problems. The key to success is, in large part, continuing education, which means that distance learning, with its open access and opportunities for active collaboration in an egalitarian environment, will have an important role to play in meeting the challenges of the future (Stansfield et al., 2004).

Nowadays, labour markets demand knowledge and skills that necessitate regular updating. People have started to realize the importance of education and how convenient it has become to have access to distance learning and virtual universities that allow educational experiences to be tailored to the needs of individuals or groups. In other words, educational needs are becoming continuous throughout one's working life.[5]

Various definitions are given to distance learning in the literature. Mantyla and Gividen's definition (1997) tries to be as comprehensive as possible[6]: "Distance learning is a system and a process that connects learners with distributed learning resources. While distance learning takes a wide variety of forms, all distance learning is characterized by: (a) separation of place and/or time between instructor and learner, among learners, and/or between learners and learning resources; (b) interaction between the learner and the instructor, among learners and learning resources conducted through one and more media; use of electronic media is not necessarily required."[7] In Berg's opinion (2002), the main elements of distance learning are: (1) physical separation (complete or more than 50% reduced contact time) between teacher and learner; (2) administration by an educational organization; (3) frequent use of various media, including print, video, film, computer and audio; (4) communication between student and teacher, synchronous or asynchronous; (5) often an administrative focus on the nontraditional learner.

Since the term distance learning is often interchanged with distance education one should try to differentiate between the two. According to Steiner[8] (1995) "Distance Education is instructional delivery that does not constrain the student to be physically present in the same location as the instructor. (…) Distance Learning is the result of Distance Education."

The common institutional motives for the use of distance learning need also to be investigated. Ehrman[9] (1998) suggests that widening access, sharing a wider range of intellectual sources, as well as implementing new teaching techniques could be envisaged as possible reasons for distance learning. Given these motives, he sees the challenge as extending access and enriching

---

[5] For example, the European Union, through its Education Commission, has initiated numerous programs concerning lifelong learning, intended not only for individual students and learners, but also for teachers, trainers and all others involved in education and training. Moreover, EU The Lifelong Learning Programme: education and training opportunities for all has a wide scope, funding projects at different levels of education and training, as it has four main sub-programmes: Comenius for schools, Erasmus for higher education, Leonardo da Vinci for vocational education and training, Grundtvig for adult education.

[6] This definition discards the growing importance of information technology in distance learning, probably because at that time (in 1997) this technology was relatively new and less widespread than nowadays.

[7] Matyla, K., Gividen, J.R. (1997). Distance Learning. A Step-by-Step Guide for Trainers. Alexandria: The American Society for Training and Development resources, while at the same time controlling costs. O'Lawrence (2007) goes along the same view, considering that universities are implementing distance learning programs for 3 reasons: (a) the convergence of communication and computing technologies, (b) the need for information-age workers to acquire new skills without interrupting their working lives for extended periods of time, and (c) the need to reduce the cost of education.

[8] http://www.dlrn.org/library/dl/whatis.htlm

[9] Ehrmann, Stephen C., "Studying Teaching, Learning and Technology: a Tool Kit from the Flashlight Program," Active Learning IX (December 1998), pp. 38-42. After June 1999, the article will be available at http://www.cti.ac.uk/publ/actlea/al9.html. Since then the article has been expanded and rewritten; a recent draft is posted at <http://www.tltgroup.org/flashlight/ActiveLearningFL.html>.

In Istrate's view (2000) distance education may be a feasible alternative due to the flexibility of the roles both the learner and the teacher have to play and to the existence of the student-oriented curriculum (the particular needs of the students are in the center of the educational activity). Through this system, students have numerous opportunities to learn, as the spatial and temporal obstacles are removed, and their learning pace is attuned to their capabilities. Moreover, Istrate emphasizes that this type of education could encompass a large targeting population, because it does not require prospective students to give up on their professional activity (job). Therefore, distance learning is designed to ensure compatibility with the characteristics and needs of the adult learner. By maintaining their jobs while attending university, adult learners are able to continue to accumulate work experience while pursuing educational goals.

In distance learning students and teachers will find themselves playing different roles than is the norm in traditional education. The teacher is no longer the sole source of knowledge but instead becomes a facilitator to support student learning, while the student actively participates in what and how knowledge is imparted. More than any other teaching method, distance learning requires a collaborative effort between student and teacher, unbounded by the traditional limits of time, space, and single-instructor effort. Distance learning is student-centered learning.

To summarize, as compared to traditional education, distance education stands out due to several advantages, such as:

- all the resources are ubiquitously available;
- the curriculum is more comprehensive, as it offers numerous possibilities for students to acquire high level knowledge from various domains;
- the number of students that can attend this type of education is considerably big, comprising those students that cannot attend traditional university courses; access to local, regional, national and international networks bring together students belonging to different social, cultural and economic backgrounds;
- learning is experienced at student's own pace and personal style, as courses can be studied or attended gradually and repeatedly; computer software are flexible, the student being able to maximize the way in which information is transmitted, learned and, finally, assimilated individually;
- the synchronous and asynchronous interaction between the teacher and the student can complement one another;
- interactive technology, easily allowing total feedback, as well as formative or summative, qualitative or quantitative assessment.

Nevertheless, there are also disadvantages, which are generally related to distance education implementation:

- distance education system development means high costs to cover expenses related to hardware and software technology, transmitting network information, maintaining equipment, producing the necessary materials;
- the difficulty to make considerable and constant efforts on the part of the students, academic staff, technical intermediaries and administrative staff;
- it is necessary for both educators and students to have good written communication skills, as well as computer skills (one of their responsibilities might be that of performing maintenance activities on their personal computer);

- the high degree of motivation that students need in order to attend and graduate from distance education (research concluded that distance education students are more prone to become "quitters", as interrelations are impersonal);
- the relatively "dehumanization" of the courses (this can be partially removed only by developing adequate interaction strategies and by focusing on the student, not on the system)[10].

Having emphasized the strengths and weaknesses of distance education, one should now be able to perform the analysis proposed at the beginning of this paper. As far as the motivation of the adult learner is concerned, this is to a great extent intrinsic, and distance education, mainly due to lack of human interaction, may cause certain problems that could be overcome only if the courses offered immediate and tangible value to the learners. Learner orientation is another aspect of adult learning which should be taken into consideration in contrast with distance learning, as adult learners learn only what they feel they need to learn. The solution might be to explicitly state learning goals as a key component in the design of distance courses; tutors and course developers need to illustrate the real-world applicability of the material and to provide adult learners with some ability to control their own learning environment.

When learning something new, most adults need to see how it fits in with (or is different from) what they already know. Distance educators should devise ways to incorporate the learners' previous experiences into new material and build in ways for learners to share their ideas and experiences with one another. As for orientation to learning, adults need immediate feedback concerning their progress. Thus, tutors and course developers in distance education should develop strategies to help adult learners assess their own progress, so they can reassure themselves they are going in the right direction.

One more important aspect that needs to be considered when analyzing the extent to which distance education is adequate for adult learners is the dispositional barrier[11]. As compared to children or teenagers, adults are much less open to the trial-and-error approach. Many adult learners will resist trying something new if it involves the risk of making an error and feeling foolish as a result. This is especially true if the person has had problems with learning in the past, or difficulties with the subject area being covered. Therefore, because adults try to avoid failure as much as possible, distance education materials could assist them in overcome this "fear", by providing simple techniques, such as making the first exercises or tests so easy that practically anyone can be successful at them. In addition, designers and developers must also be aware that providing distance learning over the Internet incorporates a whole new area of risk for many learners. The technology itself is complicated for many people, and course providers must ensure that sufficient support is available for students as they take on the challenge of learning in this new environment.

Personal learning style is also a key issue measuring the degree of adequateness of distance education for adult learning. By the time people reach adulthood, they have settled into a learning style that has worked well for them in the past. One person may prefer reading, while another does best by trying out a practical exercise, for example. They may use a global or analytic style of processing information, and they may prefer to work cooperatively or independently. Some students like to have material presented in a step-by-step, cumulative, sequential pattern that builds toward a general concept. Others learn best when they are given the concept first and then details. One possible solution might be the inclusion of global and analytical approaches in developing learning modules. Distance education course designers should provide opportunities, suggestions, and resources for independent learning and make use of techniques such as (online) role playing, simulations, case-studies. Students should be given guidance to make them aware of their own

[10] Istrate, Olimpius, Educaţia la distanţă. Proiectarea materialelor, Botoşani: Editura Agata, p.15-16

[11] MacKeracher, D., Suart, T., & Potter, J. (2006, May). "State of the field report: Barriers to participation in adult learning". Retrieved January 26, 2012, from the National Adult Literacy Database Library Web site: http://www.nald.ca/library/research/sotfr/barriers/cover.htm learning styles, and, moreover, tutors should offer them ideas for ways to adapt materials to suit their own learning styles

The adaptation of distance learning to successfully meet the adult learner's needs is a process that requires a large amount of effort, especially in point of methodology. Encompassing latest research findings from various domains such as IT, education sciences and psychology in devising courses could also be beneficial for younger adults attending distance education.

3. Conclusions

The transformation of the world economy over the past several decades has put a premium on an educated workforce. The continuous development in information technology due to its enormous resourcefulness and flexibility, as well as its increasing accessibility due to decreasing costs make higher education institutions envisage distance learning as one possible alternative for the future in order to meet this fast growing demand. Adult learners need distance learning. The flexibility and convenience of distance education makes it particularly attractive to adult learners, who are constantly looking for ways to upgrade and expand their skills in an effort to improve or protect their economic position.

The purpose of this paper has not been that of exhausting the aspects to be considered when discussing distance learning as one possibility for adult learners who want to pursue higher education. To a certain extent, I have attempted to pinpoint to the specificity of adult learning and how distance learning can be tailored to meet adult learners' needs. The theoretical framework provided in this paper will hopefully serve as a starting point for a future empirical research that will analyze if the Romanian distance higher education system meets the needs of the Romanian adult learners.

References

- Berg, Gary A. 2002. Why distance learning? Higher Education Administrative Practices. Westport: Praeger Publishers
- Ehrmann, Stephen C., "Studying Teaching, Learning and Technology: a Tool Kit from the Flashlight Program," Active Learning IX (December 1998), pp. 38-42. After June 1999, the article will be available at http://www.cti.ac.uk/publ/actlea/al9.html. Since then the article has been expanded and rewritten; a recent draft is posted at http://www.tltgroup.org/flashlight/ActiveLearningFL.html
- Istrate, Olimpius,. 2000. Educația la distanță. Proiectarea materialelor, Botoşani: Editura Agata,
- Kasworm, C., and Blowers, S. 1994. "Adult Undergraduate Students: Patterns of Learning Involvement." Report to Office of Education Research and Improvement, Department of Education, Washington, D.C. Knoxville, Tenn.: College of Education, University of Tennessee
- Kasworm, C., 2003. "Setting the Stage: Adults in Higher Education", New Directions for Student Services, No. 102, 3-10.
- Knowles, M. S., Holton, E. F., & Swanson, R. A. 1998. The adult learner (fifth edition). Houston: Gulf Publishing
- MacKeracher, D., Suart, T., & Potter, J. 2006. "State of the field report: Barriers to participation in adult learning". Retrieved January 26, 2012, from the National Adult Literacy Database Library Web site: http://www.nald.ca/library/research/sotfr/barriers/cover.htm
- Matyla, K., Givіden, J.R. 1997. Distance Learning. A Step-by-Step Guide for Trainers. Alexandria: The American Society for Training and Development
- Richardson, J. T. E. and King, E. (1998) "Adult students in higher education: Burden or Boon?" The Journal of Higher Education, vol.69 (1), pp. 65-88
- O'Lawrence, H. 2007. "An Overview of the Influences of Distance Learning on Adult Learners". Journal of Education and Human Development, Volume 1, Issue 1
- Stansfield, M., McLellan, E., & Connolly, T. 2004. "Enhancing student performance in online learning and traditional face-to-face class delivery". Journal of Information Technology Education. 3, 173–188
- http://ec.europa.eu/education/more-information/doc/2011/higher_en.pdf
- http://www.dlrn.org/library/dl/whatis.htlm

WOMEN'S EVERYDAY LIFE EXPERIENCE OF HOUSEWORK AND CARE. BETWEEN PARTENERSHIP NORMS AND PATRIARCHAL NORMALITY

DIANA ELENA NEAGA[1]

Abstract.
My aim in this paper is to explore the process by which women from a Transylvanian county understand family relations in their everyday life with respect to the sharing of the household and care responsibilities among members, mostly men and women. In doing so I will use the distinction made by Martin Hollis between a normal behavior - which can arise after some roles have been performed (the patriarchal gender roles inside the family), and the normative behavior - the one with a moral value (the partnership model of sharing responsibilities within the family). My approach will consist in the use of a gender sensitive constructivist framework, meaning that I will emphasize the way in which social actors give meaning to their interactions, keeping in mind at the same time that these interactions are developed in a coercive framework of institutions, norms, values and rules. I consider patriarchate to be one of the most important of these coercive structures, seen as a social system which perpetuates the male dominance over women in social organization, and in which fathers hold authority over women, children, and property within the family The research design is based on a qualitative methodological triangulation. Data collection was focused on two methods: semi-structured interviews and focus groups of women from Hunedoara County, Romania, living in three towns and a village. The semi-structured interviews were used to construct narratives that allowed for a relational–based research. In this framework factors such as power relations within the family, gender roles assumed by women and their partners or extended family, as well as one's own perceived social roles and cultural traditions (public narratives) will illuminate how power relations promote or disadvantage gender empowerment. The focus groups were made in order to establish fruitful and relevant lines of inquiry for the semi-structured interviews. I consider that one of the limitations of this research is the lack of a comparative framework between men's and women's understanding of the problem of household and care in Romania. The originality of this paper consists in providing new information and data about the underlined issue by using methods that try to give in-depth answers to how women see themselves as part of the family.

Keywords: housework and care, constructivism, norms, power relations, public narratives

Introduction. In the beginning, I would like to specify the fact that this paper belongs to an extended study on women's citizenship in their everyday lives, namely my PhD thesis[2]. The main issues corresponding to housework and care have been in connection with the ones regarding participation (civic, political, professional and/or familial). More precisely, citizenship has been first and foremost linked to participation, and the constructivist approach I have undertaken, and to which I will return at a later point, stresses the way in which the individuals, in their everyday interactions, provide meaning to the experiences and structures that shape their behavior. As such, within these interactions, the individuals evaluate their present situations and act upon these evaluations. With respect to their actual reality, the consequences of these evaluations as to their capacity as citizens become manifest in the active (apparent), respectively passive (latent)[3] participation or through civic

[1] Assistant Lecturer, "Nicolae Titulescu" University (email: diana_elena_neaga@yahoo.com).

[2] As stated, the present paper is part of my doctoral thesis entitled Gender and Citizenship in Romania, which was coordinated by Prof. Dr. Mihaela Miroiu and defended on September, 29th, 2011 within the S.N.S.P.A. Doctoral School in Bucharest. The paper stressed citizenship as practice, by operationalizing the concepts of participation (civic, political, familial, and professional) and the way in which they are signified in the everyday lives of the interviewed subjects.

[3] See Lester Milbrath, Political Participation, (Chicago: Rand McNally&Co, 1965); Hakan Johanson, Bjorn Hvinden, „What do we mean by active citizenship?", in Hakan Johanson, Bjorn Hvinden, Citizenship in Nrodic and political participation. However, when we actually consider the everyday lives of women, another form of participation becomes notable, namely the familial one. This perspective originates especially with the feminist theories that criticize the public-private distinction, engendering the so called "patriarchal separation"[4] of the domestic sphere from all the others[5]. The social effects of these constructions amount to the phenomenon which the 2000 Gender Barometer, as well as other studies[6], very well emphasizes, namely that women continue to be responsible for most of the housework and care activities.

Moreover, the conclusions of my doctoral paper regarding the way in which women understand and provide meaning to their relation to the paid work, point out the fact that this form of participation is directly related to their need for autonomy and community integration. Furthermore, these women don't see themselves as housewives, but as active persons, continuously active on the work-market. Given this permanent tension between the family and the professional life, my main question within this paper is: how do women understand and provide meaning to their everyday lives, with respect to the repartition of their house and care-work between the members of the family, i.e. men and women? More specifically, what type of explanations do women provide for the fact of assuming (voluntarily or not) the burden of the double shift workday.

Approach. With respect to the conceptual framework, my arguments essentially belong to the interpretative epistemological tradition, providing for a dynamic perspective on the social and cultural existence of the human being, i.e. one in which the agent and the structure are seen as interdependent[7]. This analysis will focus on the relationships and biunivocal influences between the agents (providing the roles with meanings) and the structures (especially the patriarchal one that basically imposes normality). The individuals are viewed as actors, as subjects capable of autonomous and responsible action, respectively of evolving, contesting and changing the structures depending on the meanings they ascribe upon them. A constructivist approach brings forth the individuals involved in the meaningful construction of the social reality; however this process is not isolated or independent of the exterior reality, that becomes stable, institutionalized and, ultimately, constraining.

The main structure brought into discussion in this paper - the patriarchal one - is defined by Lerner as being the display and institutionalization of male domination over the women and children in the family, as well as the extension of this domination over women in the society in general[8]. Another important aspect in the construction of my arguments is the one regarding the distinction that Martin Hollis makes between a normal behavior which can arise after some roles have been performed and the normative role, the one with the moral value. Hollis emphasizes the distinction between normal and normative, in the way that the requirements imposed by a role can achieve normative connotations as a result of the meanings actors can associate with these roles, but it does

---

Welfare States. Dynamics of choice, duties and participation in a changing Europe, (New York: Routledge, 2007), 32 – 50.

[4] See Carol Pateman, The Disorder of Women, (California: Stansford University Press, 1989), 35 and Ruth Lister, Citizenship: Feminist Prespective, (New York: Palgrave, 2003, Second Edition), 73; Susan B .Boyd, Challenging the Public and Private Divide: An Overview, în Susan B .Boyd (ed.), Challenging the Public and Private Divide. Feminism, Law and Public Policy, (Toronto: University of Toronto Press Incorporated, 1997), 4; Susan Moller Okin, Gender, the Public, and the Private, in Anne Phillips, ed. Feminism and Politics, (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1998), 119.

[5] Ruth Lister, Citizenship: Feminist Prespective, (New York: Palgrave, 2003, second edition), 119.

[6] See also Ruth Lister, Citizenship: Feminist Prespective, (New York: Palgrave, 2003, second edition), 130 – 131.

[7] See Peter Berger; Thomas Luckmann, Construirea socială a realității, (Bucharest: Art, 2008); Searle J. (1995) The Construction of Social Reality, The Free Press, New York; Brent G. Wilson, "Reflection on Constructivism and Instructional Design", in Charles L. Dills, Alexander J. Romiszowski ed. (1997) Instructional Development Paradigms, (New Jersey: Educational Technology Publication, 1997).

[8] Gerda Lerner, The Creation of Patriarchy, (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1986), 239.

not mean that any normal or regulated behavior comes from normative expectations[9]. Thus, a behavior which can be defined as normal may not always be the normative one.

In addition to this theoretical framework, I assume a feminist approach of the subject matter, by virtue of the liberating potential of feminism deriving from its contestation and deconstruction of the gender differences as generating illegitimate differences with respect to a democratic society.

Methodology. In order to come in contact with the women's actual view and life experience, in addition to the theoretical framework and the previous studies, the facts have been examined in situ, in a complex process that, beyond the actual interviews, either individual, or in group, also involved actual terrain research, in order to become familiar with the environment in which the subjects generate meanings. With respect to the representativity and the selection of the subjects, considering the method – ethno methodological qualitative research – and the techniques involved – 96 semi-structured interviews and 3 focus-groups – I have resorted to the theoretical sampling (the subjects have been selected on theoretical grounds, in view of providing comparative data and testing the research questions)[10]. The criteria involved were: sex (women), age and residence environment (urban).

I have chosen exclusively women for these interviews precisely because they have been subjected to significant changes in the last 100 years, especially considering the experiences with the totalitarian communist regime and the transition. As such, women are, concomitantly, the "new comers" in the sphere of political, civic and economic action and the "great absents" with respect to the authority positions within the public (especially political) and also as subjects of the studies, reports and researches performed in Romania.

With respect to the age sampling criterion, it has been used in order to gain information from fully mature persons with respect to their gender experiences (labor division, gender roles, care, autonomy, dependence within family) and their professional participation. The interviews were performed on the 24 – 82 age interval and the focus-groups on the 35 – 82 age interval and this because they have been used for the stabilization of the values of the individual interviews being used mainly for the pretesting of the questions of the interview, but also for the completion of the information gathered and for the enhancement of their validity[11]. For this reason, the focus-groups have been preformed previous to the interviews and they pointed out the need for a 24 -35 age category to be introduced in the analysis, that subsequently became actual part of the interviews. I have considered necessary to clear these aspects in the methodological section of this paper, as they were designed and performed in my doctoral research. However, I must mention the fact that the analysis in this paper is not focused on the differences generated by the age of the subjects and this because, considering our subject matter, this variable proved not to have an explicative value. More precisely, I have found no relevant variations arising from the age of the subjects, fact that only strengthens the perpetuations of the patriarchal norms and their resistance to change. Noteworthy is also the fact that we are not dealing here with a "representative" sample as it is understood in the quantitative studies, as this undertaking does not aim to be a statistical analysis.

The location of the terrain study was Hunedoara county, more precisely the cities of Hunedoara, Deva and Simeria. Specific to this area is the intensive industrial development that took place both in the communist era, but also previously, process the effects of which are still apparent in the area. The impact of the massive industrialization in the communist era was mainly focused on the access to the professional field, with respect to both women and men, as women performing traditionally "manly" activities being involved in the "imposed normality" of the communist regime that, at least apparently, disregarded any gender differences.

---

[9] Martin Hollis, Introducere în filosofia ştiinţelor sociale, (Bucureşti: Trei, 2001), 159;
[10] Petru Iluţ, Abordarea calitativă a socioumanului – concepte şi metode, (Iaşi: Polirom, 1997), 54 - 55;
[11] That is the reason why I have chosen not to use the results of the group interviews in this study.

The analysis method of the research data is interpretative in nature, as opposed to the ones requiring the codification of the information, therefore promoting the dynamic analyses, the interactivity between the researcher and the subject, thereby aiming at revealing the meanings deriving from such interactions[12]. With respect to the "subject" – "object" interactions I assume a reflexive feminist approach involving the interaction of the two during the research, "admitting the personal involvement of the researcher and […] considering gender not only as research object, but also as internal dimension of the entire analytical undertaking"[13].

Results of the research. In the introductory section I was stating that the professional aspect has an important role in the lives of the subjects, as most of them have a rich professional history, associated either with a single workplace, or with many, their professional continuity being enhanced and valued, while the stories regarding the periods of professional inactivity were accompanied by supplementary justifications. Therefore we are speaking of active women, constantly and intensely involved in income generating activities, both for the family and themselves. Moreover, paid work is valued by virtue of its capacity to determine a certain economic independence from the husband and/or other family members, as well as a sphere in which they can manifest themselves as professional agents, as citizens contributing to the general welfare of the family, community and society as a whole. They have the capacity of developing their abilities, of engaging in fields that satisfy their need of self respect and social acknowledgement. Last but not least, paid work is associated with the generation of social capital within the "workmate network", which is valued and used in both professional and extraprofessional contexts.

Up to this point, the picture seems to be taken out of a socialist propaganda theory advocating women's emancipation through work and "social production"[14]. However, this picture is incomplete as long as we do not also consider the activities related to the housework and care, namely if we do not ask the following questions: considering this understanding of the paid work, what happens with the housework and family care activities? Is there a link between the independence taken as an effect of the access on the labor market and the configuration of the patriarchal nucleus within the family – the labor division according to gender? More to the point, what happens with the housework and care activities of these women that speak so naturally about the emancipation through work?

Enikö Vincze writes in her work Diferența care contează (The Difference that Matters): „But however we would try to justify it, the acknowledgement of the women's need and possibility to earn from the activities performed on the labor market is not necessarily followed by the change in the cultural perceptions of the traditional labor division within the family"[15] This statement also holds

[12] Matthew Miles, Michael Huberman, Qualitative Data Analysis, (California: Sage, 1994), 8;

[13] Enikö Magyari Vincze, Diferența care contează. Diversitatea social-culturală prin lentila antropologiei feministe, (Desire Foundation, 2002), 34;

[14] In "The Origins of the Family, Private Property and State" Engels wrote: "The situation changes with the emergence of the patriarchal family and of the isolated monogamous family in particular. The household administration lost its public character. It was of no concern to society any more; it became a private service; the wife became the first servant, being removed from the social order. Only the great industry of our age has reopened woman's access to the social production – and only to the proletarian woman that is. However, only in such a way that if she fulfills her duties within the family's private service, she is excluded from the social production and can earn no income; and if she chooses to take part in the social production and to live on her own work she finds herself in the impossibility of tending to her familial duties […] Within the family, he (the man) is the bourgeois and the woman is the proletariat […] And then it will become obvious that the first condition for the liberation of women is for the entire feminine sex to return to the social production." In Karl Marx. Fridrich Engels, Opere alese, vol. II, (Bucharest: The Printing House of the Romanian Laborers Party, 1952), 211 – 212 (my translation); Also see the „feminist authors" of the communist age, namely Mathilda Neil, Drama eliberării femei, (Bucharest: Editura Politică, 1974); Ecaterina Deliman, Femeia, personalitate politică în societatea noastră socialistă,(Bucharest : Editura Politică, 1977); true for this research. Henceforth, I will make a short presentation of the way in which the housework and care activities are in reality, structured.

[15] Enikö Magyari Vincze, Diferența care contează. Diversitatea social-culturală prin lentila antropologiei feministe, (Desire Foundation, 2002), 161;

„Generally, I manage all the housework, but my husband helps me from time to time."

As Vincze said, the fact that women have access to paid work and that this activity can be regarded as a potential source of empowerment has little effect on the assumption of the gender roles within the housework and care activities. Namely, women continue to "perform" most of these activities by virtue of the cultural-patriarchal[16] norms and values which define them as main "household managers" and providers of the care services.

The questions by which I have approached the aspects related to the housework and care activities belong to the classical set regarding these aspects, but the subject has been approached in two stages. More exactly, in the first stage the subjects were asked who manages in the household the cooking, ironing, washing, cleaning as well as the care and education of children, respectively the caring of the elderly. I have sought to point out the way in which the subjects relate to these aspects in a friendly environment, without explicitly introducing the gender variable in the questions. The question that marked the second stage of the data gathering process was: "But what does your husband do within the family?". Regardless of age, the dominant model would seem to be contained in the statement:" I handle all house activities, but my husband helps me from time to time".

"(Who handles house work in your family?) I handle the house work and my mother helps me at some extent. (...the children care and education?) Yes, I handle the children's care and education as well. (Going to meetings?) Only me. (If you had sick elderly in the family, who cared for them?) Well, usually, women take care of these things as well; we haven't had any persons within the family that were seriously sick, for the time being our parents are at an age at which they don't have very serious problems, but I think that, when the time comes, I will have to deal with these things as well[…] I handle everything. When I don't feel well, as I have had surgery, I have a lady, that is very…up to my expectations, I call her and she helps me, as she is a non-working woman. […] (t*he husband*) He helps me, I don't know, by cooking. His mother, when she was young, was a cook and as he learned a lot from her, he cooks sometimes. For example, some sort of gulasz, either Hungarian or, anyway, some traditional sort of food. Otherwise…it's fairly comfortable".[17]

"(Who handles the housework in your family?) Both of us, in our family. So, if I need help in the kitchen my husband is always available, always helpful. For example, if I want to make sarmale, which are more difficult to cook, my husband is redy to help, if we have to go shopping, for example tomorrow I leave work at…, will you wait for me to do the shopping? Everything is all right, he helps me."[18]

"I think that he (the husband) has to become part of everything. He must know that we have no sugar, no salt, he must know that tomorrow is cleaning day, he must know that the children have no shoes, he has to be involved in all that is housework, he has to take part in it. (Was it so in your family?) Yes, so it was. I have involved him in everything that I could".[19]

[16] I consider here culture as a constraining structure and especially the role it plays in the patriarchal social construction. For a better understanding of the diachronic evolution of the discourse on the role of women within Romanian society also see Anthony Giddens' definition of culture in Sociology (Bucharest: All, 2001), 625 and also Mihaela Miroiu, "Foreword", in Maria Bucur, Mihaela Miroiu, Patriarhat şi emancipare în istoria gândirii politice româneşti, (Iaşi: Polirom, 2002). Another good indicator of the gender cltural construction is the 2000 Gender Barometer realized by the Foundation for an Open Society.

[17] Interview 14, (V.D.), Hunedoara, 38 years;

[18] Interview 21(M.P.), Hunedoara, 40 years;

[19] Interview 75 (E.M.), Hunedoara, 69 years;

"(Who handled housework in your family?) Just me, in the beginning, afterwards both of us. You know that once men did nothing, nowadays they become more involved […] Now the times have changed and men handle all sorts of things at home. Not only in my family, everywhere."[20]

This type of relation to the housework and care activities is recurrent along the interviews. As such, we discover that the responsibility for these activities falls on the women.[21] Women are the ones that do the washing, cooking, ironing, as well as the children care and education and the caring of the sick and elderly within the family. The fact that men sometimes help by, does not change women's responsibility in these fields, as they continue to be the ones fundamentally responsible with the organization of the family and with ensuring its functionality conditions.

It is interesting that this gender role configuration of the housework and care activities becomes an enormous advantage for the men that, from time to time, give a hand with the cooking. By the rare commodities principle, the discourse of the subjects is misguided with respect to the evaluation of their contribution in the family. As such, their occasional help is presented most of the times as a real partnership within the family. We are dealing here with a contrary effect to the small gender role changes that in the context of a profoundly patriarchal world are hyper-valued by the ones that are systematically disadvantaged by this mundane configuration, namely women. In this respect, it becomes rather obvious, from the previous conversations, that the initial remarks about the labor division within the family stress the partnership – we both handle…, we both perform household activities, and the husbands must become involved – but as the discourse becomes clearer it is remarkable how, in fact, men's contributions are small given the volume and the constancy of the housework and care activities, that they are involved in the house work only at such times when the main providers of these services, the women, are overwhelmed.

More specifically, the burden of the double day shift is assumed by men, mainly when it cannot be handled only by women. As such, we find out from the subjects' declarations that men mainly take part in housework by performing activities such as shopping, cleaning, and especially general cleaning (requiring physical strength). They also sometimes cook, which they actually enjoy doing, but they usually do that only for children and in the cases in which the mother or the grandmother are away or incapable of doing it. However, these activities are contingent, and quite rare, maybe save for the shopping, activity which, on the other hand, is realized under the close supervision of women.

Maria Bucur, in a work she wrote on this research, entitled Citizenship, Gender, and the Everyday in Romania since 1945: Work and Care, analyzes this excessive valorization of the housework realized by men, pointing out the fact that in this way women actually facilitate and contribute to the perpetuation of the gender division of labor by the fact that they don't allow them to contribute, invoking their alleged lack of experience.[22]

Vincze also mentions this aspect when observing the low level of preoccupation by men with the domestic sphere, allegedly justified by the fact that women are more pragmatic in spirit, more skilful and trustworthy with respect to this type of activities.[23] Thus women seem to be the accomplices of the perpetuation of their own exploitation within the family, and this fact is all the more surprising as they are aware of the double day shift and of the partnership model of family relations.

---

[20] Interview 78 (M.B.), Hunedoara, 77 years;

[21] Also see Lister, Citizenship: Feminist Prespective, (New York: Palgrave, 2003, second edition), 130 – 132; The Foundation for an Open Society, The 2000 Gender Barometer;

[22] Maria Bucur-Deckard, Citizenship, Gender, and the Everyday in Romania since 1945: Work and Care, NCEEER Working Paper;

[23] Enikö Magyari Vincze, Diferența care contează. Diversitatea social-culturală prin lentila antropologiei feministe, (Desire Foundation, 2002), 163;

An element that might prove helpful in understanding this type of perception is the distinction between normal and normative made by Martin Hollis[24]. In this context we could speak of the effects of the simple act of interviewing the subjects, that is of entering in the intimate sphere of the family life that can manifest by the constant relation to a normative sphere, to the desirable models and moral values, models which, this time, are not convergent with the lived normality and the performance of the gender roles. We must also bring in this equation the cultural elements that discuss the traditionally originated idealized image of the woman[25]. "The dirty laundry is washed within the family" is the motto of the clear distinction between the public and the private spheres[26] that imposes the perpetuation of the idealization of the family as the space of harmony and understanding. As such, we are faced here with two planes that do not overlap, but that, by virtue of the realization of the moral value of normativity are abusively and unconvincingly joined. The effects are the hypervalorization of men's contributions in the household, as well as the identification of some explanations supporting the auto-reflexive and autonomous assumption of these tasks by women. Furthermore, this phenomenon can also be interpreted as a manner of avoiding the dissonance resulting form the distinction of the two planes, namely that of the lived normality and that of the desirable normativity.

The irony of the discourse – a way of signaling auto-reflexivity. Although the dominant model of the distribution of the housework and care activities is the one presented above, there are also some other important aspects. One of them is the one related to the irony of the discourse regarding men's participation to the housework activities, which is very strongly supported by elements of para-language, respectively mimic and gesture language[27]. This way of communicating with respect to men's contributions within the household suggest, on the one hand, the normality of their absence from such activities, on the other, the realization and reflexive assumption by women of their position as main service suppliers within the family.

(Who handles the housework?). It depends, but in general I can say that we do that together. That is, not exclusively me or my husband, he also gives a hand. (And what sort of activities do you perform, as distinct from the ones your husband performs?) I cook, he takes out the garbage, does the vacuum-cleaning, stuff like that. In general we share them (she laughs). (Who takes care of the children?) Generally me, as he is away most of the time. He comes late from work, so to say. (she laughs)"[28]

"Well naturally, I did the housework, together with my mother, but I had a lot of help. When I came from work at two o'clock, when I was working in the morning shift, everything was ready, the food, the children brought from school or kindergarten when they were smaller […]. Until I was 42 I haven't cooked, as long as my mother lived and she helped me a lot and I miss her very much. (Does your husband help you?) He helps me now (she laughs) in his old age, he helps me with the [24] The normal behavior deriving from the role performance and the normative behavior, that holds moral value.

[25] From the interviews there derives the notion that the family must be that space in which one always finds understanding and support, that includes only those who are the closest and always willing to help. With the members of the family, one can share both the joys and the hardships. The family provides guiding models, as the parents and the grandparents are the ones paving one' way in life. Generally speaking, although not perfect, your family is functional. Although some problems are due to arise, most of them are minor as compared to what "the others" face.

[26] In keeping with the definition of the two spheres in the patriarchal societies. Also see Okin's objection to the public-private distinction in Susan Moller Okin, Gender, the Public, and the Private, in Anne Phillips, ed. Feminism and Politics, (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1998);

[27] See Goffman's distinction between expressions we give and expressions we give off in Erving Goffman, Viaţa cotidiană ca spectacol, (Bucharest: Comunicare.ro, 2007), 32; shopping, I make him a list and he goes, he drives there and buys things, that's how he helps me. With other things around the house he is unskillful." [29]

[28] Interview 09 (A.M.), Hunedoara, 35 years.

We can infer from the interviews that these women are not only auto-reflexive but that they also constantly operate on these two planes, that they are capable of identifying them as such, and of assuming critical positions in their respect, and especially that the way in which they resort to irony indicates their attempt to reduce the dissonance of their exploitation in the family using tricks by which they explain logically, both to themselves and to the others, this configuration of reality.

Therefore, they are women who are consciously aware of the way in which the family and the power relations are structured and, more than that, of the abnormality of this configuration. From here on, by virtue of the traditional idealized image of the family, acting as a cultural constraint by imposing the perfect family – perfection of which the women are mainly responsible, "I say that the woman creates the mood of the house"[30] – the discourse is shaped rather by the model of the desirable family and not by that of the existing family. However, the irony deconstructs this structure and facilitates the disclosure of the subjects' perception of the reality, assumed as such but, very importantly, also contested.

The picture of the aware realization of the family inequalities is completed, besides the irony, by the painful experiences they had as a consequence of the patriarchal constraints, by the stories regarding their self-sacrifice for the family and especially the children, by their constant efforts to be their mother, father and friend.

"[…] I had to handle everything, the housework, to go to the radio and, when coming home, unwashed dishes awaited in the sink. That's how problems start, with small quarrels about the household. That's where the first misunderstandings start, that is where the first differences appear and then you start to be insensitive to the other's attitude, when he doesn't understand to how much work, to how much effort, the woman is subjected. I have been (subjected) for several years…I felt abused by so many problems, for they were many, and nobody understands you at work, there you have to live up, to get through any situation, to act like a man. And when coming home to act like a woman, like a woman from king Louis's time, to do everything"[31].

"It was pretty hard for me to get by and it seems to me that […] this double capacity assumed by a mother that says "I have to be both mother and father" places you somewhere above and maybe I haven't developed such a good friendship with my children […] it seems to me that I haven't managed in keeping that certain warm relationship in which the children are very comfortable, because I thought there was as much need for authority as for friendship and they probably understood more of the authority (she smiles) than of the friendship. This is how I explain it."[32]

The two forms of discourse complete each other, and while irony leaves more room for interpretation, when the stories are clear, followed by examples and, not few times, by arguments for the disadvantaged position of women within the family, the accounts are about facts and facts are hard to deny. The ingredients substantiating these accounts are related to the classical aspects of the housework, that is to the routine, dissatisfaction, invisibility and underestimation of these activities.

The generational inheritance of the housework and care activities – women's support networks. In all this struggle with the burden of the double shift workday, there constantly appears a character that not only helps, but whose help in the accomplishment of these two lines of work, i.e. paid work and housework, was indispensable. Unsurprisingly, this character is also a woman, a mother or a stepmother and very rarely, a man. Generally however, the latter's participation to the housework and care activities takes place only when there is no other woman in the family that can assume these tasks, more exactly when the extended family doesn't include a mother or a [29] Interview 60 (M.A.), Hunedoara, 59 years;

[30] Interview 75 (E.M.), Hunedoara, 69 years;
[31] Interview 90 (C.P.), Peştiş, 48 years;
[32] Interview 64 (M.C.), Hunedoara, 60 years.

grandmother, just the same as happens with men who, in their capacity as husbands or fathers help only in the extent that the wives and mothers do not manage by themselves.

"And we lived together with my stepmother and my stepmother was a very hardworking woman and I had much to learn from her. As it is said, one steals the skills, steals much of everything. Therefore, I have learned a lot form her. Maybe she said it at the time, maybe…this is how it is with the young today, but I have learned a lot form her and especially from her mother. Her mother lived 98 years and she lived with me, I supported her. After her husband died, my stepmother also lived with me for 8 years. She was an extraordinary old woman, she was very wise. She learned to read from the Bible, she was extremely faithful and God-fearing. […] She helped me a lot, my stepmother, but on Saturdays I did the rest of the work. Naturally, she helped me, she cooked and so on…but I washed, a little cleaning by which my husband also contributed. (Who took care of the child?) Us and my step mother and at that time we had a neighbor that took care of her until my stepmother came and after we came from work, we cared for her. Then, she went to kindergarten and to school."[33]

"I tell you , even the house I have made it rather by myself then together with him. Because back home we have made the foundation, and then my husband left when my daughter was one year old, he went to Poland with the work. I have stayed for seven months with two children, two elderly and only the foundation of the house and there was nothing we could do. After seven months, when he came back – meanwhile I received his salary here, he received money there and I also received here, but I didn't go to work, I retained only the money I needed for the children, and back home, at the countryside, we took our food from the garden, we had a cow, sheep, birds and the money I put in the bank – when he came back we could build the house. But how? My parents helped me, my mother cooked for the masons and me an my father made the building materials and we carried them with the buckets, actually I am surprised that I have lived this long given how much weight I have lifted. And my husband came home and didn't stay more than three days, the company car came for him. And thus me and my parents did most of the work, as I lived with them."[34]

"When my child was small I have stayed home for two years and took care of him and then, I was lucky that we lived with my stepmother and for about one year she took care of him and then, when he was three, we sent him to kindergarten." [35]

Obviously, in all these interviews, the sentiment of a shared knowledge of these women's housework and care activities is pervasive. Today's grandmothers are aware of the value of the help they received from their mothers and stepmothers and help, in their turn, the young mothers and wives.

We could speak of the existence of family support networks, created by and for women for the purpose of reducing the constraints generated by the gender roles.[36] At the same time, we can speak of the existence of the double shift workday in the case of many women – the active period on the work market by the performance of both the professional and the housework activities and, in the retirement period, with house and care activities for at least two families, the main one and the one/ones of the child/children. These support networks are extended beyond the family on different events such as weddings, baptizing, funerals, which would prove the existence of women's sisterhood.[37]

We can therefore give account of the appearance of alternative solutions to the negative effects of the double shift workday, but that, at the same time, can ensure the optimal [33] Interview 63 (S.M.), Hunedoara, 60 years.

[34] Interview 65 (A.G.), Hunedoara, 60 years.
[35] Interview 28 (S.C.), Hunedoara, 43 years.
[36] Also see Laura Surdu, „Relații de întrajutorare", in Manuela Sofia Stănculescu, Ionica Berevoescu, Sărac lipit, caut altă viață, (Bucharest: Nemira, 2004), 334;
[37] For further details see Phyllis Chesler, Woman's Inhumanity to Woman, (Chicago: Lawrence Hill Books, 2009, firts 2001), especially chapter 3 Woman's sexism, 124 – 166 and chapter 9 Woman in groups, 390 – 435; performance of these tasks deriving from the assumption of the traditional gender roles. It is important to stress the fact that the purpose of these women support networks is not to contest the patriarchal norms, as one might think, but quite the contrary, the efforts are made towards the assumption of this state of affairs as normality and the acceptance of certain supplementary constraints, as the performance of paid work. As such, these women adapt to the patriarchal environment in which they live, but, at the same time, shape this environment in accordance with their needs and expectations.[38] Moreover, this normality is unique and it manifests as a constraining structure that, although dissonant with respect to individual normality – I hereby refer to the auto-reflexivity and realization of the normative model – has the capacity to impose its self-perpetuation.

Conclusions.

This configuration of the gender roles, both within the family and in its immediate vicinity, that is in the community, point out the low level of interests' politization. Even though these support networks, essentially grounded on the awareness of sharing certain common experiences, are beneficial for women, they just as much constitute the main vehicle for the perpetuation of the traditional gender roles in which women are the providers of the housework and care services.[39] Furthermore, these networks, fairly functional otherwise, contribute to the strengthening of the public – private division, in the deformed sense of the patriarchal structure[40], and to the interests' atomization. When speaking of the interests atomization I refer not so much to an alleged lack of awareness with respect to the common interests – as the abovementioned women support networks are proof of its existence – as to the lack a consistent public manifestation in this respect, fact which hinders their transposition into public policies.[41] The potential of the awareness of the common interests is diluted by the attempt to cope with the family and community problems. Moreover, the non-political nature of the coagulation of these interests is strengthened by the public – private distinction which is one of the basic elements of the patriarchal normality and which potentates the barrier between the personal and the political. The personal is private and, therefore, non-political, context in which the realization of the common interests does not have the possibility to actually contest the patriarchal system or, at least, to submit to the public agenda the gender interests but, quite the contrary, it becomes a vehicle for the perpetuation of the constraints by creating certain alternative mechanisms for the support of the interests, unframed however in the normality of the traditional gender roles.

References:

- 2000 Gender Barometer, Foundation for an Open Society;
- Berger Peter, Luckmann Thomas, Construirea socială a realității, (Bucharest: Art, 2008);
- Boyd Susan B . (ed.), Challenging the Public and Private Divide. Feminism, Law and Public Policy, (Toronto: University of Toronto Press Incorporated, 1997);

[38] See Cuche's definition of culture: "Culture allows the human being not only to adapt to its environment, but to adapt the latter to itself, to its needs and projects; in other words, culture makes the transformation of nature possible" – Dennys Cuche, Noțiune de cultură în științele sociale, (Iași: The European Institute, 2003), 18;

[39] Also see Judith Grant, Fundamental Feminism: contesting the core concepts of feminist theory, (New York: Routledge, 1993);

[40] See Susan Moller Okin, Gender, the Public, and the Private, în Anne Phillips, ed. Feminism and Politics, (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1998);

[41] Also see the criticism of the witness identity in Moya Loyd, Beyound Identity Politics. Feminism, Power and Politics. (London]: Sage Publication 2005), 35 – 40;

- Bucur Maria, Miroiu Mihaela*, Patriarhat şi emancipare în istoria gândirii politice româneşti,* (Iaşi: Polirom, 2002);
- Bucur-Deckard Maria, Citizenship, Gender, and the Everyday in Romania since 1945: Work and Care, NCEEER Working Paper;
- Chesler Phyllis, Woman's Inhumanity to Woman, (Chicago: Lawrence Hill Books, 2009, firts 2001)
- Cuche Dennys, Noţiune de cultură în ştiinţele sociale, (Iaşi: The European Institute, 2003);
- Deliman Ecaterina, Femeia, personalitate politică în societatea noastră socialistă,(Bucharest : Editura Politică, 1977);
- Dills Charles L., Romiszowski Alexander J. ed. Instructional Development Paradigms, (New Jersey: Educational Technology Publication, 1997);
- Giddens Anthony, Sociology (Bucharest: All, 2001);
- Goffman Erving, Viaţa cotidiană ca spectacol, (Bucharest: Comunicare.ro, 2007);
- Grant Judith, Fundamental Feminism: contesting the core concepts of feminist theory, (New York: Routledge, 1993);
- Hollis Martin, Introducere în filosofia ştiinţelor sociale, (Bucureşti: Trei, 2001);
- Iluţ Petru, Abordarea calitativă a socioumanului – concepte şi metode, (Iaşi: Polirom, 1997) ;
- Johanson Hakan, Hvinden Bjorn, Citizenship in Nrodic Welfare States. Dynamics of choice, duties and participation in a changing Europe, (New York: Routledge, 2007);
- Lerner Gerda, The Creation of Patriarchy, (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1986);
- Lister Ruth, Citizenship: Feminist Prespective, (New York: Palgrave, 2003, Second Edition);
- Loyd Moya, Beyound Identity Politics. Feminism, Power and Politics. (London]: Sage Publication 2005);
- Marx Karl, Engels Fridrich, Opere alese, vol. II, (Bucharest: The Printing House of the Romanian Laborers Party, 1952);
- Milbrath Lester, Political Participation, (Chicago: Rand McNally&Co, 1965);
- Miles Matthew, Michael Huberman, Qualitative Data Analysis, (California: Sage, 1994);
- Neil Mathilda, Drama eliberării femei, (Bucharest: Editura Politică, 1974);
- Pateman Carol, The Disorder of Women, (California: Stansford University Press, 1989);
- Phillips Anne, ed. Feminism and Politics, (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1998);
- Searle John (1995) The Construction of Social Reality, The Free Press, New York;
- Stănculescu Manuela Sofia, Berevoescu Ionica, Sărac lipit, caut altă viaţă, (Bucharest: Nemira, 2004);
- Vincze Enikö Magyari, Diferenţa care contează. Diversitatea social-culturală prin lentila antropologiei feministe, (Desire Foundation, 2002).

DEVELOPMENT OF AN EDUCATION METHODOLOGY IN THE SOCIETY OF KNOWLEDGE AND COMPUTERIZATION

IULIA GONTA[1]

Abstract:
Social changes of recent years have changed people's thinking and behavior, drawing a new generation. In this context contemporary society was launched in search of new solutions for understanding and constructing reality, approaching education for socio-economic problems. Modernization of education became a necessity and a solution in future perspective. In informatization era the psychosocial transformations of our civilization require new forms of educational organization, based on practical, strategic and divergence thinking.

Keywords: knowledge society; education; methodology; modernization; university.

Introduction

The world experience has shown the importance of investing in education. For this reason we decided to follow the changes occurring in education from social, scientific and economic progress. The analysis of the evolution in higher education will allow us to deduct its modernization routes. In this way we will outline the methodology necessary to connect higher education to the society of knowledge and computerization.

Studying the effects of scientific progress over society and analyzing the specifics of youth from the society of knowledge and computerization allows us to trace the directions for effective teaching interaction. Given the characteristics of the modern student we will outline the specific methodology of present university education.

The importance of the study consists in the fact that, by recognizing the need for change, it will be possible to draw the direction lines of the subsequent amendments of the education methodology.

In order to achieve the study objectives, in the survey we used the method of observation, analysis and documentation, and the education phenomena were approached through the prism of psychosocial changes.

In recent years, specialty literature resorts even more frequently to interdisciplinary approaches. Simultaneously it comes to modernizing the education system. In the specialty literature the importance of education in socioeconomic development is mentioned more often.

It is important that modernization of education addresses not only the information content, but also the teaching methodology. Therefore science education professionals have looked towards the study of youth psychology in order to develop the methodology adapted to the society of knowledge and computerization.

Development and modernization of the universities

Lately we are witnessing the process of computerization and globalization of society, following the development of new information and communication technologies. Innovation in the scope of these technologies has contributed to an evolution in the true sense of the word, that included all branches of science, and educational system. Social progress propelled education towards a natural and necessary development.

[1] Senior Lecturer Ph. D., „Spiru Haret" University, Bucharest, Romania, (email: iuliagonta@gmail.com).

Let's follow the change which included the educational domain, making a foray into the phenomenon of development and modernization of the universities. These institutions, born in Italy, France and England at the beginning of the thirteenth century, are spread now to all continents. Universities over the centuries have been radically transformed. Each period had to solve the dilemma that aroused from keeping the old knowledge and introducing of innovations, from the traditional system of knowledge evaluation and from the change of the assessment criteria for appreciation.

Medieval universities were institutions that spread ideas and doctrines. During this period the vast majority of teachers and students were limited to the reproduction of a science without seeking to renew or enrich it.

Even if the fields of study taught in the universities seem today purely theoretical, medieval academics were convinced that the studies were not an end in itself, but they must allow those who have had access to science to have a personal profit and to put their competence in the service of legitimate purposes from a social point of view.

The cultural contribution of the medieval universities was not limited only to the innovative doctrines of several great personalities. All those who have persistently attended them, were offered a very solid cultural base, a rigorous way of thinking, an ability to analyze and this formed for them the necessary notions in order to shape a coherent vision of the world.

The pedagogy of the Middle Age promoted mainly oral methods and was based on two exercises: reading and discussion. Reading presented an interpretation of the program texts by teachers or advanced students. The second method took the form of public discussions between students led by the teacher, who was leading and concluding the debate. Discussions stimulated competition energized the atmosphere and constituted a tool for discovering the truth. During this period, books were expensive, however teachers were forbidden to dictate, and students were forced to follow the teachers' explanations without taking notes.

In modern times (XVI-XVIII centuries), a major feature of the institutional evolution was the control of universities by political powers, because the state was responsible for teachers' salaries and for building constructions. Therefore in modern times in some countries the universities offered an insufficient and outdated education, and in others they provided a solid cultural base and were forming the original spirits. During this period, the development of education methodology was facilitated by the spreading of printed books.

In modern times, in academic education there have been a series of reforms. In the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries they were primarily aimed at strengthening the state control at the expense of the old privileges of autonomy over the universities. And later in the eighteenth century, the reforms reflected an explicable desire to modernization by a better adaptation to social needs.

It followed a period of diversification, expansion and professionalization of higher education. Performing higher studies had become an important condition for promoting individual social status, for the national affirmation, for elite formation, for scientific and economic progress at a national and international level.

During this period it appears the American university system in which education is considered the basic value of society. American billionaires want to offer to their country institutions in order to form the new elites, to affirm international power, operating by the German model, that is linking education to research. In the American universities the beauty of the premises, the luxury of the research laboratories and the abundance of auxiliary aids (libraries, sports halls, housing for teachers etc.) is combined with the opening of higher education to the masses and provided the people with the chance of getting higher education.

Development of an education methodology in the society of knowledge and computerization

Today education has gained new dimensions. As the result of a long historical development, it included the entire world and is strengthening its importance.

"Education is the key to a better future," said Androulla Vassiliou, European Commissioner for Education, Culture, Multilingualism and youth education, and investing in it "speeds up the process of recovery and equip people and countries with the competences to prosper in the post-crisis world"[2].

It is natural to ask ourselves the question "What is the current mission of universities and how should they interact with society?"

Currently it is outlining some perspective of the mission of universities. Thus, we can distinguish universities that can be considered regional, economic, social, ecological, cultural, etc. development centers. Another type of universities is the institutions with innovative specific and "business". Those are often in partnership with enterprises and play an important role in designing new technologies, achieving social orders through scientific research. And a third type of university serves society to "lifelong learning" and "life wide learning". These universities have the mission to contribute to adult education.

Current education seeks to join the current needs of the society and to create favorable conditions for the development of every personality. It is characterized by diversity and creativity, a mixture of styles and ambiguity tolerance, acceptance of innovation and change, challenge of lateral thinking and search for truth, creating reality through the exchange of experience. The society wants that modern methodologies will open possibilities for people with different types of intelligence, to seek alternative sources of information, allowing individualization of the learning process.

Modern education calls to establish individual routes for development for each person. This means that each person will determine his objectives, goals, ideals to achieve personal development, different from other people. These routes can be achieved through self-discovery and self-education provided through individual hard work based upon additional sources pre-established by the student.

At present education sciences deal with the development of educational standards, enriched with new scientific content. Experts indicate that the information provided for studies is not interiorized by the youth to the required extent and its assimilation is complicated and totally unfeasible. This phenomenon can be explained by the discrepancy occurred between the methodologies applied in the educational process and the psychological characteristics of the new generation, the expectations and even the needs of informational society.

Teachers today are against informative booming of students and pupils with answers, in order to prepare them for exams. The educational process must be different from a simple information delivery in which "our head is a perforated bucket through which holes the surrounding information flows within."[3] Teachers should understand that their role consists not only in efficiently storing information, but also in forming the students' ability to solve various professional and vital situations in order to achieve them in life.

Since sterile information flow is not received by youth, teachers are required to address the real problems of the new generation and to offer youth a framework to help them solve those. The information provided must be "dressed" in situations and contexts to help each person develop customized strategies of thinking to guide youth towards knowledge performances by the individual feeling of information.

---

[2]  (2010), Focus on Higher Education in Europe 2010: The Impact of the Bologna Process, http://eacea.ec.europa.eu/education/eurydice/documents/thematic_reports/122EN.pdf

[3] Karl Popper şi Konrad Lorenz (1997), Viitorul este deschis, Editura Trei, Bucureşti.

We must keep in mind that the computerization process of society emphasizes the reporting information towards existence. This aspect of modern society can be applied when we appropriate information by feelings. In other words, true knowledge can not be transmitted; they can be acquired and constructed by each person through his own efforts to understand, through experience and personal perception.

Because today's youth has primarily a visual-spatial and emotional thinking, he assimilates knowledge with emotional value, which is in conflict with the tradition of the teachers to transmit knowledge mainly through verbal channels, appealing to rational thinking. The present teacher's task is to help them discover and decipher the reality through different experiences in which reality takes different forms depending on the particularities of each person.

Education has become an attempt to influence, without guaranteeing the final result. The teacher became a mentor and a model of the experience of success or failure, of ideals approach and confrontation with non-values, of thinking and feeling mode.

In such a perspective is necessary to analyze the phenomenon of the computer revolution impact on education. We must recognize the contribution of new informational technologies in the formation of the society of knowledge and computerization.

Introducing new informational technologies imposed on society's informational globalization. Today, young people obtain information from various domains thanks to the Internet. The impact of new technologies upon education has changed the route of traditional communication and information; it imposes modernizing technologies in academic education and the modification of educational methods.

Current youth learns about the world around him on the Internet. It is obvious that the new type of knowledge is characterized by informational diversity and heterogeneity, by way of individual perception and lack of assessing information by eclecticism and originality. Current education will have to give up the system of systematical knowledge, organized and rigid, in favor of a huge field of information which offers the freedom to choose. The new generation of students is opting for the opportunity to personally decide how to achieve its development activities.

The new educational paradigm cultivates positive thinking (mental attitude with whom you manage to overcome obstacles and fulfill your dreams) and humanism (which places man and human values above all, cultivating the taste of meditating on the human condition in the world). Today's youth, willing to communicate, seeks to make friends through the Internet. The development of the computerized revolution conditioned youth employment to various social networks. These allow users to shape a personality many times different from the real one or to be anonymous. Knowing this aspect, the teacher needs to condition a good behavior, developing favorable interpersonal relationships and a positive socio-emotional climate, to promote students' qualities and abilities.

An inevitable consequence of changing the perception of the academic studies' mission treats learning activity as a process to knowledge production. In this context we can speak of a culture that cultivates tolerance regarding different points of view, trains creative thinking and promotes talent.

As we noted earlier, the society was exposed in a relatively short period of time to significant changes. Let's not forget the influence of media on our conscious and subconscious. Messages with a strong emotional intensity are transmitted more frequently in a short period of time. Acceleration of the rhythm of life, speed of information transmission has led humanity to the need of applying simplified thinking schemes, operational and intuitive. Consequently, the new methodology of education must keep the perspective of the overall changes that occurred at the conscious and subconscious level.

Education sciences, in the period of the society of knowledge, must resort to the media means and use the Internet to interact with the younger generation "in his language". It is recommended that teachers provide students with films and educational programs, games and interactive sites with educational character. Education must have sufficient sources to guide youth education through the Internet and to hold control of the information field.

During the current period, superior education students are taught to solve various problems related to professional activity. To facilitate this, teachers must provide students with creative thinking patterns of the great personalities. It is important to display in university education recordings with valuable national and international personalities.

Current education requires a change in the way of thinking and training to develop personal thinking. This means that at the current level of superior education the present methodology must involve interaction and cooperation of the young, take into account the over sizing information and active communication through the Internet, address the optimization of personal awareness through discussions and desynchronize of the educational process, to apply individualization of learning and motivation for personal development.

As mentioned in previous analysis, current technologies must develop creative and strategic thinking. This type of thinking works with information in the form of images and needs to accumulate logical alternatives related to an informative segment. The perspective of development of these intellectual skills are related to practical thinking and is structured through applicative exercises and solving problems.

Besides, we must take responsibility for the formation of student's moral character. Thus we will invest in the future of society and will contribute to it, so that the youth will be empathetic, optimistic, courageous, helpful, friendly and happy.

Finally it must be said that although at the foundation of the society of knowledge stands information and communications mediated by the computer, the place of the teacher is and will remain important.

Conclusions:

Following our study we found that, over the years, universities as a result of social progress have changed their mission, which determined the modification of contents and teaching methods. Education today must develop practical and creative thinking; allow differentiation of personal development and self-directed learning through modern information sources.

Analysis of changes in higher education from their apparition to date, allows us to say that it is natural and necessary to introduce changes in teaching methodology.

We found that, at this stage, is inevitable the change of educational interaction towards humanism, acceptance of divergent ideas and diversity in perception, the approach of connecting at the conscious and subconscious level.

The study results show that together with social progress it is necessary to improve academics, to modernize education methodology and the interaction strategies between teachers and students.

Following the study, we can conclude that the society of knowledge and computerization needs new educational methodology that will allow efficiency of the learning process. At present it is recommended that experts in education sciences approach the development of new methods, by doing a psychological analysis on thinking, perception and motivation of the persons from the society of knowledge and computerization.

References:

-  (2010), Focus on Higher Education in Europe 2010: The Impact of the Bologna Process,
- http://eacea.ec.europa.eu/education/eurydice/documents/thematic_reports/122EN.pdf.
- Bauman Yzgmunt, (2001). Globalizarea. Consecinţele umane, Bucureşti: Ed.Humanitas.
- Burke, P., (2004). O istorie socială a cunoaşterii, Iaşi, Institutul European.

- Charle, Christophe; Verger, Jacques (2001). Istoria universitatilor, Iaşi, Ed. Institutul European.
- Costea Ş., (2008). Educaţia, învăţarea şi dezvoltarea umană în societăţile cunoaşterii şi informatizării, Societate. Cultură. Educaţie, Piteşti: Rottarzmond &Rotarexim, pp.115-119.
- Drâmba, O., (2003.) Istoria culturii si civilizatiei, vol. VI, Ed. Saeculum si Vestala, Bucuresti.
- Freeman, Ch. (1997). Tehnology, Globalisation and Economic Performance, Ed. By D.Archibugi and J.Michie, Cambridge.
- Galbraith, John Kenneth, (1997). Societatea perfectă, Bucureşti, Editura Eurosong & Book.
- Lech Biegalski, (2007). Analiză: Noua Ordine Mondială şi Educaţia, http://ro.altermedia.info/noua-ordine-mondiala/analiz-noua-ordine-mondial-i-educaia_7980.html.
- Lukatskii, M.A., Kondratenko, E.B.,(2010). Metodologia cercetării educaţiei sociale: direcţiile actuale, Pedagogika, nr. 9, Moskva: Pedagogika.
- Metcalfe, S. (1994). The Economic Fondation of Technology Policy: Ecvilibrium and Evolutionary Perspective, Handbook of the Economics of Innovation and Technical Change, Cambridge, Blackwell Publishers.
- Neculau, A., (1997). Câmpul universitar şi actorii săi, Iaşi, Polirom.
- Popper, K., Lorenz K., (1997). Viitorul este deschis, Bucureşti: Editura Trei.
- Stan, E., (2004), Pedagogie postmodernă, Iaşi, Institutul European.

SECOND-LANGUAGE ACQUISITION AND THE SYSTEM OF EDUCATION

CAMELIA NEAGU[1]

Abstract:
As a branch of applied linguistics, language education or educational linguistics[2] has had a long history dating back in ancient times. However, at present, under the influence of globalization, second-language acquisition[3] has become a sine qua non condition for any potential employee or employer in the knowledge society. Basically, democratic regimes and developing countries encourage language education which they regard as an important asset in the process of globalization. Moreover, the study of foreign languages significantly contributes to the development of any human being's personality and implicitly of any society by eliminating cultural biases and borders. Currently, countries which fail to understand the importance of second-language acquisition deprive their citizens of a key social and cultural development factor. Last but not least, we could say that at present the ability to speak English has become synonym with acquiring a universal language. In consequence, educational policies should seriously focus on the study of the new lingua franca[4], i.e. English, while accepting as an undeniable possibility – given the rapidly changing political and economic environment – the fact that another language (such as Chinese or Spanish etc.) may replace English in time.

Keywords*: language education, system of education, lingua franca, globalization, English for specific purposes.*

Introduction

The study of language acquisition implies the development of linguistic theories and also of pedagogical methods, which, in an ideal system of education, should complete each other and be correlated for the benefit of the potential foreign language users. In Romania, educational policies emphasize the importance of foreign language acquisition to a great extent. Still, in our opinion, this emphasis should be more strengthened in higher education, where the use of foreign languages for specific purposes is an instrument by which students and future researchers can have access to up-to-date information in their field of study.

Language is not a science in which all experts agree to what is right or wrong. Nor is there a court of critics or professors that has either the power or the ability to settle the controversial issues about language all the time. In short, there are no agreed-upon absolute concepts in the worlds of language.

It is both ungenerous and sometimes superficial to blame only the educational system, which is a carrier not a cause of the decline of our perception of a real language as this appears in digests, advertising, the radio, on television, in the gossip columns, picture magazines, comic books, the inspirational best-sellers and the cinema etc.

---

[1] Senior Lecturer, Ph. D., "Nicolae Titulescu University", Bucharest (email: camelia.neagu@univnt.ro);

[2] Bernard Spolsky and Francis M. Hult, The Handbook of Educational Linguistics, Singapore: Blackwell Publishing Ltd., 2010;

[3] According to Muriel Saville-Troike. Introducing Second Language Acquisition. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press: 2006, pag. 2, second-language acquisition "…refers both to the study of individuals and groups who are learning a language subsequent to learning their first one as young children, and to the process of learning that language. The additional language is called a second language (L2), even though it may actually be the third, fourth, or tenth to be acquired. It is also commonly called a target language (TL), which refers to any language that it the aim or goal of learning."

[4] See Ute Smit, English as a Lingua Franca in Higher Education. A Longitudinal Study of Classroom Discourse, Berlin/New York: Walter de Gruyter Gmbh&Co. KG, 2010.

It is true that many of our primary schools, through the system of mass-promotion, place a premium on mental laziness. It is also true that many of our high-schools proceed on the make-the-work-interesting-to-the-student theory – which hardly leads to the development of the intellect. Finally, it is true that the college, therefore, is forced to neglect its main function – which is to mentally produce mature leaders – in favour of performing the elementary education duties that are properly the province of the primary and secondary schools.

School is an instrument of our society and it also should be an agent of intellectual ferment. Unfortunately, school teaches the virtues of attentiveness to things, techniques, machines, spectator sports and mass amusement instead of teaching the virtues of attentiveness to knowledge, wisdom and the works of the creative imagination. It is also true that educators in primary schools no longer really teach the child the basic skills (how to read, write, speak, listen and figure), the non-possession of which works against the development of attention.

School – there are, of course, notable exceptions – has in general become a kind of asylum or a refuge rather than an educational institution. Our real scope is to keep adolescent boys and girls, regardless of educational aptitude, desire to study or lack of them, from running the streets, getting into trouble and becoming intolerable nuisance in the community. The easiest way to keep them willing to submit to the school's control is to provide for them a vast amount of "amusement" and work to do.

This seems a fair statement but if our culture does not desire to create rational men but rather producers and consumers, most young people today are not able to enter industry or other types of gainful employment. The best method of occupying the time of such young people is an important problem and the solution to this problem requires an extended educational period (not only 3 or 4 years in universities), regardless of the immediate value of the education as such. In our opinion, the extension of the educational schedule might prove a socially wise enterprise within modern societies.

Our system of education may have to depart from the usual academic and vocational disciplines if it is to appeal to most people in this country. It is clear that this conception of the schools is a realistic one. It simply tunes in on the wave-band of our society in general and in free countries like our own.

Increasing globalization has created a large need for people in the workplace who are able to communicate in multiple languages. Although the need to learn foreign languages is almost as old as human history itself, the origins of modern language education can be found in the study and teaching of Latin in the 17th century (dominant language of education, commerce, religion and government in much of the Western world), but it was displaced by French, Italian and English by the end of the 16th century.

The study of modern languages did not become part of the curriculum of European schools until the 18th century and it was based on the purely academic study of Latin (students of modern languages did much of the exercises, studying grammatical rules and translating abstract sentences; oral work was almost minimal).

Innovation in foreign language teaching began in the 19th century and became very rapid in the 20th century. The earliest applied linguists included Jean Manesca, Heinrich Gottfried Ollendorff and Henry Sweet. The last mentioned linguist was a key figure in establishing the applied linguistics tradition in language.

Older methods and approaches – such as the grammar translation method or direct method that had been used in the past (Otto Jespersen, Harold Palmer and Leonard Bloomfield) – were replaced by new methods corresponding to the new scientific advances. With these methods, students generate original and meaningful sentences to gain functional knowledge.

In our country, language education took place as a general school subject or in a specialized language school. There are many methods of teaching languages related to second-language acquisition theory. They refer to approach, method and technique. The structural view treats language as a system of structurally related elements concerning grammar translation and audio-lingual method. Structural methods include the oral approach/situational language teaching.

A method consists of a plan for presenting the language material to be learned, which should be based upon a selective approach. The instructional system must be designed considering the objectives of the teaching/learning, how the content is to be selected and organized and the types of tasks to be performed; the roles of the students and the roles of the teachers.

Nowadays, blended learning combines face-to-face teaching with distance education frequently electronic, either computer-based or web-based. This has been a major point in the English language teaching over the last years.

When talking about language skills we mean listening, speaking, reading, writing and the use of that particular language; however, study skills and knowing how one learns have been applied to language classrooms with various results depending upon age, the level of knowledge within the surveyed classes and the aptitude to study a foreign language that some people may not possess.

In foreign language teaching pain and group work give opportunities for more students to participate more actively. Such activities also provide opportunities for peer teaching.

English has always become big business, perhaps the UK's richest natural resource, marketed with considerable skill and professionalism throughout the world. There are several reasons which explain its expansion: "...thanks to socio-historical developments, the military power exerted by English-speaking nations and, more recently, the socio-economic power of (English-dominated) international companies and organizations – English has become the main language of international relations and trade, international media and communications, international business and also academia. While the perspective domains are highly diverse, they are – as already reflected in the repeated use of 'international' – marked, on the one hand, by English in its function as lingua franca or common medium of communication amongst multilinguals /.../."[5]

In the last ten years, global setting of the English language has reached astonishing proportions from China's revolutionary English language policy to the publication of the Macquarie Dictionary of Australian English, as well as to the near-total Anglicization of international trade and politics, from OPEC to summitry.

We may say that language belongs to each one of us, to the child as much as to the professor. Everyone uses words even if nobody thinks of the words he/she uses. What is it about language that makes people so passionate and curious? The answer is that there is almost no aspect of our lives that is not touched by language. We live in and by language. We all speak and listen. We are all in some senses political, and so is language. We might consider that English is a universal language. The emergence of a language that could write the world is the fulfilment of a dream that goes back to the late 17th century and the beginnings of global consciousness itself.

Language is backed up by massive English-language training programmes, on international business that – in textbooks, language courses, video programmes and computerized instruction – is worth hundreds of millions of pounds to the economy of the UK. The English language is now one of Britain's most reliable exports, as Malcolm Bradbury stated. In other words today's lingua franca is an ideal British product "needing no workers and no work, no assembly lines and no assemble, no spare parts and very little servicing; it is used for the most intimate and most public services everywhere. We call it the English language…"[6] Any literate, educated person in the world is 'linguistically deprived' if he does not know English.

English is not simply a vital means of intercommunication for the scientific community, it also, almost unconsciously, provides the everyday basic vocabulary. Professor Yash Pal, a renowned scientist, noticed that many different standard terms are used in computer programmes and they have led to the creation of a jargon. In consequence, many speakers do not even notice that the common words they use are, in fact, English words. English has become the one foreign language that much of the world wants to learn. One basic force is an international need and desire to communicate. The more English-speaking the world becomes, the more important this language becomes to all societies. English is the language of the 'mass industries' – news-journalism, radio, film and television. Almost any international press conference held to disseminate information about an internationally significant event will be conducted in English.

[5] Ute Smit, op.cit., pag. 2.
[6] http://www.miguelmllop.com/practice/intermediate/readingcomprehension/theimportanceofenglish.pdf.

The demands of modernization, technological change and international bank funding, still largely controlled by Anglo-American corporations, provide the main reason for global English, the language of the multinational corporations. Many multinational Japanese companies (like Nissan or Datsun) write international memoranda in English. In Kuwait, the university's language centre predominantly teaches English, much of it highly specialized.

The pressure to learn English in this environment is strictly commercial. A businessman who does not know English and who has to run to his bilingual secretary is at a serious competitive disadvantage. Everybody talks English and even the minutes of the meetings are written in English. Company executives take courses to improve their proficiency and, of course, they will warn you: "You wouldn't get a job at a certain level if you didn't speak good English." What is true of individuals and companies applies to countries, too. If people do not know English, they cannot benefit from multinational development programmes. The power of English is not confined to the invention and manufacture of new technology. All major corporations advertise and market their products in English.

English as the language of international pop music and mass entertainment is a worldwide phenomenon.

It is the non-linguistic forces – cultural, social, economic and political – that have made English the first world language in human history and instilled its driving force. Language is neutral, passive: only the uses to which it is put make it active. How comes that English can inspire astonishing affection not only among those who speak and write it as their mother tongue, but also among those for whom it is a foreign language? The richness and power of English was summarized in the 19th century by the great German philologist Jakob Grimm. The founder of comparative philology, Jakob Grimm, "... hazarded to guess more than three-quarters of a century ago that English would one day become the chief language of the world, and perhaps crown out several of the then principal idioms altogether. 'In wealth, wisdom and strict economy [he said] none of other living languages can vie with it.' "[7] But is it, in fact, "better", "superior", "more expressive", "richer" than other languages? English is highly idiomatic. On the other hand, the English language has three characteristics. The gender of every noun in modern English is determined by meaning and does not require a masculine, feminine or neuter article. The second practical quality of English is that it has a grammar of great simplicity and flexibility. Nouns and adjectives have highly simplified word-endings. Nouns can become verbs and verbs – nouns in a way that is impossible in other languages.

Above all, the great quality of English is its teeming vocabulary, 80% of which is foreign-born.

English as a world language is sustained by another elusive quality – its own peculiar genius. The arts of speech and literature have been perhaps the special contribution of the English people to European culture.

Today, in this new global state, English is probably finding more variety of expressivity and more local colour than at any time since its "golden age". Spoken and written, it offers a medium of almost limitless potential and surprise. As we can see, English, as a second language of many speakers in countries throughout the world, is more likely to survive to inevitable political changes of the future.

[7] H.L. Mencken.The American Language. New York: Cosimo, Inc., pag. 372.

As for our country educational system regarding foreign languages, especially English, researchers and professionals testified as to the existence of a language system, which is part of our education. This is the reason I am asking myself why our curricula use the foreign language mostly optional, sometimes only in the first year of education?

The main policy arguments in favour of promoting foreign language education are the need for multilingual workforce as well as intellectual and cultural benefits as a consequence of greater inclusion in global information.

Conclusions

All in all, it is vital for educational policies to include second-language acquisition among its main strategies. Thus, it would be desirable and advisable for foreign language teachers and professors to place the verbs to think, to compare and to understand at the core of the didactical process. Of similar importance it is that those who teach English / any other foreign language and those who lecture on language education should encourage learners to preserve their linguistic and cultural identity. In this respect, we would like to comment on the importance of translations for the dissemination of knowledge and the consolidation of cultural identities. Thanks to second-language acquisition (and we refer here to the effort of translators to adapt unknown texts to other more widespread languages), 'marginal' cultures (such as the Romanian culture) can be known all over the world. In this respect, we would like to quote George Steiner who noticed that "The new status of Eastern Europe has occasioned a veritable tide of translations into English and into the relevant languages. Czech, Polish, Hungarian and Romanian literature are beginning to reach the Anglo-American world-audience. In turn, Western texts, long forbidden, are being imported."[8]

Finally, we would like to underline the fact that today's knowledge society cannot exist outside second-language acquisition. In the ever continuously changing political and economic environment, culture – and together with it language learning – is permanently altered by the newly created concepts and devices. If English / Chinese / Spanish or any other language is spoken by the majority of the world population and gains the statute of a lingua franca in the future, perhaps the old myth of Babylon will become obsolete.

References

- Bernhard, Elizabeth B. Life in Language Immersion Classrooms. Bristol: Longdunn Press, 1992.
- Genessee, F. Learning through Two Languages: Studies of Immersion and Bilingual Education. Cambridge, MA: Newbury House, 1986.
- Lindholm-Leary, Kathryn, J. Dual Language Education. Clevedon: Cromwell Press Ltd., 2001.
- Loomis, Roger, Sherman, Clark, Donald, Lemen, Middendorf, John, Harlan. Modern English Readings. NY: Holt, Rinehart and Winston, 1966.
- Mc Crum, Robert, Cran, William, MacNeil Robert. The Story of English. NY: Viking Penguin Inc., 1986.
- Mc Kay, Sharon, Schaetzel, Kirsten. Facilitating Adult Learner Interactions to Build Listening and Speaking Skills. Washington: Center for Adult Language Acquisition, 2008.
- Mencken,H.L. The American Language. New York: Cosimo, Inc., pag. 372.
- Met, M., E., Lorenz. "Lessons from US Immersion Programs: Two Decades of Experience". In Immersion Education: International Perspectives, edited by Johnson, Robert, Keith, Swain, Merrill, 243-264. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1997.
- Meunier, Fanny, Granger, Sylviane. Phraseology in Foreign Language Learning and Teaching. Amsterdam and Philadelphia: John Benjamins Publishing Co., 2008.

[8] George Steiner. "Preface to the Third Edition". In After Babel. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1998.

- Saville-Troike, Muriel. Introducing Second Language Acquisition. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2006.
- Smit, Ute. English as a Lingua Franca in Higher Education. A Longitudinal Study of Classroom Discourse. Berlin/New York: Walter de Gruyter Gmbh&Co. KG, 2010.
- Spolsky, Bernard, Hult, Francis, M. The Handbook of Educational Linguistics. Singapore: Blackwell Publishing Ltd., 2010.
- Steiner, George. "Preface to the Third Edition". In After Babel. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1998.
- Swain, Merrill, Johnson, Robert, Keith. "Immersion Education: A Category within Bilingual Education". In Immersion Education: International Perspectives, edited by Johnson, Robert, Keith, Swain, Merrill, 1-16. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1997.
- http://www.miguelmllop.com/practice/intermediate/readingcomprehension/theimportanceofenglish.pdf.

THE COMMODIFICATION OF ACADEMIC RESEARCH AND THE KNOWLEDGE SOCIETY

MARIA CERNAT[1]

Abstract
The knowledge society is best defined as the society where production, distribution and use of knowledge play the central role in the social matrix. The possession of technological means of production has been replaced be the possession of useful knowledge, and most theorists embrace this change thinking it could offer us hope for a better future. But does it really contribute to the development of a better society? The main objective of my article is to offer a realistic answer to this question. The perpetuation of the capitalistic way of production in the academic world leads us to the situation where ideas and scientific articles are being commodified. In theory, the knowledge society is build on the idea of producing, disseminating and using information for the well being of the people. I claim that this is a very naïve perspective on how our current knowledge society is actually functioning. Since information is so easy to transfer one could expect that all the members of the society could benefit form it. As my article will show, this is not in fact the case. Not everybody is able to produce and use knowledge. Since what we are experiencing is the commodification of academic articles only few people are able to produce and use knowledge. This way the knowledge society becomes a closed society where only a privileged financial elite has access to the latest academic research.

Keywords: academic research, academic freedom, commodification of ideas, knowledge society, commodification of academic articles

Introduction

Cultural relativism started to erode humanities and social sciences foundation at the exact time where the free-market system entered the scene. In a previous article[2] I focused my attention on the role of the university in the era of a commodified knowledge. This article is a continuation of the idea that interesting as it may seem the term "knowledge society" is nothing but an appealing label for the "society of commodified information". There are optimistic perspectives on the role of the university in our relativistic and commercial society. For instance "this battles [the cultural ones] can be seen as renewing the moral purpose of the university as opposed to simple eroding the very possibility of the university having a moral purpose."[3] The author considers that the fact that nowadays universities are cosmopolitan is in fact an advantage, a challenge to be met:

"The university is the institution in the society most capable of linking the requirements of industry technology and market forces with the demands of citizenship. Given the enormous dependence of these forces on university based experts, the university is in fact in a position of strength, not of weakness. While it is true that the new production of knowledge is dominated by an instrumentalization of knowledge and that as a result the traditional role of the university has been undermined it is now in a position to serve social goals more fully than previously when other goals were more prominent."[4]

[1] Senior Lecturer Ph. D., „Spiru Haret" University, (email: macernat@gmail.com).
[2] Maria Cernat (2011) "The Role of the University in the Knowledge Society", CKS Proceedings Volume.
[3] Gerard Delanty (2001) Challenging Knowledge. The University in the Knowledge Society, SHRE & Open University, p. 210.
[4] Op. cit. . p. 229.

While Delanty's analysis on the negative forces influencing today's universities – instrumentalism and relativism – is very precise and well documented, the methods the university is to survive the dominant market forces in order to fulfill social goals remains unclear. Simply expressing the desire that the university regains its freedom in the era of academic capitalism in order to become a key player in the global arena cannot count as a clear way out of the trap of instrumentalism and relativism. In Delanty's very optimistic perspective the university should offer us a sense of global citizenship helping to create a global community. The current realities shows just how far are we from such an ideal. The main purpose of my article is to show that transforming academic articles into a commodity transforms the global academia into an information market that has nothing to do with a meritocratic intellectual community. In the first section of my article I shall discuss some of the most controversial aspects surrounding the copyright of academic articles and also some of its most relevant effects on faculty members. In the second part of my paper I shall prove that Romanian academics as well as other academics are literally forced to publish their articles in internationally indexed journals. While this offers great visibility for academic research the access to such articles is restricted through very expensive fees. This creates a very unfair system of exclusion that is not at all justifiable in terms of production costs. The third section of my paper will be dedicated to the analysis of some of the most important social and academic effects of this capitalist way of academic texts production.

The copyright: a cluster of rights regarding abstract objects

The copyright laws refer to a very interesting type of objects: the ones that do not diminish through repeated use. The literature passionate reader may even claim that there are novels that revel their true beauty after several readings – that is after repeated uses. Having the possibility of collect a specific amount of money for every use of a token of an abstract object type seems like the best business one can imagine. No wonder the debates surrounding today's legislative efforts of protecting the intellectual property are so heated[5]. When academic texts were produced in the era of mechanical reproduction the publishing houses spent much money in the production and dissemination process. Once Internet has become a service available world wide the dissemination of academic articles is virtually free of charge. The huge opportunity provided by the world wide web was soon to be ignored by those trying to gain as much as possible from the intellectual work of academics. It is nowadays harder to protect the intellectual products and this is why the publishing houses and media corporations are desperately seeking more punitive and restrictive laws to protect their way making profit. This article is an attempt to focus on other values that should guide the academic life. If profit is all that is important a lot of other things such as meritocracy, inter-cultural dialogue, better communication and interactivity are lost. The Internet makes if harder for those profiting form the copyright laws to protect their abstract objects but it makes it so much easier for academics world wide to share and communicate their ideas. There are probably exceptions to this rule: the high costs of research in natural science makes it more acceptable to protect the scientific findings. But this is clearly not the case for humanities or social sciences. On the contrary: the incredible communication platform represented by the internet is actually a mean of progress. Humanities and social sciences are actually gaining form the constant dialogue between academics and any tool facilitating such dialogue should be welcomed. If more academics world wide could gain access to excellent journals in humanities and social science that it would be easier for a great number of faculty members belonging to very different cultural environments to engage in the dialogue. As long as it is so expensive to read the mainstream academic journals this is only a remote ideal.

[5] In 2012 Romania along with many other European countries signed Anti-Counterfeiting Trade Agreement – a series of regulations protecting the intellectual property. This decision was criticized by important organizations in the civil society since it is though to be a way of protecting media corporations and not the public or the artists.

As Andrew Alexandra[6] points out, when talking about copyright there are two types of rights involved: "control" rights (the possibility that someone is recognized as the author of a certain paper; the right protecting someone's text from being altered or used against the author's intentions) and "commodity" rights (the right to profit from the reproduction and dissemination of the article; the right to transfer the right to profit from the reproduction and dissemination of written articles). In the era of mechanical reproduction it was almost impossible to reach the public without the aid of a publishing house. The use of Internet made it possible to reach the public directly. But things were not so simple. Instead of having publishing houses we have international databases indexing academic journals and imposing restrictive access through expensive fees. Alexandra's claim that "the development of electronic publishing on the internet, however, means that in academic publishing as elsewhere it is becoming possible to cut out the "middleman" who have mediated between producers and consumers: the original holders of copyright are increasingly in a position to send their work directly to readers." But this is not the case of academic articles. As I mentioned earlier, most prestigious journals are now indexed in several databases that gain important amounts of money from the reproduction and dissemination of intellectual labor. So the "middle man" was not at all easy to be "cut off". The producer of academic text is often the last to be profiting from its own intellectual labor. Some universities consider that as long as an academic published papers while being the university employee, he has no right to profit from the reproduction and dissemination of its work. The famous academic incentive is "publish or perish", so, most academics are compelled to publish as many articles as possible. But, they are not always allowed to profit from the reproduction and distribution of their texts. The university they work in takes all the credit and all the profit from the academic copyrighted material.

There are important "side-effects" to the way nowadays copyright laws are conceived. First of all there ethically controversial aspects related to the fact that academics are compelled to publish as many papers as possible. But this is not for the sole purpose of intellectual progress. In many cases the university they work in is the only one to profit from the right reproduction and dissemination of academic articles. If this is the case it is only fair to assume that more articles means more money and not necessarily more scientific progress. But this is not the most negative of the side-effects I am trying to highlight here. The biggest problem of this way of transforming the academic texts into an information market is the system of exclusions it generates. In 2011 the Romanian Central University Library was able offer it's readers access to the most important academic databases such as Sage, Francis Taylor, Emerald, etc. Up to that point it was virtually impossible for Romanian academics to gain access to the latest research studies since the access fees for those databases were very expensive. Even now, only Romanian academics living in Bucharest can benefit form this information platform. This example touches the most controversial aspect related to the way the copyright laws are conceived: academics living in poor countries do no have access to latest results in scientific research since they cannot read the most important academic journals in their field of expertise. The media corporations, the owners of international databases and publishing houses are surely benefiting form this way of transforming the knowledge society into a commodified information society. But the rest of the people engaged in this system, academics forced to publish even though they cannot fully profit form their intellectual labor, the academics living in poor countries are not.

[6] Andrew Alexandra (2002) „Academic personality and the Commodification of Academic Texts", Ethics of Information and Technology, 4, 279–276.

The producers of knowledge are located in the richest countries and it seems they have no intention in sharing their findings and ideas with less fortunate peers living in poor countries. Gaining access to the academic market of ideas is a question of how much money you have in your pocket not how smart you are. The commodification of academic texts leaves outside the mainstream research a lot of brilliant academics lacking the financial resources to become an important players in the intellectual arena. The intellectual community is thought to be a place were meritocracy is represented at its best. One could expect that once the production costs of reproducing academic text lowered so much as a result on internet connection the a digital academic environment would welcome academics lacking the financial resources of their peers living in rich countries. This was not the case.

In fact today's regulations actually fight against the possibilities our current technology is offering us. The Anti-Counterfeiting Trade Agreement is an international law protecting the intellectual property that has been the subject of very pertinent criticism. First of all the Wikileaks site provided evidence that most countries were negotiating a law protecting the intellectual property behind closed doors. The negotiations were secret up to may 2008 when the text of the law was published on the Internet. Soon after this disclosure the mainstream media treated the subject extensively. The main problem is the internet is a global network and all the problems related to it are also global. Different states have only local solutions to a global problem. The ACTA was the subject of secret negotiations between states partly because there is no international institution having the task of generating international regulation regarding the use of the internet.[7] And, since this is an international problem, local solutions or solutions resulting from secret negotiations between states are clearly no long term solutions. Perhaps this is the typical case were technologies move faster than our institutions ability to regulate them. But this is no excuse for the lack of an international debate on the ethical issues regarding the copyright laws in general and those regarding academic texts in particular.

The case of Romanian academics

In 2011 a new law of national education was adopted. This law changed entirely the evaluation and promotion criteria for the Romanian academics. What I am trying to emphasize in section of my article is that under the current regulations only academic texts published in internationally indexed journals are acceptable in order to get a good evaluation. If we look at the promotion criteria we find out that all that matters if the research activity. Under the previous law[8] the teaching activity used to count for something in the academic evaluation.[9] The first criterion of evaluation consisted in the teaching activity performance. The actual law says virtually nothing about one of the most important academic activity. The quality-assurance process presupposes that every academic should have the self-evaluation, peer evaluation and the student evaluation. But all those evaluations are not really relevant to the promotion criteria. The institution authorized to establish the promotion criteria for the academics, The National Council for the Certification of Academic Titles, Certificates and Diplomas, does not mention anything about the teaching activity. All the criteria regard the research activity and especially the publication of articles in internationally indexed journals. The whole burden of getting access to the international databases is put on the shoulders of the universities. They have to grant their employees a good research environment by providing [7] Most of the civil rights activists harshly criticized this trade agreement. What is interesting is that so much effort is being put to the task of protecting intellectual property and very little is being done against more violent crimes committed on the internet. No international negotiation regarding child pornography on the internet is yet being done. Once the internet allows people to connect world wide we worry so much about the media corporations profits and so little about the children. This fact cast a very disappointing light on our current political leaders priorities really are.

[8] http://legislatie.resurse-pentru-democratie.org/84_1995.php

[9] www.aracis.ro/uploads/media/Metodologie_aprobata_1418-2006.pdf

access to the international databases. Moreover, there are only a few databases for every scientific field recognized by the But is this requirement realistic? First of all there is a problem regarding the restrictive number of databases for each theoretical field. For example, if someone whishes to get promoted in sociology there are only five databases recognized as being relevant for that particular theoretical field. Sage publications, Emerald, Oxford Journals are only few examples of databases that are not present in the short list selected for the above mentioned theoretical field. This is not really a problem since the most important journals are indexed in multiple databases. But the most important problem is how to grant access to all academics to the research resources. As stated earlier this burden is placed exclusively on the university's shoulders. If all the universities in Romania were private, this would probably make sense, but, since most of them are publicly funded than this doesn't seem financially prudent. The best way for granting access to international academic databases is through a publicly funded national program. This way a single subscription would be bought for all the public universities. But such a decision solves the problem only for our country. Nobody can argue that there are not brilliant academics living in poor countries. In the era of mechanical reproduction of academic text perhaps most of them relied on their best fortune or other arbitrary forces. Today's advances in technology allows the dissemination of academic texts world wide. Unfortunately the place of ideological restriction has been taken by the financial restriction. Romanian recent history was market by a very dark episode where totalitarianism prevented everyone trying to read and do research especially in the humanities or social sciences field form getting to the foreign academic journals. When trying to write an article most people spent an incredible amount of time often risking their freedom to gain access to mainstream academic journals. Unfortunately things did not dramatically change once democratic regimes were installed in Romania. There are of course huge differences. We are not prosecuted for reading mainstream journals and with the help of the friends living in richer countries we can finally document our articles. The current trend resulting from Romanian academic regulation is to gain more visibility for the research done in our country. Nobody can argue that this is in fact a very positive aspiration. But the financial restrictions Romanian academics have to face have to be taken into account.

3. Conclusions

The very low disseminating costs of academic articles in the areas of humanities or social sciences should make us hope for a virtual meritocratic academic community. The financial restrictions imposed to academics living in poor countries represents a clear obstacle preventing us from achieving this goal. The negotiations regarding the future fate of academic articles should not be the result of negotiations between states behind closed doors. Since so much energy is being mobilized to protect the intellectual property it is only fair to assume that part of that energy should be spent in order to find better ways of sharing ideas and research findings among academics world wide. Maybe such an endeavor would not be to the benefit of publishing houses but values like scientific progress and inter-cultural dialogue would be, by no means, better protected in a real knowledge society. Emphasizing only the protection and not the sharing of intellectual property is the best way to build a commercial society where the money are the ultimate value everybody should accept. Transforming the academic texts and journals form an academic arena where ideas are exchanged into a information market that privileges only those academics rich enough to participate to the dialogue is by no means the best way to build the "knowledge" society.

References:

- Alexandra, Andrew (2002) „Academic personality and the Commodification of Academic Texts", Ethics of Information and Technology, 4, 279–276.
- Delanty, Gerard (2001) Challenging Knowledge. The University in the Knowledge Society, SHRE & Open University, p. 210.
- Lieberwitz, Risa L. (2005) „Confronting the Privatization andCommercialization of Academic Research: AnAnalysis of Social Implications at the Local,National, and Global Levels", Indiana Journal of Global Legal Studies, 12:1, 109–152.

Online resources:

- http://legislatie.resurse-pentru-democratie.org/84_1995.php
- www.aracis.ro/uploads/media/Metodologie_aprobata_1418-2006.pdf

LEADERSHIP AND CHANGE, A MUST FOR CRISIS PERIOD IN HIGHER EDUCATION INSTITUTIONS

MIRCEA REMUS SABĂU[1]
DĂNUȚ NEACȘU[2]

Abstract
Leadership is always a matter of focus for both scholars, private and public institutions, especially nowadays when the whole planet is suffering from a worldwide financial crisis, which has lead to an international uncertainty. The present drastic changes of the social environment forced higher education institutions to respond and this conducted to the appearance of the leadership change issue. Current times can be considered as very difficult ones for educational leaders, especially since they are continuously faced with shifting environments, new provocations, new stakes and in the same time, new threats. In order to remain competitive in the global market and also in order to become prepared for the changing international environment, academic leaders must change. The present financial crisis is shaped by a sense of urgency and reality. Due to the fact that it affects plenty of people and various countries, it is also characterized by transboundary effects. Taking into consideration these circumstances, the necessity for quick crisis solution occurs. Accordingly, the aim of this project is to investigate the leadership problem in the academic education area during the present financial crisis. The researcher found it appealing to study the effects of external circumstances on higher education leadership. The conducted analysis discusses possible guidelines for a higher education leader to use especially in crisis situations as nowadays. The researcher plans to answer the following question: what must be analyzed when developing a model or method that can be used as guidance when leading in crisis times?

Keywords: leadership, crisis, higher education,academic, change.

Introduction

The concept of leadership is still of actuality and importance[3], in spite of "its too many definitions, and deliberation, all contain some common process elements like personal commitment, relationship building, vision creation, ethics, and vision into reality as few examples"[4].

The contemporary world is defined by complexity and precipitation, shifting values, and therefore a change in crises. According to Jackson & Parry, "leadership represents the process of influencing all the activities that a certain department of human resources makes towards achievement an objective"[5]. Another aspect that should be taken into consideration is the interpersonal process between a leader and his followers. Lundgren sees leadership as "a process made up of three factors: leaders, followers, and the relationship between these two factors"[6].

For a leader to be able to influence followers, a basic method is to "create a vision, since this is the only manner to have a realistic, credible view, attractive future for the organization"[7]. This can

[1] Senior Lecturer Ph. D. candidate, West University of Timişoara (email: remus.mircea@yahoo.coml)
[2] Senior Lecturer Ph. D. candidate,"Andrei Şaguna" University of Constanţa (email: danut.neacsu@yahoo.com)
[3] Bennis, Warren and Burt Nanus, Leaders: Strategies for Taking Charge, Collins Business Essentials, 2007.
[4] Zomorrodian, Asghar, "New Approach to Strategic Planning: the Impact of Leadership and Culture on Plan Implantation via the three Cs: Cooperation, Collaboration and Coordination", Proceedings of ASBBS, Volume 18, Number 1, Las Vegas, (2011): 1128.
[5] Jackson & Parry, A Very Short, Fairly Interesting and Reasonably Cheap Book About Studying Leadership. (London: SAGE Publications, 2008) 12-13.
[6] Lundgren, Mikael, Lecture Leadership and rhetoric, An introduction to classical rhetoric, Kalmar: Linnaeus University, 2010.
[7] Bennis, Warren and Burt Nanus, Leaders: Strategies for Taking Charge, (Collins Business Essentials, 2007): 82.

be applied to both academic organizations and to business ones as well. Based on the above issued mentioned, the problem of this article is that higher education institutions must try and achieve successful leadership for achieving environmental competitiveness and increase their performance on crisis period.

Due to this feeling that the crisis is global, due to this change of the character of a crisis, solutions must be found. Thus, a change in handling a crisis becomes a must. Hence, the present article contributes to this issue by focusing on the principle of academic crisis leadership.

The major objective of the present analysis is to determinate the necessary tools and techniques in order to guarantee successful higher education leadership during crisis period. Secondary research objectives are: to find out leader and employee perception about change and leadership through crisis; to determine, through literature review, the key incursions that conducted to a successful leadership redesign, to evaluate the implementation of leadership model in crisis period within the higher education institutions and to observe leadership change in crisis period within academic institutions.

The main purpose of this article is to carefully examine the leadership conducted in crisis times. The researcher's major intention is to provide/ set up a model that can be of great use as guidance for an academic leader who finds himself/ herself leading in crisis situations. Also, the leadership redesign must be implemented in higher education institutions, since they are undergoing obscure times with a very confused vision of the future[8].

Implementation of the study

In this part the researcher will explain and justify the approach to meet his final aim. Also, the method for the gathering of data for the research will be presented.

Background

The Asia Crisis (1997) and also the Russian Default Crisis (1998), represent the biggest two crisis that the whole world ever experienced, apart from the financial crisis of 2007/2008 which was the third major financial crisis which occurred during the last eleven years. The present international financial crisis appeared in the United States of America, but its effects have been witnessed by numerous instances globally.

On the national level, Romania, a developing country has also been affected by this crisis. Thus, bad consequences have been experienced by institutions nationwide. The public sector has been particularly exposed to the financial crisis worldwide and the Romanian public institutions are no exceptions.

Accordingly, Romanian higher education institutions have been exposed straightly to the crisis, and key implications for Higher Education have been: harsh public cuts, the cancelation of new tenure posts, the suppression of many currently offered tenure posts; the decreasing of public investments and the reduction of private funds donations or cooperation from behalf of a tormented private sector, donations meant for research, development and testing. Thus, as economic troubles started to develop and put its mark on the academic world, academic leadership's abilities and structure[9] were questioned.

In this uncertain context, the employees of the higher education institutions unexpectedly found themselves within a medium that is highly changing day the day as a consequence of the crisis. It is clear nowadays that these changes caused an insecurity, which conducted to a certain sensation of vulnerability of the employees due to the troublesome situation. Even at present, it is appropriate to admit that higher education employees are not secure about their work especially now, when things are drastically changing.

[8] Guigné, Anne de, "2010, année de convalescence pour les banques". Le Figaro, February 15, 2010.

[9] Kabouridis Georgios.& Kakarelidis, George, "Academic leadership in Greek higher educational institutions under economic and social crisis", 2nd WIETE Annual Conference on Engineering and Technology Education, Pattaya, (2011):70.

In this crisis period, when an employee does not feel secure, he/she may develop an imperative request of support from the nearest leader be it rector, dean, a leader from the Senate. Accordingly, academic leadership in crisis times requires "consultation, reflection, consensus, and a process orientation"[10], the 3Es being stressed: "efficiency, effectiveness, and economy as the leading values in the governance of public higher education"[11]. According to De Boer and Huisman, three variants can at the same time be found in a single university: oriented towards efficiency, oriented towards market and oriented towards users[12]. Human resources inevitably request or search guidance in these situations. Whether as citizens or as academic institutions employees, most of the time people are looking for somebody to present them ways to proceed, make up a pattern for them to act in accordance with and to generate meaning for problems they face day by day. Be it consciously or unconsciously, willingly or unwillingly, academic employees need a person whom to follow in both secure and unsecure times, they need a leader. Also, the academic organization should never be seen as a closed system. Thus, a higher education institution can be affected not only by internal factors but also by external conjunctures[13]. In this respect, the researcher considered it interesting to analyze academic leadership in unsecure times and explore the manner how a leader in a higher education institution affected by the crisis may act. The main question resides in the fact of whether or not leadership differs in periods characterized by crisis or stability.

Methodologyof the study

The research will be highly analytic and it will have a qualitative nature. The major purpose is to establish both challenges and determinants that conduct academic leadership change in crisis time, and to wisely manage these factors in stimulating higher education leadership and thus reinforcing the successful performing of crisis leadership.

Qualitative study represents an exploratory research which tries to examine a less known area, inspect the major dimensions of an issue, make suppositions, and comprehend outcomes or operational research due to in-depth analysis of interviewee responses either in a group or single. Thus, the researcher interviewed six higher education institution employees and their leader. The interviews held were a combination between in-person interviews, telephone interviews and correspondence over email. In the table below all the interviewees are being presented:

Table 1. Presentation of the interviewees

	Gender	Education	Position within the educational institution	Prior experience in educational institution	Type of Interview
The leader	M	PhD.	Leader of the department	Yes, almost 30 years	In person
Interviewee A	M	PhD.	Manager	Yes, almost 20 years	In person
Interviewee B	F	PhD.	Manager	Yes, >20 years	phone + email

[10] Ferren, Ann S., Kennan,William R. and Lerch, Sebastian H., "Reconciling corporate and academic cultures". Peer Review, 3, 3, (2001): 9-11.

[11] Currie, Jan, De Angelis, Richard, De Boer, Harry, Huisman, Jeroen and Lacotte, Claude, Globalizing practices and university responses: European and Anglo-American differences. Westport, Conneticut: London: Praeger, 2003.

[12] De Boer, Harry and Huisman, Jeroen, "The New Public Management in Dutch Universities". In: Toward a New Model of Governance for Universities: A Comparative View. Edited by Braun, Dietmar and Merrien, Francois-X., London: Jessica Kingsley Publishers Ltd., 1999.

[13] Hersey Paul & Blanchard Ken, Managment of Organizational Behavior: Utilizing human resources Fourth edition. (N.J: Prentice-Hall, Inc, 1982): 6-7.

Interviewee C	M	PhD.	Custom manager	Yes, >30 years	phone
Interviewee D	M	PhD.	Custom manager	Yes, many years	phone + email
Interviewee E	F	PhD.	Custom manager	Yes, many years	phone + email
Interviewee F	M	PhD.	Custom manager	Yes, >30 years	phone + email

Benefits of the study

On the one hand, for nowadays academic leaders, practitioners who want to improve and this change their leadership style, the benefits of the study are:

It offers a framework as far as academic leadership is concerned.

It identifies the relevant characteristics for a crisis academic leader.

It makes people become aware of challenges encountered in the change of academic leadership in crisis period and also getting abilities in order to manage them. This should lead to trying to avoid challenges by acting proactive.

It is meant to back higher education institutions which have already begun the leadership change, but are facing problems, to distinguish domains that have not been paid enough attention while redesign leadership. In this manner, an educational institution can pin point the domains of disturbance and thus aspiring to solving the problems.

Since most academic employees are affected by the decisions made by their leaders, this research might be useful for academic leaders to improve their crisis leadership skills, especially since "the ever-increasing complexity and interdependence of today's world calls for a critical transformation in leadership"[14].

On the other hand, although the hereby study does not pretend to be exhaustive it does intend to analyze the most important literature written on the researched issue, which can be for the benefit of the researchers. Thus, for researchers a benefit of the study is the fact that it provides a framework for the crisis leadership within a higher education institution, which is done through a literature review and also through empirical study.

According to the above mentioned framework the author evaluated the implementation of crisis leadership within higher education institution.

The research identifies domains for further analysis, and thus can be seen as a beginning or commencement for further research.

Limitations

As the researcher has already mentioned, the present crisis is still an ongoing process and even at present, its outcome remains unclear. In the same time, the crisis is also shaped by a high turmoil, an enormous number of parties affected, as well as high degree of various perceptions. Mainly because of these issues, the researcher finds it necessary to constrain the analyzed objective of his work and therefore to establish some concrete limitations.

First of all, the researcher has chosen to investigate the impact the current crisis period has on a specific higher education institution. The focus of this study lies thus, on the leadership conducted in a specific University situated in Timisoara, Romania. In this purpose, the researcher has studied the leader of the educational institution and some selected employees.

Another restriction the researcher finds and wants to mention consists of the fact that the current crisis is still going on, so is still in progress. Hence, the necessity arises that most of the information gathered, which represents a basis for the study in the article, only makes reference to the data available until the first of January 2012. The main issue is the fact that, in a crisis changes easily occur daily, an interruption in information collection being rather essential to maintain the composition and thematic consistency of the article.

[14] Yip, J., Ernst, Ch. & Campbell, M., "Boundary spanning leadership: Perspectives from the executive suite", A Center for Creative Leadership White Paper. (2011): 4.

Due to the complexity of the whole subject, another critic regard on the present work entails that the various opinions presented in the analysis comprises only the major issues of leadership. Therefore, the researcher disregarded issues which can be seen only as peripheral matters. Hence, the researcher decided to focus in the evaluation of the academic leadership of the West University of Timisoara in the crisis on several major issues, out of which the most important is the leadership aspect.

An additional restriction of the research is represented by the fact that leadership is not an issue which can be expressed by numbers. Moreover, findings concerning the leadership problem in this research cannot be quantified by clear measurements. Additionally, we transfer classic analytical principles of crisis leadership to the present crisis. Weick considers that this transformation can limit the sense making if the primary frames of references are not suitable to the present situation[15]. In our case, this restriction could lead to misjudgments and distorted results.

The last critics the researcher would like to mention, is the fact that the current work focuses on examining the leadership issue in the crisis from the perception of one academic institution from Timisoara.

Summary of the empirical findings

The analyzed participants have been working for a long time in the academic sector and during their careers they accumulated personal experience which has contributed to their personal maturity.

The leader was described as an emotional and optimistic scholar. All employees consider leadership a relational art especially at the academic level, employees being offered plenty of freedom of action in order to accomplish their tasks. Because of the uncertainty that the crisis created, took place a change of focus on tasks, which in return implemented a change of the academic leadership. Part of the interviewees seemed to be satisfied with the leadership so far, while others asked for a different leadership approach, mainly because the uncertainty affected them. The leader did see this request and accordingly, shifted his focus, even if not for all cases. The academic leader firmly thinks that leadership is shaped by circumstances, but he states that his openness and honesty in relationships does not change due to crisis times.

The leader and his personality traits

The leader described himself, and was described by interviewees A, B, D and F, mostly as an innovating person and therefore quite focused on creating new perspectives for the university. Further on, other characteristics associated with the leader were optimistic and self-confident. Accordingly, the leader was perceived as owning a great amount of self-knowledge, thing that the employees confirmed as well. After discussing several times with the leader, his statements about being positive and optimistic were confirmed. In the same time, he appeared as a helpful person, a finding confirmed also by interviewee D who stated that the leader is very interested about his colleagues.

During the research, several studies were analyzed, researches that implied certain features that a leader should have, such as: self-confidence, stress tolerance, engagement and knowledge. A leader, who appears to be self-confident and positive influences and inspires followers to achieve goals. As an employee, it is easy to listen to and to be impacted by a leader who is both positive and optimistic. In our case, due to the leader's long experience within academic leading positions, we are not entitled to question his knowledge. Therefore, we take for granted that the leader has experience and knowledge in academic leadership, which, according to Yukl, is a must for a leader[16]. Being an innovative person implies that a person is very motivated and creates new values of new products and services according to the crisis period. Interviewee A talked about this feature of the leader by confirming the leader's necessity of constantly being triggered and challenged. The same person also claims that the leader transfers his innovational spirit to the other members.

[15] Weick, Karl, Sutcliffe, Kathleen M. & Obstfeld, David, "Organizing and the process of sense making", Organization Science, Vol. 16, No. 4, (2005):409-421.

We realized that all interviewees perceive the leader in slightly different ways. This is natural, since various perceptions of a person's character represent a consequence of the individual upbringings and backgrounds. As a consequence, the employees are impacted differently by the personality traits of the academic leader.

The effect of external circumstances

Researchers consider the external circumstances, in our case, the financial crisis, affects the stability of the institution. Changes appeared in this stability will in turn affect the other subsystems, the academic leader and the employees, and all these will have high impact on leadership. Most of the time, similar effects of change in the stability are to be found both in the leader and the follower's acts. On the one hand, when everything is stable, both leader and followers are confident, which makes leadership use either "supportive" or "delegating" style. On the other hand, when in crisis, negative effects can occur, from uncertainty to insecurity.

We consider that the pyramid of Maslow can be easily evaluated in situations of crisis. The Maslow theory proves that the change in the needs of the followers because of a situation of uncertainty/crisis implies a leadership change. It is vital for every person affected by crisis to try and get a sentiment of security. Crisis times could lead to the pyramid's dislodgement and thus turning unstable due to a change in the needs of the academic employees. In this context, the main goal of the academic leader is to maintain the pyramid stable all the time, and be sure that his colleagues/employees are secured and have a sense of belonging to the University. The moment when the leader senses a change in the needs of the employees, he or she must step back and reconsider the aims of the academic leadership. The employees from the study are mature and ambitious and this signifies that their needs of self- esteem are very high in stable time. Taking this into consideration, it is highly important for the leader to keep the basic needs in mind when leading his followers in crisis times in order to keep the employees in a steady level of needs. The University where the study was done, did not discharge anyone because of the crisis up to the date when the research was conducted, which means that the major basic needs (psychological, feelings of security and belonging) of the employees have been assured.

For achieving these feelings, employees must find in their leader empathy and desire to discuss and also answer questions. According to the data gathered, the leader manages this task well. According to the interviewed employees, the leader took the time to answer general concern when the situation requested it, and showed support. Nevertheless, some feelings of discontentment were traced in some statements about the leadership. According to these statements, the leader did not, in all cases, consider the security of the Maslow pyramid.

Papworth, Milne and Boat state that the leader has to take on a flexible style of leading[17]. This comes in opposition to the basic fact that a leader must lead consistently, and use a single style of leadership in similar situations. The leader states that he is able to change his leadership style when needed, but firmly adds that his openness and honesty represent the basis of his leadership.

[16] Yukl Gary A., "Managerial Leadership: A Review of Theory and Research", Journal of Managment Vol. 15, No. 2, (1989):251-289.

[17] Papworth, Milne & Boak. "An exploratory content analysis on situational leadership". Journal of Management Development; Vol. 28 No. 7, (2009):593-606.

The degree of maturity of the employees

The degree of maturity detected within the persons who took part to the study is quite similar. Judging from the answers received, all employees seem to be self-confident and looking for challenges to improve their results. Interviewees C, D and F stated that the daily tasks are done under high proper responsibility without much interaction with the leader. Also, employee E states that she takes proper initiatives, while employee B goes even further by designating herself manager in need.

All interviewed employees appear to have great experience, high education and well-reasoned answers to our questions, reason for which we will put them all in the highest maturity stage when the external world is stable.

When speaking about the present crisis time it appeared that interviewees A and E need greater support from the academic leader. Thus, according to interviewee A, during the worst times he felt a need for stronger personal support from the leader. Interviewee E stated to have desired for greater clearance. According to the theory of situational leadership this high support from the leader implies a decrease in the degree of maturity of the follower. Employee F said that more structure in the objectives performance would have been advisable but did not affect him very much. Interviewee B and C have also been impacted by the crisis times, but did not want a growing need of support to the same extent.

CONCLUSIONS

In this part of the article, the researcher draws conclusions from his findings and summarizes them in order to respond to the goal of this research. Also he presents further findings that are of high interest even if they do not meet the purpose of this particular research.

In analyzing the leadership in crisis situations, firstly the researcher referred to the impact of external circumstances. Thus, it was found that in the outside world, crisis is interfering in the internal institutional stability negatively. As a consequence, the employees within the higher education institutions are affected which in exchange affect their performance and thus the entire institution. From the research, it was found out that the degree of maturity of the employees tends to decrease when crisis strikes and times become unstable. The crisis and unpredictable times from the outside of the higher education institution makes the employees experience the feeling of insecurity and in this particular case, their characteristic basic needs are no longer satisfied.

Secondly, the researcher referred to the impact of personality traits of the leader. According to the research, it appears that the personality characteristics of the leader have effects on the employees. In the same time, it was found out that the employees see the leader in quite various ways, and the researcher though this was due to the fact that they had different upbringings and backgrounds. Accordingly, the features of the leader have different impact on various people; a characteristic that affects one employee in a negative way can affect another employee positively.

The researcher also established a guideline to leaders when leading in crisis times. It was found that it is the responsibility of the leader to equilibrate the exterior world with the inner educational organization in order to keep it stable in uncertain times. By this, the employees are being restored confidence of their security and of their basic needs being satisfied. Also, the leader must be aware of that he or she has personality characteristics that affect the other employees. It is of high relevance that a leader identifies which personality characteristics affect each employee and to what extent. If the leader plans to use these personality characteristics efficiently, the leader would stress the ones recognized as having positive effects on the employee and minimize the traits that may be conceived as negative. This knowledge will be of great advantage for the leader when motivating his employees to perform and to continue to satisfy higher needs.

In this period of crisis, when the degree of maturity of an employee is constantly decreasing, it is of major relevance for the leader to have recognized his or her personality characteristics that are of high importance for the employee. If the academic leader does this, he/she has a better chance of helping the employee to increase his or her degree of maturity. At the moment when the maturity degree gets back to normal, the former internal institutional stability is being re-established.

When analyzing situational leadership as it has been described by Hersey and Blanchard the researcher tended to add some particularities to the theory. Thus, since the original theory does not make reference to the impact of external circumstances, or to the impact the personality characteristics of a leader have, we consider that the first theory must be completed. After studying the conclusions from this research, the researcher created an adding of the original theory. Thus, the existing model by Hersey and Blanchard was completed by two things: the impact of external factors and personality features of a leader.

This new modified model can offer a general framework for the leader in terms of academic leadership in crisis times. This model can be of use for any leader who wants to adapt or redesign his or her leadership in order to perfectly adjust it in crisis times. In this study, this modified model was used in order to gain a full perspective on the leadership conducted in the higher education institution of study.

It is of high importance for a leader to try and be flexible without having preconceived opinions about which leadership style to use. Thus, it is of great importance for the leader to pay attention to each and every circumstance and recognize each employee and external environment conditions for being able to correctly choose the leadership style.

It was proved that the relationships between the academic leader and the employees in crisis times were very different. The researcher found from the study that there is a great diversity in the relationships between the leader and his employees, and this is a rather common situation. In a work relationship employees and leaders affect each other. How well the relationship proves to develop is partly a result of the personality traits of the employees, the degree of maturity, the conducted leadership, internal circumstances within the higher education institution, or simply a match of different personalities.

One thing of great interest to look further into could be the effects on the entire academic institution if the leader has different relationships with the employees. We thus recommend the Leader-member exchange (LMX) theory by Graen George and Uhl-Bien Mary for further research.

References

- Bennis, Warren and Burt Nanus, Leaders: Strategies for Taking Charge, Collins Business Essentials, 2007.
- Jackson & Parry, A Very Short, Fairly Interesting and Reasonably Cheap Book About Studying Leadership. (London: SAGE Publications, 2008) 12-13.
- Currie, Jan, De Angelis, Richard, De Boer, Harry, Huisman, Jeroen and Lacotte, Claude, Globalizing practices and university responses: European and Anglo-American differences. Westport, Conneticut: London: Praeger, 2003.
- De Boer, Harry and Huisman, Jeroen, "The New Public Management in Dutch Universities". In: Toward a New Model of Governance for Universities: A Comparative View. Edited by Braun, Dietmar and Merrien, Francois-X., London: Jessica Kingsley Publishers Ltd., 1999.
- Guigné, Anne de, "2010, année de convalescence pour les banques". Le Figaro, February 15, 2010.
- Ferren, Ann S., Kennan,William R. and Lerch, Sebastian H., "Reconciling corporate and academic cultures". Peer Review, 3, 3, (2001): 9-11.
- Hersey Paul & Blanchard Ken, Managment of Organizational Behavior: Utilizing human resources Fourth edition. (N.J: Prentice-Hall, Inc, 1982): 6-7.
- Kabouridis Georgios.& Kakarelidis, George, "Academic leadership in Greek higher educational institutions under economic and social crisis", 2nd WIETE Annual Conference on Engineering and Technology Education, Pattaya, (2011):70.
- Lundgren, Mikael, Lecture Leadership and rhetoric, An introduction to classical rhetoric, Kalmar: Linnaeus University, 2010.

- Papworth, Milne & Boak. "An exploratory content analysis on situational leadership". Journal of Management Development; Vol. 28 No. 7, (2009):593-606.
- Weick, Karl, Sutcliffe, Kathleen M. & Obstfeld, David, "Organizing and the process of sense making", Organization Science, Vol. 16, No. 4, (2005):409-421.
- Yip, J., Ernst, Ch. & Campbell, M., "Boundary spanning leadership: Perspectives from the executive suite", A Center for Creative Leadership White Paper. (2011): 4.
- Yukl Gary A., "Managerial Leadership: A Review of Theory and Research", Journal of Managment Vol. 15, No. 2, (1989):251-289.
- Zomorrodian, Asghar, "New Approach to Strategic Planning: the Impact of Leadership and Culture on Plan Implantation via the three Cs: Cooperation, Collaboration and Coordination", Proceedings of ASBBS, Volume 18, Number 1, Las Vegas, (2011): 1128.

"EUROPE NORMAL" OR "EUROPE CRISIS": A CULTURAL CONSTRUCT DRILLED INTO POPULATION?

DRAGOS LUCIAN IVAN[1]

Abstract

The unequal weighting of cultural views within the current European context stemmed largely from a preference for more quantitative type analysis which lack the ability to explain the changes that lead to today's reality and tomorrow's future. We argue that the demographic formation of today's European society has been accompanied by the formation of a new type of cultural model. The contrast between the "Europe normal" as we were used to perceived Europe and "Europe crisis" as currently Europe is depicted clearly depends also on a change in the cultural construct . We argue that the development of a new cultural model has been accompanied by a new type of population development. It can be seen that in its pervasiveness, cultural change, threatens to undermine economic development, inscribed in the European policy. The current more robust cultural model comprises the cultural life of the European citizen. This study wishes to fill a gap in today's research. We desire to widen the scope so as to capture the place of the cultural European model within the order of things which is no longer clearly fixed and legitimated by the same binding cultural system of beliefs and values. This abstract is naturally a sketch and deliberately so, but the study promises to be less condensed and more complex. We seek to indicate central and pertinent developments in the European framework.

Keywords: cultural model transition population European

Introduction

Few areas need more expanding than the study of population in the current context of globalization and the current economic crisis. The EU is confronting an economic crisis, but which has deeper roots in the social. It is our opinion that this is the starting point of an economic crisis with roots into a social crisis. If any research can have the desire to attempt to chart the complex map of population in the context of globalization it needs to employ systematic and different approaches to any research. Until now the study of demography and cultural studies have been selectively used according to the way in which the researcher has perceived reality. We wish to encourage research on population based on the clashes and common ground between demographic research and the research of cultural models that impose a certain type of behavior. Albeit we consider necessary that in this context of trying to use such distinctive methodologies we consider it necessary to exercise more cautiously and conjecturally this type of research. The expected overall result should materialize in a synoptic view on where we are now and where it is likely for the current context to be going. By understanding the importance of a cultural model in people' life we can forecast their future decisions and we can better apply and create policies meant to foster social cohesion and social support, which might cure the current social crisis with a powerful impact on the economic. Europe has to deal with the aging of population which leads to increase social spending, in a context of shrinking working force, which means less small and medium business and less money from taxes. There have been voices that lobby for a shift from the European continent to the Asian and American continent. Their power has a population source and many are keen on researching the new "celebrities" in the current international scene. In the context of globalization we still believe in the importance of the EU as a global player, backing the following statement" Europe has been the continent that built the first economical region of the world. An economical edifice raised gradually, with a purely pragmatic attitude in mind, so much so that its allure grew in time"[2].

[1] Beneficiary of the „Doctoral Scholarships for a Sustainable Society" project, co-financed by the European Union through the European Social Fund, Sectoral Operational Programme Human Resources and Development, 2007-2013; Assistant Lecturer, Ph. D.c, The National School of Political Studies and Public Administration of Bucharest (email: i_dragos_lucian@yahoo.com)

Dominated by the classic demographic transition theory, the settled view of demography has since been profoundly challenged by a series of successive theoretical influences, derived, also, from cultural studies and, perhaps most critically, from the debates in and around new perspectives to guarantee a lively and productive research climate for some time to come.

Our methodology involves an historical perspective on the evolution of population in both Western countries and Eastern countries and the variable of social security expenditure and the moment in which East and West started to have direct contact. We recognized that despite the existence of the Iron curtain cultural exchanges have taken place, but in a limited amount. We believe that we are dealing with a process of acculturation, but with limited acquisition, limitation that triggered a demographic crisis also in the Eastern part of Europe.

Moreover, we argue, that the findings of demography and cultural studies, of these two separated research traditions, are not so far opposed as is usually supposed. Albeit they express change in different terms, they both agree on its existence and view it from a different angle. They agree about the degree of power that can be attributed to the changes that take place in Europe, but it's a difference in the nature of these changes. We believe that an acceptance of a so called incompatibility of a meeting between the two may close means of research of both theoretical and empirical critique. We understand the need for a sufficient diverse of contending perspectives so as to be able to guarantee a lively and productive climate of research. The meeting between cultural studies and demography is meant to reflect a multifaceted reality, as truthfully and objectively as possible. Thus, again, we would like to underline that in this case competing interpretations although are provided by wrongly considered rival perspectives, the evidence deployed by both is similar. Questions about the demographic change in Europe are therefore more likely to be resolved by generating both empiric and theoretical argument.

MAIN BODY

Demography is generally discussed as if it were exclusively a phenomena linked with only predictors like urbanization, infant and child mortality, migration, industrialization, freedom of movement. We agree with the statement that "According to the population projections published by Eurostat in 2010, meaningful demographic changes in the age structure of population in Europe are forthcoming"[3] but we wish to add further information regarding possible ways of investigating this situation. Indeed, this assumption is embodied in the vast majority of demographical studies in most scientific approaches, but it also being challenged through comments by Susan Watkins, Barbara Anderson, John Knodel. Our concern will be with the impact of a little understood variable, cultural setting or cultural model, on the rates and shape of demographic transition that mostly is represented by a decline in various regions of Europe. Inevitably, such a topic covering so broad a canvas will be highly selective. Hopefully, it is intended as an antidote for the conventional approach to demography, which has become a major concern in Europe. The cultural setting is tacitly portrayed as autonomous and isolated from demography. This approach has dominated demographic and cultural research for so long. To some extend the demise of the classic demographic transition theory facilitated the extension of this field of research. Through increase permeability between the two fields of research we believe the resources of the two can be harness to the advancement of knowledge in the broader benefit of human development.

[2] Paul Dobrescu, Geopolitica, Editura Comunicare.ro, Bucuresti, 2008, p. 122

[3] Cinzia di Palo, The demographic challenge on pension systems: empirical results from Italy, Review of Applied Socio-Economic Research, Issue 2, 2011, www.reaser.eu

The role of the cultural model has therefore received very little considerable attention, both from critical perspectives theory and from that of developmentally-oriented action research. We believe that the cultural model in Eastern countries was also the informal source for social support for the individual. The connection between the cultural model and traditional sources of social support is a systematic one in the case of Eastern countries. Much recent research has been focused more upon the evolution of the traditional family in an attempt at explaining the demographic decline in the Eastern countries, which in the beginning were seen as the promise "demographic land", sources of experienced and trained young specialists. We understand the importance of the family in this process of demographic transition, but we believe that cultural change plays an equally important role. The decline of the traditional family[4] has been noticed also by Beck. His theory and research paradigm has been further developed by Gernsheim. Thus, it is still the case that very little is known about actual cultural model effects in relation to demography. Much more attention needs to be given to the processes by which this process happens so as to be able to interpret, translate and transform these experiences into knowledge. It is our hypothesis that we need to draw more from a micro-analysis at small groups and individuals so as to be able to engage with and to illuminate the macro-analysis.

The rise of a new elite, strongly linked with the development of our society towards economic growth, has tended to destabilize the demographic structure by generating or in some cases exacerbating tensions within it. The development of a new cultural model had a destabilizing impact in another, more indirect way. The new cultural model encouraged people to exploit their control over family issues in the benefit of economic targets, so as to build economy, which provoked a demographic reaction throughout contemporary Europe. Market forces succeeded in containing the rise of the population against the background of growing prosperity and the assertion of a new dominant cultural model. The operation of the free market, with its accompanying rise in education costs, childcare costs, living costs, responsibility both self imposed and law imposed towards raising a child, led to a progressive transfer from a traditional cultural model which proposed a numerous family to a more reluctant to an extended family cultural model. It also led to a new economic dependence on money that encouraged the creation of a family or eliminated an early desire for a family, inhibiting the emergence of the old cultural model. Significant changes have occurred since the new cultural model has taken effect.

The possibilities and limitations of the autonomy of individual preferences for a specific cultural model within the society cannot be considered without reference to the economic base. The effects of the introduction of a cultural model that has been constructed having as a center the economic core have already been related to the family policy of the individual. In another sense, people are primarily limited by a form of social control, through reference to living standards, cultural taste and accessibility to infrastructure, coupled with cultural acceptability. Cultural decisions are rooted in straightforward notions of business and economic efficiency and cultural acceptability. Paralyzed by the ferocious economic conditions in a contemporary society in a crisis, people respond by minimizing all possible risks, hedging all bets and the cultural model of the time sees any new member of the family, like a child as a risk.

Rather, the general conclusion must be that demography is indeed bound with, and bounded by, the interest of the dominant cultural model in society, but that these interests are constantly redefined according to a process to which the persons themselves contribute. We can conclude that the external cultural model locks the person into a situation of a latent presence. Consequently, the capacity of influence of the cultural model, if not even its capacity to control, rests on an understanding of the powers and consequences which may for the most part remain latent. The politics of accommodation with the cultural model is played out at different levels: between the individuals, between the individual and the group and between the society and the individual. Within this accommodation, the limits of control are in a constant negotiation. Through these negotiations different interests are served. The precise nature and the implications of the cultural controls have been only loosely defined and interpreted. We agree with Giddens that underlines that traditional sources of support are no longer available[5] for people in Easter countries, but we have a more nuanced view upon what these sources of support are.

[4] Beck-Gernsheim, E., On the way to a post-familial family: from a community of need to elective affinities', Theory, Culture and Society, 1998, vol 15, no 3–4, pp 57.

Cultural studies arguably incorporate a stress on experience. The stress on experience is seen as a sort of humanist position. Cultural studies conceive society as a complex expressive totality. That is why we consider that the change of the cultural model in Eastern countries is equal with what Giddens calls "lifting out of social relations"[6] which inevitably has lead to an economic crisis, more visible right now, but with a core made out of a social crisis which puts in danger the very existence of the European Union.

My primary purpose in this essay has been to create an illustrated summary encapsulating the central areas of debate concerned with the reality-defining role of cultural studies in a demography type research. Yet I have also stubbornly sought, but I must admit in a lower key, to debate the degree in which today's reality is conceived and represented using only traditional methodologies. We wish to guarantee the validity of positing a duality between the plane of demography and that of cultural studies. Although, confirming the place of traditional identifiers in the effort of explaining the social reality, we believe that cultural studies should be brought into line. We believe that it is not difficult to easily identify a number of demographic inadequacies that can be explained by taking into account the uneven and less than total consume of the Western cultural model by the Eastern states that newly adhere to the European Union. In the first place, we consider that by baldly confronting the reality of demographic decline in the Eastern countries, which were in the beginning perceived as a source for young and professional workforce, able to help the EU in maintaining its economic development we can better understand what proper measures can be taken to address this sensitive and civilization frightening issue. The current distance between the quantitative and number based research of demography and cultural studies mainly focused on social and human aspect may lead to a different light upon the problem of both cultural and demographic transition which explains the current economic crisis, which will apparently be followed by a social crisis. Obviously, we must continue to make a distinction between the two elements of analysis, with different methodologies, but we should regard them as paramount in understanding today's reality.

In many ways, the Western cultural model is an economic one. The Western cultural model is also a control mechanism. It allows a certain type of society to develop and be prosperous. The possibilities and also its limitations become apparent not only in the Western society but especially in the Eastern unprepared society. While in the West it has to deal with the variable of population, which has not taken into account, in the Eastern countries it has to deal with the lack of social cohesion support sources, that were responsible for both population issues, but also strongly linked with economic efficiency. The individual in Eastern countries was paralyzed by the competition in which the Western dominant cultural model and the Eastern cultural model engaged. This struggle is illustrated in particular by the presence of a cultural transition, which emerged in Eastern countries in the early 1990s.

It is our belief that the development of a society is strongly linked with the institutionalized cultural model. The cultural model of a people has been long intertwined with that of the people consuming it. There have always been grounds for exploring the cultural significance of a model followed by the people inhabiting an area. However, the case is particularly acute at present because of the changes that have taken place on the European continent. Obviously, it has been a significant rise in transnational contact between Western Europe and Eastern Europe. In turn, nowadays,

[5] Giddens, A. ,The consequences of modernity, Cambridge: Polity Press, 1990.
[6] Giddens, A. ,The consequences of modernity, Cambridge: Polity Press, 1990, p. 21.

Europe's reality raises some crucial questions about cultural identities and its economic, demographic evolution. This situation points to the desirability of a multidimensional and even a multiperspectival research so as to be able to understand what happened.

The first concern is to talk just a little bit of the difference between Western and Eastern Europe before the URSS break-up. Historically speaking we had in the past a different reality. On one side we had the Democratic Bloc characterized by a high level of democracy and freedom of speech. On the other side it was the Communist Bloc which in short can be described as a low level of democracy at best and mildly putting it, a serious lack of freedom of speech. Within this framework it is very interesting to distinguish a similarity, the presence in both cases of an hegemonic cultural model that was applied in the day to day life. The noticeable difference is that in the case of Western Europe the cultural model was won and not given. It was constantly re-won and re-negotiated transforming the cultural model into a perfect terrain for conflict over meaning. The dominant European cultural model was not imposed, but rather a set of policies and laws both written and individually assimilated were created through the multiplicity of streams of meanings that resulted into an ascendant acknowledged and citizen support practice. In Eastern Europe, the cultural model was given, not won. It was the result of direct intervention and through a conscious attempt at manipulating the outcome of routine attitudes and working practices. People learnt the conventions and society's codes of "how things should be done" through replicating the given policies and laws. The constant growing intervention of the state in the private life of persons has tilted their behavior towards certain patterns. For example the state was not really that interested in spending and investing in social security because the cultural model in Eastern Europe assured constant social security through inter-personal relationships. The economy was not in the situation of offering much support for taking care of those in old age, because the family had this responsibility. At the same time there was no need for investing in childcare, special periods for women to have maternal leaves, because it was understood that the cultural model that existed in Eastern countries would take care of this by enforcing tacitly a certain pattern of behavior towards the family. Grandparents would act as childcare assistants, actively helping with their upbringing. The vast majority of young people were able to settle down and have a family because they were relying on the support of their parents. The Eastern cultural model also relied on the existence of a special type of family that would provide social capital for its members. We can identity two types of social capital sources in the theoretical break between West and East. On one side we have the network, born in the west which began to occur with the emergence of the Western cultural model of social cohesion and the family as a source for social capital. Mircea Brie further engages this topic of networks "The field of cultural cooperation tends to become „multipolar", as the concept of "cultural networks" is introduced. These networks have begun to shatter old structures and support identity, communication, relationship and information (Pehn, 1999:8)[7]", opinion with which we agree in this article being one of the hypothesis in explaining the current situation of Eastern European countries. This relationship between family and social capital[8] is not a new idea, but its change in the Eastern cultural model of life has been not sufficiently stressed. In fact, we are debate the problem that stems from the lack of social capital for people in Eastern countries. The role of social capital is crucial both in social prosperity and social order. Presently, this is no longer just a family issue, but we are in danger of acknowledging a growing sense of social exclusion. There might be some research that might consider this statement going too far, but lets consider a more nuanced discussion. It is obvious that the Western cultural model dominated the Eastern one. In this case we have in our contemporary one a case of cultural consumption, but not a total reproduction of the cultural model. The dominant western cultural model was not functionally adapted in the Eastern countries because not all of its elements presented interest. In this case some cultural elements that handled much of the social cohesion existing in Eastern countries have not been reproduced. I have borrowed the principle of "reproducing the dominant ideology"[9] or in this case the dominant cultural model from Althusser. The real sting of this situation is the fact that social exclusion appears the moment the person finds himself without an entity capable of offering social capital and social cohesion. This is the case in Eastern countries were the previously established cultural model handled the need for social cohesion and social capital of the individual. Once the old cultural model was replaced by the Western cultural model, which supplied social capital through networks not family, through financial support and direct support from the welfare state, not the family, the Eastern states did not adapt. Social exclusion becomes another factor in the influence upon the population of Eastern states. People more and more feel socially isolated and can no longer rely on informal sources of support, nor formal social of support. Formal sources of support[10] are present particularly in Western culture, but were not totally transferred in Eastern countries.

[7] Mircea, Brie, Ioana Horga, Europe: A Cultural Border, or a Geo-cultural Archipelago, Eurolimes, vol. 9 The Cultural Frontiers of Europe, Spring 2010, Oradea University Press, p. 153-171.

[8] Edwards, R., Present and absent in troubling ways: families and social capital debates, The Sociological Review, vol 52, no 1, pp 1–21.

	Population									Population
Year	1960	1970	1980	1985	1990	1995	2000	2001	2006	2010
Country
Romania	18.319	↗20.139	↗22.137	↗22.687	↗23211	↘22712	↘22455	↘22430	14%	↘21469
Hungary	9961	↗10322	↗10709	↗10598	↗10374	↘10336	↘10221	↘10200		↘9985
E. Germany	17285	↗17074	↗16740	↗16660	↗16433	↘15531	↘15217	↘15120
Bulgary	7829	↗8464	↗8846	↗8971	↗8767	↘8427	↘8190	↘8149	15%	↘7364
Czech Republ	9637	↗9789	↗10272	↗10333	↗10362	↘10333	↘10278	↘10266	18.07%	↘10664
Estonia	1209	↗1351	↗1472	↗1523	↗1570	↘1448	↘1372	↘1367	12.20%	↘1340
Latvia	2104	↗2351	↗2508	↗2570	↗2668	↘2500	↘2381	↘2364	13.20%	↘2067
Lithuania	2755	↗3118	↗3404	↗3528	↗3693	↘3643	↘3512	↘3487	12.40%	↘3199
Netherlands	11417	↗12957	↗14091	↗14453	↗14892	↗15424	↗15864	↗15987	30%	↗16722
Austria	7030	↗7455	↗7545	↗7574	↗7689	↗8039	↗8102	↗8121	28.90%	↗8419
W. Germany	55257	↗61194	↗61439	↗62456	65478	↗66569	↗66946	↗67140	29%
Belgium	9128	↗9669	↗9855	↗9857	↗9947	↗10130	↗10239	↗10263	29.90%	↗10274
Italy	50025	↗53685	↗56388	↗56588	↗56694	↗57268	↗57679	↗57844	26.60%	↗59715
France	45468	↗50528	↗53731	↗55157	↗56577	↗57752	↗58748	↗59038	32%	↗63601
Ireland	2835	↗2943	↗3392	↗3544	↗3507	↗3597	↗3776	↗3842		↗4231
Iceland	174	↗204	↗226	↗240	↗253	↗267	↗279	↗283	23%	↗312
Spain		↗33513	↗37241	↗38353	↗38826	↗39196	↗39733	↗40121		↗46777
Slovenia	1580	↗1719	↗1893	↗1948	↗1996	↗1989	↗1987	↗1990	23%	↗2050

Figure 1

In the table below named FIGURE 1 we have followed the population of several Western and Eastern countries. Population is represented in millions, for example 1.000=1.000.000. It can be noticed that till the 1990s moment both Western and Eastern countries enjoyed positive demographic growth, after the moment 1990s while Western countries continued to experience demographic growth, Eastern countries have started a severe demographic decline. Actually, we understand the many benefits that came with the existence of the European Union, we only wish to underline that Eastern countries need to do more to fit better in the EU world. The variable of social security was introduce and we can see that the higher the expenditure the higher or stable the demographic variable is. It seems that in Eastern countries the total expenditure on social security is still at low values, this leads in turn to the decrease of the population. Social spending was never to high in Eastern countries, but its cultural model helped social stability to be kept through special practices and particular behavior. Once this system of social support broke down it was not replacement through a more formal social security expenditure. The difference is seen in the case of Slovenia, which actually experience demographic growth, but the social security expenditure variable is the highest among Eastern countries, in the same category as Iceland. We have used countries which are from all categories of population: small size population, middle sized population and large European countries for both Western and Eastern Europe. We have used countries in both categories that have an high emigration rate and a low one.

[9] Althusser, L., Ideology and ideological state apparatuses, London, New Left Books, 1971.

[10] Warr, D.J.,'Gender, class, and the art and craft of social capital', The Sociological Quarterly, 2006, vol 47, pp 499.

Next, we can take a look at the economic situation that raised quite a barrier between East and West. The economic needs of each European hemisphere were perfectly aligned with the cultural model which determined people's behavior. For example, in the West the cultural model imposed that people, having plenty of economic opportunities should focus on their career. Once financial success was assured they could afford paying for childcare and would have special benefits that would ensure they could afford to have a family. At the same time, according to the work and its financial efficiency you would be rewarded in your old age. The Eastern cultural model was based on inter-personal relationships. The bigger the family, the higher were the chances for parents to have somebody to help both physically and financially in their old age. Both the number of children and their geographical closeness was important, not so much their economic power. The support was expected to arrive not so much from the state, through its own system of pensions and rewards for a working life, but from your own family. Obviously, the tensions between the Western Pole and the Eastern Pole were also of an economic nature. On one side we have the prosperous economic states in the West, which proliferated the welfare state. They could afford the construction of the welfare state due to economic success. The promise of a welfare state encouraged people to focus more on the economic aspect of life. This created a constant flow of career oriented people which fused instantly with the economic nature of the state. In short, the development of a living cultural model for persons living in Western Europe became intrinsic to contemporary citizens and is bound up with issues of social power and social behavior. We wish to underline that the differences were not present at the level of the individual, but at the level of the context.

In the new context, the old certainties that managed the evolution of population and the social relationships that maintain the demographic growth disappeared. The cultural model that dominated people's behavior, that of sharing housing with several generations, the grandparents had an active involvement in the housework activities and in the raising of children, the children lived with or near their parents so as to provide financial support and to help to decrease the financial burdens while confronting old age. Unfortunately, it was not replaced by a coherent welfare type state model for supporting population in a search for economic growth. Although both Western and Eastern countries have the same problems demographically speaking.

CONCLUSIONS

It is an interesting context to witness in one's life time the rise of a new cultural model, leading to a new type of society. Eastern society is characterized by a shift from the old cultural model centered on social dependence to a cultural model that prizes the individual's human capital, not involved in a dependence network, not at the same degree at least. While in this period policy makes have to understand that they need to create an efficient formal social security support to replace the no longer valid traditional informal one. In doing so the need for increasing expenditure on social security is actually an investment in long term growth and economic stability. Current figures on social security expenditure and currently even cutting down the budget of this activity may lead to a depletion in population. For Romania, specifically, it can mean a shrinking market which will be less attractive for exporters and investors. Loss of population can also mean less power and leverage on the international political stage. Let us not forget that even in the European parliament each country is represented according to the number of people. Not properly catering for the new cultural model means that the population will bring forth less active individuals into the workforce and more people needing social support.

This type of cultural model plays a key role in a knowledge driven production and planning society centered on economy. In this view, cultural change is the driving force of social change as a prerequisite to economic success. Pivotal to the conceptions of the Western cultural model is the personal development of the individual and its efficiency as part of the economic world. This in turn is central for the citizen's satisfaction with life, higher general health and the existence of the welfare state. Many of the social processes present in the Western world are economic in character. This cultural model has been propelled by the constant search for new sources of profit and out of the need for growing efficiency. Due to the direct contact with globalization, people in western countries were involved in global networks which extended far beyond their immediate physical locations. With the fall of the URSS and the Communist Bloc, Eastern countries entered into a process of socio-cultural adjustment. We believe that Herbert Schiller captured the proper term for this situation, namely "cultural imperialism". The Western culture dominated the Eastern culture and a process of acculturation took place. The process was far from being even, but we agree with Robins "For all that it has projected itself as trans-historical and trans-national, as the transcendent and universalizing force of modernization and modernity, global capitalism has been in reality about westernization – the export of western commodities, values, priorities, ways of life." Bechnar helps us to elaborate this idea, underlining the importance of the meeting between the two cultural models "when culturally disparate people come into continuous direct contact with each other, the cultural differences tend to become salient and origin changing". No doubt the first wave of change was of economic nature. The dynamic spread of western cultural model implied firstly economic contact. We can call this first contact the mercantile phase. The mercantile phase gave way to a more direct influence, the western cultural model that was perfectly suited to the economic model sought and succeeded to impose its cultural form in tandem with economic power. This in turn added up to a general decentering of western cultural model about economic progress, social relationships and social behavior. As we stipulated earlier, this process is not an even one. The type of welfare system existing in Eastern societies broke down without being replaced by the type of welfare system present in the Western culture. This can be seen in the following image that underlines the level of expenditure on social security.

The existing cultural model regarding family relations were inadequate in the face of the new complex, in contemporary times overlapping past system. Once the competence and autonomy from the economic life of the past cultural model that framed social behavior meant to sustain the population was undermined there was nothing left to sustain demographic increase. Because the meeting between Western cultural model and the Eastern cultural model triggered an uneven process, some of the powers of the social relationships that in a way represented "the welfare state" in the East were not fully carried out to a replica of the "welfare state" that existed in the west. This is not to suggest that the western influence was not positive, far from saying such a thing, but we wish to underline the need for a complete understanding of the importance of a complete cultural model, able to regulate the complex mechanism that is society. Subsequently, with a lacking cultural model, that does not regulate social life through its balance between economic progress and cultural development the productive dynamism of a society suffers. Today we begin to understand that Eastern societies lacking a social regulator, have lost one of the most important factor in economic development, population. This reflexivity involves the knowledge that we hold regarding social life. Social life is a constitutive element of economic development. The western cultural model of living and of progress has been considered and rightfully considered an emancipatory project, trough which people had the opportunity to reach economic progress and a better quality of life. But the receipt for success was not complete. With an incomplete cultural model, society has encountered several problems. The initial advantages present in Eastern countries: a young population in comparison with the western countries, a large portion of it educated and active, was gradually lost. We believe we point to a rupture in the understanding of the link between economic ambition and the sustainability of social relationships in a state. It seems that we are dealing with a break off of dialogue between economic aspirations and social aspirations. Our stress on discontinuity is an aspect of our questioning of the current cultural model present in Eastern countries and the problems it creates.

Cultural studies have an undeniably material aspect in so far as it is possible to help in identifying the demographic crisis that takes place in Europe. Social formation is facilitated for instance by culture that is why we believe special care should be placed on either "securing the identity matrix"[11] or properly understanding any cultural model that comes into contact and is consumed by a population. Perhaps in order to further prove our point that cultural contact can be dangerous if not properly mediated we can bring into question the relationships between Orient and Occident, a subject brought also into question by the perspective of "the clash of the different cultural concepts"[12].

We cannot state that the existence of a cultural model and a specific demographic evolution is a purely random encounter. We start by referring to this encounter as an entrenched and enduring pattern of European interconnectedness between the two realities. As a consequence culture can come to have a serious demographic impact. This does mean that culture represents a significant producer of real material conditions ox existence. The cultural model becomes embedded within the more expansive set of social existence under the constraints of historical conditions. What distinguishes our view is our new differential emphasis on the dynamics of demography as a consequence of a historically specific cultural model. A cultural model is never a neutral existence. It is worth dwelling on this as one of the stages in clarifying the dynamics of European demography. We believe that this research takes into consideration future trends in Europe. Nowadays, a lot of attention is given to the international relations that are built around the major players, more to individuals and less to the key part played by the masses. Demography and living cultural models shape also history as much as individuals or political relations. We consider that our research helps in determining future trends according to which visionary policies can be constructed as the following author considers as well: "When we debate Europe, we are accustomed to debate the big issues (and most probably those regarded as traditional): trans-Atlantic relations, the diplomatic relations with Russia, China and with Asia as a whole. In other words, we debate the links with the major players. Less attention is directed towards the future tendency, the reality of tomorrow which will certainly become more important; a tendency that will most likely become permanent and will exercise a powerful influence that can't be measured today.[13]

[11] Malina Ciocea, Securing National Identity in a Globalizing World, Comunicare.ro Publishing house, 2007, pp. 36

[12] Ioana-Mihaela Firicel, International Terrorism – A Serious Conflict Between the Occident and The Orient, Romanian Review of Social Sciences(2011), No. 1, www.rrss.univnt.ro

[13] Paul Dobrescu, Viclenia Globalizarii – Asaltul asupra puterii americane, Institutul European / in English "Globalisation's Deception - The Assault on American Power"The European Institute,2010, p. 268.

References

- Althusser, L., Ideology and ideological state apparatuses, London, New Left Books, 1971.
- Assaf Razin, Efraim Sadka, The Decline of the welfare state: demography and globalization, MIT Press, 2005.
- Bahira Trask, Globalization and Families: Accelerated Systemic Social Change, Springer Publisher, December 2009.
- Beck-Gernsheim, E., On the way to a post-familial family: from a community of need to elective affinities, Theory, Culture and Society, 1998, vol 15, no 3–4.
- Edwards, R., Present and absent in troubling ways: families and social capital debates, The Sociological Review, vol. 52, no 1, pp 1–21
- Giddens, A. ,The consequences of modernity, Cambridge: Polity Press, 1990.
- Kevin McQuillan, Culture, Religion, and Demographic Behavior, McGill-Queen's University Press, 1999.
- Jay Sokolovsky*, The Cultural Context of Aging: Worldwide Perspectives*, Praeger Publisher, December 2008.
- Malina Ciocea, Securing National Identity in a Globalizing World, Comunicare.ro Publishing house, 2007.
- Mircea, Brie, Ioana Horga, Europe: A Cultural Border, or a Geo-cultural Archipelago, Eurolimes, vol. 9 The Cultural Frontiers of Europe, Spring 2010, Oradea University Press.
- Paul Dobrescu, Geopolitica, Editura Comunicare.ro, Bucuresti, 2008.
- Paul, Dobrescu, Viclenia Globalizarii – Asaltul asupra puterii americane, Institutul European / in English "Globalisation's Deception - The Assault on American Power"The European Institute,2010.
- Steven Jackson, Britain's Population: Demographic Issues in Contemporary Society, Routledge Press, June 1998.
- Cinzia di Palo, The demographic challenge on pension systems: empirical results from Italy, Review of Applied Socio-Economic Research, Issue 2, 2011, ISSN: 2247-6172, accessed January 26, 2012, www.reaser.eu
- Ioana-Mihaela Firicel, International Terrorism – A Serious Conflict Between the Occident and The Orient, Romanian Review of Social Sciences(2011), No. 1, accessed January 30, 2012, www.rrss.univnt.ro
- Warr, D.J.,'Gender, Class, and the art and craft of social capital, The Sociological Quarterly, 2006, vol 47.
- Wolfgang Lutz, Rudolf Richter, Christopher Wilson, The New Generations of Europeans: demography and families in the enlarged European Union, Routedge Press, August 2006.

THE EXPLORATION OF THE SELF IN PICTURES. PHOTO-THERAPY

ELENA NEDELCU[1]
ANDRA NEDELCU[2]

Abstract
We are living in a world surrounded by images; everywhere we go we are overwhelmed by commercials, plasma screens, posters etc. We get lost in these "perfect" pictures, we dream about that perfect body, that perfect sunny holiday and that perfectly happy family. We spend time consuming those pictures, but we don't spend time to see ourselves as we are, to discover our inner self. But, can we discover ourselves in pictures? I believe so, but only when the pictures are created and not consumed. When pictures are created, creation becomes therapy and the result of the work becomes a means of self discovery and exploration. There are many examples of artists using different media like: sculpture, painting, installation, video that create pictures making use of their own body/face, of their own lives, of their own dreams, hallucinations or obsessions. This is a good way to bring their problems out of the subconscious, to use them in a creative and playful way, to visualize them and to share them with the world. The paper intends to explore the possibilities of self discovery through creating pictures, and in what proportion this activity can become therapy, art or both. The analysis will focus on the possibilities of accepting and comprehending oneself by taking pictures of oneself; on how genuine self-portraits can overcome the individual conflict between who one actually is, what one believes people's perceptions of oneself are and who one thinks people want one to be in order to be accepted or even successful.

Keywords: self exploration, self portrait, art therapy, photo-therapy, subconscious.

Introduction

As far as we can go back in time, any artist's work has been envisaged as the mirror of his experiences, thoughts and ideas. More often than not, the artist has purposefully used his own life or body, and plenty of examples from contemporary art can be given to support this idea. Throughout art history, one can easily notice that most often the artists' inspiration source has been represented by certain obsessions, traumas, and painters such as Edvard Munch or Francisco Goya are well known illustrations of this fact. The question is what would have happened if these artists tormented by such obsessions, depressions etc. had not found art as a means of escape, if they had not channeled all their repressions and anxieties in their works? We think that in many situations what gives birth to creation is exactly this overwhelming amount of thoughts and inner torments. Also, it is puzzling that especially such negative, intense experiences can turn into art, into something "beautiful" or "harmonious". If all these feelings had not been expressed, if they had not been discharged by being turned into an artistic object, one would have probably witnessed more suicide cases. Emil Cioran himself, in the interview given to Gabriel Liiceanu for the documentary "The Apocalypse According to Cioran" stated that his writings had been a real form of therapy, which had helped him go on.

Content

This paper attempts at emphasizing the approach in which studying various cases of artists and the way they work can represent a departure point in devising a self-cognition system for every person, so that this method of setting oneself free through art, through creation would not exclusively be destined to persons that have the "artist" statute. This starting point related to the use of art as therapy will be exemplified by artists whose works are particularly their own biography, a documentation on their own lives.

[1]Associate Professor, Ph. D.,"Nicolae Titulescu" University, Bucharest (email:doina.nedelcu@yahoo.com)
[2] School Teacher, General School No. 1, Afumati, Ilfov (Nikita260188@yahoo.com)

Therapy through art is relatively new, as it started to be used as such towards the middle of the 20th century. This psychotherapeutic discipline has double meaning, either referring to therapeutically producing a work of art (in this case the emphasis is on the process itself) or to the interpretation of a work of art created by the patient (in this case the emphasis is on the product and on the symbols used).

Apparently, the British artist Adrian Hill is the one who seems to have used for the first time the term "art therapy" to describe the therapeutic effect of producing images. Hill discovered the beneficial effect that drawing and painting can have in the process of recovery after tuberculosis. The values of art therapy are to release the creative energy of the inhibited patient through this captivating activity that involves both mind and fingers. In the sanatorium where he had been treated for tuberculosis, Hill suggested patients to start doing art; this was the starting point for his work with patients, based on art therapy, documented later in his book "Art Versus Illness" in 1945. Artist Edward Adamson joined Adrian Hill, applying this therapy form in insane asylums in England, where he opened workshops for patients to come and start paint. Adamson militated in favour of the patients' freedom of expression, being against interpreting their creations by specialized persons; for Adamson these interpretations would have signified only the psychotherapist's projections on the respective work.

Among the first psychologists that have encouraged self-discovery through a creative method was the famous Carl Gustav Jung. Self-exploration achieved by Jung brings about change as far as the type of analysis that he approached is concerned. He encouraged all his patients to start a self-cognitive and self-exploratory process. Patients were instructed on how to use their active imagination, on how to talk to their innerness and on how to paint their fantasies[3]. Thus, Jung himself encouraged the activity of transforming emotions into images: "Emotional torment can be differently solved, not by intellectually clarifying it, but by giving it visible form. The patients that have certain skills for drawing or painting can express their state of mind by means of an image. It is not important for it to be technically or esthetically satisfactory, but it should allow fantasy to go wild and the entire thing to be accomplished as well as possible."[4]

The means of expression generally accepted and used in art therapy have been predominantly painting, drawing and molding. Despite publications related to the therapeutic aspects of photography (Cornelison and Arsenian, 1960) or video registration (Alger and Hogan, 1967), numerous supporters of art therapy have remained skeptical about using these artistic means.[5] In 1981 Jerry Fryrear together with Bob Fleshman approached the theme of cooperation among different artistic branches in their work "The Arts in Therapy". Fryrear noticed that throughout history, among the different artistic branches there has been connection, more often than not inseparable, this tendency being ever so more apparent in contemporary art.[6] Thus, skepticism about the new artistic means – photography and video – has been moderated by the fact that these technologies include: movement, directing and body presentation. In his paper "Photo Art Therapy", Fryrear accomplishes a synthesis of his previous papers, "The Arts in Therapy", and two more publications about photo-therapy (1983) and video-therapy (1981). "Photo Art Therapy" demonstrates that not only does instant photographing include various aspects from visual arts, but it also contributes with new artistic features that could offer various therapeutic possibilities. Both Jerry Fryrear and the coauthor of the book, Irene Corbit, use photography in their therapeutic practice. What they do is photographing their patients in order to study their posture, and then using the

[3] Red Book. Liber Novus, Carl Gustav Jung, p. 205
[4] Collected works, Carl Gustav Jung, Vol.8, p. 78-79
[5] Photo Art Therapy: A Jungian Perspective, Jerry L. Fryrear, Irene E. Corbit, p. V
[6] Idem

respective photographs for the so called "self-image confrontation".[7] Moreover, they invite their patients to construct their own images and to pose for the photo camera, by imagining various moods or feelings that characterize themselves. The importance Fryrear and Corbit give to posture, to the way in which people sit in front of the photo camera becomes therapy, as our mind reacts to the expression our body gets, our body turns out to be a visual experience that changes according to emotions, moods etc. At the basis of their therapy there lies the creative process of change, which is described by the two authors as "visual transition." One of the experiments used by Fryrear and Corbit is the "self-portrait box" which explores the multitude of a person's facets. On each square of the cube, there is a self-portrait of the artist that tries to capture the various characteristics of one's personality. These images are accompanied by six more, which disclose more intimate sides of the respective person. This process encourages the articulation of the multiple aspects of one's personality that we choose to exhibit or not in front of the others.

The two psychotherapists' entire practice promotes the idea of bringing moods, experiences, so far lying beyond the conscious, by means of visual expression. Thus, worries, frustrations, fantasies, memories etc. get a concrete form. "It is easier for people to confront, discuss, change and treat a concrete referent, as compared to an abstract idea. Giving the abstract a visible form, the client creates a referent which is tangible. It has form, colour, dimension and can be directly confronted, discussed and changed in a visible manner. By means of a photograph, a client can create a photographic posture which is visibly the form of an emotion or memory (…)."[8]

Among the other characteristics of photography as therapy, enumerated by the authors of "Photo Art Therapy", one could refer, on the one side, to the efficiency put forth by the rapidness of taking a photo as compared to painting or drawing, and, on the other side, to the lack of the possible frustration that a patient might have related to one's ability to draw/paint.

Nowadays, almost everybody has access to a photo camera, which has become very easy to use once they have been digitalized, thus self-exploring by means of self-portrait photography is at anybody's hand. This art democratization allows each person to discover oneself through creative means related to the visual arts domain, which, in the past was exclusively reserved to gifted persons or to persons specialized in this field. Therefore, "photo-therapy" can be "a means of disclosing, expressing, comprehending some fragments that belong to our inner self."[9] Although we rationally know that photographs are not "real", that they "do not say the truth", as they stand for specific choices, constructions, decisive moments, however, we provide them with meaning. Nevertheless, many people think that it is in the power of photographs "to say" the truth. Precisely this contradiction and this tension become extremely productive in the therapeutic process. Looking at their pictures, being witnesses of their flexibility, one considers obvious that "truth" is a construct, that identity is fragmented in many "truths". By becoming the individual is set free from constantly looking for an immutable "ideal self", and, at the same time, it allows one to understand the self as process and evolution.[10]

This self-exploring method through photography, art or creation brings about, besides the satisfaction caused by one's own creation, a ludic dimension which is emphasized in psychotherapy. Psychotherapy lies at the intersection of two ludic spaces – the one belonging to the patient and the one belonging to the therapist. Psychotherapy means two persons that play together. Consequently, when playing is not possible, the therapist's effort is channeled towards making the patient able to play. Playing is trusting and it belongs to the prospective space (what existed at the beginning) between the child and the maternal figure. Only by being creative, one can discover our truthful self.

---

[7] Photo Art Therapy: A Jungian Perspective, Jerry L. Fryrear, Irene E. Corbit, p. VI

[8] Photo Art Therapy: A Jungian Perspective, Jerry L. Fryrear, Irene E. Corbit

[9] The Photography Reader, Liz Wells, part eight, chapter 37 "Photo-therapy. Psychic realism as a healing art", Rosy Martin & Joe Spence, p. 402

[10] Idem

Self discovery, together with self-expression, is very useful in our opinion, to the extent that in nowadays society, we are bombed with images, chimeras of an idealized body, an idealized personality or the perfect family. "The spectator is drugged by spectacular images"[11], thus becoming more and more difficult to discover who one really is. Because of the reasons that have just been enumerated, a conflict is born between what a person really is, what he/she wants or could improve about his/her own person and the desire to comply with the standards imposed by society and by the entire gallery of seducing images promoted by mass-media. As Gaston Bachelard stated "personality lives in a rhythm of conciliation and aggression, related to the game between self-love and other-love." In this conflict generated by the disagreement between desires, aspirations, ideals and what it really exists – the confrontation with an image created by one's own fantasy can be revealing. A simple self-portrait photograph could contribute to accepting a type of reality. Thus, a representation of one's own face, which is not idealized and lacks any artificiality or make-up, could be the first step to an authentic self-introspection. This courageous attempt could, however, bring an artist to a vulnerable position, to the extent that the respective artist does not only produce an introspection through his/her works, but also he/she introduces his/her personality in front of the world. In this context, one can say that Rembrandt's work represents an inventory of his self-change, the creator of the work of art being also the subject of the work of art.

As we stated earlier in the paper, we will use the work of some artists to exemplify the way in which art can be a means of setting a person free from one's obsessions, fears, frustrations.

We will start by referring to the Dutch artist Ed van der Elksen and his novel made up of photographs ("photonovel"). The idea of a novel made up of photographs was developed by Dutch photographers in the 1950s. Photography was used as kind of diary, thus endowing documentary photography with new features, turning it into something more spontaneous and more personal, directed on the intimate space and focused on the life of the photographer more than on the life of other persons. The most famous novel based on photographs is that made up by the Dutch Ed van der Elksen in 1956, named "Love on the left bank".[12] This work of art is based on a series of photographs depicting the photographer's female and male friends that lived in Saint Germain-des-Pres, Paris. Before this work was published, van der Elksen made a photo-essay (the photos were annotated) that appeared in "Picture Post": "This is not a film. This is a story from real life, about people that really exist."[13] The story contained in this photo-essay was slightly changed, so that it could have become a book with documentary photographs. The decision to make a filmic story was obviously taken to serve a commercial purpose.

Nan Goldin is an artist that also very well exemplifies the interpretation of the work of art as diary/documentation of one's own life, as she photographed her homosexual or heterosexual friends and her life partners in intimate situations. Thus, in her documentary photographs, Nan Goldin depicts aspects of sexual orientation ambiguity: homosexuals, lesbians, travesties. Her photographs do not judge, they just portray an aspect that belongs to reality. The heterosexual couples, which Goldin most often reveals during sexual intercourse, are considered either as expression of completion and perfect union, or as expression of possible frustration, lack of communication between couple members. One of the photographs that suggests lack of resonance between the two, the discontinuance of the couple, is the one in which Goldin lies in bed and looks at her boyfriend who is smoking a cigarette in the foreground, which is closer to the viewer; their eyes do not meet; the line that divides light from shadow might suggest the wall that was raised between the two, woman and man, who are incapable of getting harmonized, to recreate the archetype of the complete being.

---

[11] Societatea spectacolului. Comentarii la societatea spectacolului, Guy Debord, traducere si note de Ciprian Mihali si Radu Stoenescu

[12] The genius of photography, Gerry Badger, 2007, Quadrille Publishing Limited, p. 121

[13] The genius of photography, Gerry Badger, p. 121

Another artist who could exemplify the manner in which the work of art becomes intrinsic to the artist him/herself is Marina Abramovic, the well-known performance creator. Marina Abramovic's art is an extension of her own life; she discloses herself with complete sincerity, going beyond her physical and mental limits.

Francesca Woodman, likewise Marina Abramovic, uses her own body as a means of artistic expression. In most of her photographs, Francesca presents her body nude, in various situations that symbolize her inner quests, confusion, ambiguity. By means of her body, Francesca Woodman initiates a dialogue with herself, which becomes a symbol of receptivity, a meeting point between her and the rest of the world.

Lee Friedlander, an American photographer, has made more than 400 portraits in 50 years. The oldest were made in his youth and they are very direct, except for a few traditional family portraits. During his early artistic stage, Friedlander created the series with mirroring, reflections, shadows of his own figure caught from unusual angles. These self-portraits function as a diary that depicts how a person is changing as he/she is getting old. Among his most recent self-portraits one can find the ones in which Lee Friedlander is in hospital, the artist photographing himself before and after his bypass surgery.[14]

Yayoi Kusama is another good example for the way in which art can become therapy and a means of expressing obsessions, hallucinations etc. The Japanese artist uses various media – installation, sculpture, video – to create a type of art generated by her hallucinations caused by the obsessive neurosis Kusama has been suffering from since teenage years. The moment she was labeled with this diagnosis, the artist decided that, most of her time, she would live in a mental care institution in Tokyo, in the vicinity of which there is a spacious studio where could work.

Kusama claims that she started to have short hallucinations ever since childhood, under the form of floral patterns (which started with a vase of flowers) that started to spread out in the entire room, then changing into "threatening" dots.

Painting was the first medium the artist used to express these obsessions, which could get a material, concrete form this way. The work she created helped Kusama keep her psychiatric condition under control.

Kusama confronted with a latent phobia of sexual intercourse, which generated a series of sculptures illustrating phallic forms that she exhibited in mirrored rooms in order to construct an infinity illusion. The artist denied the erotic charge of these sculptures, assigning them totem significance that helped her control her anxiety about this symbol.[15] From the same perspective, the Japanese artist's performances can be rather considered as a type of exorcism than as a means of sensuality celebration through art – "once sexual frustrations have been made distant, there will not be an exaggerated accentuation of the sexual theme, the artist being free to channel her creative energies into real art."[16]

The trauma that generated the artist's illness partially originates in the familial context in which she grew up, that is a rigid, traditionalist background, with an authoritarian mother who used to severely (both physically and psychically) punish her daughter for any unusual behavior and who used to discourage her daughter's interest in art. This aspect is revealed in one of Kusama's early paintings, in which the artist's mother is portrayed in a "tempest" of dots.

Yayoi Kusama's works are based on repetition, which creates a hypnotic effect on the viewer. According to Freud, the value of art lies in its power to trigger "a narcotic effect, offering both the artist and the viewer a substitute, or a means of escaping reality." Nevertheless, the Japanese artist's work can be characterized by mimesis, as a mirror of her own innerness and as a means of introspection. The result of her work is a "mimetic" reflection or her ego. [17] As Kusama declared: "I do not consider myself an artist; I am looking for art in order to cope with the disability that started in my childhood."[18]

[14] http://www.guardian.co.uk/books/2012/jan/22/lee-friedlander-in-picture-review
[15] Contemporary Art and Classical Myth, Jennie Hirsh, Isabelle Loring Wallace, pg. 94
[16] Idem, pg. 95

Conclusions

From the distinctions made and the illustrations offered in the body of our paper, one could easily noticed that the cases of several artists might exemplify the manner in which art can be both a means of expressing and releasing frustrations, obsessions, memories, traumas.

Being related to creativity, imagination, instinct, subconscious, art therapy has become a curative method that has also excellent results with persons that do not have artistic training. By expressing negative emotions in a work of art, one produces detachment, so that the author-person will succeed in looking within him/herself from another point of view; at the same time, the feelings that caused him/her negative moods will transform into something tangible that can be made real and accepted.

The purpose of this paper has not been to exhaustively document the history or the forms of art-therapy. It is rather an invitation to consider the artistic phenomenon from multiple points of view, focusing on the psychosocial perspective. In this manner, one can understand the motive and the effect of an artistic act at psychical level. It represents a vision by means of which art is perceived as a form of self-discovery, comprehension of the authentic self.

References:

- Badger, Gerry. 2007. The genius of photography. Quadrille Publishing Limited
- Debord, Guy.2011. Societatea spectacolului. Comentarii la societatea spectacolului" (traducere si note de Ciprian Mihali si Radu Stoenescu), Bucureşti: Editura Rao.
- Fryrear, Jerry L., and Corbit, Irene E. 1992. Photo Art Therapy: A Jungian Perspective, Charles C. Thomas Publishing, USA
- Jung, Carl Gustav. 2009. Red Book. Liber Novus, London: W. W. Norton & Company
- Pollock, Griselda. 2006. Psychoanalysis and the image. Transdisciplinary perspectives, Oxford: Blackwell Publishing Ltd
- Wallace, Isabelle Loring and Hirsh, Jennie. 2011.Contemporary Art and Classical Myth. Farnham: Ashgate Publishing Limited
- Wells, Liz. 2003. The Photography Reader, Abingdon: Routledge
- http://www.guardian.co.uk/books/2012/jan/22/lee-friedlander-in-picture-review

[17] Contemporary Art and Classical Myth, Jennie Hirsh, Isabelle Loring Wallace, p. 104

[18] Psychoanalysis and the image. Transdisciplinary perspectives, Griselda Pollock, chapter 5 "Yayoi Kusama between Abstraction and Pathology", Izumi Nakajima, p. 133

ORGANIZATIONAL DESIGN AND CHANGE. THE EVOLUTION OF TRADE UNIONS ORGANIZATION FORMS IN ROMANIA AFTER 1989

LUMINIȚA CRISTINA CIOCAN[1]

Abstract

The study: „Management and organizational change. Evolution of union organization forms in Romania after 1989" propose as subject of analyze a type of organization which, through its affiliation to the civil society and through its role conferred by low, becomes the key for the proper functioning of the labor market. Along with the change of political regime from December 1989, the trade union organizations were put in a position to cope with a triple: reorganization, learning a new social role and public image reconfiguration, including cancellation of the association (inevitable) with the "ancient" trade union. The study proposes three major subjects: defining the term union organization accompanied by possible interpretations of the role of this type of organization at the society level – „collective voice", counter pole , political actor, collective negotiator, transnational and promoter of the class struggle, the last role not being characteristic to a democratic society; the description of the syndicate organizations evolution in Romania, after 1990; the argue of the necessity of an organizational change felt by the unions, under the impact of some factors depending on socio-economic and politic changes.

Keywords: trade unions organization, organizational change, employee, social dialogue, globalization

Introduction

From the relational point of view, the labor market suppose the regulation of labor relations between employers and employees, between the employers' bodies and the trade union organizations at different levels of economic activity (at national, sectoral or economic unit) Basically, on the labor market there are three large groups of interests; interests of the capital (represented by employers bodies and their associations), of the labor factor (represented by the syndicates) and of the state.

The subject of the present study is part of the interest aria of the organization sociology and aims to analyze the trade union organizations evolution, in the context of the socio-economical and political changes that cross our country in the last twenty two years.

Such an approach is absolutely necessary, given that the organizations which represent the employees' interests in the labor relations are un important part of the civil society and, also, social dialogue partners with employers bodies and institutions of the local and central public administration. Hence the main objectives of this study: emphasize the role of the trade union organizations type in their relationships and in the social dialogue; the identification of the directions in which these organizations in the last twenty two years.

The study was developed in three main directions: (a) defining the trade union organization term, together with possible interpretations of the role of this kind of organization at the society level– „collective voice", counter pole, political actor, transnational collective negotiator, promoter of the class struggle, the last role is not specific to a democratic society; (b) the evolution of the trade union organizations in Romania after 1990; (c) the need for organizational change, felt under the impact of factors related to socio-economical and political factors.

The data underlying this study are the results of the researches that the author coordinated and attended, beginning with 1997, in cooperation with various trade unions federations and confederations in Romania.

[1] Ph. D., „Hyperion" University from Bucharest (email: luminitaciocan@yahoo.com).

The Romanian literature doesn't treat this subject very often, maybe because these organizations have a distorted, mainly negative, associated more with street movements, with strikes, social disorder, and less with the idea of social dialogue and constructive partnership. Or, the lack of structured, coherent and fundamental information is as well detrimental as the propagandistic abundance practiced before 1990.

However, the existing contribution in the international literature are very different , the approaches from sociologically or in the economic or political sciences. We mention, in particular, the studies made available to those interested by the European Trade Union Institute.

1. Organizational change in the context of post-industrial society transformations

The mechanism of organizational change, its key factors, the context and the moment when an organization decides to restructure itself, the effects generated by these transformations within the environment in which the subject evolves represent as many challenging topics for the analysis of organizational behaviour in relation to the substantial social, economic and political modifications that have characterized the last two decades. These topics are even more challenging for the subject of our analysis is the trade union organization – i.e. a type of organization which "enjoys" a not quite positive image and which has been associated in Romania in the last 20 years rather with street protests, strikes and social disorder than with the image of a constructive social dialogue partner.

For approaching such a topic it is absolutely necessary to refer to the main evolution trends recorded in society, trends which are differently reflected over the environment in which each organization functions. In this respect, special literature most frequently mentions: globalization, innovation (particularly, innovations in technology and informatics technology), market restructuring and increase in competitiveness, geopolitical transformations, demographic modifications, major modifications of the workforce structure and its characteristics, limitation of resources (basically, energetic resources) etc.

Globalization is a concept used for defining a system of complex processes, sometimes contradictory ones, with a variable dynamic, which may have the following major effects:

Internationalization of goods and services markets, of monetary and financial markets, as well as of the workforce, a fact which allowed the liberalization of commerce, the free circulation of capital, technology and workforce. When national markets were not integrated, social experience has indicated that this fact did not lead to a decrease of the gap between them;

The very fast spread of new technologies, especially of IT and communication ones. This had, as a main effect, a globalization of knowledge without leading, however, to a dilution of the development differences which exist between different countries from various parts of the world;

The increase of corporations power, also due to the quick penetration of new markets, which have become accessible after the political regime changed (see European states from the former socialist bloc);

Integration of national states within a political and global system which had as effect the transfer of new economic, social and political decisions from national governments to supra-state structures;

The modification of certain social behaviour patterns and life styles through assimilating "imported" (and most often non-differentiated) social and cultural products alongside with the other phenomena which are associated with globalization.

Even if there is no general definition upon which the majority agrees, one thing is certain: globalization leads to an ever increasing interdependence of economic, social, political and cultural phenomena so that the facts and events that are specific for a country, a region or a system have direct and indirect effects, which are more and more complex in other economies, countries or parts of the world.

The effects of globalization are basically visible in the way economic organizations function – they had to react fast, modifying their structure, management concept and strategies in order to correspond to the new challenges. In this context, trade unions have also been obliged to adapt themselves "on the spot" and to reconsider their objectives, strategies, as well as the ways of representing their employees' interest before the employers.

What are trade union organizations?

The price which a society must pay when it undergoes a period of political, economic and social transformations - as the years that have marked the history of Romania during the last 22 years - is also a terminological one. The disappearance of an epoch inevitably brings with it a partial or total renunciation to anything that might, even indirectly, remind people of the previous reality – laws, institutions, systems of norms and values, personalities, as well as their representations, symbols, holidays, rituals etc.

Social sciences are mainly exposed to linguistic modifications, which tend to be more evident and deeper since each historical period and regime has its own series of specific terms by which it defines its identity in an as accurate and suggestive (persuasive) way as possible.

The concept of workers' movement, integrated after 1990 in the category of "to be avoided" words, is one of the most interesting examples of manipulation instruments which one can use when analysing history and society. Romanian historical literature after 1947 obsessively associates the idea of workers' movement with the idea of socialist movement (which it identifies, in its turn, with the communist one), justifying the latter through the former one, while implicitly establishing certain ideological limits. On the other hand, special literature from the former communist space does not repeat this mistake since it makes a clear and pertaining distinction between the workers' movement, the trade union movement and the social-democratic, socialist and communist doctrines.

The term movement (with the meaning that we use in this paper), as the Encyclopaedic Dictionary defines it, refers to "an action which brings together a large number of people that support a common idea and purpose."[2] We can speak, and we are not wrong, of a cultural, religious, artistic, environmental, liberal, conservatory, etc. movement. Thus, the workers' movement is a historical reality which cannot be contested and which is much older than the history of the Romanian Communist Party; its objectives are more numerous than the ones set by the framework of the Unique Party. It is true that for a certain period of time, the workers' movement (including the trade union movement) was regulated by the Romanian Communist Party, but we should not confine ourselves to this period.

For clarifying the terms, we are going to consider trade unions[3] as organizations which are set up for defending the rights provided by national legislation in collective and individual employment contracts or in collective employment agreements as well as in the international covenants, treaties and conventions Romania is a party to in order to promote its members' economic and social interests.

Trade union organizations are set up thanks to the right to free association, a constitutionally safeguarded principle in all democratic regimes in the world. Moreover, freedom of association and freedom of expression represent fundamental principles upon which the activity pursued by the International Labour Organization relies; these principles are set forth in the 13th Part of the Versailles[4] Treaty on 28 June 1919, as well as in the Declaration from Philadelphia[5] regarding the

[2]  Dicţionar enciclopedic, vol IV, Bucureşti, Editura Enciclopedică, 2001.

[3] See the Law on social dialogue no. 62/2011.

[4] Provisions set forth in the 13th Part of the Treaty of Versailles are fully comprised by the Saint-Germain Treaty concluded on the 10th of September 1919 (Article 332-372), in the Treaty from Trianon concluded on 4th June 1920 (Articles 315-355) and in the Treaty of Neuilly concluded on 27th November 1919 (Articles 249-289).

[5] Adopted at the 26th session of the General Conference of the International Labour Organization, which was organized at Philadelphia on the 10th of May 1944.

goals and objectives of the International Labour Organization. Any of the 175 member states of this organization are obliged to ensure the legal framework necessary for the setting up and functioning of the structures that represent the employees', as well as employers' interests (see the case of employers' associations).

In order to reinforce the right to setting up professional associations and the freedom of exercising this right, the International Labour Organization has adopted the Convention no. 87/1948 on trade union freedom and the defence of the trade union right.[6] According to the document, "employees and employers have the right, without previous authorization, to set up organizations as they may wish, as well as to affiliate to these organizations on condition they comply with the statutes of the latter" (Article 2). Organizations have the right to elaborate statutes and administrative regulations, to organize their management and activity, to freely elect their representatives, to devise their activities on condition that they observe the law (Article 3 § 1 and Article 8 § 1). In its turn, "national legislation shall not aggrieve the guarantees provided by the present convention" (Article 8 § 2), while public authorities "shall restrain from any intervention that might limit this right or hinder its legal exercise" (Article 3 § 2). Employees' and employers' organizations are granted the right to constitute themselves as federations and confederations which can affiliate themselves to other similar national and international organizations.

Thus, the principles which represent the basis for the organization and functioning of trade unions (largely understood as employees' organizations) are: "a) trade union freedom (which is both individual for it recognizes an employee's right to freely adhere to a trade union, withdraw from it whenever he chooses to, and collective since it recognizes the possibility of certain trade union groups to associate or affiliate to another trade union group; b) trade union pluralism (which derives from trade union freedom since it ensures the possibility to set up more trade unions within the same branch of activity, domain or unity); c) trade unions independence (understood as independence from the state bodies, which forbids any intervention from the public authorities that might limit or thwart the exercise of trade union rights and freedoms, independence from political parties – since trade unions are non-political organizations, as well as from any civil society organization)".[7]

In Romania, the present Constitution provides that "citizens may freely associate in political parties, trade unions, employers organizations, as well as in any other form of association" (Article 40). In compliance with these provisions, trade unions are defined by law as employees' organizations, "set up for the defence of the rights provided by domestic law in covenants, treaties and conventions to which Romania is a party, as well as in collective employment contracts, for the promotion of the professional, economic, social, cultural and sport interests of those organizations".[8]

No matter what definitions one gives to trade union organizations, they are merely the synthetic expression of the different ways of understanding the role played by trade unions in the relation system between employers' organizations – trade unions – states in a certain society. If we analyse the way in which representative organizations of employees function in different countries, we shall see that one can talk of trade union models. These are inevitably marked by the economic,

---

[6] Adopted at the 31st session of the General Conference of the International Labour Organization on the 17th June 1948, held at San Francisco and entered into force on the 4th July 1950. Up to the 31st of December 2001, the Convention had been ratified by 139 states, Romania being one of the first 20 states which committed itself to applying the provisions of this document (28th May1957).

[7] Ion Traian Ştefănescu, Dreptul muncii. (Bucureşti: Editura Lumina Lex, 2000), pag. 51.

[8] The law on trade unions no. 54/2003, published in the Official Gazette no. 73 / 5 February 2003, Article 1. The former law (no. 54/1991 on trade unions) set forth that trade unions are "non-political" organizations; this phrase was eliminated from the present form of the law after a series of debates on this topic, which had as result the idea that the meaning of the term "political" is quite broad and , moreover, thar trade unions define and put into practice their own defence and promotion policy regarding employees' rights; in consequence, the statement that they "do not have a political character" is not true.

political, social, cultural and historical, as well as geographical particularities of any country, and lead to the appearance of different forms of trade unions.

A first interpretation of the role of trade unions is that they are a " collective voice" which expresses the employees' point of view as to working conditions, salaries etc., and by means of which one can protest through specific means whenever there is discontent. This means that bidirectional channels of communication are created and maintained basically between trade unions organizations and management and also between these organizations and state institutions so that there is a permanent exchange of opinions on the employees' main problems.

A second interpretation is represented by the phrase: "trade unions as a counterbalance pole". The main role of the salaried representatives is in this case to balance the management objectives of the economic unity, which basically are based on profits, with their own interests, which are basically social, so that the results of the economic activity are "fairly" distributed. "As a result, it depends upon the trade unions capacity to counterbalance profit and equity so that the state is not obliged to resort to regulation measures".[9]

From another perspective, trade unions (alongside with employers) organizations are viewed as "political actors" within our society and represent the economic and social interests of their members, including their participation in the creation of normative drafts, mainly on trade unions. This requires that there should be a tri-party organization system: trade unions – employers' organizations – Government/other state administrative institutions; it also requires the legal recognition of the fact that trade unions and employers organizations may intervene in the elaboration of normative acts (for expressing advisory opinion and so on).

Globalization of economy brings about a new possibility of approaching the role of trade unions organizations, i.e. the role played by the transnational collective negotiator. The creation of multinational companies, which are organized on the principle of decentralization, namely the decentralization of the production unity and/or services which are offered in several countries, enjoying a more or less degree of autonomy in the decision making process, has led to a relatively similar reaction on the part of trade unions. Globalization of economy has also generated a decrease in the power of trade unions whose influence is most often limited to only several professions and to the territory of a state. On the other hand, enhanced financial resources of multinational companies, their capacity to move production to another state, the possibility to transfer workforce from one area to another, the presence of decision centres which sometimes are not located on the territory of that country represent as many threatening factors for the negotiation capacity and the importance of trade unions. Consequently, trade unions reacted against this situation; the solution is represented by the setting up of international trade unions and the secretariats thereof so that finally a trans-national collective negotiation system could be created. At the same time, national and international confederations collaborate with the International Labour Organization, as well as with other international or regional political bodies, with a view to encouraging the adoption of certain regulations that would limit the advantages enjoyed by multinational companies in their relation to employees and to the trade unions which are located on a certain state's territory. It is difficult to establish whether this pattern will function since there are many obstacles that might intervene: economic, social and cultural differences between countries; legislation differences as to work relations; the retention of trade union leaders who consider that the setting up of regional or international trade union structures constitutes a power transfer from their country abroad and thus a weakening of their organizations force within their national territory; the preponderantly negative perception of foreign employees in that state.

According to another approach, coined as Marxist, trade unions are "promoters of class fight", respectively organizations which, besides other organizations, represent the interests of the subordinated class in its fight against the exploiting class, in the evolution process towards a better social order. On the one hand, trade unions must settle social problems and, on the other hand, they must pursue an intense political and educative activity for making the trade union members aware of their role in the creation (or, if the case may be, consolidation) of a new society. This interpretation is losing more and more ground due to the new post-socialist political and economic context existing in Eastern Europe.

[9] Dennis Briscoe, Raoul Nacamulli, Miriam Rothman, transl. Industrial Relations Around the World: Labor Relations for Multinational Companies. (New York: Gruyter, 1993), pag. 4.

Except for the last explanatory model (which is not characteristic of a democratic state), the other ones do not exclude each other, but rather represent facets of the role currently played by trade unions organizations in different countries.

The evolution of trade unions organizations after 1990

The setting up of trade unions organizations. Political changes which occurred after December 1989 led to the disappearance of the former centralized power institutions and thus of the former Romanian General Trade Unions Association, generating a complete lack of organizations that could protect employees' rights before those who became employers in the new economic and social context. In fact, due to the impetus of that period few could predict the appearance of new work relations and the necessity of creating employees' organizations that could integrate and exercise their role in the new work environment. This explains the adoption of the solutions that were suggested at the moment: the appointment in each enterprise of a Council for National Salvation that would be invested both with administrative powers within that economic entity and with powers related to the employees' interests representation; these solutions would be seen today at least original if not utopic but, anyway, at the moment they seemed correct and efficient.

Nevertheless, at the end of 1989, political events could not thwart the normal evolution of the new trade unions. The arguments regarding the necessity of their existence in the new Romanian democratic society are both objective and subjective.

(a) From an economic point of view, the new system required the pluralism of property forms, in which private property became dominant. The owner of the property was profit-oriented and assumed his right to adopt decisions in relation to the encountered risks and within a competitive environment; the coherence of the system is ensured through the market mechanism, the existing economic and financial levels and the legislative framework. Most of the merchandise is transacted on a supply and demand market and the price is the result of free negotiations between buyers and sellers without the administrative intervention of the state and without any other pressure. Under these conditions, workforce becomes an object of transaction on the market (without, objectively speaking, being considered a merchandise in itself), a fact which brings about the necessity of creating organizations that can negotiate employment and payment conditions for employees and that can promote their professional, economic and social interests before employers, the associations of employers or before other institutions.

(b) In case certain employees' rights are aggrieved, provided that these rights are set forth in domestic legislation, collective employment contracts or in the international treaties and covenants Romania is a party to, the defence of these rights lies with trade unions organizations.

(c) Trade unions represent a social dialogue partner whose role is well defined in the bi- and tri-party organizations that are set up in a democratic society.

(d) Last but not least, the material and financial legacy of the Romanian General Trade Unions Association had to be managed and put to good account to the benefit of those who had contributed to its setting up in time, respectively to the tax paying employees and trade union members that had been active before December 1989. The quite consistent patrimony could not be included in the state proprietorship either, as it could not be shared, fragmented or destroyed; on the contrary, it had to be transferred to an organization whose role was similar to the previous association.

The first attempts to reorganize trade unions could be noticed during the last days of December 1989,[10] when the National Provisory Committee for the Free Trade Unions Reorganization was set up; several former members of the Romanian General Trade Unions Association (it is true, not the former leaders but the second wave of the former national trade unions association) got involved in this structure. From a certain point of view, their presence was natural thanks to the organizing experience and the information they had about trade unions and their way of functioning. On the other hand, the reorganization activity pursued by the new Committee was soon labelled as an attempt to preserve, in a disguised way, the former trade unions structures.

Contested or not, the National Committee basically attempted to achieve three objectives: managing the patrimony of the Central Council of the Romanian General Trade Unions Association,[11] devising a statute framework based on new, democratic, principles, which would constitute a model for the new employees' professional organizations[12], and reorganizing territorial structures.

The first two months of 1990 represented an intense activity for the reorganization of free trade unions in economic entities/or per fields of activity; at the same time, initiative groups prepared the activity programme and conference/congresses for the setting up of similar organizations.[13] The political interests and confrontations of that period could not ignore these newly created organizations which enjoyed the adhesion of an important number of persons. At the moment it is difficult to evaluate the extent to which trade unions objectives intermingled with political objectives; however, it is sure that certain trade unions organizations constantly declared that they got involved in the political activity,[14] while others, on the contrary, benefited from the advantage of being present on the public sphere and clearly departed from this kind of activity stating that their claims are exclusively economic and social; on the other hand, trade union leaders from different economic units officially became members of the newly set up parties – declaring, however, that this is a strictly personal option which does not have anything to do with the organization they manage.

In January 1990 the first central trade union was set up at national level, i.e. the "Frăţia" Confederation of the Independent Trade Unions, its nucleus being made up of the "Frăţia" Drivers Trade Union and the "1 Mai" Trade Unions of Ploieşti and "Policolor" Trade Unions. In March 1990 the National Confederation of the Romanian Free Trade Unions[15] was created (known by Romanian as C.N.S.L.R.) and it comprised federations from education, commerce, textile industry, leather [10] The "Tineretul Liber" newspaper signed on the 25th of December 1989 the action known as the "1May" Free Trade Union of Ploieşti for the distribution of typical adhesions forms for 7,000 members; the "Adevărul" newspaper mentions - in its issue on 23rd December - Mr. Mircea Adrian's initiative, a worker in the production section of the Metallurgic Research Institute who, together with 14 workers and engineers, encouraged the setting up of a free trade union for workers in the field of metallurgy. On the 30th of December, through the agency of the same daily publication, the Provisory Committee for the Typographers' Free Trade Unions Reorganization published fragments of their program and suggested that February would become the month for organizing the Conference of the Typographers' Free Trade Unions.

[11] In March 1990, by statute, the National Committee for the Free Trade Unions Reorganization declared itself the successor of the Romanian Trade Unions General Association, thus taking over its patrimony through absorption.

[12] According to the statements of some persons who were directly involved in the activity of the National Committee, the conceiving of the framework-statute followed the models of the International Free Trade Unions Confederation and the Solidarity Trade Union of Poland.

[13] Newspapers record the creation of the first federative structures – the Federation of the Romanian Journalists and Typographers' Free Trade Unions, the Federation of the Education Free Trade Unions, the Federation of the Miners Free Trade Unions of Uricani, The Jiului Valley, the Romanian Medical Assistants Federation of the Free Trade Unions, The Navigators Free Trade Union, The Radio – Television Free Trade Union, The Federation of the Romanian Factory Railway Free Trade Unions, the Federation of the Romanian Free and Independent Engine Driver Trade Unions, the Federation of the Underground Mechanics Free Trade Unions etc.

[14] See the Free Radio-Television Free Trade Union run by Dumitru Iuga

[15] Recorded at the Sector 1 Court of First Instance, Bucharest, Judge's Ruling no. 782 / 16th March 1990. Its leader was Victor Ciorbea, who at the time was the President of the Federation of the Education Free Trade Unions.

trade, fabrics industry, rubber, mechanical engineering, metallurgy and agriculture. "Cartel Alfa"[16] National Trade Unions Confederation set up in June 1990 comprised seven professional federations from the main industrial sectors: chemistry and petro-chemistry, mechanical engineering, metallurgy, mining, electrotechnics, electronics etc.

This does not mean that all trade unions organizations, as well the federative ones, were affiliated to one of the three national structures: there existed a multitude of organizations which considered that none of the large confederations represented their interests, preferring a large number of associations and alliances, many of which existed for a short period of time, depending upon the short and middle term interests of those who created them.[17]

One of these inter-federative unions, The National Trade Union Block[18] agrees with other three organizations ("Electron", The Post Office and Telecommunications Trade Unions Federations and the Typographers' Trade Union Association) to start negotiations for the setting up of a new confederation. The suggestion becomes reality in November 1991, when the representatives of 13 federations reunite in a Congress for deciding the setting up of the National Trade Unions Block as a confederative national trade unions organization.

In June 1993, delegates of the National Confederation of the Romanian Free Trade Unions[19] (C.N.S.L.R.) and "Frăția" Confederation of the Independent Trade Unions joined in a common Congress and decided to fusion the two different national trade union structures; thus, the National Confederation of the Romanian Free Trade Unions – Frăția[20] was set up. A year later the Romanian Confederation of the Democratic Trade Unions was created.

The experience of the next years proved that the principle of trade unions pluralism was not in contradiction with the idea of coagulating the trade union movement; moreover, cohesion does not do anything else but bring extra force to organizations in their relations to social partners. That is why, in 2000, C.N.S.L.R. – "Frăția" and the National Trade Unions Block started negotiations for merging; the idea was not new and (apparently) there were enough premises for applying it, many of the included federations representing employees from similar domains so that the subsequent merging thereof was possible; at the same time, the two confederations shared the same doctrine visions (social – democratic) and they also had the same international affiliation. Nevertheless, in the autumn of 2001, negotiations came at a cross and B.N.S. delegates at the National Conference decided to give up the merger project and to proceed with the consolidation of the confederation. The idea of unification is reiterated at the middle of 2004 without coming to an agreement.

At present, in Romania there are more than 180 trade unions federations and more than 10 confederations. As to the confederations, only five of them are representative: The National Trade Unions Block, the National "Cartel Alfa" Trade Unions Confederation, The National Confederation of the Romanian Free Trade Unions – Frăția, the Romanian Democratic Trade Unions Confederation and the "Meridian" Trade Unions Confederation.

---

[16] « Cartel Alfa » C.N.S was set up on the 7th June 1990; it received legal personality on 26th November 1990. Its President is Bogdan Iuliu Hossu.

[17] In 1993 there were more than 25 national confederations with legal personality.

[18] It comprises the following trade unions: CONSTRUCT, CONSENERG and CONMAS.

[19] Recorded at the Sector 1 Court of First Instance Bucharest, through the Judge's Sentence no. 782 / 16 March 1990. Its leader was Victor Ciorbea, who at the time was the President of the Federation of the Education Free Trade Unions.

[20] Victor Ciorbea and Miron Mitrea became co-presidents of the largest confederative organization in the country. However, the "marriage" of the two does not last and in October 1994, Victor Ciorbea submitted his demission from the leading position of this structure and set up the Confederatoin of the Romanian Democratic Trade Unions, with a Christian – democratic orientation (he took a part of the professional organizations that were "torn" from the mother-organization).

Stages in the trade unions organizations development

1990 – 1991- "Strong" trade unionship. The first two months of 1990 were marked by a real "euphoria" of the claiming movements that were most often concluded in the street; the claims were mainly aimed at material and financial resources and dialogue between governing organizations and trade unions organizations and they were quickly "consumed" in the favour of adopting more radical methods. Large meetings of the industrial workers from important factories in Bucharest and in the country, of drivers, of employees from the Romanian Railway System and the Underground etc. were quickly organized and filled in the squares of the Capital City – this became, in fact, a common situation in Bucharest.

Trade unions organizations soon noticed that owned an efficient pressure instrument (the mass of employees) and intensely speculated their position in relation to the state institutions. On the one hand, the advantages consisted in the large number of trade union employees and the relatively quick rhythm in which trade union leaders[21] became specialized in their specific activities; on the other hand, the advantages were represented by the weakness of certain state institutions and by the sometimes incoherent policy on economic restructuring and privatization. At the same time, one cannot neglect the social factor which favoured the given context – after years of prohibition, people suddenly discovered the "taste", "show" and "force of the street", and they started to get involved in a series of such events due to their need to be "in the middle of the events", to "directly participate" in the events; this made it easier for the trade unions to convince the population to "come in the street" (a thing which is much more difficult to do now and which requires more costs).

The implication of the political factor was added to these problems so that trade unions organizations started to be "courted" from the very beginning (thanks to their force) both by the governing political parties and by those from the opposition. Questions such as to what extent is it correct for trade unions to get involved in politics, under what form and up to what limits can this be done – represent a much too complex matter of argumentation and counter-argumentation for us to deal with in the present study. What is certain, however, is the fact that Romanian trade unions organizations quickly "tasted" from the political fruit, in a more or less visible way, supporting different political parties or alliances.

At present it is difficult to prove to what extent trade union movements from 1990 – 1991 (as well as the ones which were organized later) were influenced by economic and/or political factors. It is a certain fact that miners' protests organized within the above mentioned period showed the extent to which trade union movement can be manipulated so that it departed from its normal goals; this is proved by the fact that later on, when similar events occurred (at Stoieneşti, 1998), the large central trade unions clearly detached from the miners' attempt to reach Bucharest, probably accepting that the miners' claims are natural but the manner in which they tried to impose them was illegal and, in consequence, could not be supported.

Starting with 1991, legislation on work and social dialogue came into force as a result of the negotiations between the state and trade unions representatives; these negotiations lasted almost one year. It is true that trade unions representatives repeatedly criticized the inexistence of some real consultations, considering that the government did not take into consideration their claims.

Law no. 13/1991 on the collective employment[22] contract was the first way of legitimating the regulations of working conditions, payment and other rights and obligations that derive from labour [21] Trade union leaders underwent a quick period of training in various domains – from negotiation techniques to the assimilation of essential economic, legislative, financial and organizational management; they obtained support and benefited from training programs organized with lecturers from international trade unions organizations or from different foreign countries (with the inherent advantages and disadvantages of an intensive training program, sometimes placed on an insufficiently consolidated foundation).

[22] Published in the Official Gazette on the 9th February 1991.

relations. Basically, this law represented a step forward as to the conditions required for concluding, executing, modifying, suspending and ending the collective work contract. It has been later on proved that the limits imposed on this law were determined by the lack of representativeness criteria on the parties involved in negotiations. If for the employers organizations representatives it was simple since they were appointed by the Chamber of Commerce and Industry (for concluding contracts with the companies from the same domains and at national level), when it came to trade unions, the multitude of organizations made it difficult for the negotiation team to be established coming to the absurd situation in which two work contracts were concluded at national level. At the same time, the law did not provide clear surveillance mechanisms for the observance of the contract clauses, a fact which obliged trade unions to make use of multiple forms of protest for demanding this claim.

The law on salary income - The Law no. 14/1991[23] - and the law on collective work conflicts are considered by trade unions leaders as two of the most serious obstacles against the trade unions movement. On the basis of the first normative act, the government was entitled to thwart salary raise for a period no longer than a year. Although this provision has an economic ground, it constituted the reason of many actions initiated by the employees' organizations.

Law no. 54/1991 on trade unions[24] was the first attempt to regulate the creation and functioning of trade unions organizations after December 1989. Besides the clear advantages brought about by the provisions of such a normative act, the law favoured the atomization of the trade union movement allowing the setting up of a professional federation through the association of at least two basic organizations within one field of activity, whereas a confederation could be set up with at least two federations from different areas of activity. A simple calculation shows that with at least 15 members in an organization a central trade union organization could be created for 60 employees.

1992 – 1996 – Protest period. The firsts three years of this period are characterized by general strikes and protest actions common to the national trade union C.N.S.L.R., „Frăția" (unified from 1993), „Cartel Alfa" and B.N.S., regarding especially the salary growth, the living standards, the employment maintain, the redundancy elimination; among them there were also protests regarding politics. For example, in Juin 1992, B.N.S. organized a marsh and a protest in the capital, demanding early/anticipated elections.

On 15th September, the National Trade Union Block sign a Collaboration Protocol with CDR that undertakes to sustain the Romanian Democratic Convention in the futures elections, following that, after victory, the candidate Emil Constantinescu choose his counselors from the unionist group.

The 1993 begins in force for the union movement: early strikes of workers in railways, subways, health, etc, culminate with the general strike from may 1993, attended by six central trade – C.N.S.L.R., C.S.I.„Frăția", B.N.S., „Cartel Alfa", Univers and Ceres. Although claims were especially economic and legislative, often people from the rally demanded, as a last solution, Vacaroiu Government demission, allowing the association of the protest movements with the political manipulations.[25]

Although the social dialogue has become a slogan of both parties, reality showed that the social dialogue was not really used by either part: the government accused the syndicates pressures and the syndicates leaders gave more importance to the methods based on force and less to negotiating methods (to do not forget that the high number of the syndicate members which could be involved in streets protest is still actual). In this context, requesting to the central trade unions to [23] Published in the Official Gazette no. 32 / 9th February 1991.

[24] Published in the Official Gazette no. 164 / 7th August 1991, at present repealed by Law no. 54/2003.

[25] For example, after the strike, PRM leaders accused the confederation representatives that they will create a "syndicate dictatorship", their political action being controlled from abroad constitute a dialogue parliamentary commission with syndicates at the Senate and Deputy Chamber level was not a success.

In the autumn of the same year, the protests began again, when the government did not respond affirmatively to the requests regarding the minimum base salary and the salaries indexation.

When, in December 1993, the political parties have filed a motion of censure against The Cabinet Vacaroiu, B.N.S. triggered an action for picketing the Parliament (probably, under Protocol signed cu CDR), while the meeting Chambers debated the motion.

The year 1994 was also characterized by trade unions protests (subway employees, Resita Steel Plant) and general strikes organized by three main trade confederations.

1997 – 2000 – A new approach of the social dialogue. The government installed at the final general elections in 1996 proposed an accelerate economic and political- social reforms; or, the new prime minister[26] new very well that he needed the support of the trade union organizations, which, although they didn't have the force of the 90thies (and were sufficiently rooted in the political space), needed to play the interface role between the governmental decision and the different categories of employees. Therefore, the concept of social dialogue had to be approached in a different way.

The Economic and Social Council was created [27] - a tripartite institution aiming the debates, the consulting and negotiations between the social partners to obtain approval of the legislation regarding the development and restructuring of the national economy, the privatization of the economic agents, work relationships, salary politics, social protection and health care, education and research, etc. The apparition of the Government Decision no. 89/1997 favored the tripartite dialogue in each county.

Health Insurance Fund passed in the administration of the National Health Insurance[28] designed as a tripartite body. The next year, the National Agency for Employment was created as an institution responsible for the tripartite administration of the unemployment fond for the implementation of passive and active measures for employment.

Although the tripartite institutions were created especially because the union organizations requested to (for example, the idea of C.E.S. was lanced in 1994), very soon after that the trade union organizations were overcome by the complexity of their attributions because they didn't have neither promotions strategies for the employees through this decentralized institutions nor experienced representatives.

The fact that a number of central trade union federations had signed cooperation agreements with the new political Power has not prevented them to punish the inobservance of the agreements settlements. When Ciorbea Government didn't took the social protection measures for the rapid privatization process, the social protest began again – strikes of employees from the steel field, mechanical engineering, education, health, research, post, electricity etc. In the same time, as an organization form, the union trade organizations renounce to organize protests in the Capital, adopting the method (less expensive and more convenient) of the simultaneous protests in different towns of the country (December 1998, March 1999, April1999, January 2000 etc.).

The Government accorded high attention to the mining sector restructuring, considered rightly "a sensitive area", both from economical and social point of view and imagological: the syndicates from din Valea Jiului and their leaders[29] were considered powerful organization from long time ago, and associated with the idea of brute force, social disorder, violence, material etc. So, the solution applied was aimed mainly to close the unprofitable mines and in parallel to accord various and consistent subventions and facilities in view to determine the Jiu Valey Trade Union League to not

[26] Mr Victor Ciorbea, ex syndicate leader, president of CNSLR, and of CNSLR-Frăția and afterwards of CSDR
[27] Bz Lwo no. 109/1997
[28] In base of The Health Social Insurance Low no 1455/1997
[29] Especiallz the president of Thea Minins sindycate League from Valea Jiului, Miron Cosma

open labor conflicts; all these without according high importance to the immediate and long term consequences (on the finance source for this restructuring).

From the economic reform point of view, the year 1998 signified the release of the process to restructuring the self governing management organizations – electric and thermal energy, transports, gas, railways etc. Or, this fact represents the touch of the „hard core" of the trade union organizations (the most compact structures, with a big number of members and with significant financial resources), leading to the immediate and widespread reaction of them. The division of the ancient RENEL, With all its negative consequences for the employees and for the population determined the syndicates members from the others self governing management organizations (especially from the natural gas field, the next target) to do all their best to attest the risks of such measures – repeated negotiations with the governors, arguments similar to those occurring in the restructuring process practiced in other countries, use of media channels to make their views known, picketing (the headquarters of ministries, parties or governments housing),[30] meetings, general strike threat, etc.

After the simultaneous protest from 10th December 1998, from Bucharest and Brasov, the executive proposed to the syndicate to sign a moratorium which, on medium term, has not produced the expected effects of any of the signatories. .

Next years were characterized by a series of protests either the federations or the confederation level (separately or commonly).[31] The protests regarded legislatives modifications (Pensions law, Professional risk assurance low etc.) institutional modifications (establishment of labor courts, the abolition of the State Property Fund), budget modification (consulting of confederations regarding the budget project elaboration the modification of the budget for year 1999 in order to allow the application of the table tickets law and the salary indexation law), fiscal modifications (reduce taxes), introduction of sanctions for those who use illegal work etc.

The fifth miners protest represented a new event which cast a "black light" on the trade union movement, confederation leaders detaching from the miners action, but not strong enough and not fast enough to separate the LSMVJ image and of its leader from other organizations.

Without being voided of protests, year 2000 (electoral year) lead to the repositioning of the rapports between the main union organizations and the political parties. The experience of the inefficient collaboration CDR and PD, the visible fragmentation of the old government coalition, the fragility of ApR and PSDR determined C.N.S.L.R. – Frăția, B.N.S., C.S.D.R., „Meridian" Confederation and their main federations to switch to PDSR (in fact, for the first confederation it was just a reaffirmation and a revitalization of the relationship with this political party). The pre-electoral agreements with the Social Democracy Party provided the introduction of some syndicate representatives on this party list, in order to constitute a social-democrat union pole in the Parliament.

2001 – 2004 –attempts of political implication. Year 2001 brings an innovation in the trade union politic – concluding the first Social Agreement between the syndicate, the body of employers and the Government, agreement containing clear and precise clauses, terms and responsibilities that obliges all signatory parties. The form of the partnership between the social partners is not a Romanian innovation, being practiced for a long time in various European countries, with results more or less notables. But the perception of the syndicate members on this collaboration is rather negative, given that the trade union organizations didn't knew to prepare the "explicative land" and were satisfied with the leader accept that was given in different meeting, national conferences or [30] At 22 of July 1998, the members of B.N.S. syndicate picketed the houses of The Democrat Party members, because at that time, Radu Berceanu was the Ministry of Industry and Commerce and Traian Băsescu the Transports ministry) congresses. The entry of some leaders of the syndicate in the Parliament and the accordance of some important executive functions for the ancient syndicate leaders in Nastase Cabinet, the Social Agreement is seen not as measure to find solutions for the employees' problems but as a measure to obtain some personal advantages for those in the echelons of union trader. The negative reaction of the members determined two confederations – „Cartel Alfa" and B.N.S. to do not sign a new Agreement for 2002, requesting separate negotiations and eventually to conclude another documents in other terms.

[31] Meetings, advertisement strikes and general strikes of the employees from construction machinery , transports (CFR, RATB and Subways, metallurgy, defense industry, health, research, education, wood industry , energy, gas, public officers etc.

The protest forms (meetings, strikes, picketing) didn't disappeared but they diminished as number and as intensity; they demonstrated, on one hand the employees diminishing trust in the syndicate capacity to resolve a series of problems, and on the other hand, the scission existing in the Romanian union trade movement (in March 2003, although they presented similar demands list and although they announced the same day to protest, C.N.S.L.R – Frăția meeting was separated from that organized by „Cartel Alfa" and B.N.S., at one hour and 1 km distance of each other, only just to demonstrate the identity difference between the union trade centrals).

The new syndicate law, adopted in 2003[32] brought a change that a lot of trade union organizations were unable to fructify: a trade union organization could constitute itself with minimum 15 persons from the same profession, even if they work for different employers. It would be a good opportunity to attire the employees from the small economic units and a first step in the trade union clotting movement.

The electoral year brought for the public opinion, an initiative of the trade union confederation that generated many for and against comments: the creation of a political party which sustain and promote, in the political decision plan, the interests and the legitimate aspirations of all Romanian workers. After a series of consultancy of the own syndicate members, The National Union Block, set up, at 21st February 2004, the National Democrat Block Party (PBND), which was considered as a political instrument necessary to realize reforms in a country which desires to become an authentic state of law governed, as the occidental states, by right, fair lows, which correspond to the aspirations of the majority of the Romanian people. In view to respond to the main critics regarding the new political party, BNS declared in many times that, the two organizations, even if they are support each other, they are independent, the decisions are taken independently, the confederation keeping his trade union identity, with specific objectives and features in order to achieve political aims. Following elections in 2004, five PBND representatives, have acquired the parliamentary standing, as a candidate on the list of The Greater Romanian Party, with which the BNS political party concluded a pre-electoral agreement. [33]

2005 – 2008 – the begin of the organizational restructuring. The elections from 2004 were gained by the PNL –PD coalition, which candidate as Alianța D.A. The designed Government under Prime Minister Tariceanu, announced in early 2005 the intention to modify the Labor Code, leading to a violent reaction of all the confederations. The proposals of the Labor, Social Solidarity and Family Ministry, most of them unfavorable for the employees, and the short terms (justified also by the real or not pressures of the International Monetary Fund motivate) for the negotiation, leaded to the meetings and protests common to the five trade union centrals, which had a very good and respected program.

The union trade confederation reaction represented a proof of their maturity and of their competent reaction capacity, in favor of the employee's interests that they represent. Negotiations with the Government representatives and those of the employer's body demonstrated the capacity of the syndicates to sustain their point of view with pertinent arguments in the economic, legislative, social field, with reference to the European Directives and Recommendations and to the compulsivity

[32] Low no. 54/2003 of trade unions, published in the Oficial Gazette of Romania no. 73 from 5th February 2003
[33] The Block National Democrat Party transformed, afterwards, in the Christian Social Union to harmonize the national legislation with community patrimony in social protection and employees' rights field.

In view to emphasis their position; the five union trade confederations initiated protests in all country: – meetings and picketing organized within a good, common and totally respected program.

For the first time after 1990, over 840 representatives of the affiliated union trade federations affiliated to the fourth confederations – BNS, CNSLR – Frăția, Cartel Alfa and C.S.D.R. – went, in March 2005, to Bruxelles to participate at the euro-meeting organized by The Labor European Confederation (CES) and the International Confederation of the Free Union Trade (CISL), affirming their affiliation to the international union trade structures, the total accord regarding their requests, and hoping to an aid, more than a formal one of the European trade union groups in favor of the Labor Code in force in Romania. These are considered the first steps in view to coagulate the Romanian union trade movement, but the next years demonstrated that, this desire is still impossible to accomplish.

2009 – present – looking for a new identity. Governments that have succeeded in the last three years haven't represented an easy period for the syndicates. Because of the financial crisis, the political power adopted legislative measures (most of them assuming the governmental responsibility) that affected significantly the force of the employees representative organizations.

Although, the syndicates complained permanently the absence of the social dialogue, the true is impossible to contest: they didn't have the force and the means to impose their own point of view.

The modifications of the Labor Code, the salary restrictions in the budget sector, the elimination of the national labor collective contract, the social dialogue low are examples of normative act which supposed a more rapid and efficient intervention of the trade union organizations, especially federative and confederative organizations.

The attempts to create a pressure through public manifestations such as strikes, meeting, marsh, etc were disturbed by the syndicate leader reticence regarding the efficiency of these methods. The difference between the syndicate leaders' declarations regarding the number of persons which will participate at such events and the reality inflamed the idea of the trade union incapacity to constitute a pressure force for the actual political power

Design and organizational change

The social and economic evolution imposed a new "lesson" for the trade union organizations: training and reorganization of their activity, identification of objectives according to the changes appeared in the Romanian society. Practically, the trade union organizations have been facing with some changes which they were not prepared for. For example:

The diminution of the number of members, phenomenon due, on the one hand, restructuring economic sectors, and on the other hand, limiting confidence of employees in the syndicate force to oppose salary modifications, loss of jobs, etc. The advantage offered by the legislation regarding the constitution of the union organizations was not used, so they remained without the human and material necessary force.

After 1989 there are not exactly statistics that presents the number of syndicate members and the organization structure on age, sex, professional level, residence area etc. These dates may be identifiable at the basic organizations level but there are doubts about their veracity.

At year 1991 level, the number of the syndicate members went beyond 5,2 millions, appropriate to a rate of syndication of approximately 90%. In 1995, the forth biggest union confederations declared over 4,5 millions of members: C.N.S.L.R. – Frăția 2,1 millions, „Cartel Alfa" 1,1 millions, B.N.S. 750 000 and C.S.D.R. 600.000. These numbers would correspond to a syndication level of over 76,8%; in reality the value was less if we take into account the number of members which were paying the fee. In year 2000, with ANOFM help, they tried to realize a census of the syndicate members but the results were not public. From the commentaries about this statistics, it seemed that the number of persons affiliated to an union organization didn't exceeded 1,5 millions.

Figura 1 - Degree of syndication in economic sectors

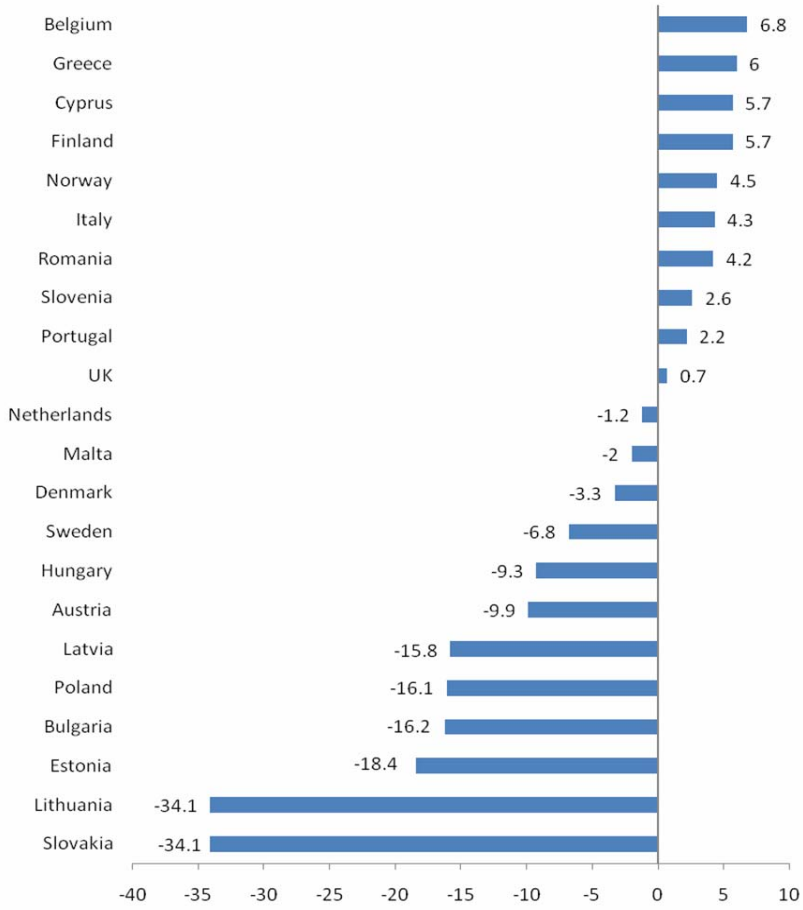
Source :  Promoting principles and fundamental writes of workers and consolidating of the trade unions from. (Bucharest: Tipografia Print Paper, 2002), page 25

Actually, the small degree of syndication is emphasized in areas where the transition to the market economy is more intense, and the private propriety gets a share increasingly higher.

At the same time, there are a series of other areas where the union activity is inexistent- the financial and banking one, the private insurance one, the informatics one. Generally, is difficult to syndicate persons that work in professional areas having a high remuneration degree and benefit by other non-financial advantages or those which work in the outside areas of spaces that require concentration of workers. In other situations, although it is not explicitly declared (because it represents a flagrant violation of Constitution), in the private sector there is a management practice of the foreign companies in Romania, which are doing all their best to avoid the constitution of trade organizations by their employees, although that in their own countries, this is a common practice, even a sine-qua-non condition.

Romanian situation from this point of view is not an exception, especially the ex socialist countries recording similar processes. An analyze of the number of union members evolution in European countries, in the period 2003 – 2008, shows that, there are countries where the number of syndicate members increases, but growth is between +0,7% and + 10%, while in countries where the number of members decreases, the percentage rage is greater: between – 1,2% and 34,1% (see figure 2). Romania record a percentage of 4,2%, but we have to take into account that these data refers to the period before the financial crisis.

Figura 2 - Percentage modifications of the number of trade union members in European countries, between 2003 - 2008



Source : European Foundation for the Improvement of Living and Working Conditions. "Trade union membership 2003 – 2008", (Dublin: Eurofound, 2009), page 10 [34]

The privatization of some fields, determined , for the first time, the union federations and confederations to negotiate the collective labor contracts with the representatives of the big transnational organizations (GDF Suez, EON, OMV etc.), facing with some tough negotiation phases comparing with the „negotiation with the state as employer". More than that, they became part of international syndicate structures (ex. European works committees), role that they had to appropriate themselves quickly and without major errors.

From this point of view, it starts to feel significant differences between the representative organizations of workers that have as social dialogue partner a private company and those that

[34] European Foundation for the Improvement of Living and Working Conditions. "Trade union membership 2003 - 2008" Accesat 20 februarie 2012
http://www.eurofound.europa.eu/eiro/studies/tn0904019s/tn0904019s.htm

represent their employees from the budget sectors. The firsts begin to feel a stronger need for restructuring the union activities and even the union organizations. From the need to cope with the private employer pressures, these organizations start to search for coagulation forms –, for example to constitute trade alliances between federations from similar activity fields. Syndicate leaders gradually discover that the activities they develop suppose not only vocation and charisma, but also a certain specialization - the activity of a syndicate leader tend to become a profession.

The negotiation process gets out gradually from the formal field (still present in the unions from the budget sector), a more detailed knowledge of the legislative, fiscal, taxes, etc problems being more and more necessary.

The need for support from the syndicate members from the basis organizations becomes again very important, so those from the management structures of the federations and confederation look for modalities to re-establish the communication channels with those from the hierarchy base. The syndicate leader starts to become, also, gradually a manager. .

The diminution of the financial and material resources is a reality that unions felt more and more intensely. The diminution of the numbers of members generates a proportional diminution of the shares, so the unions begin to focus toward other legal forms (provided also by the trade union low) to obtain the material and financial resources necessary for a proper functioning.

Legislative modifications, especially in the last three years, adopted mainly by the government responsibility assumption, without taking into account the objections, proposals or protest of the unions leaded to the idea that the union organization power diminished, which resulted in the increasing of the degree among public opinion

Corruption accusations against persons from the union organizations management, rightly few in number, have been skillfully exploited by the political power. Thus, the negative image transfer from the accused person to the entire union structure that this person was leading, led to a loss of public image of the entire trade union movement.

Conclusions

This study aims to become an argument in support of the idea that unions are social actors who can be appreciated as equilibrium factor or, contrarily, as an element of disturbance of the normal labor market and, implicitly, of all society, but they can not be ignored.

One of the European industrial relationships "rule" is that the social partners, respectively the body of employers and trade unions, are note simply lobby organizations or pressure groups which do all their best to achieve their specific representation objectives. Their mission includes, besides traditional goals, a responsibility for the public welfare, playing a very important role in functioning and structuring of the labor market as well as in the social security system.

National and international legislation confers to the trade union organizations a series of rights that have as effect the direct and the indirect intervention on the labor market. They have the right to negotiate and to conclude labor collective contracts, to intervene in the normative activity at national level, having a consultative role, to pronounce on the employer's programs that involves collective redundancies, to defend the interests of their members, interests arising from the low and from the collective labor agreements, before courts and other public and state bodies, by their own or chosen defenders etc.

The functioning mechanism of the union organizations (and body of employers) and the social, economic and political impact represents, a subject of interest to the sociological research and beyond.

In the future studies, the role of the union organizations could be analyzed in some coordinates: the corrective coordinate, the pressure coordinate, the consultative coordinate and the partnership coordinate.

The corrective role is realized especially through the quality of the trade union organizations to negotiate the collective labor agreements, starting from the national level to the unit level.

On certain segments of the labor market, labor owners don't negotiate any more individually their salary and the other conditions of employment, syndicates do it for them. This situation presents a series of advantages for the employee, the union organization becoming a "unique voice", a compact force which may be imposed in the relation capital possessors – labor possessors. Thus, the inconveniences coming from the dispersed employees against employers are limited. In turn, the employers respond with similar organization form, such as the meeting between labor market demand and labor market supply can take new, distinct issues.

The corrective role of the unions function closely linked to the pressure one. In terms of visible differences between different industries, closely linked to the number of members, to the financial and material force, to the quality and preparedness of the leaders, to their relationship with the employees, the union organizations are capable to exercise significant pressures to obtain, on short, medium or long term the rights that they consider favorable for the members they represent. Pressure instruments are distinct, from the legal protest forms to the lobby practiced by the unions, especially at federative and confederative level besides the state institutes and a closer relationship with the political factor. Not infrequently, the effects of these pressures proved to be on short term favorable to the employees, but negative on medium and long term, not only for the unit or the unit group in cause, but also for entire branches or even at the national economy level.

Logically, the main reasons for exercising some forms of pressure from union organizations are related to: salary problems: - setting salary scales, indexation and compensation denial, asking for salary rights, not according holyday bonus, not according restaurant coupons; modifications in organizational structures, collective labor agreements negotiation, refusal of the collective negotiations etc.; not detaining the conditions for developing the union activities, the immixing of the employers body in the union activities development, the lack of transparency, the non-compliance of the collective agreements negotiate at a higher level; the lack of social protection measures at the economic agent level, founds for social actions, compensatory payments, aids, etc etc.; work conditions; time work.

The most visible (and the most obvious) manifestations of the syndicate pressure are the meetings, the marshes, the strikes, and the obsessive information of the public about these manifestations, leaded in time, to the simplistic and exclusivist association with the list of demands more or less exaggerated, presented to the authorities or imposed by force by force and by social. The trade union major objective tend to demonstrate that the pressure exercised by them may have various forms, not necessary violent forms or instigation forms, this pressure aim is to ameliorate the economic, social, professional, cultural etc, problems.

The consultative and partnership role of the syndicates is emphasized especially in situations where they are placed to represent employees interests in a number of advisory bodies, bipartite or tripartite, created in order to have an institutional framework in which the social partners express their points of view regarding the legislative measures, the strategies and programs that aim economic and social fields. Institutions with tripartite administration were set up; these institutions give the possibility to the syndicates to participate directly to the management of essential sectors of the society– training and employment, pensions and other social insurance etc.

In Romania, for the year 2012, we can say that, there is legislative framework governing the organization and the functioning of institutions and social dialogue structures– it remains to achieve the most difficult thing: to become a functional one.

The social dialogue between the union trade organizations, the body of employers and the government represents a difficult social exercise, given the multiplicity and the complexity of each party interest. To be functional, it must be based on equality, strength, and openness of each partner, otherwise it remains a formality, "a mimed ritual", without real effects in the socio-economical plan.

As long as the social partners from Romania will not perceive in this way the role that they have in different social dialogue institutions, the constructive consensus and the social peace climate are simply illusions. And last, but not least, the good functioning of the social dialogue represents one of the principle criteria for Romania to integrates in the European Union.

References

- Anghelache, Constantin. Romania 2010. Economic status under the crisis . Bucharest: Editura Economică, 2010
- Avram, Eugen, Cooper, Carry, L. (coord.), Organizational-managerial psychology, Iaşi: Polirom, 2008
- Bauman, Zygmunt. Globalization and its social effects . Oradea: Antet, 1999
- De Beer, Paul. The impact of the crisis on earnings and income distribution in the EU. Working Paper, Brussels. ETUI, 2012
- Betcherman, Gordon. „Globalization, Labour Markets and Public Policy". In States Against Markets. The Limits of Globalization, editat de Boyer Robert si Drache Daniel, (London, Routledge), 1996
- Briscoe, Dennis, Nacamulli, Raoul and Rothman, Miriam. Industrial Relations Around the World: Labor Relations for Multinational Companies. New York: Gruyter, 1993
- Buzărnescu, Stefan. Introduction in the organizational and management sociology. Bucharest: Editura Didactică şi Pedagogică, 1995
- Cambier, Hubert. Syndicate ABC . Bruxelles: CISL, 1996
- Casale, Giuseppe. Tripartism and Industrial Relations in Selected Central and Eastern European Countries, Budapesta: ILO, 1998
- Dobrescu, Paul. Globalization astuteness . Assault on the american power . Iaşi: Institutul European, 2010
- Fajertag, Giuseppe, Pochet, Philippe. Social Pacts in Europe – New Dinamics. Brussels: European Trade Union Institute (ETUI) & Observatoire Social Europeen (OSE), 2000
- Kideckel, David, A. Postsocialist Romania. Work, body and working class. trad. de Oerban Vaetisi. Iaşi: Polirom, 2010
- Kowalsky, Wolfgang. Focus on European Social Policy. Countering Europessimism. Brussels: ETUI Printshop, 2000
- Lafaye, Claudette. Organizations sociology. trad. de Mihaela Zoicaş, Elisabeta Stănciulescu. Iaşi: Polirom, 1998
- Neagu, Cibela, Udrescu, MirceaOrganization Management. Bucharest: Tritonic, 2008
- Nicolescu, Ovidiu, Verboncu, Ion. The organization management fundaments, Bucharest, Editura Universitară, 2008
- Popescu, Andrei, Dţţu, Mircea. International Organization Conventions of work ratified by Romania, Bucharest: Editura R.A. Monitorul Oficial, 1997
- Simon, Ilie. The employee civilization, Bucharest: Editura Eficient, 1997
- Ştefănescu, Ion, Traian. Labor work. Bucharest: Lumina Lex, 2000
- Vlăsceanu, Mihaela. Organizatios and organizational behavior. Iaşi: Polirom, 2003
- Waddington, Jeremy, Hoffmann, Reiner. Trade Unions in Europe, Facing Challenges and Searching for Solutions, Brussels: European Trade Union Institute, 2000

HOOLIGANISM – CONTEMPORARY SOCIAL PHENOMENON

MARIA LULESCU [*]

Abstract
The proposed scientific theme is going to approach and study the hooliganism phenomenon as a contemporary social matter, in terms of conceptual and etiological.
The present work has four main purposes:
(1)- that of explaining the meaning of hooliganism social phenomenon;
(2)- that of discovering the origins of hooliganism;
(3)- that of knowing which are the causes that encourages the occurence of the hooliganism;
(4)- that of knowing how to control and minimize this phenomenon.

Keywords: Hooliganism ,Violence in sport, Hooligans, Supporters, Crowd's Psichology.

Introduction

More often we have encountered in mass media the term of hooliganism or hooligan. This should determine us to question somehow this phenomenon, being rather new for Romanian society, but rapidly growing. Thus, in the frame of this project we are going to analyze the hooliganism meaning, its roots, the causes which determine its manifestations in contemporary society and which are possible prevention and control methods. This can be attained focusing especially on London sport teams, but secondary we are going to study the hooliganism which has started to turn up in Romania as well.

What does hooliganism mean?

According to the Explanatory Romanian Dictionary, hooliganism implies grossly encroaches upon all the behavioral norms. Also the definition includes public order and moral disturbance through behavior showing lack of respect and decency regarding social interaction/brutal behavior or attitude which are manifested by overstepping the other citizens' rights and liberties, through aggression, dangerous and harmful behavior. [1]

There is no definition of hooliganism related to football. This term has been introduced by mass media, and lately, this label has been applied to more and more often violent incidents where supporters have been involved. According to majority of researchers, hooliganism in football is associated to any violent manifestation when supporters are implied.

Representing a collective form of violent behavior in sport, hooliganism should be understood better by a thorough knowledge of collective conduct and the group categories present in contemporary society.

Collective behavior implies a certain type of emergent action (spontaneous and guided by norms created by participants) and disregarding institutional norms (ruled by other norms, most of the time different from those socially accepted). Among its characteristics we can mention: the purpose, the participants degree of organization and its duration. The aims of these actions might be explicit (externalizing participants feelings) or instrumental (achieving some rights or advantages). Regarding the degree of organization of the participants manifesting this type of behavior, a distinction is made between non-organized collective conduct (spontaneous, without an appointed leader) and those highly organized (having an action program and an official leader). Between these two extremes there is intermediary collective conduct.

---

[*] Assistant Lecturer, Ph. D. canditate, „Nicolae Titulescu" University, Bucharest
[1] www.dexonline.ro

Their duration is also variable; some may last a few hours, as is the case of some events, other may last a few days, weeks or more (racial tensions or social movements).[2]

In order to establish which group categories are, it is very important to know and define what a group is. Thus, a group/crowd/mass is a temporary gathering of people, in a close assembly, either by chance or after an agreement, driven by a common interest or objective. Having common interests, similar objectives, implying some people presence at the same place and time, does not represent enough conditions to create connections, relationships for a structure. Sociologically, the notion of crowd covers a variety of gathering forms, defined by lack of homogeneity, cohesion and organization, emotional response to situations in which it is involved in. There is a fortuitous crowd, defined by a reduced degree of emotional and organizational interaction, gathered by chance and whose existence is in fact momentary. People found in this crowd have in common a momentary aim. Examples of this type include: a crowd waiting at a bus station or in front of a theater booking office.

The crowd whose behavior is conducted by mediating some ruled expectations of traditional or contractual models is a conventional one. The crowd which has no clear defined objective, but reaches a collective behavior as a result of mutual stimulation of effects, is an expressive crowd. For example a dancing, mourning or joyful crowd.

The range of reactions which might define a crowd lay from ecstasy to destructive aggression, including nervousness, anxiety, panic. According to the efficiency of social control and the stress created by dysfunctional or by a state of no moral principles in a situation, the crowd might be passive or active. Crowd sociology studies social and cultural conditions of behavior inside a gathering, the link between reactions frequency and their amplitude and the type of political, economic and social organization; factors and ascendancy which contribute to pass from non-defined group, having mostly a chaotic action, to a structured collectivity; the action of social mechanisms used to manipulate and the predominance of a psychological profile in a determined form of social organization.[3]

However, two main categories of incidents might be labeled as 'hooliganism':

a) Spontaneous incidents, most of the time minor, produced by supporters on stadiums or nearby (the type of incidents which take place, for example, in most cases in United Kingdom, when a team plays 'away'.

b) Premeditated violent actions, when usually there are implied organized gangs (or crews) gathering sport clubs fans. The incidents sometimes take place far away from the stadium and long time after the match was played.

The origins of hooliganism

Hooliganism is an often manifested phenomenon nowadays. It started around 60s-70s in United Kingdom, where it is supposed that football originated. Hooliganism is manifested by public order disturbance, especially by football fans, usually supporting rival teams.

Rivalries on the pitch usually generate even bigger rivalries outside, where the club's fans gather to fight. This is, without any doubt, a brutal attitude, maybe a manifestation of frustrated people, which unfortunately, has appeared in Romania too. Dougie Brimson relates in his book, Barmy Army, that he has known doctors, lawyers, businessmen, taxi drivers, journalists and even policemen who are hooligans.

Thus, it does not matter what they do for a living. The hooligans have a sort of double life, becoming totally different when they gather to support their favorite team. They gather before any match, establish their territories, routes and make plans so that everything to go according to their plan.[4.]

---

[2] http://www.dictsociologie.netfirms.com/Termeni.htm

[3] Idem

[4] http://ultras.sportlocal.ro/eseu-despre-huliganism.html

Dougie Brimson considers that through hooliganism someone might detaches from all the problems he or she has and might throw all his or her frustrations in brawls against rival gangs. Thus everything in this respect become a sort of fashion. Gangs even have names, meetings and history.

For example, The Headhunters, the hooligans from the Chelsea football club, are one of the oldest and best known from British and international football. Their most important opponents are Milwall, West Ham and Tottenham fans. [5]

Hooliganism in United Kingdom is like drink-driving. Some of them either have practiced or know someone who has done it, but do not take any measure to stop this sort of behavior. It is the same with hooliganism. If someone is caught it is not assumed that he or she is an offender, but just had bad luck.

Moreover they do not consider their behavior an offense. Actually, hooliganism is nothing else but an offense much more serious than drink-driving.

Anytime this sort of behavior might have dreadful consequences for those implied in such situations, and they are aware of the consequences and make everything for a flawless action. Once being part of such gangs, their life is no more secure.

Motivation for their behavior cannot be easily established. For them, a T-shirt having their logo's team does not represent anything more than the blood on the face of person in front of them. Everything is a game for them.

And most of all is the fact that in a game like this someone might die in the arms of his opponent. This means that they do not want to stop. If a gang is brutally beaten by another, it will not go to complain to police, but will take revenge next time.

Hooliganism is called 'British Disease'. Unfortunately, this devastating phenomenon has spread across Romania and we can notice that among hooligans there are mostly uneducated people, who have no connection with football and have no idea about the legalities. One of the reasons they assault most of the time innocent people, reaching almost deadly aggression, is the fact that they want be noticed and to get the others attention. For a while, we have not recorded a big number of casualties implying criminality, but we are not far away from the United Kingdom.

There is a big difference between a supporter and a hooligan. A supporter is the person who comes to see a match, buys a ticket and has a favorite team, wears the clothes colors and symbols of his favorite team, encouraging it; a hooligan is a braggart, with a great inclination to violence, who comes at the stadium without knowing anything about the event, having rebellious thoughts, which are then transformed in violent deeds, sometimes fatal.

As we have previously mentioned 'hooliganism' phenomenon was referred for the first time by the end of 60's in United Kingdom, reaching a peak in 70's and 80's. Football violence on stadiums could be traced back in time since XIX; for example, in 1880 in Derby, when following a match an emergency state was set up and two horseback squads were called to intervene and face the unruly crowd. Invading a pitch by spectators has become a common practice after 1880, but this type of action cannot be analyzed due to the lack of proof. It cannot be precisely stated if this type of phenomenon emerged in 70's -80's or simply it has become more mediated and obviously exaggerated. For example, after a careful analysis of incidents during Sweden - England match (September 1989) it became clear that media coverage of the disorders was exaggerated and irresponsible. A calm period followed after the very violent incidents on Heysel stadium (39 casualties) and Hillsborough (96 casualties).

Recently in England, hooliganism phenomenon has decreased as a result of measurements taken according to Taylor's report in 1900. Safety measurements, such as numbered sits, and especially video surveillance have contributed to a substantially decreasing of the number of incidents inside the stadiums (especially in Premiership). More than that, the number of arrests for offenses associated to football matches has been greatly diminished after the end of 80s, this happening while the number of spectators has been continuously increasing. However, this does not mean that the hooligan action number or gravity has been reduced. Many football-related violent manifestations have 'moved' outside the stadiums, with the opportunity to become more extreme.

[5] Http://sadak.ro/2009/02/huliganismul

The fact that destructive incidents take place now on different areas means that they are less reported to police and the possibility to keep them under control, restraints or arrests are more diminished.

As we have mentioned from the beginning, there are two types of incidents labeled as 'hooliganism'. First, the spontaneous ones, have a low violence level, and take place around stadiums and, usually, when British teams go abroad. These types of incidents are rarely encountered on the British island considering the great number of spectators who attend matches in England.. However, when abroad, British fans have been often involved in violent actions (Marseille 1998, Charleroy 2000, Slovakia 2002, Albufeira 2004, Stuttgart and Koln 2006, Rome 1997,2007). Most of the time media coverage of these incidents presents British fans mostly as victims of local supporters and seldom as aggressors. Usually the media states that the main causes of these incidents is the fact that hooligans take part to these official trips having clear intention to fight and they succeed to involve the other spectators in incidents, usually under alcohol influence.. However, analyzing the incidents during 1990 - 2007, published under the title "Dealing with English Disease" (2007 Pennant Book) this statement is questioned, considering external factors, such as: police attitude and intervention, provocation and so on. The second category includes incidents emerged from hooligan groups from United Kingdom. Internally, this is continuing to be a major problem, most of the clubs having"dangerous" fan groups. British police is always preoccupied by the problem represented by rival groups, always looking for confrontations, this in conditions, as it was mentioned earlier, the 'fighting area' is more and more difficult to be surveyed in the new conditions.

3. Cause of hooligan behavior

In order to answer this question we have to look into collective behavior. This shows how people change their behavior when they are in a crowd. Collective behavior is a type of spontaneous behavior, guided by fortuitous norms, sometimes diverging from those generally accepted, generated by the participants in a given situation[6]. This is a wide area of research which studies the collective behavior response in various circumstances and difficult situations. From one point of view this might mean a study of coordinated and organized social movements; on the other side, it defines apparently spontaneous emergence of a common behavior[7].

Throughout history, many social psychologists have been interested by this subject and have discussed it in their papers. Among the firsts who have been preoccupied to study mass psychology have been Gabriel Tarde and Scipio Sighele (The Crowd Criminal), but they have studied the problem only from criminality point of view[8]. The first who defined a mass was Gustave Le Bon in his paper about mass: 'Mass Psychology'. He defines mass as a gathering of people, no matter their nationality, profession or sex and led by an event which made them to be together. However, is not enough that a number of persons to be at the same place in the same time; in order to become a mass they need to have a common purpose[9]. He has suggested that all individual reactions are lost in the crowd and a so called 'collective soul' emerges, which make them feel, think and react in a totally different way that they would feel, think and act if they were alone. Mass are formed due to

[6] Septimiu Chelcea, 2008,p.81
[7] Norman Goodman,1992, p. 426
[8] Gustave Le Bon, 1985, p. 7
[9] Idem 4, p. 9

anonymity (which allow diminished personal responsibility) contagiously (ideas rapidly rumored in the group) and through suggestibility[10].

Vierkandt (1928, p. 42) defines a mass as polar opposite of individual. It engulfs elites, aristocrats, intellectuals and so on. Mass could contain anyone, once people are together.

Many detailed studies regarding mass riots, crowds and similar collective disturbances, among them belonging to Gabriel Tarde and Sigmund Freud, develop the mental contagiousness hypothesis already stated by Gustave Le Bon.

A sociological approach of the collective behavior is present in the scheme of added value by Neil Smesler (Theory of collective behavior, 1963); also R. H. Turner and L. M. Killian have been preoccupied by this theme (Collective behavior, 1957). Turner supported the idea that norms have the most important role in a mass. In this there is an under-group where the norms emerge from, which are then internalized by the remaining members, thus their actions are justified through framing in those norms[11].

Moreover, in the great Max Weber sociologist papers we find a mass definition: a mass is a group of people situated at the external side of an establishment who takes a certain attitude towards it in a crisis situation. It derives from a temporary dissolution of communities and masses. A mass, in a social system, is considered a lack of system, a gap and finally, more as a collectivity attitude than a social one[12].

The French psycho-sociologist, Romanian born, must be quoted too: Serge Moscovici with his paper 'The Masses Epoch' where he stated that a crowd is a social animal which has broken its leash, a group of people in continuous turmoil and agitation. It is also an unforgivable and blind force, able to remove any obstacle, to sway mountains or destroy age worth work[13].

Another definition belongs to Norman Goodman: the most important and dramatic form of collective behavior, a temporary and unorganized gathering of people very close to each other, possessing a common center[14].

We are quoting Anthony Giddens definition too: a crowd is that numerous gathering of people who interact with each other in a public space (a part of urban daily life)[15].

Last but not least, A. P. Nazaretean's definition: a crowd is a gathering of persons who are not united by common aims, a unique structure regarding organization and decision, but are connected through common center of attention and the same emotional state[16].

The characteristic psychological process of masses is the lack of individuality. This is a state defined through diminished self-evaluation activity and evaluation fear. The lack of individuality gives way to anti-normative and uninhibited attitudes[17]. It appears mostly as a consequence of inability to identify the participants.

Bhumer (1969) identified four types of masses. The category which we are studying is the most active and is included in the contestant type. In this type of gathering a uniformity of reactions takes place (The law of action uniformity). Members of a group have a safety feeling inside the mass. Masses, as Gustave Le Bon states are impulsive, versatile and irritable. Other way said, masses can suddenly change their state, emotion, to something totally opposite, without a pertinent explanation, and considering their impulsiveness we can explain their deeply irascible reaction.

---

[10] Oxford, Dictionary of Sociology
[11] www.gioconda.ro
[12] Serge Moscovici in Adrian Neculau, 1996, p. 400 (Weber 1949, p. 369)
[13] Serge Moscovici, 2001, p. 11
[14] Norman Goodman, 1992, . 427
[15] Anthony Giddens, 2000, p. 23
[16] A. P. Nazaretean, 2006, p. 23
[17] Postmers and Spers apud Stefan Boncu, 1999

There are also theories which explain mass dynamics. Among them, we are going to mention the following:

3.1. Contagion theories[18]

Initially stated by Le Bon, contagion theories explain mass behavior as a result of a collective soul, individual identity is lost due to contagious spread of situational generated emotions. Under anonymity and momentary emotions, people transfer opinions and responsibility to the collectivity. The crowd has its own life, no matter attendee personalities or existent social norms.

This sociology-psychological perspective was amplified by Bhemer (1951) who supports the idea that emotional states a crowd is going through are a result of people around. These emotions are accepted without an attentive selection and spread around emerging emotional level and focusing attention toward a common target.

3.2. Convergence theories[19]

In a psychological approach, convergence theories explain crowd behavior as an action of some like-minded people having the same emotional and mind state, driven into a situation and then commonly acting due to some similitude in their personalities. The first convergence theoreticians advocate that a crowd releases primary emotional impulses from social restriction which have controlled them so far. Others (Allport 1924) support the idea that the social shallowness more than contamination is the major trigger in a crowd behavior.

3.3. Emergent norm theory[20]

Turner and Killian do not think that crowds are irrational gathering of people, driven by spontaneous emotions or predispositions. Their point of view is that a crowd behavior and action can be explained by those social norms which appear through collective interaction during a collective event. This explanation is named emergent theory norm. Turner emphases that careful studies on different types of crowds show that the participants are not sincere, they are considerably different in respect to their reasons, attitude and behavior and in their involvement in a certain event as well.

3.4. Mass psychology

Firstly, a crowd represents a gathering of people which is characterized by new features, different for each individual. An organized crowd is characterized by lack of conscientious personality and its feeling and thoughts are driven to the same direction. Thus, thousands of people, under some sort of strong emotional state, for example a national or international sport event, might get the features of a psychological mass.

This theory has its origins in the paper "Mass psychology" belonging to Gustave Le Bon, and studies mass from psychological point of view.

The theory of mass psychology approaches the most encountered feelings in a mass, and the consequences of this type of collective sense[21].

Impulsion a very often encountered feeling in a mass, because almost entirely driven by subconsciousness, a person reaches the point where he or she acts randomly according to instigation. Mass impulsion is a result of external spurs. If alone, a person is able to control his or her reactions, but a mass has no such ability.

Versatility is another characteristic feeling. Masses are extremely versatile. There are numerous examples, such as mentioned before, during and after a sport event, when crowds go from

[18] Norman Goodman, 1992, p.428

[19] ibidem

[20] ibidem

[21] Gustave Le Bon, Mass Psychology, Scientific Edition, 1991, p. 23,

a state of bloody ferocity to a heroic one, in the case their team is the winner. Found under momentary instigation, crowds might go through a whole range of most contradictory feelings.

Irritability is a feeling generated by the number of people in a crowd. A feeling of undefeated power is transmitted to anyone in the crowd and an individual losses the notion of impossibility and most of the time this feeling of irresistible power drives to violent actions.

Intolerance is represented by feelings that make a crowd not to accept any contradictions, which determine a fast change from a positive state to a negative one. An example could be a public gathering where the smallest contradiction risen by a speaker is immediately received with furious shouts and violent reactions, sometimes requiring public authorities interventions in order to prevent speaker's lynching. It was noted that besides intolerance, it is present more evident authoritarianism, especially for Latin crowds compared to the Anglo-Saxon ones, where the individual feeling is predominant[22].

Suggestibility is another state very present in crowd. A crowd is many times in a state of favorable expectation for certain suggestions. First suggestion is immediately adopted through a contagious process, then the idea tends to become action, everything depending of the nature of excitement.

Credulousness is also an exaggerate feeling present in a crowd, as improbability is not acceptable for a mass. The simplest event lived by a crowd can easily become distorted. A crowd things through images and a exhibited image, display itself any other images without any connection with the first one. Collective observations are the most erroneous of all and represent a person's bare illusion, who through contagion influences the others[23].

4. Methods to struggle against hooliganism

Can hooliganism be stopped?

There is little probability, that sometimes violence to be eradicated from sport. Anytime, when large crowds of people, mostly men, sometimes under alcohol influence meet, there are potential reasons for conflicts, either a football match is or not involved. Throughout time, many methods have been tested to keep under control hooliganism, including tough sentences, legal actions or actions involving police crews (Football Intelligence Unit). In the, so called, peak period of hooliganism, ('70s – '80s) many governments adopted drastic measurements which proved a limited understanding of hooliganism problem. Most of the measurements worsened the problems, creating more and more tense relationships between fans and police. The only 'positive' outcome was 'driving away' violence out of stadiums. The action has reached its peak with ID plan (a way of identifying supporters based on cards) described by Lord Justice by a simile "using a sledgehammer to break a nut". The method was canceled after the disaster on the Hillsbourgh. Other attempts to prevent hooligan actions have included very severe laws as 'Football Act 2000' endorsed in order to stop those suspected to be hooligans to travel and take part as supporters at matches held abroad. These kinds of measurements have had a negative effect upon ordinary supporters. More than that, even the utility of interdiction (Banning orders), which was obviously had the purpose to reduce the number of violent incidences where British supporters were involved, was questionable because most of the time the people implied were recognized hooligans. However, it must be emphasized that violence on British stadiums has been greatly diminished compared with last decades, stadiums being today safer places than a city central area on a Saturday evening.

In my view, in order to prevent the phenomenon, we should start to educate our offspring from early childhood. If the youths were appropriately educated, focusing on damages this phenomenon can produce, everything would finish at some point in the future. The number of hooligans would gradually decrease and young generation would reject this type of attitude and they would be protected by such a virus. Fewer and fewer would follow these types of groups, and the hooligan groups would be diminished, and would not produce the same effects we can see nowadays. The problem cannot be resolved like a mathematical one, on the spot, or using an equation. All legal and coercive methods that public order possesses must be used.

[22] Gustave Le Bon, Mass Psychology, Scientific Edition, 1991, p. 34-35,
[23] Gustave Le Bon, Mass Psychology, Scientific Edition, 1991, p. 25,

The importance of education has been brought to attention because, generally, the lack of proper education represents the most important factor that generates violence on stadiums.

The main and most important elements in human personality formation are settled in childhood when he or she is educated and prepared for life. Besides family, school plays an important part in education, preparing an individual for real life, helping people to define their personality and properly react in society. Teachers are those who should try to offer their students the necessary knowledge, so that they would be able to choose the best way, as coaches train sportsmen for great performances.

We can ask ourselves why those children who have practiced sport since early childhood, even sport performers have a strong personality and healthy life principles. A realist answer would imply that these people have been educated in the light of fair competition.

Sport implies ambition, physical fight and physical strength, tenacity and success, optimism and health, as quoted in Latin saying "Mens sana in corpore sano", (Healthy mind in a healthy body). Any sportsman and sportswoman is able to receive the victory and defeat as well.

Unfortunately, teachers have no more authority over their students. Recently media have been presenting more and more often cases involving students bullying teachers during classes. It seems that in Romania violence appears since secondary school. Physical education classes have been transformed to social education classes.

Thus the lack of physical education generates the absence of team spirit, organization, initiative, determination, ambition, perseverance, punctuality; selflessness has been replaced by selfishness and individuality.

Physical education envisages a harmonious development of the whole body and soul, strengthens health and harnesses physical qualities (Cretu, 1999, Jinga&Istrate, 1998).

This is the first 'type of education' which greatly influences the whole, body and mind. Physical education affects biological side of human being and its social part as well.

This influences human being at any age and answer to double needs:

Individual

Social

Health state of the human body

Its normal development

Lengthen life span

Biologic health is one of the essential values which merges with nature and human mental health in the value system of a society. Through this double necessity, physical education and sport is hereditary and ambiance conditioned.

Conclusions

Contemporary societies evolution emphasizes the fact that despite the increasing number of methods and specialized institution interventions in controlling criminality and offenses, in many countries there is an obvious recrudescence and increasing number of violent and aggressive offenses even in economical areas, banking and finance, such as fraud, blackmail, bribery and corruption. Violence, however, is not a new phenomenon, its appearance and evolution being closely linked to people, groups, organizations and even human society evolution. This is one of the reasons some researchers and specialists believe that violence is a permanent human feature, close connected to human essence and society development.

To sum up, hooliganism represents a contemporary type of violence in sport, but we cannot evaluate this phenomenon in a pure form. Most of the time hooliganism is present through primary physical violence which degenerates into conflicting, collective, community violence which is even more difficult to combat.

References

- Canetti, Elias, The masses and the Power, Bucharest, Publisher Nemira, 2000
- Chelcea, Septimiu, coordinator, Psycho-sociology: Theories, researches, applications, Bucharest, Publisher Polirom, 2008
- Chelcea, Septimiu, Quality and Quantity Research Methods and Techniques, Bucharest, Publisher Economică, 2004
- Giddens, Anthony, Sociology, Bucharest, Publisher All, 2000
- Goodman, Norman, Introduction in Sociology, Bucharest, Publisher Lider, 1992
- Le Bon, Gustave, Masses Psychology, Filipeşti de Târg – Prahova, Publisher Antet XX Press, 1895
- Moscovici, Serge*, The Masses Epoch*, Iaşi, Publisher European Institute, 2001
- Dictionary of Sociology, Oxford, Bucharest, Publisher Encyclopedic Universe,2003
- www.dexonline.ro

A SOCIETY OF THE POSTABUNDANCE, FROM THE CONSUMPTION'S REDUCTION TO THE GROWTH OF THE SPIRITU AL SATISFACTION

MIRELA CRISTIANA NILĂ STRATONE[1]

Abstract:
One close-up view of the consumption reduction on global scales involves beyond the economy reasons analysis, a analysis of the causes and sociological effects of this phenomenon too, in view of the invitation of some concrete and general directions of the necessary at his real value. In view to the reach of the proposed aim there have been followed as aims:
the presentation of some initiatives already in existence but inadequate to the definition of spiritual and material needs;
the prominence of the needs of the individuals to preponderant reinvest in the spiritual needs satisfaction and in the material satisfaction restriction at the basic needs;
the promotion of the mainstream of the consumption reduction;
the redefinition of the simplicity in combination with the markers which are substituting symbolical the opulence. The aim of this paper consist in the testing to sustain the move centred on the so-called voluntary simplicity, in the view of the global society reorientation to the abnegation of the material accretion to the benefit of the environment conservation on a side, and on the other side in the view of the spiritual life enrichment of the individuals, which will get on a form of a post abundance society.

Keywords: the society of the post abundance, the reevaluation of the material needs, the voluntary simplicity, the radical simplicity, the reduction of the engines

Introduction:

The problems approached in this study inscribe in the paradigm of the crowd consumption and they are centred on the reduction idea.

The unprecendented level where has the consumption reached reclaims the search of some clue alternatives of environment psychological, sociological problems, which this has generated in a straight way.

The themes presented here aim two main purposes:

The first purpose aims the description of the major cultural agent of voluntary simplicity and his action in a differenced way and namely:

- the reduction of the "consumption engines" by the voluntary abnegation in a gradual and selective way of the unnecessary consumption;

- the radical simplifiers which are reducing the consumption more powerful then the first ones, chosing the work and the big incomes abnegation in behalf of the free time and of the incomes sizeable smaller, but enough for a confortable living;

- the holistic simplifiers, the most decided which are drastic reducing any consumption, without selection, reaching extreme manifestations, convinced that they are acting to live spiritually better and promoting the anticonsumption.

The second aim proposed refers to the explication of the need to create a new current in the social culture, that one of the society valued cultural from simplicity and the any kind abuse abnegation, a society of the post abundance.

[1] Senior Lecturer Ph. D., "Nicolae Titulescu" University, Bucharest (email: mrl_cristiana@yahoo.com)

The concern of the proposed study is reflected in the description of the main ways of chosing in a voluntary manner of a simplified lifestyle, to reach a certain freedom kind, gradual from case to case.

This aspect is marked out by the briefly review of the socio-psychological implications broken out by the chosing of the prosperity abnegation obviously in a smaller or bigger size, after the section where are the volunteers inscribed.

In the speciality literature are already studies and opinions regarding to the future of the voluntary simplicity. The consequences on social plan regarding the detached attitude from the adhesion to a lifestyle which is reducing the consumption and reorientates to the strict necessary, sometimes also this reevaluated, reconsidered, are very important for the environment and the social justice.

Related to the speciality researches, I have here presented only the main steps, which have been initiate to reach a lifestyle released by the overflow and ready to assimilate more in spiritual plan.

Content:

In the fight for a better life from qualitive viewpoint, the friendly atitude visage of the environment and a certain social economy equality in which the poor persons to receive from the rich persons the surplus to content their base needs, all in a voluntary mood, it is constituting like a new force in the creation of a new society of the voluntary simplicity.

The voluntary simplicity is constituting the core, the key, in the transition to a simple life, in which is making, is spending and is consuming less, but is living better.

The voluntary simplicity is going anti the ostentative consume and not anti the base consume. Therefore, she has adepts in the developed countries and not in the thirth world's countries.

With all, for the growing of the life's quality is welcomed the force of the postabundence society, which tryes to convince the persons that the reconsider of the life's mood by the diminution of the ostentative consume lead to a really freedom.

A certain society of the postabundence haven't constituted yet, but we can talk about this concept in the context of the future, even already there are pre-requistes of his constitution.

In the Roumania of the 2005 year, it's improper to talk about abundance, because the social phenomenon which rules "the welfare" it is named by the poverty and he is in a continous rising.

But how the model is whished to be assumed in the most of the occurrences from the americans, likewise in this case, we are heading for the attention to the american society which strives shy so far to the "voluntary simplicity", in distinction of the roumanian society in which the simplicity is for the most of the people a imposed parameter.

The voluntary simplicity represents a choice to the consumption, like an aim of the capitalism and it is relegating at the free selection of the individuals to limit the costes allocated for the expandables and for the services.

A very important aspect is that as regards the voluntary simplicity it is regarded the consumption, not the input. Accordinly, by and large it enters in discution the individuals which already have the base needs satisfied and they are submiting to desist at he synthetic satisfactions, generated by the pressure of the commercial art. In this meaning Abraham Maslow, one of americans doctrinaire in social psychology, affirm that the voluntary simplicity represents an option for the societies mighty developed and not for the third world.

The voluntary simplicity has constituted by the long of the history a mood of life, whose militants have always followed a special fundamental freedom on spiritual base and they have thicked substantial the rowes of the supreme motion versus the consumption.

From the guardes the following of the anticulture were doging to consume and to produce a little "The enjoyment, the meaning and the aim of the life were followed by contemplation, the communions with the nature, drawing near the others drogs, sex and inexpensive products"[2].

In the 70' the westerly society have displaced the values from the material, prosperity and physic security to the life' quality.

The determationed agents of the life's quality have eyed like "postmaterials values"[3] and is regarding a great liberty, a powerful soldering , at a comunitary level, as a administery more democratic.

With all more and more societies with a population growing are promoting the prosperity like an principal aim intern. The pasing under a form of promotion from the base satisfaction needs(covert, meal, clothes) to the consumption and even to the ostentatious consumption to underline the social statute is accentuating with how much the societyes are more rich.

On the analogy with the poverity we could say that the passing from the necessary to the ostentatious can be comparated with the parallel from the absolute poverity, which presumed minimum absolute of the physic survivor and relative poverity, this presumed on a side, the population of a country as referring system, or on the other side the difference between the poverity of an individual from a developed country, vis-à-vis from the poverity of an other country of an another individual from a country from the third world.

So, the relative poverity can flirt with the ostentative consumption in the conditions in which an individual which owns ownerships and luxury cars, is too poor to presume an special picture, or a special jewel, or an ownership on the Moon.

Coming to the voluntary simplicity, she is presenting like some degrees of intensity, going from modest levels(moderate simplifies in the abundant life's diction) to more accentuated degrees- the loud simplify (the suggestive reorganization of the life's mood) and in finally to the downshifter simplify.

- the moderate voluntary simplicity

This forme of the simplicity is presenting in the case of the financial assured, which renounce voluntary to different input possessions, which are constituting in luxury articles. They could have them without efforts, but they chose to renounce at them, therewith keeping an opulent life's diction: he is wearing cheap clothes, they are driving old cars(to be not confused with the epoch cars). Some of them are renounceing to the fashionable parties, they are spending their holydays at the modest mood, they don't dispose of secondary residence or luxury media transport: private planes or yachts which they could have them.

In fashion the moderate voluntary simplicity is reflecting in the choice of the practical and simple clothes, commuting the sophistry one. But this doesn't means that will be favourite the vestimentars things of dozen with small excepts. It will be chosed sign board's products, for example: the products of Prada's sign board will be favourite to the Christian Lacroaix's products.

As regards the surrouding, the habitations are less: decorated and charged, only in preceding decade. The furniture and the ornamentals are less complicated and ostentatious.

The people are dubing specialy in comfort and quality, the extravagance and the design of the lightly cars commuting by simple things.

Anyway it must be pointed out the following individuals of the moderate voluntary simplicity accept "the rejecting of the symbols of the success temp time to vount signs of the poverity in a way in which they don't let any track of doub that they are stinking rich"[4].

---

[2] Etzioni, A. – The monochrome society, Ed. Polirom, Iaşi, 2002, p. 69.

[3] Inglehart, R. – The Silent Revolution: Changing Values and Political Styles Among Westwrn Publics, Princeton University Press, Princeton, 1977, p. 3.

[4] Brooks, D. – Conscientious Consumption, in the New Yorker, 23 nov. 1988, p. 46.

Amitai Etzioni says about the people who are acceding to this type of simplicity that "they reduce the enginees"[5]. The reduce of the enginees isn't practiced only by the individuals who are financial assured, so the rich ones and the ones from the middle class. The moderate voluntary simplicity is gushing at the level of the people from the middle class by the renouncening of sophisticate parties and variety of minues quantity simple dates when is consuming reduced products. The hireds of different firms are striving too to a understood simplicity in different mood from a situation to an other; some of the loyers renounce to the additional hours so they renounce to the additional finance, as well as at a dozen of estimation from the boss, the hireds have a day on week when they dress with a carriage less elegant, even sport, renounceing at the business carriage, the same in many cases with the elegant carriage.

The renounceing of the additional finance by the renounceing of additional hours of work is explain by that the individuals are economizing the time for the improve of the life's quality: for example the time which they gave formerly to the additional hours now it will spend it with the family, will practice sport or they will travel, or they will occupy of charity acts.

In Roumania the big mass of the population from the middle class couldn't renounce to a part of cash income, but they could recalculate the priorityes as subject of consumption. Not only the middle class could necessitate this thing but in special the top class. About the down class we can't talk about this category of Roumania's population of the 2005 year and she is in majority and situating to the level of the absolute poverity. Intersting is to look for metods or technical orientation of this paupery segment to a growing of the life's quality.

- the radical voluntary simplicity

The radical simplifycaters are those we are meeting to in the riches line but in the life of those existed in the medium blankets of the developed societyes. These are reducing the enginees more stronger than the moderate simplifycaters, in the meaning that they don't follow, the recognition of their statute of rich persons but this doesn't means that they will renounce at a decent livelihood.

Hireds good payed, like directors of firms, success loyers, chose to renounce to the financial part majority which they own by the donation of this one to the segments of the destitute population or different others modalityes, and they remain with the economyes of modest category, in the perimeter whom are enroll the consumption.

The voluntary demands of retirement before the date, expecting a reduce allowance in these cases, in the view of the diminished accretion of possession of input of the allotment to a expended in the family's occupancy of the elimination of the stress represents the expression of a silent rebellion vis-à-vis of the negative influence of a culture based on the cantitative accretion unselective and they consum proper.

"The people who are reduceing in a voluntary and suggestive mood their finance are striving to be some simplifycaters more radical than those who are moderating only the life's style, because a considerable mitigation of the finance goes sometimes to a simplification more comprehensive of the life's mood than the reducing selective of the enginees, regarding some articles of input".[6]

Reporting to the roumanian society from present, couldn't be the talk of a radical simplification, excepting an population segment, reduced as number, this being done by rich individuals. In the conditions in which in Roumania of the 2005 year are manifesting deficiencyes under the aspect of the decency reported to the livelyhood's level of the social and medical protection of all the categoryes of the population , etc., the onset of the radical simplification at rank of phenomenon is a utopia.

Beyond of the riches which try the drastic reduction of the enginees and they exactly succed more or less this thing, are the individuals who wish the radical change of their proper life's mood, but they don't have luck.

---

[5] Etzioni, A. – The monochrome society, Ed. Polirom, Iaşi, 2002, p. 72.
[6] Ibidem, p. 75.

These are strong dependent with the objects with which they've encompassed, manifesting an pathological affection, vis-à-vis them. Among them only the awakes attain to ask for help of speciality and only a small part will succed to come back to a simple and a clean life's mood. These will necessitate continual supervision and help from the cures.

- the downshifter voluntary simplicity

The most bitters individuals versus the consumption are the downshifters, adepts declared of the moving for a simple life. This moving is of small span and a little curdled. With all they are benefiting of an proper organization, developing programs, proper networks of communication.

The downshifters simplifycaters are those who are moving from the luxe zones of the big cityes, or the centers strong urbanized, to the perypheryes, in outskirts weak urbanized, or more shore in the rural medium, justifyng the necessity to live simple.

The american documentary with the title: "Escape from Affluenza"[7] was promoting in 1998 the thema based on the idea to live better with less.

In Roumania the situation is presenting essential different: those who are moving from cityes to villages, to peripherys, do this to live cottages more luxurios, to detain more extensive clearances, no case to have a simple life.

The individuals who are benefiting of this luxury are the big and the small riches good situated financial, cause they must cope to the daily transport to the work place, thing realized of course with a luxury car.

In our country there are not conditions to live decent of not good, with less spend, produced and consumed, far to the "run riot world". So, each must to glorify his work's dutyes, couldn't renounce at the salary. Many who can presume are living in abound, based on amounts good invested. So, in the roumanian society from the 2005 years the move from the city to the village represents the transition to the supreme luxury, clean air, comfort on the base of some serios financial possibilityes. The poor people who live in modest zones or poorly are foreed to accept the life's mood, not far simple, but poor and enjoyned by the actual social-economic conditions.

In other words the riches of the american society adepts of the downshifter voluntary simplicity renounce to the abound to retract to better(more simple, more healthy) with less, while the financial potentates roumanians are retracting from the civilized countries to live better(more sophistical, more abounded, more complicated, so more unhealthy) with more.

It can affirm that for those who have assured the satisfaction of the vital needs, the voluntary simplicity represents a renouncing to the abundence in the sight of the improver of the life's quality, while the poor people situated at the deadline of the absolute pauperization don't have at what to renounce, keep going to live in accidental conditions

Social effects of the voluntary simplicity

The voluntary option to spend less and to consume less for a simple life, represents without discutions the optimum solution in the sight of the rid of the stress of the ballast, nonchalant of his nature.

All the society have to win by the rear of the reducing of the consumption. In this way, two are the directions prevailed which do the object of the major sociology analysis: the environment and the transition to a special equality between individuals at social level.

1- the simplifycaters and their relationship with the environment

If it took volume, the voluntary simplicity could concludive redound at the enviroment's protection. By the reconsider of the life's standards, the voluntary simplifycaters could produce and consume suggestive less. This conduce to the employment reduced by the raw material, and the production reduced by the dump goods[8].

[7] John de Graff, Vivia Boe (producers) – Escape from Affluenza, Public Broadcasting System, 8 July 1998, (op.cit.).

On the other side, the voluntary simplifycaters are really read to recycle, in comparison with the others members of the society. Advanced studies have proved that those who are chosing the way to a simplified life, are opting for civic activities, of recycling of mutual help and activities which expect consume.

The life style based on the consume reducing and the growing of the satisfactions clung of the freedom, love and health, opposite to the ecological life style have been created the premise that the voluntary simplicity terms and the ecological life style to become mutual changed. In this conditions is clear that the deputies of both the currents are mutual supporting and they have common aims.

Of course it can affirm that the voluntary simplifycaters have a benefity, friendly attitude, vis-à-vis of the environment.

2- the realization of an socioeconomic equality between the individuals

Because of the fact that the arieds modalityes to apply the democracy at governamental level have miss more or less the sensitive success, haven't something else but to demonstrate that the globally society to fix the base socioeconomic equality of her members need a new force. This force could be even the formal one from the voluntary simplifycaters. Her big advantage consists in that with the base voluntary isn't administer by coercion extents. An alleged engine of this society of simplifycaters isn't feeded from the outside and doesn't necessitate consume, but feeded and afferimed from the inside, from the wish to renounce to the surplus in the favour to those who presents poverties in the possibility of the satisfactions of the base needs(meal, clothes, refuge,etc).

At the first vision these conjectures seem untouched aims, but very important is that voluntary simplifycaters exist, act and they are multiply. This thing happens slow but shore, without the practicing of the politic forces, without consume of raw material, without the conflicts creation to centred on ethnic, religion, kind or culture. The unentity of these barriers represents an another chance to equality.

As have shown in the visage paper, in Roumania is almost impossible, acceding to the voluntary simplicity. With all, the reducing of the consumption isn't an squalid factor with more the need of the return at the ancestral values remain the base pylon of an tangible equilibrium only at the side of the nature.

Conclusions:

The main directions approached in the presentd material are aiming the material accretion over the necessary, which is pushing the individual to a namely release from this one, as he would disclaim the ballast, for the essential content and really valuable.

It has been followed the description of the abnegation action of the consumption, which beside the virtue to offer a simplier lifestyle and therewith psychological more rich, it has the virtue to sustain in a decided way the ecological movement at global level, of environment protection, by the conservation and the keeping of the ground and underground resources, and more important the reduction of the pollution level.

From here is detached an another need, that to surprise on future the rate between the followers of the voluntary simplicity and the ones of the involuntary simplicity, considering the exacerbated size of the global economic crisis and implied the recession of the discrepancy between rich and poor by the growth of the poor number and the emphasis of the poorness, the reduction of the rich number and the emphasis of their richness level, and not the last the drastic size reduction of the middle social rug.

[8] The consume of the raw material could reduced if for example it could produce more bicycles than cars. The going with the bicycle, the free going, even the functional automobiles but unostentatious could redound at the economy of the raw material and it could realize an important advance as regards the pollution.

References:

- Brooks, D., Conscientious Consumption, in The New Yorker, 23 noiembrie 1988
- Chelcea, S., Personality and society in transition, Ed. Ştiinţă şi Tehnică, Bucharest,1995
- Duane Elgin, Voluntary Simplicity, William Morrow, New York, 1993
- Etzioni, A*., The monochrome society*, Ed. Polirom, Iaşi, 2002
- Inglehart, R., The Silent Revolution: Changing Values and Political Styles AmongWestern Publics, Princeton University Press, Princeton, 1977
- Neculau,A., Ferreol,G.(coord) , Psychosocial aspects of the poorness, Ed. Polirom, Iaşi,1999
- Nilă Stratone Mirela C., Sociology, Ed. Paralela 45, Piteşti, 2006
- Van Stralen, J., The poorness. Methodes of social intercession, Ed. Alternative, Bucharest,1996
- Zamfir, C. (coord.), Poorness sizes, Ed. Expert, Bucharest, 1995

THE SOCIOLOGIC APPROACH OF FEMININE CRIMINALITY

MIRELA CRISTIANA NILĂ STRATONE[1]
BOGDAN GEORGESCU[2]

Abstract:
The present study is part of a much more cognitive approach, which tries to study resocialization and the social reinsertion of women who are under freedom privation penalty. The present material contains a short historical evolution of the sociologic theories of crime, then plunging towards feminist theories, in order to approach the gender problematic concerning the delinquent woman.. The first objective is to demonstrate the necessity of a wider approach in analyzing the genesis of the crime, through the re-evaluation and reconsidering the factors with a crime risk and placing them in an equal position in the social environment. Another objective of this study is to emphasize the importance of the gender role concerning the expectations of the society from the feminine population's side. The present study is focused on the contribution of placing the research of feminine crime research on a basis characterized by unprecedented generality, under total influencing conditions, with orientation towards gender problematic.

Keywords: Crime sociological dimension, Crime risk factors, Social control, Feminist theories, Gender problematic

Introduction:

The domain the present study refers to gets the social dimension of the crime phenomena, materialized in the evolutionary conceptions which outlined the specific paradigm.

The feminine crime, a quite complex crime segment, needs a separate theory mentioned in this study, by passing from the evolutionary analysis of the theoretical and crime approaches to the feminist theories.

By fitting the feminine crime segment into specific theoretical formulas, we can understand the unique importance for the study of the feminine crime genesis.

The delinquent woman commits one and the same crime in a two way direction: one time by breaking the penal norms, as any delinquent and second time, by transgressing the gender normative, penal deviance being accompanied by the gender deviance; the delinquent woman acts generally against the normative and desirable values of the society, and particularly, against feminism.

Thus, the conflict, determined by biological, cultural, economical, social factors, etc. and together with these ones, they will be studied through the light of gender dimension, because in spite of the fact we militate for chance equality, the two sexes remain tributary to their biological nature.

A futuristic approach in the study of crime genesis is focused on giving up the method of concentric circle and distributing the attention towards each social segment where there are crimes either in dormant or active and their research under all aspects.

The already existent contributions in the specialty works lead to the necessity of a unified conflict approach of crime.

Such a theorization already exists and it is concentrated on reconsideration and including the biological factors in the conception resulted from the integration of representative theories.

The present material wants to be of contribution to a foundation of a theoretical-paradigmatic base, which allows for complete analysis ways of feminine crime genesis.

[1] Senior Lecturer Ph. D., "Nicolae Titulescu" University, Bucharest (email: mrl_cristiana@yahoo.com).
[2] Senior Lecturer Ph. D., University of Pitesti, Pitesti, (email: georgescu_b2002@yahoo.com).

In the future, the study of feminine crime genesis will be focused on analyzing gender problems, without neglecting the social structure role of races, collective consciousnesses or of cultural values.

Consequently an exhaustive approach of the discussed phenomenon will be possible only on the base of re-evaluation of all categories of determinant factors, of their social-historical evolution and reporting them to an evolution ecological paradigm, out of which specific research methods can be configured.

Content:

1. The vision of the collective conscience

Starting from Durkheim's work, the consensual approach appeals to a certain "universality" as regards both the behavioural deviation and social control and a vision of the collective conscience regarding the criminal act.

This type of approach is characterized by a static character of the society, where universally valid laws aim at avoiding conflicts through reconcilable methods, the final purpose being to obtain social order through consensus and reduced sacrifices.

The method of the concentric circle

Burgess and Park underlined the study of the social disorganization in point of ecology, elaborating and making use, on this occasion, of the theory-method of the concentric circle at the level of Chicago city.

Thus were analyzed the characteristics of geographical areas in point of cause of balance and lack of balance between biotic and social.

The two researchers say that the environment is the result of balance between a certain geographical area and the economical possibilities of its inhabitants. They explain the transgression of the law as a result of the characteristics of the transition area, inhabited by unskilled workers, who are poor, so the cause of the transgression of the law can be found in poverty.

Clifford Shaw and Henry McKay took over from Burgess and Park the theory of the concentric circle, studying the proportion between the rate of juvenile transgression of the law and the different habitats in Chicago.

The results of the survey showed that the rate of delinquency persisted in time, no matter the race and the ethnic group, which have changed in the meantime, only the economical position and the cultural values of the delinquent groups remaining constant.

At the same time, the methods and techniques to commit offences were transmitted throughout the time, so delinquency is a social, studied behaviour, transmitted by previous groups to subsequent groups, characterized by the same economical and cultural status, aspect that received the name of cultural transmission.

Shaw and Mc Kay proved the economical and social causality of delinquency, this being considered a normal state, under certain social and economical circumstances, in an area such as that described before, that is habitat no. 2 (the two researchers took over the model of forerunners Park and Burgess, about natural urban habitats – habitat 2 being the key one, the transition area) in the concentric circle applied as a method of research of juvenile delinquency in particular.

1.2. The proportion between culture and criminality

This vision is centered upon the study of the proportion between culture and criminality. One starts from the idea that certain individuals internalize the norms and values that are not desired by the society and are opposed to those dominant, subsequently they become negatively socialized, circumstances under which delinquency appears.

The theory of differential associations was formulated by Edwin Sutherland. In 1939, in his work „Principles of Criminology" was introduced the concept of "differential associations" because, on the one hand, the word "differential" is used in Romanian in the fields of mathematics and technique, and on the other hand, one aimed to render as truthfully as possible Sutherland's conception. He sets as the basis of his theory the principle of learning, which he takes over from Tarde's theory of imitation. He reconsiders the whole life experience of the individual in order to explain historically and genetically the criminal behaviour, forwarding a series of hypothesis in this respect. The key principle of differential associations reduces itself to a non-delinquent person becoming delinquent, having as cause an abundance of judgments favorable to the transgression of laws to the prejudice of judgments unfavorable to their transgression.

Underlying the ambivalent character of groups existing in society, Sutherland stresses the idea according to which criminality would be a resultant of the differential organization of social groups.

Together with D. Cressey, were laid the foundations of principles that represent the essence of the theory of differential associations:

- the criminal behavior is learnt;
- the criminal behavior is learnt in interaction with other persons, through the process of communication;
- the most important aspect of learning the criminal behavior appears in close, intimate, personal groups;
- learning the criminal behavior includes both the techniques to commit crimes and the specific directions of reasons, impulses, rationalizations and attitudes associated with the criminal behavior;
- the above mentioned directions are learnt by the medium of positive or negative norms;
- a person becomes delinquent because of the excessive contact with situations favorable to the transgression of norms, to the prejudice of those unfavorable to this aspect;
- the differential associations can vary as frequency, duration, priority and intensity;
- learning the pattern of the criminal behavior resembles to learning the pattern of the non criminal behavior;
- both the criminal and the non criminal behaviors represent an expression of the same general needs and values.[3]

Sutherland's theory mainly characterizes by:

- the content of what is studied includes specific techniques to commit crime and in general, appreciations favorable to the transgression of law; these are cognitive elements, rather ideas than behaviors;
- the process through which learning takes place implies associations with other persons within intimate personal groups.

On the occasion of the elaboration of this theory, Sutherland offers a more adequate explanation of the causes of relativity.

Thorsten Sellin takes over the basic idea of Sutherland's theory, concerning the learning of attitudes or criminal norms and formulates the theory of cultural conflicts, centred on the cause of these attitudes or norms. He says that the transgression of the law must be analyzed as a conflict between the norms of different cultures.

Sellin made a distinction between primary conflicts, expression of discordance between the norms of two distinct, different cultures, and secondary conflicts, which appear between the groups of the same society, or when one culture divides into a variety of cultures, each promoting its own norms and values.

In the work „The Culture of the Gang" (op. cit., New York, 1955), Albert K . Cohen takes over Sutherland's conceptions and the central idea in Merton's researches, that is stress is a product of social structure, that produces behavioral deviation, in order to explain birth, location and features of the delinquent subculture.

---

[3] Banciu D., Rădulescu S.M., Teodorescu V. – Present tendencies of crime criminality in Romania, Lumina Lex Publishing House, Bucharest, 2002, page 158.

A. K. Cohen alleges that delinquent subcultures are born at the outskirts of the great American cities and have the origin in differences between classes, religion, education level, as well as parents' aspirations.

Concerning the characteristics of subculture, Cohen considers it as being non utilitarian (delinquents do not steal out of necessity, or desire, they just steal), malicious (a so-called pleasure for the ailment of other individuals causes to delinquents the expression of the delinquent behavior, as well as an extravagant desire to defy rules, a form of negative non-conformity), negativistic (the norms of the delinquent subculture are generally opposed to a certain types of crimes, have a varied activity), short term hedonism (for delinquents the moment is important, the own future too little), group autonomy (the gang or the pack leads after its own rules or norms, without cooperating with social institutions, to which they oppose and whose influence they resist to, persisting into the atmosphere of the group – it is a form of introversion).

Cohen issued the theory of delinquent subcultures, and later, together with Short, have extended the central idea of this theory, including in their research, besides the low class delinquent behavior also variants of the delinquent subculture of the middle class society and not lastly, the feminine delinquency. All these were considered to be the foundation of some new and future theories.

1.3. Crime at the border between targets and means

Theories that are in the perimeter of this current, make use of the concepts like: social system, statuses and roles assumed to these ones, social structure, functions and dysfunctions of the society, being focused on an analysis of the social-economical organizatorical action of the socializing and integrating possibilities of individuals to norms.

Robert K. Merton reconsidered the concept of normlessness from the point of view of the social deviation, developing the theory of normlessness. In the work "Current tendencies of crime and criminality in Romania", 2002, the authors Dan Banciu, S. Radulescu and V. Teodorescu expound Merton's conception, in which "normlessness appears as a result of the tension between the goals that cultural models of the society propose and the lawful means allowed by the system of social organization" (page 66 in the quoted work).

So this discordance appears as a result between the highest goals that society proposes (see the American society, where success and glory are "necessary" goals, their lack determining the depreciation of the individual) and the real possibilities, differing from one individual to another, to attain one's purposes. Through the analysis of this discordance, Merton creates a paradigm, that treats the ways of the individuals'adjusting to the environment, managing to highlight five of them as being representative: conformism (those who accept both goals and possibilities to reach them that society offers, no matter the result); innovation (individuals who accept the high goals proposed by the society, but reject the lawful means to attain them, because they are not sufficient to finalize the action engaged in view of reaching the proposed goal); ritualism (this conduct is adopted by those limitating to lawful living possibilities they dispose of, being willing to give up higher goals – these are the ordinary people, who do not want to overstep their own condition); avoidance (they generally are normless individuals, who give up goals and better possibilities and take refuge in subsidiary groups, adopting their subculture); rebellion (rebels are those who reject both goals and means replacing them with others and fighting for them).

Merton underlines the fact that the environment where the individual lives is decisive both as regards social aspect (social relationships) and the cultural one (the whole system of norms and values that humanize the human species in time and space). The conclusion is that those belonging to disadvantaged classes do not have access to high statuses and try to reach the desired social positions by adopting an antisocial behavior.

This theory has the credit of highlighting the discrepancy between goals and means, as well as the types of adopted behavior from means to attaining the goals, but it also has limits, since it characterizes in general the tendencies of the American individual, so the habitat of application is defined.

Combining the basic idea in the theory of normlessness – Merton – with the basic theory in the theory of learning – Sutherland - , Cloward and Ohlin elaborate the theory of the differential opportunity, at the basis of which we find a study concerning the means, opportunities, illegal possibilities accessible to those resorting to a delinquent behavior in order to attain their goals. We find the culture that characterizes such a behavior to authors Cloward and Ohlin as a delinquent subculture, characterized by a certain compliance with norms and negative values which suppose quick wits and a degree of diplomacy; subculture of conflict, expressed between individuals that failed both in conventional and delinquent society, based upon violence as a form of general behavior; subculture of refuge belongs to those who cannot respect either norms or negative values or violence, but resignation, ecstasy given by hallucinogenic; the impossibility to have access to lawful and unlawful means at the same time pushes them towards refuge.

1.4. The action of positive and negative social control in the study of the delinquent behavior

The American sociologist Walter C. Reckless tried an explanation both regarding the normal, positive behavior and the deviating one.

Consequently, trusting the social control, he elaborates the "theory of abstinence", which intends to be a combination between the inner control system, beneficiary of a strong self-control, self-restraint, trust, optimism etc. and the external control system, made up from the means that the close background disposes of in order to keep a tight rein on him, to prevent him from choosing illicit, illegal means to attain goals and to offer him socially desirable alternatives. This theory tries to clarify how negative and positive tensions act on the individual, how they work together with the socializing ways he went through, but does not succeed in offering an explanation about the difference of labeling in the case of the same offences.

Elaborating the theory of social connections, in the centre of which there is the more or less intense relationship between the individual and the society (especially family, friends, environment), Travis Hirschi promotes attachment (the obligation that a person feels towards those he appreciates, to behave conventionally), commitment (the individual's investment in conventional values, compared to the possibility to invest in unconventional values, alternative that usually leads to delinquency), involvement (consequence of commitment, it leads to the exclusion of certain opportunities), belief (the strong internalization of norms and desirable moral values leads to the diminution of chances to choose a delinquent behavior). By this theory, Hirschi aimed to explain the advantage following from the choice of a conventional behavior to the prejudice of an unconventional one, stressing the causes of compliance to norms and desirable rules, all in the light of social relations.

2. The conflict, determining factor of social deviation

2.1. The proportion between primary and secondary deviation

The interaction tendency starts from the idea according to which society is made up from groups that differ both as regulations, values and definition of compliance and deviation, as specifies the Romanian sociologist S. Rădulescu, in "Deviation, criminality and social pathology".(quoted work, 1999)

Lemert and Tannenbaumy laid the foundations of a theory called "the labeling theory", according to which deviation is considered an attribution to behaviors different from the conventional ones, a social reaction.

According to Frank Tannebaum, this social reaction leads to the "dramatizing of evil", application of punishments with loss of liberty and association with much more dangerous and more skilled criminals, which consolidates the future delinquent career.

Edwin Lemert realised a parallel analysis between the social reaction and its effect as compared to the deviated behavior (secondary deviation) and the expression of the behavior as such, the fact in itself (primary deviation). He seeks to explain the process through which, as a response of the others towards his behavior, the individual makes the passage to his new role (the one of a delinquent), that was assigned to him.

According to the theory of labeling, the choice of the delinquent career has as causes both the social reaction, concretized in sanctioning, stigmatization, isolation and social segregation and the internalization of labeling by the individual, all these leading finally to the acceptance and practice of a delinquent behavior tending towards professionalization.

It is absolutely necessary that, whenever we talk about the theory of labeling, we should mention what are the fundamental thesis[4] of H.Becker, J.Kitsuse and K. Erikson, which study the consequences of the theories promoted by Tannenbaum and Lemert:

a) Definitions classifying the conducts in deviating or acceptable (normal) behaviors are subjective and relative;

b) Social negative reactions towards acts of transgression of norms are not automatically released – the social reaction cannot be anticipated, it has a problematic character;

c) The key process that must be followed in the investigation of deviation is the labeling of the behavior as being deviating and of individuals as being deviating by the public (into this category also falls the respective individual, as a person who observes and appraises his own behavior);

d) Labelling an individual as being deviating, from the perspective of the undesirable, social and moral character of his conducts or acts, has multiple negative consequences for the consolidation and worsening of his deviating character.

Once the label was put is difficult to be removed.

The application of the label of deviating to a person who transgresses the rules is not an accidental process, but is strongly influenced by a series of circumstances, such as the public accusation of the deviating person;

The application of the label of deviating has strongly consequences concerning the self perception of the individual and his definition as being an authentic deviated.

Besides its merits, this theory has, as any other one, its limits, like for example ignoring the causes of crime actions and the generalizing the idea according to which the labeling determines invariably the amplifying of crime actions.

2.2. Radical conceptions

In 1973 "The New Crime Science", with Ian Taylor, Paul Walton and Jock Young as authors; the is focused on Marxist principles, considering the economic factors as primary in producing the conflicts, under the conditions in which the law is applied in a differentiated way according to social class.

The authors have emphasized that the new crime science approach needs the analysis of remote and immediate causes of the crime action, the crime action itself as well as the close and the remote origins of social reactions, its effect upon perpetuating crime and the nature of deviancy. This work had a much lower effect than the expected one.

Richard Quiney has tried to promote a social theory, based on Marxist concepts. He supports the concept of a complete equality in front of law, for this being necessary the replacement of the capitalist society with the socialist one, which is intended to be the only and the necessary condition in order for the individuals to share equally the material benefits, everything leading towards a new human nature. (see the concepts of Nicolae Ceauşescu, who taking over the Marxist-Leninist ideas, promoted the creation the new mankind, physically and psychically perfect, equal with others, an individual without problems, happy and totally integrated in the society which he wanted to be a communist one).

In the work „Critique of Legal Order: Crime Control in a Capital Society" (quoted work., Little Brown Boston, 1974) Quiney develops „The Theory of Social Realities" through which he intends the creation and the sustaining of a socialist society. His theory provoked strong critics, being considered a mystic one, who in stead of looking for explanations and answers, starts with conclusions which he deduced from his own faith in the communist society, as being the ideal one.

[4] Rădulescu S. M., Deviance, criminality and social pathology, Lumina Lex Publishing House, Bucharest, 1999, p. 133.

3. Futuristic sociologic vision in crime science

3.1. Differentiated approach of biological, psychological and social factors

The evolutionary theories start from the idea according to which different biological, psychological and social factors have different effects upon individuals, according to present particularities of these ones in various stages of life cycle.

The relation between age and crime was analyzed in a divergent way, through a longitudinal research (this brings into discussion the "career criminal", that is the individual who commits crimes on a long period of time; it is also focused on the behavior of a group of individuals in a certain period of time, which determines the establishing the influence of the previous behavior upon the present and the future one, as well as the possibility of applying different models for behavior explaining in certain stages of life cycles), as well as through a research called „transversal section" (the attention is focused on different individuals with crime tendencies, that are compared in same time).

3.2. The unified conflict approach of crime

According to these tendencies, the integration of some theories is being monitored, knowing the fact that theories treat different aspects of a common phenomenon, with the target of explaining completely the antisocial behavior.

Thus, the unified confliction theory of crime has, for the beginning, the general social structural characteristics, continues with the processes through which individuals from similar social structural locations get the skills of similar behavior models, so that in the end to finalize through the approach of the report between these behavior models and adoption processes and the application of penal laws.

John Braithwaite has inspired from the theory of labeling, from the theory of learning, control, of differentiated associations and of subculture, issuing the theory of reintegration by blaming, a new concept, according to which the blaming is reduced to stigmatization (when because of blaming, the individual is complying to the imposed model and takes refuge in marginal subcultures) and reintegration (those who apply blaming do not exclude the blamed one from their group, but on the contrary, they support reintegration, determining the awareness of the committed crime).

Braithwaite demonstrates in his theory that reintegration leads to the decrease of crime, while stigmatization has a contrary effect.

Brian Vila issues an evolutive ecological paradigm, a source for all the theories which might explain the crime phenomenon under all its aspects, both at a micro and a macro level, taking into considerance an essential conditions: reconsidering and including the biological factors in all theories.

In Vila's conception, the theories, which have been initiated until present time, would be only partial, because each in its turn approach the fractioned crime phenomenon, in the way that an application of these theories cannot be found, either from historical developing of causality, or from the research reduction not only to a micro level, or in the case of more general approaches at a macro level, or only the environment factors are taken into considerance; the idea is that the explanation of the complexity of human behavior has failed under all its aspects and this is exactly what Vila proposes: a paradigm characterized by an unprecedented generality, focused on a total and unlimited influencing in a double way (micro-macro), but also focused on change and its problematic.

Feminist theories concerning the criminal behaviour

The feminist theories, regardless that it express positive or negative aspects about life, activity and attitude of woman, are theories of the considered gender.

The gender problematic, besides the socializing and identifying with gender role, an aspect concerning the respective crime type. Differentiating the crime behaviour under biological aspect led to the necessity of elaborating a feminist theory accordingly.

Until present time, such a theory tends to be built based on the analysis of causes and effects of inequality of chances between sexes.

A general theory is not by far clearly defined. More than that, it has to express among others a synthesis of all the existant feminist theories, these being based on the causes of chance inequality.

In 2001, Danner sustained the idea according to which the feminist theory was focused on the understanding, describing and explaining the human experience and social life as well, monitoring the social changes capable to anihilate gender discrimination. For this reason, he considered that personal life and social life are genetically determined.

Feminist theories criticize the social order as well as masculine traditional theories. As any attempts of theoretical classification, this one has, besides the merits mentioned above some certain limits like for example lack of total objectivity, exaggeration in analyzing techniques as well as exclusivist orientation upon the feminine segment.

An essential aspect is represented by the fact that the feminist theories concerning the crime behaviour which is ”inspired” from crime theories.

Feminist crime science is based on the model of feminist movements from the 60s and the 70s, triggered by the need of protection and promoting women’s rights.

In the attempt of explaining and analysing the feminine crime behaviour, the researches resorted to the ethiology of crime. This process has evolved in such a way it got to the reporting of each sex towards collectivity.

Studying crime and deliquency within feminist theories, Daly (1998) approaches the problem from four different perspectives e:

- the relation between genesis and crime
- the social determinism of organized crime, of crime gender differecies (crime genesis)
- the determinant role of ethiological factors specific to domestic violence, as well as the characteristics of a crime gender-gap (track genesis)
- the role of genesis in selecting the undesirable behaviour (life genesis)

In constructing the feminist theories in crime science, a major role was held by the issued explanations about the crime bahaviour of women. These causes were approached from bilogical or psychological experience until the 70s, when the first explicative theories about crimes committed by women, theories focused on a sociologic causality. They emphasize the freedom aand emancipation.

The freedom theories appeared as an effect of movement for women’s rights. They have emphasized the opportunities appeared in the public sphere for women who overpassed the private sphere of home and family. These opportunities assume clearly the movement of the masculine gender towards the feminine behaviour, so a masculinizing of this one. The consequence was, of course, the increase of crime rate among women, because they took over from men, in the same time with the desirable model and the undesirable social one. An important role was held here by the lack of concordance between the stereotype of gender as the ideal feminine role and the real role which women have socialized with outside the private space. More than that, this role has reached in certain situations an extended level even in the private spehere, being one of the factors who led to the increased number of men as victims of domestic violence.

The evolution of feminist theories

The liberal feminism

The liberal traditional thinking was the fundament on which the first feminist current, focused on ideas as:

- freedom and equality of chances for both sexes
- equal rights for women in all domains of activities
- the exclusion of women discrimination at the working place

- juridical equality both in what concerns the evaluation of the feminine crime actions, as well as in what concerns the sanctions and the penitenciary treatment.

Besides the irrefutable merits, the liberal feminsim had its own limits. From these ones, the equality in rights and in chances have led to equality of sexes under the physical resistance for labour or penitenciary treatment, an issue desired by the first feminsit current, but not in totality.

The marxist and socialist feminism

Centred on the idea of the working class fight in the capitalist society, the marxist traditionalism contributed substantially on the analysis of the social classes. As a result, the marxist feminism has fundamented the theory on the economical causality of social inequality.

The essence of the marxist theory has influenced the crime science but the marxist feminism had a minor role comparing to the liberal one, upon the crime research.

The socialist feminism brings into the first row the importance of family, as a nucleus of human society. It had an essential contribution in a precise establishing of the status and the domestic role of woman.

Both types of feminism, the marxist and the socialist one emphasize stron aspects of social inequality, inequalities supported by the economic or juridical power: the economical nature of sexual abuse, judiciary system as a serving instrument for superior classes, used in order to opress woman, etc.

Radical feminism

The theory of radical feminism has as its fundament the concept of masculine violence and gravitates around analyses, discovery and fighting the domestic violence. This theory approaches the physical power in the private domestic space, describing the inequality between the masculine and the feminine physical force. The problems encountered by women represented the problematic of radical feminist theory: sexual abuse on women, their sexual haressment, pornografy. Emphasizing these problems and promoting the idea woman protection in the private family space by initiating and developing some legislative measures, as well as by building some living habitats and social shelters for the abused women, have represented strength elements of the radical feminism theory.

But from the radical feminism perspective, the permanent woman placement as victims, lack of solutions and of prevention methods against the oppresive patriarchal system, as well as in limitting the area of domestic violence, have represented its limits.

Modern feminism

Modern feminism criticizes the feminist theories of the first two currents of feminism and tries the development of new theories concerning the genesis of the crimes committed by women.

The previous theories were focused in explaining the concepts of ”woman” and ”women committed crimes”, but crime science needs to study the life of a woman under biological, psychological, economical, juridical and social factors. For this, Cain concluded that there is no method in crime science capable of a cognitive procedure so complex and complete in the same time.

Post-modernist feminism

The post-modernist feminist theory has a totally new shape, almost not all approached until this moment. The principal problem of this theory consists in the importance of language in information transmission.

Chesney-Lind and Faith appreciated that the post-modernist feminist theories have a strong impact upon teenagers through mass-media. Thus, in the U.S.A an experiment took place, which concentrated on the report between „the crime vawe from the mass-media” created especially through communication techniques without having a correspondent in reality and the rate of crime at a national level. While in the mass-media informations were abundant of topics connected with violence, crimes, in reality, at a national level, the crime level has decreased.

The merit of these theories consist in trying to deconstract the information from media.

Multi-cultural and multi-racial feminism

The multi-racial feminist theories approach woman both under cultural, behavioural aspect but also under social structure.

Accordingly, the multicultural feminist crime specialist Beth Ritchie tries to create the prototype of afro-american delinquent, a reason for which he studies the interaction between the human race, genesis, social class, domestic violence. The risc factors are represented by: qualities of individuals who belong to the same inferior classes; the subsistence methods offered by society to those of perferic areas; cultural and behaviour model of other women of colour, sexual identity; religion; other discriminatory factors.

Multi-racial feminist theories are concentrated of demonstrating the racial discrimination. The fight against crime aims only at poor social classes.

A special emphasis on the individual characteristics may lead to the highlighting the inequalities and different problems which put marks on the life of a person.

Masculinity and genesis

Among the crime theorist of the masculine theory, Messerschmidt is detached by directing the attention on the genesis of social actions of men, with the purpose of understanding the crimes committed by these ones.

The elements which lead to the delineation of masculinity are: the working place, the social structure, the sexual structure.

Referring to the feminist theories, Messerschmidt finds that the main power upon women is reflected in masculinity.

From the need to express masculinity, men resort to different form of violence, most of them being crimes. These are committed at any age, both in public space (working place, street) and also private (family).

Post-modernist feminist crime scientits have focused on masculinity, but they have the merit of bringing new approaches on delinquency in the first line.

The future of feminist theories on crime will center on the study of genesis of gender crimes, analyzing men's and boy's life as well as of women's and girl's under biological aspect, of social structure, of races, under psychological, cultural aspect, focusing on life environment on all plans.

Another futuristic orientation in the crime feminsit theory is represented by the displacement of attention from the periphery of society towards each social segment where crimes appear and, of course, studying these ones from a total perspective. This will lead, in time, to the elimination of race, class, ethnicity discrimination of the committed crimes both in women and men.

Continuing the research of the feminist theories will mark progresses in crime theory and, not lastly, in science.

Conclusions:

The main approached directions in the above article refer to the approach of feminine crime under the sociological paradigm. The emphasis placed on the influence of actors with crime risk, directs the research in the area of gender research.

The amplitude of the presented phenomenon and the weak concern until present time to establish the place and the role of the feminine crime within social delinquency, suggests the initiation of empirical research projects, based on theoretical ideas presented by this study.

References:

- Banciu D., Rădulescu S.M., Teodorescu V., Present Tendencies of Crime and Criminality in Romania, Lumina Lex Publishing House, Bucharest, 2002
- Gheorghe F., Penitentiary Psychology, Oscar Print Publishing House, Bucharest, 2001
- Mitrofan N., Zdrenghea V., Butoi T., Judiciary Psychology, Şansa Publishing House, Bucharest, 1992

- Mohamed Cherkaoui, in R. Boudon, Sociology Treaty, Humanitas Publishing House, Bucharest, 1997
- Neculau A.(coord.), Social Psychology, Polirom Publishing House, Iaşi, 1996
- Nilă Stratone Mirela C., Juridical Sociology, Paralela 45 Publishing House, Pitesti, 2008
- Otilia Dragomir, Mihaela Miroiu, Feminist Lexycon, Polirom Publishing House, Iaşi, 2000
- R. Dahrendorf, Essays in the theory of society, Stanford University Press, Stanford, 1968
- Rădulescu S. M., Deviance, criminality and social pathology, Lumina Lex Publishing House, Bucharest, 1999
- Rădulescu S. M., Sociological theories in the domain of deviancy and social problems, CPS Publishing House, Bucharest, 1994
- Sandu I.E., Sandu F., Ioniţă Gh.I., Criminology, Sylvy Publishing House, Bucharest, 2001

GENDER ROLES AND COOPERATIVE BEHAVIOUR

ALICE CĂLIN[1]

Abstract
We live in a world where, without any doubt, the social, political, economical power are owned by men. Almost all the societies are more or less patriarchal and the gender roles are, generally speaking, well defined and assumed by the representatives of each gender. Also, we live in a world consisting of communities that could not exist in the absence of cooperation between individuals. However, we have to consider the fact that individuals are rational persons that choose to cooperate or not based on the gains brought by each of the possibilities.
The purpose of this paper is to show that there is a correlation between the gender roles taught by each individual in childhood according to their sex and their cooperative behaviour. The hypothesis is that gender roles and cooperative behavior are interdependent and the way men and women cooperate is determined by the gender roles taught by each person since childhood according to the sex they were born. Perhaps we all heard that women are more gentle, more peaceful and more inclined to cooperation, all this being part of "their nature", while men are stronger, more practical, more rational and more likely to compete, also according to "their nature". In this paper I will assume that all these characteristics attributed to each gender are true, but I will question the nature's responsibility in all these facts.

Keywords: Gender roles, cooperative behaviour, women's nature, teaching gender, children's cooperation

1. Introduction

The present study is part of the Political Science field. It aims to show that the way women cooperate influences the gender roles and their assumption. In other words, even if women have no inborn inclination to assume care and household roles and even if they have a choice in this regard, because they are more inclined to cooperation, they are more likely to assume household tasks, especially when they have an opposite sex partner. However, if women tend to cooperate more than men, we can assume that they are more suitable for managing resources and common property.

At this time, the literature has not reached a consensus on the general tendency of cooperation among women. Some studies show that women cooperate less in the prisoner's dilemma type of experiments. On the other hand, there are studies showing that women are more cooperative and more altruistic than men. But there is also a third category of studies which reveals the fact that the way women cooperate in this type of games depends on certain conditions of the experiments.

Further I will present a series of studies and the results of their experiments in various cooperative games, showing how and in which conditions women cooperate. I will also try to show the applicability of cooperative behavior in private life and on assuming the household tasks.

2. Context

In modern society cooperation among individuals is indispensable. From the beginning of humanity, the ability to cooperate is a criterion of natural selection. Nowadays , cooperation is also a criterion of social selection. Cooperation works based on a system of rewards and punishments. Individuals that do not cooperate with others are excluded. The individual's degree of cooperation can be measured using a wide range of tools. However, the best known and most used type of experiment is a Prisoner's Dilemma.

This world has always been run by men for men, as Mihaela Miroiu says - "often, what was considered to be generally human was a simple universalization of the masculine".[2] For centuries societies are dominated and led by men who make policy only in their favor, totally ignoring the needs of women, or treating them as inferior beings, incapable of making decisions and managing on their own, therefore needing masculine care and protection. As a result, certain rules and patterns of behavior were established as being "women specific" and other "male specific", defined in the literature as "gender roles".

[1] Graduate student – Politics, Gender and Minorities, SNSPA (email: calin.alice@gmail.com).

3. Empirical studies

According to a research conducted by Mary Glenn Wiley, there was not observed a significant difference in behavior between men and women when they were not allowed to communicate. When verbal communication was allowed, there was no difference between men and women when they interacted in same-sex pairs. In contrast, traditional roles have occurred when communication was allowed and they interacted with the opposite sex.[3] We can assume that this behavior is due to the traditional relations of the patriarchal societies in which they live, where women are educated to "listen" and to depend on men. Men are those who make the rules, they are "heads of the family".

According to Tomasello, children begin to cooperate from the age of one year old and tend to follow social norms because "this is the way it is supposed to be". More specifically, once the children see an action carried out in a certain way, afterwards someone will do the same action in another way, they will resist to the last action, arguing that "it is not the way you are supposed to do it".[4] Assuming that there is indeed a biological inclination toward cooperation of women, girls would learn and they would conform to gender statuses since the first years of life especially because this is what they see in their family. Thus, even if women do not have a feminine nature "inborn" which makes them sensitive, obedient, gentle, ready for self sacrifice etc, given their inclination towards cooperation and compliance, they will gain, from a very early age, these attributes and will behave accordingly.

Eckel conducted an experiment - called "the dictator experiment" – in which a group of women and a group of men received $ 10, which they had to share with an anonymous partner, as they wanted to, as compensation for the fact that the anonymus partner came to the experiment and was not distributed to the "dictators" group, that had full control over resources. The result shows that women were twice more generous than men. The average amount donated by them to an anonymous partner, was $ 1.60 while the average amount donated by men was $ 0.82. Among women, only 1.47% have donated nothing, compared to 60% of men. Also, 30% of them have donated at least $ 3, compared with only 10% of men.[5] I shall, therefore, question how can women expect men to make policy especially for women, while 60% of them are not willing to share resources with someone else? This is also a good argument in favor of imposing gender quotas in Parliament, assuming that men wouldn't be willing to voluntary give up power.

A series of three experiments conducted by Van Vugt, De Cramer and P. Janssen had shown that men cooperate more within the group if the group is in competition with another group than in the situation where the group they belong to is not a competition. Cooperation of women has not changed significantly in the case of competition between groups. However, within the group, when there is no competition, women cooperate more than men. Though, when there is competition

---

[2] Mihaela Miroiu, Drumul catre autonomie. Teorii politice feministe. (Iasi: Polirom, 2004), 16

[3] Mary Glenn Wiley, "Sex Roles in Games*", Sociometry* 36 (1973): 526, . Accessed January 28, 2012. http://www.jstor.org/stable/2786248

[4] Michael Tomasello, *Why we cooperat*e. (Massachusetts: Massachusetts Institute of Technology, 2009), 49

[5] Catherine Eckel, and . Philip J. Grossman, Men, Women and Risk Aversion: Experimental Evidence. In C.R. Plott and V.L. Smith, Handbook of Experimental Economics Results. (Amstedam: North-Holland, 2008), 730 between groups, women cooperated approximately to the same extent as they did when there was no competition, while men cooperated almost twice more.[6] This is a very interesting fact, if we consider the possible competition between women and men, for example, in sharing resources and common property.

As we know, for women in Romania, there was never the "right moment" to enjoy rights and direct access to resources.[7] So I could say that this study strengthens the hypothesis that Romanian men behaved as being in a competition between groups trying, to remove half of the competitors.[8]

4. Application in private life

I consider that the results of these researches are relevant to study the behavior of individuals in private life. There are many situations even in family life that can be explained through prisoner's dilemma type of games. From the division of roles in the household, the education of children up to the decision to divorce, family life can be translated by a long series of prisoner's dilemma type of situations.

To illustrate such a possible situation, I will take as an example a married couple that has a child and whose dilemma is who to deal with its care. I will assume that each of the actors is rational and tends to maximize its own welfare. I will not take into account the feelings, principles or other emotional factors. I will show the situation from three points of view, of each rational actor involved - the mother's point of view, then the father's and then of the group's:

From the perspective of the mother (Table 1)

- If both cooperate, each of them will lose a moderate amount of time and energy, including the mother;
- If mother cooperates and father does not cooperate, the mother will lose maximum amount of time and energy;
- If the mother does not cooperate but the father does, she wouldn't lose anything, but she will even be able to use her time and energy doing enjoyable activities for herself;
- If none of them will cooperate, no one will lose time and energy but the child will be untidy and the task will not be completed.

Mother's perspective	Mother cooperates	Mother does not cooperate
Father cooperates	4	5

[6] Van Vugt, M., De Cramer, D. si Janssen, P, "Gender Differences in Cooperation and Competition. The Male-Warrior Hypothesis." Psychological Science 18 (2007): 19-23, Accessed January 30, 2012. http://www.fed.cuhk.edu.hk/~lchang/material/Evolutionary/cooperation%20and%20competition.pdf

[7] Mihaela Miroiu, Drumul catre autonomie. Teorii politice feministe. (Iasi: Polirom, 2004), 110

[8] Mihaela Miroiu, Drumul catre autonomie. Teorii politice feministe. (Iasi: Polirom, 2004), 95

Father does not cooperate	0	-1

Table 1

From the perspective of the father (Table 2)

- If both cooperate, each of them will lose a moderate amount of time and energy, including the father;
- If father cooperates and mother does not cooperate, the father will lose maximum amount of time and energy;
- If the father does not cooperate but the mother does, he wouldn't lose anything, but he will even be able to use his time and energy doing enjoyable activities for himself;
- If none of them will cooperate, no one will lose time and energy but the child will be untidy and the task will not be completed.

Father's perspective	Father cooperates	Father does not cooperate
Mother cooperates	4	5
Mother does not cooperate	0	-1

Table 2

Group perspective (Table 3)

- Best situation for the group is when both partners cooperate
- The middle situation is when only one parner cooperates and the other defects
- The worst situation is when none of them cooperates

Group perspective	Mother cooperates	Mother does not cooperate
Father cooperates	5	2
Father does not cooperate	2	-1

Table 3

We see, therefore, that each of them, individually speaking, has more to gain if he/she defects and the other cooperates. However, there is a chance that, if both defect, the task is not accomplished, that would be the worst possible outcome. However, considering the results of the previously mentioned studies, which concluded that women are more cooperative than men, especially when communication is allowed between partners, the probability that the mother will be the one who cooperates is higher. If she cooperates, it would result either the middle individual situation (see Table 1), but the best for the group, in which both partners cooperate (see Table 3), or the weakest individual situation, but the middle for the group, where only she cooperates and the partner defects. Based on these facts, many men choose to defect, so they get the best individual situation. These are the most common family types, according to studies, in Romania: those in which the care of the children is in the mother's charge. The smaller percentage of men who choose to cooperate leads to the existence of partnership-based families, in which both partners share the tasks equally. This game model can be applied in many situations of private life concerning common property or collective action.

Previous studies, based on cooperative games, have shown that women are more oriented towards community and society and men are more oriented to individual. Paradoxically, however, in the real world, women are responsible for the individual space, for the private life and the men for the society. As we saw in the example above, I believe this also happens because of women's inclination towards cooperation in private life.

This behavior of women is and was useful to them as many times as they were given the opportunity to manifest in public space, especially during the battle to win their political and social rights. Let's think, for example, that the suffragettes would have been less cooperative within the group. Would women had obtained the right to vote if each of them would have chosen to defect and let someone else deal with this situation? I think I can infere from these studies that there is a greater possibility that in cooperation games, "the free rider" to be men than women. In this case, I can not help wondering, rhetorically - of course, why public goods are not managed by women, considering the fact that they are more cooperative and therefore it can be assumed that they would have the ability to manage them more efficiently than men do.

"The tragedy of common goods" is often described using prisoner's dilemma type of games. In general, the "tragedy" comes from the fact that each individual tends not to cooperate with others in order to achieve a common goal, but to defect in order to maximize their personal profit. Most studies say, however, that women are more cooperative and more altruistic than men. This means that in cases where players are women, the "tragedy" is less likely to happen.

5. Conclusions

In conclusion, the fact that women are the ones that usually take care of the house and family, may depend, in the cases when they are given the choice, of their inclination towards cooperation and altruism. But often, the choice they make is not only because of their inclination to cooperate, but also due to their partner's inclination to defect.

However, the increased tendency to cooperation makes women be more valuable for the group and therefore, when choosing it, for society or community. If women are more oriented towards the society, being more willing to cooperate and men are more oriented towards the individual, being more selfish, perhaps a reversal of roles between women and men would be needed for a better functioning of the society. Just that, given the inclination of women to cooperate, I have reasons to believe that a reversal of roles wouldn't necessarily lead also to a reversal of gender statuses. Being more cooperative would not, automatically, make women to be directed exclusively to public life and to "defect" in private life, as at this time it does not make them focus only on private life. These choices are made, or should be made, depending on personal preferences.

I think that in the future this issue needs to be the subject of more experiments that take into account the conditions in which women are more likely to cooperate, to see if, indeed, gender roles and cooperative behavior are interdependent.

If gender roles and cooperative behavior are interdependent, women may be caught in a vicious circle: they cooperate because of gender roles and gender roles tend to preserve because they cooperate. If men are also caught in the same vicious circle, it means the only possible option is to maintain the status quo. Due to the fact that this is not desirable, I believe that the only way out is through policies to facilitate the removal of traditional gender roles, both for women and men. If the two variables are indeed interdependent, this will lead to the modification of the cooperative behavior so that there wouldn't be a "female specific" and a "male specific" anymore, but individuals will be free to cooperate or not, depending on each individual situation. Of course, we can hope for a world where most people, and not most women will choose to cooperate for mutual benefit.

References

- Catherine C.Eckel, Philip J. Grossman. "Are Woman Less Selfish than Men?: Evidence form Dictatorial Experiments". The Economic Journal 108 (1998): 726-35. Accessed January 28, 2012.
- http://www.jstor.org/stable/2565789
- Catherine C.Eckel, Philip J. Grossman. Men, Women and Risk Aversion: Experimental Evidence. In C.R. Plott and V.L. Smith, Handbook of Experimental Economics Results. Amstedam: North-Holland, 2008.
- Mihaela Miroiu. Drumul catre autonomie. Teorii politice feministe. Iasi: Polirom, 2004.
- Michael Tomasello. Why we cooperate. Massachusetts: Massachusetts Institute of Technology, 2009.
- M. Van Vugt, D. De Cramer, P. Janssen, "Gender Differences in Cooperation and Competition. The Male-Warrior Hypothesis." Psychological Science 18 (2007): 19-23. Accessed January 30, 2012. http://www.fed.cuhk.edu.hk/~lchang/material/Evolutionary/cooperation%20and%20competition.pdf
- Glenn M. Wiley. "Sex Roles in Games". Sociometry 36 (1973): 526-541 . Accessed January 28, 2012.
- http://www.jstor.org/stable/2786248

WOMEN WRITERS AND THEIR CONTRIBUTION TO THE DEVELOPMENT OF ROMANIAN INTERWAR DRAMA

CARMEN D. CARAIMAN[1]

Abstract

During the interwar period, feminine literature[2] was no longer perceived as a bizarre cultural phenomenon in Romania, at least not by mature and balanced critics, such as E. Lovinescu, G. Ibrăileanu and Tudor Vianu. At the time, Romanian drama and theatre life[3] developed considerably and feminine playwriting benefited from the creative spirit of the epoch and from a more flexible political, social and cultural context.

Although it did not fundamentally innovate Romanian dramatic discourse, feminine interwar playwriting furthered the literary tradition initiated by their 19th century predecessors and managed to come up with new topics and typologies.

The re-interpretation of past and often forgotten texts is a necessary task for literary history whereby critics complete the information upon which we rely to depict an epoch.

Keywords: Romanian interwar drama, women writers, innovative topics, female characters, feminine writing.

Introduction

The concept of feminine literature / writing has been differently approached in the course of time: from a sociological, historical, political, religious or cultural point of view. As far as literary critics are concerned, we can identify oscillating positions among specialists: the extremists (who either support the existence of an undoubtfully particular stylistic pattern in literary texts, which they decode by means of gendered practices[4], or who deny[5] any functional value of the concept) and the balanced critics (such as: Elena Zaharia-Filipas[6], Ioana Pârvulescu[7], Sultana Craia[8], Bianca Burța-Cernat[9] a.o., who primarily make use of the aesthetic criterion when interpreting literary texts).

The method of investigation we have adopted in our paper is the latter one. Consequently, the aesthetic value was the main principle we used when selecting the texts[10] that we have analysed in [1] Senior Lecturer, „Nicolae Titulescu" University of Bucharest, (email: cdcaraiman@univnt.ro / caraiman_carmen@yahoo.com).

[2] In our paper, we use the phrase feminine literature/writing to refer to literary works created by women writers.

[3] During the interwar period, theatre life flourished in Romania. New private theatre companies were set up (Compania Excelsior, Teatrul Maria Filotti, Teatrul Maria Ventura, Teatrul Popular, Teatrul Ligii Culturale, Teatrul Mic, Teatrul Fantazio, Teatrul 13 plus 1 and others). Private theatres came up with a fresh vision over topics, stage interpretation and stage direction and they managed to survive despite the "anticultural" taxes imposed by the state upon private theatres. A new generation of young stage directors appeared – Camil Petrescu (supporter of "total stage direction"), V.I. Popa, Ion Marin Sadoveanu, Haig Acterian, Soare Z. Soare, Mihai Zirra and Ion Șahighian (supporters of expressionism) – who approached the dramatic text in a new way.

[4] For a straightforward presentation of the main terms used to define gender writing, we recommend Anne Cranny-Francis, Wendy Waring, Pam Stravropoulos, Joan Kirkby. *Gender Studies. Terms and Debate*s, Palgrave Macmillan, NY, 2003.

[5] Eugen Negrici, Iluziile literaturii române, Bucuresti: Editura Cartea Românească, 2008.

[6] Zaharia-Filipas, Elena, Studii de literatură feminină, Bucuresti: Editura Paideia, 2004.

[7] Ioana Pârvulescu, Alfabetul doamnelor, Bucuresti: Editura Crater, 1999.

[8] Sultana Craia, Îngeri, demoni si muieri, Bucuresti: Editura Univers Enciclopedic, 1999.

[9] Burța-Cernat, Bianca, Fotografie de grup cu scriitoare uitate: proza feminina interbelica, Bucuresti: Cartea Romaneasca, 2011.

[10] In our paper, we have analysed two plays that we consider representative for Romanian interwar playwriting: Luminița by Ticu Archip and Bătrânul [The Old Man] by Hortensia Papadat-Bengescu.

our paper. Finally, we have pointed out the main particularities that interwar feminine dramatic discourse acquired in the two most representatives dramas written by Romanian female playwrights: typologies (basically the feminine ones, which are unique), topics (which can be coined as feminist since they attack patriarchal mentality) and the structure of the dialogue (the way in which replies function in the text: as a mirror that establishes the dominant position in dialogue).

If the first Romanian women playwrights (Constanța Dunca-Schiau, Sofia Nădejde, Nelli Cornea a.o.) regarded theatre as an instrument by which they could directly send the audience their feminist message while sacrifying the aesthetical value of their literary works, the second generation of Romanian women playwrights – represented by Hortensia Papadat-Bengescu, Ticu Archip and Igena Floru[11] – brought psychological depth to the profile of their feminine characters and also created well-built and coherent dramatic conflicts. Thus, feminine characters were depicted in relation to the social condition of Romanian women during the interwar period and in relation to their particular psychological profile. Moreover, the stage evolution of feminine characters was no longer a merely dull illustration of several dramatic destinies, but rather an in-depth depiction of the feminine universe and its particular characteristics in Romanian interwar patriarchal society.

The topics developed by the two writers were in part considered taboo (see the debaucherous life of Suzana and her husband in Luminița[12] or the immorally distructive influence of parents upon their child) or inadequte for traditionalist Romanian society (see Gina's critical attitude to patriarchal family in Bătrânul[13]).

The male dramatis personae were no longer the key characters in the plays written by women playwrights. On the contrary, the female character was brought into the centre of the dramatic universe.

Our attempt to bring into evidence the original typologies, topic and language innovations brought by the Romanian interwar feminine playwriting is meant to complete a fictional space which is insufficiently explored by literary Romanian criticism. Finally, our goal was to re-evaluate forgotten aesthetically valuable plays – Bătrânul and Luminița – which could be successfully represented on the stage today.

Hortensia Papadat-Bengescu. Social drama

One of the main reasons for which Hortensia Papadat-Bengescu[14]'s playwriting is less popular with the Romanian readers / theatre amateurs can be justified by her remarkable success as a prose writer. However, the author manifested a particular interest in playwriting from the very beginning of her literary career, perhaps under the influence of her uncle[15], Bengescu-Dabija[16] (an important playwright at the time). In fact, Hortensia Papadat-Bengescu's first publications dealt with theatre life: Sur la mort de Pierre Liciu in La Politique magazine, 1912, followed by an article on Bataille's literary work and several attempts to write theatre. Hortensia Papadat-Bengescu wrote her first play Povârnişul [The Slope], later on known as A căzut o stea (1939) [A Star Has Fallen], in [11] Igena, Floru, Fără reazem. București: Editura Librăriei Socec & Co., 1922.

[12] Ticu Archip, Luminița, București: Editura S.A.D.R., 1928.

[13] Hortensia Papadat-Bengescu, Teatru, București: Editura pentru Literatură, , 1965; the volume Teatru [Theatre] includes the following plays: A căzut o stea [A Star Has Fallen], Bătrânul [The Old Man], Medievală [Medieval Play], Sora mea, Ana [My Sister, Ana]. The first night of Bătrânul [The Old Man] was in 1920, at the National Theatre from Bucharest, on 2nd March1920; the play also enjoyed appreciation in Iași, in 1983 – see Ioan Holban, Hortensia Papadat-Bengescu, Editura Albatros, București, 1995;

[14] In 1923, Hortensia Papadat-Bengescu becomes a member of the Romanian Playwrights Society.

[15] According to Florin Mihăilescu, Introducere în opera Hortensiei Papadat-Bengescu, Editura Minerva, București, 1975;

[16] see Hortensia Papadat-Bengescu, Autobiografie, in Adevărul literar şi artistic, 11 July, 1937, no. 866, page 5;

1915. 31 years later she made the last attempt to write drama - Medievală (1946) [Medieval Play]. Between 1915 and 1946, the author published the social drama Bătrânul [The Old Man], which we regard as her masterpiece, followed by a mediocre play Lulu, inspired by E. Lovinescu's similarly entitlted novel, and the unfinished drama Sora mea, Ana [My Sister, Ana].

Hortensia Papadat-Bengescu's constant effort to publish theatre is also mirrored in her letters to G. Ibrăileanu and Camil Baltazar. The author considered that the difficult political context our country was undergoing at the time was an important inconvenient for building a career as a playright: "I think that now it is not the right time for fairly assessing an intellectual work because currently the events are too intense and no one is ready to make a right evaluation. I think that now a good work (everyone hopes to have written well) might be regarded with a sort of anger and unstable indifference."[17] (our translation)

In an interview with Felix Aderca, Hortensia Papadat-Bengescu confesses that technical problems she came across in the attempt to represent a play on the stage constituted another obstacle in her career as a playright: "... if the obstacles a play comes across /.../ wouldn't be so big, maybe I would write only theatre".[18] (our translation)

According to the information we have concerning theatre[19] performances, the social plays written by Hortensia Papadat-Bengescu and the psychological plays written by Ticu Archip and Igena Floru were rarely represented on the stage. The best plays published by Hortensia Papadat-Bengescu and Ticu Archip (Bătrânul and Luminita) shocked literary critics and the theatre audience that found them abominable. The less aesthetically valuable plays written by the three women writers (Fără reazem [Without Support], Inelul[20] [The Ring] and Lulu) did not disturb the patriarchal mentality of the time and did not impress critics or theatre amateurs either; in fact, they had no echo.

During the interwar period, the most successful plays were comedies (Al. Kirițescu, Th. Muşatescu), "pitoresque and sentimental theatre"[21] (V.I. Popa, G.M. Zamfirescu) and "intellectualized farse"[22] (Mihail Sebastian). In this context, feminine playwriting must have appeared isolated since it did not fit the mainstream voice.

Besides political context and technical difficluties involved by the attempt to represent a play on the sate, the audience was in Hortensia Papadat-Bengescu's opinion another obstacle that a playwright had to face: "Then, after you have enjoyed the play, you have to confront the audience, which is a quite appalling experience. Many playrights know this feeling especially those who do not write in order to flatter the audience..."[23]

---

[17] Scrisori către G. Ibrăileanu, M. Bordeianu, Gr. Botez , I. Lazarescu and Al. Teodorescu; preface Al. Dima and N. Popa, Bucureşti: Editura pentru Literatură, 1966, pag. 67: „Cred că nu e deloc timpul bun pentru o evaluare justă a unei lucrări intelectuale, spectacolul evenimentelor e încă mult prea viu, interesul fiecăruia e prea dislocat pentru o apreciere. Cred că acum o lucrare bună (fiecare speră că a făcut bine) s-ar pierde într-o indiferență nervoasă şi mobilă." (original text);

[18] Felix Aderca, Mărturia unei generatii, Editura „Națională" S. Ciornei, Bucuresti, 1929, pag. 217: „…dacă piedicile ce se pun în calea unei piese...n-ar fi atât de mari, cine ştie dacă n-aş scrie numai teatru." (original text);

[19] See Ioan Massoff, Teatrul românesc, vol. V, Editura Minerva, Bucureşti, 1974; see the following journals: Rampa (1920-1939), Teatrul (1923), Sburătorul (1920-1922, 1926-1927);

[20] Ticu Archip, Inelul, Editura Socec et Co., Bucureşti, 1922;

[21] Ov. S. Crohmălniceanu, Literatura română între cele două războaie mondiale, volumul III, Bucureşti: Editura Minerva, 1975, pag. 9.

[22] Ov. S. Crohmălniceanu, op. cit., pag. 91;

[23] I. Valerian, De vorbă cu doamna Hortensia Papadat-Bengescu, in Viața Literară, an I, 1926, nr. 29, pag. 1: „Apoi cu teatrul după ce te-ai delectat, mai rămâne publicul, adică ceva foarte înspăimântător. E un sentiment cunoscut de mulți confrați dramaturgi şi probabil de acei anume care atunci când scriu nu se gândesc să măgulească publicul..." (original text);

Although Hortensia Papadat-Bengescu's plays do not have a stable aesthetic value, they have unitary topics: "marital disagreements"[24] and the analysis of matrimonial conflicts are psychologically investigated in all the plays written by the author.

Povârnişul [The Slope] illustrates the marital drama of a woman, Simona Demir, who fails to be happy in all her love affairs. After falling apart with Radu Demir, her first husband, she has to face another disappointment – her marriage to Ian Balli:"Deeply disappointed with her marriage to a lawyer, Radu Demir, who offences her dignity, considering her to be his own <<property>>, Simona, the main character in A Star Has Fallen, falls out with her husband hoping to recover affectively."[25]

The novelty of the play consists in the writer's attempt to create a complex feminine psychology characterized by obscurity, unpredictability, soul fragility and the permanent feeling that she is a misfit in her marriages and in her role as a mother.

Simona Demir illustrates the inadaptation of a woman to the patriarchal background that marriage confines her to. The feeling that her sentimental life is a failure and her emotional unbalance gradually isolate Simona Demir from her family and friends: "Simona's drama is the drama of moral solitude because she can no longer live <<with or without people>>."[26] Her suicide is a desperate gesture by which she attempts to free herself from social cliches and her mind labyrinth.

The topic of the play and the typology of the feminine character are specific for psychological drama and should have been represented on the stage by adequate dramatic techniques. Unfortunately, the way the text is conceived reduces the characters' psychological complexity so that the dramatic conflict lacks force: Simona's psychological decline is represented indirectly by means of dialogues between the secondary characters in the play or by means of long and boring monologues. Thus, the reader has the impression that Simona's psychological evolution is perceived at the surface of the text without being illustrated by the heroine's play and stage evolution. The suicidal scene puzzles the reader/audience and it is perceived as a surprise by the other dramatis personae, too.

Simona's husbands are quite different in nature. Radu wishes to succeed in his career by all means and is ready to sacrifice his wife's happiness to see his dream come true. In his opinion, his wife is part of his fortune alongside with his property – a commonly shared view at the time:

Radu: "I do not have to be cautious to my wife...I am tired of having to handle the others with gloves...

Simona: Yes! Let us spare the others...Wife is a property...You do not have to be cautious to her...She is insured...she eats and sleeps...What else can she wish for?"[27]

Ian, her second husband, though generous and sincere in his feelings, fails to make Simona happy, too.

The first modest attempts to write theatre were followed by Hortensia Papadat-Bengescu's masterpiece - Bătrânul [The Old Man], in which the author approaches her favourite topics: woman's condition in a patriarchal society, degenerescence and upstartness.

Bătrânul [The Old Man] innovates Romanian feminine character with Gina Delescu, an intellectual and contradictory woman, oscilating between sense and sensibility, a defensive and offensive attitude towards life misfortunes. Gina verbally sanctions and defies everything which

---

[24] Dicţionarul scriitorilor români, Editura Albatros, Bucureşti, 2000, pag. 609;

[25] Constantin Ciopraga, Hortensia Papadat-Bengescu, Bucureşti: Editura Cartea Românească, 1973, pag. 89: „Profund decepționată de mariajul cu un avocat (Radu Demir) care-i ofensează demnitatea, considerând-o <<proprietate>>, Simona din A căzut o stea se desparte, sperând într-o redresare alături de armatorul Ian Balli. Noua experiență nu e mai fericită, fluidul sentimental care s-o apropie de Balli, om delicat de altfel, lipseşte." (original text);

[26] Constantin Ciopraga, op. cit., pag. 89-90.

[27] Original text: „Radu: N-am nevoie să fiu prudent cu nevastă-mea…Destul trebuie să-ţi pui mănuşi cu alţii…

Simona: Da! Să menajăm străinii…Nevasta e o proprietate…Pentru ea nici o precauţiune…E asigurată…mănâncă şi doarme…Ce mai poate dori?"; seems ridiculous or false to her, from patriarchal morality to political upstartness. Her husband seems to epitomise everything she criticizes most: shallowness, lie and lack of principles. The stage representation of this feminine character shocked the theatre audience and some of the literary critics[28] because of her direct, unscrupulous attitude towards her husband.

Many of those who read or saw the stage representation of Hortensia Papadat-Bengescu's play noticed that the writer's style is quite aggressive and virile: "dealing with feminine topics, Mrs. Hortensia Papadat-Bengescu writes about them in an incissive, almost scientific manner and with Bătrânul she created the most mature and virile work that a Romanian brain has ever produced."[29]

Most critics interpreted the play unfavourably. E. Lovinescu[30] was one of the few who praised it underlining the author's objectivity in approaching her topics.[31]

The main conflict of the play (between, on the one hand, Gina and Luca Delescu, symbolically known as Bătrânul [The Old Man] and, on the other hand, all the family members – Mrs. Delescu, Cleo and Jean – the uninstructed, penniless backbiters living on Luca's money) is multiplied and gives birth to a series of other subconflicts (between Gina and her husband, Dinu Delescu; between Cleo, Dinu's sister, and the Old Man; between Dinu and his brothers).

The social topic of the play is represented in a determinist manner. The naturalist echoes of Hortensia Papadat-Bengescu's literary work can be identified in Bătrânul in Luca Deleanu. The existential aversion Luca feels to having a mentally alienated child (Codea) makes him hate his wife and family. Hence his refuge in science.

Similarly, Gina is trapped in an unhappy marriage. Brought up by Luca Delescu (the Old Man)'s family after her parents died, Gina gets married Luca's son, Dinu Delescu, the successful, unprincipled politician and her unfaithful husband. This marriage makes her feel as if she were a commodity which is exchanged between her husband, Dinu, and her supposedly lover, Sandu:

"Dinu: ... You love my wife and she loves you (Sandu tries to protest gently). You are her friend and she has found a refuge in your arms. I imagine I were in your place. Things would not be different. It happens that we are rivals. It is a domain in which hierarchies do not exist. Now I want your friend. In politics, you may be in the opposition fighting against me with my own weapons. This is how I understand life... (Act IV, sc. VI)"[32]

Gina's presence in Luca's laboratory helps her develop her universe of knowledge. Thus, she evolves intellectually and adopts a pollemic attitude towards vanity, snobism, hypocrisy, demagogy and prejudice. The contrast between the group represented by Gina-Luca Delescu and the other characters constitute the main frame upon which the author builds her ironnical discourse.

In the author's opinion, woman's unhappiness is mainly caused by her soul solitude to which she is condemned by patriarchal society:

"Gina: You are talking of divorced women or women whose husbands died. I was talking about widows. About women who find no comfort for their souls in the moral support that their husbands should offer them. I was talking about modern odalisques."[33]

---

[28] see Felix Aderca, op.cit., pag. 216-217;

[29] Const. Ciopraga, op.cit., pag. 13: „ocupându-se de feminități, d-na Hortensia Papadat-Bengescu le tratează cu o aprigă inciziune, aproape ştiinţifică, iar în Bătrânul ne-a dat una din cele mai mature şi mai virile opere pe care le-a produs un creier românesc.";

[30] E. Lovinescu, Bătrânul, in Sburătorul, an II, No. 45, 19th March, 1921, pag. 289;

[31] E. Lovinescu, Bătrânul (II), in Sburătorul, an I, no. 51, 1st May, 1920, pag. 553-554.

[32] Original text: „Dinu: ... Iubeşti pe nevastă-mea şi te iubeşte (Sandu protestează slab). Eşti amicul ei şi s-a refugiat în braţele dumitale. Îmi închipuiesc că eu aş fi dumneata. Lucrurile nu s-ar fi petrecut altfel. Întâmplarea ne face rivali. E un domeniu unde nu sunt ierarhii. Pe amica dumitale o vreau eu acum. În politică mâine vei putea fi dumneata la tribuna adversă, luptând împotriva mea cu armele date de mine. Aşa înţeleg eu viaţa ... (Actul IV, sc. VI);

[33] Original text: „Gina: Dumneata vorbeşti de femeile divorţate sau cărora le-au murit bărbaţii. Eu vorbeam de văduve. De femeile care nu găsesc sprijinul sufletesc, nici sprijinul moral pe care au dreptul să-l ceară de la bărbatul lor. De cadânele moderne." (Actul IV, sc. V).

The discussion on the ordinary sin for which woman is considered to be responsible becomes an opportunity for Gina Delescu to cast doubt upon the biblical myth:

"Dinu: Man, after Eve committed the original sin, covered woman [with a veil] in order to reduce the number of serpents.

Gina: The first woman may have invented it [the veil] after having seen the real face of her man and instinctively covered her eyes." (Act V, Scene II)[34]

The scene in which Gina compares demagogy with puppet games is very suggestive; in fact she criticizes their lack of sincerity:

"Gina: Discourses have a strange effect on me. The effect which puppets had on me when I was a child. Something empty of real meaning... We cannot take politics for granted." (Act III, Scene IV)[35]

Gina's and Luca's running away from home represent the climax of the dramatic conflict. Their predictable return home mirrors the impossiblity to change anything in their lives. Thus, Gina's evolution – apparently circulary (from an unhappy wife to a potential frivolous woman and back to the statute of the unhappy betrayed wife) – illustrates the inner stages she follows, from revolt to resignation:

Gina: Let us go home. I am not made for love or for ambitions. These storms require stronger natures. I was brought up in the middle of ... test tubes, among two old persons...I'm afraid! I am so happy to have you! Let us proceed our work...and leave the other do their own. I have tried to prove my power. When I think of Sandu, of Dinu's lover, of him...Their lives seem so difficult...It is so difficult to live...Let us vegetate... (The Old Man is ridden by thoughts) Dad! Judging by their laws it seems to me that I have sinned.

The Old Man (takes her head in his hands): Does it?...It seems to you, my dear daughter. You have not lived according to their laws to consider that you've made a mistake. You didn't have their joys to be punished with their punishments. They didn't give you anything so that you should feel indebted to them. You've lived according to your own law, alone, like a spider. (Act V, Scene IV)[36]

Bătrânul [The Old Man] is a play about solitude and human condition, in general. However, even if the central character of the play is Luca, the main dramatis persona is Gina. The communication crisis between the couple members and degenerescence bring into evidence woman's soul solitude and the writer's nihilist vision as to human destiny. One cannot ignore the writer's own lifelong regret not to have been allowed to further her studies at the unversity and her being compelled to accept marriage as the only choice in life for a woman. From this point of view, Gina undoubtfully is an alter ego of the writer.

According to Constantin Ciopraga, the literary work published by Hortensia Papadat-Bengescu managed to do more than a feminist campaign for Romanian culture: "Hortensia Papadat-[34] Original text: „Dinu: Bărbatul, după păcatul Evei, a acoperit femeia [cu un văl] ca să micşoreze numărul şerpilor.

---

Gina: Poate că [vălul] l-a inventat prima femeie care a văzut adevărata faţă a bărbatului ei şi a făcut gestul instinctiv de a-şi acoperi ochii." (Actul V, sc. II)

[35] Original text: „Gina: Discursurile îmi fac un efect ciudat. Efectul pe care mi-l făceau în copilărie păpuşile. Ceva vid de sens real... Nu putem lua în serios politica..." (Actul II, sc. IV)

[36] Original text: „Gina: Aidem acasă. Nu sunt nici femeie de iubire, nici de ambiţie. Furtunile astea cer temperamente mai puternice. Eu prea am crescut...în mijlocul eprubetelor, între doi bătrâni…mi-e frică! Ce fericire că te am! Să ne vedem de treabă…să-i lăsăm la treburile lor. Mi-am încercat puterea. Când mă gândesc la Sandu, la amanta lui Dinu, la el…Ce greu e traiul lor…Ce greu e să trăieşti…Aidem să vegetăm… (Bătrânul e gânditor). Tată! Mi se pare că după legile obişnuite am păcătuit.

Bătrânul (îi ia capul între mâini): Ţi se pare?…Ţi se pare, fata tatii. N-ai trăit după legile lor, ca să greşeşti după ele. N-ai avut bucuriile lor, ca să primeşti pedepsele lor. Nu ţi-au dat, ca să le fii datoare. Ai trăit între ei după legea ta, singură, ca un păianjen." (Actul V, sc. IV) Bengescu did not directly support feminist campaigns but her entire literature (comprising many instances in which women are disadvantaged) is subservient to the cause, doing more than some simple campaigns. Structurally, she belongs to the category illustrated by Simone de Beauvoir whose similarly deep perspective illustrates a prolific spirituality."[37]

The feminine issue in Ticu Archip's theatre

At present, Ticu Archip's theatre is hardly ever mentioned by theatre amateurs, critics or the common reader. The main reason for which her theatre is currently so rarely mentioned can be explained by the wrong reception of her masterpiece, Luminița[38], whose topic was labelled as being unacceptably scandalous by the interwar theatre audience.

Her first plays - Inelul[39] and Gură de leu[40] (represented on the National Theatre stage in 1935-1936) - did not convince literary critics or the theatre audience of her dramatic gift[41] and for good reason. Thus, Eugenia Tudor Anton[42] regards Ticu Archip's theatre as a temporary stage in her prose writer career. On the other hand, E. Lovinescu regards her style as symbolist, i.e. using suggestion as a manner of expressing her topics (in both prose and theatre)[43]. The only literary critic who appreciated Ticu Archip as a playright was Felix Aderca: "One is amazed to discover how a writer with a gentle look and inclination is concerned in her mind's laboratory with such an essential problem as the slow decomposing of a family because of one woman's lusts which are probably stirred by her unluck or simply by her sheer nature... We witness a real talent which is still developing."[44]. (our translation)

All the plays written by Ticu Archip deal with woman's psychology and her condition in the Romanian interwar society. Ana in Inelul [The Ring], Suza and Luminița in the similarly entitled play, Dolly in Gură de leu [Lion's Mouth] – all illustrate feminine soul which is approached in relation to the bourgoisie social background, to their moral and spiritual profile and to the degree of independence they assume as women.

E. Lovinescu[45] and Felix Aderca[46] notice that the author is inclined towards creating rare feminine characters whose behaviour is scandalous (see Suza in Luminița and Dolly in Gură de leu) or passionate and inclined towards sacrifice (Ana in Inelul).

---

[37] Constantin Ciopraga, op.cit., pag. 10: „Hortensia Papadat-Bengescu nu a întreținut campanii feministe directe, dar întreaga sa literatură (cu multe pagini din care femeile ies dezavantajate) servește tacit cauzei, făcând în acest sens mai mult decât campaniile propriu-zise. Structural, ea aparține categoriei ilustrate de ultimele decenii de Simone de Beauvoir ale cărei priviri, de o egală gravitate, atestă o spiritualitate fecundă." (original text);

[38] Ticu Archip, Luminița, București: Editura Societății Autorilor Dramatici Români, 1928;

[39] Ticu Archip, Inelul, București: Editura Librăriei Socec & Co. S. A., 1922.

[40] Manuscrisul piesei Gură de leu nu este disponibil în biblioteci. Deocamdată nu avem date despre existența lui; un fragment critic despre acest text dramatic, semnat H. Lazu, a fost publicat în Adevărul literar și artistic - anul XIV, 3-XI-1935, nr. 778, pag. 8;

[41] Dezamăgit de piesă, E. Lovinescu a apreciat că titlul acesteia, Gură de leu, ar fi trebuit înlocuit cu Bâlci sentimental, pentru a ilustra tematica ei siropoasă - Eugen Lovinescu, Memorii. Aqauforte, București: Editura Minerva, 1998, pag. 242-243;

[42] Eugenia Tudor Anton, Prefața la vol. Ticu Archip, Soarele negru, București: Editura Minerva, 1983;

[43] E. Lovinescu, Istoria literaturii române contemporane, București: Editura Minerva, 1989, pag. 296;

[44] Felix Aderca, Un debut, în Viața literară, anul III, 21-I-1928, No. 68-70, pag. 17: „Rămâi uimit văzând cum o scriitoare cu înfățișare și apucături blânde e preocupată în laboratorul creierului ei de probleme atât de esențiale ca aceea a descompunerii lente a unei familii prin morbul unei femei cu poftele avivate poate de prea mult nenoroc sau numai de firea ei…Ne aflăm în fața unui talent real, în plină dezvoltare" (text original);

[45] Idem;

[46] Felix Aderca, *De vorbă cu Ticu Archip,*în Adevărul literar și artistic, anul IX, seria a II-a, 6-X-1929, no. 461, 1929, pag. 1-2;

Theatre critics[47] who considered that the topic of Luminița is outrageous referred only to the image of the debaoucherous wife and her distructive spirit (Suza), leaving out the husband's frivolity (Şerban) and his responsibility for his wife's and daughter's unhapiness.

Returning home after 15 years of absence – in which she lived as an adulterous woman – Suza attempts to convince her husband to accept her back home near him and their daughter, Luminița, but in vain. Being refused, Suza triggers between the family members a psychological war whose effects have a dramatic ending. Three conflictual triangles are built: father-daughter, daughter-finacee and mother- daughter.

The dramatic conflict is settled through the sacrifice of the most fragile family member, Luminița. The author's message is that the hypocrit morality of society – which accuses woman of frivolity, disregarding the same sin when it comes to males, – is responsible for Luminița's death.

Moreover, Suza's frivolous behaviour after returning home – illustrated by her attempt to seduce her daughter's fiancé, Vania – must have seemed unacceptable by the bourgeoisie theatre audience. Throughout the play Suza adopts a dissimulated behaviour, trying to identify each one's weak points and to convince herself that she can manipulate the others. Shortly before the play ends, the readers / theatre audience are convinced that Suza is to blame for all her family's unhapiness. However, in the end, we find the real story of the couple. We learn of the real cause which led to the couple's fallout. Considering Şerban guilty of the family disintegration, Suza accuses him of adultery and hold hims responsible for her moral decline:

"Suza: ...I was brought up at your school...I was 16 when you married me...I was younger than Luminita...remember, and you did not even call my name, you did not call me any name, in fact...a few days later you replaced me...(faster). First with a friend, then with a servant...the third must have been a woman from an important family...the fourth..." (Act III, Scene V)[48]

Suza's final discourse brutally destroys the pure image Şerban has built about himself and his wife's past. The effect is that Luminița's inner universe is broken:

"Suza: ...Look at me (to Luminita)...I'm dying for the second time in my life... I died for the first time when I left you...Serban told you...you were little, you couldn't see me...(distinctively). /.../ I leave my daughter, Luminita, my whole soul fortune...my huge soul fortune...I was the lover (Serban wants to intervene) of how many men, Serban, do you know?...the number is not important, many, many, many. /.../ Listen to me, Luminita, listen to me...my mother used to unsew an old coat when she wanted to make a new one... Make a new soul for yourself upon my broken and dirty one... I can no longer hope to do this for me...it's over..." (Act III, Scene V)[49]

Betrayed by her own fiancé, disappointed with her own father, confused by the appearance of her frivolous mother whom she thought dead, Luminta feels that all her reasons for living are lost. The image of the fallen apart family and of the adulterous parents cancel in the young woman's pure soul any reason for living and any hope in an honest and sincere love/relationship.

---

[47] Alex. Călin, Luminița, piesă în 3 acte de domnişoara Ticu Archip la Teatrul Național, în Adevărul literar şi artistic, anul IX, no. 372, 22-I-1928, pag. 6; Nicon, Premiera dela Teatrul Național. O femeie criminală. Numeroşi morți şi răniți. Incendiul unei magazi [sic!]. Şoarecile enigmatic, în Rampa, anul XIII, no. 2992, pag.2; Scarlat Froda, Cronica dramatică. Teatrul Național: Luminița, dramă în 3 acte de d-ra Ticu Archip, în Rampa, anul XIII, no. 2992, pag.4.

[48] „Suza: …la şcoala ta am crescut…aveam 16 ani când m-ai luat…eram mai tânără ca Luminița…adu-ți aminte, nici nu-mi spuneai pe nume, nu-mi spuneai în nici un fel…peste câteva zile m-ai schimbat …(mai repede). Întâi cu o prietenă, pe urmă cu o servitoare…a treia trebuie să fi fost de neam… a patra…" (Actul III, sc. V)

(original text);

[49] „Suza: …Uită-te la mine (Luminței)…mor pentru a doua oară…Întîi a fost când te-am părăsit pe tine…ți-a spus Şerban…erai mică şi nu puteai să mă vezi…(clar). /…/ Las fiicei mele, Luminița, întreaga mea avere sufletească…uriaşa mea avere sufletească…Am fost amanta (gest al lui Şerban)…am fost amanta a câți bărbați, Şerban, tu ştii?…numărul nu importă, mulți, mulți, mulți. /…/ Ascultă-mă, Luminița, ascultă-mă, mama când îşi cosea o haină nouă, descosea alta veche după care croia… După sufletul meu zdrențuit şi soios, croieşte-ți tu altul din stofă nouă şi scumpă… eu nu mai pot spera într-asta, s-a isprăvit…" (Actul III, sc. V) – original text;

The topic of the play was perceived as an abominable offence by theatre critics and the audience and, consequently, they felt obliged to criticise the author fiercely.[50]

The play comes up with an original perspective over the feminine and the masculine characters as well. Şerban and Vania represent new male dramatic personae in Romanian theatre.

Şerban is the image of the coward father who cannot recognize his faults and the negative consequences his behaviour had over his wife and child. On the other hand, Vania's gloomy nature predicts the dramatic end of his fiancée and adoptive family. Suza and Vania are the "intruders" who break the apparent harmony between Şerban and his daughter. Suza and Vania communicate well because they share a common feeling of hatred to Şerban and perceive themselves as outcasts. Suza's frivolous nature encourages Vania's taste for revolt. Moreover, Vania feels only resentment to Serban:

"Suza: Why do you hate him?

Vania: He told me that my dad died because of a mental illness...if he had remained silent about this, I wouldn't have known anything and I wouldn't have been afraid...I would have lived quitely or I would have gone mad, all the same to me. /.../ I owe him my present weakenss and that's why I hate him..." (Act II, Scene V)[51]

The dramatic discourse of the play is cristal clear. The geometrical organization of the scenes in the play leaves the impression that nothing can be added or removed from the text. Finally, it is the dramatic strength of the play which persists and convinces the reader of its aesthetic value.

Conclusions

The interwar dramatic discourse was superior to the 19th century one from an aesthetical point of view.

During the 19th century, the discourse of male-female characters, He-She, could be regarded as comprising a stimulus – an answer [52] (i.e. authoritative statement – obedient reply). As to interwar feminine playwriting, the male character is almost permanently criticized by his life partner's ironical comments which are actually oriented against prejudices. In fact, the male discourse is permanently sabotaged by women's revolting attitude.

As many literary critics noticed (E. Lovinescu, Felix Aderca, Bianca Burţa-Cernat), male characters created by women writers are no longer predominantly depicted as superior personalities or as models to be followed. In fact, they are in an overwhelming percentage depicted as immoral, hypocrite and agressive. Women are most depicted as victims of the unhappy marriages in which they are trapped or as victims of their fragile inner structure or of a society that confines them to the domestic universe without offering them the chance to further education[53]. We could conclude that a negative perception of reality dominated the two writers we have referred to in our study.

---

[50] Felix Aderca, De vorbă cu domnişoara Ticu Archip, în Adevărul literar şi artistic, anul IX, seria a II-a, no. 461, 6-X-1929, pag. 1-2.

[51] „Suza: De ce îl urăşti?

Vania: El mi-a spus că tata a murit nebun...dacă ar fi tăcut, n-aş fi ştiut nimic şi nu mi-ar fi fost teamă...aş fi trăit liniştit, ori aş fi înnebunit, tot una . /.../ Lui îi datorez slăbiciunea mea de acum, şi de asta îl urăsc..." (Actul II, Scena a V-a);

[52] Maria Cvasnâi-Cătănescu, Structura dialogului din textul dramatic cu aplicare la dramaturgia românească, Universitatea din Bucureşti, Facultatea de limba şi literatura română, Bucureşti, 1982.

[53] As we have mentioned above, Hortensia Papadat-Bengescu is was not allowed by her family to further studies and was compelled to accept the marriage to a magistrate; her huge literary success was the result of her effort and the support of G. Ibraileanu and E. Lovinescu; on the other hand, Ticu Archip (her real name was Sevastiţa Archip), the second woman writer we refer to in our paper, used to work as a teaching assistant at the Faculty of Mathematics – The University of Bucharest;

Feminine dramatis personae created by women playwrights during the interwar period hint at a different statute – they refuse to remain obedient to tradition and confined to routine housework activities; they aspire to an independent statute without identifying themselves with the aggresive profile of Tofana in Patima roşie[54]; the new feminine characters (Gina and Suzana) are involved in an ideological fight against contemporary biases. The two characters (Gina and Suzana) adopt a non-conformist attitude to couple problems. Thus, the new feminine characters depart from the traditional perspective proposed by famous contemporary writers (V.I. Popa, Th. Muşatescu, Al. Kiriţescu, Camil Petrescu and others). The 'new woman' answers to her husbands' infidelity with adultery or by simply fleeing from home in a gesture of desperate rebellion. However, the woman's refusal to accept reality as an already made pattern leads to dramatic situations for all family members (see Suzana, Luminita and Serban in Luminiţa, Simona in A căzut o stea, Lola in Fără reazem[55] [Without Support]) or proves to be futile (see Gina's evolution in Bătrânul).

All in all, the short analysis we have developed in the pages of our paper offers a glimpse to texts that could be included in articles/studies on Romanian feminine playwriting and that might determine stage directors to select for future representations. On the other hand, the curious reader may also discover forgotten masterpieces which remained almost unknown to theatre amateurs mainly because of the unfavourable review they received when written or when represented on the stage.

Bibliography

- Aderca, Felix, „Un debut", Viaţa literară, 68-70 (1928): 17.
- Aderca, Felix, „De vorbă cu Ticu Archip", Adevărul literar şi artistic, 461 (1929): 1-2.
- Aderca, Felix. Mărturia unei generatii. Bucuresti: Editura „Naţională" S. Ciornei, 1929, pag. 217.
- Archip, Ticu. Luminiţa. Bucureşti: Editura Societăţii Autorilor Dramatici Români, 1928.
- Archip, Ticu. Inelul. Bucureşti: Editura Librăriei Socec & Co. S. A., 1922.
- Burţa-Cernat, Bianca. Fotografie de grup cu scriitoare uitate: proza feminina interbelica. Bucuresti: Cartea Romaneasca , 2011.
- Călin, Alex., „Luminiţa, piesă în 3 acte de domnişoara Ticu Archip la Teatrul Naţional", Adevărul literar şi artistic, 372 (1928): 6.
- Ciopraga, Constantin. Hortensia Papadat-Bengescu. Bucureşti: Editura Cartea Românească, 1973.
- Cranny-Francis, Anne, Waring, Wendy, Stravropoulos, Pam, Kirkby Joan. *Gender Studies. Terms and Debate*s, NY: Palgrave Macmillan, 2003.
- Crohmălniceanu, Ov. S. Literatura română între cele două războaie mondiale. volumul III, Bucureşti: Editura Minerva, 1975.
- Cvasnâi-Cătănescu, Maria. Structura dialogului din textul dramatic cu aplicare la dramaturgia românească. Bucureşti: Universitatea din Bucureşti, Facultatea de limba şi literatura română, 1982.
- Floru, Igena. Fără reazem. Bucureşti: Editura Librăriei Socec & Co., 1922.
- Froda, Scarlat, „Cronica dramatică. Teatrul Naţional: Luminiţa, dramă în 3 acte de d-ra Ticu Archip", Rampa 2992 (1928): 4.
- Lazu, H., „Gura de leu", Adevărul literar şi artistic, 778 (1935): 8.
- Lovinescu, E. Memorii. Aqauforte. Bucureşti: Editura Minerva, 1998, pag. 242-243.
- Lovinescu, E., „Bătrânul", Sburătorul, an II, 45 (1921): 289.
- Lovinescu, E., „Bătrânul" (II), Sburătorul, 51 (1920): 553-554.
- Lovinescu, E. Istoria literaturii române contemporane, Bucureşti: Editura Minerva, 1989, pag. 296.
- Massoff, Ioan. Teatrul românesc. vol. V, Bucureşti: Editura Minerva, 1974.
- Mihăilescu, Florin. Introducere în opera Hortensiei Papadat-Bengescu. Bucureşti: Editura Minerva, 1975.
- Stefania Mihăilescu. Din istoria feminismului românesc. Antologie de texte (1838-1929). Iasi: Polirom, 2002, pag. 177;

[54] Mihail Sorbul, Patima roşie, Bucureşti: Editura Librăriei şi Tipografiei H. Steinberg, , 1916; [55] Igena Floru, Fără reazem, Editura Librăriei Socec & Co., Bucureşti, 1922.

- Eugen Negrici. Iluziile literaturii române. Bucuresti: Editura Cartea Românească, 2008.
- Nicon, Premiera dela Teatrul Naţional. O femeie criminală. Numeroşi morţi şi răniţi. Incendiul unei magazi [sic!]. Şoarecile enigmatic, Rampa, 2992 (1928): 2.
- Papadat-Bengescu, Hortensia, „Autobiografie", Adevărul literar şi artistic, 866 (1937): 5.
- Papadat-Bengescu, Hortensia. Teatru. Bucureşti, Editura pentru Literatură, 1965.
- Sorbul, Mihail. Patima roşie. Bucureşti: Editura Librăriei şi Tipografiei H. Steinberg, 1916.
- Tudor Anton, Eugenia, Prefaţa la vol. Ticu Archip, Soarele negru, Editura Minerva, Bucureşti, 1983.
- Valerian, I., De vorbă cu doamna Hortensia Papadat-Bengescu, Viaţa Literară, 29 (1926): 1.
- Zaharia-Filipas, Elena. Studii de literatură feminină. Bucuresti: Editura Paideia, 2004.
- Dicţionarul scriitorilor români. Bucureşti: Editura Albatros, 2000, pag. 609.
- Scrisori către G. Ibrăileanu, ediţie îngrijită de M. Bordeianu, Gr. Botez , I. Lazarescu şi Al. Teodorescu; prefaţă de Al. Dima şi N. Popa, Editura pentru Literatură, Bucureşti, 1966.

THE ROLE OF WOMEN IN PRESERVING THE ROMANIAN IDENTITY IN LOCAL ADVERTISING

MĂDĂLINA MORARU (BUGA)[1]

Abstract:
The following paper intends to reveal the involvement of women into coining efficient communication campaigns for different product categories promoted on the Romanian market. Product consumption explicitly depends on target interests and social integration considering its division into two directions according to age groups (the old generation and the young, "new media generation") after the 1989 Revolution. Our main purpose consists in identifying female profiles in Romanian advertising starting from Geert Hofstede's theory. He created a five-dimension model (power distance, individualism/collectivism, gender of nations, uncertainty avoidance, long/short-term orientation) of national culture, by analyzing local and global brands, on the one hand, and different product categories (dairy, coffee and chocolate, drugs, banks and insurance, mobile phones, home appliances), on the other.
This paper will apply the content analysis method, whose purpose is to reveal the Romanian identity promoted by the female characters of at least 50 TV commercials. In order to get a wealth of information, this study focuses on important aspects such as tradition, independence vs. involvement in family responsibilities, authority vs. subordination, living environment (city or countryside), as well as relationships with men and children. At the end of this research, we expect to reach two important goals. The first one is to establish a relationship between product categories, local identity, and the Romanian target, which is still in transition after the Anti-Communist Revolution. As for the second goal, we hope to discover some female patterns which are very well exploited in Romanian advertising based on cultural and social background. The hypothesis that strongly supports this research is that women have an essential role in preserving local identity, appealing to the Romanian consumer in commercials created especially for them.

Keywords: women, advertising, profiles, identity, Romanian market.

Introduction

The present paper is concerned with the relationship between women and national identity , which is often visible in the advertising field because consumers project their image on products and preserve brand retention. We strongly believe this article is equally important for advertising and gender studies, because the sample belongs to the first category, while female role is an issue under constant investigation. This research is essential for gender studies from several points of view, such as associating women with the Romanian local identity, recognizing female involvement in preserving the Romanian roots and understanding the reason why they are so frequently present in commercials, regardless of brand or product categories. The main purpose of this study is to create a connection between product features and Romanian female identity. The second goal is to find an advertising profile of the Romanian woman, based on their involvement in family and social life. Our starting point focuses on the simple idea that the role of women is more relevant in local commercials in comparison to the role of men, because of family portrayals social responsibilities and female power.

[1] Senior Lecturer, Ph. D., Post-Doctoral Researcher at the University of Bucharest (within the strategic grant POSDRU/89/1.5/S/62259). at the Faculty of Journalism and Communication Studies, (moraru_mada12@yahoo.com, morarumadalina@hotmail.com). This work was supported by the strategic grant POSDRU/89/1.5/S/62259, Project „Applied social, human and political sciences. Postdoctoral training and postdoctoral fellowships in social, human and political sciences," co-financed by the European Social Fund within the Sectorial Operational Program Human Resources Development 2007-2013.

The best way to reach all these research goals is to analyze aspects such as tradition, independence vs. involvement in family responsibility, authority vs. subordination, living environment, as well as relationship with men and children, by applying content analysis. The second step is to check the validity of Geert Hofstede's theory, which presupposes to identify the features of five-dimension models of the Romanian national culture in local advertising and the role of women in each case.

The role of women in promoting brand values is tightly connected to stereotypes, sexuality, and representations of male-female relationships. Erving Goffmann (1979) is one of the researchers who believed that gender relationships are socially constructed and that women are presented in ads as weak and sensitive. He developed several codes of understanding female semiotics in ads. Lindner [2]also states that since the 1950s there has been a shift in the depiction of women in advertising. Women are less often portrayed in traditional roles as housewife or mother and more often in professional roles. A contemporary researcher, Tom Reichert [3]wrote a very inspired book of advertising history, based on the feminist evolution. Analyzing the image of femininity over the ages, he concluded that advertising paid more attention to some categories, such as fragrances, coffee, travel agencies, cosmetics, given the connection between the female personality and the features of these products and less to women in connection to national or cultural identity.

2. Content:

2.1.Statistical data about men and women in Romania

Before we start approaching our research hypotheses, it is essential to emphasize he balance between men and women in Romania, according to the statistical data provided by the population censuses, registration from civil register evidence, and other administrative sources collected in 2008 by The National Institute of Statistic[4]. According to quantitative results, population reports showing gender and area prove women are dominant both in cities and in the countryside, with a greater difference margin in the rural area. Therefore, women's presence justifies their involvement in various activities and their role in preserving family values. Another very important issue that helps this paper reach its purpose, is the historically analyzed rate of living in the urban and rural areas,. A chart provided by the same survey showed a very steady percentage of people living in cities and in the countryside, between 1990 and 2008. For example, in 1990 45.8% of the Romanian population lived in the urban area, and 54.2 % in villages, while in 2008, 55% of respondents lived in cities and 45% in the countryside. These data highlight the stability of life-styles and a conservative society that does not suddenly change its structure of family and gender roles.

In 2008 and 2009 (before the economic crisis started), The National Institute of Statistic came up with additional data about the population's involvement in economic activities based on gender and living area which proves the male dominance on the market, despite of the fact that men are less represented demographically.

2.2. Theoretical framework

Geert Hofstede carried out a model based on five dimensions of national culture that considerably helps analyze the differences and similarities between cultures: power distance, individualism/collectivism, gender of nations, uncertainty avoidance, long-short-term orientation Extremely important is that Hofstede validated those two models by analyzing television commercials and print advertisements as a first research method.

---

[2] Katharina Lindner, "Images of Women in General Interest and Fashion Magazine Advertisements from 1955 to 2002," Sex Roles 51 (2004): 409-420.

[3] Tom Reichert, The Erotic History of Advertising (New York: Prometheus Book, 2003), 13-19.

[4] http://www.insse.ro/cms/files/Anuar%20statistic/02/02%20Populatie_ro.pdf, p. 2, accessed January 21st .

Power distance[5] reveals consumer difference in communication behaviour and the main values promoted in advertising reflect both authority and social status. This research strives to prove that local brands are less powerful, while global ones seem to be independent and influence the former. Global brands bring to light social status in high power distance cultures. The power distance influences not only consumer image within a society, but also brand perception. This concept was interestingly related to other research terms such as cultural paradox, values, and authority, by other researchers over the years. "Authority" and "celebrity" are keywords that help define power distance as the degree of understanding life differences between the powerful and the less fortunate.

The model of individualism versus collectivism[6] debates the relationship between cultures individually focused on their values as well as cultures preoccupied by social integration and harmony. In the first case, people are concerned with being unique by relying on themselves. Obviously, in terms of advertising, individual culture rejects global brands more than the collectivistic one, considering that consumers are more connected with their local context. Thus, the other side of the coin involves accepting and adapting to the universal brand image while understanding the common values.

The third model approaches the so-called "gender of nations", which is very well related to the successful societies, to the winner profile and his or her mentality. This brings to light the specificity of any nation either oriented to masculinity or femininity. Given this perspective, gender roles are clearly defined and consumption depends on society dynamics. We do believe this model reflects the relevance of some product categories connected with lifestyles and specific consumer behaviour. There are societies in which the household is more important than professional performance and femininity plays the main role -considering family a priority- whereas male-oriented societies are meant to focus on success, lots of work, and less affectivity. Advertising analyzes this balance and appeals to consumers relying on this overview of the gender nations, which is very difficult to change over the years.[7]

The next model developed by Hofstede is called "uncertainty avoidance" and refers to the way people accept and adopt innovation, and are not afraid of ambiguity and unexpected situations. [8]A society led by strict rules prefers stereotypes and likes to follow old customs, and, for this reason, either global brands adapt to its values, or local values become more important. On the other hand, a society, which is very open to changes and media innovation does not discriminate brands, and advertising uses synergetic strategies to promote them. Long-/short-term orientation explains differences in using certain product categories and considering them a consumerist or spiritual/abstract culture. For the long-term orientation culture, pragmatism and perseverance are vital and people are mainly preoccupied by concrete sciences. For the short-term orientation culture, tradition, popular culture, and folk wisdom top of their preferences.

Hofstede's theory had a great impact and was improved in 1996 by adding another 15 West European countries. Consequently, it concluded that many research topics could be influenced and developed according to it. Based on this theory, we chose to apply these models on our quantitative data to get a profile of the Romanian women, in terms of studying specificity and the relationship between local and global features.

Besides this theory, another aspect that immediately deserves more attention is the concept of identity with the double advertising meaning of brand image and local identity. Advertising creates a synergy between these two perspectives, considering local brands are oriented towards national identity. Therefore, a certain brand reputation reflected a certain country image and no confusion was

---

[5] Geert Hofstede, Gert Jan Hofstede and Michael Minkov, *Cultures and Organizations: Software of the Mind: Intercultural Cooperation and its Importance for Survival (*USA:McGraw-Hill, 2010), 60-64.

[6] Hofstede, Hofstede, and Minkov, Cultures , 90-99.

[7] Hofstede, Hofstede, and Minkov, Cultures, 137-146.

[8] Hofstede, Hofstede, and Minkov, Cultures, 187-190.

possible. Meanwhile, advertising became a channel to communicate similar values by buying and using the same brands. Dealing with conceptualizing national identity, Anderson (1991) argues that nations are "imagined communities," and we believe advertising encourages the construction and deconstruction of identities. Actually, he said that "communities are to be distinguished not by their falsity/genuineness, but by the style in which they are imagined."[9] Commercials create real consumers' communities relying on product features and they build an imagined consumerist world.

The relationship between women and men has very often been approached by researchers during the last few decades, and their findings highlight various female roles, such as: housewife, decorative elements, sex objects, and someone reliant on men[10] (Ferguson, Kreshel, and Tinkham,1990); housewives, someone concerned with physical attractiveness, sex objects, the career women, and the neutral women; (the alluring object of sexual gratification[11] (Mayne, 2000); and erotic and suggestive stimuli (Henthorne and LaTour, 1995)[12]. Those roles are very well connected to social behaviour and emotional involvement, but not with cultural implications. In terms of globalization, these models are available everywhere, but differences arise from local identity. Most of research was carried out in the American world, where the image of women changed quickly. Definitely, local identity has a huge influence on the female image promoted by advertising.

2.3. Research sample and method

The main corpus of our research consists of 50 TV commercials broadcast on the Romanian market and completely dedicated to local brands. The selection was made according to several criteria which are very important for the purposes of the present study. First, there are various product categories that may receive more credibility by emphasizing the local identity. Second, ads had to include a female hero to identify one of the possible roles in preserving Romanian identity in local advertising. Third, we tried to strike a balance between older commercials (created after the 1989 Revolution) and new ones because we believe the image of femininity progressively changed. Fourth, it was essential to select commercials where women were presented in relation to men and children, basically in slice- of- life setting, not testimonials or simple demonstration. Therefore, our sample consists of only 50 ads, because all these criteria involved had to be achieved simultaneously.

The following table briefly presents the product categories and brands involved in this study:

Nr.	Product categories	Brands	Number of ads
	Phones and Communication	Romtelecom	3
	Alcoholic drinks (beer and wine)	Bucegi, Timişoreana, Murfatlar	4
	Non-alcoholic drinks	Giusto, Adria	2
	Mineral water	Izvorul Minunilor, Biborţeni	2
	Cars	Dacia	3
	Dairy	Napolact, Covalact	4
	Chocolate and cookies	Rom, Măgura	5
	Banks	CEC, Banca Transilvania	2
	Cooking oil	Untdelemn de la Bunica, Floriol	4
	Detergent	Dero	2

[9] Benedict Anderson, Imagined Communities. A Brilliant Exegesis on Nationalism (London: Verso, 2006), 6.

[10] Jill Hicks Ferguson, Peggy J. Kreshel and Spencer F .Tinkham. "In the Pages of Ms.: Sex Role Portrayals of Women in Advertising." Journal of Advertising (19,1990): 48.

[11] Iris Mayne, "The Inescapable Image: Gender and Advertising.", Equal Opportunities International (19, 2000):57.

[12] Tony L. Henthorne and Michael LaTour, "A Model to Explore the Ethics of Erotic Stimuli in Print Advertising ." Journal of Business Ethics (14, 1995): 562 - 563.

	Medicines and pharmacy	Carmol, Catena	2
	Home appliaces (Electronics)	Arctic, Altex	4
	Bakery products	Boromir, Pretzel of Buzău (Covrigii de Buzăau)	2
	Meat products (paté)	Pate de Sibiu, Pate Ardealul, Cris-tim	4
	Media	Antena 1, Adevărul	2
	Cosmetics	Gerovital, Farmec	2
	Retail Construction	Dedeman	2
	Petrol	Petrom	1

Content analysis was the method we choose to provide quantitative data. The data were further developed in a qualitative manner based on the main goals of this research. The quantitative analysis was carried on according to the following variables, which can very well be understood by answering the following questions:

What is the living environment of women involved in the commercial message?

What kind of responsibilities do women who appeared in the selected ads have?

What is the relationship between women and men and/or children?

What is the balance between authority and subordination in women' relationship to men and/or children during the commercials?

What is the balance between individualism and collectivism regarding the values encouraged by the women presented in these commercials?

What do women strive for -innovation or tradition?

2.4. Findings

What is the living environment of women involved in the commercial message?

Analyzing the living area where women play their roles involves more than making a distinction between rural and urban environment, and implies discovering a connection between products and the female profile. In this case, the urban background represents the main direction of 29 commercials in comparison with only 9 ads shot in the countryside. Only two examples describe women acting in both the urban and rural environment, which reveals that this issue is less important for female profiles. These three categories were easily identified, given the visual background and several aspects of women's lifestyles. Additionally, ads show women only in their domestic environment, preoccupied by family and specific activities. The last living area is not significant for the role of women, considering the entire plot fantasy, and the character is an Empress. Before jumping to the next quantitative issue, we may conclude that the urban environment emphasizes the role of women in preserving local identity more than the rural one. This result cannot be contested or considered irrelevant because the product categories (18) involved in this research are very diverse and are not directly linked to femininity.

2.4.2.What kind of responsibilities do women who appeared in the selected ads have?

Looking for the main responsibilities of female heroes in the selected sample, we discovered a various palette of activities, which proves that gender stereotypes have been already outbalanced or at least ignored. The following table highlights this variety and offers a complete overview on this issue by using general words that synthesize women responsibilities according to different criteria such as family status, lifestyles, beauty patterns, relationships, main activities.

No.	Responsibilities	Number of ads
	Household (specifically mother and wife)	24
	Good professionals or ex-professionals	8
	Girl-friend	5
	Storyteller-Granny	4
	Sexual object and "decorative" women	3
	Friends and colleagues	2
	Multiple responsibilities	1
	"Shopping" girl	1
	"Party-girl"	1
	Empress	1

Women as wives and mothers are at the top of this list, which is quite usual for any country and identity in the world. Obviously, this top should be connected with product categories to have some relevance for this research. Therefore, we noticed female household responsibility was used in ads created for phones, cars, dairy, chocolate, oil and meat products, a fact that helps recognize the role of women in creating a brand image. Seductive and so-called "decorative" women emphasize men's power in commercials dedicated to wine, cars and chocolate. There exists an association between product qualities and the female image, a strategy of coining the message based on irresistible attraction. In one of the TV ads for Dacia, three women follow a car (Dacia) driven by an alluring man, who tries to get home to his family. The final message is "Girls, he's taken" referring to the man's wife. This commercial shows a change of roles: the guy represents the attraction for women, and the car is a way to get home faster and escape temptation. To sum up, this issue regarding responsibilities points out the implication of women in the family and at professional level, regardless of product category or brand.

What is the relationship between women and men and/or children?

Going further, the previous conclusion implies finding out the specificity of female behavior in relation to men or children. The results are quite simple here, since there are only three possibilities revealed by the analysis: the aggressive (conflicting) relationship, the amiable one, and the undecided attitude towards people. In 28 ads of the entire sample the behavior is non-conflicting, (in 18 commercials this attitude has been noticed as directed towards men, while in 9 situations it is directed towards children and only in one case towards other women).The conflicts are oriented towards men in 18 ads for different reasons such as family disagreements, excess of authority, different perspective on the relationship between tradition and innovation. Only in 4 situations women do not clearly express their attitude, either be it friendly or dominant and aggressive. What is really interesting here is that gender conflicts arise either from family tension (the classic dispute between mother-in-law and daughter-in-law, for example), or men's incapacity to make their wives or girlfriends happy. Obviously, these findings on conflicting or amiable relationships are strongly connected with the Romanian perspective on sharing responsibilities inside the home.

2.4.4.What is the balance between authority and subordination in women' relationship to men and/or children during the commercials?

The previous issue can definitely be explained by finding out the balance between authority and subordination in relationships in which women are involved in. According to the quantitative data provided by our sample, authority belongs to women 33 situations, while men have total control of decisions and women in less ads, 15. The rest of commercials share authority and do not emphasize anyone's dominance. Returning to Hofstede's theory on "gender nations", there is no doubt that we deal with a women-oriented society and advertising highlights this dimension of consumption, which is practically dominated by concern for the family and children and less for professional performance. Even if the sample is not bigger, selection criteria make these findings relevant, given the image of local brands, on the one hand, and the involvement of women in family and society, on the other hand. Female authority in Romanian commercials may be associated with a global trend, which consists in considering women very good consumers, decision –makers in the family and organizers of the family budget. Martha Barletta began her book evaluating the female power on the market by writing, "Women are the world's powerful consumers. They are the big spenders, whether we are talking about households, corporate purchasing or small business" [13]. Romanian women are greatly concerned about their family, being more conservative and traditional, and, for this reason, commercials broadcast on the local market for local brands emphasize their identity regardless of the product. They do not spend money on themselves so much (except for 2 commercials), but subordinate men by using sensibility and verbal authority.

2.4.5.What is the balance between individualism and collectivism regarding the values encouraged by the women presented in these commercials?

Discussion relying on Hofstede's theory applied in this research leads present research to another model of communication that regards the relationship between individualism and collectivism in the behavior of women. According to our findings, individualism dominates with 29 registrations, while the collectivist attitude draws the attention in 21 ads. Certainly, women are preoccupied by the local context and do not strive for external values or ignore their social background. Given that their authority is often emphasized, women rely on themselves and do not ask for help. The small difference between these categories could be explained by the glocalization phenomenon and the influence of global brands, which similarly advertized all over the world. In one of the TV ads for national phone provider Romtelecom, a father is a secret agent and travels a lot, being shown in action in many cities (Bucharest, Paris, New York) while risking his life. In the most dangerous situations, his wife calls him and asks him personal questions or to buy small goods. The woman reminds him to buy a Christmas present for their child and milk, as if man were an ordinary employee. At the end of the ad, the entire family is happy, celebrating Christmas in a very traditional way. The female perspective is very individualistic while the man's job depicts him as a universal James Bond. Whenever the creative idea of the commercial does not focus on domestic responsibilities, the image of woman is universal by acting as any other woman concerned about herself and she is completely out of the local context. Going shopping, emphasizing her beauty, ignoring her family means to reject the local personality and femininity for the sake of global stereotypes. Sometimes the individualistic perspective is woven with the collectivistic one, pointing out the glocalization or hybridization phenomenon.

2.4.6.What do women strive for -innovation or tradition?

The last issue this research aims to find an answer for regards the way women adopt or reject innovation in terms of Hofstede's theory entitled "uncertainty avoidance". Here we investigated not only the relationship between tradition and innovation, but we also tried to link this research result with the age of women, considering that a local identity promoted by femininity depends on this criterion as well. The following chart briefly points out these data, highlighting, in our opinion, an unexpected correspondence between age and overview on life:

[13] Martha Barletta, Marketing to women: how to increase their share of the world's largest market (Chicago, USA: Dearborn Trade Publishing, 2006), xxi.

	Young women	Old women	Middle-aged	Number of ads
Innovation	14	6	9	29
Tradition	11	7	2	20
Innovation and tradition	1	0		1

First, age definitely makes the difference when we speak about tradition or innovation. Young women top both aspects, which is quite unexpected, considering people got used to seeing old people anchored in their past and customs. In this case, young mothers, wives, friends or girl friends prefer tradition, almost as much as they respect it. Regarding the attitude of the old women about innovation, all 6 commercials depict them in a very humorous way, either using modern language (as like in the cooking oil commercial Untdelemn de la Bunica – Granny's Oil or for Altex- Apgreidin), or acting almost childishly (Altex-Madam Multimedia, Antena 1-The wheel). A retired woman is waiting for her pension surrounded by a computer, and a video- camera to monitor the postman, just to have fun. She is the woman ironically called Madam Multimedia, who invalidates the theory according to which old age always means being conservative and rejecting technology. To sum up, innovation and tradition do not represent real competition between old and young women, because both age-groups choose them sometimes. Expanding the target or making him or her trust the product more involves adopting a conservative or inventive attitude. This proves once again that advertising sometimes goes beyond stereotypes and reconstruct female or male profiles.

2.5. Discussion

The political and social changes permanently determine a reconstruction of the image of women who is disseminated through any kind of media and by any means. Discrimination and feminism are two words which have been dominating research studies and media market for a few decades. These terms fed other concepts like globalization, internationalization and the image of women which began to be universally framed and understood, regardless of local identity. Carolyn M. Byerly and Karen Ross considered that the relationship between the media and women has an important role in understanding femininity in a global or particular way: "The ways in which the media represent the female subject and the experiences of women working in media organizations themselves are the product of a world system of patriarchal capitalism whose globalizing tentacles currently threaten to strangle the fragile flower of change" [14]. Advertising is a real medusa, considering it exploits any type of media to promote many products both for women and men by using the female image in a global or local manner. Women could be the target, the creative support and they can positively motivate the men, because of their beauty, as well as responsibility in the household and at professional level. In terms of local identity, these general features are differently perceived or replaced by the specific ones easily recognized by the target.

In our case, this study provides some information about the female profile in local advertising in terms of promoting local products. Women living in the urban area seem to be the main characters in the analyzed commercials, and they are basically presented as housewives (mother and child), despite their age. Women do not unfriendly react towards men or children, in spite of their authority, which is obviously expressed in more than half of the selected commercials. Most women involved in commercials to get the consumers' attention prefer innovation, regardless of their age, which proves their independence. Similar in number are the female characters who individualistically behave, according to Hofstede' s theory, and preserve one's native heritage, such as tradition, religious celebrations, family rituals, and relationships. There are small contradictions here, which is not so unexpected in advertising, because women living in the city are innovative and authoritarian on the one hand, but do not appreciate collective culture, on the other. Collective culture rejects the local context and tries to integrate consumers in a global life-style. Usually, living in an urban area implies being very connected to global features having a job and many other influences.

[14] Carolyn M. Byerly and Karen Ross, Women & Media, a Critical Introduction, (Oxford: Blackwell Publishing, 2006), 75.

Therefore, this research helps us identify several female patterns important in preserving the Romanian identity in local advertising:

The young and innovative woman, who also belongs to a family and promotes new changes of society (for example the Romanian integration into the European Union in the ad for Bucegi beer entitled Bunicul - The Grandfather).

The young and traditional woman preoccupied by her family and preserving rituals (Murfatlar wine-the dowry).

The old and innovative woman, adapting to contemporary times (Altex campaigns) by using computers, driving a car (even if wheel is ironic in the ad for Antena 1- The Wheel)

Middle-aged women, dominative and always in conflict with their husbands because of their lack of skill for domestic activities (Măgura chocolate - The perfect man, Adria).

Middle-age women, which are traditional and skilled in preserving the taste of childhood sweets (Napolact).

3. Conclusion

The image of women in Romanian advertising reveals a range of profiles by also using the former criteria (age, tradition vs. innovation, responsibilities). The gap between young and old generation is not substantial, given their ability to adapt to what they need. The traditional perspective represents the main strategy to create campaigns for promoting dairy, bakery products, cold meat products. Revolutionary femininity arises from commercials dedicated to products that are, usually, very quickly upgraded: cars, domestic appliances, media. This apparent contradiction (young vs. old, tradition vs. innovation) points out two important aspects: first, target segmentation implies a proper association between product features and consumer image, and second, the female profile still reflects the transition from communism to capitalism by its conservative attitude combined with accepting new life-style solutions. There is, for sure, a hybridized depiction of women responsible for the family, on the one hand, and professionally involved, on the other hand. Tradition means preserving family responsibilities and considering the woman the origin of all solutions while innovation refers to the new woman who accepts challenges as much as men do.

To sum up, according to Hofstede's theory, individualism defines better femininity than collectivism, the Romanian nation relates more successfully to femininity in advertising than to masculinity, and women adopt innovation regardless of their age and this is sign of the short-orientation culture (based on popular culture, folk wisdom, and tradition). In our opinion, the role of women in preserving Romanian identity in local advertising consists of establishing a balance between past and present and emphasizing the social involvement of local brands in consumer's life. Advertising creates a challenging and nonconventional profile for women, going beyond the stereotypes, such as women in the kitchen, unemployed women, women depicted only as housewives and encouraging the power of femininity in making decisions and buying the best products for their family or themselves. Romanian Advertising does not isolate women from their family or profession by not emphasizing their beauty or sensitivity and passively presenting them. On the contrary, the main features of female portrayals are dynamism and authority, which make them a user or possible user for almost any product.

References:

- Anderson, Benedict. Imagined Communities. A Brilliant Exegesis on Nationalism. London: Verso, 2006.
- Barletta, Martha. Marketing to Women: how to Increase their Share of the World's Largest Market. Chicago, USA: Dearborn Trade Publishing, 2006.
- Byerly, Carolyn M., and Ross, Karen. Women & Media, a Critical Introduction. Oxford: Blackwell Publishing, 2006, 15-97.
- Ferguson Jill Hicks, Kreshel, Peggy J. and.Tinkham, Spencer F. "In the Pages of Ms.: Sex Role Portrayals of Women in Advertising." Journal of Advertising 19 (1990): 40-51.
- Goffmann, Erving. Gender Advertisements. Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1979.
- Henthorne, Tony L. and LaTour, Michael S. "A Model to Explore the Ethics of Erotic Stimuli in Print Advertising ". Journal of Business Ethics 14 (1995): 561 – 569.
- Hofstede, Geert , Hofstede, Gert Jan and Minkov, Michael. Cultures and Organizations: Software of the Mind: Intercultural Cooperation and its Importance for Survival . USA: McGraw-Hill, 2010.
- Lindner, Katharina. "Images of Women in General Interest and Fashion Magazine Advertisements from 1955 to 2002." Sex Roles 51 (2004): 409-420.
- Mayne, Iris. "The Inescapable Image: Gender and Advertising", Equal Opportunities International 19 (2000): 56-61.
- Reichert, Tom. The Erotic History of Advertising. New York: Prometheus Book, 2003.
- Electronic references:
- http://www.insse.ro/cms/files/Anuar%20statistic/02/02%20Populatie_ro.pdf, accessed on January 2nd .
- www. Iqads.ro, accessed between January 5th and January 15th.

DEDEMAN CAMPAIGNS: THE COMPENSATION OF BEING A MAN DOMINATED BY A MOODY WOMAN

MĂDĂLINA MORARU (BUGA)[1]

Abstract.
Advertising seems to be the perfect field for playing gender games, either as a relationship between authority and subordination or as a conflict. Dedeman campaigns are very well-known for targeting men by using their family background, especially women, considering product specificity. The company focuses on retail construction for home design, and is the brainchild of two Romanian owners. Basically, this company offers all the consumer needs to build a house on the outside and the inside as he or she wishes, or to modernize an existing construction.

Dedeman advertising is very rich and distributed on diverse media channels, even if the company is still young. The following research aims to highlight the relationship between masculinity and femininity in promoting brand values and service quality by analyzing print and outdoor advertisements. Therefore, we are very interested in establishing the role of the product in this difficult relationship of communication, given it is equally designed for men and for women, but establishes a different connection with them. The main purpose here is to discover the involvement of the brand and products in family life, and to identify the male and female target profile.

This research relies on the visual and linguistic sample of Dedeman print campaigns and the method approach is the analysis of the advertising discourse in texts created for billboards and print advertisements. We are very interested in the types of advertising texts (argumentative, narrative, descriptive), the linguistic representations of femininity and masculinity, and syntactic relationship between product and gender. At the end of this research, we expect to reveal a Dedeman advertising strategy applied in promoting brand's values which may involve the gender roles in a creative way.

Keywords: gender, advertising, linguistic discourse, outdoor.

Introduction

This paper aims to explain the advertising role in establishing various gender relationships based on product attributes and brand image. Over the ages, gender roles have been changing a lot according to the family and psychological criteria, and advertising takes advantages of these transformations. Firstly, we may start by saying that the relationship between masculinity and femininity moved towards two directions: either a global, or a local. The first dimension was definitely identified with stereotypes and male or female standards. Erving Goffmann (1979), was the first who argued that gender relationships are socially constructed and that women are presented in ads as weak and subordinated to man. He thus developed several codes of understanding women semiotics in ads. Male stereotypes have been lately enhanced, because some criteria of femininity do not quite match to masculinity, such as beauty, sensitivity, social status, sexual attraction. One of the goals of this paper consists in proving that the local aspects of this gender relationship depends on several issues that determine a rejection of the global perspective on this subject or, at least, an adaptation. Those issues may be: religion, tradition, cultural aspects, social support for the family, individualism versus collectivism.

[1] Senior Lecturer, Ph. D., Post-Doctoral Researcher at the University of Bucharest (within the strategic grant POSDRU/89/1.5/S/62259). at the Faculty of Journalism and Communication Studies, (moraru_mada12@yahoo.com, morarumadalina@hotmail.com). This work was supported by the strategic grant POSDRU/89/1.5/S/62259, Project „Applied social, human and political sciences. Postdoctoral training and postdoctoral fellowships in social, human and political sciences," co-financed by the European Social Fund within the Sectorial Operational Program Human Resources Development 2007-2013.

Secondly, this relationship in advertising develops differently in comparison with other research fields or interest areas (like politics, professional engagements), because of products and brands involvement. There are three product categories specifically approached in their campaigns: those dedicated to men (for example, retail and construction, motorcycle, fragrance), to women (home appliances, kitchen accessories, cosmetics and fragrances), and last but not least, unisex (no gender discrimination like some scents or cars). For the first two types, commercials follow either only the target profile, or the connection with the other gender. Our hypothesis is that in the last case the strategies may be equally addressed to any kind of target, or to one of them as a means of getting the attention of the other gender, not necessarily involved in. In this situation, we discuss about two possible relationships: on the one hand, collaboration and, on the other hand, conflict between genders, given the necessity of imposing one of them authority. Collaboration implies equal responsibilities and product use, while conflict changes the product and brand role. In our opinion, the conflict between genders points out other roles of the product as well: sometimes it mediates the gender relationship, sometimes it comes as a compensation against frustration, subordination, and lack of respect. The present research intends to reveal what is the product role in moderating the relationship between men and women, and how much Dedeman influences their communication by analyzing its outdoor campaigns.

2.Theoretical framework

2.1.Gender dichotomy

There is a real and understandable dichotomy between male and female roles given in society, and this is why gender studies emphasize stereotypes and differences. As for the social differentiation, the theory of the evolutionary psychology and constructivism explains its context and impact from the scientific point of view. For example, Wood and Eagly[2] analyzed these differences relying on two directions: first, the work division between men and women, and second the men status and power in comparison with women. Obviously, the psychological and biological dispositions traditionally attributed to both genders are the first option to explain the divergences. Looking from another perspective, the gender idea appeared inside a culture and it adapted to its specificity. This is the reason why masculinity and femininity will never be equally understood and developed all over the world.

Despite the globalization process, the advertising tries to find the best way to appeal to the consumers, by paying attention to the culture specificity. According to Moriarty, Mitchell and Wells there are three approaches focusing on the balance between standardization, localization and combination. The easiest model to identify is standardization[3] that focuses on consumers similarities all over the world, without any specific issue. In this case, male and female depiction relies on stereotypes and general overview on gender aspects. Localization, sometimes named adaptation, consists of considering many other important coordinates of each market, such as: lifestyles, cultural, economic and political particularities. Consequently, gender issues observe all coordinates requested by consumer's insight. Combination is nothing else than finding a middle way to merge the former directions in order to produce a more effective advertising both by preserving general brand strategy and translating it for local customers. Here, advertising keeps the general patterns, but it differentiates them according to local needs, and sometimes the result is a gender hybridization. For example, in Romanian advertising the dairy industry is very rich, usually promoted due to the traditional roots. Tnuva was a very well-known and global brand in Romania (it went out our market at the end of last year) which created some commercials based on the principle: Think globally, act locally! In one of the TV ads, a young woman, whose name is Măriuca (a common Romanian name), goes to work in Măriuca's Factory by bicycle, wearing traditional clothes. On the go, the camera presents us the village: the women are relaxing at SPA and drinking a cold juice, while men open the stable by using a remote control. This commercial is very strange for the local mentality where peasants are very conservative, hard-working and deeply involved. Definitely, women profile does not match the Romanian specificity and so Măriuca's factory is not credible.

[2] Wendy Wood and Alice Eagly,"A Cross-Cultural Analysis of the Behavior of Women and Men: Implications for the Origins of Sex Differences", Psychological Bulletin (128, 2002): 699.

[3] Sandra Moriarty, Nancy Mitchell, and William Wells, Advertising: Principles & Practice, 8th edition (New Jersey: Pearson Education, Inc. 2009), 548-550.

2.2. The female image in advertising

The gender approach in the advertising field started far back in the past with Goffmann's classification (1976). He divided commercials into three categories, after a study on 500 ads: traditional commercials, the commercials inverted according to the gender, and neutral commercials. The first category is focusing on the gender stereotypes specified for each society, the second one reverses the gender rules, while the last one combines the expectations of a cultural and personal stereotype. His research approaches the femininity among others aspects according to the subtle message transmitted by a woman whose attitude and body language towards a product says more than anyone could describe by using mere words. The later studies have been trying to explain the female presence more often in commercials in comparison with men's appearance. This is the big truth: women draw the consumer's attention more than men. Which is the credible explanation? We are looking for one which has nothing to do with discrimination or prejudice. Gad Saad[4] from the Concordia University came up with a very good justification for this female invasion in ads: the woman's beauty and sexuality better sell products and services. The answer is a simple one as it has to do with women's genuine qualities such as: delicacy, sensitivity, fragility.

2.3. The male image in advertising

As for men, stereotypes were not so powerful at the beginning, and in advertising their masculinity was perceived in a very authoritarian or, in a sexual way. Later, a very interesting concept changed the male perspective and this was the hegemonic masculinity. This term was systematized in an article written by Carrigan, Connell and Lee, which criticized the male sex role and proposed a model of multiple masculinities and power relationships. Researchers assume the idea of a gender hierarchy historically maintained, but accept the necessity to change it. The studies focussing on this topic applied the concept on a range of topics: military world, organizations, family, professional practice. Carrigan et al. consider that gender relationships depend so much on the global or local conditions in which women and men express their power: "The global subordination of women is consistent with many particular situations in which women hold power over men, or are at least equal." [5] Many critics have been against this scientific mainstream, and some of them noticed that there is a tendency to exclude women from this analysis. Brod argues that men studies should be strongly helped by the women' studies, should be developed through feminist theory, not against it: "I think feminist men's desires to study men from feminist perspectives should be encouraged rather than discouraged." [6] For example, Connell and Messerschmidt argue that "Critiques of the concept of masculinity make better sense when they point to a tendency, in research as well as in popular literature, to dichotomize the experiences of men and women" [7]. The meaning is quite simple here: we cannot debate masculinity by ignoring the gender relationship. The researchers also pointed out that the main idea of masculinity is its opening to changes, especially on the local level. This

[4] Saad Gad, "Applying Evolutionary Psychology in Understanding the Representation of Women in Advertisement." Psychology &Marketing (21, 2004): 606.

[5] Tim Carrigan, Bob.W. Connell and John Lee, "Towards a New Sociology of Masculinity." Theory and Society (14, 1985): 590.

[6] Harry Brod, "Does Manning Men's Studies Emasculate Women's Studies." Hypatia (2, 1987): 156.

[7] Bob R. W. Connell and James W Messerschmidt, "Hegemonic Masculinity: Rethinking the Concept." Gender Society (19, 2005): 837.

conclusion calls forth new approaches of gender relationship as long as patriarchal family is not anymore the model for new generation.

In advertising the product is the master and men are first subordinate to its success and than extend their influence on women, children or friends. When they are authoritarian, this attitude definitely expresses the product credibility and features. On the contrary, being subordinated to women means being the man desired by the latter, appealing to their senses. The reverse is available for women as well, so there is no place for discrimination here. From this point of view, it is possible to associate masculinity not only with men, as we got used to doing it, buy with any other kind of oppressive behaviour. In other words, even women could be depicted in a male way, due to their power, assertiveness or dominant tendency. As Johnson points out (1997) related to this issue and Mullany (2004) explained later, "it is now possible to consider that women and men can be oppress by different forms of masculinity based on sexuality, ethnicity, class, age etc. Therefore, from this perspective, masculinities and femininities replace the monolithic categorizations of femininity and masculinity. " [8] We may say that negotiation between genders represents nowadays a strategy to balance their communication in any field.

2.4.Gender Communication

A very good comparison between women's and men's world belongs to Marti Barletta's book (2006), Marketing to women: how to increase their share of the world's largest market, which classified femininity according to its role on the market. The work approached many other issues related to this topic, such as: women values, social standards, psychological aspects. She explained the communication key of male and female culture that highlights the difference between genders. She established a synthesis of her research by speaking about a model entitled "the gender trends star". The first level (named title versus text) shows that women start talking with a story, while men are going directly to the subject with no focusing on details. Secondly, the reportage style relying on information perfectly matches men, while the report characterizes women. Establishing a connection between genders is another sensitive point of discussion, and in our study, a very important one. Each gender has its own social value, for men it is all about action whereas for women about stories and private details. When it comes to verbal relationship, men are always prepared for competition, while women establish relationships based on affinity and empathy.

Consequently, communication in advertising creates huge differences between men and women because of their perception of world values: extremely rational for masculinity and emotional for femininity. Thus, advertising is aware of these characteristics and applies this style of communication by connecting the male/ female consumer with the product. Each advertising channel takes this aspect into consideration, but according to the production means. TV channel is given more credibility, while outdoor and prints are provided only with verbal language, without any dynamic visual landmarks. Online advertising seems to bring to light a lot of controversial issues about differences between gender in communication per email, as Mullany (2004) argued by saying that: "advertising language using email technology at least appears to have moved backwards, strengthening dichotomies instead of breaking down the boundaries of gender identities. " [9] To conclude, masculinity and femininity differently express in advertising based on channels that provide sensorial, visual and verbal aspects.

2.5.Dedeman campaigns

To begin with, here is the best place to explain what kind of brand deserves our attention here, by integrating it in the product category and presenting its brief story. The brand belongs to retail and [8] Louise Mullany, "Become the Men that Women Desire: Gender Identities and Dominant Discourses in Email Advertising Language." *Language and Literature (*13, 2004): 293.

[9] Louise Mullany, "Become the men", 303.

construction companies. The company relies on a very simple principle: Do-it-Yourself, being dedicated to those preoccupied by making their furniture and designing their own house in their personal way.

What is very interesting in Dedeman's case refers to its spectaculars and successful evolution in less than 20 years. This is a Romanian brand, integrated into new business, very welcomed on the market otherwiser. It was launched in 1992 as a private and small company with less than 20 employees and now it owns 26 big chain stores in many Romanian cities.

At the beginning, the brand positioning was the one based on consumer needs, given the slogan still powerful*: Dedeman-dedicated to your plans.* Nowadays, it is the leader on the local market, and it offers a large range of products and services starting with simple materials (cement, appliances, equipments) to furniture imported from the entire world. They cater for most consumer's need by providing them with conciliation and information in construction field, and, most important , they give him the feeling of freedom to personalize their home.

The products and services are dedicated to the entire family, because the benefices are not gender-oriented, but considering the skills requested from buyers, many of the products obviously define masculinity. The brand started investing in advertising in 2009, by using TV ads, outdoor and radio, and coining an image exclusively focused on consumers, as a gender relationship. The agency in charge with these campaigns is McCann Erickson and the strategy applied follows the same principle: somehow men and women face each other and the product is there. Last year, the outdoor advertising almost blew up on the market, and the main purpose was to attract new consumers and consolidate the trust of the current users.

2.6. Research method and sample

This study focuses on 30 billboards created in the last 2 years, since the brand has been started communicating very strongly. The outdoor material has been exhibited especially in Bucharest, but also in other big cities, such as Cluj, Braşov, Vâlcea. These billboards were homogenously coined, so that the target understand the message more easily and so the brand positioned in the consumer's mind as the one dedicated to the family preoccupied by changes in their own home. The research method applied in this study is analysis of the advertising discourse based on identifying several aspects such as: the text types, linguistic landmarks of genders in texts, the opposition or similarities, the product role. The billboards were selected to represent both woman and man as winners of their daily conflict generated by authority. Actually, Dedeman campaigns are focusing more on victimizing men who listen to the woman' s desire, giving up his wishes, all this not to generate a conflict.

3.Findings:

3.1. The types of the texts created for Dedeman outdoor campaigns

The first aspect that helps us apply the method of advertising discourse consists in identifying the type of advertising texts created for the outdoor campaigns. To better organize the sample, we found several criteria as core directions of classification: the structure, the gender relationship, the love representations. According to the structure and syntactic features, the ads sample provided us the following categories:

The double sentences, each of them representing the gender attitude. These could be interrogation (Doesn't she wish to renovate the house, every time you wish to go on holiday?) or affirmative sentences (Buy the kitchen for you and you still have money to buy a jacket for him)

The single sentence focuses on product: (You cannot hide from love even if the Dedeman bedroom. or Darling, I want the tiles with dots……ots otss otss)

The gender relationship offers two kinds of commercials: first case it is about men dominated by women and working more despite their wishes. The ad presents a very unbalanced marriage by creating such a message*: Isn't she doing her manicure, while you are cleaning the desk? At least* change the desk. In the second case, the woman victimizes herself, hinting at the man's insensitivity to her effort: Does he throw his shoes away, every time he takes them off? At least change the furniture. Under a careful analysis, the commercials reveal a disproportion between genders in another category of commercials, because the man or the woman receives something, but one of them makes a dream become true, while the other one is not completely forgotten, by receiving a small gift. Usually femininity is represented by cosmetics or fashion, while men received objects connected with their hobbies, such as sport, electronic appliances. Buy the bedroom for you and you'll have money for his ski kit, too.

The love representations are short definitions on this topic, differently expressed by using intertextuality, old proverbs, wise sentences, and well known stereotypes, such as*: It takes two for love. And a Jazz desk.* or There is a sofa distance between love and hate. Some of love depictions are conflicting, some of them just suggest the negotiation between genders. Actually, this is the creative strategy: being involved in a marriage implies coping with a lot of problems, which ultimately making the relationship work. This perspective is very credible, because each family and couple has its balance between heaven and hell.

Considering the texts are very brief, they do not focus on depicting the product, as usually the outdoor advertising does, but on convincing potential consumers to buy it or try it. The texts are, according to Jean-Michel Adam[10] (2005), advertising enthymemes, because most have more than one argumentative premise, and no conclusion or a premise and a conclusion. The example below explains what kind of thinking strategy the brand created, without being boring or detailed, without positioning on product qualities, but on consumers. Therefore, the messages are deductive and only the second sentence brings the product into discussion.

Premise 1: You are coming into love with closed eyes.

Premise 2: In the bath too.

The conclusion may be the slogan: Dedeman-dedicated to your plans, or it is indirectly deducted. Both argumentative premises are strongly connected by using analogy or, sometimes, a comparison.

3.2.The linguistic gender dichotomy

The advertising message created for Dedeman relies on several verbal issues to emphasize the gender dichotomy and thus highlight the brand power. First, the opposition consists in using personal pronouns in the same sentences: either "you" versus "he", or "you" versus "she". Obviously, "you" represents the gender victimized, and in most of the situations this is the man (in 10 ads, while women feel indifference and the lack of respect only in 4 cases This reminds us of this paper title, men dominated by moody women, which is perfectly justified under the circumstances. Another linguistic means is the use of antonyms, whose impact is more persuasive, because they suggest not only the conflict, but a real incompatibility: Isn't it that every time you are warm, she is cold? At least change the boiler. Authority in a relationship is based on specific landmarks that belong to the more powerful gender. In terms of morphological features, negations (You don't play with love) and verbs (like, will) convey the control over the partner. Again, the verbs describe the moody women whose wishes are foreground, by exploiting men's weakness.

3.2.The product role in Dedeman campaigns

The main role of the product is the compensation and negotiation between women and men, as a try to dissolve the conflict. In half of the situations, Dedeman products are the best choice against frustration, gender discrimination and resignation. There are like chocolate and fashion for women or watching football for men, considering these are gender-oriented despite the generous comparison. The compensation is usually isolated in the second sentence, to be more authoritarian and, of course, credible: You dust daily, he only on your birthday. At least change the furniture!

[10] Jean-Michel Adam, Argumentarea publicitară, the original title L' argummentaire publicitaire (Iaşi; Institutul European, 2005), 166-172.

Another role the product emphasizes is the inequality between genders when the man or the woman spends a lot of money on gifts for him/herself and buys something small, insignificant for the partner. There is no connection between Dedeman products and these presents for the partner involved in the relationship. Moreover, the wallet, the jacket, the scarf are only several objects whose role is to alleviate a possible conflict, to distract the attention from the big investments.

The third perspective on the product regards the relationship between love and the much desired product: Love goes away, the shower cabin stays. Obviously, comparisons are exaggerated, given the big difference between an abstract feeling and a concrete object, such as: a bath, a piece of furniture, a boiler etc. In this case, the product reveals its consolatory role, a way to replace feeling with comfort. This role ironically emphasizes the fragility of feeling in comparison to Dedeman home appliances by their symbolic positioning based on product qualities.

To sum up, products are not a simple promise, there are a chance to get away from an inevitable conflict inside the home. As it is, the conflict is generated by different interests, either a wrong distribution of domestic chores, or simple habits which actually characterize gender. Thus, buying a product does not necessarily mean that the consumer needs it; its subjective role maybe the one to help a relationship work better.

4. Conclusion:

The Dedeman campaigns emphasize gender dichotomy in outdoor advertising by appealing to the family, particularly to the average couple involved in minor disagreements. This paper analyzes the patterns of femininity and masculinity specific to Romanian society. It is easy to identify several profiles for each gender, which are very well developed in the commercial message and preserved in some outdoor series created on the some method. For example, we have ads addressed to the moody woman, to the lazy man, and related to the relationship within the couple. As for the female pattern, this research distinguishes three categories: the domestic woman, dedicated to her family and doing the best at work (While you are cleaning the bathroom, does he ask you how much longer you'll put lipstick on?), the moody woman (concerned about her beauty and desires- Isn't she doing her manicure, while you are cleaning the desk?), the spoiled woman (Darling, I want the tiles with dots……ots otss otss) and the decision- maker woman (*Ever since you've known her, hasn't she made "suggestions" while you're working?).*These types reveal the relationship between subordination and authority in everyday life. In most cases (12 ads), men are subordinated to women, and this has a huge influence on his decisions regarding everything he wants to do or buy. As for the male pattern, the sample brought to light the following examples: an egocentric type, the so- called the "Bergenbier type" preoccupied with sport (You're laying clothes to dry on the heater, he's out to see the game? At least change the heater), the domestic man in charge with house renovations (Every time you lay concrete, she wants it different ? At least change the cement mixer), and the lazy man, with no concern for his wife, work, or home (Every time you clean, does he rest against the wall? At least change their colour?)

Another aspect this research approached regards the advertising texts created to get more credibility and in a very unconventional manner. As a matter of fact, even if the target is oftentimes male, the brand message is equally addressed to women as well, which is the main feature of an argumentative text: to convince people to be curious and interested in something new. Advertising texts are synthetic and connotative, opening a range of possible meanings of love and family.

These research findings may have an important impact on studying the gender relations related to other product categories in advertising, or maybe other brands. If Dedeman campaigns focus on family, they might be interested in other types of relationships as well, by developing the concept of authority vs. subordination or, why not, involving other members of the community. As for the creative strategy, Dedeman adopted a very simple one, according to the Jim Avery[11] schema: to convince (communication objective) ordinary people preoccupied by their home and comfort (target) to buy the product (action) to solve their family conflicts and improve their relationship (emotional purpose), instead of choosing other similar building material providers (the main competition in Romania is Ikea). We believe that Dedeman is going to preserve this approach to better position itself in the consumer's mind for the sake of stability and retention on the local market.

Regarding further research, this paper could only be the beginning of these discussions: either connected with the evolution of this brand or with gender relations in other product categories. It would be very interesting to carry on a study focusing on a comparison between current findings and a future research during the next few years, by paying attention to the strategy and gender relations developed by the Dedeman campaigns. The second aspect is looking forward to finding other product categories whose brands indirectly address to both genders, by using female and male features to symbolically position their values. Consequently, the most important issue emphasized here is that studying gender does not only imply finding stereotypes or patterns, which vary in each culture and society, but also discovering other types of masculinity and femininity in a world in which role-reversals are inter changeable. That is why advertising is one of the hybridized fields in which genders play the chameleonic role for the sake of brand success and fulfilling consumer needs. We may be facing a new Babel Tower in which gender relationships could be differently perceived and explained.

References:

- Adam, Jean-Michel. Argumentarea publicitară (the original title L' argummentaire publicitaire). Iași; Institutul European, 2005.
- Avery, Jim. Advertising Campaigns Planning. 3rd ed., Chicago: The Copy Workshop, 2000.
- Barletta, Martha. Marketing to Women: How to Increase their Share of the World's Largest Market. (2nd edition), Chicago, USA: Dearborn Trade Publishing, 2006.
- Brod, Harry. "Does Manning Men's Studies Emasculate Women's Studies." Hypatia 2 (1987): 153-156.
- Carrigan, Tim, Connell, Bob.W., and Lee, John. "Towards a New Sociology of Masculinity." Theory and Society 14 (1985): 551-604.
- Connell, R.W. and Messerschmidt, James W. "Hegemonic Masculinity: Rethinking the Concept." Gender Society 19 (2005): 828-59.
- Goffmann, Erving. Gender Advertisements. London: Harper & Row, Macmillan, 1976.
- Johnson, Steven. "Theorizing Language and Masculinity: A Feminist Perspective ." in S. Johnson and U.H. Meinhof (eds). Language and Masculinity, Oxford: Blackwell, (1997), 12-22.
- Moriarty, Sandra., Mitchell, Nancy and Wells, William. Advertising: Principles & Practice, 8th edition. New Jersey: Pearson Education, Inc., 2009.
- Mullany, Louise. "Become the Men that Women Desire: Gender Identities and Dominant discourses in Email Advertising Language." Language and Literature 13 (2004): 291-305.
- Saad, Gad. "Applying Evolutionary Psychology in Understanding the Representation of Women in Advertisement."Psychology &Marketing 21 (2004): 593-612.
- Wood, Wendy and Eagly, Alice. "A Cross-Cultural Analysis of the Behavior of Women and Men: Implications for the Origins of Sex Differences." Psychological Bulletin 128 (2002): 699-727.

Electronic resources:

- http://www.iqads.ro/relevant/dedeman.html#printuri- accessed on January 12 2012
- http://www.dedeman.ro/ro/servicii-proiectare-bai.php -accessed on January 31 2012

[11] Jim Avery, Advertising Campaigns Planning, 3rd ed. (Chicago: The Copy Workshop, 2000), 172-173.

"GLOSSY" POLITICIANS: PORTRAYING WOMEN POLITICIANS IN ROMANIAN CONSUMER MAGAZINES

ROMINA SURUGIU[1]

Abstract

Women consumer magazines (glossies) represent the most important part of the specialized media all over the world. The main ingredients of their editorial "recipe" are the positive tone of the articles, and the optimistic, yet shallow approach to all the theme/subjects covered. Magazines are considered to be beautiful objects that inspire people to cherish them.

Women magazines have been criticized in feminist media studies for portraying women in a stereotyped way and for encouraging a consumerist behavior among them. The role models offered by these media are mainly taken from the show business and fashion industry. Women politician are rarely present in the pages of these publications, especially in countries as Romania where the political participation of women is one of the lowest in Europe.

The paper presents in the first part official figures regarding the political participation of Romanian women, and it discusses the results of the most important academic studies on women and media. A previous research showed, for example, that in a four years period, three important Romanian magazines published only 9 article presenting women politicians. The general assumption in magazines desks (and in the society) is that politics is a dirty business that does not match the beautiful world of magazines.

The second part will focus on a case study, considered to be relevant for explaining the general image of women politicians and politics in Romanian consumer magazines. A visual analysis (from the popular culture perspective) will be done to Elena Udrea's pictorial feature for Tabu (Taboo) magazine (November 2011). The choice of the case study was motivated by the following reasons: Elena Udrea is a controversial, yet successful politician, she has impersonated popular culture icons (Madonna, Jackie, Cleopatra) and the feature has generated many positive and negative comments in media.

Keywords: women politicians, consumer magazines, popular culture, icons, Romania

Introduction

Women magazines have been always criticized in feminist media studies for portraying women in a stereotyped way and for encouraging a consumerist behavior[2]. The role models offered by these media are mainly taken from the show business and fashion industry: famous actresses and actors, models, singers usually pose in magazines.

Women politician are rarely present in the pages of these publications, especially in countries as Romania where the political participation of women is one of the lowest in Europe. Nevertheless, women magazines (also known as 'glossies') are one of the most successful editorial segments within the magazine industry all over the world, with millions of readers and billions of US dollars

[1] Ph. D. Romina Surugiu, Postdoctoral Researcher, University of Bucharest, Communication and Journalism Studies, POSDRU/89/1.5/S/62259, (email: rominasurugiu@yahoo.com).

Acknowledgments: This work was supported by the strategic grant POSDRU/89/1.5/S/62259, Project „Applied social, human and political sciences" co-financed by the European Social Fund within the Sectorial Operational Program Human Resources Development 2007-2013.

[2] Gaye Tuchman et al., Hearth & Home: Images of Women in the Mass Media (New York: Oxford University Press, 1978); Janice Winship, Inside Women's Magazines (Pandora, 1987); Liesbet Van Zoonen, Feminist Media Studies (London: Sage Publications, 1994); Joke Hermes, Reading Women's Magazines: An Analysis of Everyday Media Use (Cambridge: Polity Press, 1995); David Gauntlett, Media, Gender and Identity: An introduction (London: Routledge, 2002); Anna Gough-Yates, Understanding Women's Magazines: Publishing, markets and readership (London: Routledge, 2003).

from advertising[3]. Women's magazines are also important in building gender identity, being the one of the most important pillars of "the social construction of womanhood today"[4]. Therefore, the researcher must focus on these media, taking into account their major contribution to the socialization of girls and young women, all over the world.

The goal of this paper is to show how the Romania consumer magazines are portraying women politicians. The research is based on a case study methodological approach, and it will try to answer the above question by doing a visual analysis from the popular culture perspective of a pictorial feature from a Romanian magazine. The hypothesis of the paper is that editors of women magazine feel that politics and glossies do not match. Being in the situation of presenting a woman politician, magazines will draw attention on her physical aspect. The articles tend to focus on the woman as an attractive person, not as professional, although editors' declared intention is not to be gender biased and stereotypical. "In general, though, women's magazines speak the language of 'popular feminism' – assertive, seeking success in work and relationships, demanding the right to both equality and pleasure."[5] They actually want to empower their readers by distributing powerful women as role models.

Women in decision-making. Women in media

Currently, European statistical data regarding women's participation in decision-making show that the number of women MPs in Romania is one of the lowest in Europe: 10 percents[6]. The situation has been the same in the last 20 years after the fall of communism. In 1992, for example, women represented only 4% out the total number of MPs. Ten years after, in 2004, there were only 50 women in the Parliament and 419 men – the percentage doubled (10%), but it remained low, compared to other countries in region, and to the general distribution of women and men in the Romanian society (51%-49%)[7].

Women are also underrepresented in other key positions in decision making: local and national public authorities and they cannot efficiently intervene against procedures, laws or legislative initiatives that are or may be prejudicial to women. In political parties, women are kept in unimportant positions, marginalized and isolated in internal structures like women organizations[8].

The research recently conducted in Romania has shown that women's interests are not on the public agenda, and the social exclusion of women is a reality[9]. Women are generally not taken in consideration in decision-making process. The access of women to the public sphere is limited – they are bystanders, not active participants. "Women in politics adopt – willingly or unwillingly – the patriarchal agenda and the masculine style of doing politics."[10] Therefore, the political parties do not include women's problems on their agenda. On the other hand, media tend to follow the public agenda set by political leaders, ignoring most of time topics important to women's lives.

[3] Tim Holmes and Liz Nice, Magazine Journalism, chapter2: The political economy of magazines (London: Sage Publications, 2012).

[4] Gauntlett, Media, Gender and Identity, 187.

[5] Ibid., 193.

[6] http://ec.europa.eu/justice/gender-equality/gender-decision-making/database/politics/national-parliaments/index_en.htm

[7] Oana Baluta, "Reprezentare 'in oglinda'", in: Gen si putere. Partea leului in politica romaneasca, ed. Oana Baluta (Iasi: Polirom, 2006), 140.

[8] Baluta, "Reprezentare", 140-142.

[9] For a pertinent discussion on this subject see: Oana Baluta, Alina Dragolea, and Alice Iancu, Gen si interese politice. Teorii si practice (Iasi: Polirom, 2007).

[10] Mihaela Miroiu, Drumul catre autonomie. Teorii politice feministe (Iasi: Polirom, 2004), 221.

According to research reports on women and media[11], gender stereotypes in Romanian media could be one of the roots of the low level of women's political representation. "Women in public life are not only less visible than men, but judged according to different standards: (…) family life and physical aspects", concluded Daniela Roventa-Frumusani[12]. Women politicians and men politicians' wives are equally represented in Romania media. When it comes to role models, women in media are portrayed as stars (VIPs, singers, actresses), and housewives. Newspaper and TV news present women as prostitutes, agriculture workers, and homemakers. Business women and politicians are rarely subject of hard news stories[13].

In television political talk shows, women politicians tend to embrace the values of a patriarchal and conservative society. The topics of discussion are influenced by the public agenda set by the men politicians. The political solutions proposed by women MPs in television talk shows are "an interesting mixture of conservatism and gender empowerment". On the other hand, the physical aspect of women politicians becomes, in some cases, a topic of discussion in the talk shows, along the political subjects[14].

Magazines as beautiful objects. Politics as a dirty business

Women consumer magazines (also known as glossies) represent the most important part of the specialized media all over the world. The financial force is given by the perfect symbiosis with the advertising industry, especially with the beauty products segment. The main ingredients of their editorial 'recipe' are the positive tone of the articles, and the optimistic, yet shallow approach to all the theme/subjects covered. Magazines are considered to be beautiful objects that inspire people to collect and cherish them[15].

A magazine is an aesthetic object. It conveys a message to the reader through its format and page quality – a premium or up-market publication will be glossy and have a large format that allows layouts with high quality photographs[16]. "The paper used by, say, consumer monthlies such as GQ or Harpers and Queen is expensive but helps to establish the brand image of the magazines and is an essential support for the high quality artwork which is a part of the attraction of those publications"[17]. Therefore, many journalistic resources are invested in making an appealing layout, on taking interesting pictures, and innovating graphic design.

On the other hand, politics is, traditionally, considered to be a dirty business. Politicians are portrayed as being selfish, corrupt, and greedy. This is one of the reasons why women have been advised not to participate in political fights. In past, they were prevented to get involved in the dirty political world. One historical account could help us understand the Romanian situation: in 1930 the daily Universul (the Universe) conducted a journalistic inquiry on how important is to allow women to participate in the political life of Romania. Men politicians (e.g Constantin Argetoianu, A. Em. Lahovary, Al. Bratescu-Voinesti) declared that women and politics do not match, and the main reason was the vicious nature of political fights, characterized by "anti-Christian feelings", "intense

[11] Ana Bulai and Irina Stanciugelu, Gen si reprezentare sociala (Bucuresti: Politeia, 2004); Laura Grunberg, ed., Mass media despre sexe: Aspecte privind stereotipurile de gen in mass media din Romania (Bucuresti: Tritonic, 2005); Imaginea femeii in societatea romaneasca: raport de analiza media (Bucuresti: ALTFEM, 2011).

[12] Daniela Roventa-Frumusani, "Identitate feminina si discursul mediatic", in: Femei, cuvinte si imagini (Iasi: Polirom, 2001), 64.

[13] According to the conclusions of the report quoted above: "Mass-media despre sexe", 56-57, 76- 77.

[14] Romina Surugiu, "Femei si doamne in talk-show-ul politic din Romania", in: Gen si putere, 229-230.

[15] Losowsky, Andrew, ed. We Love Magazines (Luxembourg: Editions Mike Koedinger SA, 2007); Tim, Holmes, "Mapping the magazine", in: Journalism Studies (Vol. 8, No. 4, 2007, 510-521); Charon, Jean-Marie, La presse magazine (Paris: La Découverte, 2008).

[16] Tim, Holmes, "Magazine design", in The Magazines Handbook, Jenny McKay (London: Routledge, 2001), 165.

[17] Jenny, McKay, Magazine Handbook, 144.

emotions" and "not so noble intentions". "It is a privilege for women to avoid them", concluded one interviewee[18].

In present days, politics and its fights are also associated by people with negative issues. In a recent interview (December 2011) the UNDP representative in Romania, Yesim Oruc, declared that women in Romania feel that politics is "dark and dirty" and do not want to get involved in it. Nevertheless, Oruc said that if women participate in the political field, the politics will transform in a positive way[19].

Romanian politicians in glossies

The topic of women politicians' image in magazines has not been approached by many Romanian researchers, as the general theme of women's representation in media is still under scrutiny. One exception is a master dissertation dedicated to women politicians in glossy magazines[20]. The research showed that on a four year time span only 9 articles on women politicians were published in three different magazines (The One, Tango and Felicia).

The underrepresentation of women politicians in women magazines reinforces by itself the gender stereotypes related to politics. By ignoring it, women magazines send to their readers the message the idea that politics is men's business and women seldom adventure in this domain. "We do not usually present women politicians, for two main reasons: the readers are fed up with politics and we work at a lifestyle magazine that has nothing to do with politics", commented the editor-in-chief of The One magazine, Doru Iftime, quoted in the mentioned paper. "I'm sorry, but women politicians are not part of our editorial interest and do not represent topics for the stories in our magazine", explained the editor-in-chief of Felicia magazine, Carmen Muntean.

The research conducted by Adela Rapeanu showed that all nine features were interviews. There were selected only young women politicians, attractive and the focus was mainly on their looks and their private life rather than on their political activity. Three of them (Daciana Sarbu, Lavinia Sandru and Raluca Turcan) were presented as mothers, in one article entitled "Politics and maternity".

Only one person – Elena Udrea - was twice interviewed in a women magazine (The One). "We placed twice Mrs. Udrea on the cover, because she is very much alike the magazine's profile: chic, fashion-driven, controversial – she is a character that perfectly serves the commercial and advertising interests of the magazine" explained Doru Iftime, editor-in-chief The One magazine. That explanation and other reasons detailed above has taken us to the idea that one of Elena Udrea's pictorial features could be the material of a pertinent academic case study on the subject of woman politicians in glossy magazines.

Case study – posing for a glossy women magazine

The academic literature considers the case study to be a "comprehensive research strategy"[21] which takes into consideration both the social phenomenon and its context. The advantage of type of empirical inquiry is that "investigates a contemporary phenomenon within its real-life context, especially when the boundaries between phenomenon and context are not clearly evident"[22].

---

[18] "Sa se inscrie femeile in partidele politice?", Ziarul nostru, IV (2), February, 1930.

[19] Ana Ilie, "Femeile din Romania, lumina in politica intunecata si murdara", ziare.com, December 13, 2011, accessed January 24, 2012, http://www.ziare.com/social/romani/femeile-din-romania-lumina-in-politica-intunecata-si-murdara-interviu-video-ii-1138738.

[20] Adela Rapeanu, Politica revistelor pentru femei privind femeile din politică (Unpublished Master diss., University of Bucharest, January 2010).

[21] Robert K. Yin, Case study research. Design and Methods, third edition (Thousand Oaks: Sage Publications, 2003), 14.

[22] Yin, Case study, 13.

In the present paper, we comment upon a single case, considered to be representative or typical for our theme. We follow a research protocol designed for case studies, which includes five steps: asking a question, formulating the propositions, identifying the units of analysis, establishing the logic link between the data and the propositions, finding the criteria for interpreting the findings[23].

The first step of the study case is the question, formulated as it follows: "How are women politician portrayed in women's magazines?" The study propositions lead us to the second and the third question: "Why choosing Elena Udrea's pictorial in Tabu (Taboo) magazine to be relevant for the portrayal of women politician in Romanian magazines?", "How to analyze the pictorial in order to obtain fail proof conclusions?" The third step (finding the units of analysis: the photographs of Elena Udrea in Tabu magazine) leads us to another question: "Why images are more important that words, in this particular case?"

Elena Udrea, age of 39, is a controversial Romanian politician, with a successful political career. She is an important member of the ruling Democratic Liberal Party. She has been a MP (the Lower Chamber) since 2008 and the minister of Regional Development and Tourism since 2009. Previously, she was the counselor of president Traian Basescu. Her political activity was characterized by the media as being daring, as she is assertive and has been a main part of important political scandals[24]. On the other hand, she maintained a provocative attitude, in order to draw media attention on herself. She knitted in a TV studio; she invited journalists to see her cleaning the floor with a mop or cooking a Romanian traditional dish. In the same time, she wears designer clothes and shoes[25]. Her motto – as it appears in the pictorial taken into discussion – "You can be in politics on high heels". She also stressed the idea of challenging cultural stereotypes related to blondes. In other words, she wants to be feminine, doing a man's job.

The pictorial feature was published in November issue 2011, of Tabu (Taboo) Romanian magazine. The magazine itself has a strong editorial strategy of being "the most courageous women's publication"[26], by constantly breaking taboos and challenging stereotypes from the Romanian society. One example is illustrative: it is the only magazine for women with a column for gay people. The concept of the main story in every Tabu issue (and of the cover) is to show public figures - women (in most of the cases) and men - playing a role or impersonating a well-known figure. The persons are always selected from the showbiz industry, with a few exceptions.

The feature (defined by media professionals as a long, comprehensive, narrative story, typical for magazines) of Elena Udrea consists of an interview and a series of studio photographs. The article is considered to be relevant for an academic case study for three different reasons:

The character. Elena Udrea is the most prominent woman politician of the moment. She is young and controversial. She has also posed for Tabu, in September 2008, and twice for The One magazine, in 2006 and 2009.

The story. It is the main feature of the November issue of Tabu. The image of the cover is a part of the photo session taken for the feature. The editorial theme of the issue is "powerful women". The main cover-line is: "Elena Udrea, parables of power". The title of the feature within the [23] Yin, Case study, 21.

[24] Romanian journalists claim that she provoked a political crisis in January 2007, when she made public a personal note sent by the prime-minister Calin Popescu-Tariceanu to the president Traian Basescu. (See for example: Adriana Dutulescu, "Istoria relației Elena Udrea – Traian Băsescu", jurnalul.ro, November 4, 2009, accessed January 31, 2012, http://www.jurnalul.ro/special/istoria-relatiei-elena-udrea-traian-basescu-526070.htm and Razvan Braileanu, "Cronologia 'afacerii biletul'", Revista 22, January 26, 2007).

[25] "International media writes about Romanian minister Udrea's expensive D&G dress", romania-insider.com, August 18, 2011, accesed January 31, 2012, http://www.romania-insider.com/international-media-writes-about-romanian-minister-udreas-expensive-gd-dress/31485/.

[26] This is the slogan of the publication, inserted under the logo, on the magazine cover.

magazine is: "Elena Udrea, I can do politics on high heels". The magazine also contains another feature about powerful women ("25 Romanian women famous worldwide").

The context. When interviewed for magazines, celebrities usually tend to establish or maintain a myth about them[27]. In this particular interview, Elena Udrea acts as she wants to follow the trend: she behaves like a celebrity in process of establishing a myth.

The analysis will try to identify the pattern matching between the theories of women politicians' representations in media, previous researches done on the popular culture field and the data collected from the present research work.

Taking into consideration that a magazine is – first of all – a visual medium, we will focus our analysis on the photographs from the feature. The five pictures shot for the pictorial feature will be discussed from the popular culture perspective, which we consider appropriate in the given context. In our opinion, every picture of the feature is overloaded with signs and mythical elements conveyed by the mass cultural products (such as Hollywood movies). The pictures refer to contemporary public (political) figures – even the image of ancient queen of Egypt, Cleopatra, is a modern one, constructed in the twentieth century by the Hollywood productions.

Discussion

The pictorial feature[28] under discussion consists of seven photographs: (1) the cover photo – Elena Udrea impersonates Madonna, 2) the main photo of the article – Elena Udrea is Jackie Kennedy, 3) the first portrait – Elena Udrea is Cleopatra, 4) the second portrait – Elena Udrea is Eva Peron, 5) the third portrait – Elena Udrea is Margaret Thatcher, 6) the fourth portrait – Elena Udrea as herself, 7) the fifth portrait – Elena Udrea as herself.

We will mainly analyze the five pictures in which Elena Udrea impersonates powerful women, as these images send the most powerful message to the readers. The function of the two photos of Elena Udrea as herself is to illustrate the interview, so they are left aside in the present analysis.

The cover photo, inspired by Madonna's cover of Vanity Fair, US edition (May, 2008) is powerful and meaningful. It is a full shot photograph (full body of person). The main photo of the feature (Jackie Kennedy) is a long shot, because it contains setting and other characters. The three portraits (Cleopatra, Eva Peron, and Margaret Thatcher) are medium close-up. In all three types of photos, the angle of the camera is normal (which implies neutrality), the composition is conventional and the lighting is somehow artificial, studio-like, even in Jackie Kennedy's impersonation picture where the lighting might have been naturalistic (documentary style).

The portraits' emphasis is on the face and the jewelry worn by Udrea. The key word is seduction. The distance of the camera to the subject implies even in the portraits' case a social (not personal) relationship. The audience observes, but do not intrude[29]. The conventional composition and the artificial lighting from all five pictures suggest a low degree of involvement of the subject (Elena Udrea) in the role-playing.

She is good-looking, but she does not act. She stands still, and she does not touch any object (her hands are at a certain distance to the green world globe in the cover photo). The camera caught no movement and no intention of the subject to move, even in pictures that imply action from the nature of their subject. In her attempt to be closer to the image of popular icons, Udrea fails to perform the roles of Jackie, Cleopatra or Evita, as the audience would have expected.

---

[27] McKay, Magazine Handbook, 117.

[28] The feature was realized under the coordination of the publisher Dan-Silviu Boerescu, well-known for being the editor-in-chief of Playboy Romania, for several years. The photographs were shot by Dragos Cristescu, and the interview was made by Ramona Pop.

[29] Nick Lacey, Image and Representations: Key Concepts in Media Studies (London: Macmillan Press, 1998), 23.

She is Madonna.

For magazines, the cover is the most prominent and useful selling tool, and the main carrier of the magazine's brand values[30]. The feminist critique considers that: "The cover photograph then, insofar as it represents an editorial stance or identity, also reflects the ideological implications of content that in turn reflect the producers' perceptions of culturally agreed-upon rules, goals and values. In addition, producers emphasize cover photographs as potential sources of readers' identification, thereby reinforcing the importance attached to their selection and presentation."[31]

The cover photo of Tabu is not based on an original idea. The editors of the magazine chose to re-interpret a cover of Madonna in Vanity Fair US, May 2008 issue. The pop star and icon Madonna, who made a fortune from selling her sexy image, is posed in front of the world globe, in a provocative posture. The main cover-line is: "Madonna, unbowed, uncowed, still taking on the world". The feature, inside the magazine is entitled: "Madonnarama!" The Vanity Fair editorial concept was to introduce to the readers a reinvented Madonna, activist and filmmaker, involved in tackling issues as orphans in the Third World[32].

The original image of Udrea as Madonna was altered, with the help of digital technology. A décolletage was inserted to the black dress worn by Elena Udrea. The retouching (denied by the magazine's editors) is obvious when someone compares the images from the making-off photo sessions to the images on the magazines. Journalists, e-readers, and bloggers negatively commented upon the change[33], although magazines pictures are retouched on a regular basis despite the ethical controversies related to this aspect[34].

Being Madonna could equally be a positive and negative thing. The positive aspect is that Madonna, as popular icon and a "commodity of the cultural industries" has the unique quality of being whatever the consumers want her to be[35]. John Fiske, in his research on popular culture considered Madonna as an "exemplary popular text" and explained: "Madonna as a text, or even as a series of texts, is incomplete until she is put into social circulation. (…) She is an exemplary popular text because she is so full of contradictions – she contains the patriarchal meaning of feminine sexuality and the resisting ones that her sexuality is hers to use as she wishes in ways that do not require masculine approval. (...) she is excesive and obvious. (...) she is a provoker of meanings, (she is) a set of meanings in process."[36]

In our context, Udrea's impersonation of Madonna may be interpreted as a statement of a powerful woman. She dominates the world and she enjoys the situation. She is self-assured, calm, and sexy.

But being Madonna could be a negative thing, too. Madonna is a pop star, and stars are defined in sociology as "the powerless elite"[37]. Stars have limited institutional power, but are an object of interest, identification and collective evaluation: "their lives, their social relationships become an object of identification or a projection of the needs of the mass of the population, a [30] John Morrish, Magazine Editing. How to develop and manage a successful publication, second edition (London: Routledge, 2003), 167.

---

[31] Marjorie Ferguson, "Imagery and Ideology: The Cover Photographs of Traditional Women's Magazines", in: Hearth&Home, 99.

[32] http://www.vanityfair.com/magazine/toc/contents-200805.

[33] See, for example, the article and the readers' commentaries: "Iulia Albu: 'Elena Udrea a fost decoltata cu japca'", realitatea.net, November 2, 2011, accessed January 31, 2012, http://www.realitatea.net/iulia-albu-elena-udrea-a-fost-decoltata-cu-japca_883633.html.

[34] Tom Ang, "Magazine illustration and picture editing", in Magazines handbook, McKay, 171.

[35] "To be popular, the commodities of the cultural industries must not only be polysemic – that is capable of producing multiple meanings and pleasures – they must distribute by media whose modes of consumption are equally open and flexible". John Fiske, Understanding Popular Culture (London: Routledge, 1989), 158

[36] Fiske, Popular Culture, 124.

[37] Francesco Alberoni, "The Powerless 'Elite': Theory and Sociological Research on the Phenomenon of the Stars", in: Stardom and celebrity, ed. Sean Redmond and Su Holmes (Los Angeles: Sage Publications, 2007), 65-77.

benchmark for positive and negative evaluation, the chance to have experience in the domain of the morally possible and a living testimony to the possibility of achieving a rise in personal status"[38]. From this point of view, Udrea sends to the female audience a message of a powerful person, but not the message of a powerful politician.

She is Jackie.

The main picture of the pictorial feature inside the magazine reenacts the famous scene of President John F. Kennedy and First Lady Jackie Kennedy arrival at Love Field in Dallas, Texas, on November 22, 1963. The Tabu editors took the original photo and placed Udrea's image instead of Jackie's. It is a photomontage, in journalistic terms. The impersonation of Jackie Kennedy has its ups and downs, too.

Jackie is the wife with the capital letter. Her public image was constructed in relation to her two famous husbands: John F. Kennedy and Aristotelis Onassis. Media of her time, especially magazines, turned her in a heroine. She was praised for her qualities, pitied for her loss and criticized for her life of luxury. Her image is associated to important messages for women: "women lose their identity in the men to whom they are married"[39], "women cannot be alone, and men both take care of women and bear responsibility for women's life"[40] .

She is Cleopatra.

The "modern" image of Cleopatra has embedded traits taken from the mass cultural products (Hollywood movies and popular stories), originated in Shakespeare's work, and not on historical accounts.

In the twentieth century's popular culture, the most known Cleopatra is the character played by Elizabeth Taylor in 1963, in the Hollywood production Cleopatra, with Elizabeth Taylor, Richard Burton and Rex Harrison in the leading roles. The image of Cleopatra has important cultural stereotypes attached to it: extreme luxury and unorthodox methods of achieving and maintaining power (seducing a powerful man in order to obtain military support). Of course, the criticism is modern, her actions being immoral from the Christian point of view.

It is this image of modern Cleopatra that Elena Udrea impersonates in the pictorial from Tabu magazine. She wears the same make-up as Elizabeth Taylor's Cleopatra, her hair is done approximately the same and the dress and jewelry tries to match the movie character. Udrea associates herself with the image of ostentatious luxury.

She is Evita.

Eva Duarte de Peron was the First Lady of Argentina (1946-1952). She was a powerful woman in Argentina: during her husband's office she ran the Ministries of Labor and Health, and she was an important figure in the Peronist Party. Eva Peron was extremely admired by the working class (who were referred to as "descamisados" or "shirtless ones"). After her premature death, she was given the official title of "spiritual leader of the nation" by the Congress in Argentina.

Nevertheless, her image, as popular icon, was mainly constructed worldwide by Madonna's interpretation of Eva Peron, in the Oscar-winning Hollywood movie, Evita (1996). In the pictorial feature in Tabu, Udrea is impersonating Madonna playing Evita, and not the real Eva Peron, wife and politician.

"Hollywood cinema has a long standing tradition of constructing women as a spectacle for voyeuristic pleasure", commented Liesbet Van Zoonen[41]. In this context, Udrea as Evita is a [38] Alberoni, "The Powerless Elite", 76.

[39] Carole Lopate, "Jackie!", in: Hearth&Home, 133.
[40] Ibid., 135.
[41] Van Zoonen, Feminist media studies, 87.

beautiful woman, but not a politician. She also displays ambition, motivation, openness (she smiles to the camera).

She is Thatcher.

Also known as "The Iron Lady", Margaret Thatcher was the prime minister of United Kingdom between 1979 and 1990. Thatcher's though reform program led to high unemployment, racial tensions, and strikes. During her office, the controversial Falklands war took place. "Twenty five years to the day since she entered Downing Street, Margaret Thatcher remains a controversial figure. To her supporters, she was a revolutionary figure who transformed Britain's stagnant economy, tamed the unions and re-established the country as a world power. Together with US presidents Reagan and Bush, she helped bring about the end of the Cold War. But her 11-year premiership was also marked by social unrest, industrial strife and high unemployment. Her critics claim British society is still feeling the effect of her divisive economic policies and the culture of greed and selfishness they allegedly promoted."[42]

Posing as Thatcher, Udrea puts the researcher in a difficult position. Thatcher cannot be discussed from the popular culture perspective. The portrait photo shows a brown hair lady, self composed and calm, with the typical British attitude. Udrea does not resemble Thatcher in the mentioned picture: she is too young and too attractive. The only explanation behind Udrea's choice of impersonating Thatcher could be that she aspires to be Thatcher. That is: to be a powerful politician.

Conclusions

The hypothesis mentioned in the introduction is validated. The feminist media research should take into consideration the context of journalistic text and image production. In our case, the authorial intent was to introduce to audience a powerful woman. The magazine has proposed an editorial theme focused on powerful women and cast Elena Udrea in the main role. However, the oppositional reader position (in Stuart Hall words) leads to a not-so-powerful woman, trapped in a stereotypical world of meanings.

The message of the pictorial feature is characterized by ambiguity. She impersonated powerful women (two wives, one mistress, and a pop star), but not powerful politicians (with one exception, Margaret Thatcher). In this context, Udrea is a role model for readers, due to her physical characteristics, but she fails to be a role model as a politician. After all, she impersonated stars, popular icon, not politicians.

On the other hand, the visual analysis showed that she does interpret the role of well-known public figures, but she mimics. The photographs' lack of movement, the rigid posture of the character, the conventional setting and angles created the idea of mimicking the role of powerful women, and not actually being one of them. Udrea puts the emphasis on seduction. Therefore, she is a prisoner of a constantly contradictory relation between her image in magazines – attractive, seductive - and her political activity which implies a certain level of professionalism and distinction.

References

- Alberoni, Francesco. "The Powerless 'Elite': Theory and Sociological Research on the Phenomenon of the Stars". In: Stardom and celebrity, edited by Sean Redmond and Su Holmes, 65-77. Los Angeles: Sage Publications, 2007.

[42] "Evaluating Thatcher's Legacy", BBC News, Tuesday, May, 4, 2004, accessed January, 31, 2012, http://news.bbc.co.uk/2/hi/uk_news/politics/3681973.stm.

- Ang, Tom. "Magazine illustration and picture editing", in The Magazines Handbook, Jenny McKay, 170-184. London: Routledge, 2001.
- Baluta, Oana. "Reprezentare 'in oglinda'". In: Gen si putere. Partea leului in politica romaneasca, edited by Oana Baluta, 139-170. Iasi: Polirom, 2006.
- Baluta, Oana Alina Dragolea, and Alice Iancu. Gen si interese politice. Teorii si practici. Iasi: Polirom, 2007.
- Bulai, Ana and Irina Stanciugelu. Gen si reprezentare sociala. Bucuresti: Politeia, 2004.
- Charon, Jean-Marie. La presse magazine. Paris: La Découverte, 2008.
- Gauntlett, David. Media, Gender and Identity: An introduction. London: Routledge, 2002.
- Gough-Yates, Anna. Understanding Women's Magazines: Publishing, markets and readership. London: Routledge, 2003.
- Grunberg, Laura, ed. Mass media despre sexe: Aspecte privind stereotipurile de gen in mass media din Romania. Bucuresti: Tritonic, 2005.
- Ferguson, Marjorie. "Imagery and Ideology: The Cover Photographs of Traditional Women's Magazines". In: Hearth & Home: Images of Women in the Mass Media, Gaye Tuchman et al., 97-115. New York: Oxford University Press, 1978.
- Fiske, John. Understanding Popular Culture. London: Routledge, 1989.
- Hermes, Joke. Reading Women's Magazines: An Analysis of Everyday Media Use. Cambridge: Polity Press, 1995.
- Holmes, Tim. "Magazine design". In The Magazines Handbook, Jenny McKay, 158-169. London: Routledge, 2001.
- Holmes, Tim. "Mapping the magazine". In: Journalism Studies 4 (2007): 510-521.
- Holmes Tim and Liz Nice. Magazine Journalism. London: Sage Publications, 2012.
- Lacey, Nick. Image and Representations: Key Concepts in Media Studies. London: Macmillan Press, 1998.
- Lopate, Carole, "Jackie!". In: Hearth & Home: Images of Women in the Mass Media, Gaye Tuchman et al., 130-140. New York: Oxford University Press, 1978.
- Losowsky, Andrew, ed. We Love Magazines. Luxembourg: Editions Mike Koedinger SA, 2007.
- McKay, Jenny. The Magazines Handbook. London: Routledge, 2001.
- Miroiu, Mihaela. Drumul catre autonomie. Teorii politice feministe. Iasi: Polirom, 2004.
- Morrish, John. Magazine Editing. How to develop and manage a successful publication, second edition. London: Routledge, 2003.
- Rapeanu, Adela, "Politica revistelor pentru femei privind femeile din politică." Unpublished Master diss., University of Bucharest, January 2010.
- Roventa-Frumusani, Daniela. "Identitate feminina si discursul mediatic". In: Femei, cuvinte si imagini, Adina Bradreanu et al., 17-66. Iasi: Polirom, 2001.
- Surugiu, Romina. "Femei si doamne in talk-show-ul politic din Romania". In: Gen si putere. Partea leului in politica romaneasca, edited by Oana Baluta, 205-232. Iasi: Polirom, 2006.
- Van Zoonen, Liesbet. Feminist Media Studies. London: Sage Publications, 1994.
- Winship, Janice. Inside Women's Magazines. Pandora, 1987.
- Tuchman, Gaye, Arlene Kaplan Daniels and James Benet. Hearth & Home: Images of Women in the Mass Media. New York: Oxford University Press, 1978.
- Yin, Robert K. Case study research. Design and Methods, third edition. Thousand Oaks: Sage Publications, 2003.

GENDER DIFFERENCES IN ENTREPRENEURSHIP

SILVIA POPESCU[1]

Abstract

This study of female entrepreneurship traditionally has been inspired by gender equality issues. Female entrepreneurs were assumed to experience gender-related discrimination and to experience more difficulties when starting up and running a business than their male counterparts. Today research and policy have been more and more fuelled by the idea that female entrepreneurs are important for economic progress. Even when issues such as barriers and obstacles to female entrepreneurs are raised in the gender and entrepreneurship debate, this is usually done from the perspective that female entrepreneurs are an untapped resource and have potential to contribute to a country's economic performance. Indeed, although gender equality is one of the arguments underlying the support for female entrepreneurs within the European Union, the argument that female entrepreneurs (have the potential to)contribute to economic performance continues to play a role here. The global growth of female entrepreneurship in the last decades has been accompanied by an increase in the number of studies on female entrepreneurship. Unlike most existing studies, which focus primarily upon female entrepreneurship in Western European countries, the present thesis investigates gender differences in entrepreneurship in the Eastern European countries. Different aspects of entrepreneurship are studied including the individual, the organization and the environment. A systematic distinction is made between direct and indirect gender effects on entrepreneurship to be able to disentangle 'pure' gender effects from effects of factors that are correlated with gender.

Keywords :Managing diversity, female entrepreneurship, economic performance, gender differences, entrepreneurial diversity

Introduction

As the contemporary economy is characterized by an ever-increasing demand for quality in its broadest sense, it is of vital importance that the best qualified people are selected for (available) jobs, independent of their sex. In this way the process of emancipation becomes an important driver of economic progress. At present the share of women in total entrepreneurial activity varies between 20 and 40 percent across the developed countries. Female entrepreneurs have an important contribution to employment creation and economic growth and contribute to the diversity of entrepreneurship.. The studies in this thesis show evidence of gender differences in entrepreneurship both at the macro and the micro level. In the report Good practices in the promotion of female entrepreneurship of the European Commission (2002, p.3) it is argued that women face a number of gender-specific barriers to starting up and running a business that have to be tackled as women are considered "a latent source of economic growth and new jobs and should be encouraged". Hence, the main argument to date for studying women's entrepreneurship is that female entrepreneurs are an "engine of economic growth" (Ahl, 2002, p. 125). The basis for this argument is the acknowledgement that entrepreneurship (in general) is important for economic performance. The link between entrepreneurship and economic growth has been established by several scholars and is well documented (see Carree and Thurik, 2003, for an overview).

[1] Associate Professor, Ph. D., Economics Faculty „Titu Maiorescu" University, Bucharest (email: silvipopescu@ gmail.com).

This work was supported by the strategic grant POSDRU/89/1.5/S/62259, Project "Applied social, human and political sciences. Postdoctoral training and postdoctoral felowship in social, human, and political sciences" cofinanced by the European Social Fund within the Sectorial Operațional Program Human Resources Development 2007-2013.

Are gender differences worth studying?

In the present thesis there is an implicit assumption that studying gender differences is important. However, several arguments have been brought forward why the study of gender differences in entrepreneurship would not be very useful. A related argument is that the differences among women and among men are larger and more important than those between women and men, and accordingly, that research should focus upon these intra-group (or in-group) differences instead of intergroup (or between-group) differences (e.g., Kimmel, 2000; Ahl, 2002). In this respect, Moore (1999, p. 388) advocates that: "It is time to stop clumping entrepreneurs together in one group. Much is to be learned by studying women entrepreneurs as members of various groups". Also, there are likely to be differences between female entrepreneurs of different generations. Moore (1999) distinguishes between 'traditionals' (i.e., female entrepreneurs with traditional values, adhering to stereotypical female work roles) and 'moderns' (i.e., later generation female entrepreneurs who are more similar to than different from their male counterparts other words, there may be a generation effect which outweighs the gender effect, where female entrepreneurs from earlier generations are different from those of later generations. Indeed, over time gender differences have become less pronounced. We see a gender convergence rather than divergence, and women and men nowadays are far more alike than they were some decades ago (Kimmel, 2000). Obviously, there will be a range of other factors including age, educational background, firm size and sector, that may be more important in explaining differences between entrepreneurs than gender[2] The present paper incorporates studies on gender differences in entrepreneurship, spanning different aspects of entrepreneurship at different levels of analysis, including the individual, the organization and the environment. In Section 1 attention will be paid to the participation of women in entrepreneurial activity distinguishing between the number of female entrepreneurs per female labor force (female entrepreneurial activity) and the female share in entrepreneurial activity (female entrepreneurial participation). Also, attention is paid to the economic contribution of female entrepreneurs. In Section 2 the state of research on female entrepreneurship is discussed, giving on overview of gender differences in entrepreneurship, and identifying knowledge gaps based upon under-studied themes and insufficient or inadequate methodological development. These knowledge gaps are the basis for developing a research agenda. Section 2 also familiarizes the reader with the concept of gender and gender issues in research. Section 3 presents the research agenda, giving an overview of the research questions (or themes) and presenting a research framework. Section 4 draws overall conclusions, discussing the evidence on gender differ rences, paying attention to scientific and social learning and implications as well as giving suggestions for further research.

1. The Economic Contribution of Female Entrepreneurship

1.1. Measuring Female Entrepreneurship

There are different ways in which female entrepreneurship (whether in established businesses or in new venture creation) can be measured. First, one can investigate the number of female entrepreneurs per (female) labor force (i.e., female entrepreneurial activity). Second, one can have a look at the female share in total entrepreneurial activity (i.e., female entrepreneurial participation). Whereas the first measures female entrepreneurship vis-à-vis the number of women in the labor force, the second measures female entrepreneurship vis-à-vis the total number of entrepreneurs. This paper will discuss female entrepreneurship from both perspectives, also distinguishing between self-employment and new venture activity[3]. Because female entrepreneurship rates are not similar across

[2] Brush (1992, p. 13) refers to research indicating that women business owners differ with respect to the 'individual' dimension depending upon a woman's age (see Kaplan, 1988) and the location of the business (see Holmquist and Sundin, 1988).

[3] Self-employment here refers to business owners (i.e., employers and own-account workers), excludingventure activity is measured in terms of Total Entrepreneurial Activity (TEA) as proposed by the Global countries, the present section also touches upon some country differences, but this is not the main focus of the present section.[4] Although it is interesting to see where cross-country differences in female entrepreneurship come from, at the end of the day a more important question (in particular for policy makers) is whether these differences lead to variation in economic performance across countries. Hence, special attention is paid to the relationship between female entrepreneurship and economic performance.

1.2 Entrepreneurial Diversity, Economic Performance and Gender

The present thesis it is assumed that female and male entrepreneurs have a different profile, e.g., they have a different way of doing business and start and run different types of firms. Thus, female entrepreneurs can contribute to the diversity in entrepreneurial activity and economic performance by way of their distinctive characteristics. In terms of products and services it may be argued that female entrepreneurs tend to operate in niche markets. Female entrepreneurs often pursue a specialization strategy offering tailor-made goods and services (Chaganti and Parasuraman, 1996). Assuming that tailor-made products and services are different from other products offered within the industry, it can be said that female entrepreneurs offer new non-competing or complementary products, insulating them from competition. Because over time consumer demand has become more versatile (Brock and Evans, 1989), niche markets have become more important, i.e., diversity in demand has to be met by diversity in supply of goods and services. From this perspective it may be important to stimulate female entrepreneurship, in particular as at present the share of women in entrepreneurial activity is still below 50 percent. Hence, stimulating female entrepreneurship may be a way to increase entrepreneurial diversity..

2. What Do We Already Know About Female Entrepreneurs?

2.1 Overview of gender differences in entrepreneurship

Within entrepreneurship research, female entrepreneurship can be considered a 'separate' field of study[5]. Researchers focusing upon the issue of female entrepreneurship have traditionally been female, and still continue to be[6]. In general entrepreneurship researchers appear to have become more aware of the possibility of gender differences, and gender is increasingly used as a control variable. To give an overview of the many studies undertaken in the area of gender issues in entrepreneurship, this section builds upon review articles by Brush (1992), Ahl (2002) and a review of studies identified in Gatewood et al (2003). The aim is not to provide a full picture of research in the area of female entrepreneurship, but rather to give the reader an idea of the state of research on

---

Entrepreneurship Monitor (GEM). TEA refers to the share of people in the adult population (aged 18-64 years old) who are actively involved in starting a new business or in managing a business that is less than 42 months old (Reynolds et al., 2002, p. 5). Hence, whereas self-employment is a measure of established businesses, TEA can be seen as a measure of new venture activity

[4] Several factors may account for these differences in entrepreneurship rates, including technological, economic, demographic, institutional, and policy factors. It is outside the scope of this introduction to further investigate the origin of country differences in total and female entrepreneurial activity

[5] Based on the number of researchers involved in female entrepreneurship research, the special issues in entrepreneurship journals (such as those in the journals Entrepreneurship Theory and Practice, and International Journal of Entrepreneurial Behaviour and Research, planned for 2005 and 2004, respectively), the Diana project (an international research consortium, consisting of renowned scholars in the field of female entrepreneurship), collected series of female entrepreneurship studies in books or edited volumes (e.g., International Handbook of Women and Small Business Entrepreneurship, edited by Fielden and Davidson), and the fact that gender or women in entrepreneurship has been a separate issue in the Proceedings of the Babson Kaufmann Entrepreneurship Research Conference, Frontiers of Entrepreneurship Research, from 1996 onwards (with the exception of the year 2000).

[6] This is shown by the overrepresentation of female researchers and contributors within the Diana project; the gender section of several issues of Frontiers of Entrepreneurship Research and the International Handbook of Women and Small Business Entrepreneurship gender issues in entrepreneurship. The subject of the present thesis is situated at the intersection of two broad fields of study: entrepreneurship and gender. Research on female entrepreneurship can be structured around different themes. Brush (1992) uses Gartner's (1985) framework distinguishing between four key components of new venture creation: individual, process, organization, environment[7]. Here the same classification is used discussing gender differences with respect to the different subjects within the field of entrepreneurship[8].

Most studies on female entrepreneurship focus upon the individual, covering topics such as motivations, demographics and background characteristics (such as education and experience). Up to the early 1990s research on female entrepreneurship identified gender differences with respect to individual characteristics. Brush (1992; p. 13) concludes that: "women business owners are more different from than similar to men in terms of individual level characteristics such as education, occupational experience, motivations, and circumstances of business start-up/acquisition". However, contemporary research indicates that for a range of individual characteristics (including psychological, attitudinal and personal background factors) there are more similarities than differences between female and male entrepreneurs (e.g., Ahl, 2002). With respect to research intensity, the 'individual' studies are followed by studies on the environment, organization and process of entrepreneurship, respectively (Ahl, 2002)[9]. In particular the number of studies dealing with environmental aspects has increased since the early 1990s. The process of starting up and running a business as well as environmental influences on entrepreneurial activity seem relatively similar for female and male entrepreneurs (e.g., Ahl, 2002). However, in terms of organizational characteristics businesses of women have been found to be more different from than similar to businesses of men. In particular, this is found for sales volumes, management styles, goals, and the acquisition of start-up capital (Brush, 1992). Ahl (2002) finds that the scarce research (usually studies with few observations) focusing upon organization refers to a distinctive (relational) management style of female entrepreneurs as compared to that of male entrepreneurs. The most consistent gender differences are found for firm size and sector, where businesses of women are on average smaller than those of men (whether measured in terms of financial indicators or employees) and with female entrepreneurs being more likely to operate retail or service firms. In addition to studies that fall into one of the categories – individual, organization, environment, and process – there are studies that are more comprehensive, taking into account and covering several aspects at the same time. For example, studies classified as mixed studies include overview articles and articles investigating individual and firm performance[10]. In her review of performance articles, Ahl (2002) argues that the [7] Gartner's (1985) framework for new venture creation distinguishes between four key components of new venture creation and ownership: individual (e.g., demographics, education, experience, psychological characteristics of the entrepreneur), process (referring to activities of an entrepreneur, including opportunity recognition, resource accumulation, venture creation and sustenance), environment (referring to the interaction between entrepreneur and his/her environment, including availability of resources, government regulation and support, industrial structure, urbanization) and organization (referring to firm characteristics, including strategic decision-making, organizational structure, business profile).

[8] It should be noted that the use of the components of new venture creation as proposed by Gartner (1985) may not be ideal. The components of new venture creation are by no means exclusive. For instance, the process of new venture creation may not easily be disentangled from the entrepreneur, the organization and its environment (Steyaert, 1995).

[9] As Ahl (2002, p. 97, footnote 1) argues: "the general tendency of focusing on the individual remained, with over half of the papers in this category". "The rest were divided about equally between the other three headings …".

[10] Because performance may not necessarily be classified as a component of new venture creation, but rather may be considered a consequence of new firm creation, its classification is not straightforward. This may also be the reason why Brush (1992) does not explicitly discuss female entrepreneurship studies from the perspective of performance. Nevertheless, when outlining directions for future research Brush (1992) argues that each of the suggested research areas should be studied also in combination with its effects on performance.

topic of firm performance has become more popular in female entrepreneurship studies in the past decade. Until the early 1990s this topic did not receive much attention. Discussing performance differentials between businesses of female and male entrepreneurs, Ahl (2002, p. 108) argues that "The 'female underperformance hypothesis' .... did not hold when put to rigorous tests accounting for structural factors". And if preferences are taken into account there appears to be no support for the proposed gender differences in entrepreneurial performance. With respect to the particular subjects dealt with within each of the categories, it can be said that environment studies mostly focus upon resource availability and (to a lesser extent) support structures for female entrepreneurs. The organization studies emphasize business profile characteristics, such as sector, firm size and age. Process studies tend to focus upon the process of new venture creation, including topics such as networking and resource acquisition. In addition, most studies within the area of performance differentials focus upon firm performance. Although individual studies in the area of female entrepreneurship have a broad focus, they tend to focus upon

2.2.Perspectives on Gender Differences

2.2.1.Nature versus nurture

There are two basic schools of thought proposing different reasons for the existence of gender differences (in general): biological determinism (referred to as nature) and differential socialization (referred to as nurture), the latter of which has served as input for the social feminist perspective. Biological arguments for gender differences generally draw upon three streams of research, including evolutionary theory, brain research and endocrinological research on sex hormones. The implication of the biological determinism perspective is that because differences between women and men are attributed to their different biological nature, one automatically assumes that the existing societal arrangements between women and men are inevitable, dismantling the need for policy intervention and support structures. Social scientists refute the perspective that innate biological differences lead to behavioral differences which – in turn – construct the social, political and economic environment. They argue that gender inequality in society leads to observable differences in behaviors, attitudes and traits. The differential socialization school of thought assumes that women and men are different because they are taught to be different. In essence both the biological determinism perspective and the socialization view assume that women and men behave differently, and that they are different from each other. Moreover, both streams of thought assume that the differences between men and women are greater and more decisive (and therefore more worthy of study) than the differences within groups of women and men[12].

2.2.2 Social versus liberal feminism

The identified gender differences in entrepreneurship research have been explained in different ways, either assuming that women and men are different from each other or that they are in essence the same and the environment causes them to behave in different ways. These perspectives are consistent with the social and liberal feminist perspective, respectively (Fischer et al., 1993). According to the social feminist perspective gender differences in entrepreneurship are due to differences in early and ongoing socialization. Hence, female and male entrepreneurs are inherently different, giving rise to different ways of viewing the world and, accordingly, different ways in which entrepreneurship is practiced. The liberal feminist perspective argues that in essence women and men are the same and that female entrepreneurs experience more problems or structure their firms in a distinct way (as compared to male entrepreneurs) because they are confronted with unequal access to [11]Ahl (2002) refers to divergent definitions of what constitutes an entrepreneur, heterogeneous samples and inaccurate referral practices resources and gender-based discrimination. To summarize, both perspectives expect female and male entrepreneurs to behave in a different way, either determined by situational differences and/ or barriers (liberal feminism) or by dispositional differences and/or barriers (social feminism). A different way of explaining gender differences in entrepreneurship is by investigating situational factors that are correlated with gender. Female and male entrepreneurs may behave in the same fashion, provided they have the same personal and business profile. For instance, because female entrepreneurs tend to have smaller firms, their firms are characterized by different performance rates and organizational structure. This perspective on studying and explaining gender differences may be more similar to than different from the two perspectives proposed above. Indeed, differences in the personal and business profile of female and male entrepreneurs may be explained by situational or dispositional differences.

[12]Also, these schools of thought assume that gender domination (males over females) is a result of gender differences (Kimmel, 2000, p. 4).

2.2.3.Sex versus gender

Most social and behavioral (i.e., nurture) scientists make a distinction between the terms gender and sex, where sex refers to biological aspects and gender refers to the meanings that are attached to these differences between women and men within given a culture. Thus, whereas a person's sex (male or female) is based on physiological characteristics, a person's gender (masculinity or femininity) is based on differences in social experiences (Bem, 1993; Korabik, 1999)[13]. Because there is likely to be withinsex variation in experiences, sex may not completely determine a person's gender (Fischer et al., 1993). However, Korabik (1999, p. 12) argues that: "… although sex and gender are theoretically independent, the sex-linked gender-role socialization that is still commonplace in Western culture means that empirically they are often not". Therefore, gender is often operationalized by using biological sex as a proxy variable

(i.e., assuming bio-psychological equivalence)[14]. Because biological sex may be confused with a range of other factors (Ridgeway, 1992), it is important to take into account the situational context. As Kimmel (2000, p. 12) argues: "It turns out that many of the differences between women and men that we observe in our everyday lives are actually not gender differences at all, but differences that are the result of being in different positions or in different arena's". Most studies investigating gender effects in entrepreneurship take the unidimensional model of gender, assuming bio-psychological equivalence, as a starting point. However, there have been studies taking a bidimensional gender approach to studying entrepreneurship, focusing upon femininity versus masculinity. For example, Watson and Newby (2004) argue that sex roles (masculinity or task focus versus femininity or relationship focus) may be more important in explaining entrepreneurial characteristics. Moreover, White et al. (2003) investigate the relationship between the level of testosterone and entrepreneurial behavior[15]. In these studies gender no longer constitutes a dummy variable but measurement of gender (or masculinity versus femininity) is more complex and diverse. However, using sex as a determinant of gender has the advantage of measurement consistency. In addition, it enables comparison of the studies in the present thesis with the bulk of studies that have been done in the area of gender issues in entrepreneurship. The present thesis focuses upon

[13] Hence, whereas biological sex may be seen as an exogenous variable (that is not determined by other factors), gender may be considered an endogenous variable (that is determined by other factors, such as life experiences).

[14]This is in line with the unidimensional model of gender, placing masculinity and femininity at opposite sides of the continuum, where men and masculinity are at one end and women and femininity are at the other end. Biological sex is used as a determinant of psychosocial gender. Bidimensional models of gender – on the other hand – assume that gender consists of two independent dimensions, masculinity and femininity. These dimensions are considered to be independent of biological sex. For a detailed discussion, see Korabik (1999).

[15] Testosterone may be considered a measure of femininity versus masculinity. Although testosterone levels tend to be higher for men than for women, this is not necessarily the case. It should be noted that the relationship between level of testosterone and new venture creation was tested using male-only sample differences between female and male entrepreneurs, and does not investigate the influence of femininity (or masculinity) on entrepreneurship. Whereas 'sex' of the entrepreneur is measured, the term 'gender' is used to capture all underlying characteristics and experiences of women and men. To avoid misinterpretation of the results, in this study a distinction is made between direct and indirect gender effects. Indirect gender effects refer to effects of various economic and social factors with respect to which female and male entrepreneurs differ (e.g., sector, firm size), whereas direct gender effects refer to gender differences that are not due to other factors included as controls in the study. The direct gender effect should be regarded as a residual effect as it may be that there are still other determining factors (correlating with gender) that have not been controlled for. When studying gender issues (in entrepreneurship) it is virtually impossible to control for all intermediary factors[16].

3. Female Entrepreneurship Research

3.1.Neglected themes

Brush (1992) identified areas in need for further research, several areas of which up to date still have received little attention of female entrepreneurship researchers. Knowledge gaps that are due to neglected themes particularly exist with respect to the organization and environment dimension. Although the latter area of research has received more attention in recent years studies within this category have mainly focused upon one aspect, such as resource acquisition and the relationships between banks and female entrepreneurs, rather than focusing upon the complex network of external actors with which female entrepreneurs are confronted. Moreover, in spite of the fact that there have been some studies focusing upon support structures for female entrepreneurs, thus far there has not been a comprehensive overview of macro-level influences on the start-up and or management of businesses by female entrepreneurs. Organization studies have emphasized organization context or business profile factors (e.g., firm size, sector, location) rather than organizational structure factors (e.g., management, goals). The individual dimension has been relatively well studied. Today there still has not been much attention for (self)-perception issues in female entrepreneurship research. With respect to performance studies, most of the research has been performed at the organizational level, while no research has been done investigating the (economic) performance of female entrepreneurs at the country level (Ahl, 2002).

3.2 Research Framework

The studies within the present thesis focus on different levels of analysis, paying attention to issues at the individual, organizational and environmental level. At the environmental (or macro) level the causes and consequences of female entrepreneurship are discussed. In the present thesis it is assumed that the gender of the entrepreneur influences individual characteristics of the entrepreneur, including demographics (e.g., age, ethnicity); personality, values and attitudes and ability; perception, motivation and goals, and learning; and behavior. For example, women may have specific motivations for starting a business (e.g., combining work and household responsibilities). Although it is argued in the present thesis that women and men may differ with respect to characteristics of their organization, we assume that most of these organizational differences can be related to differences with respect to individual characteristics. The individual characteristics influence organizational characteristics. Organizational characteristics include organizational context variables (e.g., sector, firm size, strategy, location, networks, suppliers and other external parties), organizational structure (e.g., management, firm structure) and organizational performance. Obviously, there will be linkages between organizational context, structure and performance. For example, small firms have a different organizational structure than larger firms. And larger firms are more likely to have higher performance in terms of financial indicators, e.g., revenues and profits. In addition, there may be 'feedback' effects from the organizational characteristics to the individual characteristics. For example, the performance of a firm is likely to influence the attitude towards work and the time allocated to the firm. Within this framework and thesis gender is considered to be a source of diversity, as we expect to find differences in individual and organizational characteristics between female and male entrepreneurs. This diversity at the individual and firm level is seen as input for entrepreneurial diversity at the level of the environment (i.e., the macro level).

[16] The intermediary factors used in the present study are all based upon a review of the literature.

3.3. Social Learning

From a societal perspective the present study is important for different reasons. The studies in the present thesis show that the observed gender differences in entrepreneurship can largely be explained by way of characteristics of female entrepreneurs and their businesses, rather than (only) by way of gender-related obstacles and discrimination. Creating insight into the origin of gender differences in entrepreneurship leads to more awareness with policy makers of the 'real' underlying factors influencing female and male entrepreneurship, which accordingly can be targeted to stimulate high quality entrepreneurship. In this respect, it is found that the productivity of working hours for female entrepreneurs is lower than that for male entrepreneurs, and this is partly due to lower amounts of human, social and financial capital of female entrepreneurs. These capital constraints may be lifted by the government through (better) provision of information and education; enhancing the (general) availability of financial capital for start-ups[17] and stimulating entrepreneurs to join and become members of networks. More knowledge about female entrepreneurship or the origin of gender differences in entrepreneurship may also do away with misconceptions with respect to (the characteristics of) female entrepreneurs and their firms. With respect to the economic importance (or performance) of female entrepreneurship, the profile of the average female entrepreneur at the micro does not provide a particularly 'glamorous' picture of women starting and running businesses. This may have its effect on economic performance. However, the present thesis shows that at the country and regional level female entrepreneurship (as measured by the share of women in entrepreneurial activity) is not harmful, but may be positive for economic performance. And although it appears that women tend to be less productive with respect to the time they invest in their firms, this is largely due to indirect gender effects, suggesting that when comparing similar female and male entrepreneurs (with respect to personal and business profile) there is no significant productivity difference. Also, the risk-averse attitude of women is likely to influence the growth patterns of the businesses of women, where women choose to adopt low-or slow-growth strategies because they want to keep control over (the growth of) the business. This cautious approach of women may not only suppress growth of female owned or-led firms, but may also result in fewer bankruptcies of businesses of women (as compared to those of men). Indeed, Blom (2003) argues that – as compared to men – women in the in the western countries have a better chance of succeeding in business. Although increasingly women start and run businesses in the the western countries and the female share in both self-employment and new venture creation is among the highest rates of all OECD countries, we have seen that on average female-owned firms remain relatively small and show low growth rates. This may be attributed to the choices of women themselves (focusing on quality rather than quantity), but also to socio-cultural values regarding the distribution of household and childcare responsibilities within the household where women still take on the bulk of household responsibilities even if they also work for a living (limiting the time and effort that can be invested in the firm). Indeed, time restrictions may be an important factor explaining the particular profile of the businesses of female entrepreneurs. Emancipation in the western countries is relatively low, [17] Because female entrepreneurs tend to be more risk-averse than male entrepreneurs, the relatively small amounts of financial capital used by female entrepreneurs may be attributable to their own choice rather than a restricted availability of financial capital.

hindering the flow of women into the higher executive jobs or positions within organizations.[18] Although this may stimulate women to start up their own firms, enabling them to be more independent and have flexible working hours, it is likely that time restrictions also play a role within the entrepreneurship of women, in particular since self-employment requires higher time investments as compared to wage-employment. To enable women to participate more fully in the labor market and run large and high-growth firms (if they choose to do so), social roles need to change, establishing a more equal distribution of tasks within the household. To establish this it is important that working women are (to some extent) relieved of the pressure of household responsibilities, stimulating the combination of work and private responsibilities by men through providing facilities such as parental leave, part-time work, and childcare (Duyvendak and Stavenuiter, 2004). Although in the western countries there is a generic entrepreneurship policy, not distinguishing between groups of entrepreneurs (Stevenson and Lundström, 2001), and there are no specific measures in place to stimulate female entrepreneurship (Bruins, 2003), this may not be a problem as long as there are measures taken at a more general level, stimulating and facilitating women who want to participate full-time in the labor market either through self-employment or wage-employment.

3.4.Scientific Learning

From a scientific viewpoint the present thesis creates awareness of the interrelatedness of female entrepreneurship with a range other business and individual factors and helps explain the observed gender differences in entrepreneurship. The present thesis avoids misinterpretation of the results, wrongly attributing differences in entrepreneurship to gender (rather than to other explanatory variables that are correlated with gender), by adding relevant control variables in the analysis to single out direct and indirect gender effects. Accordingly, this study departs from the viewpoint that it is relevant to study gender differences in entrepreneurship, but that 'pure' gender effects are hard to find. Instead, research should focus upon the explanation of the distinct characteristics of female and male entrepreneurs and their businesses, including as many relevant 'controls' or intermediary variables as possible. Although female entrepreneurship researchers have become more aware of the different ways in which the gender of the entrepreneur can influence entrepreneurial characteristics and behaviors, the present thesis advocates more precision in analyzing gender effects. A distinction can be made between total, direct and indirect gender effects, where total effects are the average gender differences that can be observed in practice. If, on average, we do not observe any gender differences, this does not mean that there are no (underlying) gender effects. That the distinction between total, direct and indirect effects is universal, and also applies to other influences than gender, becomes apparent from other studies in the present thesis. Moreover, the distinction between direct and indirect effects has shed light on the underlying reasons for many of the observed gender differences in entrepreneurship. It can be argued that gender is one of the many lenses that can be used for studying the phenomenon of entrepreneurship. By focusing upon one characteristic (i.e., explanatory factor) and its linkages, distinguishing between direct and indirect effects, a better insight can be created in the complex relationships between explanatory factors and their influence on entrepreneurship.

3.5.Pitfalls and Drawbacks of Female Entrepreneurship Research

An important criticism is that gender studies often overemphasize the focus on gender differences, ignoring similarities. This often results in reporting the results of studies that find significant gender differences, neglecting the discussion of studies where no differences are found .Moreover, findings that indicate that there are no gender differences are sometimes not accepted [18] See Parool, October 16th, 2004, Emancipatie stelt weinig voor [Emancipation is low] by Michiel Couzy. This article refers to research done by Annelies van der Horst at the Universiteit Maastricht.

(Ahl, 2002). And statistically significant results (e.g., finding gender differences) do not always reflect socially significant results .Hence, if a significant effect of the gender of the entrepreneur is found, it is important that a plausible explanation of this gender effect is provided, possibly through follow-up research. In female entrepreneurship research there is a risk of attaching too much weight to the findings of gender effects. Often, a dummy variable is used and it is easy to find a gender effect, in particular if other (intermediary) factors, correlating with gender, have not been taken into account. Also, gender research may be dictated by stereotype thinking. Women tend to be viewed as less entrepreneurial than men. Entrepreneurship is often associated with male values, such as decisiveness, risk-taking, and competitive. This stereotype thinking may direct female entrepreneurship studies towards anticipated results or interpretation of the results in conformity with gender stereotypes. For instance, because of this stereotype thinking of the entrepreneur as male, female entrepreneurs may be perceived as less entrepreneurial or even less successful. Hypotheses may be formulated and justified based on this stereotype image. A more 'positive' stereotype is that of the women as democratic leaders building relationships rather than managing from a hierarchical perspective. When researching management styles of female and male entrepreneurs, this image of the female entrepreneur as a relationship builder can be very pervasive and can impose itself upon the research(er) even though there has been only limited evidence of this finding in entrepreneurship research.

4 .Conclusions and Future Research Suggestions

The present thesis shows that female and male entrepreneurs differ significantly with respect to a range of aspects of entrepreneurship. The studies show that there is evidence of gender differences in entrepreneurship both at the macro and the micro level. At the macro level the present thesis shows that there is some evidence of a positive relationship between female entrepreneurship (vis-à-vis male entrepreneurship) and economic performance at both the regional and country level.[19] With respect to the determinants of entrepreneurship at the macro level it is found that the factors influencing female and male entrepreneurship are similar rather than different. Most of the factors that influence entrepreneurship in general, also influence female entrepreneurship. However, differential effects have been found for unemployment and life satisfaction, suggesting that the female share in self-employment is influenced by those factors. At the micro level most of the gender differences are attributable to indirect effects, although some evidence has also been found for direct gender effects. Even though most of the micro-level studies find some evidence for the existence of direct gender effects, these may be residual effects that exist because it is virtually impossible to take into account all factors that influence entrepreneurship. The present thesis has studied the characteristics of the average female entrepreneur, the profile of which has been described in one of the previous paragraphs. However, it may be that new generations operate their businesses in a different way than older generations of female entrepreneurs. It is therefore interesting to investigate the (differences in) profile of younger and older female entrepreneurs. In general, the information on female entrepreneurship can be enriched by investigating different types of female entrepreneurs in addition to the average female entrepreneur. For example, part-time versus full-time female entrepreneurs; married versus single female entrepreneurs; female entrepreneurs with and without children; and women running service versus production firms. Distinguishing between different types of female entrepreneurs also enables the comparison with male entrepreneurs in similar circumstances. Furthermore, this thesis has studied gender diversity in entrepreneurship in terms of individual and business characteristics. Most of the studies deal with business structuring and the input side of the business, focusing upon time investments, financial structure, (human [19] However, the exercises do not take into account a range of other factors influencing economic performance. In particular, the share of the service sector resource) management, and organizational structure. The output side has not been investigated and, although there have been several studies investigating performance differentials between businesses of women and men, there is still need for further research. First, research should explore the type of output female entrepreneurs produce and the extent to which these are unique and contribute to entrepreneurial diversity. For example, because female entrepreneurs tend to pursue combinations of goals, they may also be more likely to engage in social entrepreneurship. Second, we have seen that businesses of women tend to be small, and are less likely to experience growth. Arguing that female entrepreneurship is important for economic performance thus seems a paradox. Future research may be able to unravel this paradox by focusing both upon the quantitative and qualitative contribution of (female) entrepreneurs. To summarize, the relations between female entrepreneurship, entrepreneurial diversity and economic performance should be further explored in empirical studies[20]. Measurement issues are crucial here as female entrepreneurship can be measured in different ways .If the aim is to investigate the link between entrepreneurial diversity and economic performance, researchers should take the female share in entrepreneurial activity (as a measure of entrepreneurial diversity) as a starting point. Using female entrepreneurial activity rates (measured vis-à-vis the labor force) is likely to only establish a link between entrepreneurial activity and economic performance, as countries with relatively high total entrepreneurial activity rates also tend to be characterized by relatively high female entrepreneurial activity rates. Finally, future research on gender issues in entrepreneurship should explore different ways of approaching and measuring gender. In the present thesis gender is measured by way of biological sex. In this way sex and gender coincide. However, since some women may be more masculine than some men (and vice-versa), it is important to also explore other ways of measuring gender, investigating the degree of gender and using a continuous variable rather than a dummy variable (i.e., male versus female). As the feminization of society advances and it does not pass over men, studying masculinity versus femininity in the arena of entrepreneurship may be a fruitful alternative and/or complement to studying differences between female and male entrepreneurs in the future.

References

- 1.Ahl, H.J., The making of the female entrepreneur, A discourse analysis of research texts on women's entrepreneurship, (JIBS Dissertation Series 015, Jönköping University, 2002).
- 2.Bem, D.J*., Self-perception theory,* in: Berkowitz, L. (Ed.), (Advances in Experimental Social Psychology 6, 1972).
- 3.Bem, S.L., *The measurement of psychological androgyny,(*Journal of Consulting and Clinical Psychology 42, 1974)
- 4.Blom, R.J., Vrouw in Zaken [Woman in Business],(Amsterdam: Uitgeverij Bert Bakker, 2003).
- 5.Brock, W.A. and D.S. Evans, Small business economics, (Small Business Economics 1, 1989).
- 6.Bruins, A., Stimulating female entrepreneurship, (Mini-rapportage: M200307, Zoetermeer: EIM Business and Policy Research. 2003).
- 7.Brush, C.G., Research on women business owners: past trends, a new perspective and future directions, (Entrepreneurship: Theory and Practice 16 (4), 1992).
- 8.Brush, C.G. and R.D. Hisrich, Women-owned businesses: why do they matter?, in: Z.J. Acs, Are small firms important? Their role and impact, (U.S. Small Business Administration, Kluwer Academic Publishers, 1999).
- 9.Carrier, C., Intrapreneurship in small businesses: an exploratory study, (Entrepreneurship Theory and Practice 21 (1), 1996).

[20] Gender diversity may be just one source of entrepreneurial diversity and advocating entrepreneurial diversity may also imply stimulating other groups of people such as ethnic groups and young people to become entrepreneurs.

- 10.Chaganti, R., Management in women-owned enterprises, (Journal of Small Business Management 24 (4), 1986).
- 11.Chaganti, R. and S. Parasuraman, A study of the impacts of gender on business performance and management patterns in small businesses,( Entrepreneurship: Theory and Practice, Winter 1996).
- 12.Duyvendak, J.W. and M.M.J. Stavenuiter, Working Fathers, Caring Men; Reconciliation of Working Life and Family Life,(The Hague/Utrecht: Ministry of Social Affairs and Employment Department for the Coordination of Emancipation Policy and Verwey-Jonker Institute, 2004).
- 13.European Commission, Good practices in the Promotion of Female Entrepreneurship; Examples from Europe and Other OECD Countries, (Brussels: 2002).
- 14.Fischer, E.M., Reuber, A.R. and L.S. Dyke, A theoretical overview and extension of research on sex, gender and entrepreneurship, (Journal of Business Venturing 8 (2), 1993) .
- 15.Fischer, M.L. and H. Gleijm, , The gender gap in management: a challenging affair, (Industrial and Commercial Training 24 (4), 1992).
- 16.Gartner, W.B., "Who is an entrepreneur?" is the wrong question, (Entrepreneurship Theory and Practice 13 (4), 1989).
- 17. Gartner, W.B., A conceptual framework for describing the phenomenon of new venture creation, (Academy of Management Review 10 (4), 1985).
- 18.Gartner, W.B., Mitchell, T.R. and K.H. Vesper, *A taxonomy of new business ventures, (*Journal of Business Venturing 4 (3), 1989).
- 19.Gartner, W.B., What are we talking about when we talk about entrepreneurship?, (Journal of Business Venturing 5 (1), 1990).
- 20.Gatewood, E.J., Carter, N.M., Brush, C.G., Greene, P.G. and M.M. Hart, Women Entrepreneurs, Their Ventures, and the Venture Capital Industry: An Annotated Bibliography,(Stockholm: ESBRI ,2003).
- 21.Kimmel, M.S., The Gendered Society, (New York/Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2004).
- 22.Korabik, K., Sex and gender in the new millennium, in: G.N Powell (ed.), Handbook of Gender and Work, (Thousand Oaks, CA: Sage Publications, 1999).
- 23.Lohman, H., Self-employed or employee, full-time or part-time? Gender differences in the determinants and conditions for self-employment in Europe and the United States, (Arbeitspapiere, Mannheimer Zentrum für Europäische Sozialforschung. 2001).
- 24.Moore, D.P., An examination of present research on the female entrepreneur – suggested research strategies for the 1990s, (Journal of Business Ethics 9 (4/5), 1990).
- 25.OECD, OECD Employment Outlook, June 2001,(Paris: OECD ,2001).
- 26.OECD, OECD Employment Outlook, July,(Paris: OECD, 2002)
- 27.OECD, Trends and Recent Developments in Foreign Direct Investment, (Paris: 2003)
- 28.Stevenson, L. and A. Lundström, Patterns and Trends in Entrepreneurship/SME Policy and Practice in Ten Economies – (volume 3 of the Entrepreneurship Policy for the Future Series, Örebro: Swedish Foundation for Small Business Research (FSF), 2001).
- 29. Verheul, I., Commitment or control? Human resource management in female and male-led businesses, (EIM Scales Paper N200402, Zoetermeer: EIM Business and Policy Research, 2004).
- 30.Verheul, I. and A.R. Thurik, , Start-up capital: Does gender matter?, (Small Business Economics 16 (4), 2001).
- 31.Verheul, I., Risseeuw, P.A. and G. Bartelse, Gender differences in strategy and human resource management: the case of Dutch real estate brokerage, (International Small Business Journal 20 (4), 2002).
- 32. Verheul, I., Wennekers, S., Audretsch, D. and R. Thurik, An eclectic theory of entrepreneurship: policies, institutions and culture, (in: D.B. Audretsch, A.R. Thurik, 2002).
- 33.Verheul, I., Van Stel, A.J. and A.R. Thurik, Explaining female and male entrepreneurship across 29 countries, Max Planck Paper on Entrepreneurship, (Growth and Public Policy 08-2004, Jena, Germany: Max Planck Institute for Research into Economic Systems, 2004).
- 34. Verheul, I., Uhlaner, L.M. and A.R. Thurik, Business accomplishments, gender and entrepreneurial self-image, (Journal of Business Venturing 20 (4), 2005).
- 35. Verheul, I., Carree, M.A. and A.R. Thurik, Allocation and productivity of time in new ventures of female and male entrepreneurs, (EIM Scales paper N200411, 2004).
- 36. Watson, J., Comparing the performance of male- and female-controlled businesses: relating outputs to inputs, (Entrepreneurship Theory and Practice 26 (3), 2002).

- 37.Watson, J. and R. Newby, Are sex-roles better than sex? An investigation into the relationship between an alternative measure of gender and SME owner-operator characteristics, paper presented at the Babson Kauffman Entrepreneurship Research Conference, June 3-5, 2004, (University of Strathclyde, Scotland, 2004).
- 38.White, R.K. and R. Lippitt, Autocracy and Democracy: an Experimental Inquiry, (New York: Harper, 1960).
- 39.White, R.E., Thornhill, S. and E. Hampson, Entrepreneurs and evolutionary biology: the relationship between testosterone and new venture creation, in: Bygrave et al. (eds), Frontiers of Entrepreneurship Research,(Babson Park MA/Kansas City MI, Arthur Blank Center for Entrepreneurship (Babson College) and Kauffman Center for Entrepreneurial Leadership, 2003).

FINANCING INNOVATION IN ROMANIA

SORIN SERBAN[1]

Acknowledgements:

This work was co-financed from the European Social Fund through Sectorial Operational Programme Human Resources Development 2007-2013; project number POSDRU/107/1.5/S/77213 "Ph.D. for a career in interdisciplinary economic research at the European standards"

Disclaimer: This article is written by the author and represents his sole opinion and responsibility without engaging any other third part.

Abstract:
This article based on an examination of empirical literature, analyses the financing of innovative enterprises in Romania and presents the characteristics of Romanian policies in this regard. It sets forth an estimation of the number of innovative enterprises in Romania based on figures from different sources. Assessing the role of financial restrictions on innovation reveals that a firm is facing obstacles to finance its innovative activities but also other difficulties to innovate which appears to be enhanced. This article also puts forward the role of different financing actors and instruments at different stages of the firm's life cycle and emphasizes the function of proximity capital in filling the gap between supply and demand of financing. Finally a framework for policy is recommended.

Keywords: Cluster, Incubator, Innovation, Private Equity, Venture capital
Jel Classification*: E 22, G 24, O 38*

1. Introduction

The theoretical literature widely stresses that innovative projects are more likely to encounter financial constraints. Indeed, for such projects finding external financing is difficult and costly to SMEs due to the strong asymmetry relevant with such innovative investments (Hall, 2002) and the problems banks face in defining appropriate models to evaluate risk. However, empirical evidence about the impact of these constraints on innovation is dissipated and not as unquestionable as one might expect. Some authors even consider that instead of being constrained, firms mostly face an excess supply that leads them to undertake unnecessary or too risky investments (De Meza and Webb, 1987).

Romania is no exception from this situation. One strand in the empirical literature concludes that there is a single financing model, the model currently used by firms being largely determined by institutional and macro considerations, whereas another concludes that there is a particular financing process for innovative SMEs.

This article looks at financing the innovative SMEs in Romania, examining the existing empirical literature and numerous reports and studies concluded in this area. No specific survey has been conducted because the data available is already abundant. Therefore the report attempts to present the conventionalised facts, some stable patterns that emerge from different sources of empirical data, and proposes a framework to better understand the structural characteristics of [1] Ph. D. candidate, West University of Timisoara, (email: sorin_serban2001@yahoo.fr).

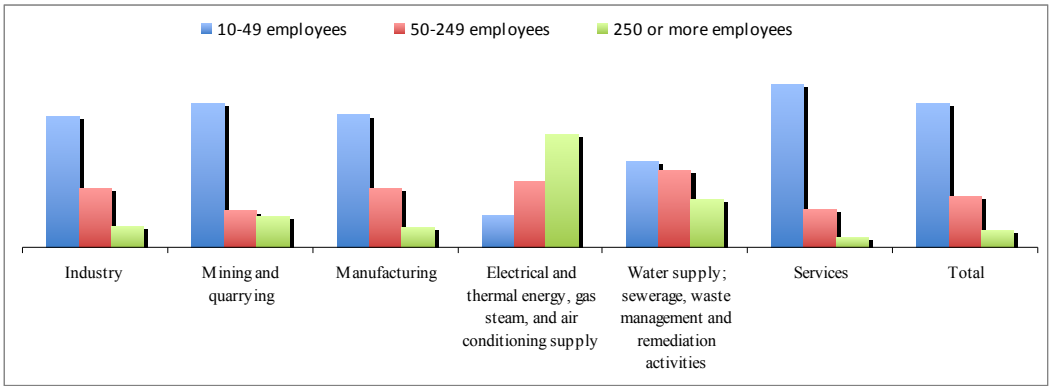
Romanian policies addressing these SMEs. It starts by identifying the subset of firms concerned by innovation, which is important for determining the scope of policies to implement. The study then presents an assessment of the financial constraints those firms are facing and explains how complementarities among financial actors intervene in order to decompress the constraints felt by some companies. The study continues by pointing to proximity as an additional element to improve relations between borrowers on one hand and investors on the other. The financial commitment of the state then is illustrated. It concludes by proposing a structural framework, to capture the policy changes that could arise from the firms behaviour to promote a collective dynamic and changes in the coordination process.

2. How many enterprises are innovative?

Based on the findings of the 2008 Community Innovation Survey (CIS 2008, 2006-2008), in Romania nearly 20% of companies where active in technological innovation from 2006 to 2008 compared to nearly 40% in the EU-27. This innovation activity may have lead to a new product (or service), or a new process, although not necessarily during the observation period.

Under a wider definition that includes organisational and marketing innovation, more than 33% of the enterprises in Romania report innovation. Organisational innovation is the most widespread form of innovation activity with almost 69% of total innovation activities, irrespective of the enterprise business sector or size. Process innovation is generally more common than product innovation, having respectively percentages of 20% and 7 %. Small enterprises are more innovation-active than large ones in all the activities except electrical and thermal energy, gas steam, and air conditioning supply as we can see in the Figure 1 hereafter. In these last industries very few SMEs can be found, therefore the innovative configuration is affected.

Figure 1. Percentage of enterprises active in PPAOM[2] innovation by activity and size, Romania



Source: INS National Institute fo Statistics of Romania, Community Innovation Survey 2008

3. An assessment of the financial constraint of SMEs – the financing gap

It is generally admitted that SMEs have more difficulty surviving, are less profitable and default more frequently than large firms due to lack of economies of scale advantages. Helping them

[2] PPAOM: products processes, innovation activities, organisation, marketing to counterbalance this weakness is, then, a structural characteristic of Romanian innovative financing.

3.1. Factors hampering innovation

Cost factors (lack of financial resources, too-high innovation costs) are the main explanation given by the majority of innovation-active enterprises in the Community Innovation Survey 2006, the last available survey which analysed the factors hampering the innovation activities. Romania is one of the most affected countries in the EU by the financial constraints, 31% of the innovative enterprises complaining about the lack of funding within the enterprise or the group. Furthermore, 31% of the innovative enterprises complain about the lack of finance from sources outside the enterprise and 29 % about the cost of the innovation as illustrated in the Table 1 hereafter.

Table 1 - Main barriers to innovation, Romania
(Percentages of innovative enterprises in 2004 and 2006)

Related factors		2004-2006	2002-2004
Cost-related factors	Lack of funds within your enterprise or group	30.6	8
	Lack of finance from sources outside your enterprise	31.0	30.3
	Innovation costs too high	28.6	29.9
Knowledge-related factors	Lack of qualified personnel	13.5	14.2
	Lack of information on technologies	5.5	7.3
	Lack of information on markets	5.3	0
	Difficulty in finding cooperation partners for innovation	14.4	15.9
Market factors	Uncertain demand for innovative goods or services	13.3	21.2
	Markets dominated by established enterprises	18.9	16.1
Reasons not to innovate	No need to innovate because no demand for innovations	2.1	5.4
	No need to innovate due to prior innovations	2.9	4.2

Source: Community Innovation Survey 2006 and 2004

Experts and politicians often mention finance as a strong constraint to innovation. Numerous surveys carried out, particularly by World Bank, highlight that the access to finance is often mentioned by the SMEs as one of the most important barriers for their "doing business". According to the World Economic Forum, in 2010 the most problematic factor for doing business in Romania is the access to financing for more than 16% of Romanian survey participating enterprises.

Furthermore, Romania is among the last countries where innovative companies received public funding: 11% in 2008 and 12% in 2006 (out of total innovative enterprises) compared to 39 % in Italy or 37 % in Netherlands both in 2008.

Therefore, it is impossible to ignore the potentially negative effect that insufficient financing has on innovation. It has been shown (Rivaud-Danset, 2001) that when an innovative project encounters financial constraints the average number of obstacles nearly doubles, whatever other difficulties the project is facing.

3.2. The credit rationing and the financing gap

A better understanding of the so-called financing gap is nevertheless required, which led many authors to study more carefully the sources of disappointment mentioned by entrepreneurs in surveys on bank-firm relationships. In doing so they refer to credit market literature in order to propose econometric models that make it possible to measure the different sorts of credit rationing.

The literature distinguishes three types of credit rationing: the well-known weak[3] and strong[4] credit rationing and a self constraint bound to the discouragement of entrepreneurs on the credit market. Many French studies (SESSI 2002; Bonnet, Cieply and Dejardin, 2004; Savignac, 2007) show that a large part of new firms are not credit constrained. According to Bonnet, Cieply and Dejardin (2004) the strong credit-rationing hypothesis only concerns 3.26% of the firms created in 1994 and 5.3% of the subsample of the innovative ones. Credit rationing, according to Stiglitz and Weiss (1981), also pertains to a very small proportion of new firms in France during mid-nineties. Weak rationing concerns 14.76% of the sample and only 8.21% of the subsample of the most innovative firms. It finally appears, that self-constraint is the most important financial impediment new firms have to suffer. Empirical studies carried out by OSEO[5] offer strong evidence favouring this assertion.

The main conclusions drawn from these studies are as follows:

The results obtained in all literature concerning the effectiveness of credit rationing to small innovative firms in France support all academic assumptions based on entrepreneurs' expectations of [3] "Weak credit rationing" (or type I) corresponds to the situation where a borrower x does not succeed in getting sufficient credit at the moment t (Keaton, 1979). This borrower is granted access to credit, but for a level of debt that is inferior to the level (s)he desires. This rationing occurs when some applicants receive, at the current interest rate, smaller loans that they desire.

[4] "Strong credit rationing" (or type II) occurs when some borrowers' demands are turned down by banks although these borrowers are ready to pay all prices and non-price elements of the loan contract, while apparently identical demands are accepted by banks. In this situation, a customer x does not receive at moment t any sort of credit, although a customer y who does not apparently differ from x gets it. This situation was first described by Stiglitz and Weiss (1981).

[5] OSEO was created in 2005 by merging ANVAR (the French innovation agency) and BDPME (the SME development bank), with a mission of general interest to support the regional and national policies. Its mission is to provide assistance and financial support to French SMEs in funding innovation and investment.

investors' future decisions. The new theory of credit rationing based on discouragement of entrepreneurs seems sound and promising;

Despite the existence of financial constraints, when new firms want access to bank loans, banks remain their main provider of external finance (87% of Romanian SMEs according to the Flash Eurobarometer study of the European Commission 2009b, p. 42). The current financial crisis has resulted in a significant reduction in the availability of bank loans to the SMEs (Roman and Rusu, 2011);

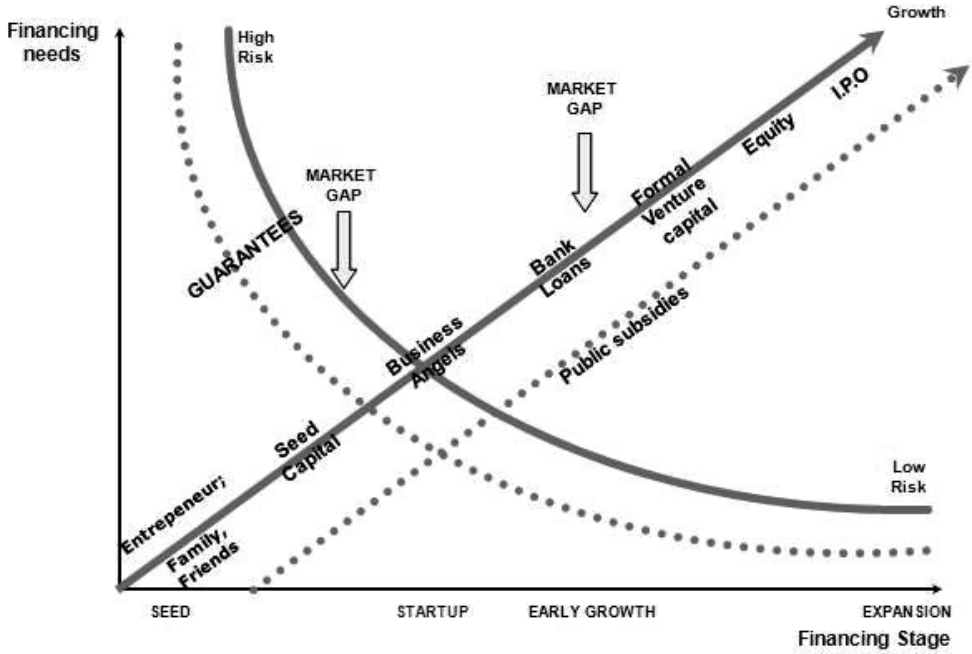
Inter-firm and external finance are unimportant when it comes to newly created and innovative firms. When only innovative sectors are concerned, the frequency of highly intensive relationships between new firms and these two kinds of investors tends to increase but remain at a very low level.

The banks have an important role in the financing of new firms in Romania and self-constraint appears as a major phenomenon almost impossible to explain by any standard theory of financing. Other means of financing such as venture capital, business angels and trade credit have played a minor role in financing of Romanian innovative firms. These findings detract from the assumption of a new firm credit gap, but they may equally support the general direction of public aid in Romania, which favours guaranteeing funding granted by banks to finance the riskiest firms - and in particular the innovative enterprises.

4. A general architecture to bridge the gap

European literature agrees on a general financing stages model for innovative SMEs as presented in the Figure 2.

Figure 2. Financing stages for innovating SMEs



Splitting the financing path into three main stages offers a view of the general architecture: there is the start-up phase, the first financial rounds that correspond to the take-off of the firm, and the subsequent financial rounds that are activated whenever a firm aims at entering new markets, tries to develop new products or attempts to manage some turmoil. Several financing solutions correspond to each of the stages, as shown in Table 2.

Table 2. Three stages of financing

Start-up phase	First financial round	Subsequent financial round
Seed capital fund Loans without interest and/or guarantee University and research centres spin-off funds Micro credit Public or para-public funds for creation of innovation Public grants Reimbursable loans	Business angels Seed capital fund Banks loans/overdraft Guarantee funds Public or para-public investment funds Regional public venture capital Public grants Corporate venturing	Private venture Bank loans Share subscription bonus Mezzanine
Indirect support: Pre-incubation, incubation, nurseries and easy-in/easy-out workshops, tutorship (coaching, mentoring, hands-on management), legislative work (financial services, capital adequacy, etc.).
Integrated actions: Financial value chain, intermediation

5. Innovative SMEs and their financing vehicles

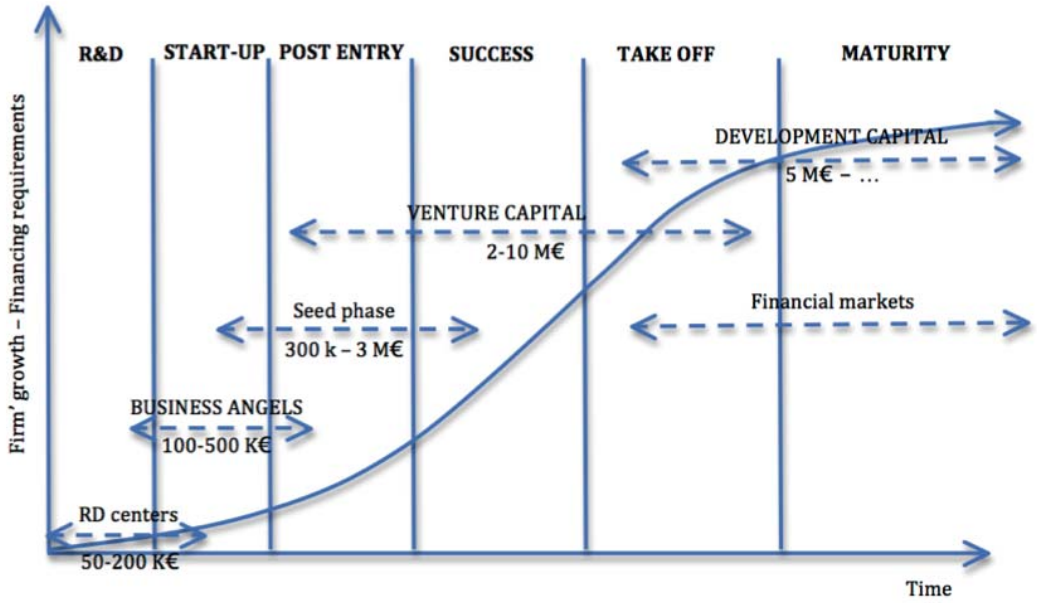
Innovative SMEs may be important in strengthening economic growth and employment, but they still face particular problems when attempting to access financing as they represent a higher risk than households, traditional SMEs or large firms. Therefore, they are not good candidates for traditional bank loans as seen above, but are used to rely on themselves or on love money gotten from friends and family to finance their riskiest projects. Instead of a financial gap, it is more accurate to speak of a mismatch of the expectations of borrowers and lenders. This results in a market failure strengthened by exogenous elements (the burst of the "dot.com" bubble after the steep rise of Internet in the late 1990s, the subprime crisis) that pushes banks to announce a credit shortage due to a more strict selection process.

Because of the supposed reluctance of banks to commit themselves to a credit relationship with innovative SMEs, these firms often tend to expect much from investors who will provide risk capital, generally in return for a share in the company. The risks for the investor are high, but so are the potential rewards if he or she is backing a winner.

Financing for innovative SMEs is complicated by the fact that these firms are likely to require a range of financing vehicles at different stages of their development. The "seed" money to start up the company generally comes from friends, professional contacts and family.

A simplified presentation of the venture capital industry in connection with the life cycle of the firm is presented below.

Figure 3. Innovation firms' lifecycle and the venture capital market



Source: CDC Entreprises, "PME innovantes et Capital risque", Novembre 2005

In European developed countries, where venture capital and private equity are more developed, "business angels" are seen as a key link in the financing chain at the early stage of business development, as they bring business experience to the table as well as their own capital in a context of proximity and coaching for the new entrepreneur. In Romania Associations of "business angels" should be stimulated by the public authorities via tax advantages for investing in start-ups and innovative SMEs.

6. Equity capital financing and proximity

Most SMEs are not connected to the financial places and only have access to financial markets. The inability to produce standardised information and to provide extensive administrative follow-up are the first barriers to entry on the stock exchange. All the impediments have been studied extensively in the literature. Furthermore admission to the stock market is not worthwhile for most SMEs, either because they run a family business or because their capital is so concentrated that the number of transactions remains extremely low. The result shows that it is not easy to estimate the price of a share. Most studies, thus, confirm the survey conducted by Belletante and Desroches in the 90s (1993); they concluded that when entering the secondary market, SMEs are not looking to raise funds but rather to play with announcement and reputational effects that will permit them to get a better interest rate from the banks. Even so, that behaviour does not say anything about the way SMEs self finance equity capital.

The notion of proximity capital that expanded over the past twenty years opened the path, in France as in other countries, to providing a suitable financial instrument for innovative SMEs.

Proximity capital refers to funds that are invested in a company in the form of equity capital or quasi-equity capital; these derive from persons, companies or institutions that maintain – either directly or, more rarely, indirectly – sustained relationships with the receiving company or with persons inside that company. Those relationships do not relate solely to financial aspects.

Therefore, the salient point of this definition is the relationship between the company and the investors that provide the equity finance. Instead of mainly resting upon financial criteria such as EBITDA[6] or P/E Ratio[7], the relationships between partners become the central element of the financial commitment. Rivaud-Danset (1996) referred to these as financial relationships "à l'engagement" – implying a long-lasting commitment. In this case, proximity capital, even if it mimics the functioning of a stock exchange, mainly rests on the "personalisation" of the relationship. This feature strengthens the role of individuals in the SME. In those firms, there is a close relationship between the holding of shares on the one hand and decision-making power in the firm on the other. That confusion between ownership and control tends to exclude SMEs from ordinary financial markets. It makes it difficult to attract new investors, who are reluctant to take part in a project whose profitability is questionable without having any say in the strategy of the firm since the owner-manager is reluctant to share its power with anyone else.

How can proximity solve some of these problems? Assuming that any innovation or expansion project requires equity capital, the entrepreneur has to find funds from those around him – from members of the family, former work colleagues, various public economic promotion agencies, persons or firms whose participation the entrepreneur has succeeded in securing. Apart from their skills as a technician or a manager, the entrepreneur's personality and ability to mobilise their social relations are a determining factor. That type of relation frequently depends on geographic proximity, and policy actions should aim at creating proximity investment funds to provide SMEs with the equity they need to strengthen their position and to permit them to diversify the origin of financial resources received. However, while geographical proximity is presumed to play a key role, the social and institutional relations of a territory will also come into play (Dei Ottati, 1994).

SMEs should have at their disposal other instruments such as the French FIP[8] ("Fonds d'investissement de proximité") which leverages private financing through equity investment. Furthermore the so-called French FCPI[9] ("Fonds communs de placement dans l'innovation") aim at [6] EBITDA is the acronym for Earnings before Interest, Taxes, Depreciation, and Amortization. It purports to measure cash earnings without accrual accounting, cancelling tax jurisdiction effects, and cancelling the effects of different capital structures.

[7] The P/E Ratio is a measure of the price paid for a share relative to the annual net income or profit earned by the firm per share. It is a financial ratio used for valuation: a higher P/E ratio means that investors are paying more for each unit of net income, so the stock is more expensive compared to one with lower P/E ratio.

[8] Local investment funds (FIP in French) are the result of the law on economic initiative dated 1st August 2003 (articles 26 and 27), which deregulated the Private Equity business. It is a savings scheme open to the general public, approved by the Autorité des Marchés Financiers (the French financial markets regulator or ombudsman), which authorises investments in the equity of SMEs in up to three regions and for no more than 3 years. They are mainly aimed at private investors and the funds are invested in areas not currently targeted by private equity schemes. So they are essentially small schemes and do not have to have a technological focus (unlike the French FCPIs: Innovation investment funds)

[9] This finance vehicle gathers individuals willing to invest, in innovative, early stage and private companies (venture capital), at least 60% of the money collected. SMEs listed on French Financial Markets (Alternext and "Marché Libre") are considered to belong to the private company pool within a FCPI portfolio. Also, up to 20% of the investing 60% of the money collected in non-listed innovative SMEs employing less than 200 people. A tax rebate is proposed by the public administration to investors. These models of proximity capital financing should be available for Romanian SMEs in order to strengthen their innovation financing.

7. Entrepreneurship and SME policy

SMEs are prevailing in the Romanian economy and represent over 99 % of all enterprises. In recent years, the SME sector has consolidated its role in the economy in terms of the number of employees and the average turnover per enterprise although the crisis has left its marks. The recession has resulted in higher restrictive credit terms for SMEs and larger enterprises. Although the steady decline in private credit growth appears to have bottomed out, SMEs in particular suffer from insufficient access to bank financing as the latter appears to be crowded out by the financing needs of the public sector. The financing problems of SMEs are further compounded by excessive delays of VAT refunds and other payments to companies by state-owned enterprises and the government. All these have contributed to the number of SME bankruptcies, which increased in 2009 and 2010. Being aware of these problems and in order to reduce payment arrears, the government has recently adopted a number of measures in order to address these issues. In this respect, good progress has been made by reducing the payment arrears by two thirds since 2009 to present.

In the wake of the crisis, Romania had taken a small number of stimulus measures regarding business support and helps to weather the crisis. Some of the measures announced in early 2009 have been adopted very late (e.g. the temporary tax exemption for reinvested profits), thus considerably delaying the expected effects while some have not been adopted at all. Financial support to SMEs is primarily being provided via multi-annual national programmes and guarantee instruments. The National Credit Guarantee Fund for SMEs was capitalised and improved its guarantee activity, also as a result of the establishment of the Counter Guarantee Fund of Loans to SMEs in 2009. In addition, legislative measures were taken in 2009 to ensure the implementation of the JEREMIE initiative.

The JEREMIE initiative developed in cooperation with the European Commission, offers EU Member States, through their national or regional Managing Authorities, the opportunity to use part of their EU Structural Funds to finance small and medium-sized enterprises (SMEs) by means of equity, loans or guarantees, through a revolving Holding Fund acting as an umbrella fund. The JEREMIE Holding Fund can provide to selected financial intermediaries SME-focused financial instruments including guarantees, co-guarantees and counter-guarantees, equity guarantees, (micro) loans, export credit insurance, securitisation, venture capital, Business Angel Matching Funds and investments in Technology Transfer funds.

Starting with February 2011 the guarantee facility under this initiative has become operational while the risk facility should be operational in 2012. According to the European Investment Fund the main advantages of JEREMIE are:

Flexibility: Contributions from the Operational Programmes to the JEREMIE Holding Fund will be eligible for interim up-front payments by EU Structural Funds, giving Managing Authorities funds may be invested in listed companies (except Alternext and "Marché Libre"). FCPI funds could be invested everywhere in EU (27 countries) and their duration is usually of 8 years. Today, the maximum investment per FCPI fund is 2.5M€,¬ per year, therefore venture capital firm may use several FCPI funds under their management to make larger ticket. Most FCPI funds have been managed within venture capital firms.

---

more flexibility in allocating these resources. Structural Fund contributions to the Holding Funds must be invested in SMEs by 2015.

Benefits of a portfolio approach: The Holding Fund will be able to re-allocate the resources to one or more financial products in a flexible way, depending on the actual demand over time. The umbrella fund approach will allow a diversification of risks and expected returns due to financial products having different default rates, as well as active cash flow management to allow for a swift response to changing market requirements.

Recycling of funds: The Holding Fund is of a revolving nature, receiving repayments from the financial intermediaries for further investments in the SME sector. This makes SME support via EU Structural Funds sustainable, unlike the pure grant approach.

Leverage: A significant implied advantage of JEREMIE is its potential ability to engage the financial sector either at the Holding Fund level, with additional capital from financial institutions, or at the level of financial instruments, through co-financing, e.g. in both cases potentially in cooperation with the EIB.

Moreover, there are several actions, financed by the OP Increase of Economic Competitiveness, which provide support for new investments, for the internationalisation of SMEs, for the implementation of international standards, and for advisory services. In addition, support for investment projects of micro-enterprises as well as for developing the regional business infrastructure is provided through the OP Regional Operational Programme. Finally, the projects financed through the OP Administrative Capacity Development aiming at implementing a coherent plan for improving the business environment, implementing at national level the Small Business Act, and developing an operational one-stop-shop pilot model were completed.

Romania's efforts to help SMEs to survive the economic crisis were hindered by the need for fiscal consolidation, which left little room for manoeuvre to launch costly recovery measures. Mitigating further high financing costs, overcoming the scarcity of credit and reducing the lack of working capital are therefore the main challenge in the short term. Related to these, Romania needs to increase support to enterprises, particularly SMEs, in accessing EU funds, as well as to reduce effectively payment arrears. Moreover, facilitating the access of Romanian companies to markets could help to offset the decline in domestic demand. In this respect, using public procurement in a more proactive manner and further supporting the internationalisation of SMEs could be important steps.

8. Romanian policy mix towards increased private RDI investment

8.1. Main public funding instruments

The main RDI public funding instruments consist of a set of programmes that address a broad target of R&D performers both in the public and the private sector (national R&D institutes, public R&D organisations, academic research centres, business firms with R&D activities, etc. The main public funding instruments are:

2007-2013 National Plan for R&D and Innovation. Launched in 2007, this is the most important funding instrument of NASR, both policy- and budget-wise, and has the largest budget of all current national programmes (multi-annual budget of about €4,700m). It is organised in six programmes, similarly to the EU FP7: (1) Human Resources, (2) Capacities, (3) Ideas, (4) Partnerships in priority domains, (5) Innovation and (6) Sustaining the institutional performance (not active yet, to be launched in 2011). Participation in all these programmes is competition-based.

Two complementary funding instruments to the RDI National Plan were launched in 2003 and have been continued to present:

The Core R&D Programmes are initiated and developed by the national RDI institutes on an annual or multi-annual basis in accordance to the National RDI Strategy priorities. They provide institutional funding to support institutes' own medium-to long-term R&D strategies (in addition to the funding gained through competition-based programmes). The Core R&D Programmes are validated by the line ministries of the respective institutes, and are approved and financed by NASR. In 2009 NASR supported 46 core R&D programmes, with a total budget of approx. €83m , which was about 30% higher than in 2008, in view of helping them maintain the R&D personnel, especially the young researchers trained abroad. In 2010, NASR funded 47 Core R&D Programmes (NASR, 2010).

Some national R&D institutes proposed the Sectorial R&D Plans for the technological development of the respective sectors.

Structural Funds (SF) for RDI activities

Sectorial Operational Programme 'Increasing Economic Competitiveness' (SOP IEC) aims to increase the competitiveness of Romanian enterprises and reduce the productivity gaps between Romania and the EU, with the specific target that Romania should reach 55% of the European average productivity by 2015. SOP IEC is also the only SOP which mainly targets the private sector, and as such is much more demand-driven and dependent on its attractiveness to potential beneficiaries than other SOPs that are mainly or completely focused on the public sector. Relevant for RDI objectives are Priority Axes 1: An innovative and eco-efficient productive system and 2: Research, Technological Development and Innovation for competitiveness. SOP IEC's Management Authority is the Ministry of Economy, Trade and Business Environment, while the Priority Axis 2 is managed by NASR as Intermediate Body.

SOP Regional Development (ROP) is the main instrument for regional development policies. It is managed by the Ministry of Regional Development and Tourism (MRDT) and covers all development regions, without any particular regional focus. Relevant for innovation objectives is Priority Axis 4 'Strengthening regional and local business environment' which supports regional and local business support structures (e.g. industrial, business parks, business incubators etc.), especially in the less developed and declining areas, regional and local entrepreneurial initiatives in order to attract investors, job creation and sustainable economic growth, technology transfer to microenterprises, in line with the Regional Innovation Strategies. This Priority Axis aims to narrow the large disparities between regions in terms of entrepreneurial and industrial development that have widened in recent years.

SOP Human Resources Development (SOP-HRD) supports the development of human capital and the increase of competitiveness by linking education, lifelong learning and labour market and providing enhanced opportunities for future participation in the labour market. Relevant for RDI objectives are Priority Axis 1: Education and training in support for growth and development of knowledge-based society, which promotes doctoral and post-doctoral programmes in support of research, and Priority Axis 3: Increasing adaptability of workers and enterprises supports the development of entrepreneurial skills and training in new technologies). SOP-HRD is managed by the Ministry of Labour, Family and Social Protection.

8.2. The national policy mix towards stimulating private RDI

The policy mix aiming to stimulate private RDI (Research, Development and Innovation) investment comprises:

8.2.1. Programmes of the 2007-2013 National RDI Plan

Romanian BERD relative to the GDP over the last 5 years was relatively stable in the period 2005-2007, at approx. 0.22% of the GDP, but dropped to 0.17% in 2008 and further to 0.15% in 2009, as a consequence of the economic crisis (EUROSTAT). The same trend was observed in the evolution of the Romanian BERD relative to the EU27 average: from approximately 0.18% of the EU27 average in 2005-2007, to 14% in 2008 and further to 11.7% in 2009, increasing even more the existing gap to the EU27 (EUROSTAT).

The main programmes of the 2007-2013 National RDI Plan are: Capacities, Partnerships in priority RDI domains and Innovation with two main focus:

Partnerships in priority domains (1 354 projects funded in 2009 and 1 347 projects in 2010). Most coordinating units were R&D institutions of national interest, especially universities, followed by national R&D institutes, and to a smaller extent firms, NGOs and SMEs[10].

Innovation (285 projects in 2009, 263 in 2010, all coordinated by firms that contributed with approx 43.6% of the budget in 2009, especially SMEs in 2010). The programme is characterised by a very high share of high-tech projects (97%) (NASR 2009). Commercialisation of results was under the expected level, because of results freezing in the experimental development stage generated b the contraction of public funding by 26.1% to the value agreed upon at the contracting stage (NASR 2009, 2010).

8.2.2. National technological platforms

There were 39 national technological platforms in 2009 and 32 in 2010 in several industries: alternative energy sources, genomics and plant biotechnologies, water management and quality control, manufacturing technologies, nano-electronics, nano-medicine, innovative medicine, sustainable chemistry, maritime transport, aeronautics (NASR 2009, 2010). Romania is also involved in several European Technology Platforms.

8.2.3. Joint Technology Initiatives (JTI)

Romania currently participates in 32 active ERA-NETs, and has also been part of other 16 ERA-NET that are now finished (inactive). By domain, the participation was highest in: Environment (8 active, 3 inactive), Food, agriculture and fisheries (5 active, 1 inactive), ICT (5 active, 1 inactive), Nano-science and nanotechnologies (5 active), Energy (4 active), Transport (3 active, 2 inactive). The lowest participation was in: Health (2 active), Government and social relations (2 active), space (1 active), Services (1 active). ERA-NETS are currently under the coordination of the Executive Unit for Funding Higher Education, Scientific Research, Development and Innovation (UEFISCDI), which has taken over this coordination task from the National Centre for Programme Management.

Participation in initiatives undertaken under Art. 185 of the Treaty of Lisbon (EUROSTARS) - In the 2nd call of the EUROSTARS programme (launched in 2008, results announced in 2009) Romania had 13 eligible proposals, of which 1 was accepted for funding following the international evaluation. In the 3rd call (September 2009), Romania had 11 eligible proposals, of which 4 have been accepted for funding as coordinator (E!5112 RELIS, E!5119 EUGEN).

Participation in European public-private partnerships - Joint Technology Initiatives (JTI) and European Technology Platforms - In 2007-2008, Romania registered as member to four of the approved six Joint Technology Initiatives: ARTEMIS (integrated information systems), ENIAC (nanotechnologies), IMI (innovative medicines) and CLEAN SKY (aeronautics). Romania is a founding member of CLEAN SKY, in which it participates through a consortium of two research institutes and two plane manufacturers. Romania is also a founding member of IMI, through the

[10] Source: NASR National Authority for Science and Research 2009, 2010

Romanian Association of International Medicines Manufacturers. In November 2009 Romania became full member of ENIAC Joint Undertaking JU15.

8.2.4 Tax incentives for R&D

In general, tax incentives are poorly represented at present, as only a few remained active after the revision of the Fiscal Code in 2007 and the cancellation of many measures in 2009, as part of the austerity measures adopted by the government to limit the effects of the crisis. In this context, the adoption of new tax incentives, although promoted in most of the recent policy documents, has faced a lot of obstacles in 2009 and 2010. Specific measures for RDI in the Fiscal Code include: VAT exemption for RDI activities performed under the National RDI Plan or financed in international, regional and bilateral partnership. The tax regime for micro-enterprises that was in force in 2009 stipulated a reduced tax of 3% of the turnover, but the provision was modified in 2010 with the option to pay a 16% flat tax or a tax on profits, depending on the company turnover[11]. In 2011, the 3% tax for micro-enterprises was reintroduced, as it was considered to be more favourable to firms and less problematic for the tax collection system than the previous dual provision.

An income tax exemption for IT specialist programmers (software engineers, system designers, system engineers or analysts) has been in force in 2009-2010 (introduced in 2001 and also continued in 2011, due to its positive economic effects on economic growth and considerable improvement of the IT sector contribution to GDP)[12]. There are also tax incentives for the establishment and development of an industrial park, in terms of a more favourable regime of local taxes. In June 2010, a project law granting tax facilities to young entrepreneurs (up to 35-years old) setting up their first enterprise was approved by the Parliament[13]. Other deductible costs under the Fiscal Code are related to the management of information systems and quality management systems; marketing, market study, promotion of existing or new markets; participation in trade fairs and exhibitions; environmental protection and conservation. The Fiscal Code also introduced flexible options for the depreciation of some categories of expenditure[14]. In 2010, the Ministry of Finance approved NASR's initiative to support the private sector by increasing the deductibility of R&D expenditure[15] from 100% to 120% for units whose R&D activities account for at least 15% of their total yearly expenditure.

8.2.5. "Increasing economic competitiveness" through SOP and ROP

These Sectorial and Regional Operational Programmes (SOP and ROP) are referring mainly to SOP (Priority Axes 1 and 2), ROP (Priority Axis 4) and SOP-HRD) (Priority Axis 1 and Priority Axis 3).

---

[11] If the turnover is below €100,000 the company can pay a tax of 3% of the turnover in the next fiscal year. If the turnover exceeds €100,000 then the company must pay the tax on profit.

[12] Continuing this measure in 2011 was appreciated by some as the only effective anti-crisis initiative of the government, as "it brings a €450m annual contribution to the state budget, which represents the annual gross salary of 83,500 public sector employees or the annual pension of 235,000 pensioners" (http://www.ziare.com/articole/eliminare+scutire+impozit+programatori)

[13] The law stipulates that young entrepreneurs (up to 35 years old) can set up their first enterprise with a capital of min. 10 RON (€2.5) and benefit of salary and profit tax exemption for 3 years.

[14] Purchase of patents, copyrights, licenses, trademarks or trade; manufacturing and other similar development expenses (purchase of technological equipment, machinery, tools, computers and peripherals); non-taxable revenues of patent owners for 5 years from the first application.

[15] Law n°. 2086/4504/2010

The dynamics of operations implemented under these SOPs shows several key features of the public and private RDI institutions:

high interest of the scientific community in public research infrastructure and a lower interest in administrative and project management projects;

high interest of the scientific community for complex RDI projects involving foreign specialists, and relatively low interest of enterprises in RDI projects in partnerships with universities and research institutes. This low interest can be attributed to some extent to the effects of the economic downturn, which obliged many enterprises to adopt a survival rather than a collaboration strategy, but a more likely explanation is their limited internal R&D capacity, especially in large enterprises. The difficulty of providing co-financing (up to 75%, apart from non-eligible expenses) and some restrictions on eligible expenses also contributed to the low response rate from enterprises.

strong investment need of SMEs in order to carry on existing operations and survive on the market, reflected in the high level of investment financing they requested, exceeding by far the budget allocated, while consultancy financing remained well under the budget allocated.

poor innovative capacity of Romanian enterprises and difficulty to access Structural Funds for RDI without a means of facilitating access to capital to cover co-financing.

low level of public-private partnerships and lack of motivation of local public authorities participating in local and regional development projects in preparing and submitting project proposals. This, in turn, is determined by the state aid restrictions applicable to business support, the high co-financing share of the projects (up to 50% of eligible expenses), unclear ownership provisions in respect of land and building(s), and lack of clear regulations on public-private partnerships. The Law 178/2010 on public-private partnerships clarifies these aspects.

large number of cancellations of signed contracts (50 by end 2009). Some were caused by the failure to provide co-financing in the context of the economic crisis, while others were caused by irregularities.

As a conclusion, the success of the current policy mix in increasing private R&D investment is very modest taking into account the declining public RDI spending levels since 2007, and was further reduced by the financial limitations induced by the economic crisis. Several key initiatives to stimulate private RDI investment were expected to start in 2011 (e.g. the elaboration of a National Innovation Strategy and four foresight studies in nanotechnologies, services, green energy and cell therapy to assess Romania's potential to participate in EU and other international programmes in these fields).

9. Risks and opportunities for attaining the objectives of 2007-2013 National RDI Strategy

9.1. Framework for private investment in R&D - Venture capital and private equity

The Romanian venture capital market is at an early stage, because of the unfavourable tax regime for private equity investments and underdeveloped domestic fund structure for private equity and venture capital. The tax regime is one of the most burdensome in the world, with companies paying 113 taxes per year, accounting for nearly 45% of the firm profit and spending 222 hours per year on tax payments (World Bank, 2011). A recent study conducted by the European Private Equity and Venture Capital Association and KPMG ranked Romania 24th out of 27 countries surveyed in terms of tax regime for private equity investments (Vrinceanu, 2009), pointing out the great potential for private equity investments in Romania, especially in infrastructure development projects.

The survey shows that in spite of some slight improvements, the Romanian risk capital market continues to be affected by unfavourable regulations for pension funds, a difficult fiscal environment and the lack of references to private and risk capital in the legislation. The survey also pointed out that Romania does not provide any incentive or tax reduction to encourage private and risk capital investments and the fiscal system is rudimentary and ineffective, being used only for tax collection. Because of these weaknesses, the fiscal system contributes only 32% to the GDP and encourages tax evasion in some sectors, like agriculture and construction. Financial instruments are also poorly developed, contributing about 30% to the GDP, in contrast to some 120% in other European countries. Although the creation of risk capital funds for innovation was foreseen in several policy documents (e.g. the 2007-10 National Strategy on RDI, the 2007-10 National Reform Plan, etc.), such funds are in progress to be created and the JEREMIE Fund for Romania just became functional.

9.2. The effects of the financial crisis on the Romanian economy

Romania's economic performance declined significantly in 2009 compared to 2008 after having been hit hard by the global economic downturn that became more visible from the second half of 2008. Among the most important crisis effects were falling exports due to declining external demand, reduced access to credit as international financial markets froze, declining internal demand caused by rapid and massively dropping exchange rate, declining foreign capital inflows and high bank interests. Consequently, the GDP slowed down and the unemployment rate went up, especially for private firms in construction, road transport and chemical industries, extraction of crude oil and natural gas. Large firms have been hit, but even more dramatically so, the SMEs. SMEs bankruptcies doubled in the first half of 2009 compared to the same period of 2008, particularly in trade, construction and real estate, and start-ups followed a similar trend (Mediafax, 2009).

The rising unemployment rate created labour market imbalances, aggravated by labour shortages and large migratory outflows, skill obsolescence, low adult participation in education and training, lack of basic skills amongst young people, resulting primarily from weaknesses in the education system and inefficient active labour market policies. Both anti-crisis plans proposed by the government (in January[16] and May 2009[17]) have failed, the public deficit continued to grow and Romania applied for a €20b financial loan from IMF (including a share from the EU, the World Bank and the EBRD). The money is channelled over 2010-2011 and will be repaid by 2015, at a 3.5% annual interest rate (Interpress Service, 2009).

9.3. The weak R&D capacity in the business sector

The R&D capacity of Romanian domestic firms is weak, since most of the R&D potential is concentrated in the national R&D institutes, while private firms are only marginally involved in R&D and innovation. The innovative capacity is low, both in SMEs and in large firms (see the chapter 2. How many SMEs are innovative?). Only 21% of the innovative enterprises were successful innovators in 2004-06 (National Institute of Statistics, 2010a) and only 15% were both product and process innovators. SMEs accounted for the largest part of innovative companies (nearly [16] The first anti-crisis plan comprised a package of 74 measures (investments in roads, highways, rehabilitation of residential buildings, health and education infrastructure, agriculture, environment, tourism, etc.) but no explicit RDI measures, which reflects the low visibility and importance of these fields in the country. The plan was widely contested on various grounds, such as addressing the effects and not the causes of the crisis, providing state aid for unprofitable industry sectors, etc. and had significant implementation flaws, which considerably delayed the expected effects, while some measures have not been adopted at all.

[17] The second anti-crisis plan included state aid schemes for firms in strategic sectors (agriculture, constructions, infrastructure, tourism, environment and health), guarantees for the credits contracted by youth for the first home purchase, support to agricultural production and simplification of tax and tariffs.

90%). A 2008 study of the National Institute of Statistics shows that SMEs have a higher share of innovation expenditure on machinery, equipment and software, and a higher R&D expenditure compared to large firms (about 30% in SMEs, 15% in large firms). Moreover, SMEs place a higher focus than large firms on the development of own R&D capacity rather than on acquisition of external knowledge, while large firms spend more on acquisition of external knowledge.

According to Erawatch 2010 for Romania the low levels of business R&D, lower in large firms than in SMEs, are rooted in several structural and managerial deficiencies, including:

poor competitive environment; firms' reluctance or inability to take on financial and commercial risks arising from R&D; and absence of financial services and instruments to mitigate the risk.

The European Innovation Scoreboard (EIS) 2009 indicators also reflect this poor innovation performance. Romania is one of the growth leaders among the Catching-up countries, with an innovation performance well below the EU27 average (SII in 2009 = 0.294, in slight progression from 0.278 in 2008), but a rate of improvement that is one of the highest of all countries. Relative strengths, compared to the country's average performance, are in Innovators and Economic effects, and relative weaknesses are in Finance and support and Throughputs. Over the past 5 years, Finance and support and Throughputs have been the main drivers of the improvement in innovation performance, in particular as a result from strong growth in Public R&D expenditures (18.0%), Private credit (25.8%), Broadband access by firms (46.7%), Community trademarks (34.5%) and Community designs (37.3%). Performance in Firm investments, Linkages & entrepreneurship, Innovators and Economic effects has increased at a slower pace.

9.4. Industry structure and FDI[18] distribution

The capacity of industry revival based on innovation is low. The country does not have an innovation-based development strategy and innovation has a low-profile among government priorities, although it is formally recognised as a priority of the 2009-2012 Governing Programme. Nearly 90% of innovative enterprises were SMEs in 2004-06 (National Institute of Statistics, 2010a), but SMEs are also those that have been hit the hardest by the economic crisis and their innovation activities have been sharply reduced. Also, the largest concentration of innovative firms, mostly in traditional processing industry, rather than in emerging R&D intensive industries, points to a low capacity for innovation-based revival. Fuelled by the large privatisation programmes of the 1990s, FDI was encouraged by the low labour cost, proximity to the euro-zone, successful disinflation, high economic growth rate and increasing domestic market potential. The record FDI inflows that Romania benefited of over 2004-2008, thanks to macroeconomic stabilisation, strong GDP growth, large scale privatisations and the prospect of EU membership, have dropped by more than 50% in 2009 (National Bank of Romania, 2009). In addition, successive wage negotiations have driven up unit labour cost, affecting Romania's international competitiveness, especially in light industry, in favour of low-cost Asian countries. Faced with slowing FDI inflows and with an erosion of the low-cost advantage in certain sectors due to skill shortages, partly due to large outward migration, Romania needs to step up efforts to attract investment in higher value-added sectors, which are less dependent on low wages, by further improving the business climate, upgrading infrastructure and developing labour skills (Pauwels and Ionita, 2008).

[18] FDI: Foreign Direct Investment

9.5. National RDI strategy – what should be improved?

Given the reduction of public R&D and innovation spending in 2009 (50 % less than foreseen in the multiannual planning and 25 % less than in 2008) and with no significant changes thereafter, there are concerns about how to ensure adequate funding for ongoing research programmes and projects. In light of this, the Romanian government adopted in May 2010, in line with the conditionalities attached to the Memorandum of Understanding (MoU) of the EU financial assistance to Romania concluded in June 2009 in the framework of the EU-IMF adjustment programme, a plan setting out a number of measures with a view to improve the efficiency and effectiveness of R&D and innovation. These measures aim at facilitating the adjustment to more limited financial resources, ensuring the consistency of R&D and innovation policies and programmes, stimulating private sector activities, as well as establishing and implementing uniform procedures for monitoring and evaluation of R&D and innovation activities.

The challenge remains to increase the innovative potential of enterprises, particularly SMEs. Another major challenge is to improve technology transfer and the business support infrastructure (business incubators, technology transfer offices, science and technology parks and clusters) which is still underdeveloped and poorly functional, in spite of recent significant improvements. In this respect, there are bottlenecks in the absorption of foreign technology as well as challenges to reduce high innovation costs, particularly for SMEs, which could be addressed through appropriate assistance programmes, the availability of information regarding technology, and facilitating access to financing instruments.

Moreover, partnerships among industry, university and R&D institutions could be improved and public funding could be used more to leverage private sector investments, strengthen links between business and research institutes and better adjust research to market needs.

An overview of the key barriers to increasing private R&D investment and opportunities generated by the policy mix is presented in the Table 3, hereafter.

Table 3. Barriers and opportunities of the policy mix

Barriers to RDI investment	Opportunities generated by the policy mix
Low innovative capacity of industry, low innovation culture, predominance of technological renewal based on imported technologies, products and services rather than on domestic ones	Stimulate regional innovation capacity through regional innovation strategies correlated with the National RDI strategy and other strategies of the country (education, employment, IT and communication, health, energy, environment).
Weak science-industry linkages	Stimulate the third mission of universities through higher support for R&D in universities, strengthening of entrepreneurial education in universities, introducing measures to stimulate academic entrepreneurship and technology transfer from university to industry (e.g. creation of spin-off firms[19], mobility between university and industry)

[19] The support systems to facilitate knowledge transfer from universities to the economy are in an early stage. Consequently, spin-off creation based on recent research results, patents or licenses is a slow process, which has been further hindered by the lack of capital and difficult access to bank financing determined by the economic

Economic structure of industry mostly based on traditional manufacturing industries, with little capacity for new technologies with high knowledge and R&D content	Increase the funding for knowledge-intensive industries, improve business infrastructure, provision of entrepreneurship and innovation incentives
Virtual absence of venture capital for RDI, unfavourable tax regime, dysfunctionality in the market competition and public procurement system, high systemic corruption and weak public administration	Introduction of venture capital for RDI schemes, use of FDI for RDI activities. Using of JEREMIE support to leverage private financing

10. A structural framework: From individual support to a collective dynamic

Romania has no longer advantages of lower work cost attractiveness in order to rely on FDI for catching–up with the economic development of the other European countries. Financial crisis came to early after the accession of Romania to the EU and Romanian SMEs, which represents 99 % of all national enterprises, even with a consolidated role in the economy, are confronted with financing obstacles for their development.

Insufficient financing has negative effects on innovation and represents one of the most important factors that hamper Romanian innovation. Financial constraints have been identified as having mainly two natures: a financial gap and credit rationing.

The financial gap should be covered by the business angels and venture capital. In Romania, these structures should be reinforced. Furthermore, policy should aim at creating proximity investment funds (like French FCPI and FIP) to provide SMEs with the equity they need to strengthen their position and to permit them to diversify the origin of financial resources received.

The credit rationing is adjusted through public reinforcement of guarantees for the banks to finance the riskiest enterprises – and in particular the innovative firms. The existing National Credit Guarantee Fund for SMEs together with the Counter Guarantee fund of Loans to SMEs should be strengthen by the recent funds brought by the European Investment Fund through JEREMIE Holding Fund. This fund should bring flexibility regarding co-participation financing in EU financed grants, the benefits of a portfolio approach, the recycling of funds and the leverage of private financing.

In addition, a set of public funding instruments is aiming to finance RDI both in public and private sector. Given the reduction of public RDI spending from 2009, the main challenge remains to increase the innovative potential of SMEs. It can be done through adapting the pure grant approach for financing innovation and using of revolving funds which leverage private financing being managed on a portfolio basis, which should be efficiently with the support of JEREMIE. A set of risks and opportunities have been identified as to support future key initiatives to stimulate private RDI that should be soon taken.

---

crisis. SOP Increasing Economic Competitiveness, Priority Axis 2, Operation 2.3.1 – Support for innovative start-ups and spin-offs, which was launched in 2008 with a total budget of €18.5m, provides funding for the creation of spinoffs implementing recent results resulted from research projects, doctoral theses of researchers employed in public R&D institutes or academics from public universities. This operation also supports innovative start-ups (implementing research results or a patent or other IP right) which are micro-enterprises or small firms with maximum 20 employees and no older than 3 years.

SMEs are generally too small to undertake an innovative project by themselves and should be supported in collective projects to which universities, research centres, large firms and other actors commit as well. The shift from policies concentrated on individual actions to systemic policies involving interaction and synergies characterises the changes in Romania over the past years.

As far as SMEs are concerned, Romanian industrial policies are characterised by a major evolution: the importance of SMEs as a target for policies has grown over time. Originally addressed in measures concerning the productive system as a whole, SMEs are increasingly identified as the sole recipient of aid. Devoted to what is often improperly considered a homogeneous class, the measures implemented aim at strengthening SMEs' place in the national productive system, helping them to circumvent the impairment that leads to high insolvency rates and limited growth.

In this perspective, three intermediate goals for industrial policies that aim at promoting innovation, competitiveness, and macroeconomic growth are identified:

Small firms have to grow, so that they can reach a minimum efficient[20] scale that permits them to increase their probability of survival and, better for long-term expectations, to undertake bigger projects.

Production cost kept high by the low scale of production has to be artificially decreased.

Public policy must wider the access to new resources or new markets for innovative SMEs.

Over the past few years these goals have remained the same, giving rise to many lines of action undertaken by some institutions acting at a national or local level. Three main dimensions should be emphasised: the content of policy (employment, R&D, etc.), the administrative level, and the medium of action (subsidies or tax rebates). These three dimensions are reminders of the distinction between state grants to individual firms and domestic subsidies to collective operations implemented at industry level introduced in the typology proposed by the European Union. Whereas the former is decreasing, collective actions are expanding – mainly because they permit market failures to be solved without introducing any bias into the competition among economic actors.

Public measures that aim at strengthening SMEs belong to the second group. This is also the case for R&D and innovation, environmental industries, energy saving development of capabilities, and local development.

In order to present these policies in a systemic fashion, a framework used by Favereau and Quiers-Valette (1998) to illustrate the diversity of economic policies can be transposed to innovative SMEs.

A first level distinguishes the policies according to their goals. On one hand, they can aim at changing the behaviour of economic agents to improve their performance realising already known productive processes. On the other hand, these policies can promote the adoption of new behaviours to replace obsolete ones or to introduce a radical change in the routines of the firms. A second level differentiates the kinds of support: public procurement, grants conditioned by successful co-operative actions, etc. Four families of policies represented on Table 4 can thus be identified.

[20] Minimum efficient scale (MES) is a term used in industrial organisation theory to denote the smallest output that a plant (or firm) can produce such that its long-run average costs are minimised. This concept is useful in determining the likely structure of a market. For instance, if the minimum efficient scale is small relative to the overall size of the market (demand for the good), there will be a large number of firms. The firms in this market will likely behave in a perfectly competitive manner due to the large number of competitors.

Table 4. A general typology of SME policies

		Goals
		Change in the existing behaviour	Adoption of a new behaviour
Means	Incentives through changes in costs of production	TYPE 1 • Investment subsidies • Reduced labour cost • Access to the public procurement	TYPE 2 • Policies directed at lowering the cost of business support services • Subsidies for innovative firm creation • Innovation/R&D policies
	Incentives conditional to inclusion in a collective process	TYPE 3 • Collective or systemic projects • Cost sharing	TYPE 4 Grants for collective research conducted in competitive clusters

- Type 1 groups together policies involving price distortions, subsidies, tax burden decreases, that aim at creating jobs and promoting investment. Pushing down the prices of production factors aspire to lessen the drawbacks of small-scale production. Investment subsidies and rebates on payroll taxes (or social contributions) constitute the backbone of these sorts of policies. They were first introduced in France in the seventies and were usually applied to any SME employing unqualified workers. They have now been strengthened to promote the employment of highly qualified workers (researchers, engineers, etc) in small firms.

- Type 2 also aims at reducing costs of production, but their ultimate goal is completely different. Instead of providing better access to resources already used in the production process, these measures are targeted to change the recipient's behaviour. The so-called "business support grant" is given to any SME having recourse to external services, in order to improve its managerial know-how. Promotion of RDI is the scope of the Inno-voucher, for example, which has been launched in Romania in October 2011 with a budget of 2 millions euro, under the management of NASR. What is expected from these means is not better price competitiveness, but a higher level of efficiency thanks to an increase in productivity, better organisation and deeper involvement in structural change.

Transition from Types 1 and 2 to Types 3 and 4 rests upon the idea that improvement of the internal organisation of firms is not enough to ensure their competitiveness. Instead of helping them strengthen their internal capacities through individual and specific grants, policy makers consider that an additional element should also be taken into account: the fact that firms and other institutions work together.

- Type 3 groups together measures that promote collective projects shared by several economic actors but led by an external leader (venture capital, business angel, syndicates, associations etc…). Even these actions can result in a decrease of production costs for SMEs that belong to the group; the main goal is to initiate a common strategy shared by many SMEs. "Technology diffusion networks", "clubs of innovative firms" and "local innovative clusters" are some (of the many) examples of such policies.

- Type 4 is the most recent strand of policy initiated by the states in Europe. Competitiveness clusters resulting from the "local productive systems" implement a common economic development strategy that is consistent with the area's overall development strategy; create extensive partnerships among players for specific projects; and focus on technologies for markets with high growth potential. By building a network of players at the forefront of innovation, the ultimate goals of the new policy are the creation of new wealth and jobs in local areas. At an analytical level, these policies focus mainly and sometimes even only on the necessary adoption of co-operative behaviour by firms, research institutions, universities, etc. in order to promote innovation.

What distinguishes the 3rd and 4th types of policies lies in what is expected from the firms themselves. Instead of reacting to external incentives and being consumers of grants and subsidies, firms are supposed to be proactive in a co-operative process built in order to produce innovations that will foster the future competitiveness of the industry, the area and the domestic economy.

Tax exemptions at an individual level remain favourite tools because of their neutral effect on public expenses in the short term[21] there has been a definite structural change in the policy-making process over the past years. Instead of being oriented mainly towards the firm as an independent actor, new policies accord priority to collective processes in which a large number of firms and other institutions take part. This is especially clear in the case of the competitiveness cluster, for which the mix of different organisations is a key condition to obtain finance.

Therefore, instead of focusing on the innovative SMEs at an individual level, their role and their place in the financial system must be conceived in accordance with their involvement in networks and other clusters in order to be more effective than individual strategies when it comes to launching a domestic growth process.

References

- Bonnet, J., S. Cieply and M. Dejardin, "Contraintes de financement, institutions financières et créations d'entreprises: la recherche des disparités régionales" 40th Colloquium of French speaking Regional Science Association, Brussels, September 2004.
- Business Magazine: "Romania nu stie sa atraga investitiile de private equity si venture capital", 5 February 2009.
- Carré, D. and N. Levratto, "Politique industrielle et PME: Nouvelle politique et nouveaux outils?", Revue d'Economie Industrielle, n° 126 (2009), 9-30.
- Chioncel, M.: ERAWATCH Country Report 2009. Analysis of policy mixes to foster R&D investment and to contribute to the ERA. Romania, (2009).
- De Meza, D.E. and D.C. Webb, "Too Much Investment: A Problem of Asymmetric Information", Quarterly Journal of Economics, 102 (1987), 281-292.
- Dietsch, M. "Atouts et handicaps du crédit client face au crédit bancaire"(Pro and cons of trade credit compared to bank credit), Revue d'Economie Financière, n°46 (1998), 175-193.
- European Commission, "Member states competitiveness performance and policies 2011 Edition", 172-178.
- European Commission, "Eurostat: Science, Technology and Innovation in Europe", 2008 Edition, 103-137
- European Commission, "Eurostat: Science, Technology and Innovation in Europe", 2010 Edition, 121-178
- European Commission, "Eurostat: Science, Technology and Innovation in Europe", 2011 Edition, 79-95
- Favereau, O. and S. Quiers-Valette, "Tous les problèmes d'incitation sont des problèmes d'interdépendance des niveaux de decision?", Décisions économiques, Economica, Paris, (1998).
- Gomes, J., "Financing Investment", American Economic Review, Vol. 91, No. 5 (2001), 1263-1285.

[21] Specialists in public economics increasingly tend to consider that even if the influence of these tax cuts on the public budget is null, from the point of view of expenses they are in large part responsible for the deficit, since they result in a decrease in receipts. Further, it seems their positive effect on growth is far from being demonstrated. A recent report published by the French "Cour des Comptes" (Court of Accounts) illustrates that mistrust on the part of the public administration. The report follows the assessment of state and regional aids realised in 2006 and 2007.

- Government of Romania: National Research, Development and Innovation Strategy 2007-2013, (2006).
- Government of Romania: Sectoral Operational Programme "Increase of Economic Competitiveness", (2007)
- Government of Romania: National Strategic Report 2009 on the implementation of the Structural and Cohesion Funds, (2010)
- Hall, B.H., "The Financing of Research and Development", Oxford Review of Economic Policy, Vol. 18, No. 1 (2002), 35-51.
- Innova Europe: Management of public R&D institutions in Romania, Final Report, (2010).
- Levratto N., "Financing growth and innovation in France", High-Growth Enterprises: What Governments can do to make a difference?, OECD Studies on SMEs and Entrepreneurship, OECD Publishing, (2010), 179-202
- NASR: Government policies for R&D and innovation in Romania, 2009 Report
- NASR: Government policies for R&D and innovation in Romania, 2010 Report
- National Bank of Romania and National Institute of Statistics (2008): Foreign Direct Investment (FDI) in Romania as of 31 December 2008.
- National Institute of Statistics: Innovation in industry and services in the period 2004-2006, (2008).
- National Institute of Statistics: Tempo Online time series, (2011).
- National Institute of Statistics (2009a): Statistical Yearbook 2007.
- National Institute of Statistics (2010a): Statistical Yearbook of Romania 2008, Chapter 13: RDI.
- OECD Science Technology and Industry Scoreboard 2011, OECD Publishing (2011), 152-153
- Pauwels, S. and L. Ionita: FDI in Romania: from low-wage competition to higher value-added sectors, Economic analysis from the European Commission's Directorate-General for Economic and Financial Affairs ECFIN Country Focus, Volume 5 (2008), Issue 3
- Ranga, M.: ERAWATCH Country Report 2010, (2010), 21-39.
- Rivaud-Danset, D., "Les contrats de crédit dans une relation de long terme: De la main invisible à la poignée de main", Revue économique, Vol. 47 (1996), pp. 937-962
- Schroth, E. and D. Szalay, "Cash Breeds Success: The Role of Financing Constraints in Patent Races", Cahiers de Recherches Economiques du Département d'Econométrie et d'Economie politique (DEEP) 05.11, Université de Lausanne, Faculté des HEC, DEEP (2005).
- Sipos, G., "The Romanian innovation performance in the European context", Scientific Anals of the University Al. I. Cuza, Iasi, (2009), 502-512
- Stiglitz, J. and A. Weiss, "Credit Rationing in Markets with Imperfect Information", American Economic Review, Vol. 71, No. 3 (1981), 393-410.
- Vrinceanu, C.: 'KPMG: Romania lags far behind European states in terms of tax regime for private equity investments', Wall-Street, 6 February 2009.
- World Economic Forum, "The global competitiveness report 2010-2011", (2010), 284-285

MEDIATION - THE ONLY VIABLE SOLUTION TO RESOLVE THE CONFLICT IN ROSIA MONTANA

DRAGOŞ MARIAN RĂDULESCU[1]

ABSTRACT

In modern society, located in a continually growing population, one of the main problems is related to the exploitation of natural resources, a source of richness limited and usually non-renewable.

That is the exploitation of Rosia Montana, where an old gold mine continues to produce interest for what might be called "gold fever" in Romania.

But, unlike the ancient and medieval times, where such operations were encouraged as a development factor, today environmental protection and sustainable development theory says that such mining destroys the nature and the community are serious demage, even if part of the local community wants to work, further mining, considering it a way of life and a reliable source of income.

Thus we have two opposing positions camps: those who want to protect nature and those who want to exploit it, and in such a dilemma can not get out only with mediation

Mediation is the only one who can bring the same opponents at the negotiation table, in the presence of specialized environments, and fully impartial stranger to conflict, to find a common solution to resolve the conflict, thus brains "peace" sustainable, that can be subsequently implemented.

This study aims to review the advantages and the role that mediation can bring it into such a sensitive issue, as the Rosia Montana

Keywords: conflict, mediation, environment, natural resources, gold mine.*

1. Introduction.

Rosia Montana is one of the oldest cities in Romania, documented before the conquest of Dacia by the Romans, as wax tablets found in the mines at Rosia and museums spread across Europe, considered by experts as a birth certificate the Romanian people.

Moreover waxed sheet no. XVIII, dated February 6 131, is known for the first time the name of the village of Alburnus Maior, here are the places where Dacia is extracted gold, making Rosia Montana as one of the oldest settlements in traditional precious metals operation in Europe hypothesis confirmed by tests carried out at Bochum (Germany) on the mining of Orlea, Carpen and Gauri.

All Rosia Montana territory hundreds of households are made in time with great toil, a historic building architecture and the age and various administrative buildings, economic, social and cultural, a unique mining museum with pieces held, memorial houses, an archaeological reserve and many other wonderful geological and vigorous roots of our history, but here is also rich resources, estimated by experts at about 330 tons of gold (the largest gold deposit in Europe) and 1,600 tons of silver (whose removal would bring a net profit of 915 million dollars), but nothing excludes the emergence of a third stakes: copper, at Rosia Montana there are the greatest career in Romania for copper surface porphyria belonging to the state.

It notes the importance of the village and the area as a nature reserve, protected by law, the pace of life to carry on as before in agriculture, animal husbandry and ecological tourism, and value precious metal deposits that are in these places and can their operation, although the environmental consequences arising from this.

This will be analyzed in a totally objective, the importance of precious metals deposit and benefits and damages caused by such exploitation in the community, in order to see how it is possible to resolve between two different lifestyles through mediation, the only way, in our opinion, which can lead to finding a viable solution for the entire community.

[1] Senior Lecturer Ph. D., „Dimitrie Cantemir" Christian University, (email: dmradulescu@yahoo.com).

2. Precious metal deposit at Rosia Montana - costs and benefits.

The costs of precious metals deposits exploitation, designed for a 16-year operational period, in Rosia Montana amounts to a total investment of $ 615 million (reported, it is true to a profit of $ 915 million), which would bring direct benefits to the state $ 583 million (taxes, fees, dividends, royalties and profit, given that the state owns 20% of RMGC (Rosia Montana Gold Corporation - the company that wants to do this operation, 80% owned by Canadian company Gabriel Resources and 20% of Romanian State by Minvest Deva).

Among the investment involved in such exploitation are displaced population (approximately 970 households in Rosia Montana and Corna, over 2000 people, who have already spent $ 20 million to acquire 43% of them), demolition of buildings (including historical monuments), 8 churches (2 of them will be rebuilt in other locations) and moving some cemeteries.

It is also about building a pool and accumulation of waste (tailings pond with a storage capacity of 250 million tons of tailings, with a body of water spread over an area of less than 80 ha, 1200 ha of the total how is the actual operation) behind a dam 185 feet high waste rock which closes the valley of Corna, resulting in surface modification of biotopes of the site and land use categories in which the worst areas will be reduced irreversibly pastures and meadows from 60% currently to 22% and forests, from 18% to 5.6%, while increasing productive land area 13 times from 5% currently to 65%.

But it's not just about money in this operation, but also the implications it has on the local community and the environment, because the operation (which takes place in a populated area) involves the destruction of the Rosia Montana community, while the displacement and relocation of the population, leading to a loss of important social cohesion by destroying the local community, which has so far affected by depopulation Apuseni mountains, a sparsely populated area.

May occur and the implications for biodiversity, because mining at Rosia Montana in four open pits Cetatea, Carnic, Orlea and Jig, as presented, will lead to changes in forest composition by changing the age and species types forest (while the Rosia Montana area includes important habitats and species of fauna and flora that are protected under national and international legislation on the conservation of natural habitats and wild flora and fauna) and can lead to destruction of wetlands, which can be the effect of altering migration routes.

There are also issues that the operation of the surface will produce a serious disfigurement of the landscape and the proposed dam was built, it provides security in extreme situations, as demonstrated by the experience of several countries where serious accidents occurred in various mines. The presence of such a storage tank and dam in the immediate vicinity of Abrud is a big risk and there is no guarantee that an accident can not occur.

Another cause that must not forget is the fact that most environmental problems associated with mining is the generation of ARD, which can be active for decades, perhaps centuries, and will be stored in sterile whose dam, built after a model "upstream" offers no guarantee that will be resistant to earthquakes, and the conditions under which sustainable development has no chance without the existence of a quality environment[2].

Besides the feasibility study does not present risks of a landslide or earthquake, or standards that will meet the dam to prevent such risks, and sodium cyanide in the process and waste storage pond containing cyanide residue, produced by "neutralizing" (very toxic) and heavy metals are serious environmental problems under national legislation and EU.

[2] Daniela Marinescu, Environmental law treaty (Bucuresti: ALLBeck,2003), 37.

Be taken into account that the concentration of gold will be very close to the limit of profitability, so that the feasibility of operation will be highly sensitive to volatile price of gold and increasing investment costs, especially amid the privatization of many sectors in Romania is that of water, electricity or fuel, with possible disruption of Rosia Montana Gold Corporation work on mining before the deadline and without meeting its obligations, working with disastrous effects in an area that needs long-term economic solutions based on renewable resources, especialy is the oldest documented mining settlement in Romania, which houses important archaeological remains, including Roman temples, fortified buildings, galleries and mining.

On the other hand a good part of the population expected to start mining work could have a stable job, in condition that Rosia Montana Gold Corporation promise to provide a number of jobs and continue the tradition of work in existing mining families of all generations, especially since the company Rosia Montana Gold Corporation has been extremely convincing with locals who have offered free mobile phones, especially the elderly in remote areas, "Goldu", as locals say to the Canadian company, becoming a kind of Republic of Montana Gold Corporation, which acts as a paternalistic state: buying property in the area, is the largest employer, largest consumer of resources and the largest investor.

More investment is seen as an opening to the outside of a closed community such as the Apuseni Mountains, which would attract new investment in infrastructure, construction, tourism and services, the possibility of building roads to link the of the other cities, facilitating an easier life for the local community, especially the Rosia Montana Gold Corporation plans talk of restoring the area after the operation.

3. Legal situation of Rosia Montana exploitation

Following the processes started by non-governmental environmental agreements for drilling had been suspended for 39 judicial drilling points, by irrevocable sentence, making it impossible for the moment, continuing the company's activities, even if it is a small part of 1,000 points of the drilling.

The situation of the urbanism certificate is not clear because the Ministry of Environment announced the impossibility of continuing the procedure of environmental impact assessment for the Rosia Montana project, after initially suspending the certificate by the court, and dismiss the appeal the company's suspension of the certificate, obtained by being required to issue any necessary authorizations RMGC activities

Problems are also archaeological discharge certificates, essential in an area with many historical relics from Roman times and without which it can issue construction permits for proposed surface mining, while the NGOs, who oppose project go to the courts for any new certificate obtained by RMGC.

But key to the whole equation is the Ministry of Environment and Forests has rejected environmental agreement at the end of the procedure involved analyzing the quality of the report on environmental impact assessment (EIA) done by RMGC, while the analysis includes public consultation (in Romania and abroad), the examination report by the numerous technical committees and obtaining the consent of several ministries and government agencies on specific issues (agriculture, health, transport, tourism or culture).

Especially as the officials are quite confused about this project, there are contradictory statements ranging from critical project as stated Codrut Seres, Minister of Economy and Commerce in the Journal of November 4, 2005: "I do not think there is something more than post-communist views a mono-industrial town ravaged by the "new capitalist system." (...) The mines at Rosia Montana is as" up to acceptance.

Problems are, also, outside Romania, Hungary, which fears the risk of pollution of the Tisza River Basin, categorically opposing project and threatening European Court of Justice for its realization.

4. Local perception and the role of mediation in conflict resolution.

Civil society is divided, various NGOs and public institutions, including the Romanian Academy, intervening on both sides of the fence, including the vicious fight at slogans: the "Let's Save Rosia Montana", the new RMGC slogan from investors, at the opponents of the "Alburnus Maior" whose call is "Save Rosia Montana".

and most importantly and directly affected by the mining population is divided between those who want to work on the mines, hoping for a better life, even if they are aware that the environment that affected seriously and those who do not wish operation, wanting a traditional lifestyle based on domestic livestock, agriculture and why not, ecotourism.

Because the camps are about equal a clear solution seems to appear out of nowhere, so clearly needed, yet not a debate because debates have been enough but a mediation.

Mediation is a process in which a neutral person conflict, impartial mediator brings the parties has been designated to the negotiating table to determine their own to find a solution[3] under his supervision.

It s also a major difference and face trial on Rosia Montana, where a foreign judge would give a solution at all, without being himself part of the community. In mediation community to find solutions that would be most convenient for the community, possibly with the assistance of recognized experts, such as those of the Romanian Academy.

Variants exist because man is a superior being who lives in the community so the community knows she must protect not only him as being single, keeping the memory of past generations, but also providing future generations[4].

Under these conditions a mediation involving these factors, local community, local authorities and specialists recognized by the Romanian Academy, with Rosia Montana Gold Corporation has great chance of success, being able to weigh the benefits of mining - jobs, leaving them with financial stability, primarily for residents, invest in infrastructure: roads, hospitals, shops, the possibility of better communication with other communities and out of isolation, leading consequently to an increase in local community / birth with the disadvantages of this operation, namely: environmental destruction and the traditional life style, lack of guarantees that this project will be carried out and will be made all the works to redevelop the area, as if after starting operation RMGC bankrupt or refused operation will lag behind them a real ecological disaster, destruction of existing settlements and historical sites important to the history of Romania, the local community in the coming change component of many people working in foreign service for a longer or shorter period of time, concerns about way of life after operation will be closed, that the sources of income of local communities, given that various substances used in mining, damage soil, and thus agriculture and livestock, and destruction of historical sites, corroborated by traces of exploitation mining can scare potential tourists in the area.

More than a successful mediation in this matter would be of benefit for all local communities in Romania, because it would provide a way to solve their local problems, which can be translated and a responsibility of the parties involved in this problem is the mine from Rosia Montana, to be the initiators of a new era of dialogue and consensus in solving local problems.

---

[3] Adina Oprea and Dragos Marian Radulescu, "Mediation (yet) start-ups," Dezbateri Social-Economice 1 (2012): 4.

[4] Federico Mayor, Memory of the future (Bucuresti: Romanian Cultural Fundation,1995), 140.

Do not forget that just because the purpose of mediation is to help the parties find a favorable solution for everyone involved, so that no the court of law can achieve.

5. Conclusions

This study examined the tense situation at Rosia Montana where existing reserves of gold and silver have attracted the interest of foreign companies that want their operation, even there are the risk to destroy existing settlements, some important historical artifacts and the environment

To compensate the damage the company promises to create jobs in a poor area, investment in infrastructure, relocation and rebuilding villages destroyed area after operations cease.

But part of the community with environmental NGOs, do not want such changes and to try to preserve current life style and to save resources for future generations in mining for a sustainable development.

Court sentences obtained so far, debate and studies have made no evident majority camp and no viable solution so the single way to solve this problem remains appealing to mediation as only bringing two sides together with local authorities, representatives of Rosia Montana Gold Corporation and in the presence of specialists of the Romanian Academy can find a viable solution for everyone, making it a local problem-solving model for all communities in Romania.

More than that and studies by scientists should consider calling the opportunity to mediation as the only viable option the parties themselves negotiate their own interests and find solutions that can be applied and respected by the entire community especially.

References

- Daniela Marinescu, Environmental law treaty. Bucuresti: ALLBeck, 2003.
- Adina Oprea and Dragos Marian Radulescu, "Mediation (yet) start-ups," Dezbateri Social-Economice 1 (2012): 4-7.
- Federico Mayor*, Memory of the future.* Bucuresti: Romanian Cultural Fundation, 1995.

THE CULTURE OF COMMUNICATION IN THE KNOWLEDGE SOCIETY
Gender differences in the listening process

ELENA NEDELCU*

Abstract
We can't speak about a "knowledge society" in the absence of a culture of communication, more precisely in the absence of a culture of non violet communication.
This type of culture produces the context for the affirmation and accomplishment of the human being, and it also intensifies the processes which imply creation and innovation in all the areas related to the social aspect.
In a world lead by man, non violent communication requires the valorization of the empathetic listening, of cooperation, in general and particularly in gender relation.
The paper intends to show that active listening represents an ability which must be learnt by all the people, but mostly by men who score greater deficiencies than women regarding this issue.

Keywords: communication, listening, communication style, culture of communication, gender differences.

Introduction

People can't help communicating. Non-communication is a form of communication. Although they communicate 11 hours a day (L. Sfez), most people is not satisfied by the communication quality. Their dissatisfaction is related to the violent or superficial or insufficient character of the interpersonal communication, to the sentiment that, too often, they are not listened and understood.

Or, in the development of the satisfactory human relations, one of the most important factors is the communication ability, the ability to demonstrate the kindness and the comprehension in communication. People complain the absence of such things, the insufficient[1] manifestation of the empathy and kindness in communication. Women complain more then man. Why? The paper bellow tries to find some answers starting from the analyze of the gender differences in communication, especially in listening

Listening is a very strong requirement both in interpersonal and organizational communication (J. Salome, 2002, p.102). Nevertheless, people are inclined to talk rather that to listen. We like to hear oneself rather than hear other people. And that is because each of us considers that his problems are the most important, simply because these problems belong to him. A famous history of an American producer, otherwise a seductive man but unable to listen. After he is talking to his girlfriend for an hour about his recent professional achievements, he stops embarrassed and tells her: Don't you want to say something? I have spoken so far only me. Would you like to tell me what do you think of my works?

How important and how difficult is to listen?

Listening is a very strong requirement both in interpersonal communication (J. Salome, 2002, p.102) and organizational communication.

[1] Senior Lecturer, Faculty of Public Administration, "Nicolae Titulescu" University, Bucharest (email: doina.nedelcu@yahoo.com)

Although they spend most time listening, people does not pay enough attention to the listening skills. Studies show that the percentage time devote to the 4 communication skills favorites the listening, respectively: (53%). At considerable distance is listening (17%), speaking (16%), and the writing (14%). In conclusion, although we spend the most time listening, we allot the least time to the appropriation of this skill.[2]

Employees from the large companies spend about 60% of their time listening, while their senior staff only 57%.

In these conditions we may say that, in business, listening could be seen in euro, dollars, Romanian lei. Listening errors can result in a bankrupt of a company. Sperry corporation declared that if 100 millions commit an error of listening of 10$, the total cost would be $ 1 billion.

Researchers discovered that there is a direct connection between the listening skill and workloads. Employees that participated to trainings regarding the development of listening skills – even before the initiation in computers techniques –have been more productive than those who did not received training in listening.

In a survey of the most 500 successful US companies, 59% of respondents said that they have paid for listening courses for their employees.

When the researchers surveyed 450 graduates of the economy sector about the communication skills they need to work, they said that listening is the most important quality for the professional success. When they were asked what kind of skills they wanted to have achieved in high school they answered "listening".[3]

Active, comprehensive listening is necessary in any field, not only in business. The need to practice it is felt at least as much in school as in family. Psychological studies show that, in a relationship, if the two would frequently practice emphatic listening, the level of the marital satisfaction would increase and the divorce rate would drop significantly. A good communication represents the key to a harmonious couple relationship.

2. Content

Obstacles in the listening process socio-cultural and psychological factors

Listening, like any other skill, must be learned and practiced. There are cultures, societies that realize and sustain that need more than others. There are some subcultures, mentalities that ignore that need, as for example the institutions, the companies specified for the primitive capitalism. These institutions were guided exclusively by the express requirement to increase profits, to face competition not always fair. Usually they ignore the human being need to be listened, understood and heard. In their search for profit, they sacrifice satisfying the human need, ignoring the boomerang effect of this sacrifice.

In developing country, small companies, with limited financial resources, even if they have a flexible, even if they have modern organizational culture, even if they are managed by resonant managers, they do not afford to sped money to improve employees communication and listening problems. On a simple Google search demand on the offer and demand of courses/ trainings in communication in Romania, we observe the existence if a gap in favor of the offer. A lot of consultancy/ training companies appeared. These companies offers services regarding the development of the communication skills, the interpersonal and organizational efficiency etc. Requests from private companies are however modest, especially for small companies.

[2] Sperry Corporation, Your Personal Listening Profile(Sperry Falls Church, VA:1980), p.4

[3] DiSalvo, Vicent, David C. Larsen, William J. Seiler, ''Communication Skills Needed by People in Business, Communication Monographs 25 (1976):274

In addition, there are common mentalities especially in post communist societies, where the listening is confounded with obedience. I think there is also a terminological confusion. For example, in Romanian "listener" means also obedient. There are confusions which could contribute to reduce individual aspiration to learn listening.

Besides socio-cultural factors, there are many psychological factors that creates obstacles to listening. In the famous work „Communicating effectively'', Saundra Hybels, Richard L. Weaver II, Mc. Graw Hill emphasis the fact that listening is non an easy thing and that there are many psychological causes that generates loss of attention, such as: cognitive dissonance, anxiety, dominate listener attitude and passive listener attitude.

According to the cognitive dissonance, a person feels a conflict, a contradiction, a discomfort if she/he has two or more information/opposite attitudes toward the same person or the same thing. For example, the students may think about Professor X is an erudite person as well as they believe that the sexual harassments allegations against him are probably true. Students who hold this convictions simultaneously (the teacher is good but the sexual harassment) suffer of cognitive discordance.

To draw out from the conflict, a solution would be for students to ignore, to reject the information that causes (the accusation of sexual harassment, in our case). It is a reaction that we have especially when accepting all information that we could put in conflict with people important to us. On the other hand, listening carefully this information is necessary if we want to sustain and respect others' ideas.

Anxiety is another psychological factor that jams the listening process.

You pass an important exam. You gave a bad answer to a simple mathematic problem. You are looking for the error but you don't find it. You become more and more nervous, anxious. You don't even hear when the teacher gives you a clue regarding your error. You lost totally your self confidence and your anxiety level is so high that you are not capable to listen any more. The anxious person feels a permanent anxiety, an intense and unjustified fear facing a real danger that affects his capacity to listen.

Researchers in the field shown that if teachers tell students that they will receive difficult tests, the students will be inclined to anxiety, and this will affect they listening capacity.[4]

The dominant listener attitude is another disturbing factor in listening.

A lot of people don't want to listen at all; they prefer to talk all the time. These kinds of people can not dialogize. They engage in endless monologues, ignoring nonverbal and disapprobative cues from the speakers (inexpressive look, absent look, discreet verification of the time etc) for dominate listeners the only problems, experiences that deserve to be discussed are their problems and experiences.

[4] Ayres,Joe,A. Kathleen Wilcox, and Debbie M. Ayres, receiver Apprehension: AQn Explanatory Model and Accompanying Research,", Communication Education, 44(1995):223-35

Listening is affected also by the passive, disinterested attitude of some speakers. The lack of interest for a certain subject determines the student to not listen the teacher pleading even if it is a good, documented theory. Listening effort is even higher as the subject seems less interesting, exciting.

Sometimes, people think that listening doesn't implicate efforts. Depending on what you listen, you need a variety of listening skills. Listening involves effort and skill as well in speech as in writing.

Gender style in communication ; listening style

We don't need special studies to discover that women and men listen differently, have different listening styles. Phrases like:„ He doesn't hear me when I talk to him" , "My boyfriend/ my husband doesn't know to engage in a dialogue, he doesn't listen to me" are met much more frequently to women than men.

Usual gender differences in communication are often due to conflicts between men and women. It seems that sometimes there are two distinct communication styles: the masculine style and the feminine style. A better understanding of the differences between these styles may reduce the divergences between men and women.

Jane Tear (cited Meier, 1991) summarizes what most experts consider to be the usual differences between the masculine communication style and the feminine communication style.

The men often use the conversation in a competitive mode, probably in view to settle the dominant position in a relationship, while women tend to use conversation in an associative mode, hoping to establish a friendship relation. Women tend to use good listening behaviors (such as eye contact, shaking their heads in sign of approval, focusing on the speaker and asking relevant questions), while men seem to focus less on listening and more on response. Men tend also to speak a lot but are less disposed to reveal personal information about them. Women tend to communicate as a modality to contact people and ideas.[5]

Deborah Tannen's work completes the synthesis of Tear communication styles. In his work, „You don't understand : Women and men in conversation ", Tannen (1990) relates the conversation of a couple which were driving with their personal car. The woman asked: „Would you like to stop the car and drink something?"; her husband answered sincerely: „No" and he didn't stop. Later, he felt frustrated hearing that his wife is upset because she wanted to stop the car and to drink something. He was asking: „Why didn't she said what she wanted? Why she has played with me?"

The woman was not so much upset about the fact that he didn't do what she wanted, but that her husband didn't take care about her desire. From her point of view, she was always interested of her husband desires while he didn't respect her preferences.

Tannen considers that, in this case, husband and wife used different but valid communication ways and both have to learn how to decipher the communication approaches of each of: the man has to realize when his wife is asking what he would like- in fact she is not ask something (information) but she starts a negotiation about they -both of them - would like; the woman has to realize that, when the man answers "yes" or "no" is his decision and not the intention to negotiate something. (1990, p. 22)

[5] Marriage and the Family , Diversity and Strenghts -David H. Olson--John DeFrain-

The study regarding the cultural listening styles emphasis that women are better listener than men. Deborah Tannen, the famous researcher in the linguistic field affirms that, in communication, the woman and the man belong to different cultures. While women are interested in relationships and networks/commitments, men are more interested in the competitive communication.[6]

This theory explains why husbands, often, manifest disinterest in listening to stories related by the wife regarding the new wardrobe of her colleague or the small office disputes. There are issues that are bothering women, but that don't concern usually males. In the same time, the wife gives less attention when her husband talks about the car reparation or about the score of a football match.

The studies realized by Deborah Tannen emphasis that, in communication, the boys cultures is based on the statute and on maintaining the statute; boys will search to remain in focus making a spectacle of oneself and telling jokes and blood and thunder/ "sensational " stories.

Tannen discovered also that, in a conversation between a woman and a man, women are inclined to play the listener role. The author sustain that the study of the old literature confirms that role for women as a very old role, coming from ancient times. Few things changes until contemporary days regarding this role. For example, in XV century, Shakespeare, in "Iulius Caesar", Portia asks Brutus to talk to her and to not have secrets from her. The same think happened to the hero from "Beowulf", the legend of the XVIII century and the examples may continue.[7]

Generally, men socialize being competitive; they live in a hierarchical word in which every unanticipated meet with another person is seen as a challenge to their status. When the fight is over, the man is making a self-evaluation setting a success or a failure. Conversations between men are almost symbolic fights in which the competitors try to obtain a superior result, to protect him from threatening movements and to do not permit to be rejected. So, men are uncomfortable talking about their feelings as opposed to women because feelings can be interpreted as signs of weakness.[8]

Women tend to be close to people not as competitors, as individualist persons or independent person but as persons interconnected with each other. Women tend to socialize; men tend to compete. Tannen sustain that for women conversations represents „negotiations for approach in which people try to search and to offer approval and support and to reach a consensus" (Tannen, 1990, p. 25). Women tend to search a community and to try to keep their intimacy and to avoid isolation. Even if women are interested to obtain such a status and to avoid failure, these are not the most important aim in their life.

Even if, it seems that all of us need to have both a sense of independence and a sense of intimacy with other people, men incline to independence and women to intimacy. The greater is the difference in communication style between a man and a woman, the greater is the potential for misunderstanding. A woman, needing approach, will naturally want to tell her husband where she goes, with whom and when she will be back home. A men, needing independence and control, would understand with difficulty why is so important to give her this information.

Similarly, a woman is more preoccupied to build a strong relation; she will tell her husband about every purchase that she wants to do – even on those which are relatively inexpensive. Her husband might not agree with asking her permission for every purchase, seeing in the diminution of the budget control the loss of the life control (Tannen, 1990, p. 26).

---

[6] O'Brien, Patricia, ''Why Men don't Listen…and What It Costs Women at Work '', Working Women 18(2), February, 1993, 56(5), online: Infotrac, Expanded Academic ASAP

[7] Deborah Tannen ''Listening to Men, Then and Now", New York Times Magazine, May 6, 1999, pp.56ff

[8] Olson, H., David, DeFrain, John, Marriage and the Family, Diversity and Strenghts,p.71

Gender differences in conversational style may lead to misunderstandings if people are not aware of them. Women tend to see the conversation as an occasion to establish a relationship with another person; men tend to see the conversation as an arena where they establish the domination. Communication in an intimate relationship involves a continuous balancing of the needs for intimacy and independence. Tannen emphasis that intimacy suggest that „we are close and identical" and independence suggest that „ we are distinct and different". Independence may also represent the base of a hierarchy in a relationship. – that is: „If I am independent of you and you are dependent of me, I am higher than you on the hierarchical scale. I am in power". Perhaps that's why men who socialize following power and control, tend to put more emphasis on independence than women. Independence is best for the world in which men were prepared to live. (Tannen, 1990, p. 28).

Tannen explain the naggy nature of the woman arguing that it comes from a different approach of the. Women are inclined to do what people ask from them. While men are inclined to reject if someone, especially a woman, is asking something from him. Women tend to repeat their requirements, becoming nuggy, because they supposed that men think how they think. "Of course he would do what I am asking from him even if would understand what I am asking".[9]

Nobody is guilty about these differences in the attitude and the reactions of listening and communication. They are simply a reflection of the roles in masculine and feminine gender in the conversation styles. Tannen is careful to emphasis that women also love freedom and independence but they tend to emphasis more the interdependence and the approach. Similarly, men enjoy the approach but consider the independence more important.

Women are often perceived in family as „gabbers", unlike men who can act as „strong and silent". This phenomena, has also the origin in the differences between the masculine and feminine gender roles. Women wishing to affiliate are doing this through communication. Men, being competitive, tend to be aware of what they are saying. Women, by contrast tend to seek social situations centered on conversation as for example taking lunch together. A good conversation heart to heart build intimacy and worm feelings. (Many homosexuals prefer conversational style that is based on the intimacy development)

In group of men, men tend to be the gabbers but a lot of this conversation between them is guided to the performance, to the attempt to establish the domination. When the subject is politics, sport or other debates which could be discussed vigorously, men lead the conversation. This communication style oriented to performance is not about privacy but to clarify who has the power.

Men, also, tend to focus on the problems solution, while women focus on sharing their feelings regarding the problems. Because of these differences of concentration, men often think that women talk only about problems and women feel frustrated and misunderstood.

Masculine and feminine gender roles start to influence boys and girls from early age. Generally, boys are playing in open air, most of the times in big groups, hierarchically structured. Girls tend to play more in small groups or pairing, and their life resumed to a relationship, as for example: „the best friends". For girls, intimacy represents an essential factor in a relationship. (Tannen, 1990, p.43). During adolescence, men and women fight to integrate among others. Although they are attracted to each other, they have problems to understand each other. These problems continue during dating and in marriage. It is logically to argue that gender role differences contribute to the unhappiness experimented by many people during their marriage.

[9] Olson, H., David, DeFrain, John, Marriage and the Family, Diversity and Strenghts, p.72

When women start to be implied in the executive/ administrative or professional field, their problem is to catch/ achieve men attention. When Sandra Day O'Connor, the first woman judge, was asked what problem she had in her career, she answered that the biggest problem was to make others listen to her. Finally she found a technique to determine people listen to her:' I have trained myself to speak slowly – pronouncing rarely each word –when I wanted to obtain from somebody complete attention. (O'Brien, Ibid.)

The strategy she has chosen is an effective strategy. Usually, people are doing exactly the opposite: when they see that they are loosing somebody attention they tend to talk faster and faster.

Another mistake that women often do in business administration – said O'Brien- is to smile and to wait their turn to speak. Thus, they are risking waiting for their turn not to come. They should change their attitude and to touch the men technique chipping in a discussion when they have something to say. Men are not accustomed to wait for their turn. Patricia O'Brien advises women who want to be heard at work, to stay in the center of the conference table, there where they can not be ignored, to speak determined, to avoid uncertainties such as : "Maybe I am right…but…',,I think so, but I am not sure,,. They need to have a convinced attitude in a dialogue, to be on subject and to avoid details.

Studies that have focused on the gender differences regarding the communication styles and especially Tannen studies gave rise to many controversies. According to Elizabeth Aries (Tannen & Aries, 1997), the main counterargument for her researchers is that she unnecessarily polarizes the differences between men and women, diminishing the importance of the fact that men and women communication styles largely overlap. This is an argument similar to that which Sandra Bem gives to the gender roles: The differences between individual women and individual men are bigger than the differences between women as group and men as group. In fact, even if men and women as groups may differ, there are many persons in each group that defy the stereotypes. The key is to recognize that the communication styles seem to differ on average, but the averages do not tell the whole story, they are not an exhaustive reflection of reality.[10]

Conclusions

Studying the gender differences in communication and in listening, we conclude that they are not insurmountable obstacles in communication, in the development of healthy and constructive relationships between speakers of the opposite sex. We need more mutual tolerance, more mutual investment in understanding the styles communication specific to the gender.

Both sexes need to develop their availability to accept and to understand these differences concerning the communication style. Such behavior is enriching, beneficial for some and for others. As Tannen observed (1990, 1993) we could learn from each other. Women could learn to accept some conflicts and differences without consider them as a threat of their intimacy; men could learn from women that interdependence does not represent a threat of their personal liberty.

Finally, we can not say that the masculine communication style is better the feminine style and not vice versa. Tannen suggested that „the best" communication style is a flexible style: finding that delicate balance between differentiation and connectivity.

[10] Olson, H., David, DeFrain, John, Marriage and the Family, Diversity and Strenghts,p.74

Rather than blame each other for the attitude and for the communication style, men and women would be better to avoid „the blame game" and focus on cooperation in order to find acceptable solutions for some and for others. While blame is a competitive effort where a part try to beat the other, authentic communication represents a cooperation effort in which the participants focus on understanding.

References

- Abric, J., Cl*., Communication Psychology* , Polirom, 2002
- Bartsch, R.A., Burnett, Teresa (2000) "Gender Representation in Television Commercials:
- Updating an Update", Sex Roles, 43/9-10, pp.735-743.
- 3.Birkenbihl, Vera F*., Communication training*, Gemma Press, Bucuresti,1997
- Cohan, J.A. (2001) "Towards a New Paradigm in the Ethics of Women's Advertising",
- Journal of Business Ethics, 33, pp.323-337.
- Coman, Alina (2004) „Perceptions of gender stereotypes in advertising ", Romanian *Sociology*II/1, pp.101-116.
- 6.Cook, G. (1992) The Discourse of Advertising, London: Routledge.
- 7.Deborah Tannen , Listening to Men, Then and Now, New York Times
- Magazine, May 6, 1999
- Dyer, G. (1995) Advertising as Communication, New York: Routledge
- DiSalvo, Vicent, David C. Larsen, William J. Seiler*, Communication Skills Needed by People in Business*, Communication Monographs 25 (1976)
- Furnham, A., Thomson, L. (1999) "Gender Role Stereotyping in Advertisements on Two
- British Radio Stations", Sex Roles, 40, 1/2.
- 10.Hybels , Saundra, Weaver II, Richard L., Communicating effectively, Mc. Graw Hill Higher Education, 2001
- Leech, G.N. (1966) English in Advertising: A Linguistic Study of Advertising in Great
- Britain, London:Longmans
- 12.McCutcheon, Randall, Schaffer, James, Wicoff, Joseph., R. ,*Communication Matters,*West Publishing Company,1994
- 13.O'Brien, Patricia, Why Men don't Listen…and What It Costs Women at Work , Working Women 18(2), February, 1993, 56(5), online: Infotrac, Expanded Academic ASAP
- 14..Olson, H., David, DeFrain, John, Marriage and the Family, Diversity and Strenghts,
- 15..Payne, James, Applications. Communication, Clark Publishing, 1999
- 16.Petre Anghel : Sex, gender and culture differences in communication
- http://unibuc.academia.edu/PetreAnghel/Papers/329817/diferen_e_De_Sex_Gen_i_Cultura_in_Comunicare

BRIEF CONSIDERATIONS REGARDING MEDIATION IN CRIMINAL MATTERS

LUMINIȚA DRAGNE[1]

Abstract
Mediation is an alternative means of conflict resolution, is designed as a flexible procedure whose utility was observed in contrast to the deficiencies of the judiciary system. In the field of criminal law, mediation is part of the larger concept of the restorative justice whose aim is restoring the main victim in its rights. From this perspective, to the criminal process is intended, in principal, repairing of the victim's prejudice and, subsequently, to encourage the delinquent in taking responsibility and to acknowledge his guilt, and also to determine him to actively participate in repairing the damage caused. The ultimate goal of the process is giving back the delinquent to society and consequently, reducing the relapse.
Romanian legislator has not taken this concept, and how it is regulated mediation in criminal matters is hesitant, cautious and ultimately ineffective. Specifically, in situations that will actually occur, victim-delinquent mediation will only take the form of "assisted reconciliation."

Keywords*: mediation in criminal matters, restorative justice, optional procedure.*

1. INTRODUCTION

Mediation as an alternative dispute resolution stems in the American legal system, where over the years has proved effective and, along with other methods of alternative conflict (arbitration, conciliation, negotiation), has an extensive media promotion and support of the judicial bodies, but also from administrative institutions. Usefulness and success of this system has led the implementation of similar forms of conflict resolution in most legal systems of modern states. In Europe, the institution of mediation is assimilated by imitation, but the process was a remarkable success in countries such as England, Austria, Germany, Sweden, Spain, Italy or Portugal, but unlike the American model where mediation is binding, the European model is mainly optional.

Institution mediation is conceived as a flexible procedure, accessible and from a pecuniary point of view, able to provide to the parties the opportunity to resolve conflicts without resorting to judicial organs, avoiding the drawbacks of probation order, formalism, time and psychic consumption specific to the court procedure.

Moreover, the usefulness of this procedure was observed in contrast to the deficiencies of the judiciary system. Judiciary process qualifies trial parts as being adversaries, which creates a visible psychological barrier between the parts involved in the conflict. By pronouncing a judge decision, only one part is successful, the dispute between them is getting deeper. The court will grant a compensation of a party, but often the parties' actual interests and needs are ignored. This way of treating the conflict is, on a long term, harmful in parties relationships, the decision of the judiciary is one absolute, and psychologically creates frustration and damage one of the parties, deteriorating relations between participants in an irremediable manner.

The purpose of this scientific approach is to emphasize that aspect of restorative justice represented by mediation, to highlight the usefulness of mediation in criminal matters and to support the reform process in the sense of civil society, as we believe that the Romanian public is not sufficiently responsive to this new way of dealing with conflicts. The lack of responsiveness is due to how inefficient the mediation in criminal matters, and not only is publicized in local media.

[1] Associate Professor Ph. D., Christian University "Dimitrie Cantemir" (luminita_ucdc@yahoo.com)

Romanian legal system, following the directions of principle established in the European Union has adopted legislation that enshrines the possibility and conditions of settlement in civil, commercial, and a narrow category of criminal cases through mediation.

But, the way in which the legislature has regulated mediation in criminal matters is evidence for lack of understanding of the institution itself and its disinterest in the matter of adopting an effective and viable private implementation of this institution.

Therefore, mediation in criminal matters is a relatively new in Romanian legal system, this prompting some interest much later than in other European countries[2].

2. THE CONCEPT OF RESTORATIVE JUSTICE

In criminal law, mediation is part of the broader concept of restorative justice[3].

Restorative justice is modern civil society response to punitive criminal justice system and the main purpose of this new concept is the restoration of the victim - and often ignored secondary participant in the criminal - in his rights. In light of this new trend, the main purpose is not criminal punishment but repairing the prejudice caused to the victim. Subsequently, wishes and aims to encourage the offender to take responsibility, to plead guilty and to determinate him to actively participate in recovery of damages caused. The ultimate goal of this process is reintegration of the offender in community, society, and consequently reducing of recidivism.

The main purpose of restorative justice is balancing the concerns of the victim and the community with the need to reintegrate the offender into society[4]. Restorative justice aims to assist the victim in the recovery process and to enable all parties directly affected by judicial proceedings to participate effectively and fruitful at its development.

Restorative process means any process in which victim, offender and other persons or members of society affected by a crime participate together to solve problems caused by crime, often with an impartial third party. This may include victim-offender mediation, conferencing, circles, victim assistance, assistance convicted, compensation, community service.

Mediation between victim and offender is the most used way of solving conflicts in European legal systems. In this process, an independent and qualified third party assists the parties to discuss the circumstances of committing the crime and the effects and to reach an agreement whereby they agree on how to repair the damage caused to the victim.

Mediation can manifest directly, in which case all parties are present, or indirectly, a situation supposing that the third party mediator will discuss separately with each party and will transmit the intentions and requirements to each other help them in this way to establish an agreement. In this procedure, the focus is primarily on the material interests of the parties and less side affective component, which involves discovering the causes of conflict and mutual understanding of needs and wishes of each party[5].

The conference assumes a wider group of people involved in restorative processes, people both directly and indirectly affected by crime committed - victim and perpetrator, their family members, other close persons, representatives of judicial bodies or other authorities, social workers, representatives of non-governmental organizations, teachers, and other representatives of affected communities. The role of discussion is to discover the causes, effects and accountability act, to agree an effective way to repair the injury and prevent possible relapses.

---

[2] Only in 2006 has been adopted the Law no. 192/2006 regarding mediation and the profession of mediator, published in the Official Gazette, Part I, no. 441/22.05.2006, and they were devoted several articles on mediation in criminal cases.

[3] Restorative justice (engl.).

[4] United Nations Economic and Social Council (2002), Basic Principles on the use of Restorative Justice Programmes in Criminal Matters, http://www.un.org/en/ecosoc/docs/2002/resolution%202002-12.pdf

[5] Dragne L., A. Tranca, Mediation in Criminal Matters, Pro Universitaria Ed, Bucharest, 2011, pp.13-14.

Circle model best reflects the democratic principles and requires, at the discussion, the presence of the more significant number of community members affected by the illegal act. The victim, offender, people who support them, community members and representatives of the criminal judicial bodies shall meet in the same circle and determine who belongs with responsibility, identifies the negative consequences of the crime and agree on a method of repair, as well as ways to prevent a repetition of the conflict situation[6].

Community service programs support the victims, community councils are secondary forms of realizing the restorative process and put less emphasis on direct communication between the victim and offender.

Restorative outcome may result in the agreement of the parties, which in turn may consist of damage, performing services on behalf of the victim or the community, and any other programs or commitments to provide cover for injury to the victim and community and reintegration into society the victim and offender.

3. SOME ASPECTS OF CRIMINAL MEDIATION ROMANIAN LEGAL SYSTEM

Mediation in criminal matters, as regulated in the state of the Romanian national legislation, adopts only one of the forms in concept application of restorative justice: mediation between victim and offender that the criminal aspect that may result in the removal of criminal responsibility.

Romanian Mediation Legislator has chosen to regulate only a limited number of crimes, namely those for which the law[7], withdrawal or prior criminal complaint reconciliation removes the criminal responsibility: crimes of impact, injuries caused by negligence, entering the home without permission, etc.

We believe that the reason for which the legislator has limited the mediation procedure in these crimes is the fact that, in these cases, the parts, even in the absence of mediation, can reach to an agreement on the offense committed and its consequences, the will of the parties being an essential element both in starting and in finalizing criminal trial proceedings, the principle of penalty process officially is clearly limited by the will of the parties.

Parties can use mediation both before - extrajudicial mediation - and after initiation of criminal proceedings - judicial mediation.

Extrajudicial mediation takes place at the initiative of one or both parties before the injured party to make prior complaint.

The legislator is only concerned with extrajudicial mediation result: if the mediation procedure is completed through reconciliation, the injured party could not refer to the same act on criminal investigation or court. We point out the inaccuracy of the term used in the sense that reconciliation can take place only after making a complaint, situation in which we are not in extra-judicial mediation, which is why the terms of agreement or arrangement would have been more appropriate. Another observation concerns the hypothesis of referral to the court by prior complaint, this last sentence was repealed[8] and, although the Law no. 192/2006 on mediation and the profession of mediator has been amended on two occasions, there was a legislative proposal to make this provision consistent with the new version of the Code of Criminal Procedure.

---

[6] European best practices of restorative justice in the criminal procedure, Conference publication, 2010, European Crime Prevention Network, www.eucpn.org/download/?file=RJ_ENG.pdf&type=8

[7] By The Decision - European Union Council Framework from 15 March 2001 on the standing of victims in criminal proceedings, it was established for the Member States of the European Union to promote mediation in criminal cases for offenses it considers appropriate for this type of measure, each member will ensure that any agreement made between the victim and the offender will be taken into account during the mediation in criminal cases.

[8] Provision repealed by Law no. 356/2006 amending and supplementing the Criminal Procedure Code and to amend other laws, published in the Official Gazette, Part I, nr.677/07.08.2006.

Successful completion of the mediation process acts as a cause to prevent the entry into the penalty action.

If mediation is not completed by agreement, the injured party may submit the prior complaint. A useful provision is contained in Art. 69, para. 2 of the Act, which enshrines the only case for suspending the deadline for lodging the prior complaint. If the parties require mediation during the deadline for lodging the prior complaint of two months, this period shall be suspended during the procedure, and it resumes its course after considering the duration elapsed before mediation. Suspension period will therefore be included between the date of signing and the conclusion of the mediation process - closing minutes of the mediation.

Judicial Mediation takes place after notification of penalty investigation authorities with prior complaint. In this case the parties may request mediation or to their recommendation from the court or prosecuting authority. The consequence for judicial mediation is suspending prosecution or trial (where the parties have turned to mediation by the prosecution), the measures taken in the mediation agreement presented by the parties.

The suspension lasts until the closure of mediation in any manner provided by law, but no more than 3 months after signing the contract of mediation.

Criminal proceedings are officially resumed immediately after receipt of the report stating that the parties were not reconciled, or if it does not communicate the deadline of 3 months.

Unlike the American model, the Romanian legal system, criminal, and not only has a voluntary mediation.

Unfortunately, experience shows that without proper information on this new alternative dispute resolution and the benefits of mediation, the practice is almost non-existent in this area, not far signed no agreement in criminal matters.

4. USEFULNESS OF MEDIATION

Mediation would be, theoretically, a major evolution in criminal proceedings. Through this institution, the victim has a greater role in the conduct of proceedings and quickly finds satisfaction through its faster ongoing and prejudice recuperation, and the perpetrator can realize the wrong done and accept repairing it, society allowing his reintegration by other means than isolation in a place of detention.

Possibility of mediation procedure initiation between offender and the injured person will depend almost entirely on the will of the former. In the couple victim - offender, victim is the most sensitive position, it is affected by the criminal act, and in most cases, willingness to communicate with the other party is a prerequisite condition for initiation of proceedings.

If, from this point of view, the position of the victim conditions the procedure of mediation, the offender will to participate in the proceeding should not be neglected. In turn, he must show voluntary consent in starting the procedure, only a sincere willingness of the perpetrator being a part in the process of reconciliation can give mediation a chance of success, otherwise there is the possibility that the conclusion of the mediation to be regarded by perpetrator only as a simple way to avoid criminal liability, which would remove the mediation of its purpose.

According to the definition given by the EC Recommendation, no. R (99) 19 on mediation in penal matters[9], criminal mediation is a process by which victim and offender are enabled, if the free consent to participate actively in solving problems arising from infringement by third parties impartial (the mediator).

[9] Recommendation no. R (99) 19 on mediation in criminal matters was adopted by the Council of Europe Committee of Ministers on 15 September 1999.

The mediator cannot impose a solution on parties to conflict mediation as subject to its role in this process is that of a facilitator of communication between the parties, helping them to identify key issues of their conflict and to identify possible solutions and remedies.

In our view, mediator's mission is not that of a single witness, but an active, contributing to the reconciliation process by carefully listening to their stories, intervening only in cases where the dialogue degenerates, and helping parties to highlight the problems that even these they have brought into question.

From such a perspective, the focus is not on the needs and interests of the parties but on their emotions and feelings. Conflict is de-structured narrative discourse and the direction is changed towards identifying key issues and their resolution.

In mediation, effective solution is determined solely on the wishes, needs and interests of the parties, without constraining the scope of the rules of procedure. The parties may choose the solution that satisfies their interests, giving mediation a more practical nature in restoring the situation of the parties.

In addition, the confidentiality of the proceedings, a principle which guarantees that nothing will be said or used outside the room where the mediation takes place, is that mediation is particularly attractive in particular for certain subjects, as it allows parties to maintain confidentiality of information concerning their personal lives or their property.

5. BRIEF CONCLUSIONS

Generally, mediation allows finding creative remedies and, away from the solemn hearings and rigid rules of procedure, is likely to provide proper conditions to a real and effective communication between the parties. Also is a quicker procedure and involves far less cost than a trial.

We can say that mediation is a complete success when the agreement between the parties resolves their material interests and, what are more important, their emotional needs, as this effect guarantees the stability agreement between the parties.

However, shortcomings of the Romanian law legislative regulatory of this institution are evident especially in terms of mediation in criminal matters. As is known in this moment, mediation victim - offender is clearly inefficient and unable to produce concrete results.

Legislative approach to mediation victim - offender is already criticized in the literature[10] and we join these criticisms. Institution mediation victim - offender is part of a much broader concept, not represent only a particular aspect of manifestation of the concept of restorative justice, originally developed in the United States.

Our law has not taken this concept and how it is regulated mediation in criminal matters is hesitant, cautious, unimaginative, and ultimately, ineffective. Specifically, in situations that will actually occur, mediation victim - offender will only take the form of "assisted reconciliation."

At this point we want to highlight just two of the major shortcomings of how the legislative regulation of mediation in criminal matters. First, unlike most European countries, Romanian legislator sought not to regulate ways to control judicial authorities on how they are fulfilled obligations under the mediation agreement. In many European countries - England, Austria, Poland, Germany, Italy, etc. - an agreement to mediate does not automatically affect the termination of criminal proceedings, but his suspension for a variable period of time that the judiciary oversees how obligations undertaken by the agreement are complied with, the termination of criminal proceedings is conditional upon the offender who committed the obligations in the mediation. In some cases (Austria, mediation of rape offenses) that supervisory role is given to the mediator.

[10] Gh Mateut, Mediation in Criminal Law Review no. 7/2007, C. Ignat, Z. Sustac, C. Danilet, Mediation Guide, University Publishing House, Bucharest, 2009.

A second major shortcoming of mediation is given by the impossibility of judicial authorities to send, themselves, the cause to a mediator. In states that have adopted this system, mediation remains voluntary, but the invitation is sent to the parties to mediation by the mediator appointed by the court or prosecutor, when the file is already in its possession. The parties may accept or not mediation, but the impact of this particular trigger mediation is much higher in the availability of the parties to resolve the dispute through mediation. In such a system, in addition, mediation is free, which is a real incentive for participants in conflict.

In conclusion, the institution of legal mediation as currently regulated has no practical use. But can acquire such utility by sustaining the reformatting process of the civil society, but only in a constant media support, real and effective, combined of course with the active involvement of judicial authorities.

Reference:

- Dragne L., A. Tranca, Mediation in Criminal Matters, Pro Universitaria Ed, Bucharest, 2011.
- Gh Mateut, Mediation in Criminal Law Review no. 7/2007.
-  European best practices of restorative justice in the criminal procedure, Conference publication, 2010, European Crime Prevention Network, www.eucpn.org/download/?file=RJ_ENG.pdf&type=8
-  The Decision - European Union Council Framework from 15 March 2001 on the standing of victims in criminal proceedings.
-  Recommendation no. R (99) 19 on mediation in criminal matters was adopted by the Council of Europe Committee of Ministers on 15 September 1999.
-  United Nations Economic and Social Council (2002), Basic Principles on the use of Restorative Justice Programmes in Criminal Matters, http://www.un.org/en/ecosoc/docs/2002/resolution%202002-12.pdf
-  Law no. 192/2006 regarding mediation and the profession of mediator, published in the Official Gazette, Part I, no. 441/22.05.2006.
-  Law no. 356/2006 amending and supplementing the Criminal Procedure Code and to amend other laws, published in the Official Gazette, Part I, nr.677/07.08.2006.

MEDIATION IN PENAL MATTERS IN ROMANIA

MIRELA GORUNESCU[1]

Abstract

In Romania, the field of restorative justice is still an unknown one, and it is still a dilemma if this kind of judicial activity (successful in other jurisdictions around the world) will be a success in our county. In this context, becomes even more difficult to find the correct answer to the question if the mediation, as a form of restorative justice, is a viable solution, in Romanian system, and even more difficult to see the future of mediation in criminal matters. This possibility legally exits since 2006.

Keywords*: restorative justice, criminal liability, mediation, criminal trial, crimes*

INTRODUCTION

1. This study focuses on the problem of the incidence of mediation in solving criminal law conflicts.

It is well known that the mediation has proved its utility in this field from during the last years, in different jurisdictions all over the world, even in criminal matters, but this possibility exists only from 2006 in Romanian Legislation. The Law no. 192 on mediation and the mediator profession[2] was put into force in this year and created a new instrument to solve the conflicts, including the conflicts which may occur in criminal law area.

2. From our point of view it is very important for all the actors involved in Criminal Law enforcement effort to have a correct a clear image on the utility, on the rules and on the particularities of the mediation in this sensitive field. That is why the present study has the aim to observe some special aspects of the mediation in criminal law: is it easy for the state authority to renounce to its so called "right to punish" and to accept the elements of restorative justice, including the mediation; which are the specific elements of Romanian legislation in the criminal law mediation area; is this instrument only a theoretical one for the Romanian judicial authorities nowadays, or it already has a practical utility in particular cases brought in front of judges; which is the future of this instrument in the New Romanian Penal Procedural Code.

3. In our study we will analyze the Romanian legal provisions on mediation in criminal matters, with all the particularities determined by the national specific. In order to realize a better understanding of this domain, we will put it in a larger framework – the one of the restorative justice. In this part, we will observe the general principles of this criminal policy, and will stress the differences from the traditional approaches.

Also, we will illustrate the future of the mediation in criminal matters according to the New Penal Procedural Code which is already adopted and about to enter into force in Romania.

4. In terms of the Romanian doctrine in the field of interest, the present study has the merit to be among the first studies ever published on this topic. The study will observe the legislative framework into force in the special law and in the Criminal Procedural Code (after the modifications operated by Law 202/2010).

[1] Associate Professor Ph. D., "Nicolae Titulescu" University, Bucharest, (email: mire_gor@yahoo.com).

[2] Published in The Romanian Official Monitor, Part I, no. 441 from 22th May 2006.

"THE RIGHT TO PUNISH" – JUST A TRADITIONAL APPROACH

It has been historically accepted that the state authority has a so called "right to punish" a person who committed a crime and perturbed the social equilibrium, only the fundament of this right has been different during the time.

Although, the first theories in this field allowed the punishment as a form of private revenge – the relatives of the victim had the right to cause harm directly to the offender, even an exaggerated one. That is why, when the Talion Law appeared it was considered an important form of progress, just because it imposed the proportionality limits.

Another age in the evolution scale was the "retributivism". In this theory the punishment is the harm the offender has to suffer to compensate the harm he or she produced to the victim – poena est malum passionis guod infligitur ob malum actionis. In some variations of this theory it was stated that the punishment is a right of the offender, an act of his or hers own will because he or she consider the law infringement as their right. A crime, as an act, is not something positive, not a first thing, on which punishment would supervene as a negation. It is something negative, so that its punishment is only a negation of a negation[3].

As a general characteristic, this theory reduces the aim of the punishment to a simple equivalent of the harm cause by crime, in order to reach the equilibrium between malum passionis and malum actionis. In this way, the repressive function of the state is reduced to put the offender in the position to expiate guilt by through suffering, to give the own right.

The Theory of utility is the one according to which the aim of the punishment is not to repress the harm caused by the crime, but to prevent the citizens to commit other offences. In this way, the punishment is an instrument for the future, an instrument which prevents the recurrence of the criminal behavior – punitur ut ne peccetur.

The state has even a more privileged position in the Social Contract Theory, because it is only an arbitrator between the society and the individuals. According to this theory, when the state applies a sanction it is only because it has a contractual obligation to fulfill, without having an interest in that case[4].

The adepts of The Social Defense Theory negated even the validity of a right to punish of the state. Instead of such a right, the state should have the possibility to take based on human rights legal, moral and social measures. A person who committed a crime is an ill person, who needs treatment no punishment. In this way, it is not needed a Penal Code, but only social defense measures, especially medical measures[5].

This was the first step in the direction of changing the perception over the punishment and the so called "right to punish" of the state. The person who committed a crime must be treated not punished.

Nowadays, the Restorative Justice Theory is the one which makes itself more and more present in the Romanian legislative realities.

FROM RETRIBUTION TO RESTORATION

The Restorative justice theory is a new movement in the fields of victimology and criminology. This theory, acknowledging that crime causes injury to people and communities; it insists that justice must repair those injuries and that the parties be permitted to participate in that process.

So, the restorative justice programs, therefore, enable the victim, the offender and affected members of the community to be directly involved in responding to the crime. It aims to the objective of ending the conflict relations in criminal law by the mediation of that conflict with all the involved parties.

[3] G. W. F. Hegel, Grundlinien der Philosopfie des Rechts, Berlin, 1821, p. 541.
[4] Hugo Grotius, On the Laws of War and Peace, Stiintifica Publishing House, Bucharest, 1968, p. 478.
[5] Chronique de defense sociale, Revue de science criminelle et de droit pénal comparé, p. 3/1964, p. 652.

Among the general principles of this kind of justice we can indicate: the crime is seen as a prejudice; the restorative effort is concentrated more on the prejudice than on the rule infringement; it pays equal interest to the victim and to the offender, as active actors of the justice; stresses the importance of victims' rehabilitation by support them the way they fill the need to be helped; gives attention to the offenders and tries to determines them to realize that they have to fulfill the obligation to the victim and to the society; the victims' point of view on the most appropriate way to repair the harm is very important; the communication between the victim and the offender is a key factor to realize the cooperation of all the implied parties; the results of the justice act are quantified by the proportion the harm caused by crime was repaired and not by the severity of the punishment.

COUNCIL OF EUROPE AND THE MEDIATION IN CRIMINAL MATTERS

The Council of Europe adopted in 1999 one important legal instrument in order to stress the utility of the mediation in criminal matters[6]. In this legal instrument, the European organism observed that in member States are some strong developments in the use of mediation in penal matters. This instrument is seen as ”a flexible, comprehensive, problem-solving, participatory option complementary or alternative to traditional criminal proceedings”.

The interest of victims to have a stronger voice in dealing with the consequences of their victimisation, to communicate with the offender and to obtain apology and reparation is considered to be legitimate. Also, the indicated legal instrument recognizes that mediation may increase awareness of the important role of the individual and the community in preventing and handling crime and resolving its associated conflicts, thus encouraging more constructive and less repressive criminal justice outcomes.

The mediation in penal matters is defined as any process whereby the victim and the offender are enabled, if they freely consent, to participate actively in the resolution of matters arising from the crime through the help of an impartial third party (mediator).

Some general principles are stated by this legal instrument: 1. Mediation in penal matters should only take place if the parties freely consent. Also, the parties should be able to withdraw such consent at any time during the mediation; 2. Discussions in mediation are confidential and may not be used subsequently, except with the agreement of the parties; 3. Mediation in penal matters should be a generally available service; 4. Mediation in penal matters should be available at all stages of the criminal justice process; 5. Mediation services should be given sufficient autonomy within the criminal justice system.

So, at the Council of Europe the mediation it is seen as a solution to better solve the penal law conflicts.

THE ROMANIAN SPECIAL REGULATION INTO FORCE IN MEDIATION IN PENAL MATTERS

Under these, and others, influence, the Romanian legislator adopted in 2006 the Law no. 192 as the first regulation dedicated to the mediation field. According to the first article of this law, the mediation represents a form of solving the conflicts consensually, with the help of a third person specialized as a mediator, with respect or neutrality, impartiality, confidentiality and with the free will of the involved parties.

In this law, the Chapter VI includes special provisions on conflict mediation, and, in its second section, the special rules on mediation in penal cases.

---

[6] Recommendation no. R (99) 19 of the Committee of Ministers to member States concerning mediation in penal matters (Adopted by the Committee of Ministers on 15 September 1999 at the 679th meeting of the Ministers' Deputies), https://wcd.coe.int/ViewDoc.jsp?id=420059&Site=DC

The incidence area is restricted by the article 67 from the Law no. 192/2006 to the penal cases which regards crimes for which, according to the law, the withdrawal of the preliminary complaint or the reconciliation of the parties removes the criminal liability.

Neither the victim nor the perpetrator can be constrained to accept the mediation in their conflict and even they accept it, all the human rights guaranties must be respected. During this procedure, the parties must benefit of juridical assistance, interpret (in case the situation imposes) and the minutes signed on the mediation final must provide information in this field.

If the mediation procedure takes place before the trial start and it has as a result the reconciliation of the parties, the mediation contract has res judicata power. That is because the victim may not notify any judicial authority on the same fact. The mediation procedure has also a suspensive effect for the term established by the law for the prealabile complains to be introduced (2 months starting from the day the adult victim knew who the offender is, according to article 284 par. 1 from The Romanian Procedural Penal Code). But, if the parties did not come to reconciliation, the victim may introduce the complaint in the same term, which will continue from the day the mediation document will be written.

If the mediation takes places after the penal trial started, the prosecution or the judgment will be suspended when any party presents the mediation contract. The suspension should be as long as the mediation lasts, but no longer than 3 months starting with the day the contract was signed. The mediator has the obligation to communicate to the judicial authority a copy of the document signed in the end of the mediation procedure.

The penal trial resumes at the judicial authority initiative immediately after it receives the document according to which the parties have not reached a consensus or when the 3 months term expires.

THE MEDIATION IN THE ROMANIAN GENERAL LEGAL RULES

Although the special regulation from the Law no. 192/2006 was into force for a while, the Penal Procedural Code has not been amended in order to be put in accordance with new institution till 2010. In this year, the Law no. 202, so called "The Little Reform", amended the Penal Procedural Code (PPC) into force since 1969 and, among other interventions, included in this important legal instrument some provisions related to the mediation. First, it is about the article 10 PPC which establishes the cases the prosecution cannot start or cannot continue. The point h) from this article was completed with a new impediment – which exists when a mediation accord was signed for the offences indicated by law as being pursuable only after a special complaint was formulated.

In the same way, the transaction and the mediation are indicated as methods to end the civil action in the penal trial. According to article 16^1 PPC, during the penal trial, the parties involved in it may sign a transaction or a mediation accord on the civil aspects of the case. In this situation, if all the legal provisions were respected, the court must take in consideration the transaction or the mediation accord and must record them in the decision. If the mediation on the civil aspects of the case is realized during the prosecution, the prosecutor has to record it in the indictment.

Even these provisions are into force since 2010, respectively since 2006, the practical activity demonstrates that they are rarely applied.

THE FUTURE IN REGULATION OF THE MEDIATION IN PENAL MATTERS

In the future Romanian Penal Procedural Code (FPPC) there are even more mediation elements.

First, the articles 16 and 23 are the correspondents of the previous analyzed articles 10 and 16^1 form the Romanian Penal Procedural Code into force since 1969. These two legal texts states that the prosecution cannot start or cannot continue if the parties signed a mediation accord, respectively, that the transaction and the mediation are the methods to extinguish the civil action in penal trial. In essence, these texts were put into force earlier by their inclusion in the actual legislation.

But, the new penal procedural code gives a more important role to mediation because it states that the victim (article 81 New Romanian Procedural Penal Code), the offender (article 83 New Romanian Procedural Penal Code), the civil part (article 112 New Romanian Procedural Penal Code), and the civil responsible part (article 112 New Romanian Procedural Penal Code) all have a right to address to a mediator. Moreover, the article 111 New Romanian Procedural Penal Code stipulates that all these parties must be informed on the possibility to exercise the right at the first hearing.

In the article 275 paragraph 2 New Romanian Procedural Penal Code it is stipulated that when there are some judicial expenses advanced by the state, these expenses are supported by a different part, depending on the solution. In case of the penal trial stopped, the expenses are supported by the offender (when this part benefits by a unpunishment cause), by the victim (in case this part withdraws the complaint, or when this complaint was tardily introduced) or by the part established during the penal mediation procedure and indicated in the mediation accord. So, after this new penal procedural code will enter into force, through the penal mediation will be possible to make an exception from the general rules in the field of judicial expenses. It will be possible to determine explicitly that these expenses to be let in the duty of the other part that the one indicated by the general rules.

In the article 312 New Romanian Procedural Penal Code, the legislator settled the prosecution suspension cases. Among these cases, near a serious disease and a legal impediment, it is also indicated the mediation procedure duration. As long as a mediation procedure will be developing, the previous started prosecution must be suspended. But, in order to produce this effect, it is required that the procedure respects all legal provisions imposed by the Law 192/2006, by the Penal Procedural Code, or by any legal instrument into force.

At the same time, the article 367 New Romanian Procedural Penal Code indicates the judgment suspension reasons. The legal provision states that these causes are: the serious illness (established by a medical expertize), the suspension of the cause for another offender in the same case, but also the mediation duration, but only when this procedure respects all legal provisions imposed by the law. The penal trial officially resumes at the end of the mediation procedure. Also, during the suspension of the judgment, the court has to verify periodically the subsistence of the suspension causes. These investigations of the court must be developed at interval at less than 3 months. In this way, it will be impossible as a mediation procedure to have duration longer than 3 months, and to cause unjustified prolongations of the penal trial.

It is obvious that after this New Romanian Procedural Penal Code will enter into force the penal mediation will get a more important role and a better visibility at the same time. In this new legal instrument there are more consistent legal provisions which create the possibility for the penal mediation as a new procedure in the penal law field to gain in effectiveness and to become a more practical instrument.

CONCLUSIONS

1. The present paper started the investigation from the so called “right to punish” the states have assumed during the ages and observed the evolution from the retributivism to a present and modern theory – the restorative justice. Under the influence of some European legal instruments as The Committee of Ministers to the Council of Europe member States no. R (99) 19, elements of this theory were included in The Romanian Penal Procedural Code into force since 1969, only from 2010 and completed the legal framework created by the Law 192/2006. Among these elements there is the penal mediation and this institution is included in the New Romanian Procedural Penal Code which is about to enter into force in short time.

2. This study represents a documentation source for every person interested in criminal law field, both theorists and practitioners. The impact on the doctrine will be an important one because there are only a few such studies published in Romania, which reveal the mediation as a restorative justice instrument and which points the legislative framework into force in present. Also, the paper has the merit to include an analysis of the future regulation included into the future Romanian Procedural Penal Code, published in the Official Monitor and which is about to enter into force in a relative short term.

3. This study opens the perspective for future researches related to this topic. It is about a new domain for the Romanian penal law and that is why such future studies should concern some particular aspects of mediation in penal matters, as for instance, the relationship between the mediation accord and the unconditioned withdrawal of the complaint. A subject like this is interesting from the both perspective as well – theoretical and practical.

References

- Law no. 192/2006, published in The Romanian Official Monitor, Part I, no. 441 from 22th May 2006.
- L. Dragne, A. Trancă, Mediation in Criminal Matters, Universul Juridic Publishing House, Bucharest, 2011.
- G. W. F. Hegel, Grundlinien der Philosopfie des Rechts, Berlin, 1821, p. 541.
- Hugo Grotius, On the Laws of War and Peace, Ştiinţifică Publishing House, Bucharest, 1968, p. 478.
- Chronique de defense sociale, Revue de science criminelle et de droit pénal comparé, p. 3/1964, p. 652.
- Recommendation no. R (99) 19 of the Committee of Ministers to member States concerning mediation in penal matters (Adopted by the Committee of Ministers on 15 September 1999 at the 679th meeting of the Ministers' Deputies), https://wcd.coe.int/ViewDoc.jsp?id=420059&Site=DC

SPECIAL ISSUES REGARDING THE MEDIATION PROCESS IN THE COMMERCIAL FIELD

SEPTIMIU STOICA[1]

Abstract

The purpose of the research subject to this paper is to find proper solutions for the increase of the volume and efficiency in the field of commercial mediation. Starting from practical remarks, after an analysis of the substance, a new concept is suggested to be included and put into operation, namely the special commercial mediation, and a plead is made for its use in the current activity of alternative dispute resolution.

The first major objective of this paper is to demonstrate once again the need and utility of mediation in the commercial field, insisting though on its remarkable specific nature. The second objective is, starting from the outlined differences between the commercial mediation and the classical mediation, to define and to conceptualize the special commercial mediation, as a separate branch of mediation. The third objective of this paper is to draw the regime of the newly defined category of commercial mediation from a regulatory point of view, of the implementation structure and techniques as foreseen.

KEY WORDS: mediator, arbitration, facilitative, negotiation, evaluation

Introduction

This study has for object the use of mediation, as ADR, in the commercial field. Although in the countries where the mediation is used intensively, the commercial area for its application is not avoided, the results are not up to the level of the possibilities. ADR star is still the more expensive, complicated and risky commercial arbitration, especially at international level. Moreover, in the countries where mediation is incipient, such as Romania, the cases of commercial mediation are singular and fortuitous, without outlining a positive increase trend. This paper aims to identify the reasons for such failure and to suggest a new approach, more pragmatic and more efficient of this field.

By this paper, we are building and suggesting the solution to the above-mentioned issue, which is a new category of mediation, deviating from the classical mediation, namely the commercial mediation. Once adopted, we believe that the effect would be of extreme importance: a better and more efficient resolution of commercial conflicts, a spectacular increase of the number of cases brought in for resolution, a recovery of the commercial relations, the relief of the Courts of law from most of the pending litigations. Therefore, the objectives of the paper are to individualize and to delimit the commercial mediation within the context of general mediation and to build a new concept, namely the special commercial mediation, and to configure it.

In order to reach such objectives, the paper underlines the need to use the mediation in the commercial field, identifies its particular features, sets forth its similarities and differences compared to the regular mediation with a facilitating nature, defines the special commercial mediation, explores the ways of its prescriptive assimilation and outlines some of the fundamental techniques that may be related thereto.

The subject of mediation in the commercial field is approached in the specialty literature. Emphasis is made more on the use of mediation as such and on case studies, but less on finding the deficiencies of its classical form. Although the evaluative approaches are present, we were not able to identify the theorization of a new concept as a separate branch of mediation detached from the trunk of regular mediation, even if we have the feeling that the idea is hovering and – in an intuitive and empirical manner – that there are practitioners who use it, to a certain extent and not systematically. That is why we hope that an original contribution in this field is made by our paper.

[1] Attorney at law with Salans Bucharest, Ph. D., mediator, (email: timistoica@yahoo.vom).

Utility of commercial mediation

Commercial conflicts represent a divergence area presenting a special interest and importance in the relational landscape of modern society. Commercial law, as a branch of private law, covers the entire performance of economic activity, with its major importance and inclusion in the contemporary existence.

Obviously, the commercial activity means interactions among people, among individuals and legal entities, among legal entities as such. The relations among protagonists are governed by laws and contracts. The inevitable misunderstandings among the parties are settled in a canonic way in front of the Court. The number of disputes is high, and the complex nature of the cases is huge, therefore it is important to settle them efficiently.

But it is the efficiency of settling the cases in front of the Court that is more and more often questioned. The methods of alternative dispute resolution (ADR) are current options in this field. The most popular is the commercial arbitration, an extremely widespread institution during the last decades, both at national and at international level[2]. Following its steps, mediation started to strongly impose itself after having been preceded by the simpler formula of the conciliation.

Why is it necessary to have an alternative to traditional justice in the commercial field and - in particular - why can this be better used in the business field? We'll give some answers herein below, in this introductive chapter of our paper.

Thus, first of all, it should be mentioned that the approaches of the participants in the economic life are harsh, but rational. Rationality is specific for the entire field so it is natural for it to be present in the disputes' resolution. The parties may foresee the costs and risks of each method of dispute resolution and decide on the most suitable one, and also when this one represents a compromise. The emotional elements are not preponderant here, as they are in the conflicts among common individuals[3] or within the community, and to establish a communication platform is also natural and accepted. Negotiation is the universal language for closing businesses, all the more so as the parties may use it again - why not? - for the conflicts' resolution. These are circumstances which - at least apparently, we are going to get back seriously to this aspect! - are in favor of ADR, especially the mediation.

The second reason refers to a major coordinate of the commercial relations, namely the continuity, at least by defined time periods. Incidents are possible, and even probable in the commercial relation between two partners. But it is necessary to manage them in an efficient manner, to find an economic solution in order to surpass the same. A "win - lose" solution, as the solution dictated by justice and even by an arbitral proceeding, may give entire satisfaction to either party, but it is quite difficult for someone to rely on the fact that the losing party will still wish to continue the contractual relation, or somehow that both parties will accept to initiate new relations between them. Such additional price that is paid, the long-term discrediting of the relation, represent per se a common cost that is not worthy to be rationally, pragmatically incurred. It leads to the decrease of the turnover, to the lessening of the potential partnerships. The consequences are often more dramatic in an asymmetrical situation when one of the belligerent parties holds a privileged position in its field of activity (for ex.: de facto monopoly). The other party, avoiding or being from now avoided, risks to seriously influence its activity, almost compromising it. Therefore it is natural for this one to find suitable a method of resolution which avoids the sacrifice of the relation.

[2] Christian Buhring-Uhle – "Arbitration and Mediation in International Business", Kluwer Law International BV, The Netherlands, 2006, pp.180-195

[3] Jennifer E.Beer, Eileen Stief – "The Mediation Handbook", New Society Publishers, 1997, p.84

There are also other aspects which may influence the interests of a trader in case of a public judgment. Its involvement in a lawsuit, even without any evident guilt - but especially in case of an apparent guilt - is likely to deteriorate its image and to adversely influence its present or future partnerships. A negative reputation, including the aggressiveness in justice, but also noticeable vulnerabilities as a result of involvement and attrition in long or costly lawsuits, or weaknesses caused by the execution of certain Court decisions, may cause additional vulnerabilities in the relation with current or future business partners. Not to forget also the virtual prejudice caused by the divulgations resulted from the public performance of lawsuit-related debates regarding the involved parties, non-public information which loses its confidential nature until then.

The commercial cases are, by their nature, complex, full of technicalities. Their resolution in front of the Court implies time, attrition. The expenses[4], even in case of success, are high, and not always nor fully covered by the opposing party which was found guilty. However, often the repair occurs with delay, is late, or has a weak coverage and efficiency. Traders search in fact rapid solutions, with the lowest costs possible, and the legal proceeding does not answer - evidently - to such criteria, on the contrary.

Time and cost are not the only adverse consequences of the complexity of commercial conflicts in common law. Their high technicality, given the absence of economic and technical training of the judges in the field of the dispute (fatally and innocently only jurists!), which can be only partially covered by expert reports, makes commercial cases be difficult to understand by law people. Correlated with the high busyness level of those judges, with the inherent weaknesses and the unavoidable idiosyncrasies of human nature, the judging process in which a third party, not qualified in issues related to the substance of the case, decides and imposes without your consent, you being a trader under litigation, may lead to unexpected and inconvenient Court decisions, even when the lawful appearance is in your favor. The above-mentioned aspects are valid, mutatis mutandis, even when it is about the ADR star, arbitration.

Finally, the conclusion may be that the resolution of commercial cases using common legal ways presents different risks and costs, material and non (immediately) material for the parties.

Resulted most often from negotiations, the commercial relations can be saved also by negotiations. But it is necessary that such negotiations take place under a special format[5]. They should be assisted by a third party who is dedicated, neutral, competent and respected by the belligerent parties. The procedure for dispute resolution that is outlined here has already a name. It is called mediation. Using mediation is a rational option, deeply in compliance with the spirit and the instruments of traders. But even a regular mediation does not have a maximum efficiency in business - in our opinion -, but a special one. This paper tries to present certain aspects about such special mediation.

Features of the commercial mediation

The previous chapter of our paper enunciated some of the inconveniences of using legal means for settling commercial litigations. This chapter highlights how to surpass by mediation the inconveniences referred to and - in the same time - explores the targets and lines of a special regime of the commercial mediation, such as this idea has already been proclaimed at the end of previous chapter.

In our opinion, the main deficiency of the solution for commercial disputes' resolution in front of the Court is the risk regarding the Court decision. The legal mechanism, when this is chosen, supposes the dictate of a third party, namely the Court. Even in case of the existence and use of remedies at law that could correct the subjectivism or the mistake of the first instance, these do not eliminate the difficulties faced when identifying and imposing a correct solution. The luxuriance of the commercial facts and aspects, both quantitative and qualitative, make often difficult to include them in the abstract and simplifying patterns of law. Being busy with a lot of cases pending in front of the Court, with at most a superficial understanding of the field, organizing the cases according to some legal stereotypes, the judges are not always ruling correct solutions. It is a common joke that good commercial lawyers are not necessarily winning your lawsuits in front of the Court, but help you not to get there. Anyhow, many times the parties must take into account a risk of Court decision different from zero.

[4] Alina Gorghiu (coordonator) – "Medierea – oxigen pentru afaceri", Universul Juridic, Bucuresti, 2011, pp.127-128

[5] Douglas N. Frenkel, James H.Stark – "The Practice of Mediation", Wolters Kluwer, 2008, pp.119-124

Obviously, rationally thinking, the traders should eliminate such risk, if possible, by an alternative method, under certain conditions that make it efficient. A first condition for such alternative uses an asset of the legal proceeding itself: to draw on a third party when the mere dialogue between the parties has failed[6]. A second condition refers to the availability and commitment of the third party. This one should be actively and continuously involved, as long as necessary, for the exclusive purpose of settling the conflict. The third condition refers to the third party's expertise as regards the substance of the case. In order to understand and then to be an useful participant in settling the issue, the third party must have the competences and – ideally – the accepted experience specific to this field. Finally, the solution found is advisable not to be imposed, but validated by the parties' agreement. The alternative resembles to mediation. But a revised form of mediation.

The issue is that, in the commercial field, in many cases, we do not simply deal with a breach of the obligations, but in reality, at the beginning, with deadlocks and not with conflicts. The initial challenge is not to administer justice (as subjective as justice often is!), but to identify a way to surpass the above-mentioned deadlock. The impossibility or the difficulty to surpass in due time a crisis situation that occurred or to continue the normal course makes appear the conflicts, which shortly after become constant. As regards the commercial relation, justice cannot but decide post mortem and impersonally the liabilities. It makes an autopsy and not a therapy. Its intervention is no longer useful in reality but – at most – partially reparative. Again, an agreed solution, able to save the relation and make it operational, is the better one.

The important assets of canonic mediation are, of course, also awarded accordingly in the commercial field. The material values in dispute are often impressive. The expenses for settling the conflict (taxes, fees, expert reports, etc.) are incurred accordingly. Naturally, the substantial reduction of costs is wished and appreciated by traders. Also the celerity or confidentiality, which are the well-known advantages of the mediation.

As it may be noticed, strong reasons plead for using mediation in the field of commercial conflicts resolution. That is what happens in reality in the countries that are economically developed and have a tradition in this field. But why is this not happening at a larger scale, including in developing countries, such as Romania? Why is mediation still a Cinderella compared to the commercial arbitration that is the unchallenged international star of the ADR? In our opinion, two explications exist:

a) canonic mediation has a facilitating nature. Mediator is declared to be the third party who only restores the dialogue. Its part is to make some valves operational in order to release the adverse emotions and to restore the dialogue. Then the parties, relieved and finally capable to collaborate, will find the solutions.

This pattern is not operational in the commercial field. There are no emotions here. In addition, the parties communicated and incline to continue communicate. They have already tried, most often, to find the solutions together. They did not succeed. They need a third party to substantially contribute also as regards the substance, not only procedurally, to their identification or construction. A simple communicator is not enough for them. With its standard methods and its optimism and peace recipes, this one risks becoming slightly ridiculous. The mediator in the commercial field, taking the risk involved by such enormous enunciation, must be at least a valid interlocutor as to the substance of the issue of the parties in dispute.

[6] Douglas N. Frenkel, James H.Stark – "The Practice of Mediation", Wolters Kluwer, 2008, p.9

b) canonic mediation may fail[7]. In exchange, a lawsuit or arbitration ends with a solution. As long as the parties, for not reaching an agreement, may fail the mediation procedure, this risks becoming a loss of time. Moreover, the actual danger exists for them to divulgate their positions, defenses, evidence, which afterwards may be annihilated in Court. In addition, a Court decision or an arbitral award is easy to be made enforceable. In exchange, the management of the parties' behavior after mediation is more difficult to be made operational, and the mediator is practically no longer involved in the process. Its part was – wasn't it? - only to "conciliate" (for the moment?) the parties! This aspect is discouraging for the pragmatic, lucid traders.

The above-mentioned obstacle is difficult to surpass in mediation because it is correlated to an inherent feature of this one: its optional nature, including of adhering to the solution.

We are going to try in the next chapter to identify however some non-standard versions for resolving this major adverse aspect of using canonic mediation in the commercial field.

Similarities and differences between commercial mediation and canonic mediation

The previous chapter underlined two important theses:

- mediation is critically needed in the commercial field
- in order to be efficient and attractive, mediation in the commercial field must be redefined and improved in comparison to canonic mediation

For the purpose of answering the second thesis, this chapter tries to outline the differences between canonic mediation and what we define herein as being commercial mediation. We'll start by emphasizing once again the fundamental useful features of canonic mediation, and then we'll analyze which one is fit and which one is not for the commercial mediation. We mention once again that in this paper commercial mediation means a new procedure of approaching the mediation process in the commercial field, as we are going to define herein below and not the classical approach and application of mediation with facilitating nature in the commercial field (less different than the canonic mediation and – in our opinion – not enough efficient, at least in the countries with weak experience in the field of ADR, such as Romania).

(Canonic) mediation supposes[8]:

1 the existence of a dispute occurred between the parties
2. not using the legal proceeding for settling the dispute
3. the appointment of a third party which catalyzes finding a solution for resolution - the mediator
4. the mediator is impartial, independent and reputed
5. the mediator is not a specialist in law or does not use its legal knowledge
6. the mediator is not a specialist in the field of the substance of the case
7. the mediator has competencies, at least natural, in communication and psychology
8. the parties are under the influence of emotions and the lack of communication
9. the mediation process takes place according to a standard procedure (method)
10. the solution for the dispute resolution is sought by negotiation
11. the negotiation is based on interests and not on rights
12. no proofs are produced, no guilty parties are determined
13. the case is not analyzed nor assessed legally, not even by the mediator
14. no decisions are ruled

[7] Douglas N. Frenkel, James H.Stark – "The Practice of Mediation", Wolters Kluwer, 2008, p.126

[8] Cristopher W.Moore – "The Mediation Process – Practical Strategies for Resolving Conflict", 3-rd Edition, John Wiley & Sons, 2003, pp.43-55

15. the participation is voluntary
16. each party voluntarily adheres to the solution
17. the solution is generated in common by the parties
18. the mediator does not participate in the discovery or construction of the solution
19. the mediation process ceases as soon as the parties reach an agreement (or when the negotiations fail, as ascertained)
20. the part of the mediator is (exclusively)
a) to release emotions
b) to restore and ensure the dialogue
c) to formally conduct the works
d) to ensure going through the stages and performing the method

As regards the commercial mediation, following the order of the above-mentioned features, the following details and distinctions are necessary:

1. Obviously, commercial mediation may occur as a result of a dispute between the parties. As a rule, this is due to the failure to accomplish or the faulty accomplishment of a commercial obligation. It should be noticed however that such dispute is often translating the occurrence of a deadlock in the commercial relation between the parties, which can no longer take place as initially agreed by them. The deadlock may be most of times noticed prior to the failure of the commercial obligation, which this one precedes. It is the result of the issues faced by one of the parties, or maybe both of them.

Without questioning the behavior or the individual liability of the parties, the deadlock represents more critically an issue of the relation per se, than of the parties. More than in other conflicting situations, the question is not in the terms according to which the parties should have evolve and interfere peacefully in proximity, but that those traders had to work, in a broader sense, together. Therefore the intention is not to simply to extinguish, by mutual compromises, a conflict, but to really find solutions acceptable for both parties to solve a deadlock, during a joint activity.

That is why, in most cases, mediation in the commercial field is dedicated no so much to settle a dispute[9], but to identify a solution in order to surpass a deadlock. It is not about an understanding point where the parties may split, but a line that the parties understand to follow.

2. If an alternative solution is chosen for solving the relational crisis, the traders waive (at least temporarily) to use legal means.

3. In commercial mediation of course it is called on the services of a third party: the mediator.

4. The neutrality, independence and reputation are also in the commercial field conditions required for the mediator. Given that the mediation in the commercial field is mainly cerebral and not emotional, we mention that the first two aspects are more related to nature and less to essence. They must relate rather to the current procedure of the actual case resolution (based, for example, on a commitment). The third aspect is mainly pertaining to the competency and honesty (pragmatic aspects) and less to fame.

5. The lack of competence or of legal perspective or the agreed mediator's waiving to use the same does not represent, in our opinion, an advantage in commercial mediation, but rather a handicap. Without setting oneself up as a judge or lawyer, the mediator must understand the legal context of the conflict. He must be able to distinguish and to show the parties (individually) the risks they might face in justice and to assess the case (similarly to the evaluative mediation). Not accepting in discussion the legal aspects during a commercial mediation is deceitfully and may cause participants' mistrust or discontent. The cases have several sizes, among which the legal aspect is essential. A solution different from the legal one is searched, and not because the lawful aspects would not have a major importance, but for rational reasons that were talked about. But to ignore law is not realistic. In fact, it must operate as a pressure for those who hesitate or simulate, reminding them that it may come back in force unless a solution through mediation is not found.

[9] Cristopher W.Moore – "The Mediation Process – Practical Strategies for Resolving Conflict", 3-rd Edition, John Wiley & Sons, 2003, pp297-299

Moreover – we'll see –the possibility exists to use certain hybrid mediation branches, in which the mediator formulates a decision (facultative or mandatory).

6. The concept of general mediator, who is not a specialist in the field in which the mediation takes place, represents a hot spot in the mediation theory. The formula enounced is almost a taboo. It is deemed to be a mediation pattern in which the parties, on one hand, do not succeed (mostly because of emotions) to communicate, and on the other hand have a rigid, positional approach. The mediator should solve those difficulties, based on a panacea method, and then the parties, knowing the field, would find the solution, using joint efforts.

In the commercial field, in most cases, the approach described above is naive. The parties communicate and – in general – have prospected (individually or jointly) the unblocking solutions, but without success. They need a decision made by a third party, as it happens in the legal or arbitration field, or a reexamination of the theme along with a third party. In order for his intervention to virtually have success, until he suggests and uses the stock of techniques, a first condition is to have – at least – the competence[10].

7. The communication competences of the mediator are useful in commercial mediation, but these must not be transformed into fetishes. The psychological competences are a bonus, but not essential.

8. In commercial field, setting up communication between the parties does not usually represent an issue. Communication functions or has functioned until a certain moment. As a rule, the parties' adhesion to mediation is a prior consent for dialogue.

Emotions do not characterize either the affected relation between the parties. They represent, at most, an ingredient, should they be sincere, or otherwise a way to put pressure. Getting over or ignoring them is not an issue.

9. In commercial field, the standard method of carrying out the mediation process becomes difficult and inefficient. There are useless, formal stages and steps. Indeed, discipline and strictness of the mediation meetings, as well as planning the objectives continue to be useful. However, in our opinion, a (new) method is necessary, being inspired only by the classical one. We plead for a lighter approach of the cases per se and – if possible – which may be individualized. In our opinion, the emphasis must be on the techniques and procedures selected and used specifically in management and the commercial field.

10. The key of the commercial mediation is the negotiation, both based on interests, and the positional one (unlike the canonic mediation)[11].

11. A great common interest exists in the commercial field, that is to continue the relation between the parties. Also, there are similar interests regarding the celerity, confidentiality, minimizing the costs, etc. Together, they led to the selection of mediation as dispute resolution method. Even due to such reason, the interests are the principal factor taken into account. The rationality of the parties, the pragmatism specific to this field make us understand that rights are ancillary to the interests.

On the other hand, it must not be neglected the fact that the parties are aware of their rights and of the possibility (under given circumstances) to use them in justice. That is why they cannot be and will not be ignored. The parties do not enter as equals in the negotiation during the mediation process. They are charged with their (infringed) rights and their (unobserved) obligations. The interests form into desiderates, while the rights and obligations represent however the legal reality.

---

[10] Douglas N. Frenkel, James H.Stark – "The Practice of Mediation", Wolters Kluwer, 2008, pp.77-79

[11] Cristopher W.Moore – "The Mediation Process – Practical Strategies for Resolving Conflict", 3-rd Edition, John Wiley & Sons, 2003, p.252

This distinction is that the rights must come under the larger interests and that they may be reviewed (fully or partially capitalized) in a wider arrangement and not that they must be ignored or abandoned.

An approach which would claim to approach the rights in exchange of the interests is not only wrong, but could discourage the participation of traders in mediation. The solution would rather be to enlarge the negotiation area in order to identify new common interests which may compensate the current deficiencies.

In conclusion, the negotiation in the commercial field tends to use the current and future interests, based on the parties' current rights and obligations.

12. As a principle, the procedural methods related to the legal field are not used either in commercial mediation. The parties know each other's situation and agreed to jointly search for a solution, and this is based on an elementary good-faith. However, the possibility exists that certain aspects or facts be differently seen or construed. Under such circumstance, some evidence (for example, written deeds) or even expert reports might be necessary.

Also, the (joint) analysis of the situation and facts cannot ignore the unobserved obligations or the infringement of the rights, namely to determine, even in a declarative manner, of certain guilt, which must be compensated.

It must be added to all the above mentioned that (if necessary) in the hybrid versions in which a decision is ruled, the third party must be made available the investigation and administration methods.

13. The canonic mediation having a (purely) facilitating nature does not seem the most suitable for the commercial mediation. In our opinion, the mediation evaluative (and not only these!) elements must be added in this case.

14. In case the usual procedure is used, the solution in the commercial mediation is not ruled by the third party, but is jointly generated and accepted by the parties. The hybrid versions may bring new elements to this effect.

15. As in any mediation, the participation of the parties in the commercial mediation is voluntary.

16. The adhesion of the parties to the solution built during the mediation process is voluntary. Only in the hybrid versions of commercial mediation other possibilities may be held.

17. The commercial mediation preserves the nature and the advantage of the canonic mediation when the parties generate the solution, using analysis, debate and negotiation.

18. The most important change that we suggest, without being mandatory, for the commercial mediation practice is as regards the part played by the mediator in identifying/constructing the solution. We believe that the mediator's active participation is useful and particularly appreciated by the parties even in the activity of generating the solution. Such capacity, based the mediator's on competences and/or the experience in the basic or a related field, would be added to the part that this one plays anyhow to organize, order and manage the mediation process works. The lucid, objective, neutral and competent contributions are the major element that the traders search in fact when the negotiations among them have failed and they resort to the mediation.

Depending on the format and the provisions of the agreement between the actors, an evolution is possible also toward other hybrid forms of negotiation, in which, after using the means for the identification of an agreed solution, the third party acting as mediator or another person may make even a decision, either mandatory or to which the parties may voluntarily adhere.

19. One of the mediation's weak points which must be recognized is the legal force of the mediation agreement. Its investiture in justice supposes an additional procedure, likely to complicate and putting it in danger. Assuming a voluntary performance, as it is natural, the parties' comfort and trust would significantly rise if an authority supervising such process could operate. The mediator himself is the most suitable as he knows the case and the turns of its resolution, the particular features and the conditional aspects of the solution built, but also as his authority is recognized and consolidated in the process. Though, his part ends in case of a conventional mediation. As a complete formula of the commercial mediation will have to cover this deficiency also, completing the process with an after-mediation stage.

20. As already mentioned, besides the fundamental classical functions of the canonic mediator, we suggest in the commercial mediation also the parts of assessor, expert, solver, (possibly) arbiter, organizer and supervisor of the post – mediation process.

Thus, the mediator not only becomes liable for the communication between the parties and is the guide during the mediation procedure (a facilitator), but also actively involves himself in the practical resolution of the dispute.

The conclusions of the comparison in twenty points above will lead us in the next chapter to the definition of the new form of commercial mediation that our paper suggests.

Definition of the concept of special commercial mediation and its regime

The considerations developed in the previous chapters were meant to argue our thesis according to which mediation in the commercial field may be configured separately from the "regular" mediation. We called the first form of mediation "special commercial mediation" (briefly and only in this paper commercial mediation), and the second one, regular mediation or canonic mediation.

Obviously and essentially the commercial mediation is a form of mediation. That is why, the essential features of the canonic mediation are characterizing it too. They represent its proximal genre. What differentiates it from the canonic mediation is its specific distinction. We are going to briefly identify them herein below so that we define the concept of (special) commercial mediation we are going to present.

Thus, the commercial mediation has the following features that pertain to

a) the proximal genre (canonic mediation):

- represents an alternative for dispute resolution
- the participation of the parties is voluntary
- appeals to the participation of a third party (the mediator)
- the mediator is impartial or independent (towards the case)
- the solution is not (as a principle) imposed from outside
- the solution is built by negotiation of the parties
- the mediation process is conducted by the mediator
- the mediator uses and implements communication techniques between the parties
- the negotiation takes (also) into account the interests

b) the specific distinction:

- the general nature of the case is commercial
- the mediator may be actively involved in the process of building the solution[12]
- the mediator has legal expertise and may offer the parties a legal assessment of the case
- the mediator has the expertise and or the experience in the field of the substance of the case and/or in a related one[13]
- the negotiation takes (also) into account the rights
- the mediation process is simplified and focuses on generating options and building the solution
- in case of deadlock, a decision may be made by the third party, to which the parties may adhere

[12] Alina Gorghiu (coordonator) – "Medierea – oxigen pentru afaceri", Universul Juridic, Bucuresti, 2011, pp.229, 232

[13] Alina Gorghiu (coordonator) – "Medierea – oxigen pentru afaceri", Universul Juridic, Bucuresti, 2011, pp.127-128

- if necessary, the process may be settled (also) by assisted competitive negotiation
- it may be instrumented, with the parties' agreement, a procedure for post – mediation supervision, managed by the third party

Thus the definition being the (special) commercial mediation, related to the proximal genre and the identification of the specific distinction, there are two aspects we are going to detail hereinafter: its legal nature and functionality.

Legally speaking, the special laws of mediation are definitely covering the canonic mediation (with facilitating nature). That is what happens in Romania too. Although the law avoids defining it univocally, the way it is officially construed and practiced lead to its restrictive reading, such as it (only) allows to exercise the mediation with a facilitating nature.

The commercial mediation pattern (not so facilitating or not only with facilitating nature) that we suggested is not however just an exercise of imagination. It succeeds an analysis and represents a solution (if not the solution itself!) so that mediation operates in the commercial field. As this is defined and practiced today, simply facilitating, it is neither attractive nor efficient.

The laws are drafted in order to meet the needs of the reality and not to impose on the reality. That is why, our opinion follows the school of reasoning according to which what is useful and claimed by the economic reality must be allowed by the laws meant to favor it. Namely we adhere to the doctrine of the ascendant of the economic (of the real life) over the legal (the instrument). In this case, three solutions exist.

The first solution, the simplest and rational one, is another positive and permissive reading of the current law. Mediation must not transform itself into a dogma. That is, on one hand, in its essence, a right granted to the parties to settle themselves their disputes, and the law approves this. On the other hand, the same law regulates and gives stability to the profession of mediator, for the primary purpose of protecting the parties in conflict. That's all and nothing more. As regards how this thing takes place, here it should be the freedom that allows adapting it to the needs of those who are in conflict and to the arsenal specific to each mediator separately. In case of interpersonal disputes, of course psychology is necessary, as for other disputes, knowledge of law or economy is required, as it happens in the commercial field. It would be ridiculous to favor the first ones (because everybody knows psychology, don't they) and to prejudice the other ones, by generalizing the approaches in the field of inter-personal mediation at the level of the mediation for economic organizations. Such wide line of reading the law in favor of which we plea is, as a matter of fact, to our information, compatible with what happens in the countries having a developed mediation practice, where, besides mediation with facilitating nature, are also used the evaluative mediation, the transformative mediation, the narrative mediation, etc.

The second solution, more complicated, is amending and complementing the law. With a view to the future law, it should be expressly defined other forms of mediation too in order to settle the disputes among professionals, such as the commercial mediation. The text formulas that might be adopted are either those generically permissive (which are preferred), or those elaborate and specific.

Finally, the third solution is to relate to common law and not to the special mediation law. Mediation, as an agreement between the parties, was able to operate (and still operates in some countries) also without a special law. it may be seen as an agreement between the parties and the mediator, under the conditions of the mediation process as provided by the contract. The freedom to extinguish conflicts by negotiation is natural; in addition common law provides even a special institution to this effect, namely the transaction. Then, there are even professionals, such as lawyers, who have a general vocation for mediation, not expressly circumstantiated within the strict framework of a law, such as mediation law.

So, the solutions for recognizing and practicing the special commercial mediation, such as defined herein, exist under the versions above or a combination thereof.

By the end we'll make some brief references also to the instruments indicated to be used during the commercial mediation.

As already mentioned, besides the formal aspects relating to the process' organization and initiation, some of the stages of the classical mediation process are no longer necessary or their importance or the time spent on them during the procedure is going to decrease.

The central part of the process will be represented by the actual construction of the dispute resolution solution. The methods used relate to the technique of group analysis and to the decisions theory[14]. The mediator must be able (including by persuasion) to transform the parties from an antagonist duo, into a working group. In relation to this aspect, the communication and psychological techniques are intensely used. A special attention will be paid to the mediations with multiple parties.

There are two possible evolutions of such process. In the favorable situation when the efforts of the mediator succeed and the parties accept to cooperate in aiming to accomplish a joint solution, the next step is to generate options. Now, it is a negotiation based on interests. The techniques used usually are those of brainstorming or collective management of decisions. A provocative, modern and creative method is, for example, the technique of parallel thinking. The mediator will participate actively, using in a constructive manner its competences in the legal field and in the field of the substance of the case.

In the less happy situation, when the parties still remain on different positions (the second possible evolution), the mediator will assist them and organize the framework of a competitive negotiation. In order to avoid the risks of confrontation, the technique recommended to be used with priority is that of individual discussions (caucus), when, on one hand, the mediator will be the messenger of the parties' suggestions, and on the other hand will interactively assess with each party the legal situations separately, as newly configured.

Finally, in case no solution is accepted by both parties after using both versions, if they accept and if evidence has been produced during the procedures, the third party may rule a solution itself. Such solution may be accepted voluntarily or mandatorily, or may be used as a reference for another (final) stage of negotiations. The above-mentioned development is included in a broader concept of hybrid ADR called med-arb ("mediation&arbitration")[15].

Both the solutions of prescriptive accommodation as well as the techniques around the special commercial mediation are to be detailed in a future research. These have been formulated above, just as examples and not restrictively, complementing and adjusting the new concept suggested hereunder.

Conclusions

This paper tries to identify a solution for making the mediation process in the commercial field more efficient. The presentation strategy follows a practice – theory – practice path. It starts from remarks regarding the appetence, which can be and is ascertained, for mediation of the commercial field, and from practical remarks regarding its specific nature and desiderates. A theoretical table was drafted with the features of the classical mediation and the similarities and differences between this one and the commercial mediation were analyzed according to the doctrine. A concept of a new form of mediation resulted, namely the special commercial mediation. Finally, an attempt was made for identifying the most suitable formula of legal accommodation of the method and some practical approaches of the method have been suggested.

The results of the research are likely to stimulate the optimism as regards the viability and feasibility of the newly suggested formula of mediation in the commercial field.

We think that the global result of the research should have an impact and possibly to cause controversies which are prolific from the point of view of the debates on ideas among the mediators.

[14] Alina Gorghiu (coordonator) – "Medierea – oxigen pentru afaceri", Universul Juridic, Bucuresti, 2011, p.235

[15] Christian Buhring-Uhle – "Arbitration and Mediation in International Business", Kluwer Law International BV, The Netherlands, 2006, pp.148-152

We hope that it will be convincing and that the newly suggested paradigm will conquer the dogmas or the prejudices in this field and will have a liberating effect.

The new pattern of commercial mediation will be lighter, more fitted, more efficient. The reshaped mediation would correspond to a greater extent to the needs of the traders' conflicts resolution, would attract more cases in front of the Court, which would be settled to a greater extent and more convincing. Also, we hope that in this way we'll stimulate actual, substantial and intellectual debates among practitioners, jurists and representatives of the business environment.

The future research activities will be able first of all to deepen and to test the concept, to check its theses. Secondly, an actual way of accommodation to the current legal framework must be found. A study will be conducted to see to what extent the concept is supported by the special law of mediation, if necessary, as an alternative, taking into account only the regular commercial laws and not the special ones, or if it is necessary to amend the special laws in this field.

The efforts for theoretical drafting and the practical tests will outline the structure of the related procedure and the combination of facilitating, evaluative techniques and of hybrid procedures which will equip it.

References

- Cristopher W.Moore – "The Mediation Process – Practical Strategies for Resolving Conflict", 3-rd Edition, John Wiley & Sons, 2003
- Douglas N. Frenkel, James H.Stark – "The Practice of Mediation", Wolters Kluwer, 2008
- Jennifer E.Beer, Eileen Stief – "The Mediation Handbook", New Society Publishers, 1997
- Mary Greenwood – "How to Mediate Like a Pro", iUniverse, 2008
- Christian Buhring-Uhle – "Arbitration and Mediation in International Business", Kluwer Law International BV, The Netherlands, 2006
- Alina Gorghiu (coordonator) – "Medierea – oxigen pentru afaceri", Universul Juridic, Bucuresti, 2011
- Ana Ludusan – "Medierea conflictelor", Editura Studium, Cluj-Napoca, 2010

DIVISIONS AND SEGREGATIONS OF THE PATRIMONY

CRISTIAN GHEORGHE[1]

Abstract
For a long time, dispute resolution and alternative techniques like mediation have been dealing with a classic conception: every part involved in dispute resolution was carrying exactly one patrimony. Irrespective of physical or moral person the rule was the same: one person, one patrimony.
Alternative dispute resolution, like mediation, dealt with persons in order to reach a mutual agreement affecting their unique patrimony.
The rule is already history. Still remain the first premise: every person has a patrimony. But under present Civil code the provision is stopping here. As a result, the uniqueness of the patrimony vanished from new law.
Dealing with different patrimonies a dispute solver should be able to understand the new notion and to assist the parties to finals agreements according to the rules of the divisions of the patrimony.
First at all we should observe that any division of the patrimony of a person have to have a legal basis. The "liberalisation" of the patrimony is not so advanced in order to accept any voluntary division of the patrimony of the person.
Second, the prominent creation in this field are represented by fiducia (a kind of Anglo-Saxon trust concept) and assigned patrimony. Fiducia is new for our legal system only, following in fact the Quebec civil code regulation.
The assigned patrimony was already been present in our legislation. The Ordinance no 44/2008 was dealing with this concept in commercial field.

Keywords: patrimony, assigned patrimony, new civil code, mediation, trust.

Introduction

Mediation is now widely accepted as an effective method of resolving disputes. Mediation has recognized advantages than ordinary court proceedings: is faster, cheaper, even more trusted and easier accepted by parties.

Mediation avoids parties' confrontation inherent in judicial proceedings and allows the parties to keep their business, professional or personal relationships beyond the dispute. Mediation also enables the parties to find their own, creative solutions to their dispute, usually not rendered by court judging strictly by law.

Mediation is well-fitted for civil and commercial law branches, (although other law branches are not excluded) in patrimonial disputes. The main premise for mediation is the economic character of the dispute, the money expressed claims parties can dispose of. The concept of patrimony, the extent of the assets parties can dispose of is very important in such settlements, mutual agreements involved by mediation process.

The concept of patrimony and its extent is changing dramatically now, according with new Civil Code. Observing this new concept is important for law scholars and practitioners in mediation (mediators) in order to understand the border of the individual patrimony which settlements can affect.

We intend to define the new concept of patrimony as the aggregate of the person's economic rights and obligations and its relation with enterprises and persons (natural and legal).

Old theory of the patrimony. Classic doctrine.

First of all we are dealing with a civil-law system concept (in common-law system the concept is related with inheritance), the total of all personal and real entitlements, including movable and immovable property, belonging to a natural person or a juristic (legal) person; in some respects the concept is similar to the common-law concept of a person's estate.

[1] Senior Lecturer, Ph. D., "Nicolae Titulescu" University, (email: cristiangheorghe@gmail.com).

Old civil law doctrine follows a simple principle: every juridical person (natural or moral person) has just one patrimony. It means there aren't a patrimony without a corresponding person as well as there aren't a person without a patrimony.

The general principle of the old civil law doctrine on patrimony stated the uniqueness of the patrimony[2]. Every person has exactly one patrimony conferred by his legal status.

Classic theory of patrimony pursues to full identification of patrimony with legal capacity (personality) claiming that nothing remains outside the patrimony. As legal capacity may remain just a latent concept till future events, the patrimony can be only an abstraction, an "empty bag" ever ready to receive further legal effects of acts and deeds.

Critique of this doctrine tempered these allegations making distinction between abstract legal personality and patrimony which must remain close to the "contingent reality". Emphasizing monetary value of the rights and obligations of a person, elements of the patrimony, the differences between this notion and legal personality are better underlined.

Uniqueness of the patrimony theory has always created difficulties in explaining practical realities. Concept such patrimony of affectation (distinct division of a patrimony reserved for a recognized purpose), tendencies of identifying a group of goods and individual rights within a patrimony, all these were struck by the uniqueness of the patrimony inflexibility and had to retreat in front of the prestige and infallibility of this theory.

At present, in the civil law approach, the patrimony of affectation is a patrimony, or legal entitlement, that can be divided for a purpose, as being distinct from the general patrimony of the person. The corresponding common law approach of the concept is trust in some aspects where property is held by an administrator for the benefit of third parties. The property remains entirely outside the patrimony of the grantor, thus if the grantor become bankrupt or has liabilities, the property remains untouchable and may continue to benefit the intended beneficiaries.

The new patrimony theory in the new Civil Code.

The new regulation of the patrimony is stepping apart from the old approach. Every person still has a patrimony. There isn't a person without a patrimony.

This notion, patrimony, as defined in Civil Code, comprises all rights and obligations of a person that can be valued in money[3]. Further, this legal concept evolves and allows distinct patrimony masses, separated within the general patrimony of a person and delimitated by a purpose according to the law.

Civil Code imported into national law the concept of fiducia following the "trust" concept from common-law system. In this case, by his will, the grantor conveys a distinct mass of assets to a person (administrator, trustee) on behalf of a beneficiary (which may be the grantor itself, the trustee or a third person). The trustee holds or manages and invests assets for the benefit of another. These [2] The uniqueness of the patrimony theory has a long life in juridical doctrine, starting with its founders: Charles Aubry, Charles Rau, Cours de droit civil français (1839-46). The core provisions of the theory are: every patrimony belong to a person; every person has a patrimony which cannot be divided in distinct groups of rights. Against this theory has raised the assigned patrimony theory which basically stated the independence between patrimony and legal personality. The division of a patrimony is built from its the goals: a person should be free to assign part of his patrimony to different activities. Accordingly, a person can possess many patrimony masses delimitated by his authorized activities.

C. Bîrsan, "Drept civil. Drepturile reale principale", ALL Beck, Bucureşti, 2001, p. 1-28; V. Stoica, "Noţiunea juridica de patrimoniu", "Pandectele Române", G. Luţescu, "Teoria generala a drepturilor reale", Bucureşti, 1947, p. 9-80.

[3] Civil Code, Art. 31 al. 1.

assets are his property till the termination of the contract (trust) but they remain distinct from his own patrimony.

Other new situation appears in the collective enterprise (simple partnership) case. Such enterprise doesn't enjoy the legal person status. It remains a partnership. But such enterprise has capital stock and an own patrimony consisting of the individual contributions of the associates.

It is generally acknowledged for a company (legal person status) that for all legal purposes the assets of the company shall constitute a separate estate from the personal assets of the founders (associates, shareholders). But a collective enterprise in the form of association (simple partnership) isn't a legal person. It remains a partnership. In such circumstances we encounter a case when a patrimony is recognised beyond the legal person status. This is an inflexion point between old and new regulation in civil and commercial matters.

The simple partnership enjoys the occurrence of a distinct patrimony[4] which is actually difficult to understand without a legal person status. Creditors of the enterprise have to execute these assets first. Still they have a second option in case of lack of assets; they are allowed to ask the partners to indemnify them, following an ingenious rule: each partner have to indemnify creditors with its own assets "proportionally with its contribution to the patrimony of the enterprise, only if the creditor could not be satisfied with the assets of the enterprise". In this way the obligations of the partnership is guaranteed in the end with the associates' patrimonies.

Any mediation process shall observe the limits imposed by this mechanism. Personal asset are not in safe harbour for persons who establish a collective enterprise in the „simple partnership" form. The solution of the parties exposed in a mediation process, under mediator surveillance, shall observe the new concept of the patrimony of the enterprise, with its legal bounds.

Patrimony divisions.

New Civil Code innovates once again by recognition of divisions of the individual patrimony within the unique classic personal patrimony.

Assigned assets of the general patrimony are regulated as fiduciary property (trust) and assets affected to authorized profession practice; besides these situations the law allows the creation of such patrimony divisions subject to strict legal regulation ("other patrimonies determined by law"[5]). Patrimony divisions shall be strictly regulated; they are not governed by person's free will.

Fiducia is a purely civil concept, available to any person (underwriter) which transfers rights (property rights, receivable, securities or other property rights or an ensemble of such rights, present or future) to one or more person (trustee). All these transferred rights remain distinct in the trustee's patrimony; they constitute a separate division, forming an autonomous mass inside trustee's patrimony distinct from other trustee's rights and obligations.

The division of the patrimony involved in a trust (fiducia) scheme is reflected primarily in creditors' rights for each patrimony division. Therefore the trustee's personal creditors cannot execute assets from fiduciary patrimony; they are not reachable for these creditors. Symmetrically, creditors whose claims are derived from the exploitation of the trust can execute assets from this patrimony division only.

Patrimony divisions operate therefore as effective barriers which limit the liability of the person up to specially constituted property mass.

The question is whether such a provision acts for any patrimony division. The answer will be given after observing the situation of professionals (persons which operate enterprises).

[4] Ibidem, Art. 1920.
[5] Ibidem, Art. 31 al. 3.

Patrimony of affectation.

From commercial point of view the relevant concept concerning the patrimony division is assigned patrimony ('patrimony of affectation' in civil-law system). Under the Civil Code, the assigned patrimonies are represented by fiduciary property, patrimonies affected for authorized professions and other patrimonies determined by law[6].

Patrimony divisions include those patrimony affected for authorized professions. The law stated on these professions referring to professional entities which enjoy a special regulation, including the individual forms of practicing (lawyers, notaries, bailiffs, mediators, doctors, architects, etc.) Under civil law, the formation of the assigned patrimony established in order to individually practice an authorized profession is done by the act concluded by the holder according to special law. Termination of this patrimony (liquidation of individual affected patrimony) is in line with similar provisions governing the simple partnership unless the law provides otherwise. This rule raises questions about the professionals' situation. Accordingly, if individual enterprise is involved, does it enjoy the legal status of the assets within assigned patrimony affected for authorized profession or its legal situation is different.

Finally the question is whether the professional's situation subsumes the notion of authorized profession. Does the professional pursue an authorized profession or not? In the old classic commercial doctrine the trader's situation was considered that of a person who exercises acts of trade as a profession (as a usual occupation). Trading activities used to have a broad recognition as profession irrespective the fact that "authorized professions" was concerned then as well as now with those occupations organized in the form of legal and professional bodies.

Sill, under present Civil Code the professionals, as traders' successors, are not pursuing an "authorized profession" and the rules governing the assigned patrimony affected for individual practice doesn't cover the situation of the professional, the patrimony affected for exploitation of an enterprise. The distinction conducts to different legal effects.

Rules on patrimony divisions.

Accepting patrimony divisions makes it necessary to observe the relationship between property rights and obligations derived from each patrimony divisions.

Prohibition of balancing rights ad obligations born in different patrimony divisions. Generally speaking when the quality of creditor and debtor belongs to the same person the obligation shall be extinguished by confusion. This rule ceases when different patrimony divisions are involved[7].

The transfer between different patrimony divisions are subject to private creditors rights. The occurrence of property divisions appears with clarity when transfers of rights between these divisions are intended. The rule of law is that the transfer of rights and obligations from a patrimony division to another should not harm the creditors' rights from each patrimony division (and comply with the requirements laid down by law for such divisions).

We cannot speak of a ban, but a test. Any prejudice inflicted to creditors is a barrier for rights and obligations transfer from a patrimonial division to another[8].

Legal protection of assets in case of trust and patrimony of affectation for authorized professions.

Civil Code has rules for possible interactions between patrimony divisions. Situation of a trust (fiduciary patrimony) and authorized professions (patrimony of affectation) is comparable.

Common rule for any obligations is that the debtor is required to cover his obligation with all his "movable and immovable, present and future"[9] that serve as the joint guarantee of its creditors.

[6] Ibidem, Art. 31 al. 3.
[7] Civil Code, Art. 1624.
[8] Ibidem, Art. 32.

Despite such general rule, the assets subject to an assigned patrimony affected for an authorized profession practice may be executed by creditors whose claims have been born about the profession only. Even more, these creditors cannot pursue other assets of the debtor[10].

As stated, the assigned patrimony established due to an authorized profession practice results gives rise to a true separation of patrimonies: the „professional" creditors are not entitled to person's personal assets and the person's personal creditors are not entitled to any claim upon assigned patrimony for authorized profession.

Such situation must be considered a legal benefit for person who exercising authorized profession who finds a safe harbour for his personal property against any obligations arising from exercising his profession.

Assigned patrimony regarding professionals (undertaking economic activities) who operate a sole proprietorship (individual) enterprise.

According to the law this category of commercial law subjects shall not enjoy the separation of patrimonies benefit granted to persons authorized to exercise a profession.

The rule is that creditors whose claims have been born about a particular patrimony division are obliged to raise claims upon this patrimony division first. But if such assets (from the patrimony division) fail to cover all the claims the creditors will pierce through the assigned patrimony veil. They are permitted to pursue other assets of the debtor up to the value of their claims[11].

This is the legal position for all individual subjects of commercial law (individual economic enterprises). The assigned patrimony recognized for these professionals is clarified by other existing special rules[12]. Consequently, the assigned patrimony in commercial matters is defined as "all assets, rights and obligations of an authorized individual, business owner or individual members of the family business, affected the purpose of exercising an economic activity, constituted as a distinct part of the natural person's patrimony, separate from the general pledge recognized to their personal creditors."[13]

We find out in the end that the personal creditors and the creditors of the individual enterprise compete on the same assets. The obvious rule laid down herein is included in special regulation too, that person (professional) is responsible for his commercial obligations up to his assigned patrimony and, in addition, with all his assets[14].

Conclusions

Mediation (like any alternative dispute resolution) involves a social interaction in order to reach, under mediator assistance, a mutual agreement between persons affecting their patrimonies.

Under Civil Code the provisions the old uniqueness of the patrimony theory was replaced by a more flexible approach including patrimony divisions.

Dealing with different patrimony divisions a mediator should be able to understand the new notion and to assist the parties to finals agreements according to the rules of the divisions of the patrimony.

A mediator should observe that any division of the patrimony of a person have to have a legal basis and voluntary division of the patrimony are prohibited. Second, the prominent creation in this field is represented by fiducia (a kind of Anglo-Saxon trust concept) and patrimony of affectation.

---

[9] Ibidem, Art. 2324 al. 1.

[10] Ibidem, Art. 2324 al. 4.

[11] Civil Code, Art. 2324, al. 3.

[12] GO no 44/2008 regarding economic activities undertook by authorized individual, individual enterprise and family enterprise, with further modification.

[13] Ibidem, Art. 2

[14] Ibidem, Art. 20 (for authorized individual), Art. 26 (for individual enterprise), Art. 34 (for family enterprise).

These cases only operate a real and total division of the patrimony of a person with all the legal effects.

References

- Civil Code, Law no 287/2009,
- Law regarding implementation Civil Code, Law no 71/2011,
- G. Beleiu, Drept civil român. Introducere în dreptul civil. Subiectele dreptului civil, Bucharest: Universul Juridic, 2007;
- G. Boroi, Drept civil. Partea generala. Persoanele, Bucharest All Beck, 2008;
- G. Boroi, L. Stanciulescu, Institutii de drept civil in reglementarea noului Cod civil, Bucharest: Hamangiu, 2012,
- St. D. Cărpenaru, Tratat de drept comercial român, Bucharest: Universul Juridic, 2009;
- Fr. Deak, St. D. Cărpenaru, Contracte civile şi comerciale, Bucharest: Lumina Lex, 1993;
- M. Djuvara, Teoria generală a dreptului, Bucharest: All, 1995;
- C. Hamangiu, I.Rosetti-Bălănescu, Al. Băicoianu, Tratat de Drept Civil Român, Bucharest: All, 1996.
- I.L. Georgescu, Drept comercial român, Bucharest: All Beck, 2002;
- C. Gheorghe, Drept comercial european, Bucharest: C.H. Beck, 2009;
- Gh. Piperea, Drept comercial, Bucharest: C.H. Beck, 2008;
- C. Stătescu, C. Bîrsan, Drept civil, Teoria generală a obligaţiilor, Bucharest: Hamangiu, 2008;
- V. Stoica, Drept civil. Drepturile reale principale, Bucharest: Humanitas, 2006;
- I. Turcu, Tratat teoretic şi practic de drept comercial, Bucharest: C.H. Beck, Bucureşti, 2008, 2009.

THE ADVANTAGES OF USING A COLLABORATIVE INFRASTRUCTURE IN VIRTUAL ENTERPRISES

ADINA-GEORGETA CRETAN*

Abstract
The purpose of this work is to provide a collaboration support for small and medium enterprises which cannot or do not want to fulfill a major contract alone. In that case, in order to better meet a higher external demand, the managers are willing to subcontract parts of their contracts even to competitors.
This approach is illustrated by a business-to-business interaction, being proposed a sample scenario where partners are autonomous gas stations grouped in a virtual enterprise (VE). In such a VE, we present a schematic example of a collaboration process using negotiation and coordination mechanisms that we proposed in this paper.

Keywords: SME, B2B interaction, subcontracting, cooperation, collaboration.*

1. Introduction

Recent advances in the information technology have made possible the development of a new type of organization, the virtual organization. Taking into account the connection between the new communication technologies and the relationships between the industrial organizations, two main directions are distinguished. The first direction considers the Internet and the Informatics as being the main technologies that facilitate the communication between persons. The second direction, more visionary, is focused not only on the communication but mainly on the modalities that allow the information technologies to coordinate in an efficient fashion and with minimal effort requirements the activities of individuals.

Related to the second direction, the concept of "Virtual Enterprise (VE)" or "Network of Enterprises" has emerged to identify the situation when several independent companies decided to collaborate and establish a virtual organization with the goal of increasing their profits. Camarinha-Matos defines the concept of VE as follows: "A Virtual Enterprise (VE) is a temporary alliance of enterprises that come together to share skills and resources in order to better respond to business opportunities and whose cooperation is supported by computer networks"[1].

Given this general context, the objective of the present paper is to develop a conceptual framework and the associated informational infrastructure that are necessary to facilitate the collaboration activities and, in particular, the negotiations between independent organizations that participate in a virtual alliance.

The starting point in the development of this work was the goal to support small and medium enterprises that are not able or are not willing to perform alone a large contract since in this situation the association in a virtual alliance provides the opportunity to subcontract the tasks of the contract to other partners within the alliance. To achieve this goal, research was dedicated to the development of a model to coordinate the negotiations that take place within an inter-organizational alliance. Our research was focused on the topics of virtual alliances, automation of the negotiations and of coordination aimed to provide the mechanisms for coordinating the negotiations that take place among autonomous enterprises that are grouped in a virtual alliance.

* Assistant Lecturer Ph. D., „Nicolae Titulescu" University, Computer Science Department (email: adinacretan@univnt.ro).

[1] Camarinha-Matos L.M. and Afsarmanesh H.,(2004), Collaborative Networked Organizations, Kluwer Academic Publisher Boston.

Assuming that the nature of the roles that may be played in a negotiation are similar in multiple approaches, the number of participants involved at the same time in the same negotiation is considerably different.

Depending on the number of participants involved in a negotiation, we may distinguish various negotiation types: bilateral negotiation (one-to-one); one-to-many negotiation; many-to-many negotiation.

Taking into account the complexity of the negotiations modeled by multi-agent system, we can state that to conduct in an efficient fashion one or many negotiations that involve a large number of participants and to properly account for all negotiation dimensions, it is necessary to develop a coordination process that is defined outside of the specific constraints of a given decision mechanism or communication protocol.

The negotiation process was exemplified by scenarios tight together by a virtual alliance of the autonomous gas stations. Typically, these are competing companies. However, to satisfy the demands that go beyond the vicinity of a single gas station and to better accommodate the market requirements, they must enter in an alliance and must cooperate to achieve common tasks. The type of alliance that we use to define their association emphasizes that each participant to this alliance is completely autonomous i.e., it is responsible of its own amount of work and the management of its resources. The manager of a gas station wants to have a complete decision-making power over the administration of his contracts, resources, budget and clients. At the same time, the manager attempts to cooperate with other gas stations to accomplish the global task at hand only through a minimal exchange of information. This exchange is minimal in the sense that the manager is in charge and has the ability to select the information exchanged.

When a purchasing request reaches a gas station, the manager analyses it to understand if it can be accepted, taking into account job schedules and resources availability. If the manager accepts the purchasing request, he may decide to perform the job locally or to partially subcontract it, given the gas station resource availability and technical capabilities. If the manager decides to subcontract a job, he starts a negotiation within the collaborative infrastructure with selected participants. In case that the negotiation results in an agreement, a contract is settled between the subcontractor and the contractor gas station, which defines the business process outsourcing jobs and a set of obligation relations among participants[2].

The gas station alliance scenario shows a typical example of the SME virtual alliances where partner organizations may be in competition with each other, but may want to cooperate in order to be globally more responsive to market demand.

The collaborative infrastructure, that we describe, should flexibly support negotiation processes respecting the autonomy of the partners.

We are starting with a presentation in Section 2 of a VE life cycle model. Then, we are briefly describing in Section 3 the architecture of the collaboration system in which the interactions take place.

The main objective of this paper is to propose a collaboration framework in a dynamical system with autonomous organizations. In Section 4 we define the Coordination Components that manage different negotiations which may take place simultaneously.

In Section 5 we present how the structure of the negotiation process can be used by describing a particular case of negotiation. Finally, Section 6 concludes this paper.

[2] Singh M.P., (1997) Commitments among autonomous agents in information-rich environments. In Proceedings of the 8th European Workshop on Modelling Autonomous Agents in a Multi-Agent World (MAAMAW), pp. 141–155

2. The main steps of the Virtual Enterprise life cycle

The life cycle of virtual enterprise is classified into six phases. The relevance in different phases is shown in Figure 1 and the statement for each phase is given as follows:

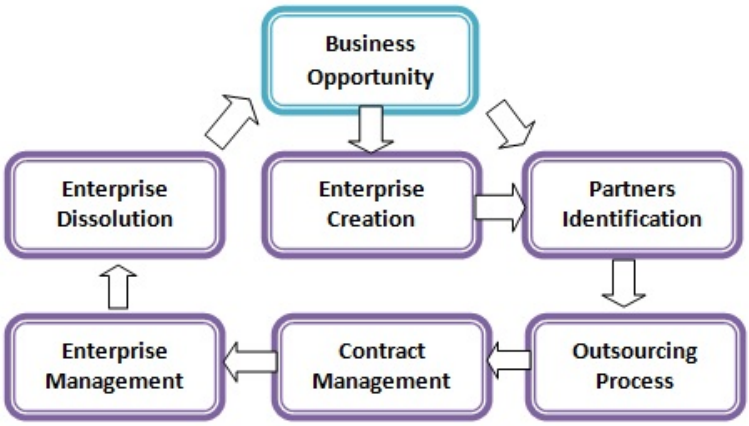

Figure 1. Life-cycle of a virtual enterprise

a) VE creation

When a business opportunity is detected, there is a need to plan and create the VE, identify partners, establish the contract or cooperation agreement among partners, in order to manage the processes of the VE.

b) Partners search and selection

The selection of business partners is a very important and critical activity in the operation of a company. Partners search can be based on a number of different information sources, being private, public, or independent. The enterprise's private suppliers' list is a data repository that contains information about the companies that have had commercial relationships with this enterprise. This information composes an Internal Suppliers Directory (ISD). External sources include directories maintained by industrial associations, commerce chambers, or Internet services. This information composes the External Suppliers Directory (ESD). Another emerging solution is the creation of clusters of enterprises that agreed to cooperate and whose skills and available resources are registered in a common SME Cluster Directory (CD).

c) Outsourcing of tasks within a VE

In this stage of a VE life cycle, we can assume that a gas station company receives a customer demand. In this respect, the Manager of this company may negotiate the outsourcing of a schedule tasks that cannot perform locally with multiple partners of selected gas station companies, geographically distributed. The Manager can select the partners of the negotiation among the database possible partners according to their declared resources and the knowledge he has about them.

The outcome of a negotiation can be "success" (the task was fully outsourced), "failure" (no outsourcing agreement could be reached) or "partial" (only part of the task could be outsourced).

d) Contract management in the VE

In case the negotiation process ends in a successful, a contract is established between the outsourcing company and the insourcing ones. The contract is a complex object, which is based of trust in this coordination mechanism. Moreover, it contains a set of specific rules, such as penalties, expressing obligation relations between the participants.

In case of failure of a partner, the Manager will have to supervise if the obligations are honored (for example to oblige the partner to finish his work or to set penalties) and to modify the business process renegotiating parts of the work that have not been realized.

e) Management of the VE

A VE is a dynamic entity in which a new company may join or leave it. Members may need to leave for many reasons, when they change their activity or when they don't want any more to collaborate with the partners of the VE. In case of departure from the VE, the leaving partner may either notify all the partners. It also may leave without giving any information. The departure of a partner from the VE will have an important impact on ongoing contracts especially when this partner is an insourcer of an important amount of task.

f) VE dissolution - after stopping the execution of the business processes.

3. The Collaborative Infrastructure

The main objective of this software infrastructure is to support collaborating activities in virtual enterprises. In VE partners are autonomous companies with the same object of activity, geographically distributed.

Taking into consideration, the constraints imposed by the autonomy of participants within VE, the only way to share information and resources is the negotiation process.

Figure 2 shows the architecture of the collaborative system:

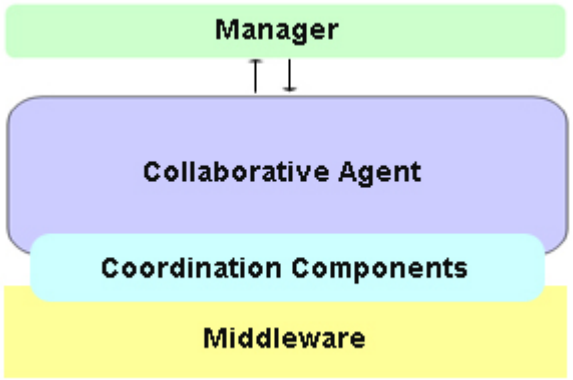

Figure 2. The architecture of the collaborative system

This infrastructure is structured in four main layers[3]: Manager, Collaborative Agent, Coordination Components and Middleware. A first layer is dedicated to the Manager of each organization of the alliance. A second layer is dedicated to the Collaborative Agent who assists its gas station manager at a global level (negotiations with different participants on different jobs) and at a specific level (negotiation on the same job with different participants) by coordinating itself with the Collaborative Agents of the other partners through the fourth layer, Middleware[4]. The third layer,

[3] Cretan A., Coutinho C., Bratu B. and Jardim-Goncalves R., (2011), A Framework for Sustainable Interoperability of Negotiation Processes. Paper submitted to INCOM'12 14th IFAC Symposium on Information Control Problems in Manufacturing.

[4] Bamford J.D., Gomes-Casseres B., and Robinson M.S., (2003), Mastering Alliance Strategy: A Comprehensive Guide to Design, Management and Organization. San Francisco: Jossey-Bass, pp. 27-38

Coordination Components, manages the coordination constraints among different negotiations which take place simultaneously.

A Collaborative Agent aims at managing the negotiations in which its own gas station is involved (e.g. as initiator or participant) with different partners of the alliance.

Each negotiation is organized in three main steps: initialization; refinement of the job under negotiation and closing[5]. The initialization step allows to define what has to be negotiated (Negotiation Object) and how (Negotiation Framework)[6]. A selection of negotiation participants can be made using history on passed negotiation, available locally or provided by the negotiation infrastructure[7]. In the refinement step, participants exchange proposals on the negotiation object trying to satisfy their constraints[8]. The manager may participate in the definition and evolution of negotiation frameworks and objects[9]. Decisions are taken by the manager, assisted by his Collaborative Agent[10]. For each negotiation, a Collaborative Agent manages one or more negotiation objects, one framework and the negotiation status. A manager can specify some global parameters: duration; maximum number of messages to be exchanged; maximum number of candidates to be considered in the negotiation and involved in the contract; tactics; protocols for the Collaborative Agent interactions with the manager and with the other Collaborative Agents [11].

4. Coordination Components

In order to handle the complex types of negotiation scenarios, we propose five different components[12]:

- Subcontracting (resp. Contracting) for subcontracting jobs by exchanging proposals among participants known from the beginning;
- Block component for assuring that a task is entirely subcontracted by the single partner;
- Divide component manages the propagation of constraints among several slots, negotiated in parallel and issued from the split of a single job;
- Broker: a component automating the process of selection of possible partners to start the negotiation;
- Transport component implements a coordination mechanism between two ongoing negotiations in order to find and synchronize on the common transport of both tasks.

These components are able to evaluate the received proposals and, further, if these are valid, the components will be able to reply with new proposals constructed based on their particular coordination constraints[13].

---

[5] Sycara K., (1991), Problem restructuring in negotiation, in Management Science, 37(10), pp.24-32.

[6] Smith R., and Davis R., (1981), Framework for cooperation in distributed problem solving. IEEE Transactions on Systems, Man and Cybernetics, SMC-11, pp. 42-57.

[7] Zhang X. and Lesser V., (2002), Multi-linked negotiation in multi-agent systems. In Proc. of AAMAS, Bologna, pp. 1207 – 1214.

[8] Barbuceanu M. and Wai-Kau Lo, (2003), Multi-attribute Utility Theoretic Negotiation for Electronic Commerce. In AMEC III, LNAI, pp. 15-30.

[9] Keeny R. and Raiffa H., (1976), Decisions with Multiple Objectives: Preferences and Value Tradeoffs. JohnWilley & Sons.

[10] Bui V. and Kowalczyk R., On constraint-based reasoning in e-negotiation agents. In AMEC III, LNAI 2003, pp. 31-46.

[11] Faratin P., (2000), Automated service negotiation between autonomous computational agent. Ph. D. Thesis, Department of Electronic Engineering Queen Mary & West-field College.

[12] Cretan A., Coutinho C., Bratu B. and Jardim-Goncalves R., (2011), A Framework for Sustainable Interoperability of Negotiation Processes. Paper submitted to INCOM'12 14th IFAC Symposium on Information Control Problems in Manufacturing.

[13] Vercouter, L., (2000), A distributed approach to design open multi-agent system. In 2nd Int. Workshop Engineering Societies in the Agents' World (ESAW), pp. 32-49.

From our point of view the coordination problems managing the constraints between several negotiations can be divided into two distinct classes of components:

Coordination components in closed environment: components that build their images on the negotiation in progress and manage the coordination constraints according to information extracted only from their current negotiation graph (Subcontracting, Contracting, Block, Divide);

Coordination components in opened environment: components that also build their images on the negotiation in progress but they manage the coordination constraints according to available information in data structures representing certain characteristics of other negotiations currently ongoing into the system (Broker, Transport).

Following the descriptions of these components we can state that unlike the components in closed environment (Subcontracting, Contracting, Block, Divide) that manage the coordination constraints of a single negotiation at a time, the components in opened environment (Broker, Transport) allow the coordination of constraints among several different negotiations in parallel[14].

The novelty degree of this software architecture resides in the fact that it is structured on four levels, each level approaching a particular aspect of the negotiation process. Thus, as opposed to classical architectures which achieve only a limited coordination of proposal exchanges which take place during the same negotiation, the proposed architecture allows approaching complex cases of negotiation coordination. This aspect has been accomplished through the introduction of coordination components level, which allows administrating all simultaneous negotiations in which an alliance partner can be involved.

The coordination components have two main functions such as: i) they mediate the transition between the negotiation image at the Collaboration Agent level and the image at the Middleware level; ii) they allow implementing various types of appropriate behavior in particular cases of negotiation. Thus we can say that each component corresponding to a particular negotiation type.

Following the descriptions of this infrastructure we can state that we developed a framework to describe a negotiation among the participants to a virtual enterprise. To achieve a generic coordination framework, nonselective and flexible, we found necessary to first develop the structure of the negotiation process that helps us to describe the negotiation in order to establish the general environment where the participants may negotiate. To develop this structure, we proposed a succession of phases that are specific to different stages of negotiation (initialization, negotiation, contract adoption) that provided a formal description of the negotiation process.

The advantage of this structure of the negotiation process consists on the fact that it allows a proper identification of the elements that constitute the object of coordination, of the dependencies that are possible among the existing negotiations within the VE, as well as the modality to manage these negotiations at the level of the coordination components.

5. The structure of the negotiation process

According to our approach regarding the negotiation, the participants to a negotiation may propose offers and each participant may decide in an autonomous manner to stop a negotiation either by accepting or by rejecting the offer received. Also, depending on its role in a negotiation, a participant may invite new participants to the negotiation.

In order to illustrate this approach, we present a schematic example of a negotiation process using negotiation and coordination mechanisms that we proposed in this paper.

Negotiation process that we present in Figure 3 is divided into five parts (initialization, choice of tactics, choice of partners, negotiation and contract adoption).

Initialization. The Manager initiates a subcontracting of a task, defining and communicating to the Collaborative Agent the properties and the constraints of the negotiation object and the negotiation framework. The negotiation process begins by creating an instance of the component [14] Muller H., (1996), Negotiation principles. Foundations of Distributed Artificial Intelligence.

Subcontracting. This instance will initiate other stages of negotiation, based on constraints provided by the Manager: the invitation of the coordination components (Contracting, Broker, etc.). Moreover, this instance will conduct negotiations in terms of construction and evaluation of proposals for subcontracting proposed task.

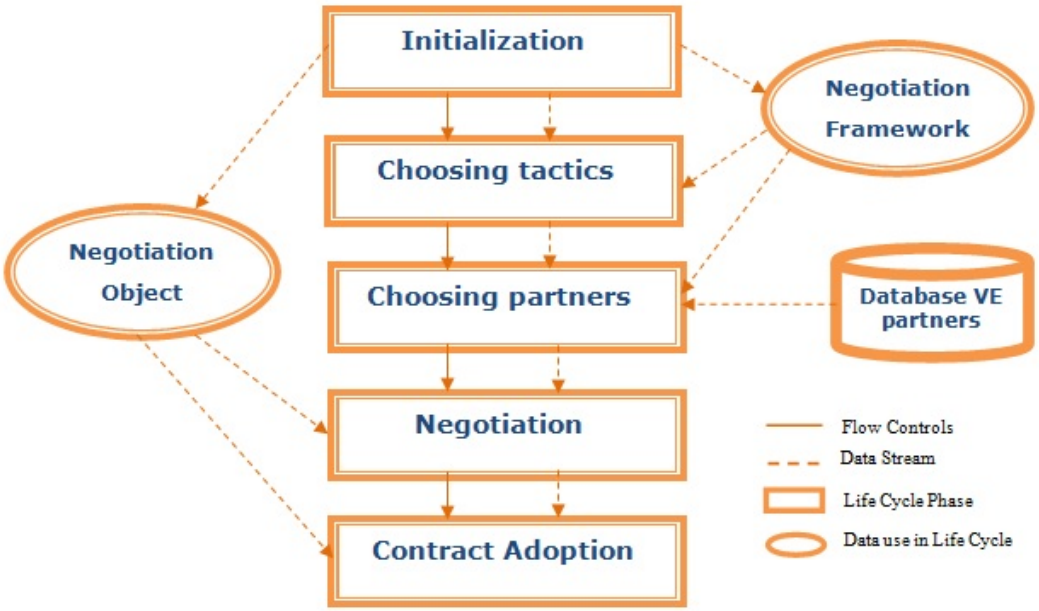

Figure 3 – The structure of the negotiation process

Choosing tactics. Using the tactics of negotiation specified in the negotiation framework, the coordination is decomposed into several coordination schemes. We considered three tactics that correspond to three coordination schemes: Block, Divide and Transport.

Choosing partners. We have two choices of partners:

- among known partners – The Manager who initiating the outsourcing can specify any constraints on the set of possible alliance contractors. To do this, the manager uses the description of the job that follow to be subcontracted and also the database alliance partners and/or the different adhesion contracts which they signed[15];
- among unknown partners - in this case, the entire research activity of the potential partners is managed by the infrastructure through Broker component.

Negotiation. At this stage, during exchanges of proposals, the negotiation object evolves according to the constraints imposed by the manager on negotiated attributes of the subcontracting task. The final objective of the negotiation process is to build an Instantiated Negotiation Object from initial specification of negotiation object[16]. An Instantiated Negotiation Object is a negotiation object whose attributes have been accepted by the all partners. After that, this object will be used to establish a contract.

[15] Hurwitz, S.M., (1998) Interoperable Infrastructures for Distributed Electronic Commerce, http://www.atp.nist.gov/atp/98wpecc.htm

[16] Robinson W., and Volkov V., Supporting the negotiation life cycle. Communications of the ACM, 1998.

Contract Adoption. In the final negotiation phase, the negotiation properties are fixed values. In this case, the Collaborative Agent asks Manager to validate the result of negotiation and makes contact with other partners' agents.

Depending on the answers obtained, the Manager may decide to: i) to restart or to suspend negotiations; ii) to enable the contracting phase, which allows reaching an agreement[17].

The negotiation process involves several parties (for several bilateral negotiations), each having different criteria, constraints and preferences that determine their individual areas of interest[18]. Criteria, constraints and preferences of a participant are partially or totally unknown to the other participants. The job under negotiation is described as a multi-attribute object. Each attribute is related to local constraints and evaluation criteria, but also to global constraints drawing dependencies with other attributes[19].

In conclusion, the proposed architecture provides the following features:

- to define the negotiation process structure: participants, interaction protocol, negotiation protocol, tactics and coordination components, the negotiation object and the negotiation strategies;
- the modeling all negotiations for a gas station in the form of a set of bilateral negotiations, which the agent can operate independently;
- the modeling of the coordination among the negotiations based on a set of coordination components and the synchronization mechanisms at the middleware level.

Thus, we can say, that we have proposed an infrastructure that manages, in a decentralized manner, the coordination of multi-phase negotiations on a multi-attribute object and among a lot of participants.

6. Conclusions

The functioning of this kind of alliance suppose task achievement, which cannot be individual treated, by a single participant for better adjustment of the clients requirements.

The proposed infrastructure aims to help the different SMEs to fulfill their entire objectives by mediating the collaboration among the several organizations gathered into a virtual enterprise.

A specific feature that distinguishes the negotiation structure proposed in this work from the negotiations with imposed options (acceptance or denial) is that it allows the modification of the proposals through the addition of new information (new attributes) or through the modification of the initial values of certain attributes (for example, in the case of gas stations the gasoline price may be changed).

The business-to-business interaction context in which our activities take place forces us to model the unexpected and the dynamic aspects of this environment. An organization may participate in several parallel negotiations. Each negotiation may end with the acceptance of a contract that will automatically reduce the available resources and it will modify the context for the remaining negotiations.

In the current work we've described in our collaboration framework only the interactions with the goal to subcontract or contract a task. A negotiation process may end with a contract and in that case the supply schedule management and the well going of the contracted task are both parts of the outsourcing process.

In order to illustrate our approach we have used a sample scenario where distributed gas stations have been united into virtual enterprise. Take into consideration this scenario, one of the principal objectives was related to the generic case and means that this proposed infrastructure can be used in other activity domains.

[17] Ossowski S., (1999), Coordination in Artificial Agent Societies. Social Structure and its Implications for Autonomus Problem-Solving Agents, No. 1202, LNAI, Springer Verlag, pp.56-69.

[18] Schumacher M., (2001), Objective coordination in multi-agent system engineering – design and implementation. In Lecture Note in Artificial Intelligence, No. 2093, Springer Verlag, pp.72-88.

[19] Kraus S., (2001), Strategic negotiation in multi-agent environments. MIT Press, pp.56-67.

Regarding research perspective continuation, one first direction which can be mentioned is the negotiation process and the coordination process taking into consideration the contracts management process. In this way the coordination can administrate not only the dependence between the negotiations and the contracts which are formed and with execution dependences of those contracts.

Another perspective is to deliver to the user one instrument which allows him negotiation protocol definition according with the restrained negotiation interactions possibilities. Consequent, this will be a problem of coordination on which the infrastructure must solve on negotiation protocol administration and protocol build perspective.

References

- Camarinha-Matos L.M. and Afsarmanesh H., Collaborative Networked Organizations, 2004 Kluwer Academic Publisher Boston.
- Singh M.P., Commitments among autonomous agents in information-rich environments. In Proceedings of the 8th European Workshop on Modelling Autonomous Agents in a Multi-Agent World (MAAMAW), pp. 141–155, May 1997.
- Bamford J.D., Gomes-Casseres B., and Robinson M.S., Mastering Alliance Strategy: A Comprehensive Guide to Design, Management and Organization. San Francisco: Jossey-Bass, 2003.
- Sycara K., Problem restructuring in negotiation, in Management Science, 37(10), 1991.
- Smith R., and Davis R., Framework for cooperation in distributed problem solving. IEEE Transactions on Systems, Man and Cybernetics, SMC-11, 1981.
- Zhang X. and Lesser V., Multi-linked negotiation in multi-agent systems. In Proc. of AAMAS 2002 July, Bologna, pg. 1207 – 1214.
- Barbuceanu M. and Wai-Kau Lo, Multi-attribute Utility Theoretic Negotiation for Electronic Commerce. In AMEC III, LNAI 2003, pg. 15-30.
- Keeny R. and Raiffa H., Decisions with Multiple Objectives: Preferences and Value Tradeoffs. JohnWilley & Sons, 1976.
- Bui V. and Kowalczyk R., On constraint-based reasoning in e-negotiation agents. In AMEC III, LNAI 2003, pp. 31-46.
- Faratin P., Automated service negotiation between autonomous computational agent. Ph.D. Thesis, Department of Electronic Engineering Queen Mary & West-field College, 2000.
- Cretan A., Coutinho C., Bratu B. and Jardim-Goncalves R., A Framework for Sustainable Interoperability of Negotiation Processes. Paper submitted to INCOM'12 14th IFAC Symposium on Information Control Problems in Manufacturing, 2011
- Vercouter, L., A distributed approach to design open multi-agent system. In 2nd Int. Workshop Engineering Societies in the Agents' World (ESAW), 2000
- Muller H., Negotiation principles. Foundations of Distributed Artificial Intelligence, 1996.
- Hurwitz, S.M., Interoperable Infrastructures for Distributed Electronic Commerce. 1998, http://www.atp.nist.gov/atp/98wpecc.htm
- Robinson W., and Volkov V., Supporting the negotiation life cycle. Communications of the ACM, 1998.
- Ossowski S., Coordination in Artificial Agent Societies. Social Structure and its Implications for Autonomus Problem-Solving Agents, No. 1202, LNAI, Springer Verlag, 1999.
- Schumacher M., Objective coordination in multi-agent system engineering – design and implementation. In Lecture Note in Artificial Intelligence, No. 2093, Springer Verlag, 2001.
- Kraus S., Strategic negotiation in multi-agent environments. MIT Press, 2001

GPGPU COMPUTING

BOGDAN OANCEA[*]
TUDOREL ANDREI[]
RALUCA MARIANA DRAGOESCU[]

Abstract
Since the first idea of using GPU to general purpose computing, things have evolved over the years and now there are several approaches to GPU programming. GPU computing practically began with the introduction of CUDA (Compute Unified Device Architecture) by NVIDIA and Stream by AMD. These are APIs designed by the GPU vendors to be used together with the hardware that they provide. A new emerging standard, OpenCL (Open Computing Language) tries to unify different GPU general computing API implementations and provides a framework for writing programs executed across heterogeneous platforms consisting of both CPUs and GPUs. OpenCL provides parallel computing using task-based and data-based parallelism. In this paper we will focus on the CUDA parallel computing architecture and programming model introduced by NVIDIA. We will present the benefits of the CUDA programming model. We will also compare the two main approaches, CUDA and AMD APP (STREAM) and the new framwork, OpenCL that tries to unify the GPGPU computing models.

Keywords: CUDA, Stream, OpenCL, GPU computing, parallel computing*

Introduction

Parallel computing offer a great advantage in terms of performance for very large applications in different areas like engineering, physics, biology, chemistry, computer vision, econometrics. Since the first supercomputers in early '70s, the nature of parallel computing has changed and new opportunities and challenges have appeared over the time. While 30-35 years ago computer scientists used massively parallel processors like the Goodyear MPP[1] Connection Machine[2], Ultracomputer[3] and machines using Transputers[4] or dedicated parallel vector computers, like Cray computer series, nowadays off-the-shelves desktops have FLOP rates greater than a supercomputer in late 80's. For example, if Cray 1 had a peak performance of 80 Megaflops and CRAY X MP had a peak performance of 200 MFLOPS an actual multicore Intel processor has more than 120 GFLOPS. These figures emphasize a major shift in computer and processors design.

The processors speed increased as the clock frequency and the number of transistors increased over the time. The clock frequency has increased by almost four orders of magnitudes between the first 8088 Intel processor and the actual processors, and the number of transistors also raised from 29.000 for Intel 8086 to approximately 730 million for an Intel Core i7-920 processor[5]. The increased clock frequency has an important side effect - the heat dissipated by processors. To overcome this problem, instead of increasing the clock frequency the processor designers come with a new [*] Professor, Ph. D., "Nicolae Titulescu" University (email: bogdan.oancea@gmail.com).

[] Professor, Ph. D., Bucharest Academy of Economic Studies (email: andreitudorel@yahoo.com).
[] Assistant Lecturer, "Artifex" University (email: raluca_dragoescu@yahoo.com).

[1] K. E. Batcher, (1980), Design of a Massively Parallel Processor, IEEE Transactions on Computers, Vol. C29, September, pp. 836–840.

[2] Lewis W. Tucker, George G. Robertson, (1988), Architecture and Applications of the Connection Machine, Computer, vol. 21, no. 8, pp. 26–38.

[3] Allan Gottlieb, Ralph Grishman, Clyde P. Kruskal, Kevin P. McAuliffe, Larry Rudolph, Marc Snir, (1982), The NYU Ultracomputer—designing a MIMD, shared-memory parallel machine, ISCA '82 Proceedings of the 9th annual symposium on Computer Architecture, pp. 27 – 42.

[4] Barron, Iann M. (1978), D. Aspinall. ed. "The Transputer". The Microprocessor and its Application: an Advanced Course, Cambridge University Press.

[5] INTEL (2012), Microprocessor Quick reference guide.

paradigm – multicore processors. Both INTEL and AMD offer multicore processors that are now common for desktop computers. Multicore processors turn normal desktops in truly parallel computers. Although the computing power of multicore processors is amazing, new applications demand more and more computational power.

In 2003, Mark Harris[6] recognized the potential of using graphical processing units (GPU) for general purpose applications. Modern GPUs are high performance many-core processors that can obtain high FLOP rates. In the past the processing units of the GPU were designed only for computer graphics but now GPUs are truly general-purpose parallel processors. Since the first idea of using GPU for general purpose computing, GPU programming models have evolved and there are several approaches to GPU programming now: CUDA (Compute Unified Device Architecture) from NVIDIA and APP (Stream) from AMD. A great number of applications were ported to use the GPU and they obtain speedups of few orders of magnitude comparing to optimized multicore CPU implementations.

GPGPU (general-purpose computing on graphics processing units) is used nowadays to speed up parts of applications that require intensive numerical computations. Traditionally, these parts of applications are handled by the CPUs but GPUs have now MFLOPs rates much better than CPUs[7]. The reason why GPUs have floating point operations rates much better even than multicore CPUs is that the GPUs are specialized for highly parallel intensive computations and they are designed with much more transistors allocated to data processing rather than flow control or data caching[8].

Khronos Group's OpenCL (Open Computing Language)[9] is a new emerging standard, that tries to unify different GPU general computing API implementations like CUDA or APP (Stream) and to provide a general framework for writing programs executed across heterogeneous platforms consisting of both CPUs and GPUs.

The CUDA programming model

Figures 1 and 2[10] shows the advances of the current GPUs that become highly parallel, multithreaded, manycore processors with an amazing computational power and very high memory bandwidth. Figure 1 plots the FLOP rates of GeForce GPUs compared with Intel processors while figure 2 plots the memory bandwidth of the NVIDIA GPUs.

[6] Harris, Mark J., William V. Baxter III, Thorsten Scheuermann, and Anselmo Lastra.(2003), Simulation of Cloud Dynamics on Graphics Hardware. In Proceedings of the IGGRAPH/Eurographics Workshop on Graphics Hardware 2003, pp. 92-101.

[7] NVIDIA, (2011), NVIDIA CUDA C Programming Guide, version 4.0.

[8] NVIDIA, (2010), CUDA C Programming Guide, Version 4.0

[9] Khronos OpenCL Working Group (2009), The OpenCL Specification - Version 1.0. The Khronos Group, Tech. Rep

[10] NVIDIA, (2011), NVIDIA CUDA C Programming Guide, version 4.0

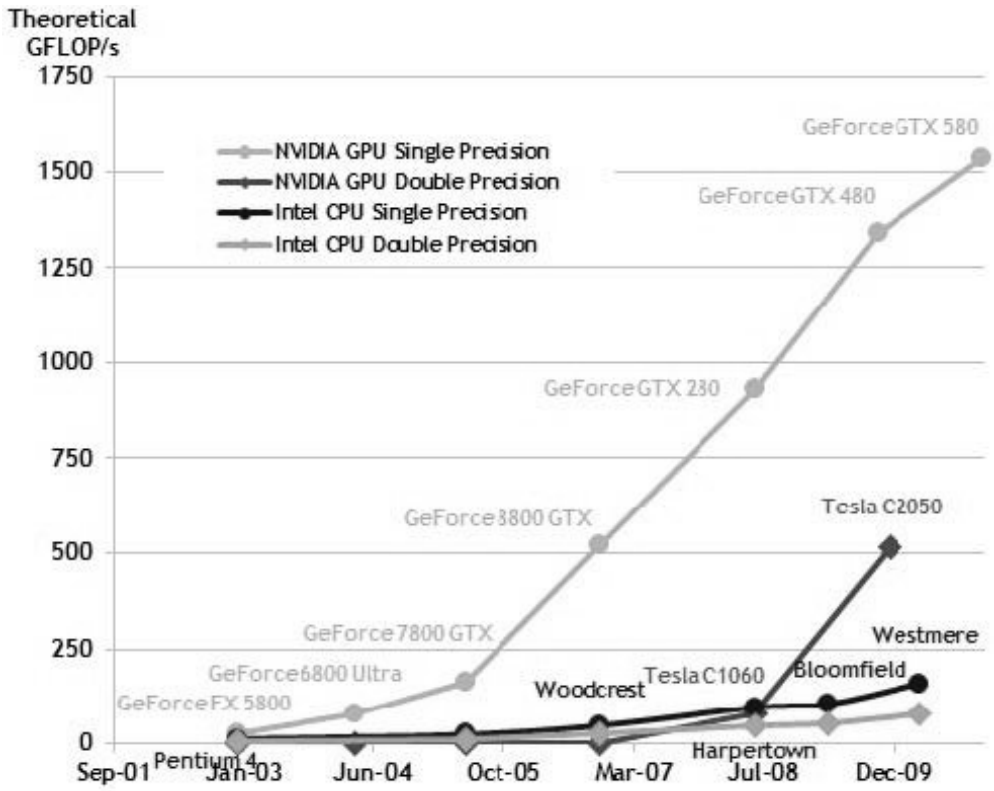

Figure 1. Theoretical FLOP rates of the GPU and CPU

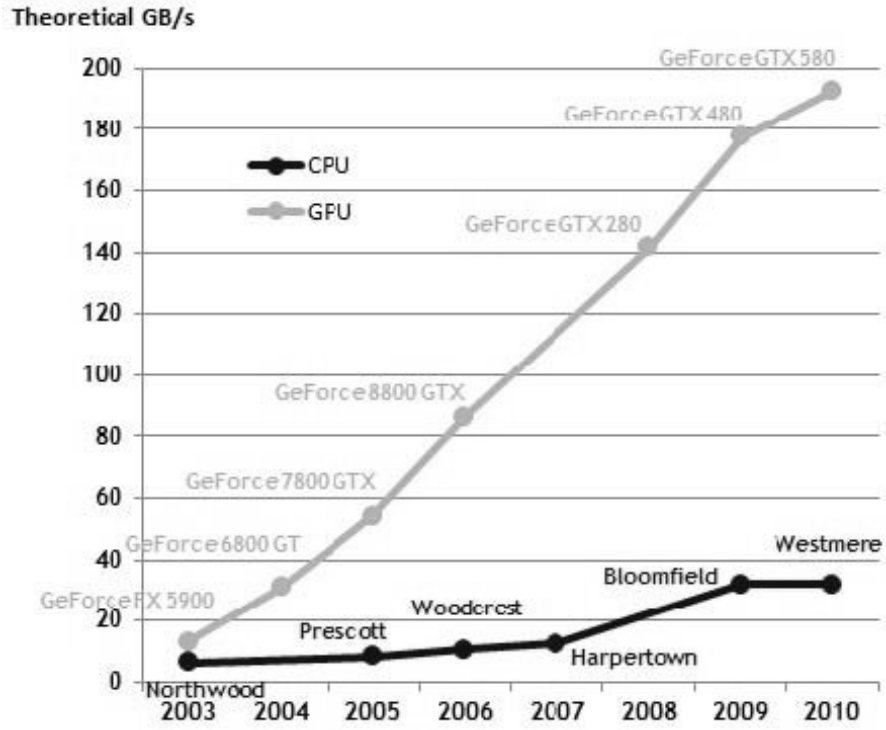

Figure 2. Theoretical memory bandwidth of the GPU

GPU can obtain such high FLOP rates because it is specialized for highly parallel computation and it has more transistors dedicated to data processing rather than flow control or data caching which is the case of a CPU. This is the main reason of the big difference in floating point computational power between GPU and CPU. Figure 3[11] (NVIDIA, 2011) shows this design shift in GPU.

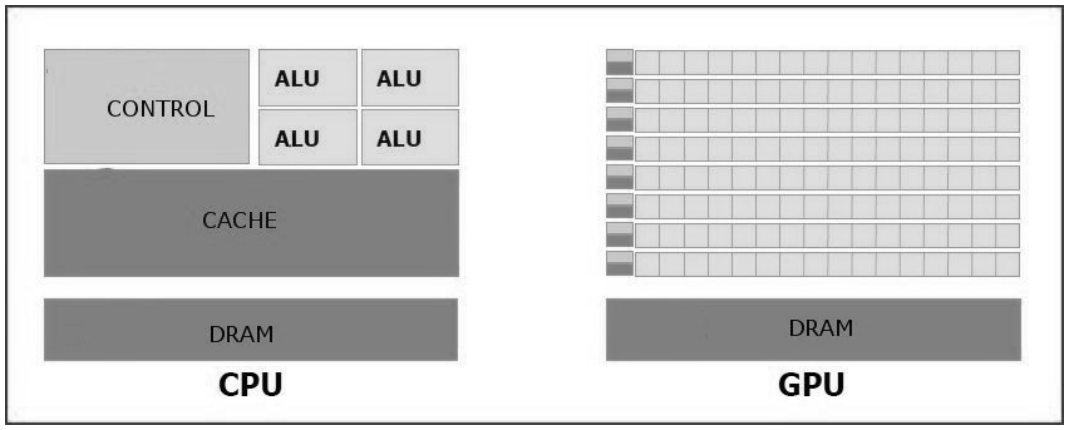

Figure 3. Design differences between GPU and CPU

[11] NVIDIA, (2011), NVIDIA CUDA C Programming Guide, version 4.0

GPUs are designed to solve problems that can be formulated as data-parallel computations – the same instructions are executed in parallel on many data elements with a high ratio between arithmetic operations and memory accesses. This is similar with the SIMD approach of the parallel computers taxonomy. Because the same instructions are executed on each of the data element there is no need for complicated flow control circuits and the memory latency can be hidden by arithmetic computations instead of using data cache.

Data parallel programming paradigm can be found in many applications like 3D rendering, image scaling, pattern recognition, video encoding and decoding, linear algebra routines, computational biology, computational finance or econometrics. All these applications can obtain very high speedups by mapping data elements to parallel processing threads that are executed in parallel by the GPU.

CUDA (Compute Unified Device Architecture) was introduced for the first time in 2006 by NVIDIA. It is a general purpose parallel programming architecture that uses the parallel compute engine in NVIDIA GPUs to solve complex computational problems in a more efficient way than a CPU does. At the time of its introduction CUDA supported only the C programming language, but nowadays it supports FORTRAN , C++ , Java, Phyton, etc.

The CUDA parallel programming model has three main key abstractions – a hierarchy of thread groups, shared memories, and barrier synchronization. These abstractions are exposed to the programmer as language extensions. They provide fine grain data parallelism and thread parallelism together with task parallelism that can be considered coarse grain parallelism.

The CUDA parallel programming model requires programmers to partition the problem to be solved into coarse tasks that can be independently executed in parallel by blocks of threads and each task is further divided into finer pieces of code that can be executed cooperatively in parallel by the threads within the block. This model allows threads to cooperate when solving each task, and also enables automatic scalability. Each block of threads can be scheduled for execution on any of the available processor cores, concurrently or sequentially. This allows a CUDA program to be executed on any number of processor cores. Figure 3[12] shows how a program is partitioned into blocks of threads each block being executed independently from each other. A GPU with more cores will execute the program in less time than a GPU with fewer cores.

[12] NVIDIA, (2011), NVIDIA CUDA C Programming Guide, version 4.0

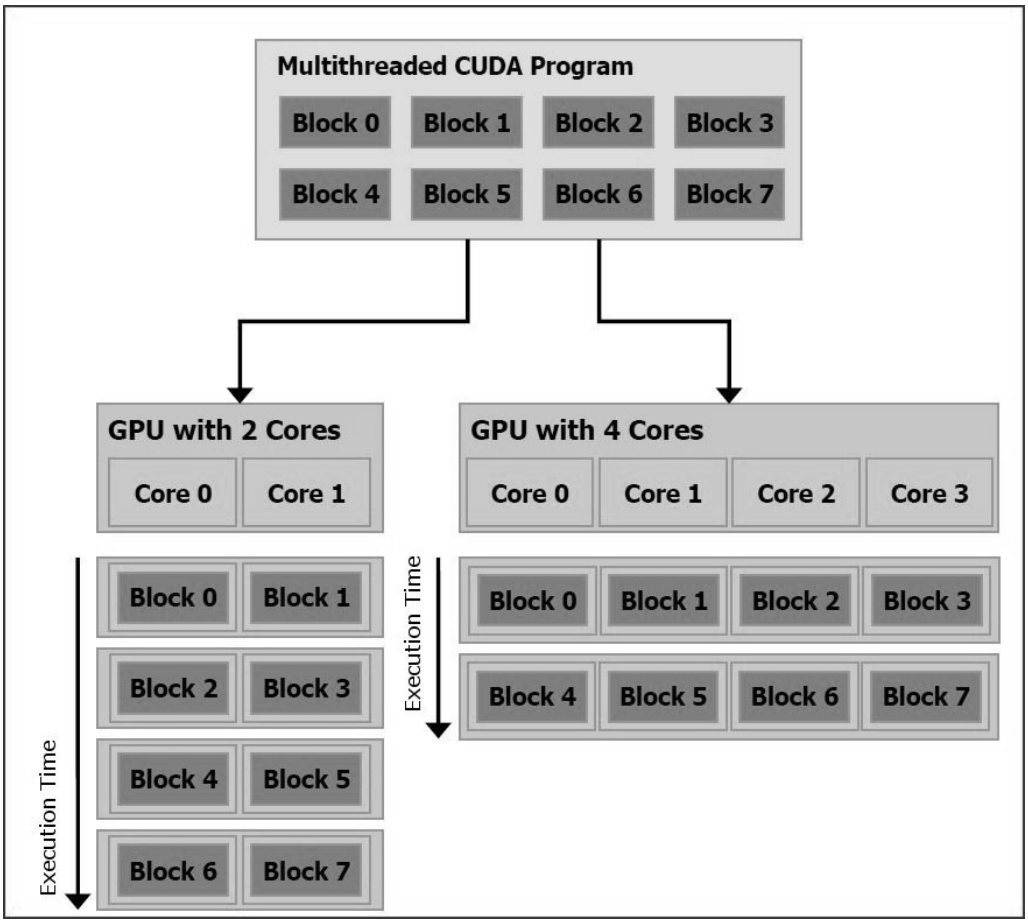

Figure 3. A multithreaded program divided into blocks that are allocated on 2 or 4 cores

The main C language extension of the CUDA programming model allows the programmer to define C functions, called kernels, that are executed N times in parallel by N different CUDA threads.

A CUDA kernel definition specifies the number of CUDA threads that execute that kernel for a given call. A unique thread ID identifies each thread that executes the kernel. This ID is accessible within the kernel through the built-in threadIdx variable. ThreadIdx variable is a 3-component vector, so that each thread can be identified using a one-dimensional, two-dimensional, or three-dimensional index. By indexing the threads in this way one can execute computations on data elements organized in a vector, matrix or 3D space.

The thread number per block is limited because all the threads of a block will be executed by one processor core and must share the limited memory resources of that processor core. This limitation on current GPUs implies that a thread block can contain up to 1024 threads. The blocks are structured into one-dimensional, two-dimensional, or three-dimensional grid of thread blocks. The number of thread blocks in a grid is limited by the size of the data being processed or the number of processors in the GPU.

In the CUDA programming model, threads can access data from multiple memory spaces during their execution life time. Each thread has its own private local memory, each thread block shares a memory visible to all the threads in that block and all threads have access to the same global memory.

CUDA threads are executed on a physically separate device that operates like a coprocessor to the host processor running the C program. The device is located on the GPU while the host is the CPU. The CUDA programming paradigm assumes that the kernels execute on GPU and the rest of the program executes on the CPU. It also assumes that that both the host and the device maintain their own separate memory spaces in DRAM, referred to as host memory and device memory. Using CUDA programming model a matrix multiplication code $C = A \times B$ can be structured like in the following example:

```
/* allocate memory for the matrices A, B, C in the host memory, A,B,C, being N x N matrices*/ host_matrix_A = (float*)malloc(N * N * sizeof(host_matrix_A[0])); host_matrix_B = (float*)malloc(N * N * sizeof(host_matrix_B[0]));
host_matrix_C = (float*)malloc(N * N * sizeof(host_matrix_C[0])); /* generate random test data / randomTestData(host_matrix_A, host_matrix_B, host_matrix_C) / allocate memory for the matrices in the device memory space*/ cudaAlloc(N*N, sizeof(device_matrix_A[0]), (void)&device_matrix_A); cudaAlloc(N*N, sizeof(device_matrix_B[0]), (void)&device_matrix_B); cudaAlloc(N*N, sizeof(device_matrix_C[0]), (void)&device_matrix_C); /* copy the values from the host matrices to the device matrices */ cudaSetVector(N*N, sizeof(host_matrix_A[0]), host_matrix_A, 1, device_matrix_A, 1); cudaSetVector(N*N, sizeof(host_matrix_B[0]), host_matrix_B, 1, device_matrix_B, 1); cudaSetVector(N*N, sizeof(host_matrix_C[0]), host_matrix_C, 1, device_matrix_C, 1); /* call the matrix multiplication routine*/ cudaMatMul(device_matrix_A, N, device_matrix_B, N, beta, device_matrix_C, N); /* Copy the result from the device memory back to the host memory */ cudaGetVector(N*N, sizeof(host_matrix_C[0]), device_matrix_C, 1, host_matrix_C, 1)
```

CUDA GPU applications

Since its introduction in early 2007, a variety of applications have benefitted by the tremendous computational power of current GPUs. These benefits include few orders-of-magnitude speedups over the previous state-of-the-art implementations. Few of CUDA enabled applications are presented in the following.

Medical imaging is one of the earliest areas that benefited most from the CUDA programming model on GPU. Very large images from Ultrasound imaging devices or CT can be processed in only few minutes. For example[13] reports an improved algorithm for medical imaging reconstruction that benefits from the computational power of a Quadro FX5600 device that can shorten the processing time of an image, making the reconstruction practical for many clinical applications.

Another important challenge in the medical imaging field is the amount of data that is collected for a single patient. For a 4D (3D + time) computed tomography (CT) dataset can be of the resolution 512 x 512 x 512 x 20 and require more than 10 GB of memory storage. A first step in processing such an image is to apply image denoising. For a dataset of about 10-15 GB this can take several hours on the CPU, compared to 10-15 minutes on the GPU.

[13] Sam Stone, Justin P. Haldar, Stephanie C. Tsao, Wen-mei W. Hwu, Zhi-Pei Liang, Bradley P. Sutton, (2008), Accelerating Advanced MRI Reconstructions on GPUs, Proceedings of the 5th International Conference on Computing Frontiers, May 5-7, http://doi.acm.org/10.1145/1366230.1366274.

Computational fluid dynamics is another area that benefitted from the GPU developments. Several ongoing projects on Navier-Stokes models or Lattice Boltzmann methods have shown very large speedups using CUDA-enabled GPUs.

Other GPGPU applications that benefits from the advantages of CUDA programming model are:

- Linear algebra and large scale numerical simulations;
- Molecular dynamics, protein folding;
- Finance modeling;
- Signal processing (FFT);
- Raytracing;
- Physics simulation (fluid, cloth, collision);
- Speech and Image recognition;
- Databases;
- Sorting and searching algorithms;
- Astrophysics;
- Lattice QCD, theoretical physics.

The authors of this paper developed a CUDA based library that implements iterative algorithms for linear systems. Our library implements Jacobi, Gauss-Seidel, CG, GMRES and BiCGSTAB methods[14] [15].

The general flow of a solver implemented in our library is:

Allocate memory for matrices and vectors in the host memory;

Initialize matrices and vectors in the host memory;

Allocate memory for matrices and vectors in the device memory;

Copy matrices from host memory to device memory;

Define the device grid layout:

- Number of blocks
- Threads per block

Execute the kernel on the device;

Copy back the results from device memory to host memory;

Memory clean up.

We've tested our iterative solver for both single precision and double precision floating point numbers. We used a computer with Intel Core2 Quad Q6600 procesor running at 2.4 Ghz, 4 GB of RAM and a NVIDIA GeForce GTX 280 graphics processing unit (GPU) with 240 cores running at 1296 MHz, 1GB of video memory and 141.7 GB/sec memory bandwith. We compared the results obtained using the CUDA code with a single threaded C implementation run on CPU that used the optimized ATLAS library (Whaley, 2001) as a BLAS implementation. Our performance tests show speedups of approximately 80 times for single precision floating point numbers and 40 times for double precision. These results show the immense potential of the GPGPU.

Other GPGPU frameworks

AMD Accelerated Parallel Processing (former ATI Stream technology) is a set of advanced hardware and software technologies that enable AMD graphics processors (GPU), working in together with the central processor (CPU) to accelerate applications (AMD, 2011). The APP programming model resembles the CUDA paradigm. It supports data-parallel and task-parallel programming models.

[14] Golub, G. H., and C. F. Van Loan, Matrix Computations (1996), Johns Hopkins Series in Mathematical Sciences, The Johns Hopkins University Press

[15] Saad, Y. (1996), Iterative Methods for Sparse Linear Systems, PWS Publishing Company.

OpenCL (Open Computing Language)[16] is the first open, standard for general-purpose parallel programming of heterogeneous systems. It tries to provide a unique programming environment for software developers to write portable code for servers, laptops, desktop computer systems and handheld devices using a both multi-core CPUs and GPUs.

OpenCL programs are divided in two parts: one that executes on the device (the GPU) and other that executes on the host (the CPU). The device program is the part of the code that uses GPU for parallel execution. Programmers have to write special functions called kernels which uses OpenCL Programming Language (an extension to the C programming language). These kerneles are scheduled to be executed on GPU. The host program offers an API so that the programmer can manage the execution of kernels on device. The host program can be programmed in C or C++ and it controls the OpenCL environment.

Open CL uses a SIMT (SINGLE INSTRUCTION MULTIPLE THREAD) model of execution that reflects how instructions are executed in the host. This means that the same code is executed in parallel by a different thread, and each thread executes the code with different data. Another concept of the Open CL is the work-item. The work-items are the equivalent of the CUDA threads being the basic execution entity. They have an ID accessible from the kernel. The ID is used to differentiate the data to processed by each work-item When a kernel is launched for execution a number of work-items specified by the programmer are also launched, each of them executing the same code. Work-items cooperate between them within a work-group. A work-group specifies the organization of the work-items which can be a N-dimensional gridwith N = 1, 2 or 3. Work-groups are equivalent to CUDA thread blocks. Work-groups also have an unique ID that can be referred from the kernel. The next level of organization of the device code is the ND-Range. It specify how work-groups are organized: as N-dimensional grid of work-groups, N = 1, 2 or 3. Table 1 summarizes the different but equivalent terms used by CUDa and OpenCL

Table 1. C for CUDA terminology versus OpenCL terminology

CUDA	OpenCL
Thread	Work-item
Thread block	Work-group

Conclusions

This paper presents a new trend in parallel processing – GPGPU. This means using the GPU for execution of numerical intensive parts of general applications. GPUs have evolved over the years and now they are truly general processors and it outperforms CPU for numerical computations.

There are now two main frameworks that use the GPU for general applications: CUDA developed by NVIDIA and APP developed by AMD.

In the future the GPU devices will become more and more capable. This performance improvement will be mainly due to increased levels of parallelism. There is one limitation to the increase in the computational power of the GPU: the memory bandwidth that will play an increasing role.

Maybe one of the important developments in GPGPU field will be in the programmability of the GPUs. A particular attention should be paid to OpenCL framework which is a crossplatform and device-independent approach. This is very attractive to developers because is independent from hardware vendor.

[16] Khronos OpenCL Working Group (2009), The OpenCL Specification - Version 1.0. The Khronos Group, Tech. Rep.

References

- AMD (2008), ATI Stream Computing - Technical Overview. AMD, Tech. Rep.
- AMD (2011), AMD Accelerated Parallel Processing – Programming Guide.
- Barron, Iann M. (1978), D. Aspinall. ed. "The Transputer". The Microprocessor and its Application: an Advanced Course, Cambridge University Press.
- K. E. Batcher, (1980), Design of a Massively Parallel Processor, IEEE Transactions on Computers, Vol. C29, September, pp. 836–840.
- Golub, G. H., and C. F. Van Loan, Matrix Computations (1996), Johns Hopkins Series in Mathematical Sciences, The Johns Hopkins University Press.
- Allan Gottlieb, Ralph Grishman, Clyde P. Kruskal, Kevin P. McAuliffe, Larry Rudolph, Marc Snir, (1982), The NYU Ultracomputer—designing a MIMD, shared-memory parallel machine, ISCA '82 Proceedings of the 9th annual symposium on Computer Architecture, pp. 27 – 42.
- Harris, Mark J., William V. Baxter III, Thorsten Scheuermann, and Anselmo Lastra.(2003), Simulation of Cloud Dynamics on Graphics Hardware. In Proceedings of the IGGRAPH/Eurographics Workshop on Graphics Hardware 2003, pp. 92-101.
- INTEL (2012), Microprocessor Quick reference guide.
- Khronos OpenCL Working Group (2009), The OpenCL Specification - Version 1.0. The Khronos Group, Tech. Rep.
- NVIDIA, (2010), CUDA C Programming Guide, Version 4.0.
- NVIDIA (2007) CUDA – CUBLAS Library.
- NVIDIA, (2011), NVIDIA CUDA C Programming Guide, version 4.0.
- Oancea, Bogdan, Ion. Gh. Rosca, Tudorel Andrei, Andreea Iluzia Iacob,(2011), Evaluating Java performance for linear algebra numerical computations, Procedia Computer Science, vol. 3, pp. 474-478.
- Saad, Y. (1996), Iterative Methods for Sparse Linear Systems, PWS Publishing Company.
- Sam Stone, Justin P. Haldar, Stephanie C. Tsao, Wen-mei W. Hwu, Zhi-Pei Liang, Bradley P. Sutton, (2008), Accelerating Advanced MRI Reconstructions on GPUs, Proceedings of the 5th International Conference on Computing Frontiers, May 5-7, http://doi.acm.org/10.1145/1366230.1366274.
- Lewis W. Tucker, George G. Robertson, (1988), Architecture and Applications of the Connection Machine, Computer, vol. 21, no. 8, pp. 26–38.
- Whaley, R. C., A. Petitet, and J. Dongarra (2001), "Automated Empirical Optimization of Software and the ATLAS project", Parallel Computing, 27(1-2), 3-35.

IMPROVING THE PERFORMANCE OF THE LINEAR SYSTEMS SOLVERS USING CUDA

BOGDAN OANCEA[*]
TUDOREL ANDREI[]
RALUCA MARIANA DRAGOESCU[]

Abstract
Parallel computing can offer an enormous advantage regarding the performance for very large applications in almost any field: scientific computing, computer vision, databases, data mining, and economics. GPUs are high performance many-core processors that can obtain very high FLOP rates. Since the first idea of using GPU for general purpose computing, things have evolved and now there are several approaches to GPU programming: CUDA from NVIDIA and Stream from AMD. CUDA is now a popular programming model for general purpose computations on GPU for C/C++ programmers. A great number of applications were ported to CUDA programming model and they obtain speedups of orders of magnitude comparing to optimized CPU implementations. In this paper we present an implementation of a library for solving linear systems using the C-CUDA framework. We present the results of performance tests and show that using GPU one can obtain speedups of about of approximately 80 times comparing with a CPU implementation.

Keywords: CUDA, GPU computing, parallel computing, linear systems, iterative methods, matrix factorization

Introduction

Parallel computing can offer an enormous advantage regarding the performance for very large applications in almost any field: scientific computing, computer vision, databases, data mining, and economics. GPUs are high performance many-core processors that can obtain very high FLOP rates. Since the first idea of using GPU for general purpose computing, things have evolved and now there are several approaches to GPU programming: CUDA from NVIDIA and Stream from AMD. CUDA is now a popular programming model for general purpose computations on GPU for C/C++ programmers. A great number of applications were ported to CUDA programming model and they obtain speedups of orders of magnitude comparing to optimized CPU implementations.

Mark Harris[1]recognized for the first time the potential of using graphical processing units (GPU) for general purpose applications. Since then GPU programming models have evolved and there are several approaches to GPU programming now: CUDA (Compute Unified Device Architecture) from NVIDIA and APP (Stream) from AMD. A new standard OpenCL (Open Computing Language)[2] tries to unify different GPU general computing API implementations and to provide a general framework for writing programs executed across heterogeneous platforms consisting of both CPUs and GPUs.

In this paper will we use C-CUDA extension for developing a GPU accelerated library that implements direct and iterative methods for large linear systems. In our library we used the CUBLAS[3] library as a BLAS GPU accelerated library.

---

[*] Professor, Ph. D., "Nicolae Titulescu" University (email: bogdan.oancea@gmail.com).
[] Professor, Ph. D., Bucharest Academy of Economic Studies (email: andreitudorel@yahoo.com).
[] Assistant Lecturer, "Artifex" University (email: raluca_dragoescu@yahoo.com).

[1] Harris, Mark J., William V. Baxter III, Thorsten Scheuermann, and Anselmo Lastra.(2003), Simulation of Cloud Dynamics on Graphics Hardware. In Proceedings of the IGGRAPH/Eurographics Workshop on Graphics Hardware 2003, pp. 92-101.

[2] Khronos OpenCL Working Group (2009), The OpenCL Specification - Version 1.0. The Khronos Group, Tech. Rep.

[3] NVIDIA (2007) CUDA – CUBLAS Library.

Serial iterative and direct methods for solving large linear systems

The classical approach for solving a linear system using iterative methods consists in Jacobi, Gauss-Seidel and SOR methods that are well known are presented in many textbooks[4].

For very large linear systems, the most appropriate iterative methods are the Krylov techniques[5]. Contrary to stationary iterative methods such as Jacobi or Gauss-Seidel, Krylov techniques use information that changes from iteration to iteration. For a linear system $Ax = b$, Krylov methods compute the i^{th} iterate x(i) as :

$$x(i) = x(i-1) + d(i) \quad i = 1,2,...$$

Operations involved to find the i^{th} update d(i) are only inner products, saxpy and matrix-vector products that has the complexity of $\Theta(n^2)$, so that Krylov methods are computational attractive comparing to the direct methods for linear systems that computes a decomposition of the matrix A into two triangular matrices.

Perhaps the best known and largely used in real applications Krylov method is the conjugate gradient method (CG). This method is used to solve symmetric positive definite (SPD) systems. The idea of the CG method is to update the iterates x(i) in such a manner to ensure the largest decrease of the objective function $\frac{1}{2}x' Ax - x' b$, while keeping the direction vectors d(i) A-orthogonal. This method can be implemented using only one matrix-vector multiplication per iteration. In exact arithmetic, the CG method gives the solution for at most n iterations. The complete description of the CG method can be found in (Golub, 1996).

Another Krylov method for general non symmetric systems is the Generalized Minimal Residuals (GMRES) introduced by (Saad, 1996). The pseudo-code for GMRES is:

GMRES
Given an initial solution x(0) compute r = b – Ax(0)
$\rho = ||r||_2$, v(1) = r/ ρ, β = ρ for k = 1,2,... until convergence for j = 1,2, ... k, h(j,k) = (Av(k))'v(j)
  end
  $v(k+1) = Av(k) - \sum_{j=1}^{k} h(j,k)v(j)$
  $h(k+1,k) = ||v(k+1)||_2$
  v(k+1,k) = v(k+1)/h(k+1,k)
endfor

The most difficult part of this algorithm is not to lose the orthogonality of the direction vectors v(j). To achieve this goal the GMRES method uses a Gram-Schmidt orthogonalization process. GMRES requires the storage and computation of an increasing amount of information, vectors v and matrix H. To overcome these difficulties, the method can be restarted after a chosen number of iterations m. The current intermediate results are used as a new starting point.

[4] Golub, G. H., and C. F. Van Loan, Matrix Computations (1996), Johns Hopkins Series in Mathematical Sciences, The Johns Hopkins University Press

[5] Saad, Y. (1996), Iterative Methods for Sparse Linear Systems, PWS Publishing Company.

Another Krylov method implemented by the authors is the BiConjugate Gradient method[6]. BiCG uses a different approach based upon generating two mutually orthogonal sequences of residual vectors and A-orthogonal sequences of direction vectors. The updates for residuals and for the direction vectors are similar to those of the CG method, but are performed using A and its transpose. The disadvantage of the BiCG method is an erratic behaviour of the norm of the residuals and potential breakdowns. An improved version, called BiConjugate Gradient Stabilized BiCGSTAB, is presented bellow:

BiCGSTAB

Given an initial solution x(0) compute r = b – Ax(0)
$\rho_0 = 1$, ρ_1 = r(0)'r(0), $\alpha = 1$, $\acute{\omega} = 1$, p = 0, v = 0 for k = 1,2, ... until convergence $\beta = (\rho_k / \rho_{k-1})(\alpha/\acute{\omega})$ p = r + β(p- $\acute{\omega}$v) v = Ap
$\alpha = \rho_k/$(r(0)'v) s = r – αv
t = As $\acute{\omega}$ = (t's)(t't)
x(k) = x(k-1) + αp + $\acute{\omega}$s

For the BiCGSTAB method we need to compute 6 saxpy operations, 4 inner products and 2 matrix-vector products per iteration and to store matrix A and 7 vectors of size n. The computational complexity of the method is $\Theta(n^2)$ like the other Krylov methods. The operation count per iteration cannot be used to directly compare the performance of BiCGSTAB with GMRES because GMRES converges in much less iterations than BiCGSTAB. We have implemented these iterative methods and run experiments to determine the possible advantages of them over the direct methods. The results of our experiments are presented in the next section.

The alternative to solve a linear system $Ax = b$ is the direct method that consists in two steps:

- First, the matrix A is factorized, $A = LU$ where L is a lower triangular matrix with 1s on the main diagonal and U is an upper triangular matrix; in the case of symmetric positive definite matrices, we have $A = LL^t$.
- Second, we have to solve two linear systems with triangular matrices: $Ly = b$ and $Ux = y$.

The standard LU factorization algorithm with partial pivoting is (Golub, 1996):

[6] Golub, G. H., and C. F. Van Loan, Matrix Computations (1996), Johns Hopkins Series in Mathematical Sciences, The Johns Hopkins University Press

Right-looking LU factorization for k =1:n-1 do
find ν with k≤ ν≤n such that $|A(\nu,k)| = \|A(k:n,k)\|_\infty$
A(k,k:n)↔A(ν, k:n) p(k) = ν
if A(k,k) ≠ 0 then
A(k+1:n, k) = A(k+1:n,k)/A(k,k)
A(k+1:n,k+1:n) = A(k+1:n,k+1:n) - A(k+1:n, k)
A(k, k+1:n)

The computational complexity of this algorithm is $\Theta(2n^3/2)$. After we obtain the matrix factors L and U we have to solve two triangular systems: $Ly = b$ and $Ux = y$. These systems are solved using forward and backward substitution that have a computational complexity of $\Theta(n^2)$, so the most important computational step is the matrix factorization. That's why we have to show a special attention to the algorithms for matrix factorization.

In practice, using actual computers with memory hierarchies, the above algorithm is not efficient because it uses only level 1 and level 2 BLAS operations[7]. As it is well-known, level 3 BLAS operations[8] have a better efficiency than level 1 or level 2 operations. The standard way to change a level 2 BLAS operations into a level 3 BLAS operation is delayed updating. In the case of the LU factorization algorithm we will replace k rank-1 updates with a single rank-k update.

We present a block algorithm for LU factorization that uses level 3 BLAS operations. The $n \times n$ matrix A is partitioned as in Figure 1. The A_{00} block consists of the first b columns and rows of the matrix A.

A_{00}	A_{01}		L_{00}	0		U_{00}	U_{01}
A_{10}	A_{11}	=	L_{10}	L_{11}	*	0	U_{11}

Figure 1. Block LU factorization

We can derive the following equations starting from A=LU:

$L_{00}U_{00} = A_{00}$ (1)

$L_{10}U_{00} = A_{10}$ (2)

$L_{00}U_{01} = A_{01}$ (3)

$L_{10}U_{01} + L_{11}U_{11} = A_{11}$ (4)

[7] Dongarra, J., J. Du Croz, S. Hammarling, and R. Hanson (1988): "An extended set of FORTRAN basic linear algebra subprograms", ACM Transactions on Mathematical Software, 14, (1), 1-17.

[8] Dongarra, J., J. Du Croz, S. Hammarling, and I. Duff (1990): "A set of level 3 basic linear Algebra subprograms", ACM Transactions on Mathematical Software, 16 (1), 1-17

Equations (1) and (2) perform the LU of the first b columns of the matrix A. Thus we obtain L_{00}, L_{10} and U_{00} and now we can solve the triangular system from equation (3) that gives U_{01}. The problem of computing L_{11} and U_{11} reduces to compute the factorization of the submatrix $A_{11}' = A_{11} - L_{10}U_{01}$ that can be done using the same algorithm but with A_{11}' instead of A. The block LU factorization algorithm can now be derived easily: suppose we have divided the matrix A in column blocks with b columns in each block. The complete block LU factorization algorithm is given below.

Block LU factorization for k_b =1 to n-1 step b do

$b_f = \min(k_b + b - 1, n)$

{LU factorization of $A(k_b : n, k_b : b_f)$ with BLAS 2} for $k = k_b$ to b_f do find k such that $|A(k,i)| = \|A(i:n,i)\|_\infty$

if $i \neq k$ then swap rows i and k

endif

$A(i+1:n, i) = A(i+1:n, i)/A(i,i)$

$A(i+1:n, i+1: b_f) = A(i+1:n, i+1: b_f) - A(i+1:n, i)\ A(i, i+1: b_f)$

endfor

{Let $\tilde{L}$ be unit lower triangular matrix $b \times b$ stored in $A(k_b : b_f, k_b : b_f)$}

Solve triangular systems $\tilde{L}Z = A(k_b : b_f, b_f + 1 : n)$

Update $A(k_b : b_f, b_f + 1 : n) \leftarrow Z$

{Delayed updating}

$A(b_f + 1 : n, b_f + 1 : n) = A(b_f + 1 : n, b_f + 1 : n) - A(b_f + 1 : n, k_b : b_f)A(k_b : b_f, b_f + 1 : n)$

endfor

The process of factorization is shown in Figure 2. The factorization of the current column block is done with the usual BLAS 2 operations and the active part of the matrix A will be updated with b rank-one updates simultaneously which in fact is a matrix-matrix multiplication (level 3 BLAS). If $n >> b$ almost all floating point operations are done in the matrix-matrix multiplication operation.

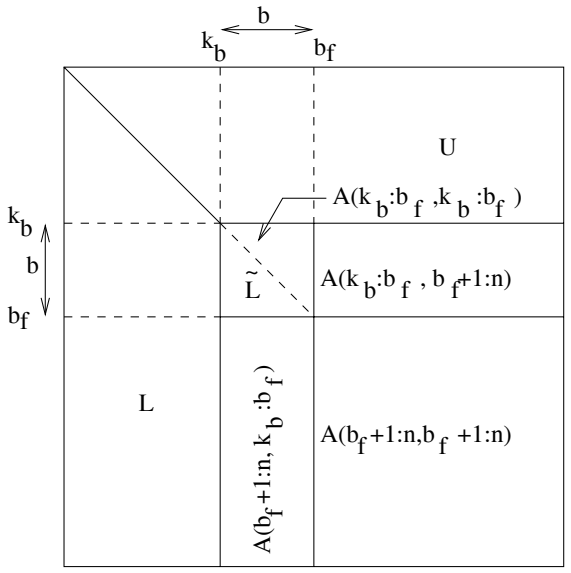

Figure 2. Block LU factorization with BLAS 3 operations

Cholesky factorization consists in finding the factorization of the form $A = LL^T$ where A is a symmetric positive definite (SPD) matrix. Figure 3 shows the partitioning of matrices A and L.

$$A = \begin{pmatrix} A\_11 & * \\ A\_21 & A\_22 \end{pmatrix}$$

$$L = \begin{pmatrix} L\_11 & 0 \\ L\_21 & L\_22 \end{pmatrix}$$

Figure 3. The partitioning of matrices A and L.

From $A = LL^T$ we can derive the following relations :
$A_{11} = L_{11}L_{11}^T$
$L_{21}L_{11}^T = A_{21}$
$A_{22} - L_{21}L_{21}^T = L_{22}L_{22}^T$

If matrix L will overwrite the inferior triangle of A, then the Cholesky factorization consists in the following three computations:
$A_{11} \leftarrow L_{11} = Cholesky(A_{11})$
$A_{21} \leftarrow L_{21} = A_{21}L_{21}^{-T}$
$A_{22} \leftarrow A_{22} - L_{21}L_{21}^T$

Parallel implementation of the direct and iterative algorithms using CUDA

Our library implements LU and Cholesky factorization as directs methods and Jacobi, Gauss-Seidel, CG, GMRES and BiCGSTAB iterative methods.

The general flow of the solver implemented in our library is:

- Allocate memory for matrices and vectors in the host memory;
- Initialize matrices and vectors in the host memory;
- Allocate memory for matrices and vectors in the device memory;
- Copy matrices / vectors from host memory to device memory;
- Define the device grid layout:
  - Number of blocks
  - Threads per block
- Execute the kernel on the device;
- Copy back the results from device memory to host memory;
- Memory clean up.

We've used CUBLAS library in the implementation of the direct and iterative algorithms for performing BLAS operations. We also implemented the same algorithms in a single threaded program developed in C and run on CPU. The CPU library uses ATLAS[9] as a high performance BLAS implementation.

Results

We've tested our direct and iterative solvers for both single precision and double precision floating point numbers. For our tests we used a computer with Intel Core2 Quad Q6600 procesor running at 2.4 Ghz, 4 GB of RAM and a NVIDIA GeForce GTX 280 graphics processing unit (GPU) with 240 cores running at 1296 MHz, 1GB of video memory and 141.7 GB/sec memory bandwith. The operating system used was Windows Vista 64 bit.

We compared the results obtained using the CUDA code with the single threaded C implementation run on CPU. The CPU implementation of the direct and iterative algorithms used the optimized ATLAS library as a BLAS implementation. This gives better performances than a standard reference implementation of the BLAS.

Table 1 shows the speedup obtained by the C-CUDA implementation of the iterative solvers compared with the traditional CPU code for single precision floating point numbers and table 2 shows the speedup for double precision numbers. From the results presented below one can see that GPU outperforms CPU for numerical computations.

Comparing the results for each method, it can be noticed that BiCGSTAB has better performances than the other methods. For GMRES, in our experiments we restarted the method after 35 iterations. The tolerance for the solution was fixed at 10^{-4} for all methods. For our experiments we have considered linear systems containing between 2000 and 20000 variables.

Table 3 shows the speedup of the CUDA implementation of the direct method for linear systems compared with a single threaded C implementation (the standard block-level implementation that can be found in LAPACK). We considered linear systems with 500 to 3500 equations.

Our performance results show the net advantage of GPU computing compared to the classical CPU code. The results also emphasize the advantage of the iterative solutions compared with the direct solution. Another advantage of using CUDA programming model is that the code can be easier read and support. The major drawback of CUDA is that it is only available for NVIDIA devices. A port of our library to OpenCL is intended for the future.

[9] Whaley, R. C., A. Petitet, and J. Dongarra (2001), "Automated Empirical Optimization of Software and the ATLAS project", Parallel Computing, 27(1-2), 3-35

Table 1. Speedup of the CUDA library for single precision FP

Matrix dimension	Speedup
	Jacobi	Gauss-Seidel	GMRES(35)	BiCGSTAB
2000	67.4	69.3	78.3	82.2
4000	56.2	65.5	81.8	84.5
8000	68.3	67.4	80.1	81.9
12000	66.7	68.4	81.4	84.1
16000	71.1	69.2	79.3	86.0
20000	72.8	69.9	81.3	86.9

Table 2. Speed up for double precision FP

Matrix dimension	Speedup
	Jacobi	Gauss-Seidel	GMRES(35)	BiCGSTAB
2000	35.2	36.1	39.6	41.7
4000	36.1	36.0	41.2	42.3
8000	29.1	35.2	41.6	43.6
12000	33.6	37.8	40.5	43.9
16000	32.3	35.9	42.8	44.0
20000	35.6	37.1	43.2	46.1

Table 3. The speedup of the direct method based on LU factorization for double precision

Matrix dimension	C-CUDA
500	8.99
1000	12.45
1500	11.41
2000	16.78
2500	16.23
3000	14.39

Table 4. The speedup of the direct method based on Cholesky factorization for SPD matrices double precision

Matrix dimension	C-CUDA
500	13.50
1000	19.75
1500	19.71
2000	23.17
2500	24.45
3000	22.585
3500	23.90

Conclusions

We developed a C-CUDA library that implements the direct method with LU and Cholesky factorization and Jacobi, Gauss-Seidel and non-stationary iterative methods (GMRES, BiCGSTAB). The matrix-vector and matrix-matrix computations were done using CUBLAS routines. We compared the performance of our CUDA implementation with classic programs written to be run on CPU. Our performance tests show speedups of approximately 80 times for single precision floating point numbers and 40 times for double precision for the iterative methods and about 10-25 for the direct method with double precision FP. The lower figures of the speedups for direct methods may come from the memory bandwidth.

These results show the immense potential of the GPU accelerated numerical computations. In the future we intend to extend our direct and iterative solver library and to port it to OpenCL.

References

- AMD (2008), ATI Stream Computing - Technical Overview. AMD, Tech. Rep.
- AMD (2011), AMD Accelerated Parallel Processing – Programming Guide.
- Agullo, E., Augonnet, C., Dongarra, J., Faverge, M., Langou, J., Ltaief, H., Tomov, S. (2011), LU Factorization for Accelerator-based Systems, IEEE/ACS AICCSA 2011, Sharm-El-Sheikh, Egypt, December, 2011
- Barron, Iann M. (1978), D. Aspinall. ed. "The Transputer". The Microprocessor and its Application: an Advanced Course, Cambridge University Press.
- K. E. Batcher, (1980), Design of a Massively Parallel Processor, IEEE Transactions on Computers, Vol. C29, September, pp. 836–840.
- Dongarra, J., J. Du Croz, S. Hammarling, and I. Duff (1990): "A set of level 3 basic linear Algebra subprograms", ACM Transactions on Mathematical Software, 16 (1), 1-17.
- Dongarra, J., J. Du Croz, S. Hammarling, and R. Hanson (1988): "An extended set of FORTRAN basic linear algebra subprograms", ACM Transactions on Mathematical Software, 14, (1), 1-17.
- Doornik, J. A., D. F. Hendry, and N. Shephard (2007): "Parallel Computation in Econometrics: A Simplified Approach" Chapter 15 in Handbook of Parallel Computing and Statistics, Chapman & Hall/CRC, 449-476.
- Golub, G. H., and C. F. Van Loan, Matrix Computations (1996), Johns Hopkins Series in Mathematical Sciences, The Johns Hopkins University Press.
- Allan Gottlieb, Ralph Grishman, Clyde P. Kruskal, Kevin P. McAuliffe, Larry Rudolph, Marc Snir, (1982), The NYU Ultracomputer—designing a MIMD, shared-memory parallel machine, ISCA '82 Proceedings of the 9th annual symposium on Computer Architecture, pp. 27 – 42.
- Harris, Mark J., William V. Baxter III, Thorsten Scheuermann, and Anselmo Lastra.(2003), Simulation of Cloud Dynamics on Graphics Hardware. In Proceedings of the IGGRAPH/Eurographics Workshop on Graphics Hardware 2003, pp. 92-101.
- INTEL (2012), Microprocessor Quick reference guide.
- Khronos OpenCL Working Group (2009), The OpenCL Specification - Version 1.0. The Khronos Group, Tech. Rep.
- Nath, R., Tomov, S., Dong, T., Dongarra, J. (2011), Optimizing Symmetric Dense Matrix-Vector Multiplication on GPUs, ACM/IEEE Conference on Supercomputing (SC'11), Seattle, WA, November 12-18, 2011.
- NVIDIA, (2010), CUDA C Programming Guide, Version 4.0.
- NVIDIA (2007) CUDA – CUBLAS Library.
- NVIDIA, (2011), NVIDIA CUDA C Programming Guide, version 4.0.
- Oancea, Bogdan, Ion. Gh. Rosca, Tudorel Andrei, Andreea Iluzia Iacob,(2011), Evaluating Java performance for linear algebra numerical computations, Procedia Computer Science, vol. 3, pp. 474-478.
- Saad, Y. (1996), Iterative Methods for Sparse Linear Systems, PWS Publishing Company.
- Sam Stone, Justin P. Haldar, Stephanie C. Tsao, Wen-mei W. Hwu, Zhi-Pei Liang, Bradley P. Sutton, (2008), Accelerating Advanced MRI Reconstructions on GPUs, Proceedings of the 5th International Conference on Computing Frontiers, May 5-7, http://doi.acm.org/10.1145/1366230.1366274.

- Lewis W. Tucker, George G. Robertson, (1988), Architecture and Applications of the Connection Machine, Computer, vol. 21, no. 8, pp. 26–38.
- Whaley, R. C., A. Petitet, and J. Dongarra (2001), "Automated Empirical Optimization of Software and the ATLAS project", Parallel Computing, 27(1-2), 3-35.

MANAGING HUMAN FACTORS IN IMPLEMENTING ELECTRONIC DOCUMENT SYSTEM IN THE PUBLIC SECTOR

TOMS LEIKUMS*

Abstract
Document management underlies the activities of almost every organization. Correctly managed correspondence and organized document circulation characterize successful performance particularly in the public sector organizations. Even though production of documents itself is not the main task of governmental institutions, document creation and processing are crucial processes for the provision of basic functions in public sector. In the 21st century it gets more important to use the new possibilities offered by modern technologies, including electronic document management. Public sector itself is a heavy bureaucratic apparatus in the need of elasticity and ability to change its working processes and habits in order to gradually switch to the digital environment. Western European countries have already turned to electronic document management whilst most of the Eastern European countries, including Latvia, have just recently started a gradual electronization of document circulation. When implementing electronic document management systems in the public sector organizations, it often comes to resistance of the staff and unwillingness to change the accustomed methods of work – paper format document circulation. Both lower level staff and higher level managers put obstacles to electronic document management. In this article author inspects cases of successful practice and analyses possible action mechanisms that could convince public sector personnel of advantages of electronic document circulation and prepare them to switch to work with digital documents.

Keywords: Electronic document management, public sector, document management systems, electronic workflow, educating personnel

Introduction

The implementation of any information system is a responsible and important process. The implementation phase largely determines both further users' attitude towards the system and successful performance. When developing and implementing information systems, one must pay attention to great number of elements: business process analysis, financial aspects, platforms to use, system analysis, programming, testing etc. However, often among these important elements another factor tends to be forgotten – system users. Even the best projected and developed systems can fail if during the stages of system development and implementation the work with the users has been neglected.

All organizations, including the public sector institutions, gradually switch to partially or completely electronic document management. In Western Europe the shift was undergone during the last decade, but Eastern and Central European countries have activated the issue right now and are trying to apply principles of electronic document management to public sector. However, this process is not simple and presents several problems, for instance, lack of qualified software developers, financial and technical restrictions, but mainly – the unwillingness of users to change their work practice and habits. Exactly the last reason is one of the most important obstacles in further development of electronic public sector, and this article deals with this issue in a greater detail – how to manage human factors and improve the environment for the implementation of electronic document management systems.

In order to detail the problem scope and offer solutions, the author of the article uses personal experience of system analysis, software development and implementation gained in working in the public sector. Additionally the article contains good practice examples from specialists of implementation of information systems and document management systems' developers.

* Toms Leikums, Ph. D. student, Latvia University of Agriculture.

Many authors of specialised literature have paid attention to involving users into development projects of information system and training for the work with the software. However, mainly there are only some general advices, for instance, to involve the potential system users when running the acceptance testing. User attitude and specific wishes, on their turn, usually do not get special attention. The specifics of the analysed research target group – public sector institutions in Eastern Europe – also has to be taken into account – unfortunately these countries are on a considerably lower level of the IT development, if comparing to Western Europe or USA. Respectively, the workers in the public sector are less keen on using the computers and the attitude towards innovations is often plain aggressive. The author of the article pays special attention to features of document circulation in the public sector institutions in the post-soviet space and outlines directions of further development on the way to e-government.

Risks in implementation of electronic document management system

In order to apprehend the problems in question and the sphere of activity, one must first view the possible risk factors. Thorough risk planning during the initial phase of the project allows avoiding many obstacles in the implementation of the new document management system. In the following we will inspect the most important risk factors related to users and their attitude towards the information system.

- Weak legislation environment

Public sector is a specific branch and the actions of its workers are regulated by a large number of legislative documents both on the state and individual institution level. Document management system can also be regulated by, for instance, document circulation regulations, record-keeping rules, safety policy, job responsibilities description etc. Public officials follow such regulation very thoroughly and do not want to change their working habits or accept alternatives – as an electronic document management. Respectively, the implementation of electronic document management system can be negatively influenced by the lack of basic legislative regulations on the state level and unadjusted rules and regulations inside the institution.

- Low quality user training

Nowadays almost every IT project contains user training sessions. Only in cases when the organization acquires a generally known out-of-box software solution, e.g. Microsoft Office, no user training is organized. However, user training can be conducted in several ways – both on high level and by paying necessary attention to it, and carelessly, obviously only for the fact of conducting the training itself. Often no direct user trainings are organized at all and the developers prepare a manual instead and assume that it would be enough for a basic user to get to know the new system and accomplish his/her functions in it. Probably this approach is cost-effective for some smaller information systems. However, document management systems are usually huge IT solutions, projected for the usage by several hundreds of even thousands of people and therefore they are complicated and functionally crowded. Thus the potential users when first seeing the voluminous manual even do not want to read it. Direct user training is also not always the optimal solution as many organizations conduct them very superficially in order to mark that there has been a training, e.g. for all the workers at the institution at once, even though there are more than ten or even hundred workers. Obviously this is not the correct approach of quality training and one can assume that after such training most users' attitude towards the system will not be positive.

- Indifference of managers

Every IT project is based on humans. Also in public sector the suggestion to acquire one or another information system comes from the staff, usually – from the IT specialists. If in private sector software acquisitions are usually initiated also by managers, then in the public sector higher lever managers are usually occupied with their direct responsibilities and are almost never interested in IT solutions. Often they think that IT solutions function for itself (e-mail, internet). However, it is the higher level managers who are entitled to meet decisions about acquiring new purchases or starting projects. Respectively, it is them whom the IT specialist has to convince of the need to spare some financing and acquire an information system. Though convincing the managers and getting the financing is not enough – the manager has to show some interest or support to the project during the whole process, but especially – during the implementation. If users see or learn that the manager does not use the new software, they automatically assume that they do not have to do it as well.

- Traditions of document circulation in the public sector

Public sector institutions can be regarded as the most conservative organizational group at all. Similar incredulity against new information systems exists only in banking sector. Since ancient times the officials have been used that they work with documents – with paper, respectively. There are papers on the working desks, huge amounts of paper are being printed, coordinated, placed in folders; notes are being taken in paper notepads, and the document search means searching through piles of paper. In the age of modern technologies such approach can seem foolish but one has to take into account that it is not only traditions determining it – in some ways working with paper documents has always been and will be more comfortable than the most elaborate document management system. Miles L. Mathieu and Ernest A. Capozolli even forecast that in the nearest future the situation will not be changing rapidly and electronic document circulation might not come to reality: "Reality has proven that a paperless office has been impossible to achieve thus far. Today's individuals, computer savvy as they are, have shown they are unwilling to give up the convenience and low cost of paper for more cumbersome and costly digital display devices. Individuals have also relegated printers, copiers and fax machines into the "for granted" category, believing one belongs on everyone's desk. Until digital display devices transfer data from computer to medium as simply as printers do with paper, the paperless office may never be a reality."[1]

Suggestions for a successful transition to electronic document management

Many authors regard involving users into different system development and implementation phases as the key to success. Already in 1995, when different information systems were very far from the highest peak of their popularity, the prestigious magazine Compuworld wrote about user involvement in software development: „Involving users early on to speed up systems development isn't exactly new advice. Still, it remains something many IS developers fail to do on a regular basis because „it takes more time initially. You can't just sit down and code"."[2]

User involvement has also been emphasized in order to ensure positive attitude towards the newly implemented system: "Users do not make best use of information systems unless they feel that these systems have been designed with their involvement and in their interest."[3]

One has to take into account that in an optimal way users have to get involved in the IT project as soon as possible. In many places there is praxis that users (in reality only a minor part of them) first see the system during the phase of acceptance testing. Though this is not the worst case since the users can still express their opinion and indicate errors or mistakes in the system. However, it is not possible to perform any significant changes of the system at this stage anymore. For user involvement in different phases of an IT project several methods can be used. "The way to be user-centered is to involve users and pay attention to their views.

---

[1] Miles L. Mathieu and Ernest A. Capozzoli, "The Paperless Office: Accepting Digitized Data" (paper presented at the Troy State University, System-wide Business Symposium, 2002).

[2] Julia King, "Consult users early, often," Computerworld, October 16, 1995.

[3] Patrick C. J. Nolan et al., ed., Pathways to institutional improvement with information technology in educational management (New York: Kluwer Academic Publishers, 2002), 63.

This can include a variety of approaches, from simply observing users' working practices as part of collecting system requirements, to using psychologically based user-modeling techniques, to including user representatives on the design team. More important, users should be involved in the testing and evaluation of the system during its design and development."[4] In order to comprehend the processes of document circulation in an organization and offer an optimal alternative – electronic document management system, the developers would have to spend lots of time for system analysis and evaluation of the current situation. It is not enough to have discussions with IT staff only (since they are sometimes not related to document circulation) and record managers (who in their turn are so familiar with document circulation that they cannot pictures themselves in the role of a standard office worker). It is necessary to acquire information from other potential users of the system. Interviewing particular workers or groups of workers or surveys might be used as methods for this task. If safety policy of the institution allows and no workers are against it, it is advisable to conduct staff observation. This method can prove to be especially helpful during the implementation and usage of pilot versions of the system (if intended). "Going to observe users in their natural setting – observing them while they are doing real work in their real working environment or using a home system in their homes – is an essential part of user-centered design. In addition to finding out what users do, you can also discover what aspects of the current system they like and dislike."[5]

As one of the most important recommendations we have to mention the need to individually train as much system users as possible. When an organization acquires a new system, usually it is being inspected only by managers, record managers, and possibly IT staff who will have to administer the system in the future. Yet one cannot forget all the other system users. In many institutions there is an opinion that user manual, provided by the developer, is enough for basic users. However, one has to reckon that in the user manual the supplier or the developer describes only the system functions, respectively, which button to press in order to navigate between forms etc. Yet, for the users the context between processes is much more important, since they have to work with specific tasks, for instance, to create a return letter. An instruction on how to do it might as well be scattered between different parts of the manual because the description of the process can be found on different programme windows. Another wrong approach is to organize one common user training for all the staff where they are being carelessly informed on the fact the institution now has a new document management system, that it can be used for different functions and from now on everybody has to use it. Even if amongst the staff there are people who are capable of learning to use new software fast, most of the staff will not ask any questions, postponing them to the moment when they will really start working with the system. This is the moment when they call the IT specialists or the office clerks who in their turn have to carry out an individual training on operations of the document management system. The experience of the article author that has been gathered during several years indicates that document management in the public sector is a process important enough to spare time for individual trainings for the users. Usually it takes up to 30-40 minutes but the prospective time savings are worth the investment. It is very important that the users are being trained according to their position in the institution. For instance, senior officers and other lower lever workers of the hierarchy will be using different options of the document management system than the middle level managers; higher level managers, on their turn, will be interested in functionality of various monitoring options, assignation of resolutions and control mechanisms etc. The only common elements for all users are basic system actions and document search.

For the specifics of public sector institutions – much more than for the private business companies – it is necessary to gain support of the management for the processes in the institution, including the transition to electronic document circulation. Therefore as a very important example of good practice one has to mention management involvement into planning document circulation and implementing electronic document management. In order to achieve it, one could have to go through several stages. First of all, the management has to be convinced of the need for the electronization of the document circulation. Heads of institutions are not always competent with modern technologies and mainly do not fully comprehend the potential gains. Therefore there is a need for a person who is capable of comparing the current situation of an organization with its possible status in the future, when electronic document circulation could be carried out. It is important that this person is not a marketing specialist or software supplier for any of the companies distributing document management systems – in their presentations they basically tend to concentrate on design details and use common arguments, like, "electronic document system will save money for you" or similar. However, a long-term employee of the institution who has full understanding of workflows and organization processes in the institutions is capable of giving real examples and explaining to the management what changes are to be expected. If possible, management has to get involved into process planning, purchase and testing of the electronic document management system. One has to take into consideration the peculiarity of public sector that it is the like or dislike of the head of the institution that determines further destiny and success of the system in the whole institution. If the head of the institution who is the only one having the authority to sign, will not be willing to edit and sign documents electronically, then all the other staff will have to continue creating letters and regulations in paper format. Involving the responsible managers into the project already during planning and testing stages can bring up ideas of how they want to see their electronic workspace to look like and how to structure the information so that it would be comfortable to use.

[4] Debbie Stone et al., User Interface Design and Evaluation (San Francisco: Morgan Kaufmann, 2005), 17.
[5] Debbie Stone et al., User Interface Design and Evaluation (San Francisco: Morgan Kaufmann, 2005), 29.

As one the examples of good practice document management system developers, for instance, Optical Image Technology, Inc.[6] often name the possibility to implement document management solutions gradually. Thus functionality modules can in the beginning only get used partially. One can start with document input, saving and output. In this case there is the problem that users will learn how to work with the system incorrectly. And in future it can be much harder to make them change habits and start using additional functions of the document management system. For instance, the institution decides to start using the document management system and create and store documents in the classified folders electronically. However, this workflow functionality will have to be started by the next year. Therefore the users get used that after creating a document it has to be printed out, reconciled and signed on paper. Also the managers get used to this process and afterwards they do not want to reconcile documents electronically. Therefore the author of the article recommends to thoroughly consider if there are significant obstacles and the system has to be implemented partially, thus distorting business processes of the institution. Perhaps a far better solution would be to spare some more time for staff training on all functions of the system and migrate to an electronic document management somewhat later – when everyone conceives what and how has to be done and what is expected of them as of system users.

For the institution staff to support the electronic document circulation and system, it is valuable to start using the system for their everyday tasks, replacing e-mail. Nowadays in public sector most of the information circulates in two ways. First one is e-mail that is being used for forwarding huge amounts of documents and their different versions. Another one is shared server folders, far less used for the sheer process of workflow organization. They are mainly used for the storage of completed documents or their final versions. A modern document management system supports document editing in groups or collaboration. There is, for instance, such project function that allows organize documents as electronic environment of a particular work group. In this case there would be much less data sent per e-mail (one cannot forget the fact that there are backup copies created for e-mails and the increase of their number reduces performance of both servers and user

[6] "Five Document Management Best Practice Considerations for County Government Offices," Docfinity, accessed January 15, 2012, http://www.docfinity.com/index.php/news-a-events/docfinity-articles/42-tips-for-government-offices/205-five-document-management-best-practice-considerations-for-county-government-offices computers) and documents would be accessible to all group, not only to some of its members. Any modern document management system surely supports versioning of documents and therefore anyone can use document management system for a gradual document creation with options to view what changes have been done, by whom and when. In the coming years it will be hard to prevent the fact that people will continue to prefer printing the documents and reading them on paper – most people think it's more comfortable. "In fact, studies have even shown that people are able to retain 30% more information if it is shown to them on paper than if they see it on a computer screen."[7]

One of the most important factors that have to be paid attention to in the development of electronic document management system is the usability of it. The system can be exceptionally rich and voluminous with function but still the first thing the users see is its interface. The fact that the usability is closely related to user satisfaction has been emphasized also by Debbie Stone, interface specialist: "A computer system that is usable in one context, may be unusable in another. As a user interface designer, it is important to consider the context in which the system will be used. A user interface that users find pleasurable is likely to be more acceptable than one that annoys them. Users are more likely to use a computer system that they enjoy than one that irritates them. Contented users are likely to be more productive, so usability is clearly related to user satisfaction."[8] Undeniably significant role in gaining users' trust is played by high-speed performance as well – nobody likes being held up. Ralph Stair and George Reynolds mention that user satisfaction with the system is directly related to its quality, or precisely, to four properties: "User satisfaction with a computer system and the information it generates often depend on the quality of the system and the value of the information it delivers to users. A quality information system is usually flexible, efficient, accessible, and timely."[9] Developers of document management systems do not always rank usability in its list of highest priorities. This is caused by the principles of public sector purchases – when purchasing an information system, the requirements are mainly functional and technical (high-speed performance, maintainability, restorability etc.). As can be seen, the emphasis is on measurable criteria, not usability – it is hard to measure or cannot be measured at all. Therefore the developer will never decrease the performance of the system if that would be necessary to improve its usability. This has to considered as a significant problem that indicates lack of comprehension during the transition process to an electronic document management system. Also Wilbert O. Galitz emphasizes that a system has to cover the needs of the customer's users, not developers: "All users, including customers and other interested parties, today expect a level of design sophistication from all user interfaces, including Web sites. The product, system or Web site must be geared to people's needs and the system's goal, not those of the developers."[10]

In order to make electronic document management system reality, it is not always necessary to start with projecting an information system. Almost always when migrating to electronic document management system, the public sector institution has to change its business processes. There is no need for a system that only duplicates paper document circulation and thus causes more work, or a system that is complicated to use and cannot be fully used in conformity to usual document circulation model in the institution. Often business process optimisation is needed. For instance, electronic document reconciliation has almost no sense if afterwards the document in question anyway has to be printed and signatures have to be collected on paper. Optimizing business processes could gradually lead to creation of automatic work flows in the document management system that would in the future facilitate processes of document registration or creation. In frames of

---

[7] Miles L. Mathieu and Ernest A. Capozzoli, "The Paperless Office: Accepting Digitized Data" (paper presented at the Troy State University, System-wide Business Symposium, 2002).

[8] Debbie Stone et al., User Interface Design and Evaluation (San Francisco: Morgan Kaufmann, 2005), 7.

[9] Ralph Stair and George Reynolds, Principles of Information Systems, Tenth Edition (South-Western, 2011), 59.

[10] Wilbert O. Galitz, The Essential Guide to User Interface Design. An Introduction to GUI Design Principles and Techniques. Third Edition (Indianapolis: Wiley Publishing Inc., 2007), 62.

the same business process optimization it is necessary to create and always maintain a clear vision on who is responsible for document management. People in the public sector have to understand which person or at least which structural unit is responsible for document circulation. Especially important it is for new members of the staff who have until then not worked with the bureaucratic apparatus in the public sector and who do not have the comprehension what difference there is between a regulation, order, instruction or a letter. Mainly in ministries record-keeping sections are responsible for document management and it is also their task to develop an order for document circulation that can be then presented to all staff members.

In order to standardize information exchange between interested parties, a mutually accepted document management terminology has to be used. Problems arise when staff members connected to document circulation cannot understand each other because of differently used terminology. For instance, an records keeper and an IT administrator (who possibly administers the document management system) have fundamentally different opinions on what is to be called a 'file'. A basic user often sees no difference between 'putting a visa on' and 'reconciliation'; however, from the document circulation point of view these are two different processes with different purposes. In order to avoid potential misunderstandings it would be recommended to include a chapter with definitions and explanations into the order for document circulation. Misunderstandings can significantly influence future prospects also when the institution purchases or develops new document management system and uses different terms than those used by the suppliers/developers of the new document management system. In such cases before starting the project it is recommended to agree on a common basic vocabulary.

Conclusions

Managing human factors is one of the most important tasks to make a document management system get recognized and used at all. Public sector institutions are not typical business organizations whose workers are profit-guided. Unlike them, to motivate staff in the public sector it is not enough to present a return-on-investment chart showing that the system will pay off in one year. Habits and traditions are more important in the public sector. However, as everywhere else also in the public sector there will be both supporters and opponents of the implementation of new information systems: "In the worst of cases, individuals will react negatively to change and they will resist using the new system. In best cases, they will incorporate the new system into their work habits as long as they perceive that the supplementary effort needed to learn it and to use it is worthwhile given the perceived usefulness of the system."[11]

When planning the transition to electronic document circulation, it is not enough to purchase or develop a document management system. It is a long-haul project making the institution to perform both organizational and technical changes. In fact, it is a continuous and never-ending process since the technological progress persistently asks for changes also in the institutions that have long undergone the transition to electronic document management. For example, for states of European Union it is now especially current to ensure mobility and public sector workers want to access the documents of their institution from anywhere, using mobile phones, tablet PCs or notebooks. Therefore it is necessary to adapt the document management systems for operations in public network. However, despite the rapid development of technologies, there is still a long way to a completely electronical document management system. "Modern society may be far away from the day when one can reach into a pocket and unfold a viewer in order to show a store clerk, boss or friend notes made on a digitized piece of paper. Office workers are closer, however, to the day when they can plug a viewer into their computer, access the daily paper of choice, and download the information before they go to work and society accepts this as the normal routine. But until the day when digital viewing devices are as simple to use, disposable, storable, and as widespread as paper, there will never be a truly paperless environment."[12]

[11] Jane Carey, ed., Human Factors in Information Systems: The Relationship Between User Interface Design and Human Performance (London: JAI Press Ltd., 1997), 163.

In spite of different sceptical opinions, electronic document circulation will sooner or later reach public sector institutions. However, in order to make it happen, it is necessary to head towards e-government both on the level of the state, as well as in every separate institution. As recommendations for further research the author can mention electronic document management development trends regarding the IT progress, problem scope of the electronic signature, as well as possible case studies about transition to electronic document circulation in different governmental institutions – both in ministries, and in state agencies and services. The topicality of the research subject remains intact as public sector institutions have always worked with documents and document management will always be the main supportive process in public sector.

References

- Carey, Jane, editor. Human Factors in Information Systems: The Relationship Between User Interface Design and Human Performance. London: JAI Press Ltd., 1997.
- Docfinity. "Five Document Management Best Practice Considerations for County Government Offices." Accessed January 15, 2012. http://www.docfinity.com/index.php/news-a-events/docfinity-articles/42-tips-for-government-offices/205-five-document-management-best-practice-considerations-for-county-government-offices
- Galitz, Wilbert O. The Essential Guide to User Interface Design. An Introduction to GUI Design Principles and Techniques. Third Edition. Indianapolis: Wiley Publishing Inc., 2007.
- King, Julia. "Consult users early, often." Computerworld, October 16, 1995.
- Mathieu, Miles L., and Ernest A. Capozzoli "The Paperless Office: Accepting Digitized Data." Paper presented at the Troy State University, System-wide Business Symposium, 2002.
- Nolan, Patrick C. J., and Alex C. W. Fung, and Margaret A. Brown, ed. Pathways to institutional improvement with information technology in educational management. New York: Kluwer Academic Publishers, 2002.
- Stair, Ralph, and George Reynolds. Principles of Information Systems, Tenth Edition. South-Western, 2011.
- Stone, Debbie, and Caroline Jarrett, and Mark Woodroffe , and Shailey Minocha. User Interface Design and Evaluation. San Francisco: Morgan Kaufmann, 2005.

[12] Miles L. Mathieu and Ernest A. Capozzoli, "The Paperless Office: Accepting Digitized Data" (paper presented at the Troy State University, System-wide Business Symposium, 2002).

Cuprins