The consignee is entitled to be remunerated for its rendered services until the consignor's death, pro rata with what has been owed to it for fully performing the granted power of attorney. This rule is also applicable as regards partial remuneration in case of the consignor's death, which shall be made by its inheritors.

The consignment contract terminates also as a result of bankruptcy or adjudication of incapacity applied to any party[34]. The motive is that the contractual parties should be legally competent – the consignor should be itself able to conclude the sale-purchase contracts for which it grants a power of attorney to the consignee, while the consignee should be fully legally competent, since, in performing the contract, it concludes legal documents in its own name. Loss of this competence causes inability to maintain the contract.

2) Effects of terminating the consignment contract

Termination of the consignment contract results in the parties' obligations being extinguished. On the one hand, the undertaken obligations consisting in concluding with third parties sale-purchase contracts with respect to the consignor's goods should no longer be performed. In addition, the consignee, after the contract is terminated, should return the consignor the movable goods entrusted in consignment, or should hand over the amounts received in exchange for the sold goods. Further, the consignee should account to the consignor for the manner in which it chose to fulfil the given tasks.

[34] Based on the old regulation, as per Article 21 of Law No. 178/1934, in case the consignee is bankrupt, the consignor may reclaim the entrusted goods or their price. Since the movable goods entrusted in consignment do not successively pass in the consignee's patrimony, the goods in question or price obtained by being sold to third parties, are not included in the consignee's statement of assets.

On the other hand, the consignor is bound to take the necessary measures to recover the unsold goods from the care of the consignee, also taking along the amounts or values obtained by it in exchange for the sold goods. The consignee is bound to pay the consignee the remuneration appropriate for the part of the contract which was performed until it was terminated, and also to indemnify it for all the expenses or losses suffered as result of the undertaken tasks.

As per Article 2057(4) thesis I of the New Civil Code, in case the termination of the consignment contract occurs as a result of the consignor being declared bankrupt, the goods entrusted to the consignee in consignment are included in the consignor's statement of assets. In other words, these goods should be returned and may be followed by the consignor's creditors. This provision is a consequence of the fact that the goods entrusted in consignment are not successively passed in the consignee's patrimony, since they are handed over to it as simple temporary holder, while the ownership continues to remain in the consignor's patrimony.

Assuming otherwise, that the termination of the contract occurs as a result of the consignee being declared bankrupt, the goods entrusted in consignment are excluded from the statement of assets and shall be promptly repossessed by the consignor. Accordingly, the consignee's creditor shall not be able to follow these goods for satisfying their receivables, and the goods should be returned to the consignor. The explanation resides in the fact that the property over the goods remains in the consignor's patrimony, and the consignee is a simple temporary holder until they are sold to third parties or being returned in the care of their actual owner.

In the same sense, Law No. 178/1934 also stipulates under Article 21, as follows: in case the consignee is bankrupt, the consignor may reclaim the goods entrusted in consignment or their price which was not paid by money, or otherwise.

CONCLUSIONS

The consignment contract is therefore a species of mandate without representation which has as representative the contract of commission. Therefore the contract of consignment derives from the contract of commission.

But the consignment contract is a special contract, used mainly by entrepreneurs, found on a very large scale in both internal and external commercial relationships. Thru it a faster unloading of goods is possible, mainly because the consignees have their own network used to unload and deliver the goods on the market. also, this type of contract favors cost reductions of the consignee prices regarding the launch, advertising, direct sale of a large quantity of goods, making them more accessible to the consumer. Therefore many producers of goods sell by means of a consignee, usually a specialized company already known on the determined market territory.

NOVATION, WAY OF MODIFYING THE LIABILITIES – THEORETICAL AND PRACTICAL ASPECTS

GABRIEL BOROI[*]
CĂTĂLIN-BOGDAN NAZAT[]

Abstract
Although largely treated by the scholars in their writings, the novation is not a common practice in the Romanian juridical area. As a definition, the novation represents that juridical mechanism through which the parties of an agreement decide to replace a pre-existent valid liability with a new liability, by observing certain conditions.
The purpose of this paper is, mainly, to highlight the amendments brought by the New Civil Code and to explain their impact on the operation under discussion.

Keywords: New Civil Code, novation, modify, liability, parties, agreement.

Introduction

Defined as the convention based on which the parties extinguish an old liability and replace it with a new liability[1], the novation presumes the existence of a causality relationship between the two successive liabilities, thus: the extinguishing of the old liability depends on the generation of the new liability and, also, the generation of the new liability depends on the extinguishing of the old liability.

Regulated by the Civil Code from 1864, in Chapter VIII treating on the extinguishing of liabilities (more specifically, in articles 1128 to 1137), the novation is currently regulated in Title VI – Conveyance and transformation of liabilities from the Civil Code in force starting with the 1st of October 2011, respectively in articles 1609 to 1614. In our opinion, based on the current regulation regarding novation, the previous interpretations belonging to certain doctrinaires were discarded, which, taking into account the old regulation and the fact that through this operation the old liability is extinguished, considered and analyzed it as being a true juridical means of extinguishing a compulsory relationship[2].

Like many other Romanian law operations, novation, too, originates in the Roman law. The latter saw a great importance in the period when the assignment of claims, just like any other means of assignment of liabilities, was not allowed in Rome; thus, the novation appeared as a means of conveying a liability, allowing the interchange or indirect replacement of the creditor or of the debtor by another person[3]. In the Roman law, novation was defined by Ulpian as being "a transfer of duty from a previous liability to a new liability (prioris debiti in aliam liabilityem transfusion atque translatio)", and further on, novation occurred through the change of duty between the same parties, thus replacing an older liability with a new one[4].

Although long exploited in the specialized doctrine, the proposed theme remains, however, a subject open to interpretations and debates, with the necessity of making new determinations in order to emphasize the changes brought to the matter under discussion through the legislative changes recently occurred in our country. Moreover, we consider that the proposed theme is of current interest, also due to the fact that in a market economy undergoing continuous changes, the liabilities gained, in time, a special significance due to their decisive role in the destiny of any participant to a juridical relationship.

In conclusion, the main purpose for drafting this paper consists in making a complex analysis of the novation operation, first of all from the perspective of the Civil Code provisions, recently adopted in our country.

Notion. Types of novation. In the course of time, the operation being the subject of the present study has been assigned several definitions, but we will only focus on the one according to which novation is the convention through which the parties to a compulsory juridical relationship extinguish an existing liability, and replace it with a new liability[5]. As we will see hereinafter, this definition assigned to novation is of special importance for establishing and analyzing the effects of novation.

According to the above mentioned definition, this operation is characterized by the fact that the compulsory juridical relationship turns into a new compulsory juridical relationship, the extinguishing of the old liability being only a side effect of this operation[6].

The specialized doctrine of our country classifies novation into two categories: objective novation and subjective novation[7]. Thus, novation is objective when it occurs between the initial debtor and creditor, but the scope or the cause of the juridical relationship is changed. Novation is subjective when the creditor or the debtor under the juridical relationship is replaced with another person. We will deal with the two types of novation in more detail on the course of this paper, as we progress in the analysis of novation as an operation.

Conditions for novation. We must state from the beginning that because the novation is an agreement, it presumes the fulfilment of all the validity conditions concerning agreements, as stipulated by the applicable law. Moreover, according to the specialized doctrine and to case law,[8] novation also presumes the fulfilment of the following conditions[9]:

1. the existence of a valid pre-existing liability which will be extinguished by novation – a few mentions should be made in relation to this pre-existing liability.

Thus, novation will not produce effects if the old liability is absolutely null and void. If the old liability is relatively null and void, the realization of novation may mean the confirmation of the liability, which becomes valid, and, consequently, it will turn into a new liability. Of course, for this effect to take place, the novation must be agreed with by the person entitled to invoke the relative null and void character of the liability.

However, in spite all that, in case the person which could ask for the cancellation of the old liability is incapable of doing that or its consent was vitiated at the time of consenting on the novation, it can be subject to cancellation for inability or vice of consent. The same thing happens in case the person who was not aware of the fact that the old liability was subject to cancellation, although such person was fully capable of that.

It was still the doctrine the one which stated the fact that novation cannot be completed when the old liability consists in delivering a determined individual good which accidentally dissipated prior to the completion of novation, but not due to the debtor's fault, because the old liability was extinguished by law[10].

It was unanimously apprehended that the liability subject to a condition can be replaced, through novation, with a pure and simple condition (and the other way round). However, things are different in relation to the possibility of novating a liability subject to a condition into a new liability subject to the same condition. Thus, according to some authors, if the old liability was affected by a condition, the same will be the case of the new liability, too, unless otherwise agreed by the parties[11]. On the other hand, it was claimed that the liability subject to a condition cannot be novated into a new liability subject to the same condition, being assessed that the adding or elimination of a condition which affects the juridical relationship represents the modification of the same liability[12].

Finally, an imperfect civil liability can turn, through novation, into a civil liability as such.

2. the generation of a new valid liability – as we have mentioned before, the fulfilment of novation is conditioned by the generation of a new liability, which is the reason for the extinguishing of the old liability.

If the new liability is not valid, being null and void, the novation will not produce effects, and the old liabilities will continue to exist. In case the new liability is subject to cancellation, meaning it is relatively null and void, it will consolidate retroactively after the expiry of the term for the prescription of the action for cancelling. Thus, if the new liability is absolutely null and void or cancelled, the old liability will become effective again, on a retroactive basis.

3. the new liability must contain a new element (aliquid novi) in relation to the old liability which is extinguished – novation cannot exist without this new element which, as shown before, may consist in the change of parties, of the scope or of the cause for the juridical relationship.

We have shown before[13] that this element of novelty can also consist of the transformation of a conditioned liability into a pure and simple liability or of the transformation of a pure and simple liability into a conditioned liability.

As we have mentioned in the first part of our work, based on an analysis of art. 1609 from the Civil Code, one can infer that novation can be of two types, i.e. novation when one of the subjects to the juridical relationship (creditor or debtor) is changed with another person and novation when another element under the compulsory juridical relationship between the same parties, is changed.

Further on, we will make a brief analysis of the two types of novation:

a) Novation when the debtor or the creditor changes – either party to the juridical relationship can be changed through the novation contract.

Novation when the debtor is changed is expressly stipulated in paragraph (2) of art. 1609 from the Civil Code, according to which novation occurs when a new debtor replaces the initial debtor, which is discharged by the creditor, thus the initial liability being extinguished. Art. 1609 paragraph (2), final thesis also states the fact that in this case, novation can operate without the initial consent.

According to the specialized studies from our country, novation with the change of the debtor presumes a certain and unequivocal manifestation from the creditor, in the sense of discharging the original debtor. Thus, the case law in our country, as well as the French case law decided that there is no case for novation when[14]: the creditor accepted a second debtor, without expressing its intention of discharging the first debtor; the creditor accepted a partial payment from a third party; a third party undertakes in relation to the creditor to pay the debtor's debt; the debtor empowers a third party to pay its debt to the creditor, originating from a compulsory relationship; the creditor accepted, upon the debtor's request, to invoice a third party for the payment of the services supplied by the debtor; the lessor agrees to assign the rental contract, without discharging the assigning lessee or accepts a long term payment of the rent by another person different from the titular of the rental contract.

From the point of view of the means of defence in the case of novation with the change of the debtor, the Civil Code establishes in art. 1612 that the new debtor may not oppose to the creditor the means of defence that it had against the initial debtor, or the ones that the latter had against the creditor, except for the case when, in the latter situation, the debtor can invoke absolute nullity of the act which generated the initial liability.

Novation with the change of the creditor is expressly stipulated in paragraph (3) of art. 1609 from the Civil Code, according to which novation occurs when, as an effect of a new contract, another creditor substitutes the initial one, in relation to which the debtor is discharged, thus the old liability being extinguished. In other words, the initial creditor discharges its debtor in exchange for a new liability which it undertakes in front of a new creditor[15].

The specialized doctrine correctly apprehended that the novation with the change of the creditor lost part of its usefulness once with the occurrence of the assignment of claims, the two operations being distinct[16]. Thus, if in the case of the assignment of claims, the initial liability remains the same, only the creditor being changed, in the case of novation, however, the initial liability extinguishes and transforms into a new liability. The assignment of claims is expressly stipulated in the Civil Code, in articles 1566 to 1592.

b) Novation with the change of a structural element of the compulsory relationship, achieved by the same subjects – it was claimed that the change of the object of the compulsory juridical relationship is when, for example, the parties agree that instead of an owed amount of money, another performance is executed.

On the other hand, changing the cause may occur when the buyer of a good (acting as debtor of the good's price) agrees with the seller on the generation of a new liability, while preserving the price under the title of a loan[17].

Some authors also remind of the novation with the change of the liabilities' means, accepting, however, that this concept of means in the field of novation is ambiguous and quite difficult to circumscribe[18].

One must apprehend, however, that the modification of the execution term of a liability does not represent a novation, the old liability not being extinguished, and the new liability not being generated at the same time.

4. The parties' intention to novate (animus novandi) – more specifically, the parties' intention to transform the old liability into a new one.

This last requirement is expressly stipulated in art. 1610 from the Civil Code. According to which novation is not presumed, and the novation intention should be certain. The absence of this mutual intention of the parties, to perform the novation, makes the novation inexistent.

Effects of novation. Based on the definition of novation, itself, it can be inferred that this operation produces a double effect, namely the extinguishing of an old liability and the generation of a new liability. Thus, a new juridical relationship occurs between the parties, always of a contractual nature, being the result of the parties' will to perform the novation[19].

According to the correct apprehensions of the specialized doctrine, between the two effects of novation there is "an indissoluble connection, in the sense that the generation of the new liability has as cause the extinguishing of the old liability and the other way round; the old liability extinguishes only if the new liability is generated and, correlatively, the generation of the new liability is subordinated to the extinction of the old liability"[20].

Once the old liability is extinguished, all the actions, the accessory clauses, the exceptions and guarantees which accompanied it.

a) The situation of the novated claim guarantees – according to art. 1611 from the Civil Code, the mortgages which guarantee the initial claim will not accompany the new claim, unless expressly stipulated. Thus, the initial claim mortgages are not taken over by the new liability, but, to the extent the preservation thereof is desired, this must be expressly stipulated in the deed of novation.

If the novation involves the change of the debtor, the guarantees can no longer be preserved, but the new debtor can offer its goods as guarantee. In this sense, paragraph (2) of the same art. 1611 stipulates that in the case of novation with the change of the debtor, the mortgages related to the initial claim do not subsist in relation to the initial debtor's goods without the latter's consent and they do are not correlated with the new debtor's goods without the agreement thereof. Thus, if the new debtor does not possess goods which may be offered as a guarantee, the old debtor may continue to preserve the initially established guarantees, in order to be used by the creditor[21].

If the novation operates between the creditor and one of the joint debtors, the mortgages connected to the old claim may only be transferred onto the co-debtor's goods, which takes over the obligation concerning the new debt [art. 1611 paragraph (3)].

b) the effects of novation on the joint debtors and guarantors – expressly regulated by art. 1613 from the Civil Code, this effect of novation consists in the fact that the novation operating between the creditor and one of the joint debtors discharges the other co-debtors in relation to the creditor. The novation which operates in connection with the main debtor discharges the guarantors. In spite all that, the exception is represented by the case when the creditor asked for the co-debtors' agreement or, depending on the case, the guarantors' agreement, in order for the latter to be bound by the new liability; the initial claim subsists in the situation in which the debtors or the guarantors fail to express their agreement [art. 1613 paragraph (2) from the Civil Code].

c) the effects of novation on the joint creditors – the novation approved by a joint creditor is not enforceable against the other creditors except in relation to the part of the claim undertaken by the respective creditor (art. 1614 from the Civil Code).

Conclusions. Although, nowadays, this operation (i.e. the novation) is not frequently used in the legal practice area, it still represents a subject of interest for the legal scholars. Thus, it is our view that new interpretations and opinions will be formulated in the future with respect to this subject, mainly due to the new provisions of the Civil code.

THE PRINCIPLE OF UNJUST ENRICHMENT FROM THE EUROPEAN CODES TO THE EUROPEAN CIVIL CODE

IRINA ANGHEL[*]

Abstract
Despite a very long history and the unanimous recognition of solid moral grounds, the principle of unjust enrichment found its place in the legal systems only very late and its acceptance occurred after many hesitations and imposed many conditions for its application.
This paper takes a comparative view at the way the principle of restitution (according to which the unjustified enrichment is not allowed) is reflected in three leading continental European legal systems (French, German and Swiss) and the possible role this principle will play in a future European Civil Code.

Keywords - restitution, codification, Europe, unjustified enrichment, principles.

Introduction

Lawmakers have always avoided the legislative sanction of principles that are too general as they did not wish to undermine the legal system by introducing principles whose general applicability would have called into question many of the special legal institutions. It is however undeniable that, although it was not taken up as a principal tenet of law, unjust enrichment represented a "formative force behind a variety of rules and institutions of positive law"[1].

Originating in the Roman Law, the moral principle of restitution is currently recognised under all modern legal systems represented in Europe. Nevertheless, its recognition by the jurisdictions of the Old Continent is inconsistent. Even though differently reflected in various legal systems of European states, the principle of restitution could, and in our opinion should, be regarded as one of the fundamental pillars of the European Civil Code, if such a code is ever to be enacted. It is therefore of great interest to look at the main current European codifications in order to identify the elements which need to be harmonised.

By having a have a closer look at some of the civil law (Romano-Germanic) jurisdictions (focusing on the French, German and Swiss Codes) we aim at indentifying the elements related to the principle of not allowing unjustified enrichment which might potentially find their place in a future common European codification.

1. General comments regarding Romano-Germanic Legal System

The jurisdictions in the Romano-Germanic system were the first to adopt the principle of unjust enrichment through legal actions. But even in this system there were two quite different approaches of the issue which in turn generated radically different consequences.

In the Romano-Germanic system there were two fundamental codifications that underlay all subsequent civil codifications: the French Civil Code and the German Civil Code. The Swiss Code of Obligations is also worth mentioning because it influenced the codifications of some of the states of Latin America in the first half of the past century and its translation was adopted in Turkey in 1926.

2. The French Model

The first major codification was made during Napoleon's time, in France - the Napoleonic Civil Code of 1804. It is one of the great achievements and prides of its creator and namesake who used to say that his victories might be forgotten, but his code will last throughout history. And he was most definitely right. The Napoleonic Civil Code was a model to follow for countries from all corners of the world (such as Romania, which in 1864 adopted a Civil Code strongly inspired from the French one). When Spain adopted, in 1889, a Civil Code of French inspiration, it brought the spirit of the Napoleonic Code to its colonies, and many South American states followed suite.

The Napoleonic Civil Code contains no explicit reference to unjust enrichment per se, but many of its specific institutions are evidently based on this principle. The lack of a clear legislative sanction thereof is attributed to a great extent to the code's authors being influenced by the writings of famous legal scholars, such as R.J. Pothier (1699-1772) and J. Domat (1625-1696) which did not uphold unjust enrichment as a source of obligations, but did however expressly regulate negotiorum gestor and undue payment under the name of quasi-contracts. These two latter institutions, together with other important institutions of the French law[2], can be considered special applications of the general principle. Pothier and Domat, together with other jurists, considered that "the principle is too vague to be proposed as legal rule and that, like an underground river, it feeds precise rules, which prove its existence, but it never surfaces"[3].

Nonetheless, the need for a general sanction of the principle, so as to avoid unjust situations, was increasingly felt. The merit for creating the modern theory of unjust enrichment in the French legal system is attributed entirely to doctrine and jurisprudence.

At first, the courts or law had constantly rejected the principle of unjust enrichment in cases that were not perfectly regulated by the existent legal rules. It was deemed that its general applicability could have unfortunate consequences on other law institutions, preventing their application, and that the system of legal rules as a whole could be blown away like a house of cards by the equity current being manifested. Practically, it was said then that the two fundamental principles, neminem laedere (which underlies tort) and suum cuique tribuere (which refers to the non admittance of unjust enrichment), could replace all civil law rules, and that was unacceptable.

At the end of the 19th century, a strong doctrinal movement militated in France for the recognition of unjust enrichment as a source of civil obligations. The prestigious French jurists, Aubry and Rau, authors of the classical patrimony theory, developed a theory of unjust enrichment within their very theory on patrimony. They considered that one of the rights of a patrimony owner is the right to claim, by means of a personal action, which we can classify as de in rem verso action, the restitution of the patrimonial objects and assets. They also asserted that actio de in rem verso should be taken as a sanction of the equity rule according to which no one can enrich themselves at the expense of another in all cases where a person's patrimony is unjustly enriched at the expense of another person's patrimony, unless the latter does benefit by obtaining what is due to him, through any action arising from contract, quasi contract, tort or quasi tort"[4].

Nonetheless, the jurisprudence hesitated to adopt this solution. In 1892, in a famous case (known as the "Boudier affair" or the "fertilizers affair"), the Court of Cassation in Paris decided to allow an action grounded on unjust enrichment. It "opened the flood gates wide"[5], taking it as far as to support that the exercise of such action "deriving from the equity principle, which prohibits enrichment at the expense of another, is not subject to any condition if not stipulated by any text of law,"[21] .

It is unanimously accepted that the judgement given in this case represented an acknowledgement of unjust enrichment as source of civil obligations; however, the general nature of this formula, which was so wide that it could have destroyed the entire legal order[6], was bound to be amended. Therefore, in a judgement on 12 May 1914, the Court of Cassation in Paris found, in another case, that actio de in rem verso cannot be allowed unless certain conditions are met, and listed therein the conditions enunciated by Aubry and Rau.

The judgements that followed adopted these conditions, and unjust enrichment and actio de in rem verso were taken on by most jurisdictions of French inspiration.

Last, but not least, it should be mentioned that in many jurisdictions that can be considered of French inspiration, where the Civil Codes were amended or even where new codes have been adopted, the institution of unjust enrichment is expressly regulated (for example, article 2298 of the Civil Code of the State of Louisiana, articles 1493 to 1496 of the Civil Code of Quebec, article 212 of the Dutch Civil Code as well as the regulation in the newly enacted Civil Code of our own country, Romania), in some cases the new texts departing from the conditions established by the French law. As a matter of fact, even a draft of the Romanian Civil Code, drawn up during the Communist period, was supposed to include five articles regarding unjust enrichment and undue payment, the latter, we believe, being rightfully considered a particular situation of the former.

At the end of this historical overview of the sanction, in the modern law, of unjust enrichment as source of obligations, we can conclude that, notwithstanding the immense merit of having acknowledged this legal institution, French law is also responsible for preventing many of its useful applications by formulating certain conditions, not so much restrictive, as discouragingly abstract and insufficiently defined, such as the "absence of cause".

3. The German Model

The second extremely important codification in Europe is the German Civil Code (B.G.B.)[7]. After long hesitations of the German jurists and having generated famous controversies, it became effective, almost 100 years after the adoption of the Napoleonic Code.

[7] Bürgerliches Gesetzbuch, German Civil Code of 1896, effective as of 1900, is chronologically the second most important codification in Europe, after the Napoleonic Civil Code of 1804, and, is similarly an inspiration model for many modern civil codes.

After the fall of Napoleon, Germany continued to be politically influenced by France. Baden Baden kept the Napoleonic Code and continued to apply it, while other states rejected it and returned to Ius Commune. However, all German states increasingly raised the issue of codification, wishing to achieve a simplification and rationalization of the law. The position of a well-known jurist, Friedrich Karl von Savigny, played an important role in postponing the codification at the time. He was the founder of the so-called Moderne Rechtsschule which drawn up the "New Pandectae", in which an overwhelming importance was given to terms and definitions.

The adoption of the Code was strongly supported by Ihering, and due to his efforts, in 1896 the B.G.B. was adopted and became effective as of January 1st, 1900.

It has been said that the German Civil Code is more academic and more technical and its rules are more precise than those of the Napoleonic Code[8]. Unfortunately, as we shall see, when it comes to the issue of unjust enrichment the German jurists did not live up to the expectations and the current regulation is not the best there is.

Significantly influenced by the conclusions of the Modern Law School of Savigny and based on Pandectae, B.G.B. has a structure completely different from that of the Napoleonic Code and consists of five books:

1. General Principles (one of the novelties as compared to the Napoleonic Code, comprising the common rules of the private law system, as a whole);
2. Obligations (it comprises the main product of the Roman law and Ius Commune. It should be mentioned that in the German system, as opposed to the French one, the construct of obligation is more important than that of property, since after the industrial revolution, it was deemed that not property is essential, but obligation);
3. Property (note the existence of the principle of abstraction, which allows for the existence of two contracts in the field of transmission of property: one of "obligation" and one of "transfer" ("disposition");
4. Family; and
5. Inheritance.

The differences between the two most important European codifications did not refer only to their structure, but also to the institutions they regulated. Unlike the Napoleonic Code, the German Civil Code not only acknowledges unjust enrichment, but in addition to applications thereof in numerous subject matters[9], it includes ten articles (from 812 to 822) dedicated expressly to this institution grouped in a subchapter entitled "Unjust Enrichment" (Ungerechtfertigte Bereicherung)[10].

The German Civil Code is often presented as a codification characterized by precision, consistency and clarity, thus showing consistency with the Roman law, but in the regulation of unjust enrichment, the long praised code lacks precisely in precision and clarity. The shortcoming seems to be attributed to the fact that the regulation contains a general action, followed by several lists of situations, to which no clear correlations are made. This reflects a compromise between Savigny's

[9] For example: article 324 provides for the application of the unjust enrichment rules, when a contract is terminated due to circumstances for which the party is not responsible; article 682 when the parties do not have business management capacity; article 684 when management is contrary to the interests/will of the managed party; articles 987, 988 and 993 where it is raised the issue of restitution of an asset by its holder.

ideas, supporting the introduction of a general action based on unjust enrichment and the other authors of the code, who preferred the traditional approach, based on condictiones.

However, it remains unquestionable the application of unjust enrichment where, due to the principle of abstraction, a transfer made on the basis of a valid "transfer contract" could give rise to restitution if the "obligation contract" ceases to be valid, thus the "transfer contract" losing its cause. Some of the other situations where actions based on unjust enrichment apply were mentioned when we talked of condictiones.

Last, but not least, we should be mentioned that, used to the technical nature and clearly defined concepts of the German law, German courts were quite reluctant to an extensive application of unjust enrichment when faced with general terms such as "enrichment at the expense of another" or "unjust". As a result, unaccustomed to such extremely wide constructs, German courts also limited the application of the principle.

4. Swiss Code of Obligations

Without going into details, it should be nonetheless mentioned that the Swiss Code of Obligations of 1912 includes a chapter (entitled "Obligations Deriving from Unjust Enrichment") dedicated entirely to the institution that makes the object to our analysis. The seven articles regulating the field refer to:

- General Conditions (article 62, which in the first paragraph asserts the principle, demanding restitution when a person has been unjustly enriched at the expense of another and in the second paragraph lists several particular cases of restitution, derived from Roman law, namely: when something was obtained (1) for no valid reason; (2) for a reason that was not achieved; or (3) for a reason that subsequently ceased to exist);
- Undue payment (article 63 defines in the first paragraph the conditions when the general rule applies in case of undue payment and sets out the condition that the solvens provide proof of error; the second paragraph sanctions the inapplicability of the general rule of restitution in case of natural obligations);
- Scope of the restitution obligation (article 64 stipulates what in German law is known as "objection to the loss of enrichment" – that is, the defendant's possibility to obtain a rejection of the claim made against him, if he proves that he is no longer "enriched" at the time of the claim – and also specifying the exceptions from this situation, cases when the defendant is bound to the restitution, even if he is no longer "enriched": (1) if he alienated in bad faith the benefit received; (2) if he should have known, at the time of the alienation, that he might be bound to return them);
- Rights in respect to expenditure (article 65 establishes the condition of restitution of the expenses made by the defendant who is obliged to return the benefit, as it follows: in the first paragraph, it stipulates that the defendant is entitled to reimbursement of the expenses necessary or useful, although where unjust enrichment was received in bad faith, the useful expenditure must be reimbursed only within the limits of the added value existing at the time of the restitution; the second paragraph makes reference to compensation for other expenditures, to which the defendant is not entitled, but where no such compensation is offered to him, he may, before returning the property, remove anything he added to it, provided this is possible without damaging it);
- Statutes of limitation (article 67 the first paragraph contains the rule: the statutes of limitation and the date on which it begins to elapse is the time when the injured party learned of his right to restitution, without, however, exceeding ten years after the date when such right arose; the second paragraph stipulates an exception, which allows the "impoverished" party to refuse to satisfy the claim, even if his own claim for restitution exceeds the statutes of limitation, when the enrichment consists of a debt.

Without risking any final conclusion as regards the regulation of the unjust enrichment in the Swiss law, we notice that this regulation can be considered a solution of compromise between the German system, where unjust enrichment is extensively regulated, and the French system, where such regulations is completely absent.

5. Towards an European Codification

In today's Europe tendencies of legislative harmonization manifest in all aspects of the law, including those traditionally considered "strictly national", such as civil law. It has been quite a few years already since, despite a great number of opponents, there were serious debates about the drafting of a European Civil Code. Once the idea was launched, many realized that this is an immense challenge and the European jurists are facing probably the most important and delicate task requiring an in-depth comparative analysis, which meant going back to the principles. After launching the call for initiating this step, many commissions have been established and many reputable jurists become involved in this mission, starting, arbitrarily or not, from the Obligations Law, an area that saw another group of states try to come up with a common codification, almost a century ago.[11].

Moreover, as Professor Christian von Bar, coordinator of the Osnabrük group, who, at the request of the European Parliament, made a study of the private law systems in the European Union, in view of creating a European Civil Code, said, it is undisputable that there is a "need for a common legal code, valid all over Europe, particularly a code governing the distribution of wealth, now that the Common Market has a common currency". In this context, the moral principle of rejecting unjust enrichment, acknowledged by all legal systems, but applied so differently, even by great law systems, proves to be again at the centre of attention, more than a century after it was acknowledged as a source of obligations in the continental European law.

Conclusions

Traditionally considered an institution of "civilian" tradition, the principle of unjust enrichment has lately been quoted[12] as one of the "civilian" principles adopted by the common law, and it lies at the basis of the theory of restitution. Not long ago, the common law system did not allow actions that included general claims of restitution based on unjustified enrichment, but once the forms of action were abolished, the substantive principle of unjustified enrichment acquired an extremely important role, being considered a fundament of all actions leading to restitution, not only of those originated from quasi-contract.

The equitable principle of non-admittance of unjust enrichment is currently applied in most national law systems of the five continents. In Europe and the Americas, both the "civil law jurisdictions" and the mixed ones (such as Scotland, Louisiana, Quebec) are based on this principle, and lately even the "common law" jurisdictions afford a wide acknowledgment of the unjust enrichment, due to a wider acceptance of the theory of restitution in those countries.

[11] We refer here to the French and Italian Project of Code of Obligations, v. Steurmann, Contribution a l'etude du Projet Franco-Italiende Code des Obligations et a son introduction en Roumanie. 1933.

In the civil law system, unjust enrichment appears to be expressly regulated as source of obligations in some countries (such as Armenia, Bulgaria, Switzerland, Philippines, Germany, Greece, Italy, Louisiana, Mexico, Mongolia, Quebec, Peru, Portugal, and Tunisia and more recently our own country, Romania) or, without being sanctioned in special texts of law, it was synthesized and developed by the doctrine and jurisprudence (such as, for example in France, Spain, Romania, Argentine), and the principle of unjust enrichment underlies many of the fundamental institutions of the system.

The importance of this principle is confirmed also by the structure proposed for the European Obligations Law, which is deemed to be formed of three main braches: Contract Law, Tort Law and Restitution Law, the latter being based on the principle of non-admittance of unjust enrichment.

In this day and age, when globalization has become an almost obsessive subject, lawmakers have an understandable tendency to return to principles, particularly to moral principles based on which to develop a global and coherent if not uniform legal system. Moral principles, as undisputable source of judicial institutions, are increasingly rediscovered and carefully considered by jurists of all legal systems. The obvious purpose is to find common ground for the law institutions functioning in various regions of the globe, and this is why the generous principle of unjustified enrichment should continue to be the object of many research studies, being one of those principles with universal vocation.

CONSIDERATIONS ON THE RELATIONSHIP BETWEEN PRODUCER AND CONSUMER ON FOOD MARKET

MĂDĂLINA DINU*

Abstract
Perhaps one of the largest legislative climbing in recent years is shaped by the instruments that Romanian legislator puts at hand in order to protect its consumers from potential abuses of the producer. The importance of rules of such liability producer is justified primarily by the fact that a modern democratic society, consumer protection has become an essential part of the whole system of social protection. Moreover, the consumer's right to health and safety of its community is a constitutional principle, a consumer is considered by the Community forums as a new form of citizenship.

Keywords: producer, consumer, food market, provider, protection

Introduction

The desiderate that the offer issued by the producer and accepted by the consumer to be as agreed between the parties, remained often an illusion, so that, through domestic and international legal instruments are provided, on the one hand, guarantees that for lack of sufficient consumer products conform it to have a partial or complete repair of the damage suffered by negligence product producer or service to access it, on the other hand, if there legislative means that protect consumers, the producer will have more care on the quality of marketed products.

In this paper I intend to analyze the legal framework through which is the incidence of domestic producer responsibility for food quality, beginning with the analysis of concept as producer, consumer and relationship between them. It is important to understand that acceptance of Romanian legislator gave such notions, as the only way we will be able to evaluate the actions of state, theoretical and practical solutions proposed for removal from the market of individual consumers posing, users and public. Producer responsibility for the quality of food placed in the center of the idea of security products in the circulation and thorough study of the mechanisms involved in binding its producer and similar persons.

Concept of producer

The current sense, the producer shall mean that person by his work, creating goods, scientific or artistic value[1]. Based on the producer type near term and reaching specific difference, we might say, the producer of food, means a person who by his labor to produce food themselves or others.

However, the term ”producer” has a rather broad sense, going into this class operators in a broad sense, however, and persons holding capacity of the seller or dealer, trader manufacturers were considered producing a finished product or component of a product, the raw material manufacturing, who apply their name, mark or other distinctive sign on products, who reconditions the product, trader or distributor, by his conduct change product features, representative of a registered trader who not established in Romania or in his absence, the importer of the product trader who import products in order subsequently to an operation selling, renting, leasing or any other form of distribution, the distributor of the imported product, if not importer knows, even if the manufacturer is listed, the product distributor if the importer can not be identified, unless you notify the person aggrieved within 30 days to request the identity of the importer[2].

In a synthetic definition, we can say that producer is the manufacturer of a finished product, the producer of any raw material or a component manufacturer, and any person who, by putting his name, trade mark or other distinctive product presents as its producer. But, in a careful analysis of the provision of Article 3 of Law across 240/2004, noted thatsecurity must be extended to all those involved in production and distribution ofproduct on the market, taking into account in determining liability both work real producer, and that of the apparently.

In this context, and considering the meaning given by law the concept of producer, we can easily imagine situations where the producer, as defined by law can not be identified, in which inherent next question is: who will be responsible for any effects harmful product put on the market? Liability is the responsibility of each provider who fails to notify within a reasonable time damaged consumer identification producer or the person who supplied the product. In other words, we can say that operates a transfer of responsibility from the producer to the supplier, each supplier of the product that created the harm, being treated as a producer, consumer harmed if he did not communicate in a reasonable time, data identifying the manufacturer or the person who supplied the product; same is true in the event that we are dealing with an imported product that affect food safety, if the product does not indicate the importer provided, even if said producer name.

This interpretation of legal provisions resulting from the linking of art. 2 of Law 240/2004 with those of Article 2 of Law nr.321 of 15.10.2009 which is the law in matters of food marketing and supplier defined as "person or entity authorized to engage in production, processing or food distribution to marketing. " In other words, in the Law nr.321 notion is analyzed by the manufacturer, but only that the provider that involves the producer, can speak about identity in defining the two concepts. We disagree with this view, saying that the distinction between the concept of manufacturer and supplier that is the proximate genus which is the producer the specific difference that is given to the concept of provider, as any producer and supplier can be but not every vendor can be a producer. Specific activity is the manufacture of the product manufacturer while its distribution is characteristic for the work done by the supplier. Certainly the two activities, production, distribution that can be found in the remit of the same person, but in the meantime can target different people, the producer being the person in charge ofall aspects of production until such time that reach the final product, while the supplier is one who takes food marketing activity respect the finished product. However, the two activities, namely manufacturing and product distribution must be made in a professional, profit-making activities, which is why the marketing of product is essential for the approach of a potential liability.

Concept of consumer

The consumer is central pawn production activities, distribution and consumption. Economic activity is based around the consumer, which is the ultimate recipient of all spheres of production.

In other words, is what determines consumer market competition between various producers, whereas, in relation to personal needs and the knowledge about the products on the market, the consumer is opting for a product against another, he enjoying the certain rights to all the high principles of the Consumer Code (Chapter III), namely:

a)the right to be protected against the risk of purchasing a product or a service are likely to prejudice the life, health or safety or affect their rights and legitimate interests;
b) the right to be informed fully, fairly and accurately on the essential characteristics of products and services so that they adopt decision on them to meet their needs better and to be educated as consumers;

b)the right of access to markets that provide a wide range of quality products and services;

c)the right to be compensated for damage caused by poor quality of products and services, using for this purpose means provided by law;

d) right to organize associations for consumer protection in order to protect their interests;
e) the right to refuse signing contracts containing unfair terms in accordance with the law;
f) the right to not be prevented by an operator to obtain a benefit provided by applicable law;

The definitions in the literature, the consumer shall mean, on one hand "the person who consumes goods from production[3]", on the other hand, "the person who buys for his own goods offered by manufacturers in the free market, competitive[4]" .

Based on the two meanings of the notion of consumption, it outlines two theories that essential element consumer, objective theory, that the subjective theory.

The objective theory, the notion of consumers include all natural or legal persons, entered in this field "producers, manufacturers, traders, the traders generally purchasing goods for their activity, buyers of products for their particular use, simple passer-by who have a relationship with the product, but have suffered damage as a result of its defective character.[5] " Therefore, according to this view, all persons are protected against manufacturer launches market risk products for consumers use. I appreciate that this view requires some qualification, meaning that not all people are consumers but those who had a connection with the product improperly, directly or indirectly. As such, the mere passing of speaking this theory becomes the consumer andtherefore enjoy the protection of law only insofar as the risks and consequences ofproduct produced directly or indirectly have effects on him. Thus, we can not includein the consumer category passers person who does not even aware of that producton the market.

Subjective notion of consumer theory associated with the processes of acquisition, possession or use of goods or services for private purposes. In other words, as stressed by the French specialist legal literature, consumers are "people that purchase or use goods or services for something unprofessional, or for their personal use[6]".

Therefore, unlike the objective theory that identifies the consumer with any person, subjective theory establishes two rules for determining the consumer of other people: on the one hand, the person to acquire, possess or use a good or service, on the other hand, acquisition, possession or use of goods or services to be performed privately. Subjective theory and joined the Romanian legislature intended to define when the consumer as "any natural or legal person who buys, acquires, uses, and consume food outside professional activity[7]" or "individual or group of individuals acting purposes outside his trade, industrial production[8], craft or profession ".

Therefore, according to the subjective theory to acquire the consumer and thus qualify for protection in this matter, a person must meet two conditions:

1. to be an individual person, legal person can not be a consumer. As such, in relation to the subjective theory embraced by the Romanian legislation in the field, in the notion of the consumer are included only individuals or groups of individuals who sign a contract outside of their professional activity. In that the groups of people who appreciate that the text is in association aims to protect consumers associations and not any associations. As such, consumers only have the status of associations to defend and protect consumer interests.

2. individuals to purchase, acquire, use or consume products or services outside their area of professional activity. Therefore have the status of consumers are protected from individuals who buy, acquire, use the products for consumption. In other words, if people buy some goods for personal consumption but not for resale, for example, they will not be qualified as consumers will not enjoy protection in this regard. Moreover, the hypothesis stated above can attract even their liability if they distribute such products on the market which caused further adverse consequences for human health.

We believe that the reason why the legislature included in the consumer sphere only people who purchase goods for consumption is that if products are purchased by individuals in their professional activity, they have enough knowledge to properly assess purchased the product complies with current laws.

The activity of legal persons, whatever form of organization(companies, autonomous, nongovernmental organizations, public institutions) is oriented towards profit orprovision of other essential services of public administration, issues that lead to exclusion them from the notion of consumer.

I appreciate this provision objectionable and discriminatory normative grounds that can easily imagine situations in which legal entity in its outside professional activity may have a consumer. In this context the natural question arises about the reason that the legislature did not intend to include in the scope of consumer and legal person. In other words, by excluding individuals notions of consumer legal sense, means that, in those situations in which legal entity acquiring property outside his business, itenjoys no protection?

I think the answer can only be negative, meaning the legislature to protect the individual normative provisions establishing a number of its rights and obligations of the manufacturer, as appropriate seller, by special law in order to give greater liability of persons guilty of making efficiency market rigors of legal non-conforming products.

In this context, given that the legal consumer can not appreciate that, for situations in which it is involved in legal relations with the producers, the latter will be liable for defects of things sold under the Civil Code, specifically the provisions governing the contract of sale.

Although both in law and in the international concept of "consumer" is considered only natural, reading the provisions of Law 321/2009, note that the concept of consumer isdefined as "any person or entity that buys, acquires, uses and consume food outsideprofessional activity ". As such, consumers in food can be both natural and legal person, provided they acquire, use and consume those products outside the scope of professional activity.

While recognizing that the consumer means a natural person who uses the particular purpose and unprofessional, products and services offered on the market formanufacturers, retailers and service providers, the natural question arises whetherthe consumer is not the same person with the buyer ? We appreciate that despite legislation in the content which the two notions are confused, we can not sign identity between the two, whereas the term includes the consumer, a buyer may be situations in which a consumer acquires an asset in other ways than buying it. Consumptiongood can result not only from a contractual relationship, but also a legal relationshipon which the owner has not expressed willingness.

Conclusions

Attempt to regulate internal concepts of producer, consumer, food by reference to international law But I think that the current Romanian legal system is not yet adapted to the needs of society, is, not infrequently contradictory (and I mean to provide the sense notion of consumer) and often incomplete.

Confusion and contradictions that arise in regulating various acts of the same concepts (for example, in Act 240/2004 consumer can only be natural for the body of law 321/2009 to meet the legal person as a consumer).

I think that these inaccuracies are from correlated transposition of Directives into national law instead of making extensive doctrinal discussions on the subject.

THE NATIONAL AUTHORITY FOR ANIMAL HEALTH AND FOOD SAFETY, THE MAIN BODY INVOLVED IN FOOD SAFETY IN ROMANIA*

PETRUȚA-ELENA ISPAS

Abstract
This paper is intended to present the role, functions and responsibilities of the National Authority for Animal Health and Food Safety as the main body involved in food safety in Romania. It will be also exposed the Regulation 178/2002 of the European Parliament and the Council, the general food "law" in Europe, and Law 150/2004, which transposed into Romanian legislation Regulation 178/2002.

I. Introduction

The National Authority for Animal Health and Food Safety is the main body involved in food safety in Romania.

After Romania's EU integration, Romanian authorities wanted to align the legislation regarding food safety to the European standards. Therefore, the European legislation has been transposed into national law.

For food safety for consumers, the European Union has developed a series of standards regarding food, animal safety and health and plant health. These standards are applied both for food produced within the EU and for imported food. The present study analyzes the role, functions and responsibilities of National Authority for Animal Health and Food Safety as the main body involved in food safety in Romania.

The study also presents the general law on food safety at European level, but also at Romanian level. We will try to shortly present the main principles regarding food safety in Europe and in Romania.

primary materials to the end consumer. The Authority represents the link to the European Authority for Food Safety and runs on structural, functional and decisional autonomy[2].

The National Authority for Animal Health and Food Safety (hereafter referred to as Authority) was founded by Government Ordinance 42/2004[3] through the reorganization of the Romanian Agency for Food Safety and of the National Agency for Animal Health from within the Ministry of Agriculture, Forestry, Water Resources and Sustainable Development"

The organization and the activity of the Authority were regulated by Government Decision 130/2006[4], which was abolished through the enactment of the Government Decision 1415/2009[5].

III. The General Food Law

Given that food safety has become a major topic in the last decade, the capability of producing safe food requires a multidisciplinary approach, involving key areas which include also legal matters. In order to ensure food safety, all stages of the food chain, as a continuous process, are taken into account, starting from and including primary production and ending with selling or distribution of food directly to consumers, because each element might potentially have an impact on food safety itself.

The EU-Law on food is based on the principle that food operators bear the responsibility for all stages of production, processing and distribution from within the framework of activities controlled by them. They have also the obligation to ensure that the food products meet the requirements of the food safety legislation.

III.1. Regulation (EC) no. 178/2002 of the European Parliament and of the Council

At European level, the general legal framework is represented by the Regulation (EC) no. 178/2002[7] of the European Parliament and of the Council of 28 January 2002 laying down the general principles and requirements of food law, establishing the European Food Safety Authority and laying down procedures in matters of food safety, modified as follows: Regulation (EC) no. 1642/2003 of the European Parliament and of the Council of 22 July 2003[8], Regulation (EC) no. 575/2006 of the European Commission of 07 April 2006[9], Regulation (EC) no. 202/2008 of the European Commission of 4 March 2008[10].

The above-mentioned regulation lays down the general principles governing food and feed in general and food and feed safety in particular, at Community and national level[11], and the general objectives, risk assessment, the precautionary principle and the protection of the consumers' interests respectively. Regulation 178/2002, as subsequently amended, establishes procedures for problems that have direct or indirect impact on food and feed safety.

The regulation also establishes definitions, principles and obligations covering all stages of the food chain. As to the general obligations regarding food trade, food and feed imported into the Community for placing on the market, as well as food and feed exported from the Community for placing on the market of a third country are subject to regulations.

As for food and feed imported into the Community for placing on the Community market, these must meet the relevant requirements of food law or the conditions recognized by the Community to be at least equivalent thereto or, where there is a specific agreement between the Community and the exporting country, the requirements contained therein.

Food and feed exported or re-exported from the Community for placing on the market of a third country shall comply with the relevant requirements of food law, unless otherwise requested by the authorities of the importing country or established by the laws, regulations, standards, codes of practice and other legal and administrative procedures as may be in force in the importing country

The regulation also stipulates that in other circumstances, except in the case where foods are injurious to health or feeds are unsafe, food and feed can only be exported or re-exported if the competent authorities of the country of destination have expressly agreed, after having been fully informed of the reasons for which and the circumstances in which the food or feed concerned could not be placed on the market in the Community.

Where the provisions of a bilateral agreement concluded between the Community or one of its Member States and a third country are applicable, food and feed exported from the Community or that Member State to that third country shall comply with the said provisions.

III.2. Law 150/2004

Regulation 178/2002 was transposed in Romania by Law no. 150/2004 on food and feed safety[12], with later amendments and addenda.

According to the above-mentioned Law[13], certain requirements must be met for achieving food security: food should not be marketed unless it is safe, food is considered unsafe if it is harmful to health or unfit for human consumption. In determining whether any food is unsafe, regard shall be had to the normal conditions of use of the food by the consumer and at each stage of production, processing and distribution, and to the information provided to the consumer, including information on the label, or other information generally available to the consumer concerning the avoidance of specific adverse health effects from a particular food or category of foods.

In determining whether any food is injurious to health, regard shall be had to the probable immediate and/or short-term and/or long-term effects of that food on the health of a person consuming it, but also on subsequent generations, to the probable cumulative toxic effects and to the particular health sensitivities of a specific category of consumers, if that kind of food is intended for that category of consumers. In determining whether any food is unfit for human consumption, regard shall be had to whether the food is unacceptable for human consumption according to its intended use, for reasons of contamination, whether by extraneous matter or otherwise, or through putrefaction, deterioration or decay.

Where a food which is unsafe is part of a batch, lot or consignment of food of the same class or description, it shall be presumed that all the food in that batch, lot or consignment is also unsafe, unless following a detailed assessment there is no evidence that the rest of the batch, lot or consignment is unsafe. The conformity of a food with specific provisions applicable to food safety are considered not to represent a risk related to the aspects to which that law refers to.

The conformity of a food with specific provisions applicable to that food shall not bar the competent authorities in the field of food safety from taking appropriate measures to impose restrictions on it being placed on the market or to require its withdrawal from the market where there are reasons to suspect that, despite such conformity, the food is unsafe.

As we can see, the law 150/2004 tries to transpose the Regulation 178/2002. It is very important that Romanian authorities hardly try to apply European legislation into national legislation. Of course, we need time and resources to reach the European level in food safety, but Romania started in a good way.

Conclusions

By this article, we have tried to present the role, the functions and main responsibilities of the National Authority for Animal Health and Food Safety as the main body involved in food safety in Romania. We have also presented the general food law for Europe and for Romania.

Of course, this is only a small part of the aspects regarding food safety, but we will try to present other major problems as contaminants in food, the legislation on official control, the legislation regarding pesticides in food, legislation regarding radioactive contamination etc.

BANK GUARANTEES

VASILE NEMEŞ*

Abstract

The present study propose the analyse of the irrevocable commitment of a bank entity towards a determined person, through which guarantees a certain legal conduct of its client, and, in case of breach, assumes the payment obligation of a determined amount of money.

This kind of legal technique it is called bank guarantee and in the usual business language it is called "Letter of Bank Guarantee".

The determined reason to choose this scientific initiative it is the frequency of this kind of financial - banking commitments with various practical issues which are occurred by the use of those.

From the legal point of view, the bank guarantees are not under an own legal regulation and are based on the common law, used in the guarantees domain.

Through the new aspects of the actual Civil Code it are the legal regulation of the letter of bank guarantee and of the comfort letter, which shall constitute the main regulation in the negotiation and conclusion of a letter of bank guarantee or a bank comfort letter.

For the legal reports with foreign elements, the parties can also use the Uniform Rules regarding the Guarantees at Request (URGR) Publish no.758/2010.

Keywords: guarantee, letter of guarantee, comfort letter, obligation, issuant, beneficiary, debtor.

1. Introductory notions

By adopting the new civil code, several institutions of private law have been redefined and others were first introduced in the Romanian legal regulation. They also include the institution of guarantees.

The participants in relationships involving obligations specific to guarantees may be the natural persons and legal entities and, according to this criterion, the guarantees may be real, when these relate to movable or immovable property and personal guarantees, when the guarantor is liable with all the present and future assets to guarantee his obligations.

2. The concept of bank guarantee

In the practice of commercial activities are more frequent the situations where the obligations undertaken by different subjects of legal relationships are guaranteed by the banking entities or by non-banking financial institutions[1].

The bank guarantees are preferred to other categories of guarantees due to the financial credibility enjoyed by the banking companies in the relevant market, as well as due to easiness to capitalize them.

It is necessary to note that not all the guarantees in which is involved a banking entity fall into the category of the bank guarantees.

In the carried on crediting activity, a banking company is required to comply with the financial prudence regulations which, among others, imply the procurement of some guarantees from the debtors credited by it. According to quality of the debtors and the purpose of the credit, the banking entities request the establishment of some real or personal guarantees. It is understood that, in case of failure to reimburse the granted credit, the lending bank will pursue either the assets assigned to guarantee, or the persons who have undertaken the obligation to make the payment instead of the debtor, if he fails to fulfill it. Not such relationships involving obligations form the content of the bank obligations. In order to be in the presence of a bank guarantee is required the bank to take the legal position of debtor of the payment obligation. It is noted that, in case of the lending operations for which the debtor brings real or personal guarantees, the bank has the status of creditor of the guarantees, meaning that it is the beneficiary of the guarantee, a quality that allows it to pursue them in order to satisfy its debts to the guaranteed debtor. Or, the bank guarantees are those where the bank has the capacity of debtor, meaning that it undertakes the obligation to pay a sum of money or to indemnify if the debtor guaranteed by it does not fulfil or fulfil improperly the guaranteed obligations.

Therefore, in the crediting relationships, the bank has the capacity of creditor of the real or personal guarantee set up in its favour and, as concerns the bank guarantees, the issuing bank has the capacity of debtor of the guarantee. It means that, if the customer guaranteed by it will not fulfil the obligation to reimburse the credit, the lending bank will satisfy its debt by pursuing the assets assigned to guarantee or the persons who have undertaken to make the payment instead of the debtor. The guarantees accompanying the credit have nothing particularly compared to the civil legal guarantees, meaning that they may be real or personal, that is the debtor may set up an immovable or movable property or he may guarantee with his entire patrimony. The only difference is that the beneficiary of the guarantees of the credit is the lending bank entity.

On the other hand, the bank guarantees are different from the ordinary guarantees in that they are intended only to pay a sum of money or to give some compensation. Unlike the guarantees of common law that may have as object both movable and immovable property, as well as the personal guarantees, the bank guarantees are set up exclusively on some amounts. In other words, the bank issuing the guarantee is committed to its beneficiary, not with an immovable property or determined movable property, but with its entire patrimony. This is because, according to the financial-bank prudence rules, the acquisition and the ownership of movable and immovable property, it has a legal system very different from the other legal entities and natural persons.

3. Concept and regulation

As shown above, the new Civil Code has defined the field of guarantees and, as a novelty, introduced the so-called category of autonomous guarantees. Under the heading autonomous guarantees, the Civil Code regulates the letter of guarantee in article 2321 and the letter of comfort within the content of article 2322.

We notice, therefore, that the legislator does not use the term of bank guarantee, but, in practice, both the letter of guarantee and the letter of comfort are issued by a banking entity. Hence the usual expression letter of guarantee. Certainly, as the two categories of guarantees are regulated, they may be used and issued by any participant in the legal relationships, but, as we mentioned, they are especially used by the issuers of the banking companies. Hence the consequence according to which, if they are issued by other entities, they shall have the character of ordinary guarantees and only if they are undertaken by a banking entity or non-banking financial institution, they will acquire the legal status of bank guarantees.

4. Letter of bank guarantee

According to the provisions of article 2321 of Civil Code, the letter of guarantee is the irrevocable and unconditional commitment by which a person, called issuer, undertakes, at the request of a person called authorizing officer, in consideration of a preexisting report involving obligations, but independently, to pay a sum of money to a third party called beneficiary, under the terms of the undertaken commitment.

The definition given by the legislator shows the main characters of the letter of bank guarantee.

Thus, although the legislator uses the notion of guarantee, actually, this is an authentic contract between the issuer and the beneficiary of the guarantee. It follows that this category of obligations has as source the parties' agreement and, at least in principle, it cannot be set up by a judicial process or by any legal norm.

Then, the letter of guarantee has an irrevocable character, resembling with the irrevocable documentary letter of credit[2]. The irrevocable character of the letter of bank guarantee consists in the fact that, once undertaken the payment committed, it cannot be unilaterally revoked, denounced or modified by the issuing bank.

The commitment made by the issuing bank is also unconditional, meaning that the bank will pay, without being able to invoke the exceptions resulting from the relationships involving obligations which are guaranteed by it. Hence the autonomous character of the letter of guarantee materialized by the payment of money, independently of the pre-existing legal relationships guaranteed by it.

The letter of bank guarantee has a trilateral character, expressed by the fact that in the conduct of the relationships of guarantee participate at least three entities: the issuing bank, the authorizing officer and the beneficiary.

This type of guarantee requires a relationship involving obligations, pre-existing and independently of it. In other words, as a technique of drawing up and issuing the guarantee, the bank will undertake the irrevocable payment commitment only after the obligations intended to be guaranteed have been executed.

The letter of guarantee aims to pay a sum of money, which means that will not be brought as a guarantee any movable or immovable property. Since is not specified a property or a category of assets as a guarantee, it means that the issuing bank exhibits its entire patrimony on the occasion of issuing the letter of guarantee, meaning that its status is very similar to the personal guarantor' status from the relationships involving obligations specific to the common law.

5. The participants in the legal relationships specific to the letter of guarantee

As shown in the definition given by article 1321 of Civil Code, in the conduct of the relationships of a letter of guarantee take part the issuer, the authorizing officer and the beneficiary.

Under the silence of law, in capacity of issuer may be any natural person or legal entity and the undertaken commitment will have the legal nature of the letter of bank guarantee only in case it was undertaken by a banking entity or non-banking financial institution.

The issuing bank has the capacity of debtor of the guarantee, meaning that if its customer, that is the authorizing officer guaranteed by it does not fulfil his obligations or fulfill them improperly, the issuing bank will pay a sum of money to the third-party beneficiary.

The authorizing officer of the bank is a customer who, in the preexisting relationships involving obligations, acts as a debtor, meaning that he has to execute certain actions, to perform works, to provide services or to deliver certain goods to the beneficiary, pursuant to some arrangements made with him. Thus, the letter of guarantee requires the existence of at least two conventions. The first consists of the agreement between the authorizing officer and the beneficiary to deliver certain assets, to perform works or to provide services and the second is the convention that materializes the proper letter of guarantee by which the issuing bank undertakes to pay a sum of money to the beneficiary.

The position of the participants in the relationships specific to the letter of guarantee is different. In the convention generating the preexistent relationship involving obligations, the parties are the authorizing officer and the beneficiary and their capacity varies according to the nature of the convention. This may be a sale-purchase contract by which the authorizing officer, in capacity of seller, undertakes to deliver certain goods to the beneficiary, in capacity of buyer, or may be an agreement, an enterprise contract by which the authorizing officer, in capacity of entrepreneur, undertakes to perform a work for the beneficiary.

The mechanism of the bank guarantee arises from the protection ensured by the beneficiary. Keeping on the above examples, the beneficiary, in capacity of buyer or, where appropriate, consignee of the works, requires the authorizing officer, namely the seller, respectively the entrepreneur, to bring as a guarantee the obligation of a bank to compensate him by paying a sum of money, if the authorizing officer, in capacity of seller or, where appropriate, entrepreneur, will not fulfill his obligations or will fulfill them improperly. Definitely, he will not deliver the goods at the deadline agreed in the contract, he will not deliver the goods as determined by the parties, he will not complete the works within the agreed period etc.

From the technique of regulation and operation of the letter of guarantee is understood that the parties of a bank guarantee are the issuing bank and the beneficiary of the guarantee. This is because the issuing bank undertakes to make the payment to the beneficiary. We notice, therefore, that the authorizing officer is not a party of the letter of guarantee, as the issuing bank is not a party of the contract which generated the preexisting relationship involving obligations.

Definitely, under the principle of relativity of legal documents, the letter of guarantee will cause legal effects between the issuing bank and the beneficiary, the authorizing officer being a third party of it and the contract which generated the preexisting relationship involving obligations will cause legal effects exclusively between the authorizing officer and the beneficiary and the third party of the contract being, this time, the issuing bank.

6. The purpose of the bank guarantees

As we mentioned above, according to the provisions of article 2321 of Civil Code, the letter of guarantee is the commitment by which the issuer undertakes, at the request of the authorizing officer, to pay a sum of money to the beneficiary for the event that the authorizing officer will not fulfill his obligations arising from the preexisting legal relationships or will fulfill them improperly.

As we can see in the content of article 1321 of Civil Code, the obligation of the issuing bank consists of the payment of an amount. Therefore, the purpose of the letter of bank guarantee will consist of sums of money, excepting other movable or immovable property.

Definitely, the purpose of the letter of bank guarantee is the irrevocable and unconditional obligation of the issuing bank to pay a sum of money to the third party, called the beneficiary, in the event that the authorizing officer fails to perform his obligations or perform them improperly.

7. The effects of the letter of bank guarantee

As the relationships specific to the letter of bank guarantee have a trilateral character, meaning that in such relationships participate the issuer, the authorizing officer and the beneficiary, we will consider the effects generated by it, distinctly, between the issuer and the authorizing officer, the effects between the issuer and the beneficiary, as well as the legal effects between the authorizing officer and the beneficiary.

7.1. The effects of the bank guarantee between the issuer and the authorizing officer

As shown by the norm, the article 1321 of Civil Code, the letter of guarantee is issued upon the request of the authorizing officer. Usually, the authorizing officer is a customer of the issuing bank, who needs its commitment towards the beneficiary.

We mentioned that the authorizing officer is not a party in the letter of guarantee; under the principle of relativity of legal documents, the authorizing officer is a third party. This feature is materialized by the fact that is generated the relationship involving obligations of the bank guarantee and it will be carried out exclusively between the issuing bank and the beneficiary of the guarantee. The issuing bank undertakes the payment commitment, based on the legal relationships with the authorizing officer. Please note that the bank warrants the obligation of the authorizing officer towards the beneficiary of the preexisting relationships involving obligations and, in order to undertake the commitment, the authorizing officer, in his turn, must provide the guarantees required by the bank. Once the bank compensates the beneficiary, it will return against the authorizing officer in order to recover the amounts paid pursuant to the letter of bank guarantee.

According to the financial-bank prudence rules, the issuing bank may require guarantees to the authorizing officer, such as: mortgages on movable goods or mortgages on real estates, pledge on accounts or certain personal guarantees in order to protect its right to recover the amounts paid to the beneficiary. The right of the bank to recover the amounts paid as a guarantee is stipulated in the article 1321, paragraph 4, of Civil Code which states that: "The issuer who made the payment has the right of recourse against the authorizing officer of the letter of guarantee".

Since the right of recourse is provided by law, the issuing bank will recover the amounts paid as a guarantee, even if this issue is not expressly stipulated in the contract.

7.2. The legal effects between the issuer and the beneficiary

Whereas the parties of the letter of bank guarantee are the issuing bank and the beneficiary, it causes legal effects between the two parties. Definitely, if the authorizing officer does not fulfill his obligations of the preexisting legal relationships (he does not deliver the goods, does not perform the works, does not provide services etc.) or fulfill them improperly, the beneficiary will activate the letter of guarantee and, pursuant to the undertaken obligation, the bank which makes the guarantee will pay the amount stipulated in the contract.

The letter of guarantee may be executed at the first and simple request of the beneficiary, meaning unconditionally, or it may be subject to the occurrence of certain circumstances that might cause the non-fulfillment or improper fulfillment of the guaranteed obligations.

Article 2321, paragraph 2, of Civil Code provides that the undertaken commitment is executed at the first and simple request of the beneficiary, if not otherwise provided in the letter of guarantee. It follows that the method to activate the letter of guarantee depends on the parties' agreement and, definitely, it may be submitted in two forms: one form is that the amount will be paid at the first and simple request of the beneficiary and the second, where the letter of guarantee is conditional, the sums of money will be paid only after the beneficiary will demonstrate the conditions which generated the non-fulfilment of the obligations by the debtor.

For example, in the letter of guarantee may be stipulated that the payment of the amounts will be made only if the authorizing officer did not fulfil his obligation due to the fact that he became insolvent or he started the insolvency proceeding. The differences between the letter of guarantee at the first and simple request (unconditional) and the conditional letter of guarantee are substantial and consist in the manner and terms of payment of the amounts by the bank which makes the guarantee.

If the guarantee is at the first and simple request, is sufficient the beneficiary to prove that the authorizing officer did not fulfil his obligations of the pre-existing legal relationship or fulfilled them improperly and, therefore, the bank which makes the guarantee will be required to pay the amount indicated in the letter of guarantee. On the other hand, if the bank guarantee is conditional, for example by the debtor's insolvency or other circumstances, the beneficiary may not claim the payment from the issuing bank before proving the conditions for the non-fulfilment of the obligations by the authorizing officer. In this example, the beneficiary of the letter of guarantee must prove to the bank which makes the guarantee that the authorizing officer did not fulfil his obligations due to the insolvency proceeding. Therefore, in the relationships involving obligations, from the beneficiary's view, the greatest protection is offered by the letter of bank guarantee executed at the first and simple request.

We mentioned in the above lines that the relationships specific to the bank guarantees are independent of the pre-existing relationships involving obligations guaranteed by them. The autonomous character of the two categories of relationships involving obligations is expressly provided by the article 1321, paragraph 3, of Civil Code.

In this respect, the said legal text provides that the issuer cannot oppose to the beneficiary the exceptions based on the relationship involving obligations existing before the commitment undertaken by the letter of guarantee and he shall not be held to pay in case of abuse or obvious fraud.

The beneficiary of the bank guarantee may assign the right to request the payment within the letter of guarantee if its text expressly provided it; therefore, the letter of bank guarantee is transferable but only if the parties have conferred such character.

In terms of the period in which the letter of guarantee covers the payment of the amounts for the obligations undertaken in the preexisting legal relationships, the Civil Code allows the parties to agree in such matter. Specifically, we have in view the provisions of the article 2321, paragraph 7, of Civil Code, providing that, if not otherwise stipulated in the letter of guarantee, it shall take effect from the issuing date and the validity shall cease by law at the specified deadline, independently of the delivery of the original letter of guarantee. In practice, the validity period of the letter of guarantee exceeds the execution time of the obligations undertaken in the preexisting legal relationships. This is because, even if the letter of bank guarantee is autonomous, independent and unconditional, it cannot be activated before the expiration of the execution period of the obligations undertaken in the preexisting, main legal relationships guaranteed by it. In other words, the beneficiary cannot capitalize the bank guarantee before the maturity of the main obligations, meaning before the term for the delivery of the goods, providing services, execution of works etc. A contrary attitude of the beneficiary would lead to the refusal of the request regarding the payment as prematurely submitted.

It should be noted that is important the non-fulfillment of the obligations of the guaranteed preexisting legal relationships or improper performance by the authorizing officer to take place and to be observed within the validity period of the letter of bank guarantee because, by hypothesis, if the guaranteed events occur after the expiry of the letter of guarantee, undoubtedly the bank which makes the guarantee is exempted from liability. In the practice of the guaranteed legal relationships often happens the parties extend the terms for the execution of the obligations by omitting, many times, to also extend the validity of the letter of bank guarantee. In such cases where the maturity of the obligations is extended and falls outside the validity period of the letter of guarantee, the bank which makes the guarantee cannot be required to pay pursuant to the letter of guarantee.

Therefore, in order the bank guarantee may be capitalized, it is important that the non-fulfillment of the guaranteed obligations or improper fulfillment take place during the validity of the letter of bank guarantee and the capitalization of rights will be done thereafter, amicably or by judicial process.

7.3. The legal effects between the authorizing officer and the beneficiary

The authorizing officer, not being a party in the letter of bank guarantee, causes legal effects between the issuing bank and the beneficiary of the guarantee. Do not forget that the letter of bank guarantee comes into being at the request of the beneficiary. The request is submitted to the authorizing officer and he, finally, requires the bank to issue a letter of guarantee. Therefore, although the letter of bank guarantee causes legal effects directly between the issuing bank and the beneficiary, the guarantee is not generated at the direct request submitted to the beneficiary by the bank, but upon the request submitted to the authorizing officer.

Due to the independent and autonomous character of the letter of guarantee, the authorizing officer will not be responsible for the non-fulfillment of the payment obligation undertaken by the bank which makes the guarantee. This is because, as we mentioned above, according to the applicable legal norms, the payment of the amount is the responsibility of the bank which makes the guarantee. For this reason, if the bank which makes the guarantee refuses to pay, the beneficiary cannot claim damages from the authorizing officer, but only for the capitalization of his rights pursuant to the letter of guarantee, by judicial process.

8. Letter of comfort

8.1. Concept and regulation

The regulation of the letter of comfort is foreseen in the provisions of the article 2322 of Civil Code. According to the said text, the letter of comfort is the irrevocable and autonomous commitment by which the issuer undertakes an obligation to do or not do, in order to support another person, called debtor, for the execution of its obligations towards a creditor.

Even here the law does not condition the capacity of the issuer, meaning that the letter of comfort may be undertaken by any natural person or legal entity. It will be deemed a bank letter of comfort if the payment commitment is undertaken by a banking entity or non-banking financial institution. In the regulation of Civil Code are also foreseen the main characters of the letter of comfort. Therefore, as the letter of guarantee, the letter of comfort generates an obligation to guarantee the execution of certain services by the debtor for his creditor.

The letter of comfort is also submitted as an authentic contract between the issuer and the creditor of the main obligations, who will receive the legal status of beneficiary of the letter. The commitment undertaken by the letter of comfort has an irrevocable character, expressed on the fact that, as in case of the letter of guarantee, the issuer cannot unilaterally cancel, withdraw or modify the payment obligation.

The purpose of the letter of comfort consists in the obligation of the issuer to do or not do, in order to support another person. Thus, unlike the letter of guarantee whose purpose consists in the payment of an amount, the letter of comfort has as subject the obligation to do or not do. This is clearly shown in the definition of the letter of comfort contained in the article 2322, paragraph 1, of Civil Code, according to which the letter of comfort is an irrevocable and autonomous commitment where the issuer undertakes an obligation to do or not do, in order to support another person, called debtor.

The payment of an amount is the secondary purpose of the letter of comfort and an accessory, meaning that it is conditioned by the non-fulfillment of the obligation to do or not do, undertaken by the issuer of the letter of comfort. This feature arises from the content of the article 2322, paragraph 2, of Civil Code, according to which the issuer of the letter of comfort may be required only to pay damages to the creditor.

The letter of comfort has a trilateral character, the participants in the legal relationships specific thereof are: the issuer, the debtor and the creditor of the guarantee obligation.

The letter of guarantee is independent and autonomous of the main obligations guaranteed by it. This feature is foreseen in the content of the article 2322, paragraph 1, of Civil Code prohibiting the creditor to assert any defense or exception arising from the relationship involving obligations guaranteed by the letter of comfort.

8.2. The legal effects of the letter of comfort

As the letter of guarantee, the letter of comfort causes three categories of legal effects, namely: legal effects between the issuer and the debtor, legal effects between the issuer and the creditor or the beneficiary of the letter and legal effects between the debtor and the creditor.

As concerns the legal effects specific to the relationships between the debtor and the issuer of the letter, it should be noted that the letter of comfort is issued at the request of the debtor, submitted to the issuer. As in case of the letter of guarantee, the issuing of the letter of comfort is based on the creditor's initiative, but he does not apply for it directly to the issuing bank, but to his debtor and, finally, the debtor applies to the issuer in order to make a guarantee for him.

If the debtor fails to fulfill his guaranteed obligations or fulfill them improperly, the issuer is liable for damages to the creditor. After he compensates the creditor, the issuer of the letter of comfort shall recourse against the debtor in order to recover the paid amounts. The issuer's right of recourse is foreseen in the article 2322, paragraph 3, of Civil Code providing that the issuer of the letter of comfort, who is required to compensate the creditor, has the right of recourse against the debtor.

As the issuer of the letter of guarantee, the issuer of the letter of comfort may condition the issuing thereof by certain real or personal guarantees from the debtor who asked him to make a guarantee, on his behalf, towards the creditor. It is understood that, if the debtor does not make the payment, the issuer of the letter of comfort may capitalize his right of recourse by pursuing the movable or immovable assets or the persons who have guaranteed the debtor's obligation.

As concerns the legal relationships between the issuer of the letter and the creditor, they are governed by the principle of independence and autonomy of the undertaken guarantee obligation.

The article 2322, paragraph 2, of Civil Code provides that, if the debtor fails to fulfill his obligation, the issuer of the letter of comfort may be required only to pay damages to the creditor and only if the latter proves that the issuer of the letter of comfort did not fulfill his obligation undertaken by the letter of comfort. The payment of damages may be performed amicably and, in case of refusal from the issuer of the letter of comfort, by judicial process.

However, it should be noted that, according to the article 2322, paragraph 1, final thesis of Civil Code, the issuer may not oppose the creditor any defense or exception arising from the relationship involving obligations between the creditor and the debtor. This is the consequence of the independent and autonomous character of the guarantee obligation undertaken by the letter of comfort towards the obligations arising from the main legal relationships guaranteed by it.

Finally, the legal effects between the debtor and the creditor are those arising from the main relationship involving obligations, in relation to which the letter of comfort was issued. Indirectly, the letter of comfort takes effect also regarding the legal relationships between the creditor and the debtor by the fact that, as stated in the foregoing, according to the legal norms, the issuer of the letter may be required to pay damages only if the creditor proves that he did not properly fulfil his obligations.

Conclusions

As it relates from the present study, the New Civil Code has the merit of institutionalising the rules that are the embedment necessary for the making and use of the bank guaranties, which are so used in the commercial activity nowadays.

The Civil Code legislates only the general principals regarding bank guaranties wich means that the parties to the obligation must see to the details and must adapt these guaranties in accordance to their personal interests.

None the less, apart from the dispositions of the Civil Code regarding the guaranties, the rules regarding the financial prudence towards the credit institutions and nonbanking financial institutions exposure must be kept in sight.

CORPORATE SOCIAL RESPONSIBILITY: OPTIONAL OR REGULATORY

MIHAELA IRINA IONESCU*

Abstract
Given the collateral activity developed and the economic background of the present author I took the approach of a topic that includes aspects from both fields, namely "Corporate Social responsibility- optional or regulatory".
Through the paper I will try to summarize the pros and cons of regulation, mandatory of corporate social responsibility and to review, present the ways in which countries with advanced economies in European Union and the EU itself have addressed this issue.

Keywords: corporate, social, responsability, optional, regulation, economies

Introduction

The interest in the social responsibility of businesses, mainly known as "corporate social responsibility" (CSR), is not of recent date, the issue of a „moral" responsibility of companies which should contribute to the welfare of the community that provides for their existence and profit has been raised ever since the end of the XIXth century.

Currently, the debate has switched from a moral-type approach towards a utilitarian approach, business social responsibility being rather perceived from the perspective of costs and benefits involved.

The basic idea CSR relies on is that profits, people and the environment can be harmonized in a strategic corporate approach, so that the company can become economically viable, socially responsible and careful towards ecological aspects.

Corporate responsibility is seen as a complementary and effective agreement between business and the society where it operates, an agreement which highlights the mutual dependence between companies and community.

So that the company's actions and society's evolution can lead to success, they should be conducted in an atmosphere of mutual trust and predictability so as to enable both the achievement of business success and fulfillment of obligations to shareholders, as well as social welfare and environment protection.

Trust between the actors involved relies on past experience of cooperation relations and on community's cultural level.

As countries of the world and international institutions have acknowledged that adoption of corporate social responsibility principles serves the objectives of long-term development, the need for international standards has come up to define the meaning of a "desirable corporate behavior".

The main debate in this area refers to two distinct concepts:

❖ CSR seen as a moral obligation or duty towards a wider or narrower range of groups of interest

* Assistant Lecturer, Ph. D. candidate, Law Faculty, "Nicolae Titulescu" University, Bucharest (email: mihaela.ionescu@audio-optica.ro).

❖ and CSR as an initiative voluntarily assumed by companies, in order to meet social and economic objectives.

To solve the dilemma: volunteering of regulation, the European Commission, established at the management level of the European Union, has assumed a role of arbitrator in promoting CSR, mediating adoption of certain regulations and encouraging voluntary approaches.

By its strong social policy and by its objectives proposed in the Lisbon Strategy, the European Union insisted in particular on the development of the CSR concept and on its practical implementation.

Thus, in the European Union, the European Forum on corporate social responsibility issues defines CSR as "a concept whereby companies voluntarily integrate social and ecological aspects in their business operations and in their interactions with stakeholders".

At the same time, the European Commission has based its strategy to promote CSR on a few principles having regard to:

1- Recognition of the voluntary nature of CSR;
2- The need to render credibility and transparency of CSR specific activities;
3- Focus on community actions which truly bring added value;
4- Balanced approach to CSR, from the economic, social, environmental perspectives, including its correlation with the interests of consumers;
5- Granting increased importance to the specific demands of SMEs;
6- Support and compliance with existing international agreements and instruments (Labour Standards, etc)

In addition, the European Commission has focused its strategy on the following domains:

1- A better knowledge of the positive impact of CSR on enterprises and society in Europe, mainly in developing countries;
2- Increase of expertise and good practice exchange between companies in terms of CSR;
3- Promoting the development of CSR management abilities;
4- Stimulation of the SR attitude within SMEs;
5- The integration of CSR with other communitarian policies, such as meeting social standards (SA 8000) and environmental standards (ISO 140010), so that the fundamental rights be unalterably respected.

CSR awareness, evoked in the European Council in Lisbon in March 2000, resulted in the introduction of the "Best Practice" concept in areas such as:

- Lifelong learning;
- Work organization;
- Equality of chances
- Social inclusion;
- Sustained development.

Starting from the premise of raising awareness on every aspect specified in the definition, the center of gravity becomes, thus, the enterprise and the company (from SME to corporations), their responsibility in social and environmental areas.

In the Green Paper, the European Commission defines the CSR concept as being voluntary decision of enterprises -companies to contribute to the improvement of society and a cleaner environment. The same document specifies that "for an enterprise to be socially responsible, it must meet legal requirements, comply and invest in human capital, environment and relations with the parties involved."

All these definitions show that, in the modern society, the company must be responsible not only to shareholders (owners), but also to all groups which are influenced or influence, directly or indirectly, company's activity: the shareholders/owners, customers, employees, suppliers, distributors, business partners, creditors, competitors, governmental and non-governmental organizations, local communities, public opinion, groups of interests, the media, etc. considering that the primary duty is to provide quality goods and services at fair prices, which would contribute to the welfare and development of society as a whole (see Fig. 1. The six key responsibilities of CSR). Socially responsible companies consider the profit to be a reward for the work performed for the benefit of the community.

Thus, one can appreciate the social responsibility of the company as "the obligation freely assumed by a firm, beyond its legal obligations or those imposed by economic constraints, to pursue long-term objectives which are for the benefit of society."[1]

In order to avoid some misunderstandings, one should differentiate the social involvement of companies, through philanthropy, donations or sponsorships from corporate social responsibility.

What are the differences between the ways of action mentioned above?

- Philanthropic activities are organized for charitable, humanitarian causes.
- The donation is a quite widespread method, by which a company provides financial support to an organization or to actions of the community it is part of.
- Sponsorship is another method, perhaps even most frequently used, to financially support an organization or an event which brings promotion, and it is deducted from the corporate tax to a maximum of 0.3% of turnover, but no more than 20% of the due corporate tax.

Corporate social responsibility, though it may also include the methods above, represents more than those, being in fact a strategy, specially developed for this purpose,through which firms can interact with the community where they operate- in narrower or wider sense -.The CSR strategy, which also creates benefits for the company, may include expertise and various other types of services offered to beneficiaries in potential partnerships. The spirit of mutual aid which underlies philanthropic actions is replaced with a relationship of reciprocity.

Usually, it is accepted that corporate social responsibility activities and projects be allotted 0.8% - 1% of companies' operational profit.

This concept and managerial attitude proved to be the most effective, not only as it ensures company's economic success, but also because it allows obtaining a competitive advantage due to gaining confidence of the people from inside and outside (customers and suppliers) and acquiring – as a consequence – a good reputation (goodwill).

Communication between employer and employees, between developer and community is necessary for all the projects, initiatives and actions related to social responsibility. There are various possibilities for the transmission of messages related to corporate social responsibility: product labels, packaging, media relations, publications, events organized for this purpose (conferences, contests, promotional events), reports, posters, brochures, fliers, websites, advertisements, informational packets or verbal messages.

The methods used for information dissemination depend on the selected target group: customers, employees, local community, press.

Thus, the community will have confidence that the company protects the environment and acts responsibly on social level and employees will be proud to work in a company concerned with their issues and which appreciates their work and contribution.

There are however situations where certain managers consider the corporate social responsibility as a marketing tool which can bring profit, this approach having generated controversies on the ethical character of some projects and actions carried out under the auspices of this concept. Especially if those companies sometimes cause certain damages to the community where they run business. (for example, the Rosia Montana project in Romania)

One of the major dilemmas concerns the ethics of those companies which cause damages to the community or environment where they operate and, at the same time, they carry out or participate in social responsibility projects. The question is whether these companies are entitled to a positive image and the other benefits pertaining to the corporate social responsibility.

Due to non-compliance with the basic principles of corporate social responsibility, some countries face situations which can lead to a crisis of the corporate system, by loss of confidence of business partners, Governments and citizens in the successful models of the previous years.

In order to prevent conflict situations with serious social and economic consequences, a series of actions are considered on three intervention levels:

1.stimulation of corporate responsibility by voluntary adopting of the necessary changes,

2.corporate supervision through a system of regulations, control and penalties,

3.sanctioning of the culpable enterprises.

Pros and cons of social responsibility of enterprises

Starting from the various approaches and visions on CSR, the specialized literature devotes an ample presentation of its pros and cons.

Bowie andDuska, in*Business Ethics*[2], carried out a synthesis of the most frequent arguments invoked for and against a maximalist approach to CSR.

Pros for the maximalist approach of corporate social responsibilities:

a. the call to citizenship: businesses, as institutional members of the society, are citizens, and citizens have civic responsibilities and duties;

b. obligation to gratitude: corporations capitalize on the society, so they have some obligations of gratitude towards the society which allows them to exist and operate; businesses should behave in accordance with the wish of the general public;

c. responsibility of social power: corporate social responsibility derives from company's social power; the significant financial resources of corporations should be used wisely and largely to solve urgent social problems. Therefore, businesses must use their power for good purposes, socially and environmentally.

Cons for the maximalist approach of corporate social responsibilities:

a. Obligations of corporations to do well cannot be extended indefinitely, companies' increased duties to help in solving certain social problems could lead to the impossibility of obtaining profits by companies or their refusal to contribute to solving those social problems.

b. There is no authority to define criteria for moral assessment (social needs and hierarchy of their priorities) when the enterprises fulfill their maximal social responsibility.Company managers, accustomed to management decisions - based on economic and financial criteria, will find themselves in the position to make ethical decisions - based on moral considerations. Thus, businesses will influence social priorities, which must remain at the discretion of the Government and elected representatives.

c. Shareholders will be deprived of a part of the profits, which will be allocated by managers as they wish. This contradicts the hypothetical social contract concluded between managers - as agents of the owners - and shareholders.

d. The increased social responsibility of a company mistakes its social obligations for discretionary actions, freely undertaken by the company. Businesses do not have the moral responsibility to do well. The relationship between ethics and business must be realistic: after all, the ultimate goal of business is to make profit, even if this requires meeting additional moral and social obligations.

Gheorghe Ionescu[3], in his book Culture of business: American model, considers the pros and cons of the extended corporate social responsibility depend on the analysis perspective, i.e. whether it is considered to be an economic system responsible only to shareholder/owner, or if it is viewed as an economic-social system responsible to a multitude of different groups of interests.

Current realities show that, beyond the balance between the pros and cons of social responsibilities (table 1), companies have developed a specific social behavior, which exceeds the concept of financial profit's strict maximization. The main purposes of the company's involvement in social activities can be grouped as follows:

- economic reasons: ensuring profits (and protection of shareholders' interests) on long term; avoidance of additional future costs (imposed by Government policy, environmental degradation, etc.);
- extra-economic reasons: improvement of public image, social pressure, etc.

Partisans of anti - CSR see the company as a purely economic system, profitable by its very nature and responsible only to shareholders.The arguments brought in favor of this vision may include:

➢ The system of the competitive market works effectively, real, only when the organization focuses on economic performance and capitalizes shareholder's interest. This model provides the best possible use of the resources of the society.

[3] Gh. Gh. Ionescu,*Culture of business: American model,*Economic Publishing House, Bucharest, 1997, p. 177-178.

- As economic institutions, organizations will specialize in what they do best, i.e. the efficient production of goods and services. The profit represents a reward for its effective, real, social performance.
- Businesses must not necessarily pursue social goals. This function is left to other institutions of society.
- Any unselfish attempt of corporate social responsibility is basically a part of shareholders' resources, which will no longer be, legitimately, distributed as profits.
- Businesses have a great economic power. Social responsibility of large corporations will have excessive influence of inappropriate, highly exaggerated, on many other activities. Pluralism is cherished and avoidance of concentration of power is intended.
- The company that will emphasize social responsibility will have a competitive disadvantage as compared with those which do not assume such a responsibility or practice it less.

Partisans of corporate social responsibilities consider the company as an economic-social system responsible to a multitude of various groups of interests and they justify their favorable attitude using, among others, the following points of view:

- There are no situations of pure competition and the competitive environment does not automatically guarantee the optimum allocation of resources. The market economy does not guarantee the efficiency and equity activities undertaken by operators.
- Businesses are not only profitable economic instruments, but business activities also have significant social impacts. Profit is not the only indicator of social performance.
- Usually, managers are not trained to deal with social responsibility in their decisions, although the social impact of their decisions is unavoidable. Many corporations have enormous resources and, as such, many of these should be channeled towards activities related to social welfare.
- Social responsibility does not necessarily determine opposition or damage to the interests of shareholders. In long-term operation, consideration of social responsibilities will emphasize of shareholders' interests.
- A better society offers better chance for better future conditions. Investments to improve the social structure predict a favourable business environment, which also has a positive impact on all community members.
- Business organizations that assume a more responsible position discourage certain groups of interests – such as trade unions and Government – and helps large companies to avoid Government regulations and restrictions, thereby avoiding distortions of competition and the free enterprise system. In a broad sense, the business organization has a particular interest in its engaging in social responsibility events.

The presented reasons show that the pro-CSR attitude envisions issues in a broader context or for longer periods of time, while anti-CSR attitude is much more interested in immediate profitability.Over the last two decades, in the developed society, increasingly more corporations have become interested in social responsibility issues, as the arguments in favor of this approach have become more numerous.

The Expression of Social Responsibility in other countries of the European Union

As for the development of CSR on the European continent, one must highlight European Union's contribution to the conceptual development and practical implementation of corporate social responsibility.

In Europe, the interaction between companies and society is strongly marked by the economic, political and cultural diversity on the entire continent. The development of social responsibility of the enterprise in Europe has been determined both by the proactive strategies adopted by leading companies and by the European institutions and national Governments, as well as external pressures from other groups of stakeholders, including civil society or investors, in general.

The idea that companies should contribute to the general welfare of societybeyond the limits imposed by legal obligations enjoys a long tradition in Europe, especially in the Anglo-Saxon area.

In Western Europe, following a pioneering endeavor in the Bismarck period in the second half of the XXth century, a social protection system has been developed, as part of the social contract between State and citizens, giving consistency to the notion of "citizenship", so that, for the reduction of social polarization and the development of middle classes,the countries of Western Europe have assumed the role of guarantor of welfare, by the technical role in the organization and supervision of social security systems -mandatory public insurances against major risks in life - and by the role of provider of allowances within the family and demographic policy.

The public mandatory social insurance systems, regardless they are based on social contributions or differentiated income taxes, represent mandatory saving from gross wages, deriving from labor.Whether they are paid by employee or employer, these revenues belong to employees, as labor price, the State only having technical role in administration of pension systems, health insurance, labor accidents or unemployment insurance systems. In addition, in order to avoid social exclusion, according to the principle that "it is easier to prevent than treat", through the budgets of local authorities, local communities, the States have organized and guaranteed a final barrier - network against poverty by the social assistance system, consisting of the compensations and/or occasional social services, strictly customized and limited. The entire social protection system — regardless we refer to social security through insurance or family support policies and social assistance - is based on intragenerational and intergenerational solidarity between rich and poor regions, between rich and poor people, between sexes and between any majority and any minority.

On equal terms,we must all be equal before the law. But only on equal terms. Otherwise, the law can become an abuse of the strong against the weak. Otherwise, even laws may generate crisis. Increasingly more frequent, legality does not necessarily mean legitimacy.

In the recent decades, economic factors and the socio-political situations in many countries in Western Europe have led to a partial redefinition of boundaries in the public sector and private sector, as well as their roles in society. In this context, increasing attention is paid to voluntary actions undertaken by companies as part of their corporate social responsibility strategies, in order to manage the economic, social and environmental effects of their activities and to contribute to society's development, in general.

Considering that Europe is a relatively rich continent and a stable region of the world, benefiting from a well developed social and economic structure, the current problems and challenges associated with CSR in Europe differ significantly from those in less developed regions of the world.

Thus, many of the social and environmental corporate responsibilities, which might fall under companies' voluntary involvement in other parts of the world, are strictly legally regulated and defined in Europe. However, the increasing interest towards business opportunities associated with innovative approaches in terms of CSR and stakeholders' growing expectations about corporate responsibility and implementation of responsible business practices at intra-and extra-continental level will consolidate the CSR agenda.

Furthermore, given the recent financial and economic crisis, the level of public trust in business environment has decreased significantly in many European countries. In this context, the lending crisis and the recession that followed have emphasized companies' need to contribute to rebuilding civil society's confidence in the business environment and shaping a more responsible and sustainable economy, both in Europe and globally.[4]

In 2007, the European Commission, through the High Level Group of National Representatives on Corporate Social Responsibility issues, has developed a summary of the corporate social responsibility policies in the 27 EU Member States.[5]

This collection illustrates both similarities and differences between national CSR policies.

Although they differ from one country to another, the objectives of these policies are often similar and cover aspects such as:

- encouraging dialogue with all types of stakeholders and public-private partnerships;
- strengthening the transparency and CSR practices and instruments;
- raising public awareness, increase of knowledge, dissemination and copying of excellence models in the field;
- ensuring a more solid and consistent connection between the objectives of sustainable development and public policies.

Thus, for a better presentation of the information in the 27 Member States, the data collected have been structured on three main categories:

I. policies that promote the progress registered in CSR,
II. policies aimed at ensuring transparency of CSR practices and tools
III. and initiatives in other public policies which have a positive impact on CSR.

The conceptual framework of the CSR analysis at European level is as follows:

1. Promotion of CSR:

- Raising public awareness,
- Research,
- Public-private partnerships,
- Business incentives (for example, corporate awards and recognitions)
- Management tools.

2. Providing transparency in CSR practices:

- Principles and codes of conduct,
- The general framework of social reporting,
- Management systems and labels of social/ecological recognition,
- Socially responsible investments,
- Advertising,
- Others.

3. Development of public policies to support CSR:

- Sustainable development strategy,
- Social policies,
- Environment policies,
- Public procurement,
- Trade and export policies (for example, promoting the OECD guidelines),
- Others (development policies or fiscal policies).[6]

At the level of each country, only policies and initiatives directly linked to the social responsibility of the enterprise were reviewed, without being addressed other national policies.

All these show that the nature and characteristics of the corporate social responsibility vary between different Member States and from one cultural context to another: in some countries, CSR is integrated in national policies (such as; Bulgaria, Cyprus, Denmark, Finland, France, Germany, Portugal, Sweden, etc) which leaves little space to companies for voluntary corporate social involvement, while others have rather developed initiatives to raise public awareness and the socially responsible practices are left to the discretion of companies (Estonia, Greece, Ireland, United Kingdom, Netherlands, Slovenia, etc.) starting from the premise that the role of Government and of public authorities is to support opportunities for companies' involvement and not to set up formal structures and strict rules to guide the corporate involvement.

In order to achieve a minimum impediment in all countries, the European Union has developed a number of principles aimed at internal and external relations of enterprises with the community. Internal relations with companies aim:

- to minimize the impact of their activities on the environment and natural resources,
- to ensure a better quality of life for employees at their job and otherwise,
- to ensure a safe and healthy working environment,
- to address responsibly reorganizations in case of crisis, taking into account the interests of all parties involved.

In their external relations with all the interested parts, companies are responsible for:

- respect for human rights stipulated in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights,
- support for development of the communities they activate in,
- support for the development of local economic systems by concluding partnerships with local distributors,
- protection and encouraging global environmental protection.

EU recommends adoption of those principles in business strategies of enterprises and reporting on their implementation.

CSR is complementary to specific approaches to ensure increased social and environmental performances and it should not be considered as a legal substitute or a task of companies with public responsibilities, which mainly continue to be under the influence of Governments.

At European Union level, special attention is paid to social responsibility of small and medium-sized enterprises (SMEs), not only to that of large companies, the special term which denotes their social responsibility being: responsible entrepreneurship.Even though a special term is used, its content overlaps CSR's definition. A different term is used as CSR is a complex notion, mainly developed for large companies.[7]The interest for SMEs is owed to the fact that they represent, at European Union level, the predominant form of business organization, both in number and as contribution to the GNP, as well as in the job offer.[8]In addition, the rate of their occurrence and extinction is very high, their activity being run on markets dominated by large/very large multinational companies and financial and banking policies, which are not always favorable.As a result, the economic success of SMEs is difficult, being possible by a specific mixture of factors, which can turn them into competitive advantage. Under these circumstances, the European Commission got involved, particularly in the last decade, in identifying new methods for SME's to be successful, one of its policy's priorities being stimulation of social responsibility, regarded as potential source of competitive advantage.

The European states, aware of the benefits of CSR, have adopted various regulations in the area.Thus, France requires companies listed at the stock exchange to prepare annual reports dedicated to CSR and all countries have ministries in charge with various aspects of social responsibility.

Thus, in France, at least two ministries have direct responsibilities in the field of CSR: the Ministry of Solidarity and Social Cohesion, as well as the Ministry of Ecology, Sustainable Development, Transports and Housing.[9]

In the United Kingdom, at least three departments (which include several fields run by State Ministers, Secretaries of State or State Undersecretaries) are responsible for areas directly related to business, environment and innovation: the Department for Business, Innovation and Skills, the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs, the Department for Communities and Local Government -community cohesion.[10]

In Belgium, several ministries are directly responsible for CSR related areas, their new names being, Federal Public Service for Employment, Labour and Social Dialogue, the Federal Public Service Economy, SMEs, Middle Classes and Energy, the Federal Public Service for Programming covering the following areas:Social integration and Social Economy and Poverty reduction, Sustainable development, Science policy and, finally, Protection of consumers.[11]

Concerns with CSR are noticed in every policies and strategies of ministries in the EU countries, not only in those with direct social interface. Monitoring of reports is probative from this point of view.

European Union's Directorate-General for Employment, Social Affairs and Equal Opportunities makes annual monitoring of national public policy for Corporate Social Responsibility in the European Union.[12]

Though new in Romania, corporate social responsibility has become an increasingly present concept in the Romanian business community.

Corporate social responsibility was first known due to multinational companies, which are, as yet, the main promoters of corporate initiatives in our country (Coca-Cola, Lafarge, Holcim, Carpatcement, Zentiva, Orange, Vodafone, etc.). As nearly any major concept subject to an accelerated assimilation need in Romania, CSR was initially more like a fashion, rather than the result of full awareness on the needs of all categories of stakeholders.

Originally, the national companies have turned to socially responsible practices in their attempt to meet business standards consolidated at European and international levels. As the Romanian market is becoming increasingly competitive, national companies started to see the potential of a social and economic approach in their brand development, as a prerequisite for he long and medium term commercial success. Thus, corporate social responsibility started being present in the business strategies of companies of all sizes.

A study prepared by European Union's Directorate-General for Employment, Social Affairs and Equal Opportunities in 2007 underlines the weak points of the Romanian social responsibility programs and the low level of public awareness.

The number of complex CSR programs has only increased in the past three years in Romania and few companies are involved in major social responsibility projects.

There are no policies to support CSR activities at Government level and, only in 2008, under the authority of the Ministry of Labour, a Department for Corporate Social Responsibility (DRSC) has been established - the department dealing with the identification and formulation of public policies in CSR, in collaboration with the ministries and specialized bodies of the central and local public administration authorities, employers' organizations, non-governmental organizations and trade unions representative at the national level.

The objectives of the Department are:

- promotion of business practices which help to the success and profitability of companies as well as meeting the objectives concerning sustainable development;
- raising awareness on the social responsibility concept, initiation of an open, constructive dialogue with all interested parties;
- formulation of performance standards in areas such as safety, health and equality of chances.

Development and implementation of public policies in the field of CSR is a challenge that requires learning and innovation, and the public authorities that plan to approach CSR need to expand this capacity. MMFES' commitment to integrate CSR in developing public policies is vital for improvement of decision-making processes on all levels in order to increase competitiveness in a sustainable manner.

The number of complex CSR programs has only increased in the past three years in Romania and few companies are involved in major social responsibility projects. There are no policies to support CSR activities at Government level.

Conclusions

Even though Corporate Social Responsibility, as it is formally known, is a relatively recent phenomena, company owners and managers have become involved with activities, that can be related to CSR, almost ever since the Industrial Revolution.

But, until 1990, CSR was generally restricted to corporate philanthropy.

From the beginning of the 1990s, extended CSR concepts and practices have become de focus point. What triggered this radical change?

In 2007, Scherer and Palazzo claimed that, in a globalised world, there is a need to change to a new extended political concept concerning CSR.

In fact, globalization also implies a weakening of the national power, the political authorities being able to regulate the businesses that want to extend their operations to a global level. Thus, companies have become key elements on the economical and political scene.

For example, present times companies are considered to be socially responsible, including for their providers chains (for example: Nike).

This is why companies that are in control have the moral obligation to use their power in a responsible manner and to influence the weaker parties in adopting new activities codes, to a certain standard.

Today, the state's authority can be taken over by international organizations, like the IMF, and also by multinational corporations.

On the one side, globalization puts companies in the position that the state was formally in and it obliges them to own up to a responsible corporate conduct. On the other side, a social corporate behavior is necessary for corporations to be able to control the way society reacts to them.

Looking at the situation from this perspective, the importance of having international (European) organizations that can regulate boundaries, rules and standards, for each member state – the minimal amount in order for states to be able to take on and implement for the companies that activate on their territory – becomes very clear.

CONSIDERATIONS ON EXCESSIVE LIBERALITIES REDUCTION*

ILIOARA GENOIU

Reduction of excessive liberalities represents one of the sanctions typical to succession field, which operates, on demand, as a result of forced heirship being transgressed.
The present work is aimed to analyze all the issues regarding this sanction, under all the aspects which the latter involves, in the light of the current Civil Code[1]. Thus, there will be analyzed elements such as: the way reduction operates, persons who can demand it, ways of performing reduction, statute of limitations term, order in which reduction is performed, legal effects and reduction of some special liberalities.
The present work will also provide a comparative analysis of reduction, by pointing out the novelty elements brought in the field under discussion by the current Civil Code, in comparison with the 1864 Civil Code. In general, when it comes to forced heirship, the current Civil Code consecrates several novelty elements, reconfiguring the matter in question. These modern elements also concern the excessive liberalities reduction issue. Consequently, one of the objectives of the current work is to point out such novelties and to assess their modern character.

Keywords*: forced heirship, disposable portion, donations, legacies, imputing liberalities.*

1. Introduction

Law No. 287/2009 reconfigures the field of succession in general, by preserving from the former regulations only those provisions having a justness and actuality which were never doubted throughout time.

The present work is aimed to analyze the issues regarding excessive liberalities. The New Civil Code regulates this sanction typical to testamentary field in Book IV "On inheritance and liberalities", Title III "Liberalities", Chapter IV "Forced heirship, disposable portion and reduction of excessive liberalities", Sanction 2 "Reduction of excessive liberalities", articles 1091-1098. In relation to them, the new Civil Code regulates the following aspects: the way reduction operates, persons who can demand it, ways of performing reduction, statute of limitations term, order in which reduction is performed, legal effects and reduction of some special liberalities.

In this context, our aim is to analyze such aspects in a comparative manner, so as to point out the elements which the new Civil Code preserved from the former civil regulations (the 1864 Civil Code), but also the novelty elements which the same Civil Code consecrated. We will also assess the justness and appropriateness of the novelty elements consecrated by Law No. 287/2009.

Under the circumstances in which, after the new Civil Code entered into force, on October 1st 2011, it has been published only a specialized work relating to successions[2], we consider that our scientific initiative is both actual and useful. We also want to popularize this way the novelties consecrated by law No. 287/2009 in the field of excessive liberalities reduction, so as to contribute, hopefully, to the good enforcement of the justice act. Moreover, we consider that the results of our

2. Content

2.1. Short considerations on excessive liberalities

The performance of liberalities with the observance of forced heirship represents one of the limits of the right to make provisions. According to article 1086 of the new Civil Code, "Forced heirship constitutes that part of the inheritance estate to which forced heirs[3] are entitled, according to law, even against the deceased's will, expressed by means of liberalities and disinheritances". Consequently, forced heirship operates only in the case in which the deceased has forced heirs.

Thus, the limits of forced heirship concern, naturally, not only the liberalities ordered by the deceased, but also the disinheritance testamentary clause. Even if a deceased disinherited his forced heirs in his last will act, such heirs will obtain the forced estate, according to law.

If the deceased has only non-forced heirs, he may exert his right to decide on his assets irrespective of any other limitation.

According to provisions of article 1089 of the new Civil Code, the disposable portion represents "…that part of the inheritance estate which is not reserved according to law and which can be freely disposed of by a testator, including by using liberalities".

It thus emerges that, if a deceased has on the one hand forced heirs, while on the other hand he performed liberalities (legacies or donations), his estate shall be divided in two parts: the legal heirhsip, to which forced heirs are entitled, even against the deceased's will, and the disposable portion, which can be disposed of by the deceased out of his own will, without any legal restriction.

Nonetheless, it the liberalities disposed of by the deceased affect forced heirship, such liberalities shall be subject to reduction, being considered excessive.

2.2. Definition of excessive liberalities reduction

Excessive liberalities reduction constitutes the sanction which deprives of efficacy those liberalities made by a deceased, which affect forced heirship[4]. The essence of excessive liberalities reduction concept emerges from the provisions of article 1092 of the new Civil Code, according to which "After an inheritance is opened, the liberalities which transgress forced heirship are subject to reduction, on demand".

Thus, the reduction of excessive liberalities triggers only the latter's inefficacy, and not also their nullity. Consequently, the reduction of excessive liberalities must not be confounded with nullity, although both of them have the legal nature of a civil sanction. Nullity is the sanction which intervenes as a result of a donation contract or a will being concluded by ignoring the essential validity conditions, provided for by law, while reduction concerns a donation contract or a legacy, validly constituted, but which affect a legal limit, namely forced heirship. While nullity intervenes for causes which are anterior or concomitant with the conclusion of a civil legal act, the reduction intervenes for causes which are ulterior to the conclusion of a civil legal act, in a valid way.

[3] According to provisions of article 1087 of the new Civil Code, forced heirs are the surviving spouse, the deceased's privileged descendants and ascendants.

[4] The excessive liberalities reduction is defined in the same terms also by: Francisc Deak, Tratat de drept succesoral, II edition, updated and completed (Bucharest: Universul Juridic Publ. House, 2002), 340; Stanciu Cărpenaru, „Dreptul de moştenire" in Drept civil. Contracte speciale. Dreptul de autor. Dreptul de moştenire, Francisc Deak and Stanciu Cărpenaru (Bucharest: Bucharest University, 1983), 477; Ioan Adam and Adrian Rusu, Drept civil. Succesiuni, (Bucharest: All Beck Publ. House, 2003), 346; Dan Chirică, Drept civil. Succesiuni, (Bucharest: Lumina Lex Publ. House, 1996), 186, a.s.o.

Are subject to reduction not only the donations made by a deceased during his life, but also legacies [5], irrespective of the fact that they are universal, by universal title or by particular title.

In all cases (regarding donations or legacies), the reduction issue is raised only after the inheritance opening, article 1092 of the new Civil Code clearly stating it. At the same time, the reduction issue is raised irrespective of the fact that the beneficiary of the excessive liberality is a third party or heir – forced heir or non-forced heir.

2.3. Person who can invoke excessive liberalities reduction

According to article 1093 of the new Civil Code, "Reduction of excessive liberalities can be demanded only by forced heirs, by their successors and by the unsecured creditors of forced heirs". It thus emerges that the reduction of excessive liberalities can be invoked only by the following persons[6]:

- forced heirs, who are effectively entitled to inheritance (those who accepted inheritance);

If there are more forced heirs, they can collectively demand the reduction of excessive liberalities. Still, the way of exerting the right on demanding reduction, which can be individual or collective, must not be mistaken with the character of such a right, which is always individual. As a result of the individual character of the right to reduction, if one of the forced heirs waives the use of such a right, the result is that liberalities are reduced only if forced heirship is replenished by the other forced heirs.

- if a forced heir dies, after the opening of the inheritance in relation to which had such a quality, but before exerting his right on demanding reduction, his right is passed on to his own heirs;

If a forced heir has only one heir, the latter has the choice to exert or waive the right on reduction. If he has more heirs, in order to avoid any difficulty, is preferable for heirs to have a unitary option for the right to reduction, namely either to waive or to exert it. Difficulties emerge only when the heirs of the forced heir do not state the same option regarding their inherited right, so that some of them want to use such a right, while others waive it. Nonetheless, in all cases, since the right to reduction has an individual character, the fact that some of the forced heir's successors waive such a right does not affect the right of the others to exert it[7].

- unsecured creditors of forced heirs.

According to the provisions of article 848 of the 1864 Civil Code, it was possible to demand the reduction of excessive liberalities, apart from forced heirs and their successors, also by those "presenting their rights". Consequently, according to the former Civil Code, the sanction under scrutiny could be invoked by the universal successors or successors by universal title of the forced heir, but also the creditors of the forced heir, as persons "presenting the rights" of that forced heir. Thus, the notion "persons presenting the rights of a forced heir" designated the so-called "having cause" persons. The successors by particular title of the forced heir (such as the buyer or the donor of

[5] Article 848 of the 1864 Civil Code contained an inadvertence, since it only referred to liberalities among alive persons, under the circumstances in which, from other provisions of the same normative act (such as articles 850, 852 and 853) resulted without any doubt that reduction also concerned legacies. Yet, specialized literature unanimously considered that reduction generally regards liberalities, namely donations and legacies. For that matter, see: Dan Chirică, quoted works, 187; Francisc Deak, quoted works., 341, Alexandru Bacaci and Gheorghe Comăniță, Drept civil. Succesiunile, (Bucharest: C.H. Beck Publ. House, 2006), 163, footnote 4. Article 1092 of the new Civil Code refers to liberalities, thus to both donations and legacies. It can be thus seen that, by taking into account the criticism within legal doctrine, the new Civil Code removes any doubt regarding liberalities subject to reduction.

[6] The list of persons who can invoke reduction has a limitative character, so that other persons than those nominated by the lawmaker at article 1093 of the new Civil Code cannot exert such a right. As a result of such reasoning, it was criticized the solution admitting the request of privileged collaterals for the reduction of excessive liberalities. See P. Savu and others, „Notes on the civil decision No. 3743/1957 of the Regional Court of Craiova", in „Legalitatea populară" Magazine (2/1958): 110.

an individual good established from the inheritance), by not being "having cause" persons, could not exert the right to reduction.

Still, it can be noticed that the new Civil Code, in the limitative list contained by its article 1093, refers only to unsecured creditors of forced heirs, and not also to the whole category of "having cause" persons. As a consequence, by lege lata, the universal or by universal title successors of the forced heir cannot demand the reduction of excessive liberalities, to such a right being entitled only the unsecured creditors of the forced heir.

Given that the right to reduction concerns precisely donations and legacies, donors and legatees themselves cannot demand the reduction of liberalities from which they benefited. If there are more persons on behalf of whom a donation was performed, they can demand only the observance of the legal order regarding the reduction of excessive liberalities[8].

It can be thus seen that Law No. 287/2009 innovates in terms of those persons who can demand the reduction of excessive liberalities, by acknowledging this right only to forced heirs, their successors and unsecured creditors.

2.4. The order in which excessive liberalities are reduced

It is necessary to know the order in which the reduction of excessive liberalities operates, only if the deceased carried out more liberalities. The new Civil Code, at article 1096, establishes the rules regarding the order in which liberalities are subject to reduction. Thus:

a) Legacies are reduced before donations [article 1096 paragraph (1) of the new Civil Code].

The institution, by the lawmaker, of such a rule with an imperative character, which cannot be changed by the deceased's will, is based on two ways of reasoning:

- legacies have effects from the moment an inheritance is opened, unlike donations, which have effect from the moment they are performed. Thus, in time, donations precede legacies, so that is assumed that donations, at least in part, are done from the disposable portion and that is natural for reduction to concern primarily the last liberalities ordered by a person.
- if donations were to be reduced with priority, in competition with legacies, the principle on the irrevocability of donations would be affected;
- by reversing the order imposed by the lawmaker, it would also be affected the principle prior tempore potior iure.

b) Legacies are reduced all at the same time and in a proportional manner, except for the case when a testator ordered for some legacies to have priority, case in which the other legacies shall be reduced first [article 1096 paragraph (2) of the new Civil Code].

Therefore, as a rule, legacies are reduced all at the same time and in a proportional manner, irrespective of being universal, by universal or particular title and being included in the same or in different wills. Still, by exception, a testator may dispose for some legacies to have priority, case in which the other legacies will be first of all reduced.

The institution, by lawmaker, of such a rule having an imperative character, which can be changed by the deceased's will, is based on the reasoning that all legacies produce effects starting with the same date (the testator's death).

c) Donations are successively reduced, in the opposed order of their date, starting with the most recent [article 1096 paragraph (3) of the new Civil Code].

As a result of this rule, if the last donation is not enough for completing the quota of the entire forced heirship, it shall be moved on to the reduction of the following donation.

The reasons which determined the institution of such an imperative rule are determined, just as in the case of the one mentioned above, by the preoccupation of not affecting the principle on the irrevocability of donations, but also to the principle prior tempore potior iure. Also in this case, there are presumed to have affected forced heirship the donations more recently performed.

Being related to public order, the rule according to which donations are subject to reduction in a reversed chronological order cannot be modified by donor's will, irrespective of the latter being expressed by means of inter vivos or mortis causa liberalities[9]. Still, by exception, the donor has the acknowledged right to establish the order in which concomitant donations (having the same date) are reduced. If the donor expresses no will for that matter, concomitant donations shall be subject to reduction, just like legacies, all at the same time and proportionally with their value. Thus, according to the provisions of article 1096 paragraph (4) of the new Civil Code, "Concomitant donations are reduced all at the same tine and in a proportional manner, except for the case when the donor ordered for certain donations to have preference, case in which the other donations shall be first of all reduced".

If the beneficiary of the donation which should have been reduced is insolvent, it shall be moved on to the reduction of the former donation [article 1096 paragraph (5) of the new Civil Code]. Consequently, if the beneficiary of the donation alienated the donated asset and has no other assets which could be pursued, the former donation is reduced[10].

It can be thus identified another novelty element brought in the field subject to analysis by Law No. 287/2009. Under the incidence of the former Civil Code, which contained no provision for that matter, such a solution was being proposed by most of specialized literature[11].

As it could have been seen, the moment when a donation is carried out is very important. This aspect does not raise difficulties in the case of actual donations (performed by authentic act). In the case of other donations (non authentic donations, such as indirect donations, simulated donations or even handed in gifts), the reduction shall take into account the moment when such donations received a certain date, according to article 1182 of the 1864 Civil Code[12].

Specialized literature[13] has also raised the issue regarding the reduction of indirect liberalities[14], the latter representing the duties relating to direct liberalities. Indirect liberalities are subject to reduction only if they meet two conditions:

- the duty is provided for in favor of a third party and not of donor's, therefore constituting a stipulation for another person;
- the donor's intention was to gratify.

In the light of the principle accesorium sequitur principale, the reduction of a direct liberality shall also trigger the reduction of indirect liberality. Since indirect liberalities have the same date as direct liberalities, which they entail, their reduction shall be performed simultaneously and proportional with their value.

As to us, we consider that such an opinion can be upheld also at present.

[9] Specialized literature acknowledges that a donor can stipulate for the donation made in favor of his spouse, who is revocable anyway, to be subject to reduction before other donations subsequently disposed. House, 1966), 370; Dan Chirică, quoted works, 193; Alexandru Bacaci and Gheorghe Comăniţă, quoted works, 166. Specialized literature has also stated another opinion, much more equitable, which nonetheless did not benefit from the same support as the first one. According to it, the consequences of the insolvency of a person receiving a donation subject to reduction should have been borne not only by the former person receiving the donation, also by forced heirs. Such fact could have become possible by excluding the donation in question from the estate subject to calculation. For that matter, see: Matei B. Cantacuzino, quoted works, 313; Francisc Deak, quoted works, 345, footnote 2.

[12] Its correspondent in the new Civil Procedure Code is article 272.

[13] This issue, not at all deprived of theoretical and practical use, was for the first time brought in attention by Fr. Deak, quoted works, p. 346-7.

[14] Indirect liberalities are called II degree liberalities.

2.5. Procedural ways to exert the right to reduction

According to provisions of article 1092 of the New Civil Code, reduction does not operate by right, ex officio, but it must be demanded[15]. Reduction can be carried out both by agreement and by judicial ways.

A) Reduction by good agreement

Between forced heirs, on the other hand, and the legatees on favor of whom the deceased left certain provisions, can take place an agreement regarding excessive liberalities which overcame the limits of the disposable quota. By being a genuine contract, the convention of the parties on reduction can be revoked only unilaterally, but it can be annulled or declared null for not observing the essential validity conditions.

The ways of performing reduction by good agreement (extra-judicial), regulated by the provisions of Law No. 36/1995 are the following:

a) reduction of liberalities until the limits established by law are reached, by a notary public, on the basis of the agreement between the person interested in it [article 82 paragraph (3)];

b) division of assets by good agreement [article 81 paragraph (3)].

B) Judicial reduction

In the absence of the agreement expressed by the interested persons, the reduction of excessive liberalities can be invoked in front of the court, by exception or by an action method, as the case may be [article 1094 paragraph (2) of the new Civil Code]. The method to be followed differs, just as the assets which constituted the object of the liberality in question are in the possession of the person of the person receiving that liberality or of forced heirs.

a) The hypothesis frequently encountered in practice is characterized by the fact that the assets constituting the object of a liberality are founded at the person receiving that liberality (usually, the donee and only exceptionally the legatee). In this case, forced heirs are entitled to take the legal action for reduction, which has a personal and patrimonial character. Since such an action is not a real one, the forced heir cannot pursue the goods which constituted the object of the excessive liberality while they are possessed by third parties which obtained them[16].

From the personal and patrimonial character of the legal action for reduction, the following consequences result:

- the quality of plaintiff can be assigned only to the heir whose forced estate was affected by the excessive liberality;
- the legal action for reduction can be promoted only between the limits of the forced heirship to which the plaintiff is entitled;
- the beneficiary of the legal action for reduction admission can be only the plaintiff.

According to provisions of article 1094 paragraph (3) of the new Civil Code, "If there are more forced heirs, reduction operates only between the limits of the forced quota to which is entitled the person who demanded reduction". It thus emerges that the legal action for reduction is divisible.

We mention that the former Civil Code contained no provision for that matter, so that judicial practice was the one to adopt such a solution[17]. Under these circumstances, we consider praiseworthy

In the light of the 1864 Civil Code, jurisprudence admitted nonetheless that the reduction demand made by one of forced heirs was to be befitted from also by the other heirs from the same category, only if, by having this quality, the demand in question was being promoted within the partition action and only if the other forced heirs were within the term of statute of limitations, which they themselves could promote. See for that matter: Supreme Court, civil section, decision no. 1119/1977, in „Culegere de decizii pe anul 1977", 92-5.

the fact the new Civil Code takes over the former orientation of jurisprudence, providing a legal character to it.

- the legal action for reduction, by being subject to the statute of limitations, must be taken within the statute of limitations term, which is of 3 years. According to provisions of article 1095 of the new Civil Code, the term mentioned above starts to elapse, as a rule, from the moment succession is opened or, as the case may be, from the date when forced heirs lost the possession of the assets constituting the object of liberalities. In exceptional cases, such as those in which a forced heir does not know, out of reasons of which he is not guilty, about the existence of some excessive liberalities, the statute of limitations term starts to operate from the moment the forced heir learns about the existence of the liberalities in question and their excessive character.

We mention that the 1864 Civil Code made no reference to the issue presented above. Consequently, jurisprudence was the one to adopt a certain orientation. As a result of the latter, the legal action for reduction had to be taken within the general statute of limitations term, of 3 years, which started to elapse from the moment inheritance was opened[18]. In case a forced heir did not know about the existence of some excessive liberalities, for reasons of which he was not guilty, the statute of limitations term started to operate from the moment the forced heir became aware of the excessive liberalities or should have learnt about their existence[19].

It can be therefore noticed that new Civil Code provides a legal character to most of the jurisprudential orientation regarding legal action for reduction. Yet, some different elements can be identified. Thus, according to the new Civil Code, the 3 year term starts to operate, as a rule, not only from the moment an inheritance is opened, but also, according to the case, from the moment forced heirs lost possession of the assets constituting the object of liberalities. Then, in the exceptional case in which a forced heir does not know about the existence of some excessive liberalities, the term starts to elapse, according to the new Civil Code, only from the moment the forced heir learns about the liberalities in question and about their excessive character.

b) If forced heirs are in the possession of assets which constituted the object of excessive liberalities (a fact which can be encountered in case of legacies), the beneficiaries of excessive liberalities can demand for such assets to be handed in, by resorting to legal action (for getting back legacy, heredity petition, a.s.o.). In his defense, the forced heir can invoke reduction[20] in front of the plaintiff or can resort to a counterclaim action for that matter[21].

We mention that the reduction exception does not benefit from statute of limitations [article 1095 paragraph (3) of the new Civil Code]. Before the new Civil Code entered into force, legal doctrine and jurisprudence also adopted the same solution regarding the fact that the reduction exception could not benefit from statute of limitations. According to them, a forced heir found in such sitation could not be subject to statute of limitations, by considering that he had exercised in fact all his prerogatives deriving from his quality, so that he could not be accused of negligence[22].

2.6. Effects of excessive liberalities reduction

According to provisions of article 1097 paragraph (1) of the new Civil Code, "The effect of reduction is the inefficacy of legacies or, as the case may be, the annulment of donations, in order to replenish forced heirship".

Thus, the effects of reduction are accomplished in a different manner, depending whether liberalities regard legacies or donations.

A) Reduction of legacies triggers their inefficacity, either partially or totally, jus as forced heirship can be replenished or not only with a part from their value. In such case, the replenishment of forced heirship shall be done in kind, a fact which is possible as a result of the assets which constituted the object of excessive legacies existing in the testamentary estate.

B) Reduction of donations triggers their annulment, either partially or totally, jus as forced heirship can be replenished or not only with a part from their value

Due to the abolishment of a donation as an effect of reduction, the forced heir becomes owner of the asset which allowed the replenishment of his forced heriship and, in such quality, he can demand the restitution of that asset, in principle in kind [article 1097 paragraph (2) of the new Civil Code][23]. Consequently, a testator cannot dispose of forced heirship to be insured by means of an equivalent.

The exceptions which characterize the rule presented above are provided for in a clear, limitative manner by article 1097 paragraphs (3) – (5) of the new Civil Code. Thus, the replenishment of forced heirship is carried out by equivalent in the following cases[24]:

a) before the opening of the inheritance, the donee alienated the asset, or instituted real rights upon it, or the asset disappeared due to a cause of which the donee is not guilty [paragraph (3)];

In such case, forced heirs are entitled only to the counter equivalent in money. This solution is just, since reduction has effects only from the moment inheritance is opened, while alienations and responsibilities emerging from duties created by the donor before that moment remain valid. The solution mentioned above is completely applicable, in case a donee has the quality of third party before inheritance or non-forced heir.

It must also be mentioned that the duty to pay the counter equivalent in money does not also belong to the donee, who cannot be accused of the disappearance of the asset. In this case, the asset will no be included in the testamentary estate, being presumed to have disappeared also from donee's possession.

In all the cases regarding restitution by equivalent, operates the rule instituted by article 1091 paragraph (2) of the new Civil Code, according to which it will be taken into account the state of the assets at the moment they were donated and their value at the moment inheritance is opened.

[23] See also Supreme Court, civil section, decision No. 1314/1994, in Revista „Dreptul", (7/1995), 87.

[24] According to the 1864 Civil Code, the replenishment of forced heirship could be performed by equivalent, in clear and limitative cases provided for by law:

a) the excessive donation was ordered in favor of a descendant or the surviving spouse, with the exemption to be reported;

In this case, the donee had the right, according to the provisions of the 1864 Civil Code, to perform reduction, by taking less from the forced heirship, if hereditary assets were of the same nature with the assets received by donation.

b) excessive donation, having as object a building, was ordered in favor of a potential heir, without the exemption to be reported, and the part necessary for the replenishment of forced heirship was smaller than half the value of the asset;

On the basis of article 770 paragraph (2) of the 1864 Civil Code, the donee had in this case the choice between:

- keeping the asset and compensating the other forced heirs, by taking less from other hereditary assets;
- paying the financial equivalent of the surplus;

c) the donee alienated the object of donation or instituted duties upon it, before inheritance was opened;

d) the donated asset perished out of donee's guilt.

Beneficiaries must obtain full ownership of forced heirship, without the latter being subject to other duties or supplied by granting a usufruct right[25].

Therefore, it can be noticed that the new Civil Code reunites two exceptional situations regulated by the 1864 Civil Code (the donee alienated the object of donation or instituted other duties upon it, before inheritance was opened, and the donated good perished out of donee's guilt), in only one. Otherwise, the new Civil Code would not have brought any other innovative element until this point of our analysis.

b) the donation which is subject to reduction was done on behalf of a forced heir, who is not bound to report that donation [paragraph (4)];

In this situation, the donee – forced heir, who is not bound to report the donation – will be allowed to keep that part which overcomes the disposable portion, inside his estate.

The equivalent of the situation motioned above in the 1864 Civil Code regards the hypothesis in which an excessive donation was left on behalf of a descendant or surviving spouse, with the exemption to be reported.

It can be thus noticed that the new Civil Code expands the group of persons which can use such an exception, from descendants and surviving spouse, to forced heirs category. But besides the surviving spouse and descendants, the quality of forced heir is also held by the deceased's privileged ascendants. Still, the duty to report donations belongs only to the surviving spouse and the deceased's descendants, who come effectively and together to the legal inheritance [article 1146 paragraph (1) of the new Civil Code].

c) If a donee is prospectively bound to report and the part subject to reduction represents less than half from the value of the donated asset, then the forced donee can keep the asset, whereas the reduction which is necessary for replenish the estate of the other forced heirs shall be performed by taking less or by a financial equivalent.

Therefore, the case mentioned above regards only the surviving spouse and descendants, when coming effectively and together to the legal inheritance, since they are prospectively bound to report. It is necessary for them not be exempted from the obligation to report donations out of testator's will. We also mention that this option is acknowledged by law, in relation to prospective heirs who are bound to report, only with the view to replenish the estate of the other forced heirs, namely of privileged ascendants.

The correspondent of this exceptional case in the former Civil Code regards the situation in which an excessive donation, having as object an immovable asset, is ordered in favor of a prospective heir, without exemption from report, whereas the part necessary for replenishing forced heirship is less than half the value of the asset.

It can be therefore noticed another different element between the former and current regulations in the field of reduction. Unlike the 1864 Civil Code, the new Civil Code does not restrict the field of the hypothesis described above only to immovable goods.

On the basis of provisions of article 1097 paragraph (5) of the new Civil Code, the donee has in this case the possibility to chose between:

- keeping the asset and offering compensations to the other forced heirs, by taking less from the other inheritance assets;
- paying the financial equivalent of the surplus.

It has been pointed out that the reduction of donations triggers their retroactive abolishment. The moment until which abolishment remains retroactive is, in this case, represented by the date when inheritance is opened. Thus, it is being consecrated an exception from the common law rule, according to which the abolishment of a civil act goes back in time, up to the date that act was concluded. The preservation of this exception is upheld with text arguments. Thus:

[25] See also Supreme Court, civil section, decision No. 760/1969, in „Repertoriu II 1969-1975", 206.

a) according to the provisions of article 1097 paragraph (3) of the new Civil Code, the documents by means of which the assets donated to third parties are alienated, before the opening of inheritance, remain valid;

b) on the basis of article 1097 paragraph (6) of the new Civil Code, in case forced heirship is replenished in kind, the person who received the donation keeps the fruits from that part of the asset which overcomes the available portion, obtained by the date the persons entitled demanded reduction.

2.7. Reduction of some special liberalities

Liberalities in usufruct, use, habitation, annuity or life maintenance, which are hard to evaluate, as they depend on a casual element, namely the length of beneficiary's life, are subject to a special legal regime, consecrated by the provisions of article 1098 of the new Civil Code[26]. Thus: "If the object of a donation or legacy is an usufruct, use, habitation, annuity or life maintenance, forced heirs have the possibility either to exert that liberality as it was stipulated or to abandon the possession of the disposable portion on favour of the beneficiary of that liberality or to demand reduction according to common law".

Therefore, from the legal provisions mentioned above, it results that forced heirs, whose forced estate is affected by a liberality consisting in usufruct, use, habitation, annuity or life maintenance, have the following possibilities:

a) to comply with liberalities as they were instituted by the deceased;

b) to give up to the disposable portion, so that the beneficiary of usufruct, use, habitation, annuity or life maintenance becomes, under these limits, owner;

c) to demand reduction according to common law;

The new Civil Code also provides that, if forced heirs do not reach an agreement regarding their options, the reduction shall be performed according to common law.

In comparison with the correspondent provisions of the 1864 Civil Code (article 844), article 1098 of the new Civil Code brings two novelty elements:

- expands the area of special liberalities subject to reduction, from usufruct and life annuity, to liberalities consisting in usufruct, use, habitation, annuity and life maintenance;

- offers three possibilities to forced heirs whose forced estate is affected by a liberality consisting in usufruct, use, habitation, annuity or life maintenance. The 1864 Civil Code offered instead to forced heirs only the possibility to comply with liberalities as they were ordered by the deceased and the possibility to give up to the disposable portion. In addition, the new Civil Code offers also a third possibility, that of demanding reduction according to common law.

Consequently, the new Civil Code offers to forced heir the possibility to choose between there forms of action. An apparent advantageous situation seems to be created for the forced heir. In reality, the solution provided by the legal provisions under discussion has a reasonable character for both parties involved. On the one hand, forced heir is advantaged as a result of the fact that he has the possibility to adopt a course of action out of three, according to his personal interests, while on the other hand the beneficiaries of usufruct, use, habitation, annuity or life maintenance cannot make any reproach to lawmaker, given that their interests are guaranteed, irrespective of the solution adopted by the forced heir. If the forced heir decides to comply with the liberality in question, as it was ordered by the deceased, the beneficiaries of that liberality cannot express discontent, since they received precisely the rights conferred by that liberality. At the same time, the beneficiaries of the liberality have no reasons to declare themselves under-privileged not even in the case in which the forced heir decides to give up, on their favour, to the property of the disposable portion. On the contrary, in such an eventuality, for beneficiaries is created a favourable and profitable situation, superior to deceased's real intention, since they obtain more than the testator intended them to. Moreover, beneficiaries' interests are completely protected also if the forced heir decides to demand reduction according to the conditions of common law.

[26] Its correspondent in the former Civil Code was represented by article 844. According to the latter: "If the disposition relating to alive persons, left by documents or by will, constitutes an usufruct or life annuity having a value which overcomes the disposable portion, then forced heirship have the capacity to comply with such dispositions or to abandon the possession of the disposable portion".

Exerting the right regarding the reduction of excessive liberalities in usufruct, use, habitation, annuity or life maintenance can be done either in a friendly manner, according with the non-litigation procedure, or in a judicial manner, with the correct application of the rules analyzed.

The provisions with a derogatory character of article 1098 of the new Civil code become applicable only in those situations which meet the following conditions:

a) the object of excessive liberality is usufruct, use, habitation, annuity or life maintenance;

The legal text mentioned above is not applicable to the excessive liberalities having as object simple property or the property bearing life annuity in favour of the forced heir[27]. Moreover, the legal provisions already mentioned make no direct reference to the hypothesis in which the beneficiary of the liberality in usufruct, use, habitation, annuity or life maintenance is the forced heir, hypothesis which would regard co-heirs[28].

b) the deceased instituted only one liberality;

Only in the case in which the deceased made only one excessive liberality in usufruct, use, habitation, annuity or life maintenance, become applicable the provisions of article 1098 of the new Civil Code, valuation not being necessary[29]. On the contrary, valuation is necessary in case the deceased made several liberalities, among which one in usufruct, use, habitation, annuity or life maintenance.

c) each forced heir, in case there are more forced heirs, has the possibility to choose, in an individual way, one of the legal solutions applicable to excessive liberalities consisting in usufruct, use, habitation, annuity or life maintenance, given that the legal action for reduction has a divisible character. The consensus of forced heirs is necessary, only if the object of liberality involved is an indivisible good. In the absence of this consensus, there will become applicable the provisions of article 1098 paragraph (2) of the new Civil Code, according to which reduction shall be done according to common law.

d) if a forced heir gives up to the possession the disposable portion, in favour of a donee or legatee, the latter remain donee and, respectively, legatee by particular title, not having the duty to take upon themselves the debts relating to inheritance[30].

The option right consecrated by the provisions of article 1098 of the new Civil Code has a personal character, so that it cannot be transmitted by inheritance[31]. Consequently, this right can only be exerted by the forced heir, whereas no successor or creditor of a forced heir can use the option conferred by the exceptional legal provisions, already mentioned.

The provisions of article 1098 of the new Civil Code have no imperative character[32], so that, one the one hand, parties can decide upon another way of reducing excessive liberalities consisting in usufruct, use, habitation, annuity or life maintenance, while on the other hand the deceased can decide for the derogatory system in question not to be applied. By forbidding the transformation of the right on usufruct, use, habitation, annuity or life maintenance in full ownership, the person ordering that makes possible the come back to common law, in the field of excessive liberalities reduction.

3. Conclusions

At the end of our analysis, we are listing the novelty elements consecrated by Law No. 287/2009 in regard to reduction of excessive liberalities. Thus:

- Law No. 287/2009 innovates in relation to persons who can demand the reduction of excessive liberalities, by acknowledging this right only to forced heirs, to their successors and unsecured creditors of forced heirs. According to the former civil regulation, the whole category of „having-cause" persons could use this right.

- According to the new Civil Code, if the beneficiary of the donation which must be reduced is insolvent, then it shall be moved on to the reduction of the former donation. Under the incidence of the former Civil Code, this solution was being proposed by most of specialized literature.

- According to the new regulation in the civil field, the legal action for reduction has a divisible character. Such character was being imposed to legal action for reduction also by the regulations which preceded the entry in force of the new Civil Code, under the circumstances in which the 1864 Civil Code contained no provisions for that matter.

- The new Civil Code regulates in great part the former orientation of jurisprudence when it comes to the statute of limitations applying to legal action for reduction. Thus, the maximum period of time within which the legal action must be filed is of 3 years and starts to elapse, as a rule, from the moment inheritance is opened or, as the case may be, from the moment forced heirs lost the possession of the goods constituting the object of liberality but also, as an exception, from the moment forced heirs became aware of the existing liberalities and their excessive character. According to the new Civil Code, the exception from reduction cannot be subject to statute of limitations.

- In what concerns the exceptional cases, in which reductions is performed by equivalent, the new Civil Code reunites two exceptional circumstances, regulated by the 1864 Civil Code (the donee alienated the object of donation or instituted duties upon it, before inheritance was opened, and the asset in question perished out of donee's guilt) in only one. Moreover, the new Civil Code expands the group of persons who can keep inside forced heirship that part of donation subject to reduction, which overcomes the disposable portion, from descendants and surviving spouse to the category of forced heirs.

- In what concerns the reduction of some special liberalities, in comparison with the 1864 Civil Code, the new Civil Code brings the following novelty elements: expands the area of special liberalities subject to reduction, from those consisting in usufruct and life annuity, to liberalities consisting in usufruct, use, habitation, annuity and life maintenance; offers three possibilities to forced heirs, whose reserve is affected by a liberality consisting in usufruct, use, habitation, annuity or life maintenance. The 1864 Civil Code offered instead to forced heirs only the possibility to comply with liberalities as they were ordered by the deceased or to give up to the disposable portion. Moreover, the new Civil Code brings a third possibility, namely that of demanding reduction according to common law.

Finally, we consider that, by bringing together the proposals made by legal doctrine and jurisprudential orientation, which were shaped by the former Civil Code, but also by using an updated language, the new Civil Code provides the reduction of excessive liberalities with a modern, just and flexible regulation.

BANK CONTRACTS IN THE NEW ROMANIAN CIVIL CODE

DAN VELICU*

Abstract
The adoption of the new Civil Code and its entry into force on October 1st 2011 has involved an extensive reform of the private law. The new Code, as its authors notice, has aimed primarily to achieve a unification of the private law, the largest part of the land commerce regulations from the commerce code adopted in 1887 being absorbed into the new text and, secondly, to harmonize the basic institutions of the private law with the European regulations and directives.
Beyond these two major objectives, the new Civil Code comprises regulations with innovative character compared to the Romanian law, such as bank contracts.
This study is preliminary and aims to highlight the inspiring models of the new Civil Code and to analyse the functionality of the newly used concepts.

Keywords: new Civil Code, bank contracts, bank current account, bank deposit, rental of value boxes

1. Preliminary considerations.

The new Romanian Civil Code, which entered into force on October 1st 2011, has contributed, besides from the modernization of some institutions of civil and commercial law and the harmonization of various legal mechanisms with the norms of European Union law, to the innovative regulation of some types of contracts.

The typology of banking contracts seems to be this respect one of the aspects with obviously innovative character.

The old Commercial Code, although mentioning banking contracts between operations considered acts of trade (art.3), did not offer any definition about them and did not regulate them separately. In the predominant conception of the legal literature of the XIXth century, the banking contracts are nothing but mere applications of civil contracts like the civil deposit or loan. They acquire a commercial character when they are used exclusively and permanently by the commercial banks to increase their profit.

It was only in the XXth century, by the contribution of important theorists such as Joseph Hamel, Joaquin Garrigues or Giaccomo Molle, that the banking contracts acquired an autonomous profile. The Italian Civil Code from 1942 has established this recognition, the regulation being included in Chapter XVII – Contratti bancari.

2. Current account in the new Civil Code.

With the new reform, the regulation of the current account contract was transferred from the Commercial Code (art.370-373) – partly repealed at this moment – to the content of the new Civil Code. The previous provisions had into consideration only the effects produced by the closure of a current account contract and the way in which it could be dissolved. There were no legal rules defining the concept itself or its scope of applicability[1].

The current provisions of NCC resolve such a situation. Thus, art.2171 NCC retains the current account contract as that contract by which the parties, referred to as account holders, are committed to register in an account the receivables arising from mutual remittance, considering them non-eligible and unavailable until the closure of the account.

On the other hand, it is stated that the credit balance of the account upon its closure represents an eligible receivable. If its payment is not required, the balance represents the first remittance from a new account and the contract is considered renewed indefinitely.

Although the current bank account contract is individualised, having an entire section of the Civil Code dedicated to it, it is not very clear if in the vision of its authors the current bank account is a legal independent institution or just a version of the current account (on one hand, as shown above, the relevant provisions (art.2184-art.2190 NCC) are found in another section and, on the other hand, this section does not comprise any definition of the concept.

The provisions which, as a matter of fact, are numerous seem rather applications of the current account. For instance, according to art. 2184, if the bank deposit, credit or any other banking operation is done though the current account, the account holder may, at any time, dispose of the credit balance of the account, in compliance with the notice, if the latter has been agreed by the parties.

According to art.2188 NCC, if the current bank account is concluded for an indefinite period of time, wither party may terminate the current account contract, observing a 15-day notice, unless the contract or practices mention another term, under the damages sanction.

The reference period of 15 days is unnecessary, considering that art.2183 paragraph 2 NCC referring to the current account, as generic figure, mentioned that in the case of the contract concluded for an indefinite period of time, each party may declare its termination upon the closure of the account, informing the other party 15 days in advance.

Another norm, art.2187NCC provides that if the account owner dies, before reaching partition, the heirs are considered co-owners of the account, account and the consent of all co-owners is necessary for performing the operations in the account.

Thus, the personal creditor of one of the joint-heirs cannot seize legally the credit balance of the joint account. He can only ask for partition. The joint-heirs are kept divisible by the credit institution for the balance due of the account, unless otherwise determined by law or convention.

None of these provisions contribute, in our opinion, to shaping the autonomy of this contract. Moreover, art.2187 paragraph 3 states that the provisions outlined are applicable properly and in other cases of severalty between current account holders, unless otherwise provided by law.

In other words, the rules of derogatory nature will also be applied on grounds of analogy in the case of the current account, although this is considered a general typology.

3. Bank deposit.

The new regulation makes a clear distinction between the two forms: the deposit of funds and the deposit of titles.

According to article 2191 NCC, by creating a deposit of funds, the credit institution acquires ownership of the money deposited and is committed to repaying the same amount, of the same kind, upon the agreed deadline or, where appropriate, at any time, at the depositor's request, within the deadline established by the parties or, in its absence, within the deadline established by the practices.

The provisions outlined reproduce the content of art.1834 from the Italian Civil Code, according to which "nei depositi di una somma di danaro presso una banca, questa ne acquista la proprietà ed è obbligata a restituirla nella stessa specie monetaria, alla scadenza del termine convenuto ovvero a richiesta del depositante, con l'osservanza del periodo di preavviso stabilito dalle parti o dagli usi"[2].

[2] See on this matter Molle, I contratti bancari, (Milan: Giuffré, 1966), 87-91; id, Per la gualificazione giuridica del deposito bancario, in Banca, borsa e titoli di credito, 1948, I, p.7 et seg. Also, Hamel, II, 95.

In general, the deposits and the withdrawals will be made at the headquarters of the operative unit of the credit institution where the deposit has been created. As compared to art.1834 from the Italian code, which states that "salvo patto contrario, i versamenti e i prelevamenti si eseguono alla sede della banca presso la quale si e costituito il rapporto", the regulation contained in NCC highlighting the principle of performing all the operations by account in the agency or branch where the bank account was opened.

The credit institution is committed to ensure, free of charge, the information of the client about the operations performed in his accounts.

Unless the client requests otherwise, this information is made on a monthly basis, under the conditions and procedures agreed by the parties.

By creating a deposit of securities, pursuant to article 2192 NCC, the credit institution is entitled to their administration.

The Italian Civil Code comprises, within art.1838, a synthetic regulation of the obligation's content assumed by the credit institution: La banca che assume il deposito di titoli in amministrazione deve custodire i titoli, esigerne gli interessi o i dividendi, verificare i sorteggi per l'attribuzione di premi o per il rimborso di capitale, curare le riscossioni per conto del depositante, e in generale provvedere alla tutela dei diritti inerenti ai titoli. Le somme riscosse devono essere accreditate al depositante.

The NCC authors preferred to use a provision of reference, in the absence of special rules, at the institution of Administration of another person's goods (Title V, art. 792-857 NCC respectively).

Unlike the NCC regulation, art.1838 paragraph 2 requires the bank's obligation to request instructions in certain specified cases: Se per i titoli depositati si deve provvedere al versamento di decimi o si deve esercitare un diritto di opzione, la banca deve chiedere in tempo utile istruzioni al depositante e deve eseguirle, qualora abbia ricevuto i fondi all'uopo occorrenti. In mancanza d'istruzioni, i diritti di opzione devono essere venduti per conto del depositante a mezzo di un agente di cambio.

The credit institution is entitled to the reimbursement of the expenses incurred for the necessary operations, as well as to a remuneration, to the extent determined by agreement or by practices.

The text is a reproduction of art.1838 paragraph 3 from the Italian Civil Code: Alla banca spetta un compenso nella misura stabilita dalla convenzione o dagli usi, nonché il rimborso delle spese necessarie da essa fatte.

In order to avoid the possibility of limiting the liability of the bank, art.2192 paragraph 2 NCC sanctions by nullity any clause by which the credit institution would be relieved of liability for failure to comply with its obligations in managing the securities with care and diligence.

The correspondent regulation of the Italian code is more concise, broading the scope of the sanction and, upon any understanding, envisaging this scope outside the regular contractual framework: E' nullo il patto col quale si esonera la banca dall'osservare, nell'amministrazione dei titoli, l'ordinaria diligenza.

4. Credit facility.

The credit facility is defined according to art. 2193 NCC as the contract by which a credit institution, a non-banking financial institution or any other authorized entity by special law, called the financer, is committed to keep at the client's disposal an amount of money for a specified or indefinite period of time.

The term credit facility corresponds to the opening credit, as it is defined by art. 1842 of the Italian Civil Code: L'apertura di credito bancario è il contratto col quale la banca si obbliga a tenere a disposizione dell'altra parte una somma di danaro per un dato periodo di tempo o a tempo indeterminato.

The parties ensure, by contract, to put at the client's disposal an amount of money that he can use in certain circumstances to achieve various objectives previously established.

The credit facility, as defined by art. 2193 NCC is not a loan agreement since the customer acquires only the right to remove various amounts within a certain limit[3]. He does not have the obligation to use the full amount or to withdraw amounts of money once the contract has been closed.

Unless the parties have stipulated otherwise, the client may use the loan in several installments, according to the practices, and may, by successive repayments, renew the amount available.

The unilateral termination of the contract at the request of the bank cannot operate, unless provided otherwise, and before the expiry of the term unless it is for sound reasons and only if these relate to the beneficiary of the credit facility (art. 2195 NCC).

According to the Italian Civil Code, the termination may not occur unless it is for a just cause: Salvo patto contrario, la banca non può recedere dal contratto prima della scadenza del termine, se non per giusta causa (art. 1845 paragraph 1).

Similar to art. 1845 paragraph 2 from the Italian Civil Code, the Romanian regulation stipulates that the effects of a unilateral termination consist in the immediate termination of the client's right to use the credit, with the observation that the bank should provide at least a 15-day term for returning the amounts used and their accessories.

When the credit facility has concluded for an indefinite period, each of the parties may terminate the agreement, observing a 15-day notice, unless the agreement or practices indicate otherwise.

5. Rental of value boxes.

This service provided by the credit institutions is essentially a neutral operation, because its goal is to ensure the protection of small movables of small dimensions with great economic value.

It is relevant that despite the banking character of the operation, the rental of value boxes is not a typical contract, because the essential obligation is not of financial nature service.

With the exception of the Italian Civil Code, the rental of value boxes is not covered by the main European legal systems.

It can be said that the absence of legal definitions may well characterize this unnamed contract. The Italian Civil Code itself avoids defining the concept of contract, limiting itself by art.1839 to identifying the bank obligations: Nel servizio delle cassette di sicurezza, la banca risponde verso l'utente per l'idoneità e la custodia dei locali e per l'integrità della cassetta, salvo il caso fortuito.

In a close sense, art. 2196 NCC provides that in the execution of the rental of value boxes contract, the credit institution or other entity providing such services under the law, hereby referred to as the provider, responds to the client to ensure an adequate and safe room, as well as the box integrity.

The legal nature of the contract was the subject of several debates in recent Western doctrine[4].

Since the bank allows the use of a space by one if its customers for a period of time, whether or not agreed, and since the latter undertakes to pay a sum of money for the service provided, a variety of the rental contract is configured.

The terminology, which is found in the banking practice, would also be an argument to assimilate the civil lease contract.

[4] See on this matter Molle, I contratti bancari, (Milan: Giuffré, 1966), 607.

However, contrary to this thesis, one could argue that in fact the value box is only a good value property by incorporation, as it is fixed and cannot be moved from the bank building. If the rental of value boxes were merely a variety of the civil contract with the same name, the effects are felt including over the nature and characteristics of the contract, as the latter cannot be real because, regardless of the box usage, the client owes the payment of the sum of money.

Likewise, it is an impediment for such an assimilation the fact that the possession or detention of the box is impossible or, in the case of rental by material remittance, the tenant becomes the temporary holder of the lased asset, thus configurating a material relationship characterized by continuity.

In a completely different manner, in the case of the value boxes, the bank is required to allow access to such box whenever its client wants, within the public work hours. Therefore, the hypothesis when the client or the user of the box can be qualified as holder is excluded, because there is no material remittance of the leased asset.

In the systems based on the distinction between civil and commercial law, like the Romanian one before 2011, framing the contract in a civil or commercial profile is particularly relevant in the matter of the proof or the third party rights[5].

According to a second thesis, despite its name, the contract is a variety of the deposit, since the objective pursued by the depositor is precisely the one of preservation or conservation of a movable good of considerable value. However, the mechanism of using the value box is exactly what constitutes an impediment. Therefore, it is beyond any doubt that the purpose of the contract is to preserve an asset, thus showing some similarities with the civil or banking deposit, but nevertheless the depositary is not a temporary holder; in other words, the bank virtually cannot act over the asset and cannot trace the asset.

The essential obligation of the bank is that of providing an external safety for the value box, but depositing the asset in the value box does not determine its delivery to the bank as in the hypothesis of the deposit[6].

Precisely from this perspective the obligation of restitution, which underlies any typology of the deposit contract cannot arise because the bank does not receive the asset deposited in the value box.

At the time of closing the contractual relationship or before this moment, the user will collect the asset deposited in the box without having to report to the bank the material delivery of the asset. At the same time, in the case of the deposit the contractual obligations and implicitly the contractual relationship are terminated by returning the asset and repossessing it. In the case of the rental of value boxes contract the fact that the user collects the asset from the box has no effect on the contract itself.

Accordingly, the mixed nature of the contract is the only answer we can offer.

The rental of value boxes contract is a perfectly autonomous contractual illustration which cannot be assimilated to any other named contract.

Considering the objective pursued by the parties, the obligations assumed by the bank envisage the custody of the asset. In this perspective, we can say that the bank has two basic obligations:

- that of allowing the user the access to the value box and
- that of taking any safety measures for the external protection of the box.

Therefore, the first obligation requires a specific conduct; upon request, the user can enter the area where the value boxes are, deposit and collect the values he wishes to preserve. Clearly, in order to use a box the bank provides its customer with specific safe mechanisms such as ciphers, special keys etc.

The second obligation has a general and abstract character. The bank will provide the external permanent protection of the value boxes without being able to enter the 'private' space of the box. The main obligation of the user is that of paying the fee requested by the bank for providing such a service. As with the rental, a certain obligation of restitution of the space can be configured at the termination of the contract, by handing over the keys or other safety elements. A second obligation – obligation of not doing – requires the user not to introduce in the value box a series of assets which can either be degraded, thus affecting the space they are deposited in, or are dangerous for the safety of those using value boxes, or are forbidden to commercial traffic.

If the box is rented out to several people, art.2197 NCC provides that any of these may require opening the box, unless otherwise provided by the contract.

In case of death of the client or any of the clients using the same box, the provider, once he has been notified, cannot consent to opening the box without the consent of everyone who is entitled or, failing that, under the circumstances established by the court.

These provisions will also apply accordingly upon termination or reorganization of the legal person; in this case, the official receiver or judicial liquidator can require the opening of the value box.

The value box can be opened forcibly only under the requirements provided by art.2198 NCC. Thus, upon the completion of the term provided in the contract, following the expiration of the 3-month period since the notification to the customer, the provider may ask the court, by presiding judge's order, the authorization to open the value box. The customer notification may be done by registered letter with acknowledgement of receipt to the last home or office brought to the knowledge of the credit institution.

The opening of the value box will be made in the presence of a notary public and, where appropriate, in compliance with the prudential measures established by the court.

The court may also dispose measures of conservation of the objects discovered, as well as their sale to the extent necessary to cover rent and expenses incurred by the provider, as well as, if applicable, for the damage caused onto him.

6. Conclusions.

First of all, the recognition of the independent nature of the bank contracts was absolutely necessary, especially since the use of these legal instruments, though which financial intermediation operations were carried out, has become the exclusive activity of some subjects of law identified and supervised by the banking law.

However, although through the new Civil Code the bank contracts are identified, its authors did not include in them the bank credit agreement, although at this moment the credit agreement is one of the defining instruments of a commercial bank's activity; basically, in the case of analysis of any credit agreement, the applicable texts will be those regulating the loan in general.

It is also noted that unlike the Italian Civil Code which clearly regulated the discount of the commercial bills, an essential operation in the history of commercial law, the new Civil Code did not engage such an institution in the broader framework of the banking contracts.

We believe that despite the innovations brought by the new regulation, its improvement is absolutely necessary to adapt it to the requirements of the banking practices.

1. Introductory aspects

The adoption of a new civil code which regulates the doctrinal and jurisprudential provisions was necessary in the context of the evolution of society and the attempt to rally to the European legislation.

The law no. 287/2009 on the New Civil Code, brings important changes for the institutions of law and their principles, being established and acknowledged both by the judicial doctrine and by the legal practice.

In all certainty the New Civil Code brings necessary changes in the socio-legislative reality of Romania, but unfortunately it arises multiple controversies and creates the premises of some solutions which lack in equity.

The difficulty in the enforcement of the New Civil Code is given on the one side by the lack of its agreement with the laws on which it concerns, and on the other hand by the ambiguity of the legislator's method of expression.

Still, the theme of this paper is far from being addressed to the legislative technique approached by the legislator, but it aims at highlighting the impact, the implications, the changes, the controversies and the difficulties in application, brought by the New Civil Code with respect to the procedure of insolvency regulated by the Law no. 85/2006.

The law no. 85/2006 on the insolvency procedure, as well as many other regulating laws belonging to the commercial law, have remained in force, as they are not included in the provisions of the Law no. 287/2009 on the New Civil Code, and as such we cannot ignore the changes in the national commercial legislation after the entering into force of the New Civil Code, namely after October 1st 2011.

The new regulations, such as the definition of the professional and the enterprise, the fiduciary, the mortgage and the administration of the mortgaged goods, the prescription of debts, the separation of patrimonies, the forfeiture of the term benefit, have an impact upon the enforcement of the procedure of insolvency.

Without pretending an exhaustive approach, this study shall reveal a possible interpretation and enforcement of the provisions of the New Civil Code with respect to the procedure of insolvency, being aimed at bringing a plus in the incipient doctrine in this field.

Just like in the study regarding the remand agreement called "The prediction and prevention of insolvency Law 85/2006 on the procedure of insolvency" presented and sustained in the 4th edition of the International Scientific Session - Challenges of the Knowledge Society – this paper shall tackle the provisions of the two laws through the eyes of the practitioner, of the professional who enters into direct contact with the court of law and the enforcement of the law, under a double aspect, of the lawyer and the practitioner under insolvency, trying to delimit their practical applicability.

Certainly, the current reality prefigures many changes to the Law no. 287/2009 on the New Civil Code.

2. The field of applicability of the procedure of insolvency starting October 1st 2011

Since the adoption of the Law no. 85/2006 and up until the present, the sphere of applicability of the procedure of insolvency has extended its limits under the aspect of the recipients subject to it.[1]

In the first approach, the Romanian legislator reserves the procedure of insolvency exclusively for the trader.

Currently the procedure of insolvency applies to certain categories of professionals, as defined in the New Civil Code.

2.1. The form of the Law no. 85/2006 on the procedure of insolvency

In the current form of the Law no. 85/2006 on the procedure of insolvency, the procedure of insolvency concerns the following categories of debtors:

The companies;
The corporate companies;
The cooperative organizations;
The agricultural companies;
The economic interest groups;
Any other legal entity of private law which also develops economic activities;
Traders, natural persons, acting individually;

[1] Under the aspect of the evolution of the procedure of insolvency and bankruptcy, also see Stanciu D. Carpenaru, Vasile Nemes, Mihai Adrian Hotca, the Law no. 85/2006 on the procedure of insolvency, Hamangiu Publishing – 2008;

Family businesses.

Without entering into details regarding the enforcement of the procedure of insolvency on the various categories of debtors, currently there also are categories of debtors subject to the procedure of insolvency under conditions regulated by special laws.

This is the case of autonomous administrations, administrative and territorial units, insurance companies, credit institutions, financial and banking institutions.

The Law no. 85/2006 is also aimed at the natural persons who hold the quality of trader acting individually, as well as to the family businesses.

The law no. 85/2006 on the procedure of insolvency states that any other legal entity of private law which also develops economic activities, can be subject to this procedure.

We can see that the legislator uses notions like trader, economic activities, commercial deeds, enterprise.

In this regulation, until the entering into force of the Law no. 287/2009, the notion of enterprise was defined as being an economic unit engaged in production, the provision of services or trade, currently the legislator giving another form, another regulation and applicability to the notion of enterprise.

2.2. The professional and the enterprise in the sense of the New Civil Code

The art. 3 par. (1) of the New Civil Code itself regulates the field of applicability, respectively the professionals, as well as the relationships between professionals and any other subjects of civil law.

Further, the same article, through the next paragraph, defines the notion of "professionals" as being all those who exploit an enterprise.

The exploitation of an enterprise is represented by the systematic exercise, by one or more people, of an organizational activity consisting in the production, management or alienation of goods or the provision of services, irrespective of it having a lucrative purpose or not.

As such, a professional is a person who exploits an enterprise, this being the only definition given to it by the New Civil Code.

We can see that the legislator does not offer an explanation of the newly-introduced notion, namely the "professional" - through the definition of the enterprise, a professional is he who exploits it.

We draw the conclusion that the professional is not in all cases the holder of the enterprise, but it is sufficient for him to have the quality of explorer of the enterprise.

The sphere of professionals includes all those who, during the exploitation of an enterprise, develop a systematic activity related to production, management, alienation of goods or provision of services, these including the categories of trader, entrepreneur, economic operator, as well as any other person authorized to develop trading or professional activities, according to the provisions of art. 8 of the Law no. 71/2011 for the enforcement of Law no. 287/2009 on the Civil Code.

From the economics of the previously mentioned text we can conclude that the liberal professions also fall under the incidence of the New Civil Code, being included in the category of professionals, as they develop professional activities in the meaning of art. 8 of Law no. 71/2011.

Under these circumstances, the professional is not mistaken for the trader, as the latter is only a category of professional.

2.3. The trader-professional

Starting from those shown in the previous section, we shall se that together with the entering into force of the New Civil Code, the trade is also extended to the persons who, according to the old regulations, did not perform deeds of commerce.

To this respect, the art. 6 of the Law no. 71/2011 gives a definition of the trader, showing that the references to traders are considered to be performed for natural persons or, as appropriate, for legal entities subject to the registration in the trade register.

As such, the category of traders is determined as being all natural persons or legal entities subject to registration in the Trade Register.

The simple obligation of registration in the trade register transfers the quality of trader on the natural person or legal entity.

So, if before the adoption of the New Civil Code, for example the certified natural persons subject to registration in the Trade Register were not subject to the legal conditions of the trader, the former developing economic but not trading activities, but currently they receive the quality of trader.

What is more, we can see the method of expression of the legislator with respect to the condition imposed so that a person be assigned the quality of trader, respectively not that of being registered in the Trade Register, but being subject to registration in the Trade Register.

This provision, be it intentional or not, can be interpreted only in the sense that a simple obligation of registration in the Trade Register confers to a natural person or legal entity the quality of trader even until the performance of the formalities of registration and publicity, and thus until the moment the respective person begins to be an entity.

This interpretation leads to a series of legal effects, having as period of birth the initial moment of exploitation of the new enterprise in a systematic way of an organized activity which consists of the production, management or alienation of goods or the provision of services, irrespective of them having a lucrative purpose or not.

Thus, it is irrelevant if we find ourselves in the presence of an irregularly created company or of a natural person who develops trading activities, or who is engaged in the provision of services or a productive activity which is not yet registered in the trade register, as they have an obligation to register and shall be subject to the legal conditions applicable to the trader.

2.4. The professionals subject to the procedure of insolvency

The procedure of insolvency, until the date of entering into force of the New Civil Code, was applicable to the categories of natural persons or legal entities mentioned in art. 1 of the Law no. 85/2006.

The law which regulates the procedure of insolvency states the possibility of it being enforced on the traders which are natural persons and act individually.

By extending the notion of trader to the certified natural persons, currently they too can be applied the procedure of insolvency.

We must keep in mind that until now, the certified natural persons responded for their obligations with the assignment patrimony, if created and, in addition, with the entire patrimony.[2]

In case of insolvency, the certified natural person can be subject to this special procedure, stated by the Law no. 85/2006 on the procedure of insolvency, through the simplified procedure only

[2] The Emergency Ordinance no. 44 as of April 16th 2008 on the development of the economic activities by authorized natural persons, individual enterprise and family businesses, with the subsequent modifications and integrations

ART. 20 (1) The ANP is responsible for its obligations with the assignment patrimony, if created and, in addition, with its entire patrimony or, in case of insolvency, it shall be subject to the simplified procedure stated by the Law no. 85/2006 on the procedure of insolvency, with the subsequent modifications, if it has the quality of trader, according to art. 7 of the Commercial Code.

(2) The creditors shall execute their debts according to the common law, if the ANP does not have the quality of trader.

(3) Any interested person can make the proof of the quality of trader within the procedure of insolvency or separately, through action in observation, if justified by a legitimate interest.

if the debtor – CNP makes the proof that he has the quality of trader, according to the definition of trader included in art. 7 of the Commercial Code.[3]

As such, this was the exception in terms of insolvency, the rule being that all creditors shall execute the debts according to the common law, if the certified natural person does not hold the quality of trader.

In the light of the new provisions brought by the New Civil Code, even though the traders-natural persons are still not given the possibility of performing a judicial reorganization, they can recur to the simplified procedure of bankruptcy, thus creating the advantage for them that they can be released from their debts at the conclusion of the bankruptcy, thus being able to restart their initial professional activity.

The method of elaboration of the New Civil Code leads to certain controversies and positive discriminations with respect to the other professionals which continue to be excluded from the procedure of insolvency.

The discriminatory role between the various categories of professionals is obvious, for if we performed an analysis of the people registered in the trader register as developers of a professional activity under the form of a certified natural person, we would notice that, apart from the actual traders, there are journalists, singers, taxi drivers, bloggers, as well as other categories which obtain incomes from copyrights, who are registered.

Still, as we all know, the intellectual property does not have a trading nature, either in the old sense given to the notions of trader and trade or even in the current regulations.

Although it is difficult to guess the reasons for which the legislator transformed into a trader any person subject to registration in the trade register, until a possible explanation or change, all that is left for us is to enforce the law as it is currently in force and thus hold open the way of the procedure of insolvency for other categories of debtors than those expressly listed by the Law no. 85/2006 on the procedure of insolvency.

3. The separation of patrimonies in the procedure of insolvency. The creditors of the patrimonial assets.

The tendency of the legislator through the adoption of the New Civil Code aims at separating the patrimonial assets of a person, which means that from the general patrimony a part of it can be dislocated through special assignment.

Thus, through the separation of patrimonies, the creditors of a person's general patrimony cannot go after the goods corresponding to a distinct patrimonial asset.

In their turn, the creditors of the patrimonial asset with special assignment can only go after the goods corresponding to the patrimony in relation to which the debt was born and only to the extent that their debt is not covered in this way, can they foreclose the goods belonging to their debtor's general patrimony.

The separation of patrimonies springs either from the deed of trust and the complete administration of goods, or from the matrimonial conventions, the succession rights or the patrimony with professional assignment.

It is important to notice that the deed of incorporation of a class of goods affected by a special patrimony, is not usually affected as a consequence of the debtor's insolvency.

To this respect, the creditor of the respective assets, not only has a guaranteed debt, assigning a preferential degree before the other creditors, but can also manage the goods corresponding to the respective patrimonial assets.

The New Civil Code forfeits the restrictive provisions regarding the use of clauses which forbid the alienation of the buildings instituted through the regime of circulation of real estate properties and even gives the possibility to institute over them a conventional inalienability[4], which leads to the legal imperceptibility.

The latter can have a major effect on the debtor's general patrimony and can prejudice its general creditors, as they will not be able to go after these goods.

3.1. The deed of trust

The deed of trust regulated by art. 773-791 of the New Civil Code, is an institution which does not have a correspondent in the old regulations.

It applies in the procedure related to a debtor's insolvency, as we will clearly see, being an instrument which is able to create separations of patrimonies.

Considering that the rule of separation of patrimonies is still valid in a case of insolvency, this new element is able to lead to the remission if not even the annihilation of its purpose.

Surely the deed of trust in the current regulation presents a value for the development of business, as it can be used both as a legal instrument for the management of goods and as a guarantee, but undoubtedly it will also be a means to fraud the creditors, to launder money and hide values, as well as to avoid certain legal provisions through its creation.

The institution of the deed of trust shall produce effects which shall be felt by the personal creditors of the debtor subject to the procedure of insolvency.

The deed of trust is defined by the regulating law as being the legal operation by means of which one or more constitutors transfer real rights, liability rights, guarantees or other patrimonial rights or an ensemble of such rights, present or future, to one or more fiduciaries which exercise them with a determined purpose, for the use of one or more beneficiaries.

This springs from the law or from the fiduciary agreement concluded under an authenticated form.

The fiduciary agreement is one of the oldest real agreements, having its origins in the Roman law, where it was called pactum fiduciae.[5]

For an analysis of the institution of the deed of trust through the perspective of the implications in the insolvency procedure, it is necessary to start from the definition given to this institution by the legislator.

As such, the deed of trust is the transfer of real rights, liability rights, guarantees or other patrimonial rights or of an ensemble of such rights, present or future, to the fiduciary for a period of time limited to a maximum of 33 years.

By concluding a fiduciary agreement, the fiduciary is transferred the property over a good which is the object of the deed of trust for a determined period of time.

Art. 627 - The inalienability clause. Conditions. Field of enforcement.

(1) The alienation of a good can be forbidden by convention or testament, but only for a duration of maximum 49 years and if there is a serious and legitimate interest for it. The term starts at the date of acquirement of the good.

(2) The acquirer can be authorized by the court to dispose of the good if the interest which justified the clause of inalienability of the good has disappeared or if a superior interest imposes it.

(3) The nullity of the clause of inalienability stipulated in an agreement attracts the nullity of the entire agreement, if determined at its conclusion. In the onerous agreements, the determining characters is presumed, until the contrary is proven.

(4) The clause of inalienability is implied in the conventions from which arises an obligation to assign a property in the future towards a determined or determinable person.

(5) The assignment of the good by succession cannot be stopped through the stipulation of inalienability.

[5] A. Bureau, Le contract de fiducie: e′tude de droit compare′, Allemagne, France, Luxembourg, www.juripole.fr.

After the creation of the deed of trust, the creator forfeits the right given as fiduciary, assigning the property to the fiduciary, for a determined period of time, for administration purposes.

For the regulation of the deed of trust, the legislator expressly states that the rights which arise from the deed of trust constitute an autonomous patrimonial asset, different from the other rights and obligations in the fiduciaries' patrimonies.

In an interpretation of these provisions we notice that the fiduciary rights do not make a distinct patrimonial asset, autonomous with respect to the patrimony of the creator but only with respect to the patrimony of the fiduciary.

At a theoretical level and strictly as a legal operation, the deed of trust might be interpreted as being the division of the creator's general patrimony into two patrimonies, respectively the patrimonial asset with special assignment and the patrimonial asset of the remainder of the general patrimony after the constitution of the deed of trust.

Still, as effects, the fiduciary patrimonial asset is taken out of the creator's patrimony for the entire period of existence of the fiduciary agreement, in order to create for the fiduciary an autonomous patrimony, distinct from the other rights of its patrimonies.

I consider that given the express provisions of the norm, we find ourselves in the presence of a derogation from the principle of intra-patrimonial transfer, as the latter is incompatible with the transfer from a patrimony – that of the creator – into another patrimony – that of the fiduciary – the essence of the principle being the transfer through division, within the same patrimony.

There are contrary opinions with respect to the compatibility of art. 32 and art. 2324 of the New Civil Code with that of art. 773 of the New Civil Code.[6]

This is how the creator's personal creditors cannot go after the goods included in the fiduciary patrimonial asset, even through the enforcement of the provisions of art. 2324 of the New Civil Code.

In order to avoid as much as possible the situations of fraud and circumvention of certain legal provisions, the quality of fiduciary is limited to certain categories of professionals, namely the credit institutions, the investment and investment management companies, the companies performing services of financial investments, the insurance and reinsurance companies, as well as the lawyer and notaries public.

Still, the creator or the beneficiary of the deed of trust can be any legal entity or natural person.

The separation of patrimonies thus defends the debtor from creditors, others than the creditors of the patrimony of the fiduciary asset.

In this situation, the creator's personal creditors cannot foreclose the goods in object of the deed of trust, not even through the procedure of insolvency.

The deed of trust creates the premises for a safeguard of the debtor's estate, both in the case of its own insolvency and in the case of the fiduciary's insolvency.

This happens because, when starting a procedure of insolvency against the fiduciary, the fiduciary agreement is terminated, this being a derogation from the provisions of art. 86 of the Law no. 85/2006, which expressly forbids the introduction into the contracts of any clause which might lead to the termination of the agreement in case of insolvency.

I consider that in this case of termination it is necessary to merge the provisions of the New Civil Code with the special regulating norms of the institutions which can hold the quality of fiduciary, which state special procedures for their recovery or bankruptcy.

Furthermore, it is necessary to take into account the provisions of the laws for the organization of the professions of lawyer and notary public, which do not give these categories of professionals the possibility to be traders, thus not being subject to the procedure of insolvency under any of its forms.

Considering that the deed of trust can also be terminated at the moment of reorganization of a legal entity, without mentioning that it is applied to a legal entity which is a fiduciary or a creator – and where the law does not make distinctions, we must not make any either – we can consider that the legislator applies this case of termination in relation both to the effects of the creator's reorganization and to that of the fiduciary-legal entity.

Also, the legislator does not make any distinctions between the reorganization of the legal entity through procedures of division, fusion, etc and the legal reorganization through the procedure of insolvency.

As such, the fiduciary agreement is terminated through the start of the procedure of insolvency against the fiduciary, which according to the Law no. 85/2006 can be in simplified procedure – bankruptcy or general procedure – a legal reorganization (thus covering a form of reorganization) or when there are effects of the reorganization of the legal entity of the fiduciary through the subjection to certain procedures of transformation, division, fusion, etc. – another form of the reorganization of the legal entity.

With respect to the termination of the deed of trust through the reorganization of the creator's legal entity, we notice that the deed of trust does not stop at the beginning of the procedure of insolvency against the latter, but only when there appear effects of the reorganization of the legal entity inasmuch as within the procedure of insolvency a legal reorganization is discussed.

At the same time, the deed of trust stops when there appear effects of the reorganization of the legal entity other than the legal reorganization, respectively the reorganization through division, fusion, etc.

No other solution would be possible if we apply the theory of incompatibility of the principle of intra-patrimonial transfer in the creation of the deed of trust, as the fiduciary good is not under the creator's patrimony but under that of the fiduciary, and as such it cannot be part of the assets and liabilities of the debtor-creator.

These remain valid because, as shown, the fiduciary agreement is not terminated at the beginning of the creator's procedure, both from the perspective of art. 86 of the Law no. 85/2006 and from that of art. 790 of the New Civil Code.

Definitely, we shall not exclude other interpretations of the art. 790 of the New Civil Code.[7]

Starting from these premises, a conclusion would be that the beginning of the procedure of insolvency against the debtor who is also the creator of a deed of trust, does not have effects on the patrimonial assets of the fiduciary, until the moment of production of the effects of the reorganization of the legal entity, which is the only case in which the deed of trust would be terminated by means of the procedure of insolvency.

Thus, when starting a procedure of insolvency through simplified procedure and bankruptcy, the fiduciary patrimonial asset cannot be part of the assets and liabilities of the debtor subject to insolvency.

The theory is sustained on the one hand by the fact that the deed of trust also exists beyond the moment of opening of the creator's procedure of insolvency, and only to the extent that the procedure of insolvency follows the general procedure for legal reorganization, there is the possibility of returning the goods afflicted by the deed of trust into the debtor's general patrimony through the termination of the deed of trust, and on the other hand the legislation lists, expressly and with limitation, the causes of termination of the deed of trust.

[7] Alexandru-Serban Ratoi – lawyer Piperea & Asociatii, The New Civil Code – Notes; Correlations; Explanations, C.H. Beck 2011 Publishing, page 276.

We can see that the legislator, willingly or not, from the express and limited list of causes for the termination of the deed of trust, has excluded the possibility of its termination through the creator's bankruptcy, but only through its reorganization, as previously shown.

In the other case, that of the reorganization of the creator-legal entity, the deed of trust stops, which means that together with its termination, the goods corresponding to the fiduciary return into the debtor's general patrimony.

This might be an effect of the termination of the deed of trust through reorganization only in one case, that of the inexistence of the person of the beneficiary from the fiduciary agreement.

Inasmuch as the fiduciary agreement stipulated a beneficiary – other than the person of the creator and the fiduciary agreement is terminated at the moment of production of the effects of the creator's reorganization, beyond this moment, the effect of the termination is that of transferring the fiduciary patrimonial assets existing until then, to the beneficiary.

As such, the goods in object of the deed of trust are definitely taken out of the fiduciary's special autonomous patrimony and enter into the beneficiary's general patrimony thus operating the transfer of property over the respective goods.[8]

In these conditions, the possibility of satisfying the liabilities of the general creditors of the debtor-creator from the fiduciary goods, is limited to the return of these goods, as an effect of the reorganization, on condition of the inexistence of the beneficiary in the fiduciary agreement or when there is an identity between the beneficiary and the creator of the deed of trust.

All these can be considered to be either derogations from the principles instituted through art. 31-32 of the New Civil Code, or disagreements of the legislator within the same norm. I previously sustained that, according to the principle of separation of patrimonies, the creditors cannot go after the goods subject to the deed of trust.

Article 786 of the New Civil Code imposes two exceptions from this principle:

- the case of the special creditors of the liabilities arising from the goods in object of a deed of trust through the cumulative fulfilment of two conditions, namely the liability needing to be encumbered by a real warranty and the forms of publicity for the opposability of this warranty be fulfilled prior to the establishment of the deed of trust.

- the case of the general creditors of the creator, but only based on a definitive court decision for the admittance of the action through which the fiduciary agreement was cancelled or turned non-opposable in any way, with retroactive effect.

The first exception applies through the opposability of a warranty inscribed prior to the establishment of the deed of trust which is preferred instead of the warranty created with the deed of trust, the second exception applying as an effect of the return of the fiduciary good into the creator's general patrimony which shall be responsible for its debts according to art. 2324 of the New Civil Code.

By merging the provisions of art. 31-32 of the New Civil Code[9] with those of art. 2324 of the New Civil Code[10] we interpret that the pursuit of the patrimonies must be performed in a

Art. 791. The effects of the termination of the fiduciary agreement

(1) When the fiduciary agreement is terminated, the fiduciary patrimonial assets existing at that respective time is transferred to the beneficiary or, in the absence of the latter, to the creator.

(2) The merging of the fiduciary patrimonial assets into the beneficiary's or the creator's patrimony shall take place only after the payment of the fiduciary debts.

[9] The New Civil Code

Art. 31. The patrimony. Patrimonial assets and assignment patrimonies

(1) Any natural person or legal entity is the holder of a patrimony which includes all the rights and debts that can be evaluated in cash and which belong to them.

(2) It may be the object of a division or an assignment only in the cases and under the conditions stated by the law.

certain order, namely once the general patrimony is divided into several patrimonial assets with special assignment, the creditors will be able to pursuit for the satisfaction of the debt, the patrimonial asset which gave birth to that debt and only to the extent to which the debt was not cancelled through the valuation of the goods corresponding to the respective patrimonial asset, as such being able to pursuit the goods of another patrimonial asset belonging to the debtor and only until the value left uncovered is reached.

There is a single exception from these provisions, which is expressly stated by the legislator, respectively the patrimonial asset afflicted by the exercise of the profession can be only followed by the creditors whose liabilities arose in relation to the profession and, at the same time, they cannot pursuit those goods belonging to the debtor, even if the entire value of the debt was not covered.

Furthermore, not even the debtor's general creditors can pursuit the patrimony corresponding to the profession.

The institution of the fiduciary also holds those unenforceable provisions because, as shown, the legislator has created an absolute exception, even if it was not expressly explained, from the pursuit of this patrimonial asset by other creditors except for the fiduciaries, both through foreclosure and through the procedure of insolvency.

I conclude with a rhetorical question - does the interpretation previously given to the institution of the deed of trust represent a legal manner to fraud, an error of vision of the legislator or of the author of this study?

3.2. The inalienability and imperceptibility of the goods

We are the observers of a new conception of the Romanian legislator on the legal circulation of goods.

If until October 1st 2011, the date when the New Civil Code entered into force, we were subject to the legal regime of the circulation of goods which claimed that all goods enter into the civil circuit except for those which are expressly declared by the law as being inalienable and imperceptible, the New Civil Code brings an element of novelty in the regulation of this regime, through the institution of the conventional inalienability.

According to the latter, through a convention or a will the alienation of a good can be forbidden for a duration of a maximum of 49 years.

(3) The assignment patrimonies are the fiduciary patrimonial assets, created according to the provisions of title IV and book III, those affected by the exercise of an authorized profession, as well as those patrimonies determined according to the law.

Art. 32. The intra-patrimonial transfer

(1) In case of division or assignment, the transfer of the rights and obligations from a patrimonial asset to another, within the same patrimony, is performed based on the conditions provided by the law and without bringing any prejudice to the creditors' rights over each patrimonial asset.

(2) In all cases stated in par. (1), the transfer of the rights and obligations from a patrimonial asset to another is not an alienation.

Art. 2.324. The creditors' common guarantee

(1) He who has a personal obligation is responsible with all his assets and real estates, both present and future. They serve as common guarantee for his creditors.

(2) The imperceptible goods cannot be the object of the guarantee mentioned in par. (1).

(3) The creditors whose debts were born in relation to a certain division of the patrimony, authorized by the law, must firstly go after the goods in object of the respective patrimonial asset. If they are not sufficient for the satisfaction of the debts, other goods belonging to the debtor can be followed.

(4) The goods in object of a division of the patrimony corresponding to the exercise of a profession authorized by the law can be followed only by the creditors whose debts were born in relation to the respective profession. These creditors cannot go after the other goods belonging to the debtor.

The inalienability can be instituted inasmuch as there is a serious and legitimate interest for it.

The clause of inalienability is implied in the conventions which give birth to the obligation to assign in the future the property to a determined or determinable person.

If the inalienability is created through convention or through will, only the acquirer has an active legitimacy in a law suit based on the authorization of the disposition of the good, which means that a debtor's creditor, under the protection of the clause of inalienability, cannot request the acceptance or authorization of the execution over the respective good.

Still, the nullity of the clause of inalienability stipulated in an agreement attracts the nullity of the entire agreement if it was determined on its conclusion. In the onerous agreements, the determining character is presumed, until the contrary is proven.

The effects of the clause of inalienability are reflected in the consequences borne by those who act against the interdiction of alienation, namely, the resolution of the agreement in which the clause was stipulated, the obligation to pay damage or even the nullity of the agreement concluded with the violation of the clause. The latter sanction is, though, conditioned by the satisfaction of certain opposability conditions.[11]

Also as an effect of the institution of conventional inalienability there is the legal imperceptibility of the good for which the clause was stipulated for the duration of its validity, respectively maximum 49 years.

To this respect, the imperceptibility of the good protected by the clause of conventional inalienability was legislated, which means that the good cannot be followed by the creditors of the beneficiary of the clause, for the entire period in which it produces effects in a valid manner.

As a rule instituted by the New Civil Code, the inalienable and imperceptible goods are imposed certain conditions related to the validity of the clause of inalienability according to the provisions of art. 2329 of the New Civil Code.[12]

As an effect of this new regulation in the procedure of insolvency, the inalienable and imperceptible goods cannot be foreclosed by the creditors and cannot be included in the assets and liabilities of the debtor subject to the procedure of insolvency.

As a consequence of the modifications brought by the regulation of the principle of specialty of the capacity of use of a legal entity, previously regulated by art. 34 of the Order no. 31/1954, by the art. 206 and the art. 208 of the New Civil Code, the legal entity can be the holder of any right and obligation, except for those which through their nature or by law can only belong to natural persons.

As such, the legal entity has obtained, since October 1st, the capacity to receive liberalities under the conditions of the common law, from the date of the deed of creation, except for the testament foundations which ca receive liberalities only from the date of opening of the testator's inheritance.[13]

Art. 2.329. Clauses of imperceptibility

(1) The conditions required for the validity of the clauses of inalienability apply accordingly to the clauses in which the imperceptibility of a good is stipulated.

(2) All goods which are, according to the law, inalienable, are also imperceptible.

(3) In order for them to be opposable to third parties, the imperceptibility clauses must be included in the public registers or in the real estate registers, as appropriate.

[13] The New Civil Code

Art. 208. The capacity to receive liberalities

By exception from the provisions of art. 205 par. (3) and if the law does not dispose otherwise, any legal entity can receive liberalities in the conditions of the common law, from the date of the deed of registration or, in the case of the testamentary foundations, from the moment of opening of the testator's inheritance, even in the case when the liberalities are not necessary so that the legal entity be legally created.

We find ourselves again in the impossibility to include in the assets and liabilities a good belonging to the patrimony of a debtor afflicted by a clause of inalienability and imperceptibility.

Definitely, during the following period we shall see more donations with "duties" justified by a "legitimate and serious interest", for the benefit of legal entities, which will have as an effect, be it intended or not, the decrease of the assets and liabilities for the detriment of the good-faith creditors.

4. Conclusions

As stated in the introductory part, this study is far from covering all the implications, changes and difficulties arising together with the entering into force of the New Civil Code and especially in relation to the procedure of insolvency.

The study was limited to the impact of the separation of patrimonies over the procedure of insolvency, but the changes and problems arisen by the enforcement of the New Civil Code are multiple, even if we are still in the incipient phase of its enforcement.

The newly implemented legal norm is, at least in its current form, defective, leaving space for interpretations through the claim of certain notions which constituted doctrinal and jurisprudential springs since 1864 and until the present day.

An enforcement can obviously not be performed unless by claiming well-known notions, by bringing additions from the old regulations, inasmuch as they are still compatible.

It is important to observe the space allowed by the new legal norm for the speculations and for the "removal" of the patrimonial goods from the procedure of insolvency.

The changes brought by the New Civil Code to the procedure of insolvency seem to obstruct more than sustain the purpose of the Law no. 85/2006 and tend, without a full and deep analysis, towards a lack of efficiency.

All these without insisting on the legislator's awkwardness in the elaboration of the New Civil Code, which apart from the legal technique approached, equals the notions of bankruptcy and insolvency, insolvency and insolvability, etc.

The separation of patrimonies, through the division of the general patrimony of the person in various patrimonial assets subject to a special assignment such as the deed of trust, the management, represent only an approach of the "bankrupt" impact on the Law concerning the procedure of insolvency.

In a future approach of the impact of the New Civil Code on the Law no. 85/2006 on the procedure of insolvency, we shall tackle the provisions of the institution of the decay from the term benefit, the mortgage and, especially, the taking over of a mortgaged good for administration, the prescription of debt, the special obligations and agreements – part of them being terminated at the beginning of the procedure of insolvency and all of them bringing significant changes and derogations to the procedure of insolvency.

We are still trying to support the efforts to enforce, improve, modify this norm, by searching, as practitioners, legal solutions in the sense that a norm should produce legal effects without ceasing to believe that our efforts from the initial stage of the Law no. 287/2009 shall lead to certain results, the contribution of each of those involved directly in its enforcement being materialized into a doctrine, a practice or in jurisprudence.

De lege ferenda imposes the intense cooperation with the various categories of practitioners under direct contact with the enforcement of the laws, not only with theoreticians, as a vision of ensemble and interpretation, which can be possessed profoundly by the lawyer, but also by the practitioner under insolvency, the magistrate and other similar practitioners.

At the same time, it is necessary to explain the institutions with a regime of absolute novelty for the Romanian legal system, the correlation of the norms still in force with those regulated by the New Civil Code.

Mainly with respect to the procedure of insolvency, it is very important not to lose sight of the purpose of the law which, as already seen, tends to be eluded, through the creation of levers which shall secure the debtors' goods, thus encouraging illegal, disloyal practices performed with the purpose of committing "legal" fraud, as well as for the development in ill-faith of "clean" practices for money laundering, all these in the detriment and damage of the contractual partners – the creditors.

CONTROVERSIAL ASPECTS REGARDING APPOINTING AND REVOKING THE LEGAL ENTITY ADMINISTRATOR

CARMEN TODICA*

Abstract
Having as main objective the analysis the provisions of Company Law and the New Civil Code regarding the management of a trading company by a legal person, the study offers several solutions to a number of controversial issues with strict reference to two aspects: appointing and revoking the legal entity administrator. Can the administrator be any entity with a legal personality or just a trade company? Is the administrator subject to legal requirements of good repute, characteristic to a representative natural person? Can the legal person fulfill the president position in a collective administrative body? Can he be revoked ad nutum? Regarding the administrator legal person representative, may the company revoke the administrator, on its own? There are several questions outlining the juridical status of the administrator legal person, and to which the paper tries to find answers, introducing some jurisprudence solutions, comparative law issues and controversial doctrinal views.

Keywords: administrator revocation, appointing the administrator, honorability, legal person, permanent representative.

Introduction

In the current legislative framework, established by the Law on trading companies no. 31/1990 and by the New Civil Code, as we shall see later, it is undeniable that the position as a trading company administrator shall be performed by a legal entity administrator. But, both normative acts are limited strictly to allowing such a possibility, without detailing what should be the appointment method, the conditions that should be met and how to revoke the administrator legal person.

In the silence of the law on trading companies, in the approach taken, it has been tried to indentify some problems that may occur, in practice during the company's life span related to the aspects like appointing and revoking the legal entity administrator. Namely: what would be the appointment procedure through the constitutive act or by the ordinary general assembly decision, if the legal entity administrator must meet the honorability conditions and independence requested by the law for the appointment of the administrator and to what extent he could be appointed chairman of the collective administrative bodies? Regarding the revocation of the legal entity administrator two issues are put under discussion, if the legal entity administrator mandate can be revoked ad nutum or only in the context of failure to meet certain duties expressly stipulated in the management contract signed with the company and if the legal representative of the legal entity administrator can be revoked by the associates of the managed trading company.

In addressing these issues solutions from judicial practice, the views often divergent outlined in theory are considered, and also a corroborated interpretation of the legal texts on trading companies, at times poor, with the provisions of the New Civil Code on the usage capacity specialty (art. 206) and the trader quality (art.8 para.2) but also of the Criminal Code on criminal liability of the legal person. While making use of the lawmaker's inconsistency in drafting legal texts, and also of the legal void regarding a number of issues related to the appointment and revocation of the legal entity administrator, the study attempts to cover the gaps and the legislative inadequacies.

* Senior Lecturer, Ph. D., Faculty of Law, „Titu Maiorescu" University (email: carmentodica_utm@yahoo.com).

The possibility for a legal entity administrator to exercise its administrative powers and to represent a trading company has been relatively recent introduced in the Romanian legislation, the aspects regarding its appointment and revocation have been subject to only few specialty papers and only isolated in relation to the overall context on managing a trading company[1]. But the practical impact of the proposed solutions is to be related to the provisions of the New Civil Code with general applicability for any legal person who considers the managing opportunity by another legal person. Although Law 31/1990 is limited to mentioning such a possibility expresis verbis such a possibility only in regards to the joint stock companies, starting from the principle provision of art. 209 para (2) of the New Civil Code, in what follows we will try to offer arguments in the sense that also in other types of companies the administration and representation duty can be assigned to a legal person.

1. The current legal framework on the possibility to appoint the legal entity administrator

Law 31/1990 on trading companies, in its original form, didn't contain any provisions that would allow the appointment of a legal person to the administrator position. Also, the law made no difference between legal and natural persons, as administrators of trading companies. In addition, at that time, major part of theory argued that, considering the way the company law was drafted it actually was in support of this legislative act that the administration would be done by a natural person. The conclusion follows mainly from the interpretation of the legal provisions, which didn't expressly provided the possibility of exercising the administration duties for a trading company by a legal person, and on the other hand from the legal prohibition that the incapable or dishonorable persons to exercise the administrator duty, prohibition that only concerned natural persons. However, rarely[2] it was admitted that based on logical argumentation where the law didn't prohibit, it allowed, a legal person to exercise the administrative mandate of a trading company under the provisions of Law no. 31/1990.

Later, based on the provisions or art. 139 (legal text introduced by Government Emergency Ordinance no.31/1997, currently repealed)[3] the Law on trading companies expressly allowed for a legal person to be appointed or elected as the administrator of a trading company, provided that the rights and obligations of the parties shall be drafted in a management contract.

In the current legislative context, the issue regarding the management of the trading company by a legal person is no longer an issue, related to the provisions of art. 153^{13} para.1 and 2 (introduced by Law no.441/2006) according to which " (1) the managers of the joint-stock company, in an unitary system , or the members of the management, in a dual system, shall be legal persons.

(2) A legal person may be appointed administrator or member of the supervisory board of a joint-stock company. (...)"

Therefore, the law (art. 153^{13} para.2) expressly allows a legal person to be appointed administrator or member of the supervisory board of a joint-stock company. If among the Board of directors, respectively the supervisory board can be both legal and natural persons, in respect to the managers of the joint-stock company, in unitary system, or the members of the management, in the dual system can only be natural persons (art. 153^1, para. 1).

At the same time, in the current legislative framework, established by the New Civil Code[4], the legal person is also an administrative body, which by law, by constitutive act or statute is empowered to act in relations to third parties. Indeed according to art 209 para.(2) " has the status of administrative bodies….the natural or legal persons who, by law, constitutive act or statute are empowered to act in relation to third parties, in the name and on behalf of the legal person". Thus, when regulating, in principle, the afore mentioned legal text, the New Civil Code, indirectly, besides the qualification as an administrative body, generally recognizes the possibility of a legal person to be appointed administrator of another legal person.

2. Practical issues concerning the appointment of a legal entity administrator

2.1. With reference to the fact that legal texts above alleged are relevant in the field of joint-stock companies, a first problem arises, namely: if for the other types of trading companies- the limited liability company and the general partnership- the administrator position can be assigned to a legal person?

Provided that the legal regulations applicable to the administrators of limited liability companies and general partnership make no distinction, we consider that both the natural and legal person can be appointed as the administrator of the company[5]. Moreover, to the extent to which the lawmaker would have wanted to exclude the legal person from the administrative duties of the trading companies, he would have expressly prohibited through a provision of the law.

The conclusion follows also from the provisions of art. 81 corroborated with art.7 letter. e) which regulates the administrators' identification data, needed to be mentioned in the constitutive act of the general partnerships and of limited liability companies, separately, both for administrators and for legal entities administrators.

Indeed art. 153^{13} para.2, regulating the possibility to appoint a legal entity administrator for the company, is placed among the provisions on joint-stock company[6], but, compared to the provisions of art. 209 para.(2) of the Civil Code we appreciate that the failure to regulate this possibility for the other types of companies is just an inadvertence[7], so that together with the entry into force of the Civil Code, art. 153^{13} para.2 of Law 31/1990 has general applicability.

2.2. Noting only in a general manner that: "the legal person can be appointed administrator or member of the supervisory board", art.153^{13} para.2 of the Law raises a second problem: which of the legal persons could exercise the administrative mandate? In other words, can any entity with a legal personality be an administrator?

According to the legislative changes introduced by Law no. 44/2006, art.81, letter b) of Law no.31/1990 provides as identification data for the legal persons, including administrators or members

[4] Law no. 287/2009 of the Civil Code, published in the "Official Gazette", Part I, no. 505 of July 15th, 2011, pursuant to Art. 218 of Law no. 71/2011 for the implementation of Law no. 287/2009 of the Civil Code ("Official Gazette", Part I, no. 409 of June 10th , 2011).

[5] In a contrary opinion, the possibility for managing a trade company by a legal entity administrator is limited only to the joint-stock companies. Consequently the author states distinctly that one of the conditions to be appointed as an administrator for the other types of companies, is being a natural person. See D.M. Daghie, quoted work, 97.

[6] For a contrary view, see Stanciu D. Cărpenaru, Romanian Commercial Law, VIII th Edition (Bucharest: Universul Juridic, 2008): 232. According to the author, Law no. 31/1990, in its current form, allows the appointment as administrator of a legal entity, but only for the company joint-stock. Prior to the amendment, the appointment of an administrator legal person was allowed in any trading company, regardless of their legal form.

[7] Stanciu .D. Cărpenaru, Cătălin. Predoiu, Sorin David, Gheorghe Piperea*, Company Law. Review on articles* (Bucharest: C.H, Beck Publishing House, 2006): 325. To decide otherwise would mean to empty the content of art. 7 letter. e), and in addition, among all companies, the joint stock company is the one that requires best, professional administration through a specialized legal entity.

of the supervisory board: the name, head office, registration number in the National Trade Register of the sole registration code. Since these are identification data specific for traders, we consider that the Law takes into account only the legal entity as "administrator-legal person"[8].

At the same time, the legal person, appointed administrator or member of the supervisory board, must comply with the specific conditions imposed by the specialty principle legal capacity of the legal person. Starting from this principle, regulated in art 34 of Decree no. 31/1954[9] on natural and legal persons, according to which the legal person can only have those rights that meet their main scope established by law, constitutive act or statute, the administrator- legal person must have within the object of activity this management activity. Since this is a commercial activity based on mandate contracts and not on isolated commercial activities, the legal person-administrator is, necessarily, a commercial company, whose main scope and activity is the management of trading companies[10]. Otherwise, a commercial company which hasn't stated amongst its object of activity the activity of managing other companies, could not carry out such activity, without infringing the specialty principle of the legal capacity of the legal person.

In other words, the provision of art. 61 related to art.73^1 shall apply to the legal entity administrator, in the sense that cannot be administrators the "persons which, by law, are incapable". In this case, the legal entity administrator's capacity must allow the representative (natural person) appointed by him, to conclude any legal act needed for carrying out a commercial activity having as a main scope obtaining profit. Thus, termination of the legal capacity of the legal person by dissolution, dissolution followed by liquidation, reorganization entails the revocation of the right to manage. In the new Civil Code, yet the speciality principle of the legal capacity is regulated only in terms of the legal person with non-profit activity. Thus according to art. 206 para. 2 "the legal persons with non-profit activities may have just those rights which are necessary to meet their scope set by law, by the constitutive act or by statute", for the legal person in general the new legal provisions giving the plenitude of civil rights and obligations. In this sense, art. 206 para.1 states that" the legal person may have any rights and obligations, except those which by their nature or by law, can only belong to the natural persons". Considering that a legal person, among which the commercial company, in fact, can only have rights and obligations specific to its scope and can only carry out those activities that meet the goals of the object of activity provided in the constitutive act, we believe that the specialty principle of the legal capacity should find a well deserved legal regulation on all the legal persons, without any distinction.

2.3. A final issue raised in theory[11] was whether the administrator/ member of the supervisory board- legal person can be appointed chairman of the board of directors, respectively of the supervisory board? The question arises considering at least two aspects: a legal person may be appointed administrator or member of the supervisory board of a joint-stock company (art. 153^{13} para.2), and the board of directors appoints amongst its members a chairman of the board (art 140^1 para.1 thesis I) respectively the supervisory board chooses among its members a chairman of the board (153^{13} para.5).

[8] In a contrary view it is considered that a non-profit legal entity may act as an administrator of a commercial company, since the Law does not prohibit expressly, but that the law when it introduced art. 139 (in the previous regulation), did not take into account NGOs , but trading companies (Marius Şcheaua, work quoted, 313.

[9] Decree regarding the natural person and legal person published in BO no. 8/30 January 1954 was repealed upon the entry into force on October 1st of the New Civil Code - Law no. 287/2009.

[10] Specifically the constitutive act of the administrator legal entity shall provide as object of activity also the operations listed in Class 7022 CAEN Code - "business consulting activities and management".

[11] C.I. Stoica, quoted work, 87-91.

Considering the provisions of the French law[12] where a legal person cannot be the chairman of the board of directors, it has been argued that the legal person cannot be appointed chairman of a board of directors. However, in relation to the provisions of the law on trading companies, that do not prohibit, not expressly and not indirectly, the appointment of a legal person for the chairman of the board of director position, respectively supervisory board, we consider this to be possible. This, especially since these boards elect their chairman among its members and the legal entity can be legally appointed as a member of these bodies.

3. Legal terms regarding the appointment of the legal entity administrator

3.1. in the previous form of the law (art. 139, repealed by law no. 441/2006) the statute of the legal entity administrator was very well outlined. Therefore, the law on trading companies required legal persons, in order to be appointed administrator, they were supposed to meet the special conditions required for the administrator natural person (in this sense art.139 para.1 was referring to the conditions provisioned by art.138). Also, on the modality for appointing the legal entity administrator, art.139 para.2 stated that, the rights and obligations of the parties were established through a management contract.

Under these aspects, the current regulation of art 153^{13} para. 2 is deficient. In respect to the manner for appointing the administrator-legal person, the law no longer contains any provisions in this sense, and is limiting itself to state that the legal person may be appointed administrator, respectively member of the supervisory board. Compared to the regulation on appointing the administrator- natural person, and in the silence of the law regarding the appointment of the administrator-legal person, we believe that for the same reason, the appointment by constitutive act or by decision of the general assembly shall also apply to the administrator-legal person. Consequently, the administrator- legal person may be appointed by constitutive act, during the set up of the company or later, during the company's existence, by the decision of the general assembly, and exercise its duties under the provisions established in the instrument of appointment. Having as main attribution managing the activity of the company, in the name and on the behalf of the trading company, the mandate given to the administrator-legal person is a remunerated one. Of course, it is possible to conclude a contract (management) between the commercial company and the administrator natural person, contract that will become an annex to the appointment agreement.

An important clause in the administrator- legal person's appointment agreement is the one regarding the appointment of the natural person, permanent representative of the latter. Thus, according to art. 153^{13} para.2, thesis II, once appointed administrator or member of the supervisory board (of a joint-stock company) the legal person is bound to appoint a permanent representative, natural person. And as far as the permanent representative is revoked, the legal person is bound to appoint a replacement.

3.2. In respect to the permanent representative, the law expressly provides that "he is subject to the same conditions…as an administrator or a member of the supervisory board, natural person action on his behalf", without referring to the conditions that the legal entity administrator should met. In this context, shouldn't the legal person meet also certain similar conditions to those to which the natural person is subject to? In the silence of the law we believe that he is subject to the same conditions as the natural person, with certain particularities.

Separately from the citizenship condition for the natural person, among the identification data of the administrators, that the constitutive act should contain, art.81 letter b) of the Law lists for the legal persons the nationality. Therefore, the legal entities administrators can be both legal persons with Romanian nationality and foreign legal entities. Of course, through the constitutive act the possibility to appoint as the administrator of a foreign legal entity can be limited. In regards to the honorability of the legal person-administrator, in theory[13], it has been argued that it can only affect its permanent representative, to whom the provisions established for the administrator- natural person shall apply.

However it has been suggested as a solution[14], in the absence of any provision in this sense of Law 31/1990, applying, by similarity the provisions of Law on management agreement no. 66/1993 (currently repealed) which in art. 4, point 2 and art. T section 2 established the conditions that were supposed to be met by a legal person to become "manager" (to have experience in the management field; to prove by acts their creditworthiness; should not be declare bankrupt; has not been sanctioned for breach of the legal provisions on taxation; should not appear on the list of managers who were revoked). In a contrary opinion[15], these conditions would concern also the administrator-legal person, only to the extent to which there would be an express reference of the Law on trading companies to the rules regulating the management agreement, and as Law no.31/1990 didn't comprise such a reference, the provisions of the management contract law could not be applied. Additionally, it was argued that managing the company by a legal person should have been made through its permanent representative, which was, in fact, the person who concluded juridical acts with third parties.

Following the recent amendments made to the Criminal Law[16], we appreciate that, since the legal persons is criminally liable for the offenses committed in achieving the object of activity or for the benefit or on behalf of that legal person, if the offense has been committed with the form of guilt provided by the criminal law (art.19^1 para.1), therefore, the provisions of art. 73^1 and art.6 para.2 are directly applicable. Thus, the legal person cannot be administrator/member of the supervisory board if he has been convicted for the offenses established by art. 6 para.2 law no.31/1990.

Consequently, we don't believe that in a future regulation (de lege ferenda) would be necessary the express regulation of some morality conditions towards the administrator- legal person, since he is subject to art. 73^1 and art. 6 para.2 of the Law. Thus, Law no. 278/2006 amending the Criminal code[17] adopted, in art. 19^1 , the solution on the criminal liability of the legal person, which can be invoked, in principle, for any offense. The lawmaker offered also guidelines for establishing the offenses that could lead to a criminal conviction of the legal entity, adding that the offenses must be committed while achieving the object of activity or in the interest or on behalf of the legal person. Therefore, all the more so, the offenses provided at art.6 para.2 of the Law 31/1990 fall within this limits, since the object of activity of the legal person- administrator is the management of the trading company.

Since no expressly stipulated distinction has been made between the natural person and the legal person, we consider that there are no impediments that, when appointing the administrator-legal person, some of the independence criteria of art. 138^2 para.2 of the Law should be considered, especially those stated at letter c) and e), respectively that they shouldn't have received form a company or a company controlled by it an additional remuneration or other advantages, other than those corresponding to its capacity of administrator, and should not have or had in the last year labor relations with a company or a company controlled by it, either in person, or as associated, shareholder, administrator.

3.3. At the same time, the administrator-legal person of a commercial company is also a trader, given both the manner for obtaining the legal personality, and the specific object of activity. In theory[18], the conditions necessary for a person to acquire the legal personality as a trader have been outlined, namely: to commit acts of trade, to perform acts and facts of trade as an ordinary profession carried out in his name.

As a result of entry into force of the New Civil Code, art. 8, para. 2, the terms "commercial acts" and "facts of commerce" will be replaced by "activities of production, trade or services". Although, he carries out commercial acts and facts (activities of production, trade or services) as his main field of action, the administrator don't become a trader because he doesn't carry out these activities in his name and at their own economic risk, but on behalf of the company they manage. Thus, the administrator-natural person meets only the first two conditions required in order to be a trader, which is not sufficient to acquire this status[19]. Of course, neither the legal entity administrator carries out services activities in its own name, but in nomine alieno for the managed company. But, since it is about commercial acts carried out on a regular basis and not isolated commercial acts, subsidiary to the main object of activity, the legal entity administrator is necessarily a trade company and consequently is a trader.

As a commercial company the administrator-legal person acquires the trader status from the very moment of its registration with the National Trade Register and without carrying out commercial acts (production activities, trade or services). Moreover, interpreting art. 6 of Law no 71/2011 for the implementation of Law 287/2009 of the Civil Code[20] are considered to be traders the legal person subject to the registration with the National Trade Register, according to art. 1 of Law no.26/1990 on the National Trade Register[21], thus including the legal entity administrator that carries out its activities as a trade company and is obliged to register with the National Trade Register.

4. Controversial issues on the revocation administrator legal entity

As shown above, the administrator or member of the supervisory board of a joint-stock company can be also legal person. Once appointed, the legal person is obliged to designate a permanent representative.

Pursuant art 153[13] para.2 of Law on trading companies, this permanent representative "it shall be subject to the same obligations and conditions and shall have the same civil or criminal liability as the an administrator or a member of the supervisory board, natural person, action in its own behalf (…) When the legal person dismisses its representative, shall be under obligation to appoint at the same time a substitute."

Unlike the previous regulations[22], the legal text no longer provides the obligation to conclude a management agreement between the managed company and the legal entity administrator on the rights and obligations. However, in order to exercise properly these rights and obligations, it is

[18] Cărpenaru D. Stanciu, "Legal Regime of traders in the, Romanian commercial law", Law 6 (1992): 3.

[19] In early jurisprudence it has been agreed that the administrator-natural person is not a trader (Commercial Decision no. 19/September 2nd 1934, Muscel Court of Justice, in Pandectele Române (1935). It was considered that those who do not carry out commercial activities proprio-nomine cannot be considered traders, and thus the servants, trade peddlers, directors or administrators of joint-stock companies, their representatives cannot have this quality.

[20] According to art. 6 para.1 of Law no. 71/2011 " within the content of the juridical acts, upon the entry into force of the Civil Code, the reference made to traders are considered to be made to natural persons, or as appropriate to legal person subject to registration in the National Trade Register according to art.1 Law no. 26/1990 on Trade Register".

[21] In the accordance with art. 1 of Law no. 26/1990, with amendments and supplements, "traders, before starting, trade ... before they start their activities are obliged to request the registration in the trade register ....".

[22] Prior to the repeal by Law no. 441/2006, art. 139, which regulated the possibility for a legal entity to be appointed an administrator of a commercial company, it also stated that, in para. 2 "the rights and obligations of the parties shall be determined by a management contract." necessary that the legal relationship between the two entities should be written down in a contract, regardless of its name- administration contract, management agreement(most commonly used at present), or even contract of mandate.

The quoted text is likely to raise two issues. Primarily it would be on whether the right of a trade company to revoke ad nutum its administrator would apply also for the case of a legal entity administrator, and secondly concerning the representative of the legal entity administrator, if the company may be capable of dismissing him on its own.

4.1. Regarding the 1st problem, since the trading company is the one that appoints the legal entity administrator, the mandate being given intuitu personae, the company is entitled also to revoke this mandate. But, considering that between the two entities usually a contract is concluded where the rights and obligations are stipulated, in practice, it was considered that this revocation can't operate ad nutum, because the principal's right to revoke the mandate "is not discretionary and not censorable, but a conditional right, within the limits well established by contractual clauses"[23]. Similarly, in another case, it has been decided[24] that "the contract concluded by agreement of both parties will cease under the conditions established for the contract termination. Therefore, the contracting parties and not the general assembly of the shareholders, have the power to set the termination of the management contract".

Therefore, the revocation of the mandate of the legal entity administrator cannot be a revocation ad nutum, but a revocation under the conditions, limits and contractual clauses agreed upon with the managed company, reason for which in legal literature the revocation has been described as a cause for contract termination[25].

However the doctrine[26] recognizes the company's right to revoke ad nutum the legal entity administrator, considering the principle of contractual freedom and of the binding force of the contract (pacta sunt servanda). In this respect, by contract, the parties may agree, at most, on an estimation of damages for the case where an irrevocable decision of the court would qualify the revocation measure as abusive, but their agreements regarding the circumstances and motives for which revocation may occur will be considered as unwritten.

4.2. With respect to the company's possibility to revoke the representative of a legal entity administrator, the opinions diverge. Thus, according to a 1st opinion[27] it was considered that even though the law doesn't expressly provide, the trading company may by itself revoke the natural person in question, since he is subject to " the same obligations and conditions and it shall have the same civil or criminal liability as an administrator", and it was even stated that by reference of the [23] December. no. 60/Ap from May 30, 1996, the Commercial Law Review 6 (1998): 93-94. In this case, the revocation measure did not target, an administrator, according to Law. 31/1990, but a manager according to the Law on management agreements no. 66/1993, but the principles are identical. Therefore, the court awarded priority to the contractual terms, considering that termination of the mandate occurs as a result of non-compliance to the contractual obligation: "by contract, it has been established as a cause for termination of the contract and dismissal of the administrator the failure to meet the contractual obligations, therefore it was not agreed upon a discretionary and uncensorable right of the mandate, but a conditional right, within well established rights for contractual clauses".

[24] December. no. 744/6.02.2002 of C.S.J. Curierul Juridic 11 (2003). " the termination of the management contract decided by the general assembly of shareholders is illegal, the provisions of Law no.31/1990 regarding the appointment and revocation of the administrators being inapplicable. The management agreement may terminate only based on the decision adopted by the commercial company and by the majority of the managerial board, under the terms stipulated by the contractual clauses, in this case, if it is proven that the contractual obligations haven't meet met."

law to the "obligations and conditions" to which the administrators in general are subject to, represent an evidence in the sense that the administrator (thus including the permanent representative- A/N) represents foremost the company's body.

In a different point of view, the juridical relationships between the legal entity administrator and its representative natural person are subject to the rules of a trust mandate. Given this particularity for the case of the management agreement termination by the managed trade company with the legal entity administrator it occurs by default a revocation of the mandate of the representative natural person in relation with the managed company[28].

We appreciate that the company, specifically the general assembly of directors may not revoke the natural person, permanent representative of the legal person- administrator or member of the supervisory board of the company. Firstly, because the general assembly can revoke only their own administrator or member of the supervisory board pursuant art. 111 para.2 letter b) of the law.[29] Second, even if the legal text (art.153[13]para.2) establishes the exclusive competence of the legal entity administrator to revoke the permanent representative, along with the obligation to appoint at the same time a substitute ("when the legal person is revoking its representative, it shall be under the obligation to appoint in the same time a substitute").

In the approach taken we tried to analyze, based on the legal possibility of a legal person to perform administration duties for a trade company, aspects which define the status of the legal entity administrator the appointment process, the legal requirements for appointment, revocation from the administrator position. Summarizing the answers to the questions raised throughout the paper we can conclude the following:

Although the law on trading companies strictly regulates the possibility of a legal person to manage only a joint-stock company, together with the entry into force of the New Civil Code (art.209, para. 2) and considering the general applicability of this legal text, currently we are not wrong to consider that any type of trading company can be managed by a legal person, including the general partnership and limited liability companies. Also, keeping in mind that the administrator concludes any juridical act necessary for carrying out activities having as main objective obtaining profit, we consider that only a commercial company can be appointed "legal entity administrator" in the sense of Law no.31/1990. In the absence of an expressly stipulated distinction between the natural and legal person, we consider that there exists no impediment for the administrator-legal person to meet, on appointment, the independence and honorability criteria. At the same time the legal entity administrator cannot be revoked ad nutum by the general assembly of the shareholders like in the case of the natural person administrator, but only under the conditions, limits and terms of the contract agreed upon with the managed company, the revocation acting as a termination of this contract.

Although this paper was related to the issues regarding the appointment and revocation of the administrator of the trading company, the issues are currently relevant in the context where the New Civil Code recognizes in general the possibility of appointing a legal entity administrator to other legal personality entities, and not only strictly limited to trading companies. Therefore the difficult task to implement the provisions of the new Civil Code and to offer solutions to the problems considered and regarding other categories of legal person, who will carry out, in practice, the administrative position, lies upon the court.

THE EUROPEAN MECHANISM FOR FINANCIAL STABILITY AND THE EURO-PLUS PACT

AUGUSTIN FUEREA[1]

Abstract

The economic crisis that has affected countries from all continents has generated, among others, also a strong financial crisis, which in turn, has caused serious imbalances in the economic and financial environment of EU Member States.Under these circumstances, the Council, being in an exceptional situation, "outside the control of Member States", as it itself states in the Preamble to Regulation No. 407/2010, considered necessary, "the immediate establishment of a stabilization mechanism at EU level in order to maintain the financial stability in the European Union", mechanism that "would enable the Union to respond in a coordinated, rapid and effective way to the serious difficulties undergone by a certain Member State".

1. Introduction

Without claiming to develop a specialized analysis on the financial crisis that not just Europe has crossed through the last three years and still crosses, it is impossible not to observe the concerted efforts of Member States of the European Union in order to overcome it, or, at least, to maintain it at the same level. Thus, further on, we propose an overview of what is happening now in the EU, while trying an economic recovery in Europe. This presentation is however limited only to the legal aspects, leaving time to decide whether all these efforts have been successful or not. In this sense, we bring in the forefront two measures at EU level, namely the European Financial Stabilization Mechanism and the Euro-Plus Pact.

2. The European Financial Stabilization Mechanism (EFSM)

The economic crisis that has affected countries from all continents has generated, among others, also a strong financial crisis, which in turn, has caused serious imbalances in the economic and financial environment of EU Member States.

Aware of the fact that it witnesses a financial crisis and an economic downturn "without precedent which has brought serious damage to the economic growth and financial stability, leading to a strong deterioration in the deficit and debt situation of Member States"[2], the European Union legislature has been put in the situation of facing new challenges. One of these challenges is the fact that the financial crisis has also deteriorated the loan conditions in Member States, situation which, unregulated in time would result in the emergence of a new threat "against the stability, unity and integrity of the Eurozone, as a whole"[3].

Under these circumstances, the Council, being in an exceptional situation, "outside the control of Member States"[4], as it itself states in the Preamble to Regulation No. 407/2010, considered necessary, "the immediate establishment of a stabilization mechanism at EU level in order to maintain the financial stability in the European Union"[5], mechanism that "would enable the Union to respond in a coordinated, rapid and effective way to the serious difficulties undergone by a certain Member State"[6]. The mechanism is activated in the context of a joint support EU / International Monetary Fund (IMF). Therefore, on May 13, 1010, Regulation no. 407/2010 for establishing a European financial stabilization mechanism[7] came into force; through this regulation, "strict economic policy conditions to maintain the sustainability of public finances of the beneficiary Member State and to rebuild its capacity to finance itself on financial markets"[8] were imposed.

The mechanism established by Regulation no. 407/2010 reproduces, in the 27 EU Member States, the basic principles of operation of Regulation no. 332/2002 for establishing a facility providing medium-term financial assistance for Member States balances of payments, applicable to Member States outside the Eurozone.

The rules contained in the Regulation determine the conditions and the procedure under which a Member State that is affected or is in a situation that ultimately leads to severe economic or financial distortions may obtain financial assistance from the Union. We mention that the situation where that State is in must be caused by exceptional occurrences resulted beyond its control.

If a Member State wishes to obtain financial assistance from the Union, pursuant to Regulation no. 407/2010, it shall notify the Commission institution of its intention, presenting also a draft program of economic and financial adjustment. Discussions are being held with the European Commission, in cooperation with the European Central Bank (ECB). The financial assistance which may take the form of a loan or a credit line is granted by a Council decision adopted by qualified majority, based on a proposal from the Commission.

Under article 3, paragraph (3), letters a), b) and c), the decision to grant a loan include the following:

- the amount, the average maturity, the pricing formula, the maximum number of instalments and the period of availability of the financial assistance from the Union, as well as other rules necessary for the implementation of the assistance;

- general economic policy conditions attached to the financial assistance from the Union in order to restore a sound financial or economic situation in the beneficiary Member State and to rebuild its capacity to finance itself on financial markets; these conditions will be determined by the Commission, in consultation with the ECB;

- an approval of the adjustment program prepared by the beneficiary Member State in order to fulfil the economic conditions attached to the financial assistance received from the Union.

Regarding the decision to grant a credit line, article 3, paragraph (4), letters a), b) and c) sets out its content, namely:

- the amount, the fee for the credit line availability, the pricing formula applicable for the release of funds and the period of availability of the financial assistance from the Union, as well as other rules necessary for the implementation of the assistance;

- general economic policy conditions attached to the financial assistance from the Union to restore a sound financial or economic situation in the beneficiary Member State; these conditions will be established by the Commission, in consultation with the ECB;

- an approval of the adjustment program prepared by the beneficiary Member State in order to fulfil the economic conditions attached to the financial assistance received from the Union.

"When the mechanism is activated, it allows the Commission to loan from financial markets on behalf of the Union, under cover of an implied warranty from the EU budget. The Commission loans then the receiving funds, to the beneficiary Member State. This special credit arrangement involves the absence of charges afferent to the debt service for the Union. The interest and the loan capital are fully reimbursed by the beneficiary Member State, through the Commission. The EU budget guarantees the redemption of bonds by a p.m. line, in the event of default by the debtor"[9].

In addition to this mechanism, the European Facility for financial stability[10], such funds guaranteed by the Euro area, as well as IMF funding are available for Member States of the Eurozone. If a Member State wants funding from the International Monetary Fund, the State must first notify the European Commission. Following the notification, the Commission shall examine the possibilities within the mechanism of financial assistance from the Union, as well as the compatibility conditions on economic policy for commitments envisaged by the Member State to implement the recommendations of the Council and the decisions of the Council adopted under articles of the Treaty on the functioning of the European Union[11].

Member States outside the Eurozone are also eligible for assistance under the Regulation on the balance of payments.

According to The Communication of the European Commission on the European financial stabilization mechanism[12], "on November 21st, Ireland requested financial assistance from the European Union and Member States of the Eurozone. In the context of a joint program EU / IMF, the financial assistance package for Ireland will be funded through the EFSM and FESF, supplemented by bilateral loans to be negotiated by Member States". According to the same document, "in 2010, most Member States of the Eurozone registered large public deficits, which resulted in substantial increases of total issuances of government bonds denominated in Euro and in further growth of public debt. That overall increase in the offer of sovereign bonds increased the difficulties in accessing the market for some smaller issuers, which also involved the persistence of a future refinancing risk. Amounts to be attracted from the market in 2011 are, generally the same as in 2010 and will remain at least as high for many years"[13].

3. The Euro-Plus Pact

The European Council from March[14] this year took place on the background of a sensitive economic recovery in the global economic crisis. Heads of State or Government, meeting in Brussels, adopted, among other things, a package of measures designed to help overcome the financial crisis. The package aims at strengthening the economic governance of the European Union and at ensuring the sustainability of the Eurozone, as a whole.

In Annex I of the Conclusions presented at the end of the meeting from March, we find details about the Euro-Plus Pact[15]. The Pact is nothing else but an agreement concluded between Member States of the Eurozone and was joined by Bulgaria, Denmark, Latvia, Lithuania, Poland and Romania. Besides these countries, others are also invited, but voluntarily.

The purpose of the Pact, as agreed by Heads of State or Government is the strengthening of the "economic pillar of monetary union in order to achieve a new quality of economic policy coordination, to enhance competitiveness, leading thus, to greater convergence"[16]. The Pact focuses mainly on areas of national competence and which are essential for enhancing competitiveness and preventing further disturbances.

The Pact is based on four guiding rules, as it follows:

1. The Pact will be conform to the existing economic governance within the Union and will strengthen it. At the same time, the Pact is conducted using tools already available, namely: Europe 2020, the European Semester, the Integrated Guidelines, the Stability and Growth Pact and the new framework for macroeconomic surveillance;

2. The Pact will cover priority policy areas essential for promoting competitiveness and convergence. In the policy areas chosen, the Heads of State or Government will agree on some common objectives[17];

3. "Participating Member States will pursue these objectives through their own policy mix, taking into account the specific challenges faced. Every year, each Head of State or Government will take concrete national commitments;

4. The Pact will fully respect the integrity of the single market"[18].

The Pact objectives can be achieved only if the participating States are able to fulfil their obligations, namely: promoting competitiveness, employment, strengthening the public finance sustainability and strengthening the financial stability. Each participating Member State must present specific measures that it considers necessary and that must adopt in order to meet these obligations. If a Member State can prove that it is not necessary to act in one area, it will not take measures in this direction. Each State is free to identify and establish by itself, nationally, measures to be adopted, but to the identification and promotion of national actions, the State participating to the Pact must take into consideration concrete policy and monitoring commitments provided in the Pact. Therefore, "choosing the strategic actions necessary to achieve the common goals is connected to the liability of each country, but special attention will be paid to possible measures being referred to further on"[19]:

A. Promoting competitiveness. Under the provisions of the Pact "the progress will be evaluated based on the evolution of wages and productivity and on the adjustment need, in the area of competitiveness. To assess whether wages evolve in accordance with productivity, unit labour costs (ULC) will be monitored over a period of time, in relation to developments from other Eurozone countries and comparable to the major trading partners. For each country, unit labour costs will be assessed in the economy, as a whole and separately for each major sector (manufacturing, services and the commercial and non commercial sectors). Significant and sustained growth can lead to erosion of competitiveness, particularly if it is accompanied by a growing current account deficit and by the diminishing of market shares for exports. Actions to increase competitiveness are needed in all countries, but special attention will be paid to those facing serious difficulties in this regard. To ensure balanced and widespread growth across the Eurozone, specific tools and joint initiatives will be considered in order to promote productivity in regions lagging in development. Each country will be responsible for the specific policy actions that it chooses to take in order to promote competitiveness, but special attention will be paid to the following reforms:

(i) complying with national traditions of social dialogue and business relations, measures to ensure cost developments consistent with productivity, such as:

• reviewing procedures for determining wages and, where appropriate, the degree of centralization in the process of negotiation and mechanisms for indexing, while maintaining the autonomy of social partners in the process of collective negotiation;

• ensuring that the agreements establishing wages in the public sector support the competitiveness efforts from the private sector (taking into account the important barometer effect that wages from the public sector have).

(ii) measures to increase productivity, such as:

• further opening up of sectors protected by measures taken at national level to remove unnecessary restrictions on professional services and retail sector, to promote competitiveness and efficiency, by totally complying with the EU acquis;

• specific efforts to improve the educational systems and to promote research and development, innovation and infrastructure;

• measures to improve the business environment, especially SMEs, in particular by eliminating bureaucracy and improving the regulatory framework (for example, laws on bankruptcy, the commercial code)"[20].

B. Promoting employment. In this respect, it is stated that "a properly functioning labour market is essential for the Eurozone competitiveness. Progress will be assessed based on the following indicators: long-term unemployment rates and, among young people, employment rates. Each country will be responsible for the specific actions referring to policies that it chooses in order to promote employment, but particular attention will be paid to the following reforms:

• labour market reforms to promote "flexicurity", to reduce undeclared work and to increase employment;

• lifelong learning;

• tax reforms such as reducing taxes on labour, to increase work profitability, while maintaining the overall fiscal revenues and adopting measures to facilitate the labour force participation of the second contributor to the family income"[21].

C. Strengthening the public finances sustainability. "To ensure full implementation of the Stability and Growth Pact, special attention will be paid to:

- the sustainability of the pension systems, health care and social benefits.

This fact will be assessed, in particular, based on the sustainability gap indicators. These indicators show if debt levels are sustainable, based on current policies, especially on pensions systems, health care and social benefits and taking into account the demographic factors. Necessary reforms to ensure sustainability and adequacy of pensions and social benefits could include:

• aligning the pension systems to the national demographic situation, for example by aligning the effective retirement age to life expectancy or by increasing the participation rates;

• limiting early retirement schemes and using targeted incentives to employ older workers (especially the age group over 55 years).

- National fiscal rules. Participating Member States undertake to transpose the European fiscal rules, as set out in the Stability and Growth Pact, into national legislation. Member States will have the right to choose a specific national legal instrument to be used, but they will have to guarantee that it is required and has a sustainable character (for example, by Constitution or by a framework Law). Also, the exact wording of the rule will be decided by each country (for example, it could take the form of a "debt brake", a primary balance related rule or of a norm of expenditure), but it should ensure fiscal discipline at national and sub-national level. The Commission will be able to be consulted on the tax legislation in question before adoption, with the total compliance with prerogatives of national Parliaments to make sure that it is compatible with EU rules and that it assists them[22].

D. Strengthening the financial stability. "A strong financial sector is the key-element to the global stability of the Eurozone. A comprehensive reform of the EU framework for financial sector supervision and regulation was developed. In this context, Member States undertake to adopt national legislation to solve the banking crisis, by fully complying with the Community acquis. Strict simulations of banking crisis, coordinated at EU level will be regularly done. In addition, ESRB President and the President of Eurogroup will regularly be invited to inform the Heads of State or Government on matters relating to macro-financial stability and macroeconomic developments in the Eurozone, requiring special attention. In particular, for each Member State, the private debt of banks, households and non-financial companies will be closely monitored"[23].

Once established the guidelines of the participating States' commitments, the action is transferred from the European Union, at States level. Consequently, the participating states gradually include in their national reform programs (NRP), as well as in the stability and convergence programs, a number of commitments covered by the regular supervisory framework, framework established by the Pact.

On June 21, 2011, the General Secretariat of the Council published the first document of Member States Ministers participating in the Euro-Plus Pact. Under the Report[24], "despite the short time interval between the agreement on the Euro-Plus Pact and the PNR transmission, and the stability and convergence programs, the majority of participating States have succeeded to provide measures in their programs in relation to commitments under the Euro-Plus Pact. In total, more than a hundred different measures, focusing in particular, on the four objectives of the Euro-Plus Pact were announced: competitiveness, promoting employment, strengthening public finance sustainability and strengthening the financial stability". Next, we shall present the commitments and national policy measures adopted in Romania, as they are listed in the Annex[25] to the Report.

1. Promoting competitiveness

- the declining share of GDP with wages in public sector by one percentage point in 2012 compared with 2010, through gradual recovery until the end of 2012 of nominal reductions with 25% made in 2010. Therefore, the development of the unit labour cost will be below the level of the labour productivity development;

- strengthening the capacity and performance of the research, development and innovation sector (RDI), by implementing the new system of institutional financing;

- developing the European cooperation in the RDI area by promoting two strategic projects: the International Centre for Advanced Study Danube - Danube Delta - Black Sea and the Extreme Light Infrastructure (ELI);

- the national strategy for lifelong learning;

- creating the reference curriculum skills upgrading oriented;

- prioritizing the public investment in order to achieve competitiveness by creating a high-level working group under the direction of the Prime Minister, including a list of priority investment projects for which funding may be provided in the next 3-5 years;

- the sale on financial markets of major packages of shares in state companies;

2. Promoting employment:

- creating a unitary waging framework in the public sector by adopting the framework Law on the staff's unitary salaries paid from public funds;

- strengthening the social dialogue and rendering more flexible the system of collective work agreements;

- measures to promote flexicurity and employment through amendments to the Labour Code;

- implementing the national strategy on reducing the incidence of undeclared work for 2010-2012;

- adopting the draft law on the exercise of occasional activities performed by labourers;
- amending and supplementing the legal framework for the unemployment insurance system and employment stimulation;
- amending and supplementing Law no. 279/2005 on apprenticeship to the workplace;
- the reform of the legal framework for adult training;
- implementing the simplified European framework for the recognition of professional qualifications, in terms of reciprocity, between Member States;
- initiating procedures for the classification of universities into categories, based on the evaluation of study programs and on their institutional capacity: mostly educational universities, universities for scientific research and artistic creation and universities for advanced research and education.

3. Strengthening the sustainability of public finances:

- implementing the Law on the unitary pension system providing:
- (i) the gradual increase of the retirement age to 65 years for men and 63 for women until 2030, as well as the gradual increase of the complete contribution period to 35 years for women and men, by 2030;
- (ii) the introduction of stricter criteria for the access to partial early retirement;
- (iii) the gradual introduction of a mechanism for indexing pensions depending on inflation, by introducing into national law, a numeric rule for the general budget deficit under the Maastricht Treaty;
- further fiscal consolidation given a budget deficit of 5% of GDP in ESA terms for 2011 and less than 3% of GDP in 2012;
- reducing the arrears of the general budget by restructuring the health sector and by strengthening the budgetary discipline at local authorities level, by applying the recently approved amendments to the Law on local public finances;
- the implementation of the parental allowance program;
- improving the flexibility of the school educational system;
- defining the legislative framework on social assistance including also social services and benefits.

4. Strengthening the financial stability:

- Romania has applied since 2004, a series of measures to reduce the vigour of forex loans, using a wide range of tools, some of which still remain in force, even after the adjustments undertaken in connection with the accession to EU requirements;
- additional measures to ensure the comprehensive implementation of IFRS (International Financial Reporting Standards) by the banking sector since 2012;
- by the end of June 2011, the NBR will issue recommendations for prudential filters to further ensure a prudent policy in terms of solvency and bank reserves;
- amending the legislation for the purpose of allowing the use of Fund resources of the Bank Deposit Guarantee (FRBDG) to finance the restructuring approved by the NBR on the transfer of deposits, including the operations of assets transfer and assuming liabilities;
- develop procedures necessary to implement the new duties of the central bank and FRBDG in restructuring the credit institutions, as well as the FGBDG immediate access to government funds, if necessary;
- reconsidering the regulations of the legal framework on the liquidation of credit institutions to take measures, if necessary, in order to ensure their consistency;
- the increase, by NBR, of the scope of instruments accepted as guarantees in refinancing operations by including the bonds issued in lei by international financial institutions listed on BSE and Sovereign Eurobonds;
- establishing a prudential treatment of the temporary holding of equity, resulting from the restructuring of loans in order to avoid the weakening of the financial position of banks;

- monitoring the loans in foreign currency and making the necessary arrangements for their price to reflect accurately and transparently the risk of granting them to debtors at risk; - failing to transpose the draft legislation on insolvency of individuals and debt recovery, which could undermine the debtors' discipline;

- adopting additional measures by the Central Bank on the contingency plan, in order to avoid systemic risk in the banking sector.

Chronologically, concerning the documents developed in the European Union, we notice that one month after the presentation of the Report of Ministers participating in the Euro-Plus Pact, on July 21st, 2011, Ministers of the Eurozone, together with representatives of EU institutions, signed the "Declaration of the Heads of State or Government of the Eurozone and EU institutions"[26]. Since this is a declaration, that is, a document not legally binding, but a document of principles, the legal commitments lack, but it is worth mentioning some provisions related to our subject. Thus, those who signed the Declaration, inter alia, required "the rapid completion of the legislative package strengthening the Stability and Growth Pact and the new macroeconomic surveillance. Eurozone Member States will fully support the Polish Presidency to reach an agreement with the European Parliament on voting procedures in the preventive component of the Pact"[27]. However, they agree "that it would be needed in the EU regulatory framework" to rely "less on external credit ratings, given the recent Commission proposals in this direction"[28]. In the end of the Declaration, the European Council President, after consultation with the European Commission President and the Eurogroup President, is invited until October 2011, to make proposals on how to improve working methods and enhance crisis management in the Eurozone.

At the completion date of this brief presentation of some EU initiatives on the financial crisis, the economic and financial situation in Europe, and not only, worries the world, again. This is why, at the meeting of September 12, 2011, the so-called "package of six proposals" was adopted, "package" which refers to six pieces of legislation designed to strengthen the economic governance in the EU. Four of those proposals relate to tax issues, including a reform to the Stability and Growth Pact of the EU, while the other two are intended to identify and effectively approach the economic imbalances within the EU and the Eurozone.

In the margins of the European Council meeting on 1-2 March 2012, 25 European leaders signed the Treaty on Stability, Coordination and Governance (TSCG) aimed at strengthening fiscal discipline and introducing stricter surveillance within the euro area, in particular by establishing a "balanced budget rule". The content of the treaty had been endorsed at the last European Council meeting in January[29].

4. Conclusions

We conclude our brief presentation, by reproducing two statements of those who attended the meeting of September 12, 2011, namely Herman Van Rompuy, the European Council President and Donald Tusk, Prime Minister of Poland. The first said that "We face a difficult period and this new set of rules and procedures, which were discussed in the Task Force last year, and have subsequently been transposed into law, represents an important step in the process of strengthening the macroeconomic surveillance and fiscal discipline"[30]. Donald Tusk said: "Our main task at this time - in cooperation with the European Council President, European Commission and European

REVOCATION OF ADMINISTRATIVE ACT

MARTA CLAUDIA CLIZA *

Abstract
Because the revocation is totally specific for administrative law principles, I chose to talk about in this study and its impact on the cancellation of administrative acts. Revocation will be explored, in terms of the authorities which it may provide but also of the effects caused.It also would examine if revocation has a legal basis, as well as real cases to provide the impact of this principle in administrative law.

Keywords: revocation, administrative act, the principle of parallelism of forms, the rule of contrarius actus, Romanian Constitution.

Introduction

Administrative action is, for administrative law, the living essence of public authorities.

Government activity can take many forms, which can be classified from several points of view, depending on different criteria: ability to produce legal effects, number of stakeholders, applicable legal status, etc. Fundamental tripartite division of the forms of government activity is that presented in legal documents - legal and material facts - material-technical (administrative) operations. To these are added, according to some authors[1], and public documents. We will define them in turn and then we will make the necessary connections.

1.1 Administrative action - main form of activity of public administration authorities

Juridical acts are the wills of an administrative body, made in order to produce legal effects. A building permit, a government decision for pension indexing, a title of ownership issued with a view to reconstruction of a private property right, a local council decision to accept a donation, etc. fall into this category.

Material and juridical facts are those forms of government activity which, although not made in order to produce legal effects, they produce such effects under the law. As examples, we may generally give a misconduct or contravention of an official, failing to settle a request within the due term, etc.

Material and technical (or administrative or technical-material) operations are those forms of activity that do not produce any legal effect in themselves, they preparing an administrative action[2], giving them an enforceable character[3] or serving to the achievement of advertising formalities for the already issued deed: approvals, notification addresses, consent given by an individual in order to be issued a building permit operations are examples of such material operations.

[1] R.N. Petrescu. Administrative law, (Editura Hamangiu, Bucharest, 2009), p.276.

[2] That is why some authors call them preparatory actions - see, for example, C.G. Rarincescu, Romanian administrative court, 2nd edition, (Editura "Universala" Alcalay & Co.., Bucharest), p. 249- 251. The author speaks of them in the context of analyzing action subject in administrative court, which must be an administrative act and not a preparatory one.

[3] It's about formalities (administrative operations) leading to the formation of complex administrative acts: administrative agreement, proper approval, acknowledgement as a synonym of the latter.

Political acts are wills of an administrative body, issued in order to produce political (but not legal) effects: message of the Romanian President addressed to Parliament (Article 88 of the Constitution), the declaration of the Prime Minister concerning the general policy of the Government [art. 107 paragraph (1) of the Constitution], etc..

As a rule, political acts come from authorities situated at the top of administrative pyramid.

Actually, the categories that matter are the legal act, as well as material - technical (administrative) operation. The other two categories are generally only mentioned, but not analyzed by the authors of administrative law. This is due to the fact that, as concerns the political acts, once defined, they fall within the subject of constitutional law rather than within administrative law.

On the other hand, material and legal facts (i.e. those material facts to which the law attaches legal effects[4]) have not so great practical importance. And this happens because, if we talk about illegal acts of civil servants (real wills which, by the will of the legislature produce legal effect), have too little importance to a general theory of administrative act and if we speak of unjustified refusal to settle an application, we must note that under Article 2 paragraph (2) of Law no.554/2004 of administrative court[5], it is assimilated to administrative act, as regards the legal status; therefore creating a separate category would be purely formal[6].

Fundamental difference between the legal act and material-technical operation is, as can be seen in their definition, that of the legal effect that only acts can produce. On the contrary, administrative operations do not produce such effects[7]. At most, in some cases of forming complex acts, we could say that such operations contribute to the production of legal effects by the administrative acts. Therefore, essential for such distinction are the legal effects that the expression of will of the government produces or not. Thus, as noted in legal practice[8], to the extent that the document reviewed produces legal effects, being therefore "likely to harm the rights of whom enjoyed by exercising of certain powers up to that point," it is an authority administrative act, censored in the administrative courts, even if it bears a designation specific to material-technical operations (address)[9].

If we analyze the activity of public administration structures, we find that most of their work deals not with the legal acts, but government operations and material facts, those that make up the second category mentioned above.

As we find out from the interwar doctrine, the concept of “act” comes from the Latin “actum”, meaning to work, to do, to act[10].

According to an opinion expressed in the interwar doctrine, in carrying out its essential duties of law enforcement, the executive makes a series of acts, not all being of the same nature, nor the same meaning and legal value, nor the same scope, they being delimited into: proper administrative acts, jurisdictional administrative acts and preparatory administrative acts[11].

[6] However, we note that, theoretically, legal documents, as well as material and legal facts differ in that, in the first case, there is a perfect concordance between the expression of will, its purpose and effects, which are not found in the case of material and legal facts - I Iovănaş, Administrative Law, (Ed Servo Sat, Arad, 1997), p.14.

To evoke the idea of administrative act in the meaning of authority act, both literature and law have used several formulations, of which two asserted to be dominant, namely:

- Aadministrativ law acts (School of Cluj, by prof. Tudor Drăganu),
- Administrative acts (School of Bucharest, by prof. Romulus Ionescu).

In the optics of authors from Cluj, it was stated that the proposed formulation is likely to evoke the legal regime applicable to the act, ie elaboration regime, as well as the effects of acts of state administration bodies, issued in achieving state power. It is intended to reveal that these acts are subject to the legal regime different from that of civil acts of state administration bodies.

Authors within School of Bucharest argued that the name of administrative act evokes just the purpose for which this act is issued, namely the achievement of the administration.

According to Professor Antonie Iorgovan, one may say as well administrative acts, focusing on the idea of activity, in the way that are evoked acts that make public administration, or administrative law acts, emphasizing the idea of applicable legal regime.

It should be noted that art. 52 of the Constitution chooses the idea of an administrative act.

By administrative act shall be meant the main legal form of public administration activity, which consists of a unilateral and express willingness to create, to modify or extinguish rights and obligations, in implementing public power, under the main control of legality of the courts.

Administrative act was defined as unilateral act, expression of will of a single subject of the legal relationship, in this case that endowed with public power, issued by public authorities in order to execute or organize the law, being essentially a legal act, creating, modifying or extinguishing legal relations.

1.2 Forms of termination of the effects of administrative acts – administrative act revocation

Revocation is the legal operation by which the issuing body of an administrative act or its superior body abolishes this act. Revocation is therefore a special case of cancellation, thesis supported mainly by Prof. A. Iorgovan. If the revocation is ordered by the issuing body, it was imposed the term "withdrawal". Although there is no text to explicitly enshrine the principle of revocation, if the judiciary can correct administrative acts, it is normal that this right be owned by the government itself. Admitting that the organizational structure of government is based on certain rules, including administrative hierarchical subordination, the principle of revocability appears as a rule of functional structure of public administration. Some authors have admitted the thesis according to which the objective necessity of revocation leads to the idea according to which public authorities only have to justify this operation, that is the contrary legal act contrary of cancellation. But it must be admitted that the problem of revocation motivation is required when the administrative act created a number of legal relationships other than administrative ones. No less, the rule of contrarius actus requires that the revocation be ordered by an act of at least the same legal force, in compliance with the procedure of issue and in any case, by admitting the possibility of contentious action.

The principle of parallelism of forms

The content of the principle of parallelism of forms (also called of correspondence of forms or reciprocity of forms[12]) is closely linked to that of parallelism of skills[13]. The two principles are so similar, because both establish a link between the initial act and the act of revocation, except that one does it in terms of skills and other in terms of issue formalities. Consequently, according to the principle of parallelism of forms, "the act of revocation must be given with the same forms and conditions that cover the very act whose removal is sought.[14]". So, when an administrative act must be issued under certain forms or accompanied by certain formalities, the act of revocation may not be legal unless it is issued under the same forms and according to the same procedure[15].

French doctrine has emphasized the existence of an important principle under which the Government may find itself obliged to observe certain formalities in issuing acts of revocation, even in the absence of explicit legal provisions in this regard. It is about the general principle of complying with the right of defense, which, under certain conditions, it also applies in the field of administrative revocation[16].

The existence of this principle is closely related to the contradictory principle, which enjoys a full commitment in the activity of courts. But the latter principle has also extended progressively to the Government activity. Administrative procedure requires in some cases the observance of the mentioned principle. The most common such cases are found in civil function and occur especially when an administrative act has the character of a penalty. The civil servant affected by such an act have to be recognized, under the contrary principle, a few rights, such as those by which he should be notified the data of his file, to be given the opportunity to discuss the reasons justifying the measure against him.

It was also noted the fact that the contrary principle should apply whenever the revocation of administrative acts occurs as a sanction against the beneficiary of the act[17]. Such circumstances often arise, for example in connection with the revocation of an act of appointment to a public office, caused by the disciplinary violations by such official[18] or related to the revocation of various permits, whose provisions were not complied with by their beneficiaries. In the absence of legal texts, an appeal should be made to the principle of the defense right, under which recipients of revoked [13] Many times, the principle of parallelism of forms is used in a broad sense, also including the principle of parallelism of skills.

The same author also presents an interesting analysis of meanings that the notion of "form" shows in administrative law, while expressing at the same time: physical form under which administrative act appears, all conditions to be met by the administrative act to be valid; category of administrative acts to which the said act belongs, each characterized by a certain legal value, depending on the place the issuing body occupies in the hierarchy of administrative authorities.

[18] Law no.188/1999 provides a number of safeguards for the public servant liable to be disciplinary sanctioned (including dismissal action). Article 78 paragraph 3 states that "disciplinary sanctions may apply only after a preliminary investigation of the offence committed after the hearing (subl. ns. IB) of the civil servant". Such hearing is an indicative example of warranty provided by law for a better observance of the right to a viewpoint. We note that our discussion focuses only on those situations where the legal text does not provide anything in this regard or has insufficient provisions.

administrative acts should be granted some guarantees[19]. These guarantees are materialized in a series of formalities, which the Government is obliged to observe during the procedure of issuance of the revocation act, such as: informing interested parties about the proposed measure, their hearing, motivation of issued revocation acts.

Although the incidence of the defense right principle in the field of administrative act revocation is confirmed only in the French administrative law, we consider that it requires its application and the Romanian law. Its beneficial effects on the protection of administration recommend it. It should be used whenever the act of revocation has the character of a penalty. In such circumstances and in the silence of the law, the act of revocation shall be subject to additional formalities considering them as guarantees of the compliance with the defense right principle.

Revocation occurs then for all conditions of illegality, but especially for conditions related to opportunity. Grounds for revocation may be prior, simultaneous or subsequent to issuing the administrative act. In the first two hypotheses, the revocation shall produce retroactive, ex tunc effects, and in the third hypothesis, it would produce ex nunc effects.

There is a fairly widespread viewpoint in the specialized literature, according to which the revocation of administrative acts is a particular case, a species of cancellation[20]. In addition, confusion between cancellation and revocation is also produced at the level of legislation[21] and jurisprudence[22]. Such facts seem to discourage any attempt to clear delineation that could be achieved between the two methods. Revocation and cancellation are two totally separate ways from each other, with a completely independent existence, as an author of modern generation asserted, whose theory we shall present below. The main difference lies in the different authors of these transactions, to which is added a significant difference on the reasons that can justify their use.

The holder of privilege for cancellation of administrative acts is easily identifiable, it being expressly stated by the constitutional and legal texts. According to Article 52 paragraph (1) of the Romanian Constitution, "the person injured in any of its rights or in a legitimate interest, by a public authority through an administrative act or by failing to solve an application within the legal term, is Tofan, Administrative Law, vol . II, (Ed. All Beck, Bucharest, 2003), p.58. It should be noted that the terminology used is "special case of nullity" and from the immediate context results that the authors put the equals sign between the cancellation and nulity (being also used the phrase "particular case of cancellation"). We deem that this overlap is not correct, being actually made a confusion between a way to get out of force (cancellation) and a penalty which may affect the provisions of a specific administrative act (nullity). Likewise, O. Podaru, "Lapse of expression of will in the Romanian public law, doctoral dissertation, ("Babes-Bolyai" University of Cluj-Napoca, 2002,) p. 9.

[21] Law no.90/2001 on organization and operation of the Romanian Government and ministries (published in the Official Gazette of Romania, Part I, no. 164 of April 2nd, 2001) contains an interesting provision in Article 28, second paragraph, according to which "in exercising hierarchical control, the Government has the right to cancel illegal or inappropriate administrative acts issued by public authorities subordinated to it, as well as those of the prefects". Since this is an abolition of an administrative act arising from an authority of the Administration, the correct name of this operation would have been, as we shall see below, that of revocation. The same confusion is reflected by GEO no. 194/2002 on the aliens regime in Romania (republished in the Official Gazette of Romania, Part I, no. 201 of March 8th, 2004 and substantially amended by Law nr.56/2007), which, at art. 32 shows that the cancellation and revocation of the Romanian visa (which is an authorization, undoubtedly an administrative act, as is stated in the Article 2 letter (d) can be done by the same administrative authorities (diplomatic missions or consular offices of Romania, the General Directorate of Consular Affairs within the Ministry of Foreign Affairs), the difference between these two operations being that cancellation produces retroactive effects and the revocation produces effects only for the future.

entitled to obtain the recognition of the claimed right or legitimate interest, the annulment of the act and repair of damage". Supplementing this provision to those contained in Article 21 paragraph (1) and Art. 126, paragraph (6) of the same law, but also with the provisions of organic law, namely Law no.554/2004 of administrative court, it clearly results the author of cancellation of an administrative act: court exclusively[23]. If the texts of the Constitution and organic law reserve this terminology to describe the retroactive abolition of administrative act by the courts, we believe this option should be strictly complied with. Consequently, the cancellation of administrative acts must evoke only the dissolution of administrative act by the competent court.

As regards the revocation, there have been some uncertainties regarding the precise determination of the competent authority to rule it. Revocation is a way of abolishing an administrative act whose holder is only the Government.

First, it must be mentioned the numerous legal provisions using the term "revocation" to describe the abolishing of an administrative act by a Government authority. Administrative court law regulates the possibility of revocation of administrative acts only by issuing public authority or the hierarchically superior one. Generally, this fundamental act of administrative law promotes distinction between the revocation and cancellation based on different holders of two ways: the court in case of cancellation, the Government in case of revocation.

Exceptions to the revocability principle - categories of documents:

- ❖ administrative acts declared irrevocable by an express disposition of law;
- ❖ administrative acts of a judicial nature;
- ❖ administrative acts for applying appropriate sanctions for the forms of liability in the administrative law;
- ❖ administrative acts for enforcement of criminal procedural acts;
- ❖ administrative acts giving rise to civil contracts;
- ❖ administrative acts which are issued as a result of the existence of civil contracts;
- ❖ administrative acts giving rise to subjective rights guaranteed by law in terms of stability;
- ❖ administrative acts that have been materially performed.

Exception of administrative acts which give rise to civil contracts concerns the relationship between administrative law and civil law. Civilist thesis states that individual administrative act, which conditions the creation of civil relations, may be revoked until the conclusion of civil contract. But administrative acts giving rise to such contracts are more than just legal conditions of the contract, they continuously conducts the civil law effects. Therefore, such acts will be always subject to revocability principle. The civil law ability of the parties in such cases is subject to administrative law capacity of the body who has issued the document. Professor T. Drăganu supports the thesis of civil law authors, admitting as arguments: the principle of civil law according to which the contract may be terminated only by judicial proceedings and that government body was able to verify the legality and appropriateness of a civil legal relationship when it issued the administrative act. This argument can not cover all categories of administrative acts prior to concluding some civil contracts by individuals. Administrative acts which do not cease their effects upon termination of civil contract remain revocable anytime. These types of contracts are subject to a legal regime controlled by public law, that is a legal regime derogating from the common law, without being exclusively about a power regime. In some cases, civil contract and administrative act form a unity and therefore, any change in the sphere of the administrative conditions of legality of administrative act directly impacts the civil contract. The withdrawal of an assent procedure entails, for example, revocation of the administrative act and consequently, the civil contract termination. The individual which is part in the civil contract, has opened the action in the administrative court against the act of revocation and may request its cancellation and compensation or just compensation. As long as the law provides otherwise, the Government body will have a patrimonial liability for the revocation of administrative act for exclusively opportunity reasons.

[23] It can also be mentioned other regulations which expressly provide the possibility of cancellation of an administrative act by the court. For example Law no. 401/2006 for the approval of GEO no.35/2006 (published in the Official Gazette of Romania, Part I, no. 911 of November 9th, 2006 which provides that "the Competition Council shall request the competent courts to cancel the administrative acts by which ..." . Law no. 95/2006 on Health Reform (published in the Official Gazette of Romania, Part I, no. 372 of May 2nd, 2006), whose art.451 states that "Against the decision of sanctioning the superior discipline commission, within 15 days from notification, the sanctioned doctor may institute an action of repeal at the administrative department of the court in whose jurisdiction it operates." Law no. 360/2002 on the policeman statute (published in the Official Gazette of Romania, Part I, No. 440 of the 24th June 2002): "policeman who is unsatisfied by the sanction applied may appeal the administrative court, requesting the cancellation or amendment, where appropriate, of sanctioning order or disposition "(art. 61 paragraph 3).

Exemption from revocability principle of administrative acts issued based on a prior civil contract. This time, administrative legal regime is made available to the parties by a contract, its effects being attached to those of the contract. In this case, the administrative act is a legal instrument, strictly necessary to fulfill the contract and revocation of the administrative act would be similar to a termination of the contract. Administrative act can not be abolished in its legal existence, except once with the contract and on the means provided by law for this purpose, but not by revocation of the administrative body.

Exemption of administrative acts which gave rise to a subjective right is guaranteed by law through stability. These acts are irrevocable and are divided into two categories, as the subjective right occurs in the sphere of an administrative legal relationship (eg. birth certificates), as well as a civil one. In case of civil subjective rights, the law understood to give them a special protection, except for the administrative act underlying them, from the revocability principle, because they require the recipient's engaging to substantial expenses. It would be unfair that the administrative body revoke the act after performing such expenses. But not every administrative act creating subjective rights is irrevocable, the act acquires such character only when the subjective right which it generated is protected by law so effectively that, from its content or its purpose results that it understood to deprive the administrative body from the possibility of dismembering it.

Exemption of acts that have been materially made. The most common administrative acts within the scope of this category are authorizations, giving rise to subjective rights that are not specially protected. For example, our law protects residential construction made without permits, which can not be demolished except by an authorization document, issued by municipalities or prefectures. This category of exceptions regards only individual administrative acts that are carried out materially by means of an operation (action) or several specific operations. In this category do not fall those administrative acts that are made by actions or inactions on a continuing basis (for example the authorization for the exercise of a job). Such documents are revocable, because the rights and obligations of the beneficiary of act require continuing and successive operations. It's about free permits, which, being given on a basis of a right of appraisal of the government body, are precarious and revocable by definition. Beneficiary of such permit, as well as parts of civil contracts conducted by an administrative act, have assumed the risk of some damages when requesting authorization, as well as conclusion of the contract and thus it cannot be invoked the issue of patrimonial liability of the government bodies. The injured party has the way open for submitting an action to the administrative court, as well as for an indemnification action, according to common law.

Finally, we stress once again that "This principle of revocability[24] of administrative derives from the Constitution and Administrative Litigation Law, no.554/2004[25]. Although in the Romanian Constitution, it is not expressly regulated, however it derives from the corroboration of several articles: 52, 21, 126, etc."

"Regarding the reflection of legality principle into the European legislation, we mention that, at European level, there is the right to a good administration[26] in operation of public authorities.

The right to a good administration is laid down in the EU[27] Charter of Fundamental Rights proclaimed within Nice Summit in December 2000, but also in the European Code[28] of Good Administrative Conduct approved by Parliament on the 6th of September 2001 and currently it serves as a guide and source[29] of information for the staff of all Community institutions and bodies. "

This study aimed at highlighting the importance of the concept of revocation, as a specific form of termination of effects for administrative law.

There were thus spotlighted the implications of revocation, the authorities who have the jurisdiction to pronounce it, effects produced in the legal circuit, and in synthesis were presented exceptions to the revocability principle, just to emphasize the importance of the concept of revocation in administrative law. We hope that this analysis will be useful to specialists in administrative law by trying to highlight all the characteristic notes of this institution.

THE INFLUENCE OF THE CONSTITUTIONAL JURISDICTIONS ON THE BASIC LAWS

VALENTINA BĂRBĂȚEANU*

Abstract
This paper intends to reveal the role played by the constitutional courts or other bodies entitled to perform the constitutional review of normative acts in enhancing the significance of the National Basic Laws and in developing their content. The research will try to show that the case-law created by the constitutional jurisdictions can shape the perception of the society on the Basic Law, offering a different perspective over its meaning. This is the effect of the interpretation of the Basic Law provisions, which is an inherent part of the constitutional jurisdictions' activity.

Keywords: basic Law, supremacy, constitutional review, constitutional courts, amending of the Constitution

1. Introduction

Constitutional jurisdictions are entitled to perform the constitutional review of normative acts. In order to do that, the constitutional judge has to evaluate the wording of the contested legal provision and, in the same time, the significance of the constitutional rules comprised in the Basic Laws which serve as benchmarks for the comparison. So, the interpretation of the Constitution is an inherent operation of the constitutional review. It has the potential to enhance its significance and to offer the efficiency required by the supreme character of the Basic Law. Due to the legal binding force of this interpretation, the content of the Basic Law is sometimes expanded and magnified. The constitutional jurisdictions case-law is taken into consideration especially by the legislative bodies that have the legitimacy to amend the Constitutions. The paper will study how different constitutional jurisdictions are involved in the process of supplementing the provisions of the national Basic Laws, with a special look to France, Germany, Italy and Spain. The comparative study includes Romania, as well, and analyzes to what extent the Constitutional Court has the possibility to improve the Romanian Basic Law and to make its provisions more protective for the citizens, for their fundamental rights and liberties.

The present study has been inspired by the recent idea that the traditional concept of "negative legislator" established by Hans Kelsen regarding the impossibility of constitutional jurisdictions to modify the reviewed normative act has to be reconsidered. This affirmation is proved by the increasing activism of various Constitutional courts. One of the most incisive study has been accomplished by Christian Behrendt[1]. It has been drafted from the point of view of the reviewed normative acts which can be supplemented this way. The present study tries to highlight the influence of the constitutional case-law on the Basic Law itself.

2. Overview of the legal theory concerning the supremacy of the Basic Law

Every state's legal system consists of a sequence of legal norms that spring one from another, organized in a pyramidal structure where the superior norms regulate the product of the inferior norms. This spatial image has been suggested by Hans Kelsen, the founder of the normative school of law in Wien. According to his theory, the unity and stability of this edifice is due to the interrelation established among its elements. More precisely, on the fact that the validity of a norm is based on the validity of the norm that regulated its creation and which, at its turn, has been generated by another norm. In other words, the validity ground of a legal norm lies in the positive superior norm that regulates its producing.

This concatenation has the supreme reason of validity in a hypothetical fundamental norm: the so-called Grundnorm on which is based the entire system[2] and ensures an adequate balance to the whole juridical edifice. This basic law is the Constitution of one state and represents the primordial source of every legal norm. Within the legal state's order, the Constitution has the highest position in the positive law, meaning the actual, vivid law, which is in force in a certain state, in a certain period of time[3].

The supremacy of the Constitution is a complex concept, which incorporates a range of specific features and elements and a diversity of political and legal values which express its prevalence not only in the legal system, but also in the whole social and political system of a state[4]. The essential consequence of the supremacy of the Constitution is the compulsory compliance of each and every legal norm with the constitutional provisions. Any deviation from its prescriptions has as a result the invalidation of the named legal norms[5].

This supreme character has been raised to the rank of a basic, fundamental rule, being, in most of the cases, specified in the constitutional content itself[6].

3. The importance of the constitutional review

The respect of the Basic Law's provisions and its supremacy is a duty that incumbes to all individuals, legal persons - private or public - and to all authorities, regardless of the field of activity. That is why it appeared the necessity of imposing an efficient control system in what concerns its observance. This mechanism resides in reviewing the conformity of the normative acts with the provisions and principles comprised in the Constitution. Thus, the constitutional review represents an effective guarantee of the supremacy of the Constitution.

The constitutional review is circumscribed to two models that are governing to different types of constitutional jurisdictions. On one hand, there is the so called „American model", typical for the United States of America and adopted also by countries like Denmark, Greece, Norway or Sweden. This kind of review is performed by courts which are part of the judiciary. On the other hand, there is the „European model", characterized by the existence of a specialized authority, distinct and detached of any other public authority. Hans Kelsen has developed this concept. The model he promoted had the advantage to prevent two major shortcomings of the American model: the fact that different courts could render divergent solutions over the same legal provision and the relative value of the judgements which had only inter partes litigantes effects. Setting up a unique constitutional court that could centralize the whole constitutional review and which could materialize its assessing in a generally binding decision regarding the validity of a normative act represented a viable idea, which has been extended, in time, at a European level[7].

[7] As a matter of fact, Hans Kelsen was the one who, based on the Austrian Basic Law of 1920, has the most significant contribution to the establishment of the Constitutional Court of Austria. He has also been member of the Court between 1920 and 1929.

Louis Favoreu offered a revealing definition of this kind of authority: „A constitutional court is a jurisdiction especially and exclusively invested with the constitutional contentious issues, which is situated outside the ordinary jurisdiction and completely independent"[8].

As the famous professor noticed, the history of constitutional courts build on the European model is not very long. It began in 1920 with the establishment of the Czech Constitutional Court (by the Constitution of the 29th of February 1920) and of the High Constitutional Court of Austria (by the Constitution of the 1st of October 1920). The Spain Constitution of 1931 has created a Tribunal of Constitutional Guarantees which would last until the beginning of the general Franco's dictatorship. There is a second stage, situated after the Second World War: after the re-establishment of the Austrian Court in 1945, Constitutional Court of Italy has been founded in 1948 and the German Federal Constitutional Court in 1949. A few years later, in 1959, appeared the French Constitutional Council and then the Constitutional Court of Turkey in 1961. A third stage took place in the first years of the 70's and included the creation of the Portuguese and Spanish Constitutional Tribunal in 1976 and, respectively, in 1978. This movement extended in Belgium where has been founded La Cour d'Arbitrage in 1983 and had a great development in the Eastern European countries: Poland (1985), Hungary (1989), Czech Republic (1991), Romania (1991), Bulgaria (1991) and the ex-soviet republics (Moldova, Belarus, Armenia, Georgia etc).[9]

The Romanian Constitutional Court has been established by the provisions of the 1991 Constitution and it is the guarantor for the supremacy of the Constitution. The need of such an institution in the Romanian juridical landscape has been confirmed by the experience of the European countries having a much stronger constitutional tradition.

In most European countries, the constitutional courts - a general name for the bodies that perform the review of constitutionality, no matter if they are courts, constitutional tribunals or constitutional councils – are not part of the judiciary, stricto sensu. Their place in the constitutional ensemble of the state is different of the one hold by the ordinary or administrative courts. Many of them are sui generis court, opposite to the other three traditional authorities – legislative, executive and judicial. Only in isolated cases they are part of the judiciary, being juxtaposed to other state powers, including the highest courts.[10]

The constitutional review is a creative task and the constitutional judge has a much wider ability than the ordinary judge in what concerns the possibility to enrich the significance of legal provisions by means of interpretation and, most important, they are not bound to the inflexible application of the law[11].

Instead of being "negative legislators" as Hans Kelsen defined them, the constitutional courts are slightly turning into a positive legislators or, at least, co-legislators.[12] Relevant in this respect is the case of Italy, Hungary or Portugal, countries where the constitutional authorities are entitled to review also legislative omissions of normative acts submitted to their jurisdiction.[13]

4. The impact of the constitutional review on the Basic Law

In order to perform the constitutional review, the constitutional courts extract the correct meaning not only of the checked legal provisions and also of the text of the Constitution to which the conformity of the norm is compared. Within the decision, the constitutional court offers an interpretation of the significance of their content. It has the ability to clarify their sense, in a manner suitable to shape a certain view regarding its approaching, to linger into the society a certain way of thinking, but also to facilitate the perception of their normative content. Starting from the remark of two famous constitutional scholars, according to whom "the interpreter of the law has a legislative power and the interpreter of the constitution has a constituent power"[14], there might be taken into consideration the creative valences of the constitutional courts case-law. There are also some scholars who affirmed that revealing the significance of the interpreted constitutional norm represents an act of creation and is the result of a cognitive process of evaluation of the meaning of the interpreted norm. One can say that the constitutional judge re-creates the norm in the specific circumstances of the situation referred to its jurisdiction[15]. From this point of view, the constitutional judge sometimes reshapes the content of the Basic Law, offering a new perspective over its provisions. The constitutional judge notices its deficiencies and resorts to the classical fundamental principles of law in order to establish the bench-marks necessary to perform the constitutional review.

For instance, in Romania, prior to the amendment of the Basic Law in 2003, the Constitutional Court has acknowledge by praetorian way the principle of check and balance of the powers[16] and the principle of the fair trial[17]. These have not been included in terminis in the 1991 Constitution. Still, the Constitutional Court has oftenly mentioned them in its decisions and they have been explicitly inserted in the amended Constitution[18]. In this respect, the Constitutional Court of Romania has acted in a similar way with other European constitutional courts which, on their turn, during their activity, have felt the need of innovation in what concerns the content of national Basic Law itself.

The German case could be suggestive in this regard, taking into consideration the fact that expressions like „the objective order of the fundamental rights values" (objective Wertordnung der Grundrechte), "the principle of proportionality" (Verhältnismassigkeits-prinzip), „effectiveness of the fundamental rights" (Grundrechtseffektuierung) do not appear in the wording of the German Basic Law, but they are the creation of the German Federal Constitutional Court which gave them constitutional value[19].

France also offers a relevant example in this regard. Due to the constitutional review, the juridical security became a fundamental legal principle and the Constitutional Council has recognized its effects regarding the foreseeability and the quality of the law. Rendering the decision 2010-4/17 QPC[20], the Council has confirmed the existence of an implicit constitutional value consisting in the intelligibility and accessibility of the law.

There are constitutional benchmarks that can be invoked as grounds for priority preliminary ruling on the issue of constitutionality which can be divided into two categories[21]: some of them refer to the general interest and, in this respect, can be mentioned preservation of public order (Decision

80-127 DC)[22], the benchmark of ensuring continuity of public services (Decision 79-105 DC)[23] or the finding the criminal offenders (Decision 99-411 DC)[24]. The other category includes the constitutional rights concerning the social and economical field, like the right to health, the right to a decent dwelling (Decision 94-359 DC)[25] or the right to employment (affirmed by the 5th paragraph of the 1946 Constitution Preamble. These benchmarks can be used by the French Constitutional Council in order to review a normative act that appears to be contrary to them.

In the same respect, illustrative for the creative potential of the constitutional case-law is the fact that, more recently, the French Constitutional Council has stated that the human dignity represents a constitutional value, even if it is not expressis verbis mentioned in the French Constitution[26].

In a decision which became famous[27], the Constitutional Council has extended its review by reference to the Preamble of the French Constitution of 1958 and to the Declaration of the Rights of Man and of the Citizen of 1789. It is the so-called „block of constitutionality". This decision was the consequence of a previous one[28] which answered two important questions. The first one was if the provisions of the Preamble of the 1958 Constitution have normative value and the second one referred to power of the constitutional Council to assess the conformity of legal acts with the provisions of the Preamble of the Constitution. The answer was affirmative for both questions[29].

There is also in Spain a similar "block of constitutionality" that contains even more referential normative acts having constitutional value. It includes laws issued in order to distinguish between the powers of the State and those of different autonomous communities or in order to regulate and harmonize the powers of the latter. The State's territorial structure is not, in fact, defined only by provisions of the Basic Law[30], but also by frame-laws issued by the State in certain fields, relevant for its competence that provide the guiding lines which has to be respected in drafting the legislation of the autonomous communities.[31]

5. The influence of the Romanian Constitutional Court's case-law on the Romanian Basic Law due to its creative interpretation

Following the stream of thinking created by the constitutional authorities from different European countries, the Constitutional Court of Romania has rendered a series of eloquent decisions in this regard.

5.1. For instance, being asked to rule on whether there is a constitutional legal conflict between some state's authorities[32], the Constitutional Court has clarified the meaning of Article 109 of the Constitution, used an extensive interpretation, able to expand its normative content, but which, in the same time, is not distorting the will of the constituent power. On the contrary, it explains and reveals its genuine goal.

In that case, the Court has found the existence of a legal dispute of a constitutional nature between the Public Ministry – the Prosecution Office attached to the High Court of Cassation and Justice, on the one hand, and the Parliament – Chamber of Deputies and Senate –, on the other hand, in connection with the procedure to be followed for claims relating to the prosecution of members and former members of the Government for acts committed in the exercise of their office and who, at the time of referral, are also Deputies or Senators. The dispute has been generated by the different way of interpreting of the mentioned constitutional provisions. According to Article 109 paragraph 2 of the Basic Law, „Solely the Chamber of Deputies, the Senate, and the President of Romania have the right to demand criminal prosecution be taken against Members of the Government for acts committed in the exercise of their office". Analyzing this constitutional provision, the Constitutional Court assessed «that the term „solely" means that: „no one" other than the three public authorities may require prosecution and that it can not be initiated without referral to the Chamber of Deputies, Senate or the President of Romania, as appropriate. As for the conjunction „and" in the text of Article 109 paragraph 2, it signifies the end of a listing, which gives each of the three authorities it own competence. The constitutional text excludes both the cumulative power of requests of the three public authorities and the alternative power between the three authorities».

Regarding the meaning of this constitutional provision, the Constitutional Court has noticed that "the submission of referral to one of the three authorities to require prosecution can not be preferentially or randomly made by the Public Ministry – the Prosecution Office attached to the High Court of Cassation and Justice" The Court stated that "the solution is varied, depending on his quality of Deputy or Senator at the time of referral". It concluded that, consequently, the Prosecution Office attached to the High Court of Cassation and Justice must address the Chamber of Deputies or the Senate – for members of Government or former members of Government who at the time of referral, are also Deputies or Senators or the President of Romania – for members of Government or former members of Government who at the time of referral, are not also Deputies or Senators.

In this way, it is established, unequivocally, a benchmark according to which the Prosecution Office attached to the High Court of Cassation and Justice is going to refer one of the three public authorities in order to demand the prosecution of members of the Government in office or of former members the Government.

The Constitutional Court has also noted that "otherwise the provisions of Article 109 paragraph 2 first sentence of the Constitution would become inapplicable as concerns the right of the Chamber of Deputies and the Senate to demand prosecution of members and former members of Government who also act as MPs, leaving to the discretion of the Public Ministry to decide, by itself, to which of the three authorities it should address the referral".

5.2. On a different occasion, assessing over the existence of another legal dispute of a constitutional nature[33] the Constitutional Court has used a par analogie interpretation of a constitutional provision and has supplemented it in some way. Upon settlement of the legal dispute raised in the case, the Constitutional Court noticed that it has to give a proper interpretation to the texts of the Basic Law, as to grasp from their letter the spirit that governs the matter.

[33] Decision no.98 din 7 februarie 2008, published in the Official Gazette of Romania, Part I, no.140 of 22nd of February 2008.

In the case, it had to adjudicate on the request for the settlement of the legal dispute of constitutional nature between the President of Romania and the Prime Minister concerning the refusal of the President to appoint Mrs. Norica Nicolai to the office of Minister of Justice and on the legal grounds invoked by the parties.

Article 85 paragraph (2) of the Basic Law does not provide how many times is the President of Romania entitled to ask the Prime Minister to make another proposal or the Prime Minister's obligation to come with a different proposal than the initial one.

The Court stated that it must search the meaning of the rule under Article 85 paragraph (2) of the Constitution both in the letter of this text and in the basic principles and in the spirit of the Basic Law.

Regarding the number of cases in which the President of Romania may ask the Prime Minister to make a different nomination for the vacant office of minister, the Court found that, in order to avoid the occurrence of an institutional blockage in the lawmaking process, the constituent legislator provided under Article 77 paragraph (2) of the Basic Law, the President's right to return a law to Parliament for reconsideration, only once.

The Court found that "this solution acts as a constitutional principle in the settlement of legal disputes between two or several public authorities which have conjoint duties in the adoption of a measure provided by the Basic Law and that this principle can be generally applied in similar cases.

Applied to the process of government reshuffle and appointment of some ministers in case of vacancy of the offices, this solution could eliminate the blockage generated by the possible repeated refusal of the President to appoint a minister at the proposal of the Prime Minister.

[…] The limitation to a sole rejection of the proposal is justified by the fact that, further, the answerability for a different nomination rests exclusively with the Prime Minister.

[…] As in case of all the other prerogatives provided by the Constitution, the President is politically answerable before the electorate for the reasons for which he declined the proposal of the Prime Minister, such as the Prime Minister and the Government are politically answerable before the Parliament.

As concerns the Prime Minister's possibility to reiterate his first proposal, the Court finds that such possibility is excluded by fact that the President of Romania declined the proposal from the beginning. Therefore, the Prime Minister must nominate a different person for the office of minister."

5.3. In another decision[34], the Court has proceeded to an elaborate analyze of the ideas contained in Article 115 paragraph (4) of the Basic Law which comprises the conditions of legislative delegation of power according to which to the Government may adopt an urgency ordinance in the following conditions, met cumulatively: the existence of an exceptional situation; the regulation cannot be delayed; the ordinance must contain the reasons for that urgency. The Court noticed that «beside the trenchant character of the formula used by the constituent legislator, its intention or purpose, consisting in the restriction of the field in which the Government may substitute the Parliament, adopting primary norms for certain reasons which it is sovereign in determining, are clearly underlined by the difference between the constitutional text in force and the previous one, former Article 114 paragraph (4) of the Constitution, in its initial form. According to that text, Government's possibility to adopt urgency ordinances was conditioned exclusively by the existence of certain exceptional cases.

The term „exceptional cases" used in the former wording was replaced, in the new wording, with that of „exceptional situations". Moreover, although the difference between the two terms, from the point of view of the degree of deviation from ordinary or common which they express, is obvious, the same legislator felt that it is necessary to clarify these aspects and not to leave any interpretation that would minimize such difference, by adding the collocation „which call for regulations without delay", enshrining, thus in terminis the imperative of the regulation urgency.

Finally, for reasons of legislative rigor, it instituted the exigency on the statement of the reasons for the urgency in the very content of the ordinance adopted outside a law of delegation.

Even under the empire of the previous constitutional regulation in the matter, the Court, referring to the exceptional case, of which was depending the constitutional legitimacy of the adoption of an urgency ordinance, was stating that this is defined in relation with „the necessity and urgency of the regulation of a situation which, because of exceptional circumstances, imposed the adoption of immediate solutions, in order to avoid a serious breach of the public interest"[35]. For the same purpose, of a better defining of the exceptional case, the Court mentioned this is characterized by its objective character, „in the sense that its existence does not depend on the Government's will, which, in such circumstances is compelled to react promptly in order to defend a public interest by urgency ordinance"[36].

The aspects stated by the Court in this matter, under the empire of the previous constitutional regulation, as a result of a interpretation that was transgressing the letter of the constitutional text, underlying its meaning in light of the intention of the constituent legislator and of the purpose, as well by using certain principles and constants of the law, are even more pertinent, today, if we have in view the fact that the viewpoint present has full support precisely in the letter of the constitutional regulation of reference, in its present wording.

The Court's influence over the legislator's activity is obvious in this kind of situations. When upholds the unconstitutionality of an urgency ordinance on the ground of the lack of sufficient reasoning of the urgency and on the failing in proving the necessity of such regulation, the Court invalidated, on utility grounds, the normative acts. In the same fore/mentioned decision[37], the Court held that in the preamble of the urgency ordinance approved through the criticized law, the urgency character is determined by the opportunity of identifying shortly a rational and long lasting situation for assuring the necessary means for the preservation, restoration and maintenance of the national, cultural and religious patrimony of Suceava county, issue that concerns the social interest and that constitutes exceptional situation.

The reproduced text underlines the reason and the utility of this regulation, but not the existence of an exceptional situation which regulation cannot be delayed, which it proclaims, without setting forth the reasons, as requested by the constitutional text.

Or, "invoking the element of opportunity, subjective by definition, to which is conferred a determinant contributing efficiency of the urgency, which, implicitly, converts it in exceptional situation, leads to the conclusion that it does not have, necessarily and unequivocally, an objective character, but it can give expression also to certain subjective factors, of opportunity, in which account, moreover, this regulation was adopted by means of ordinance. But as such factors are quantifiable, the affirmation of the existence of the exceptional situation, in their account or by converting them in such situation, confers it an arbitrary character, which would create insurmountable difficulties in the legitimacy of the legislative delegation. Thus, we would find ourselves in the situation in which a constitutionality criterion – the exceptional case –, which observance is by definition submitted to Court's review, to be, practically, not control as such, which would be inadmissible.

6. The influence of the constitutional courts' case-law in the case of revision of the Basic Law

6.1. Some constitutional courts of some countries, like Moldova, Ukraine, Romania or Turkey, are expressly empowered to review the constitutional amendments.

[37] Decizia nr. 255 din 11 mai 2005.

Others, like the German Constitutional Court, held that it can review the conformity of constitutional amendments with the substantial limits expressly written in the text of the Constitution[38].

Even if the constitutional review of Basic Law amendments is not listed among the powers granted by the Italian Constitution to the Italian Constitutional Court, the constitutional jurisdiction in this country has stated that it has the ability to check the compliance of procedural conditions required by Article 138 of the Basic Law for adopting constitutional laws[39]. Moreover, considering that the Basic Law contains "supreme principles" which has to be also respected on the occasion of amending the Basic Law, the Constitutional Court of Italy has verified the substance of the amendments[40].

On the contrary, the French Constitutional Council has chosen a different approach, adopting a self restraining attitude regarding the sovereign constituent legislator[41].

The Constitutional Court of Romania is one of the few constitutional authorities in the world that is empowered by the Basic Law's provision to perform the constitutional review over the constitutional amendments. The constituent power has offered to the Constitutional Court the opportunity to render valuable judgements meant to guide the Parliament in what concerns the drafting of proper amendments to the Basic Law. The new draft has to suit the level of democracy to which the Romanian State is making for, the present stage of European political development. This is the reason why the opinion of the Court expressed in its decisions has to found a reflection in the new drafting of the amended Constitution, Such a conclusion is the logical consequence of the role of the Constitutional as a guarantor of the supremacy of the Constitution.

The Constitutional Court has rendered several decisions based on this power and, every time, has expressed various critical remarks regarding the legislative project of amending the Basic Law. Some of the suggested solutions, meant to correct the deficiencies of the draft will be presented in the followings.

6.2. The contribution of the Romanian Constitutional Court at the improvement of the Romanian Basic Law on the occasion of its revision in 2003[42]

Assessing over the suggestion contained in the project regarding the right to the private property, the Court noticed that after the provision of Article 41 Paragraph 7 that provides that "Lawfully acquired assets shall not be confiscated. Lawfulness of acquirement shall be presumed" there has been inserted a new paragraph in which circumstantiates this presumption and establishes that it is not applied for "any goods intended for, used or resulting from a criminal or administrative offence".

The Court held that this wording could be criticized and that it might lead to confusions. Thus, if the text meant to permit the confiscation of the goods acquired lawfully, but which was based on a quantity of money results from criminal offences, its wording was inappropriate. From the wording of the newly introduced Paragraph (7^1) resulted that it meant the reverse burden of proof on the licit character of the assets, being provided the illicit character of the goods acquired through the capitalisation of the incomes resulted from criminal offences.

The Court has reminded its own previous case-law adjudicated by Decision no.85 of September 3rd 1996, published in the Official Gazette of Romania, Part I, no.211 of September 6th [42] Decision no.148 of the 16th of April 2003, published in the Official Gazzette of Romania, no.317 of the 12th of May 2003.

1996, occasion in which was stated that the juridical security of the right to property over goods that constitute wealth of a person is indissolubly connected of the presumption of the lawfully acquiring of the goods. The Court has underlined that the removal of this presumption has the significance of the suppression of a constitutional guarantee of the right to property, which is contrary to the provisions of Article 148 paragraph (2) of the Constitution. Therefore, the objective aimed on this way is unconstitutional.

Reexamining the project of amending law, the Parliament took into consideration the Courts conclusion and has kept untouched the presumption of lawfully acquired of the assets.

Nevertheless, only eight years after, the same issue has been raised again and the idea of rejecting this presumption reappeared in the contemporary political landscape[43]. The latest revision project of the Basic Law completely eliminated the fore-mentioned presumption. Consistent with its own case-law, the Court stated[44] that such a provision is unconstitutional.

The role played by the Court in the process of genesis of law and, in particular, of the Basic Law is also underlined by another idea contained in the Decision no.148 of 2003. The Court has sanctioned the legislative technique shortcomings contained in the body of Article 19 paragraph 1 of the Basic Law, namely its inner antinomical structure: in the first thesis is alleged Romanian citizen's right not to be extradited or expelled. Instead, in the second thesis is alleged the contrary, namely that Romanian citizens may be extradited based on the international agreements Romania is a party to, according to the law and on reciprocity basis, which reflects a wording fault/deficiency.

Following this remark, the Parliament has corrected the deficient drafting, introducing the possibility of extradition of the Romanian citizens only as an exceptional provision, on the grounds of reciprocity, based on the international treaties to which Romania is a party.

It is to be noticed also the Parliament's reluctance in taking into consideration of some suggestions expressed by the Constitutional Court which were meant to improve the normative content of the Basic Law. For instance, regarding the educational system in Romania, the Court has noticed that, according to the new wording of the provisions under Article 32 paragraph (5) the education may be carried out in State or private establishments, thus being instituted a dichotomy specific to the most profound legal constructions. The Court has stated that the insertion of this new criterion, the confessional one, is not connected with the dichotomy logic, adding to a logical criterion a new determination, inadmissible by the fact that it can be found in the two, defined in the present by the Constitution. Thus, confessional education neither is excluded from the private nor from the state education. Therefore, there is a confessional education both private and public, which justifies the amendment, under this aspect, of the Basic Law. The Court considered that the examined norm would have become coherent if the logical pair of confessional, respectively lay education is inserted in the text submitted for revision. Thus, the new constitutional text would have provide that education of all levels may be lay or religious and conducted in Stat or private institutions, according to the law.

Despite the lack of coherence highlighted by the Court, the Parliament has ignored the correction suggested by the Court[45].

6.3. The constitutional review of the legislative proposal for the revision of the Constitution of Romania in 2011

Assessing ex oficio on the recent initiative of amending the Basic Law, the Romanian Constitutional Court has rendered the Decision nr.799 din 17 iunie 2011[46] and has drawn a series of recommendations which represent, in fact, genuine proposals of amending the Basic Law.

The suggestion concerned the national minorities right to identity, the State's liability for damages caused by judicial errors, the Parliament's Standing Orders, the fields regulated by organic laws, conditions for the nomination and removal from the office of the members of the Government, the conditions for organizing the referendum, the narrowing the possibility of assuming by the Government of responsibility before the Senat and the Deputy Chamber, legal disputes of a constitutional nature between public authorities

We shall see to what extent the Parliament will take into consideration the Courts opinions. It is to be noted that one of the solution rendered by the Court in a previous decision[47] has been inserted in the constitutional provisions, the constitutional norm prescribing that the President of Romania has not only the power to award decorations and titles of honor, but also to withdraw it.

7. Conclusions

The present study has been oriented on the revealing of creative potential of the constitutional jurisdictions case-law, especially in what concerns their possibility of intervening on the normative content of the Basic Law. The importance of the task performed by the constitutional courts is undeniable and the fact that the have a positive influence on the constitutional provisions should consolidate their authority in the State's institutional architecture. This potentially quasi-legislative power does not interfere with the sovereign power of the Parliaments or other similar legislative bodies to elaborate normative acts. That's because one of the most important goals of constitutional courts is to ensure the balance among the state's legislative, executive and judicial authorities. On the contrary, it has softens the conflicts and stimulates the fruitful collaboration among the states' authorities.

THE ASYLUM, BETWEEN HUMANITARIAN RESPONSE AND POLITICAL INSTRUMENT

CATRINEL BRUMAR*

Abstract

At 9 November 2010, the European Court of Justice, in a preliminary ruling, decided to depart from the interpretation promoted by the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees, in the matter of the application of the exclusion clauses. The European Court considered that no proportionality test between human rights protection and gravity of a crime is to be applied in the case of a person suspected of having committed an act contrary to the principles and purposes of the United Nations. By eliminating this test, the Court is sending a signal on rethinking the asylum institution, from a humanitarian tool that it became, to a political instrument. This decision could not be read alone; corroborated to the concerns already raised on the suitable use of the asylum instrument to address massive humanitarian needs, it would indicate a reorientation in the interpretation of international norms governing the refugee law.

Still, the human rights organs and the European Court of Human Rights continue to refer to the asylum as a situation where a humanitarian perspective, reflected in the proportionality test, or for those mechanisms the risk of human rights violation probability test, is still valid. The two apparently divergent directions will need to converge in the implementation of the European Union regulations on asylum.

This paper is exploring the possible reinterpretation of the European norms, trying to identify the new trends in the political perspective of asylum and the limitations to these trends that the respect for human rights is establishing.

Keywords*: refugee status, serious non political crime, act contrary to the purposes and objectives of the United Nations, proportionality considerations, preliminary ruling*

1. Introduction

The refugee law is in quest of a redefinition. The last twenty years have shown that the humanitarian perspective, reflected primary in the work of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees, although very appreciated, is not succeeding in coping with, on one hand, the massive influx of refugees which do not always fulfill the criteria set down in the Convention Relating to the Status of Refugees, signed in Geneva on 28 July 1951 (here after "the Geneva Convention") and on the other hand with the restrictions imposed by the immigration regulations. The development of human rights law had a major impact on the interpretation and application of the refugee definition, extending it as far as the notion of discrimination and the standard of protection from the State of origin are concerned, but also weakening its political dimension. Against this background, new theories immerged, trying to rediscover the essence of asylum as refugee protection and to clarify its relation with the humanitarian approach[1].

This rediscover also determines a reinterpretation of the exclusion clauses, i.e. those provisions in the Geneva Convention that are establishing the persons who, although having a well-founded fear of persecution, are undeserving of international protection because they committed certain acts that show the are unworthy, undignified of such a response from a State.

Traditionally, the application of the exclusion clauses were conditional, at least in part, by the performance of a proportionality test; a person fulfilling the criteria laid down in Geneva Convention would not be excluded from being a refugee if his or her need form protection overweighs the need to sanction the acts committed.

However, if one is approaching the refugee concept from a political perspective, the humanitarian considerations in the application of the exclusion clauses are no longer justified.

This trend seems to be adopted by the European Court of Justice in its recent case-law; in the context of the development of an European asylum law, where the European Court will play a major role as the only institution with the authority to interpret European Union regulations, it is clear that the direction she is offering is essential for all the Member States.

2. The context: factual background and questions referred

The judgment rendered on November 9th by the European Court of Justice in the cases Bundesrepublik Deutschland against B and D (joined cases C-57/09 and C-101/09)[2] was issued in a preliminary ruling proceeding generated by the German Federal Administrative Court, who asked the European Court to clarify the interpretation of the exclusion clauses from the refugee status, as stipulated by the Council Directive 2004/83/EC of 29 April 2004 on minimum standards for the qualification and status of third country nationals or stateless persons as refugees or as persons who otherwise need international protection and the content of the protection granted (hereafter "Directive 2004/83"), in its article 12.

This European piece of secondary legislation had the aim of ensuring that Member States apply common criteria for the identification of persons genuinely in need of international protection and of guiding the competent national bodies of Member States in the application of the Convention Relating to the Status of Refugees, signed in Geneva on 28 July 1951.

According to its article 12, a person is disqualified from being a refugee where there are serious reasons for considering that, inter alia, he or she has committed a serious non-political crime outside the country of refuge prior to his or her admission as a refugee; or he or she has been guilty of acts contrary to the purposes and principles of the United Nations as set out in the Preamble and Articles 1 and 2 of the Charter of the United Nations[3].The questions referred to the European Court aimed at a clarification of the notion of a "serious non-political crime" and of an "act contrary to the purposes and principles of the United Nations", in order to determine if the participation as a member in an organization listed as a terrorist one could be qualified as entering into one of the two categories of deeds excluding the person from being a refugee; they were also requesting a response on the application of a proportionality test between the seriousness of the crime, and therefore the need to condemn it and its perpetrator, and the risk faced by the person if disqualified from being a refugee. Thirdly, the questions referred to the European Court were enquiring over the place, in the application of the proportionality test, of the existence in the national legal system, of protection against deportation under the prohibition of torture and other ill treatments rule.

The questions raised in fact some interesting issues relating to, on the one hand, the value of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees guide on implementation of the Geneva Convention and if this body's practice would be a source of inspiration for the European Court as it has been, for almost 35 five years for the national courts and, on the other hand, on the character of asylum, understood as protection for the refugees.

[3] Article 12 is also stipulating that a person is excluded from being a refugee if there are serious reasons to consider that he or she has committed crimes against peace or security, but this hypothesis is outside the scope of the present study.

The German authorities seemed to have difficulties in determining whether, from the perspective of the European law, persons that belonged to organizations listed as terrorist were to be excluded from being a refugee; in fact, the lower German courts considered that an asylum seeker should not be excluded from being a refugee without a proper application of the proportionality test, even if he or she had committed, before being admitted on the German territory, a serious non-political crime. The two applicants in the domestic procedures were former members of organizations listed as terrorist in accordance with Common Position 2001/931/CFSP on the application of specific measures to combat terrorism[4].

The request for asylum filled by the first applicant, B., was rejected as he confessed that as a schoolboy he had been a sympathizer of the Revolutionary People's Liberation Army/Front/Party (DHKP/C). Engaged in guerilla fighting for this organization in the period between 1993 and 1995, he was arrested and sentenced to life imprisonment, after giving statements under torture. While in prison, he was again sentenced to life imprisonment for the killing of a fellow prisoner. Released from custody on heath grounds, he left Turkey and entered Germany.

The second case was generated by the decision of German authorities to revoke the status of refugee, previously recognized to D., a former guerrilla fighter for the Kurdistan Workers' Party and one of its senior officials. He was a member of this organization since 1990, but in 2000, following some political differences with other leaders, he decided to leave the organization.

Two preliminary remarks are worth making in connection to these cases: the first one is related to the qualification of their conduct by the domestic jurisdictions as serious non-political crimes; the second remark concerns the demarche of the Federal Administrative Court (the instance that requested the preliminary ruling of the European Court): although this tribunal is acknowledging the fact it is bound by the findings of the lower courts, nevertheless, it is requesting the European Court to clarify if the conduct of the applicants is a serious non-political crime or an act contrary to the purposes and principles of the United Nations.

The relevant rules of international law at the time of the judgment

As mentioned in the previous sections of this article, the Geneva Convention represents the cornerstone of the international legal regime for the protection of refugees. In fact, as recognized by the European legislation, the Geneva Convention represents both the source of inspiration but also the goal, as the Directive 2004/83 sets as objective to achieve a common application of the criteria for the identification of persons genuinely in need of international protection. Against this background, it is useful to recall the main rules regarding the exclusion of certain persons from being refugees, on account of their conduct that makes them undeserving of international protection. According to article 1 F of the Geneva Convention, 'the provisions of this Convention shall not apply to any person with respect to whom there are serious reasons for considering that:

(a) he has committed a crime against peace, a war crime, or a crime against humanity, as defined in the international instruments drawn up to make provisionin respect of such crimes;

(b) He has committed a serious non-political crime outside the country of refuge prior to his admission to that country as a refugee;

(c) He has been guilty of acts contrary to the purposes and principles of the United Nations.'

The first hypothesis is of no interest for the present study; the other two are invoked in the European Court's ruling and therefore deserve our attention. The intention of the drafters of the Convention was to ensure that important fugitives from justice are not able to avoid the jurisdiction of a state in which they may lawfully face punishment [5] . As far as the exclusion clause relating to the perpetration of a serious non political crime is concerned, it is to be noted that not all the extraditable offences were to be considered serious; although no list, exemplificative or exhaustive was drawn up, the drafters were determined to exclude the offences punishable by three months' imprisonment and referred to capital crimes [6] as being covered by the exclusion clause. It is also interesting to note in connection to this exclusion clause, that its application is only possible if the punishment faced by the asylum seeker were to be or would be applied in a non discriminatory way and that receiving States are not to ignore the risk that would be done by returning the claimant to face prosecution or punishment[7] or, in other words "the well-founded fear of persecution".

The United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees has, over the years, and in the fulfilling the task of supervising the application of the provisions of the Geneva Convention, issued series of Background Notes and Guidelines on the interpretation to be given to the conventional norms. Its task was truly remarkable taking into consideration the fact that the Geneva Convention is international in the affirmation of the refugee status, but essentially national in its application. Therefore, the role of the High Commissioner was to ensure as broad uniformity as possible in the application, by domestic authorities and courts, of the disposition of the Convention. And to combat the risk of very divergent interpretation on the notion of a refugee, it even elaborated a Handbook on Procedures and Criteria for Determining Refugee Status under the 1951 Convention[8].

With respect to the exclusion clause for the commission of a serious non-political crime, the UNHCR firstly pointed out the offences that would attain the level of seriousness: crimes against the physical integrity of a person, crimes committed through the use of violence. The traditional interpretation of the UNHCR would place terrorist acts under this exclusion clause, as the alleged political objective of such acts is clearly annihilated by the violence of means and no longer predominant. The other exclusion clause of interest to this study refers to the commission of an act contrary to the purposes and objectives of the United Nations. Although there was agreement for the inclusion of this clause in the draft of the Convention, the reasons behind it were very diverse and confusing: some representatives limited its application to war collaborators in the Second World War or to acts similar to the gravity of war crimes, while others thought of it as a prohibition for refugees to engage in activities contrary to the country of origin. Another suggestion for the understanding of this clause refers to the commission of acts such as racial discrimination or denial of the right of self-determination.

As the terms of the purposes and objective are general and vague, the UNHCR recommended careful and narrow consideration of this exclusion clause. As the Charter of the United Nations bounds States, in principle only persons in positions of power would appear capable of committing such acts[9]. Still, the discussion is left open for the cases involving a terrorist act.

From the language of the 1951 Geneva Convention, it would appear that the application of the exclusion clauses is mandatory ("the provisions shall not apply"). Commenting on the proportionality considerations, the UNHCR in its analysis, is invoking the humanitarian object and purpose of the Convention to justify the necessity of assessing the respect for human rights in the application of the exclusion clauses. In the words of the UNHCR "as with any exception to a human rights guarantee, the exclusion clauses must therefore be applied in a manner proportionate to their objective, so that the gravity of the offence in question is weighed against the consequences of exclusion. Such a proportionality analysis would, however, not normally be required in the case of crimes against peace, crimes against humanity and acts falling under article 1F(c), as the acts covered are so heinous."[10]

Several consequences are to be drawn from the drafters' intention and the UNHCR interpretation. Firstly, although the terms of the Convention would support a mandatory application of the exclusion clauses (that is, any person having committed such acts should not recognize as a refugee), in fact, their application is subject, to a wider or narrower degree, to a proportionality test. This test would allow striking a fair balance between the seriousness of the crime and the need to see it punished and the risk the person is facing. It is to be noted that the result of the proportionality test would be either the revocation or cancellation or non-recognition of the refugee status or the maintenance or recognition of this status.

This is important to underline, because the proportionality test is similar to the one applied by the human rights organs in deciding if a measure restricting the exercise of a right represents a legitimate interference or a violation of that right. Still, its consequences in the field of refugees' protection go beyond the simple avoidance of a violation to someone's rights. A person who committed a serious non-political crime would face an inhuman punishment or an unfair trial. Two possibilities are opened to a receiving State at that point, according to the domestic practice: either to have recourse to proportionality considerations, either to consider that such a punishment or trial represents a violation of a human right so they should be dealt with from the human rights perspective. However, the consequences are not the same and therefore the two possibilities should not be seen as excluding each other, but as complementary, the second one being activated if the first one would lead to the exclusion from being a refugee. As to the consequences, the application of proportionality considerations would result in the maintenance of the refugee status, with all the rights it confers and with the guarantee of non-refoulement that is more protective that that prohibition to return under human rights law. In fact, in refugee law, the existence of a threat to the life or freedom of a person on account of race, religion, nationality, political opinion or membership to a particular social group is prohibiting any measure of expulsion or return: under human rights law, the individual must prove a real risk and concrete risk of being subjected to ill treatment[11].

The automatic exclusion, on the ground that the person is protected under human rights law, would simply mean the prohibition to expel or return, without any particular statue being afforded to that person; besides, the threshold of proof is higher that refugees' non-refoulement. Only a probability of individual application would stay the execution of the return measure.

Secondly, in general the test would apply only in connection with the perpetration of serious non-political crimes; still, although normally excluded from the application in the other hypothesis, the test is not completely ignored; in some extraordinary cases, the UNHCR applied the test even when crimes against humanity were committed[12]. We consider that this application is justified by the fact that the status determination officer and even the domestic courts dealing with the exclusion clauses are not criminal tribunal and their evaluation does not attain the strictness of a criminal procedure. It follows that the individual would be found "guilty" outside the normal guarantees of a penal procedure.

Thirdly, it is not definitively agreed as to the qualification of the terrorist acts, if they would fall under the "serious non-political crime" notion or the "acts contrary to the purposes and objectives of the United Nations" one. Still, the UNHCR seems to favor inclusion in the first category, as the methods and consequences are those of a serious non-political crime. This position is also more favorable to the individual, as in general, the perpetration of a serious non political crime is proved by the initiation of criminal proceedings, documents and evidence collected in the file, prosecution applications, and judicial decisions. A conclusion as to whether a person "is guilty" for an act contrary to the purposes and objectives of the United Nations, if that act is not at the same time a crime, is more difficult and the evaluation of individual responsibility, that does not benefit from the criminal standard, more fluid.

The judgment of the European Court of Justice

In responding to the questions referred by the German Federal Administrative Court, the European instance considered, in the first place, the qualification to be given to terrorist acts; it concluded that those acts could fall to be regarded both as serious non political crimes and as acts contrary to the purposes and objectives of the United Nations. Still, as the language employed both by the Geneva Convention and the Directive 2004/83 shows, it is not sufficient that the organization to whom the person belongs had perpetrated such acts; it must be shown that the acts were committed by the person in question. Recalling the principle of individual responsibility, the European Court underlined that "the mere fact that the person concerned was a member of such an organization cannot automatically mean that that person must be excluded from refugee status pursuant to those provisions"[13].

By way of consequence, although the domestic court provoked the re-qualification of the acts reproached to the applicants, the European instance refrained from making a choice; it is to be noted that this abstention from the European Court in not without consequences – as the first applicant had committed both acts as member of a terrorist organization but also murder. From the factual background, it follows that neither the domestic nor the European courts were interested with the second potential „serious non political crime", only with the acts committed while a member of the organization.

At the same time, the European Court's directions as to the assessment of the individual responsibility, without clarifying the notion she is dealing with (non political crime or act contrary to the purposes and objective of the United Nations), would imply that the same standard of proof applies for serious crimes that are generally discovered upon extradition requests (that is, a criminal proceeding is ongoing or has been completed) and for the other acts. Although this could be regarded as a guarantee and applauded as such and we genuinely acknowledge its importance, it is worrying however that a person is evaluated as being "guilty" in the absence of specific guarantees and a specific procedure[14].

However, the European Court, in answering the third question, considered that, once the domestic authority or court has determined that the person in question has committed a crime so falling under the exclusion clauses, their effect is mandatory and the person is excluded from being a refugee.

[13] European Court of Justice, judgment of 9 November 2010 (cases C-57/09 and C-101/09), para. 88

[14] Without entering into a lengthy discussion on the subject, it is worth noting that in the sanctions regime considering the events in the Cote d'Ivoire, some persons were listed on the visa-ban and assets freeze lists for incitement to racial hatred; should this also mean that they were to be excluded from being refugees, if the case may be? The standard of proof for the listing in restrictive measures is less strict and transparent.

The Court considered that no proportionality test is required, as the domestic instance has already, „in its assessment of the seriousness of the acts committed by the person concerned and of that person's individual responsibility, taken into account all the circumstances surrounding those acts and the situation of that person"[15] . But a few paragraphs earlier, when indicating the elements to be taken into consideration, the Court only remembered: the true role played by the person concerned in the perpetration of the acts in question; his position within the organization; the extent of the knowledge he had, or was deemed to have, of its activities; any pressure to which he was exposed; or other factors likely to have influenced his conduct[16]. The indication is correct as it only takes into account the demarche to determine whether the acts committed by the organization concerned meet the conditions laid down in exclusion provisions and whether individual responsibility for carrying out those acts can be attributed to the person concerned.

Still, the proportionality test, that the Court obviates, is not reduced to just assessing the role or the subjective state of mind of the person concerned and is applied after the qualification of an act as serious non political crime or act contrary to the purposes and objectives of the United Nations. Among proportionality considerations one should take into account the period of time elapsed from the perpetration of facts, the punishment already completed, the age of the perpetrator at the moment of the fact, the fairness of the trial. By using these tools, even if one is in the presence of a serious non-political crime of an act contrary to the purposes and objectives of the United Nations, could decide, after balancing different interests, not o exclude the person concerned from being a refugee.

The European Court is very firm in its position; the commission of a crime – against peace or humanity, war crime, non political one, contrary to the purposes of the United Nations – renders the perpetrator not worthy of the protection deriving from the refugee status. It is another way of proclaiming that refugee protection is for a person that is being persecuted, that suffering from a harm that is being illegitimately, maliciously and unjustifiably inflicted. The fact that a person is guilty of serious or - as the UNHCR put it - heinous acts, transforms him or her into an individual undeserving of protection. It is a clear vision of the refugee protection through asylum as a political instrument. In general terms, a political vision on asylum is concentrated on reaction for the protection of the persecuted (understood as persons chassed out of their political communities) but also for the chastising of the persecutory state for its conduct.

From the fact that the European Court did not qualified the acts described in the present cases, it follows that its position is one of principle; irrespective of the type of crime, the person considered to be guilty is to be excluded from being a refugee. This is in line with the political view on refugee status; the moment a person, although persecuted or fearing persecution, is, on serious grounds, considered to have committed such a crime, she is no longer or anymore in the position to invoke the risk of persecution in order to keep its status.

The revocation, cancellation or refusal to recognize the refugee status as a consequence for the application of an exclusion clause does not mean however the absence of all evaluation of the risk of a violation of fundamental human rights for that person, in case the exclusion clause is accompanied by an extradition request or by a decision to remove the person from the receiving State's territory. Still, as explained in more detail bellow, the decision to stay an extradition or a return order will not imply the recognition of a certain status and the presence of the risk must be real and concrete. The Court itself recognize it in paragraph 110 of its decision: "it is important to note that the exclusion of a person from refugee … does not imply the adoption of a position on the separate question of whether that person can be deported to his country of origin".

3. Conclusions

Divorcing the concept of refugee protection through asylum from the humanitarian goals promoted by the NHCR does not, in consequence, have the meaning of refusing all protection for a person confronted with a probable violation of her rights; it only tries to delimitate the refugee status from the humanitarian protection, that is subsidiary and non-distinctive, in the sense that is not sanctioning a distinctive kind of harm – persecution.

It is too early to say if the trend emerging from this judgment will be consolidated; there some signs of interest from the part of domestic instances as well, which, by the questions referred to the European Courts, are provoking a new interpretation of the meaning of "membership of a particular social group" or a distinction among human rights violations that would or would not amount to persecution. The current intention of the European Court is also suggested by the total absence of any reference to the work or works of the UNHCR; however, it will certainly be difficult for the European Court to change the trend in a short term, as for many years the UNHCR has been the trainer of the domestic authorities, including in Europe and its lines of interpretation are just consolidating in the case-law of national bodies.

THE RELATION BETWEEN TERRITORIAL COLECTIVITIES IN FRANCE AND THE EUROPEAN UNION. THOUGHTS ON THE CROSS-BORDER COOPERATION

CLAUDIA BARBOIU-GILIA*

Abstract

France, one of the founding members of the European Union, is a unitary state from the administrative-territorial point of view, based on deep centralism. Having territorial collectivities with highly complex structure (communes, departments, regions, sui-generis collectivities and overseas collectivities), France committed itself to cooperation not only between its own administrative structures, but also to cross-border cooperation within the European Union.

After showing reluctance to external actions underwent by territorial collectivities, France ended up with acknowledging this right of its territorial collectivities within the «decentralized cooperation», expressly brought under regulation by the Law of 6 February 1992. According to the law, there is no need for any ratification on behalf of the State to allow cooperation between territorial collectivities, within the boundaries of their competence. The Law of 1992 thus authorized the territorial collectivities to close agreements with other collectivities from abroad. Furthermore, the Law of 4 February 1995 allowed several treaties with the border states to be signed, thus creating the SAAR-LOR-LUX region (an European cross-border region that made way for cooperation between Germany, France and Luxembourg). The French legislation also allowed several European districts to be created, acting as local groups for cross-border cooperation, created on the initiative of territorial collectivities.

The aim of our study is to identify the main relationship between territorial collectivities in France and EU and to analyze the cooperation instruments used by the French collectivities in order to foster the cross-border cooperation.

Introduction

In these days, in Europe, the economical success often relies on the capacity of a region to develop cooperation networks with other regions. The cooperation and the exchange of experience between regions can be crucial in fostering a dynamic process for regional development. The European Union plays and important role in negociating and supporting partnerships across the Union's regions. The European Territorial Co-operation objective is financed by FEDER between 2007-2013. This objective supports cross-border, transnational and interregional co-operation programmes.

In the period 2007-13, the European Territorial Co-operation objective covers three types of programmes:

- 52 cross-border co-operation programmes along internal EU borders (ERDF contribution: €5.6 billion);

- 13 transnational co-operation programmes cover larger areas of co-operation such as the Baltic Sea, Alpine and Mediterranean regions (ERDF contribution: €1.8 billion);

- The interregional co-operation programme (INTERREG IVC) and 3 networking programmes (Urbact II, Interact II and ESPON) cover all 27 Member States of the EU. They provide a framework for exchanging experience between regional and local bodies in different countries (ERDF contribution: €445 million)[1].

The aim of our study is to identify the main relationships between territorial collectivities in France and the European Union and to analyse the cooperation instruments used by the French collectivities in order to increase the cross-border cooperation in particular, but also to highlight the way in which the funds granted by the European Union helped the French regions to develop.

The first step of our scientific approach is a brief presentation of the French administrative organization in order to highlight the role played by the regions in the administrative-territorial architecture of France.

In order to achieve the objectives of our research, the next step is to analyse how the French legislator regulated the cooperation instruments.

The importance of our study also consists in showing the way in which the French territorial collectivities, the regions in particular, understood the major role of cooperation in developing the communities and improving the relationships between the European Union's citizens. The cooperation instruments used by France can be regarded as models of good practice for Romania. The European funds absorption and a good management determined the French regions to experience an accelerated dynamic.

Under this consideration, we appreciate the subject we have propose is actual and our scientific approch is useful.

1. Preliminary thoughts on the administrative-territorial organization of France

The French political system is mainly based on the representative democracy, both at local and national level. The instruments of direct democracy are limited within the French system. We are talking here only about the referendum, there is no way for popular initiative or the power of veto. In its attempt to bring the citizen closer to the political decision, the French legislator inserted within the French legislation several elements of participatory democracy. We have to mention that this formula is not to be found expresis verbis within the French legislation, but we do fiind the concept of local democracy or proximity democracy[2].

The relationship between the French Republic and its constituent collectivities are regulated by Title XII and Title XIII of the Constitution, and also by special laws. According to Art. 72 of the Constitution, the territorial collectivities of the Republic are communes, departments, regions, sui-generis collectivities and overseas collectivities, provided by Art. 74[3]. Any other collectivity can be created according to the law, instead of one or several of the above mentioned collectivities, if necessary.

The administrative-territorial organization of France is complex[4]. One of the most debated issues in France concerns the optimal dimensions of territorial collectivities, but also the optimal number of „administration levels"[5].

[4] The restyle of the French society triggered an update of the complex administrative organization of France. In 2009, the French administration underwent a substantial reform, which will take place in several steps. The President of the Republic grounded the inception of this reform on the following reasons: „French people criticize the jacobine centralization they feel like the Government administration doesn't come close to the citizens and their activities. French people are more and more critical as far as descentralization is concerned and the organization of local collectivities. From their perspective, the number of local collectivities is too high. They are browned of the increasing local inland revenue and costs of collectivities' activity. (...) The French citizens, our enterprises, our inland civil

There are three levels of administration in France:

1. the communes – the basic unit of local public administration. It is the oldest level and the closest to the citizen. There are 36.682 communes and they succeeded in 1789 the old parishes. The mayor, who is elected by the municipal council, represents the state within the commune, but he also fills the local executive power. France is one of the countries with a high number of communes. In order to cope with the risk of plotting the local public policies, there has been developed an intercommunal level, which enables several communes to manage together certain public services and to develop certain policies. In order to meet this target, there have been created Public Institutions for Intercommunal Cooperation – EPCI[6], which are public persons, lacking the status of territorial collectivities. These Institutions are the outcome of the territorial collectivities' will;

2. the departments – they have been created in 1789. The 100 departments form one of the three levels of local government. 96 departments are metropolitan and 4 of them are to be found in the overseas territories. These territorial collectivities are administered by a General Council, elected once in three years. Each counsellor is elected for one canton. Furtehr on, there is a new territorial subdivision within a department – the arondissment, where a Subprefect represents the Government;

3. the regions (in number of 22) – the officially became territorial collectivities in 1982. The first election for the Regional Council took place in 1986, by means of universal vote.

The Government is represented by the mayor, prefect and regional prefect. In France, there are also the sui-generis collectivities and the ovserseas collectivities besides the territorial collectivities.

Within the Metropolis, Paris, Lyon and Marseille have a sui-generis status. These cities are divided into arondissments, which elect the arondissment mayors and counsellors. Paris has a double status: commune and department. Corsica also has a particular institutional organization.

French Polynesia and New Caledonia make the so-called overseas countries (Pays d'outre mer au sein de la République"). By means of local referendum, which is going to take place in 2014, these two entities will decide if they continue to part of the French Republic[7].

Following a simple analysis, we notice how complex is structured the local public French administration. The French territorial collectivities play a crucial role within the social life.

2. The relatinship between the French territorial collectivities and the European Union, regulated by the French legislation

Having territorial collectivities with a highly complex structure, France opened itself to cooperation not only between its own administrative structures, but also to cross-border cooperation within the European Union.

The cooperation between cross-border regions has been developed ever since 1970 in order to solve the actual problems that the citizens living in cross-border regions had to deal with (environment protection, issues related to cross-border workers etc.).

servants, office holders, our contry on the whole, is waiting for a deep reform in terms of local organization. The French citizens want the structures to be simplified, the competences to be cleared up, the responsibilities to be identified and the local expenses to be reduced. It's a matter of effectiveness, but also of democracy. (...) We need to update the country more than ever We need challenging and innovative answers. The law of 2 March 1982 regarding the rights and liberties of communes, departments and regions[8] used to regulate the cross-border cooperation in the Art. 2. By means of the Prime Minister (Pierre Mauroy) curricula of 26 May 1983, there has been created the institution of The delegate for external actions of local collectivities. This institution acknowledged the concept of external action of territorial collectivities.

Once the Law of 6 February 1993, regarding the territorial administration of the Republic, has been adopted, France legally acknowledges in Title IV the – Descentralized cooperation. Art 131 indent 1 of the above mentioned Law stipulates the following aspects: „the territorial collectivities were valid to close agreements with foreign territorial collectivities, within the boundaries of their specific competences and with the obligation to obey France's international commitments".

At first, France proved to be reluctant to the external actions of territorial collectivities, but it ended up by acknowledging this right of its territorial collectivities within the «descentralized cooperation», stipulated by Law of 6 February 1992. According to the law, the Government doesn't have to ratify the cooperation between territorial collectivities, within the boundaries of their competences. Cooperation is achieved in various forms: development support, institutional support, common management of goods and services, cross-border cooperation or inter-regional cooperation.

The Law of 4 February 1995 also enabled several treaties to be signed with the neighbor states, thus creating the SAAR-LOR-LUX region (it's about an European cross-border region which made way for cooperation between Germany, France and Luxembourg).

The law of 13 August 2004 regarding the local liberties and responsibilities issued the concept of „European district", a legal entity with financial autonomy. These districts are local groups for cross-border cooperation, founded at the initiative of territorial collectivities.

The Law of 2004 also enables the establishment of mixed groups with members from the neighbor country collectivities in order to commonly create and manage territorial projects, equipments and public services. The Law simplifies at once the authorization procedure for those collectivities that attend foreign structures. The legal norms authorize the transfer of structural funds management to territorial collectivities, transfer experimetally exercised by the Alsace region.

3. Instruments for cross-border cooperation used by France

The territorial collectivities are not regarded as leading actors within the European construction, they act at European level through the agency of the Committee of the Regions, created in 1992. As far as the lobby actions are concerned, the territorial collectivities use to associations: the Assembly of European Regions (AER) and the Council of European Municipalities and Regions (CEMR), two groups that originally created the Committee of the Regions.

Nowadays, all the French regions have an office in Bruxelles. These offices are working particularly on issues related to the competences of local and regional collectivities, such as: social problems, economical development, transports, environment, education (social mobility of young people), culture, research and innovation. Their mission is to initiate a dialogue with the European institutions, aiming to help the collectivities to build up a «cross-border» partnership. In order to use the resources on mutual basis or because they share the same problems, certain regions gather together so they could establish a commune structure designed to represent them. This would be the case of the following regions: Bretagne, Pays de la Loire and Poitou-Charentes.

In 2006, for better cooperation, several associations of the local power have established the European House of Local Authorities (Maison européenne des pouvoirs locaux[9]).

According to an account issued in 2010 regarding the cross-border policy[10], France has 3.000 km of border line, meaning 20% of the metropolitan territory is opend towards the neighbor countries. In France, 16 regions and 28 departments are facing the cross-border, while 10 mil. of French people live near the cross-border lines.

Instruments for cross-border territorial cooperation:

- LCCG – The Local Cross-border Cooperation Group – it's a legal instrument, made possible by the Karlsruhe Agreement in order to facilitate cross-border cooperation. The general code of territorial collectivities provides a number of forms of public inter-communal cooperation establishments, which might adjust to cross-border cooperation[11];
- ECCG – European Cross-border Cooperation Groups[12];
- ECG – Euro-regional Cooperation Groups.

France collaborated very well with its neighbor countries and created Euro-districts in the first place, which may function within the Euroregions. Most of the Euroregions turned afterwards into European cross-border cooperation groups.

France is involved in 21 programmes for territorial cooperation: there are 9 programmes for cross-border cooperation, 5 programmes for transnational cooperation within the metropolitan area and 3 programmes within the overseas departments. Other 4 programmes aim at inter-regional cooperation: INTERACT II, URBACT II, ESPON/ORATE and INTERREG IV C.

Here is a chart to serve this purpose:

As far as the government level is concerned, the Government of France initiated a series of dialogues with the Governments of neighbor countries regarding the whole cluster of border issues. The Ministry of Foreign Affairs in France, Germany and Switzerland hold every year meetings with the administration of the border regions, lands and cantons. There has been established an inter-governmental committee regarding the cross-border cooperation with Luxembourg. There is a borderland committee with Italy. Several administrations in France and the neighbor countries have established committees or commissions which get together on a regular basis and discuss on topics that fall under their competence, issues related to taxation and the transport infrastructure in particular.

4. The role of structural funds in the regional development of France

In France, the regional policy of the European Union is coordinated by the Interministerial Delegation for Territorial Planning and Regional Attractiveness - Délégation interministérielle à l'aménagement du territoire et à l'attractivité régionale (DTPRA). The structural funds are the main tool to put into practice the regional policies and aim to reduce the regional disparities in Europe. The European Union established in 1994 a cohesion fund designed for the countries with a national gross income lower than 90% of the communitarian average.

France ranged with the seven years calendar established by the European Union within the plan contracts State-Region, which later became project contracts State-Region (2000-2006, 2007-2013), in order to improve the relationships between regions and Europe. Between 2000 and 2006, nearly 140.000 projects received a contribution from one of the European funds (ERDF or ESF). This support given by the European Union led to 200.000 new jobs between 2000 and 2006.

In the Nord-Pas-de-Calais region, the European Union financed research programmes on technological innovation and launched the operation „Villes et territoires numériques".

The European supplies enabled the Lorraine region to establish a cross-border partnership with the Sarre Land (Germany) in order to develop the plastics industry, thus creating more than 2.000 new jobs within the two cross-border regions.

In Normandy, the operations of dragging the Mont Saint-Michel in order to preserve the marine patter of the area capitalized €21,5 million from European funds, that is 15% from the lump sum.

For 2007-2013, France benefits from an European investition of more than €14 billion:

- €10,3 billion under the regional competitiveness and employment in metropolitan regions objective (funds earmarked by ERDF and ESF);
- €3,2 billion under the convergence objective regarding DOM - Departements d'outre mer - (funds earmarked by ERDF and ESF);
- €860 million under the European territorial cooperation objective which finances the cross-border, trans-national and inter-regional cooperation projects (funds earmarked by ERDF)[14].

These investments are carried out within 36 operational programmes, of which 31 programmes are financed by ERDF and 5 programmes by ESF. The cohesion policy for 2007-2013 stipulates particular measures for those four overseas departments: Martinique, Guadeloupe, Réunion and Guyane.

Within the operational programme for regional cooperation INTERREG, for 2007-2013, there have been granted €1,15 billion for cross-border programmes that cover the French border territories. This financial support given by the European Union is a tremendous support that encourages the exchanges and the relationships between the collectivities and populations living near the border.

Financially speaking, between 2007 and 2013, 63% of the structural funds invested in convergence regions and 79% of those granted for competitivity regions will finance the priorities stipulated within the Lisbon Strategy, with a significant boost as far as the investments in research, development and innovation are concerned. France's priorities regarding the cohesion policy during the period 2007-2013 are as follows:

- to promote research, development and innovation, with a grant of €4,2 billion;
- to promote the entrepreneurial spirit and the small and medium enterprises, with a grant of €1,4 billion communitarian support
- accesibility and transport infrastructure, with a grant of €1,1 billion[15];

[14] http://www.europe-en-france.gouv.fr/Des-programmes-pour-qui-pour-quoi/A-chaque-programme-son-Fonds/La-cohesion-economique-et-sociale (Accessed January 30, 2012).

- to promote workers' formation and adaptation to the new economical environment[16];
- to develop informatics societies, for which France invested €636 million.

The cohesion policy for the period 2007-2013 encapsulates specific measures for the four overseas departments: Martinique, Guadeloupe, Réunion şi Guyane.

- to increase the assistance funds from the structural funds (ERDF and ESF) with 85%; (FEDER and FSE) cu 85%;
- to assign a special grant, worth of €481,6 million, in order to reduce disparities in the overseas departments[17] due to ultra-peripheral location.

The European Commission has adopted[18] a draft legislative package which will frame cohesion policy for 2014-2020. The new proposals are designed to reinforce the strategic dimension of the policy and to ensure that EU investment is targeted on Europe's long-term goals for growth and jobs („Europe 2020").

The new elements in the package are:

- Concentration on Europe 2020;
- Better coordination of various EU actions;
- Rewarding performance;
- Sound macro-fiscal environment;
- Reinforcing territorial cooperation;
- Further simplification of the policy is a guiding principle[19].

Regions will continue to receive support within three (3) defined categories:

- less developed regions, whose GDP is below 75% of the Union average, will continue to be the top priority for the policy.
- transition regions, whose GDP is between 75% and 90% of the EU 27 average;
- more developed regions, whose GDP per capita is above 90% of the average.

Conclusions

In the report from March 2009, the Balladur Committee reached the conclusion that region is often perceived as a promising administrative level for the state authorities, thus making from this territorial level the center of the state services and actions reorganization.

Along with the reform of 16 December 2010 in France regarding the territorial collectivities[20], France brought the cooperation between its regions and the European Union to a new level.

Whether it is trans-national, cross-border or inter-regional, the cooperation with other territorial collectivities became the base line of the French regions policies and the European regional policy as a matter-of-course.

As a member state of the European Union, France managed to absorb substantial European funds, which led to a noticeable restyle of the French territorial collectivities and regions in particular.

THE REGIME OF PUBLIC PROPERTY UNDER THE RULES OF THE NEW CIVIL CODE

MARTA CLAUDIA CLIZA *

Abstract

Law 213 from 1998 covered until now public property regime in Romania. Along with the entry into force of the new Civil Code,it have been affected and some rules on public property. These changes are just taken into account in this study which wants to illustrate what is currently public property regime in Romania and what are the rules that govern this system.

Keywords: public property, the New Civil Code, domainiality, estate legal regime, perpetuity and transferability

Introduction

In administrative law science, genesis of field theory is conferred by doctrine and jurisprudence[1].

Field category - especially the public estate - has a long history, receiving over time various scientific interpretations.

From ancient times it was felt the need that, certain goods, due to their nature or other reasons, be designed, by special regulations, to collective use.

The modern age has brought into question the concept of public service and for its provision, it was revealed again the need for the existence of a special categories of goods - public goods.

It was therefore outlined the idea according to which legally organized public communities - governmental or local - may possess, just as individuals, movable and immovable/, tangible and intangible assets - that they use in process of providing general interests. These are public goods that belong to a moral public legal entity.

1. Public property constitutional status

The legal status applicable to such goods includes specific form and content rules concerning their management, administration or alienation. Some of these goods belong to private property, others to public property[2].

"Estate" concept stems from the Latin "dominium", meaning possession, property.

The existence of estate, of property owned by the holders of public authority - state, local communities - is linked by the purpose of ensuring, by these authorities, of the general public interest of the community concerned.

Legal connection between owners of the field and assets that make up the field is constituted by means of property institution. Exercising ownership right by the state or local community on their own estate property is subject to specific rules that overlap or are added to the general property regime governed by common law.

Domainiality even require the regulation of a specific property form - public property - belonging only to the holders of power to manage public affairs, i.e. the State or local authorities.

Legal rules governing this subject are exorbitant rules, derogating from the common law, belonging to public law[3].

For a better understanding of the investigated subject, a brief historical analysis is required.

In Roman law[4] there were goods forming the public sector- res publicae, making up all goods belonging to the Romanian people. These goods were divided into two categories:

a). goods which represented a source of income: res publicae in pecunia populi, in the composition of which also were included ager publicus - lands conquered from their enemies;

b). property intended for the public use, given for direct and immediate public use, called res publicae in usu publico, which includes res comunis - the sea shore, calculated up to where water reached in case of flow.

Under the feudal reign, the kings' estate was dismembered by the seniors, who had become owners of roads, streams and rivers, substituting in the rights of kings.

All feuds emanated from kings, which had created by various concessions and royal jurisdiction dispensation.

Later, the kings, by their fight against feudal lords, succeeded to reconstruct the royal sector (belonging to the Crown), resuming successively roads, rivers, mines, fairs, etc.

Wishing to preserve the property of the estate, kings have taken precautionary measures for that time, countermanding alienations previously made and forbidding them for the future. Thus, by Ordinance of February 1566, given by Moulins under the reign of Carol, the IXth - inalienability of estate property was raised to the rank of a true public law principle. Kings' property was thus subject to inalienability, on the grounds that were part of the Crown estate and not because they were beneficial for anyone[5].

The old French law did not know any distinction between the two estates, within the modern meaning. Thus, although the theory of the Crown estate accepted the heterogeneity of the estate due to the presence of incorporated rights (royal, seigniorial, tax), along with material elements (rivers, roads, places of battle, etc.), supported their joint legal condition, all considered to be the King's property, likely to bring income and equally subject to inalienability rule. This single legal regime was applicable even to goods that were acquired by the king as personal property, by the common law procedure.

An evolution in the field is marked by the French Revolution of 1789, when it was discussed the distinction between the national and the Crown estate. Since then, the nation not wishing be the same person as the king, it was asked to distinguish between the two estates.

Thus, by Law of 22nd November to 1st December 1780, although a distinction was not made between the public and private estate of the state, however, it is created the national estate, passing upon nation all properties producing income, along with those intended for the public use. So, res publicae in pecunia populi could be alienated by this law, according to certain forms, by virtue of a decree of the assembly sanctioned by the king and res publicae in usu publico were inalienable, because they were intended for the public use.

Napoleonic Civil Code mentioned the goods that were part of the public sector in the meaning of current doctrine.

Even the Romanian Civil Code, in art. 476, speaks of goods that are not private property, "as dependencies of the public sector", meaning the estate goods or state goods, without distinguishing between public and private sector. Also, art.477 of the same Code considers as part of the public wealth also the vacant successions or unclaimed property, matter reviewed by Law 213/1998[6].

We note that the distinction between public and private sector work is especially the work of doctrine and jurisprudence, rather than objective law.

So, the sector category (administrative sector in the meaning of inter-war doctrine)[7] includes goods that the state or local communities as administrative entities[8] assign to the general interest tasks incumbent on them.

The sector represents a universality that allows its divisibility into two masses of goods: public and private sector. The distinction between the two sectors is not purely formal, but it involves a duality of legal regimes to which property is subject.

Beyond the differences in legal regime, public and private sectors have a common function, namely to not allow public persons fulfill their administrative missions[9].

Estate regime helps us give answer to questions such as those related to differences in legal regime applicable to identical goods, but belonging to different owners: one of them- the state and the other- a private entity.

Scientific language is and still remains the result of terminological conventions. For these reasons, we further present the conventional meaning of certain terms, given to them in light of this paper.

1. sector- ensemble of movable or immovable, tangible or intangible assets, belonging to the holders of power to manage public affairs: state, county, town, commune (synonym – estate goods);
2. estate legal regime- all form and content legal rules applicable to ownership right of the estate property;
3. domainiality - all features of ownership on sector assets (i.e. establishment of a specific ownership form applicable only to them - public property; printing of characters specific to private ownership exercised on estate assets).
4. estate rights - public ownership and private ownership on estate assets; real property rights established based on them, such as administration right, use right, concession right; rights of claim provided in connection with an estate good;
5. estate code – complex law including all regulations in the field of estate[10].

Public property constitutional regulation is suffering as a result of the generalism characteristic of these rules, but enjoys a precise and clear delineation of the great principles governing its legal status.

Constitution of Romania which came into force in December 1991 and revised in 2003 regulated the property, both public and private one, as a fundamental institution lying not only in public or private law, but we can say at the border between the two classical law branches.

The text of the Constitution contains two articles on the property, the one in Title II dedicated to fundamental freedoms, liberties and duties, entitled "Protection of private property" (Article 44), respectively that of Title IV "Public economy and finances" entitled "Property" (Article 136). Constitution drafting committee considered, by this two-headed arrangement, that the issue on property generally have an general establishment where property system be established in Romania, so the forms property take, as well as a special establishment of primary ownership, as a fundamental right.

[6] According to art.25 of Law no. 213/1998 on public property and its legal status (Official Gazette no. 448 of 24 th November 1998), by phrase "public sector", contained in art.477 of the Civil Code, it is meant the private sector of the state or administrative units, as appropriate.

The solution chosen by the constituent legislature that first it should be regulated the protection of private property and then the property regime in Romania was criticized by the doctrine. Although Title I requires to first highlight the supreme values of the Romanian state (constitutional state in which human dignity, rights and freedoms of citizens, free development of human personality, justice and pluralism are supreme and guaranteed values), we consider that it would be have been provided here an article entitled "Property" including two paragraphs:

1). “State protects property”

2).”Property is public or private”

Then it followed that, in a separate article, "Public property", it should provided its features, as provided and developed in art. 136.

Systematic analysis of constitutional rules in relation to property must start from art. 136:

1).”Property is public or private”.

2). Public property is guaranteed and protected by law and belongs to the state or administrative - territorial units.

3). Wealth of public interest of the subsoil, air space, waters with capitalized energy potential of national interest, beaches, territorial sea, natural resources of the economic area, and of the continental area, as well as other assets established by organic law shall be exclusively subject to public property.

4). Public property goods are inalienable. In accordance with the organic law, they can be managed by autonomous administrations or public institutions or may be leased or rented; they may also be given for gratuitous use to public utility institutions.

5). Private property is inviolable, under organic law. "

Thus, one can see that art. 136, after showing that, in the general meaning of the term, any property is guaranteed and protected by state, specifies the two forms of ownership (public and private), then it sets the regime of public property, because public property is the exception (the rule in the society is made by the private property) and finally to enshrine the principle of inviolability of private property.

From economy of Article 136, it results that that holders of public ownership are exclusively those listed in subsection 2 of art. 136 and no other person can have this property right in its patrimony. As regards administrative-territorial units, as owners of public ownership, it should emphasize that such notion defines commune, city, town, county as legal and administrative entities with jurisdiction, while the notion of state, as owner of public property, public authority defines those public authorities whose competence is general throughout the country.

Another general principle governing the legal status of public property is developed by art. 136 paragraph 3, which defines in an incipient manner the public sector, as a sine qua non element of public property.

In other words, the above-mentioned legal text states in a declarative specification (but not limitative) the main goods forming the object of public ownership right. Declarative, example character of this constitutional specification is given by the expression used by the legislature at the end of the text, namely that it may be subject to public ownership "other assets established by organic law". Organic laws have been thus designed to decide with great precise the composition of the public sector.

If we refer to the owners of public property, it results that the goods subject to public ownership is the public sector that can be owned by the state (the national interest), or property of administrative-territorial units (the local interest).

The term of “public sector” is not restricted only to goods subject to public property. In some respects, to public sector also belong the immovable assets (farmland, forests) or movable assets (paintings, sculptures), which are privately owned.

Integration of a good of public sector (object of the state or an administrative – territorial unit property) is made by ways specific to a regime of public law or, where appropriate, by means of the common law, but "ordered" by a public law regime. Our Constitution admits:

a). administration by public institutions;

b). autonomous administration;

c). rental or lease to any legal entity;

d). free commissioning to public utility institutions.

Although the Basic Law does not use "expressis verbis", the expression of public sector or public estate, it does not mean it is unknown to the spirit of the Basic Law. It can be inferred implicitly from some constitutional provisions, sustaining the thesis of a report of synonymy between the expressions of public sector and public property.

In terms of the legal status of such goods, art. 136 paragraph 4 of the Constitution establishes mandatory rules of exclusive applicability, namely the public property is inalienable.

Inalienability of public sector components, or in other words, the prohibition that they be subject to legal acts or deeds with property translative effect, generates other two principles, namely indefeasibility and intangibility of public assets.

Goods in the public sector are intangible, i.e. they can not be subject to enforcement proceedings by creditors, the liquidation of state debts and administrative-territorial units being based on specific rules derogating from the common law.

Goods from public sector are indefeasible, both prescriptively and possessively. This means, on the one hand, that the holder does not lose ownership on these assets as long as they would not exercise it (extinctive prescription) and, on the other hand, a third party can not obtain a right on these goods no matter how much time it would actually exercise, even if in good faith, their holder being entitled to claim them.

A very important rule, which refers to the acquisition of public property right, is that found in art. 136, Second sentence, according to which goods subject to public property "may be managed by autonomous administrations or public institutions, or may be leased or rented". It is the law text that lead the way for major legislation on exercising the public property right, by creating new rights: the right of management, leasing or renting.

Administrative area includes a universality split into two masses of private property, being able to speak of a public and a private sector of the state, respectively, of the local territorial community.

From the above mentioned constitutional text, it results that the holder of the public sector can only be the state or administrative-territorial units, the latter being understood as legally organized local communities.

It must be noted that the notions of public property in the public sector, as well as private property and private sector, are not synonyms. The property is a legal institution, and the sector represents the totality of goods that are subject to property, connected between them by the holder of real property right and their destination to serve the public interest.

As regards the scope of public property holders, we note that it is fully established in the Constitution [Article 136 paragraph (2) of the Romanian Constitution, republished], while the sphere of public property object is started by the Constitution [Article 136 paragraph (3)] and must complete by law, the same being the case as regards the legal regime of public assets for which the Constitution, Article 136 paragraph (4) establishes just a few basic guidelines.

The series of special rules derogating from the common law applicable to the public sector, are, according to Andre the Laubadere, "estate regime".[11]

[11] A. Laubadére ş.a, Manuel de droit adminstratif, (Paris, 1988), p.336.

Thus, the state and local public community, sometimes called administrative entities in the doctrine are, as individuals, goods ownership, which are distributed into two groups, forming public and private sectors.

Due to the belonging of such goods to some persons of public law, administrative people in interwar doctrinal beliefs, such as the State or its territorial dismemberments, they were generically called using the expression administrative sector.

The distinction between public and private sectors is not purely formal, but it involves a duality of legal regimes which the goods of both sectors are subject to.

Beyond the differences in legal regime, public and private sectors have a common function, namely to allow the public persons achieve their administrative tasks.

We may understand the administrative sector as a set of goods which the state or local communities use in achieving the general interests of state or local community.[12]

2. Public sector-public property relationship

To understand this issue, it should be noted that public property is currently regulated by the Constitution, as stated above and the New Civil Code, which entered into force on the 1st October 2011. So far, public ownership was regulated by Law no. 213/1998. Law no. 71/2011 for the implementation of Law no. 287/2009 on the Civil Code (read the New Civil Code) provides that as of 01/10/2011, it amends the Title (new title, Law on Public Property), art. 12 paragraph (5) and repeal art. 1, art. 2, art. 5, art. 7, art. 10 paragraph (1), art. 11, art. 12 paragraphs (1) - (4) and (6), art. 13, art. 17 of Law no. 213/1998, published in the Official Gazette no. 409/10.06.2011.

In the doctrine were expressed critical views towards organic legislature of 1998, which "comes and establishes the expression of public property in an identical meaning as that of public sector". Professor Dana Apostol Tofan, author of this opinion, emphasizes the conclusions drawn from the enumeration of art. 3, paragraph 1 of law, regarding the goods that make up the state public sector, according to which it can be found neither in law nor in the list contained in the Annex, belonging to the public sector of some goods that have been privately owned, but which are equally containing the public sector (e.g. the national cultural heritage held by different owners, individuals or legal entities) and it is not recognized as a principle, any possibility of existing some estate protection rules, towards other private assets, others than those belonging to the public sector.

A possible solution to this problem could be to establish certain rules that should represent special estate regimes, be it goods of national cultural heritage, be it lands, forests, etc.., belonging to individuals or legal persons, others than the state or administrative-territorial units. These special estate regimes lead to a restriction, in some respects, of exercising the private property rights.

As Professor A. Iorgovan asserts, in such situations, "the estate regime, in consideration of a private property good, appears as a public regime of limiting the exercise of private property right, enrolling in art. 53 of the Constitution".

Public sector, as a legal entity, known throughout the history of law in general and public law, in particular, a series of fluctuations in its content, fluctuations that have seriously left its mark upon the way of defining the criteria for delimitation from the private sector, as well as procedures for inclusion of some property in this area.

Both domestically and internationally, outlining the public sector idea has been done in parallel with the materialization of the concepts of ownership and right of ownership, as well as at the same time with the outlining of holders of such real right. When it was found that public property has its own autonomy, different from the private property and when the owners of both types of property were clearly individualized, it was required the delimitation of the two types of property - public and private.

[12] E. Bălan, Property administrative law, Master, (Editura C.H.Beck, Bucharest, 2007), p.41-42.

On this line of thinking, trying a more clear delimitation of the public sector from the private one, in the doctrine, the public sector was defined as being that consisting of "all movable and immovable property, which, being designed to an established public service, are directly used or consumed by it to enable achieving its purpose or to ensure its operation."

Referring to our literature of public law, we shall retain that in the concept of public sector were also included assets making up the national cultural heritage, which, however, could be subject to private ownership right. Thus, with a view to formulating a definition of the public sector, it should be considered both the public property assets, as well as private property assets which are of a particular importance for the history, culture, etc.

Thus, by public sector we understand "those public or private assets, which by their nature or express provision of law must be kept and transmitted to the future generations, representing values to be used in the public interest, directly or through a public service and subject to an administrative regime, as well as to a mixed regime, under which the power regime is determined, being in the property or, where appropriate, in the keeping of public legal entities".

3. Public ownership

In economic sense, property is the ratio of appropriation of material goods by the individual and it is a condition of any production and, therefore, a prerequisite for the existence of any society[13].

As an essential component of the production relations, the property is part of the society: it originated with the society and it will last as long it will exist.

In the legal sense, property right, part of the society superstructure, expresses in terms of law, the economic content of the appropriation social relation. Ownership has occurred at a certain stage of development of society, along with the occurrence of state and law, when the economic ownership relationship was covered by the legal form, when the ownership of material goods has become a right of ownership, appropriation, enshrined and provided by the force of state coercion.

According to Liviu Pop, "The property is, both in economic and law meaning, the supreme expression of people's access to the possession, use and disposal of goods "[14].

Ownership is a fundamental right of old tradition in the catalog of fundamental rights and freedoms guaranteed to citizens. The content comprises the right of individual to acquire a property, to use and freely dispose in connection with its property and ability to assign its right to someone else.[15] The Constitution may establish some limitations on the scope of property, limitations clearly and expressly defined and determined only in the interest of establishing a system for protecting and guaranteeing the public interest.

Achieving ownership entails the obligation of the state to guarantee and protect the property obtained by lawful means.

Given its legal content and the specific position of the owner, according to Liviu Pop, ownership is "that real right granting its holder the attributes of possession, use and disposition of a property, attributes that only he can exercise in their completeness, in its own power and interests, in compliance with the legal rules in force "[16]. We mention that these doctrinal considerations keep their actuality even in the light of the new provisions of the Civil Code and in substance there are no significant differences between the previous and current concepts.

Ownership has a series of own characters, which distinguish it from other real rights. Thus, ownership is absolute and inviolable, full and exclusive, perpetual and transferable.[17] a). Absolute and inviolable character. Ownership is absolute in a broad meaning, as it is recognized to its holder or in its relations with all others who are obliged to do nothing for breaching it. In other words, the ownership is enforceable against everyone, erga omnes.

Inviolability of ownership supports and strengthens its absolute character, in other words, ownership can not be violated by anyone.

According to art. 136 paragraph (5) of the Constitution, "Private property is inviolable, in accordance with the organic law".

Inviolability of private property is not absolute, since the exercising of such right is affected by the tasks that, under the law or custom, are incumbent upon the owner of the ownership for environmental protection, provision of good neighborhood, compliance with the other tasks.

Exceptions to the inviolability are also those provided in art. 44 paragraph (3) of the Constitution on expropriation for public utility and art. 44 paragraph (5) which allow that, in general interest, public authority may use the subsoil of any real estate with the obligation to pay any damages caused.

b). Full and exclusive character. Full character shows that ownership confers on its proprietor all the three attributes: possession, use and disposal.

Exclusive character shows that attributes of this right are independent of any power of another person on such good, apart from cases where the property is dismembered. So, the full and exclusive character of ownership of the property is lacking when dismemberments are established on such ownership and some attributes of this right are exercised by another person (usufruct, use, habitation, servitude, superficies).

Exclusive character may also be understood by giving the holder a true monopoly of the possession, use and disposition of the property subject of ownership.

Perpetuity and transferability. By perpetual nature of ownership it is meant that it is unlimited in time and lasts as long as the good subject to it exists. Moreover, it is not lost through non-usage or non-performance.

Usually, the action claiming ownership is imprescriptible.

Ownership can be transmitted among the living ones, under the law. Furthermore, transmission of ownership is inevitable and binding mortis causa.

Transmissibility is the natural consequence of ownership perpetuity. Given the finite nature of human life, by transferring ownership right is made its transmission from a person property to another person's property, ensuring its perpetuity.

We will see below that public ownership, because of its inalienable right, is not transferable.

Public ownership as a form of ownership, shows, with certain nuances, general features specific to this real right[18].

Law no. 213/1998 on public property and its legal status has been prepared pursuant to art. 135 of the Romanian Constitution (currently art. 136, after review), according to which property is public or private.

It is important to reveal that according to art. 73 of the Constitution, this law, being a law governing the general legal status of public ownership, is an organic law.

This results unambiguously from the provisions of art. 5 paragraph 1) of Law 213/1998, which foresees that "the legal status of public ownership is governed by this law, unless provided otherwise by special laws". We mention that this text, currently repealed, cleared up the legal nature of this law.

Article 1 of the law defined the scope of public ownership, noting that "Public ownership belongs to the State and administrative units, on the property that, under the law or by their nature are of public interest or use." Thus, it came to defining the public property as being the ownership of the state or administrative-territorial units, communes, towns and counties upon goods that, under the law or by their nature or intended use, are of public interest or use".

We note here that the first part of art. 1 of law coincides with art. 136 of the Constitution, except that, while the latter refers to public property, the legislature uses the formula of public ownership. From this we may conclude that the two concepts should have finally expressed the same thing, which was otherwise expressed trenchantly in the doctrine and jurisprudence, such idea being promoted particularly by the civilist specialists.

By law are enshrined the notions of public and private sectors of the state and administrative-territorial units, concepts that do not appear for the first time in a law that contains regulations in connection with public private ownership, but in this law it acquires a unitary regulation.

Evidently, the special law establishes general criteria underlying the qualification of a good as belonging or not to the public sector. Therefore, it is established that a good may be the subject of public ownership on sine qua non condition, that it should be (by law or by its nature) of public use or public interest.

Law makes the delimitation between "the state public sector which is composed of assets referred to in art. 136 paragraph 3 of the Constitution, those provided in section I of the Annex, as well as other national public interest goods, declared as such by law "," public sector of the counties comprising goods referred to in section I of the Annex and other county public interest goods, declared by the county council decisions, if not declared by law as goods of national public interest or use" and" public sector of communes, cities and municipalities which is composed of assets referred to in section III of the Annex, as well as other goods of local public interest or use, declared as such by the decision of the local council, if not declared by law as goods of national or county public interest or use".

Goods that are subject to the public sector are mentioned in the Annex of the law, which contains one list for each of the public sectors: state public sector, county public sector and public sector of the communes, cities and municipalities. This listing has a great practical importance, even if it has a declarative character, and not a limitative one, a fact stipulated expressis verbis in the preamble of Annex.

Article 858 defines public ownership as follows: "Public property is ownership that belongs to the state law or an administrative - territorial unit over the goods which, by their nature or by the declaration of law, are of public interest or use, provided that they acquired by one of the ways stipulated by law." One can easily see that the civil legislature did not alienate from the provisions of Law no. 213/1998.

The novelty of legal statement is found in art. 860, unambiguously talking about

"national, county and local public sectors."

As regards public ownership characteristics, according to art.861 we find the same characters: inalienability, indefeasibility and intangibility.

Article 862 stipulates what are the limits of exercising public ownership. Thus, public ownership is liable to any limits stipulated by the law or the New Civil Code for the private ownership, provided they are compatible with public use or interest to which assigned goods are intended. Incompatibility is established by agreement between the public property owner and the person concerned or, in case of divergence, in the court. In these cases, the person concerned is entitled to a fair and prompt compensation from the owner of public property. We may appreciate that these provisions are a novelty towards the primary regulation of Law no.213/1998.

4. Acquisition of public ownership

Article 7 of Law no. 213/1998, currently repealed, provides that public ownership is acquired in the following ways:

a). naturally;

b). by public procurement made under the law;

c). by expropriation for the public utility cause; d). by acts of donation or legacy, accepted by the Government;

e). by the transfer of goods from the state private sector of its administrative-territorial units in their public sector, for public utility cause (the operation is called assignment):

f). through other ways provided by law;

Towards these provisions of Law no. 218/1998, as previously stated, they were repealed by art. 863 of the New Civil Code, the text listing the cases of acquisition of public ownership, as follows:

a). by public procurement, made under the law;

b). by expropriation for the public utility cause, under the law;

c). by acts of donation or legacy, accepted under the law, if the property, by its nature or by the will of its dispose, becomes of public interest or use; d). by onerous convention, if the property, by its nature or by the will of its acquirer, becomes of public interest or use;

e). by transfer of a property from the state private sector in its public sector, or from the private sector of an administrative - territorial unit in its public sector, under the law;

f). by other means established by law.

One can easily see that the new provisions practically resume those of Law no. 218/1998, with slight amendments. It disappears the natural course as a means of acquisition, which is natural, as it was impossible to identify concrete ways considered by the legislature to be included in this text. Also under the new provisions, legacies and donations must be accepted under the law and not the government, as provided by law no. 213/1998.

A new provision is also introduced, from which it results the possibility of entry into public ownership of a property by an onerous convention, issue resulting by default from the provisions of Law no. 213/1998.

5. Termination / settlement of public ownership

Public ownership ceases if the property perished or passed into the private sector.

Law no. 18/1991 regarding the agricultural real estate, republished as amended, provides that lands belonging to the public sector, no matter who the owner of their property right might be, the state or administrative - territorial units, may be placed in the civil circulation only if, according to law , they are decommissioned from the public sector.

Passing of goods from the public into the private sector is made, where appropriate, by decision of the Government, of the county council, as well as of the General Council of Bucharest, or local council, unless otherwise provided by Constitution or law.

The decision of transferring of property in the private sector may be appealed to the competent administrative court in whose territorial jurisdiction is the property.

The New Civil Code provides in art. 864 that public ownership is extinguished if the property has perished or has been transferred to the private sector, if the use or the public interest has ceased, under the conditions provided by law.

In the New Civil Code[19] is regulated the settlement of public ownership, towards the previous provisions of Law no. 213/1998, currently repealed, which stipulated the methods for termination of public ownership.

Conclusions

The new Romanian Civil Code defines private property in relation to the contents of this law, as follows: Private property is the owner right to possess, use and dispose of a good exclusively, absolutely and perpetually, within the limits set by law.

Currently, we find provisions on public ownership in the New Civil Code, Articles 858-875 (Title VI - Public property), provisions leading to the abolition of certain texts of law no. 213/1998.

In conclusion, this study aimed at highlighting what is currently public property regime in Romania and what are the rules that govern this system.

SPECIFIC FEATURES OF THE LIABILITY FOR CONTRAVENTION IN ENVIRONMENTAL LAW

ANDRADA MIHAELA TRUŞCĂ*

Abstract
Along with civil liability and criminal liability, contravention liability comes to complete the classical forms of liability applicable in the environmental protection field. This form of liability, unlike the civil liability, which has a predominantly repairer character, has a sanction character, intervening in the case in which a subject of law does not comply with a conduct established by a rule of public law. Although contravention liability is not a specific liability of environmental law, it has an important economic role and constitutes a serious means of prevention, contraventions sanctions being the most often applied in cases of non-compliance of environmental rules.

Introduction

Next to civil and criminal liability, the liability for contravention completes the forms of classic legal liability applicable in environmental law. This form of liability, as opposed to civil liability which has mainly reparatory character, is predominantly penalizing, intervening when a subject of law does not comply with a conduct established by a rule of public law[1].

In the specialized literature, over time, there was and still is a controversy regarding the liability for contravention considered as a distinct form of legal liability, as an administrative liability or as a form of such liability. Thus, some authors[2] treat the liability for contravention as a form of administrative liability, next to the actual administrative liability and patrimonial administrative liability, naming it administrative liability for contravention[3].

Other authors of the specialized literature[4] state that administrative liability is not equal with liability for contravention, the latter being only a form of administrative liability and the contravention being a manifestation of administrative illicitness, its most serious form, in fact; the legal regime of this type of liability is predominantly an administrative law regime. The same authors are stating that this form of liability is an atypical and imperfect form of administrative liability, and the use, sometimes, of the administrative attribute is inappropriate, penalties for contravention applying not only by state administration bodies, but also by the court, so the term of administrative penalty does not keep anymore its proper meaning.

There is, however a unanimous opinion concerning the ground of the liability for contravention, namely the illegal fact that starts it, which actually represents the offense, and also it is stated that this form of liability is individual and personal; the active subject of the contravention is himself liable as this kind of liability is not transferable[5].

In this issue, we acquiesce to the opinion of authors of the specialized literature[6] that state that the liability for contravention is a distinct form of legal liability, Government Emergency Ordinance no. 2 /2001[7] on the legal regime of contraventions representing the source of law in the matter of the liability in question; the contravention benefits of its own sanctioning system, and not least, the liability for contravention is involved under a specific procedure, only if a person commits an act which has all features of the contravention.

Regarding the liability for contravention in environmental law, we consider, together with other authors[8], that it represents that form of legal liability which consists of the application of sanctions to persons guilty of violating environmental laws which provide and sanction offenses committed in connection with the protection and development of the environment.

Although the liability for contravention is not a specific liability of environmental law, it has an important economic role and it represents a serious means of prevention[9]; penalties for contraventions are most often applied in cases of non-compliance with rules of environmental protection.

The definition of contravention and the usefulness of it being defined by the legislature

Article 1 paragraph (2) of Emergency Ordinance no. 2 / 2001 generically defines the contravention as "the act committed with guilt, established and sanctioned by law, ordinance, Government decision or, where appropriate, by decision of the local council of the village, town, municipality or district of Bucharest, the county council or the General Council of Bucharest".

As for the utility of defining the contravention by the legislature, the doctrine[10] asserts that it represents a tool that practitioners use in applying the law for offenses, reflects some of the principles of the law for offenses, and also helps to delineate the scope of the contravention illicitness from the field of other species of illicit.

Thus, although there is no legal act defining the ecological contravention, this has been defined in doctrine[11] as the act committed with guilt, representing a social risk lower than the crime, and which prejudices environmental factors.

Features of the contravention

From the definition given in art. 1 of Government Emergency Ordinance no. 2 / 2001, two specific features of the contravention result, namely[12]:

[12] Other features of the contravention have been highlighted in the specialized literature, namely, typicity (the correspondence that must exist between the actual facts committed by the offender and the abstract model described by rules of criminalization of the contravention), anti-juridicity (characteristic of an act of being contrary to the existing legal order) guilt (requires the existence of a typical fact, the need for the person who committed the act incriminated to

- the act committed with guilt;
- the act provided and punishable under laws and other regulations expressly determined by law.

Below, we shall briefly present features of the contravention.

The act committed with guilt

As known, any unlawful act, in our case the contravention, is important only if committed with guilt.

Indeed, the objective liability is predominant in the environmental field; however, we consider that in the case of liability for contravention in this area, given the nature of most offenses provided in regulations, only a subjective liability based on fault can be drawn.

The legislation for contravention does not define guilt[13]; this is why its forms and ways were taken from criminal law, but they are not important (and therefore we shall not analyze them) as long as the legislation in force provides that the liability for contravention is involved, whether the act is committed intentionally[14] or by negligence[15].

Regarding the relapse into contravention, as an institution that has implications in terms of guilt, it is important to mention that there is no provision on the matter in Government Emergency Ordinance no. 2 / 2001, but according to expert authors[16], the relapse has specialized nature, consisting of the repetition of unlawful conduct in a particular field, with no general relapse into contravention; also to be noted is that the relapse into contravention remains in the contraventions area, without becoming a crime.

In the field of environmental protection, two laws are regulating the relapse into contravention, namely:

Government Decision no. 984/2005[17] on establishing and punishing contraventions to veterinary and food safety rules provides in art. 8, three situations when the relapse into contravention applies:

(1) Contraventions referred to in art. 4[18] and art. 6 letter b) section 1[19] shall be sanctioned, have realized the implications of his/her act and to have determined its effects) and legality (the feature of the offense to be prescribed by law). Ovidiu Podaru, Radu Chirita, Government Ordinance no. 2 / 2001 on the legal regime of contraventions. Commented and annotated, (Cluj-Napoca, Sfera Juridică Publishing House, 2006), 7-9.

[13] The specialized literature in the field has defined guilt in the matter of contravention as "the state of consciousness of the perpetrator while breaching a statutory provision, the violation of which is considered contravention" (Alexandru Ticlea, Regulation for contraventions, sixth edition, (Bucharest, Universul Juridic Publishing House, 2008), 9) or another definition, "the subjective state of the author of the illicit fact while infringing upon the rule of law, expressing its negative mental attitude towards social interests and values protected by legal rules" (Mircea Preda, Administrative law. General Part, third edition, (Bucharest, Lumina Lex Publishing House, 2004), 290).

[14] The fact is considered committed intentionally when the perpetrator anticipated the result of his action, pursuing its occurrence by committing the act in question (direct intention) and when the perpetrator foresaw the result of his action, and, although he did not pursue it, he accepted its occurrence (indirect intention). (Dana Apostol Tofan, Administrative law, volume II, second edition, (Bucharest, C.H. Beck Publishing House, 2009), 206)

[15] The fact is committed negligently when the perpetrator foresaw the result of his action, but did not accept it, believing without reason that it will not happen (easiness or fault with anticipation), as well as when the perpetrator did not anticipate the result of his action, although he had to and could anticipate it (negligence or fault without anticipation) (Ibid.)

[18] Article 4 of Government Decision no. 984/2005 provides several offenses, among which, for example: handling food and feed for animals with breach of veterinary and food safety rules; conducting hunting activities in areas with veterinary restrictions or without announcing the official veterinarian, as well as the consumption of venison without veterinary expertise and without veterinary documents; the storage, outside places specially prepared, of next to a fine, also by the suspension of the activity of production, processing, storage, transport and recovery of products, sub-products of animal and non- animal origin, imported or indigenous fodder, for a period of one year, provided that they are committed for the second time within 6 months from the application of the fine.

(2) The contravention referred to in art. 6 letter a) section 9[20], committed by possessors of the permit for distribution of veterinary medicinal products within the activity of distribution to third parties, shall be sanctioned next to a fine, also by the suspension of the wholesale trade of veterinary pharmaceuticals, for a period of one year, given that it is committed the second time within 6 months from the application of the fine.

(3) Contraventions referred to in art. 31, if they are committed the second time within 6 months from the application of the fine, shall be sanctioned, next to a fine, also by:

a) cancellation of the deliverer's authorization, for those provided to letter b) section 4[21] and letter d) section 3[22];

b) cancellation of the control point authorization for those provided to letter c) section 6[23] and letter d) section 4[24];

c) cancellation of the certificate for professional competence for those provided to letter b) sections 5[25] and 6[26], letter c) sections 1, 5 and 6 and letter d) sections 1[27] and 2[28].

The second piece of legislation is Government Ordinance no. 37/2002[29] for the protection of animals used for scientific or experimental purposes, which provides in art. 26 paragraph 3, the relapse into contravention which will be applied to the repeating of contraventions provided in paragraph 1[30] of the same article:

(4) In the case of repeating the contravention within one year from finding the previous contravention, the penalty of canceling the authorization for pursuing the activity of growth, supply and use of animals used for scientific or experimental purposes is also applied, next to a fine.

Two observations can be made to the above mentioned. First, in regard to penalties for the residues and animal wastes, as well the failure of companies to evacuate them to companies in charged with their processing; not complying with the technological flow and not limiting dirty areas from clean areas;

[19] Article 6 letter b) section 1: refusal to allow the access of inspectors of the authorities for animal health and food safety, in units audited for food safety and animal health control or obstructing veterinary and food safety authorities competent in exercising the powers provided by law;

[21] Article 31 letter b) section 4: rearranging or changing the means of transport in a way that affects the welfare of animals.

[22] Article 31 letter d) section 3: the absence of a navigation system, for means of transport used for long journeys, as required by law.

[23] Article 31 letter c) section 6: not respecting the balance of space for each animal species.

[24] Article 31 letter d) section 4: the functioning of control points without holding the veterinary documentation provided by law.

[25] Article 31 letter b) section 5: the non-compliance with transport practices for loading, unloading, handling and separating animals.

[26] Article 31 letter b) section 6: not respecting watering and feeding intervals, the journey duration and periods of rest.

[27] Article 31 letter d) section 1: the infringement of provisions contained in the contingency plan.

[28] Article 31 letter d) section 2: the transportation of animals injured, sick or that manifest physiological weaknesses, without the official veterinarian's approval.

[30] G.O. no. 37/2002 art. 26 paragraph 1: Under this ordinance, the following facts represent contraventions:
a) causing pain, suffering, anxiety and disability committed by the user, outside obligations assumed by him when approving the experiments;

b) the violation of instructions for housing and care of experimental animals, approved by joint order of the Minister of Agriculture, Food and Forests and of the Minister of Waters and Environmental Protection;
c) the delivery of unregistered and unmarked animals without veterinary certificate.

relapse into contravention in the cases above presented, one can notice that they are diverse and can consist, next to a fine, of the penalty of suspending or canceling some administrative authorizations. The second observation concerns the existence of a period when the contravention must be committed in order for it to be considered relapse; the period for the cases mentioned above is of 6 months, respectively one year[31].

Concerning the environmental protection, we agree with the opinion of professional authors[32] who say that the great shortcoming of the liability for contravention is to allow the relapse into contravention (besides the two acts mentioned above, which we consider insufficient), allowing, by the repetition of illegal acts, to perpetuate a state with negative environmental impact with the costs of a repeated payment of fines, situation which is much more convenient to the offender.

In this regard, we propose that, in the future, the Law for environmental protection and special laws concerning environmental protection should be modified for the purpose of introducing some situations regulating the relapse, instituting severe penalties, differentiated depending of the severity of the repeated offense, and also taking into account if the relapse into contravention was committed by a natural or legal person, in order to discourage the repetition of such illegal acts.

The act provided and punished by law and other regulations expressly determined by law

A person can be held liable for a certain act only if this act is provided and sanctioned as such, expressly, in a regulation issued by a competent body of the state, which is called legality for establishing and sanctioning contraventions[33], established in art. 1 and art. 3 of G.O. no. 2/2001.

Thus, we notice[34] that the legality imposes the compliance with certain requirements:

- the regulation for offense must be published, ensuring thus the true accessibility of every individual to its text;
- the regulation for offense can not retroactivate;
- the regulation for offense must be stated with sufficient clarity so that any person should be able to understand which actions or inactions are prohibited.

In this regard, under art. 1 and art. 2 of the Ordinance, the offense is established and sanctioned as such under law, ordinance, Government decision or, where appropriate, by decision of the local council of the village, town, municipality or district of Bucharest, the County Council or the General Council of Bucharest, and under laws, ordinances or decrees of the Government, offenses in all fields may be established and punished.

In the contravention field, we find in art. 12 of the Ordinance, the application of the most favorable regulation in criminal law, which states that "if by a legislative act, the fact is no longer considered contravention, implicitly it is no longer sanctioned, even if it was committed before the effective date of the entering into force of the new regulation. If the penalty provided in the new bill is easier, it will be applied. If the new regulation provides a more serious punishment, the contravention committed before will be punished under regulations in force at the time of its commission".

[31] In other areas, sanctions may consist of increasing the fine, and as for the period within which one new offense must be committed in order to be considered relapse, it may lack; any new offense committed, regardless of the period of time from the penalty application for the first offense, leads to the relapse situation. Constitutive elements of the liability for contravention

Since the contravention is nothing but a crime that in a time of social and cultural development is felt to be less serious, constitutive elements of the contravention are the same as those of the crime, namely, the subject, the object, the objective and subjective sides[35].

Below we shall briefly present the constitutive elements of the liability for contravention, taking into account its specific features of environmental law.

Subjects of the liability for contravention

Except for minors under 14 years and for permanently irresponsible persons, all members of society are likely to commit contraventions. For the child who turned 14 years, the penalizing regime is less severe, the minimum and maximum of the fine established under law for the fact committed is reduced by half, and the minor who has not reached the age of 16 can not be penalized with performing an activity for the community[36].

Active subject of the contravention may be a natural person, as well as a legal person.

In environmental law, the passive subject of the liability for contravention, the victim of the contravention, is the whole community, because of the general interest for environmental protection and preservation of nature[37].

The active subject of ecological offenses is represented by the natural and legal persons carrying out activities contrary to the rules or provisions on environmental protection or not meeting the legal obligations arising from legal relations of environmental law[38]. Certain additional sanctions, as we shall see in subchapter 5.4, can be applied only to legal persons, such as closing the unit, suspending the activity etc.

Another feature of subjects of the liability for environmental contraventions is that they can be, next to natural and legal persons, also some circumstantial subjects, such as public local authorities (By the complaint registered by this court under no. 9023/236/29.09.2008, the complainant C.G., requested through the Mayor, in contradiction with the respondent G.N.M.G., the cancellation of the contravention report, series GNM, no. 008370 drawn up by the respondent, on September 11, 2008. As grounds for the complaint, the complainant showed, essentially, that the penalty was unfairly applied, as C.G. had achieved measures established, and the fine of 100,000 lei was excessive and evidence of bad faith. The defense motivation showed, in essence, that the petitioner was punished because she had failed to comply with the legal obligation to establish the sanitation service. The entire report was showing that the locality Gostinari did not realize measure no.1 established by finding note no.458/01.02.2008, concerning the establishing or granting of the sanitation service. According to this finding note, a deadline was given until February 29, 2008, for establishing the sanity service in the village. The complainant annexed to the file, two decisions of the local council, no. 23/04.07.2008 and no. 27/13.08.2008. By decision no. 27/2008 of the local council, the association of C.G. with other administrative units from the county, within the Intercommunity Development Association, "Efficient management for a clean county" was approved, and by decision no. 23/2008 of the local council, the participation of C.L.G. in setting up the "Eco Walachia" Intercommunity Development Association was also approved. The court commended initiatives implemented by those decisions, but mentioned that the combination of the two associations could not replace the sanity service, therefore it can be concluded that the obligation established by commissioners of the Environmental Guard was not accomplished, being met the constitutive elements of the offense for which the sanction was applied. Compared to those shown, the court accepted, in part, the complaint and disposed the reduction of the fine imposed by the report, from 100,000 lei to 50,000 lei[39]), owners and possessors of land with or without title etc[40].

The object of the liability for contravention

The object of the liability for contravention is represented by social values, property or legitimate interests protected by legal rules that are affected or endangered by the illegal act, in our case the contravention.

The exact knowledge of the contravention object is relevant from the perspective of legal classification of the fact constituting a contravention, especially in the case of similar contravention rules[41].

Generally, contraventions are divided into regulations depending on their subject, this fact resulting from the very title of the regulation[42], for example: G.D. no. 127/1994[43] on the establishment and sanctioning of infringements of rules for environmental protection, G.D. no. 984/2005[44] on the establishment and punishment of contraventions to veterinary and food safety rules, Law no. 171/2010[45] on the establishment and sanctioning of forest contraventions etc.

The objective side of the liability for contravention

It is well known that the objective side is the action or inaction described in the rule for establishing and sanctioning the contravention, in the result that the unlawful conduct has, as well as in the causal relationship that must exist between the two elements above[46].

Contraventions can be committed either by action or by omission, as the crimes. Action means to do what the rule for contravention forbids (burning stubble, woody and herbaceous vegetation, irrespective of land and ownership, including adjacent land of passageways, except for cases permitted by environment authorities[47], unlawfully flooding land from the national forest fund, by building dams, rapids or others alike, on the beds of streams or valleys[48]), and inaction means the abstentation to perform an action that the law pretends to have performed, violating in this way, a onerative rule (failure, by the public services and responsible economic agents, of taking street cleaning measures, maintenance and management of green spaces, markets and public parks[49], the non-delimitation, by owners, of forest land which they possess, according to property documents and / or the inappropriate maintenance of property boundary signs[50])[51].

The subjective side of the liability for contravention

The subjective side concerns the offender's mental attitude towards the contravention committed and its consequences that are expressed by guilt. Therefore, we agree with the professional author's appreciation[52] indicating that, in light of current regulations, there can be no contravention committed without guilt, and as shown in the first pages of this chapter, there can be no objective liability.

Penalties for the contravention

The penalty for contraventions was defined in the doctrine[53], as a measure of restraint and rehabilitation, being applied to the offender for straightening him and for preventing the committing of other contraventions.

The penalties applicable to violations of environmental protection activities are generally, main and complementary[54].

The main penalties for contraventions are: warning, fine for offenses and providing a community service activity.

It should be noted that all main legal provisions relating to the main sanction of prison for contraventions[55] were repealed by Government Emergency Ordinance no.108/2003[56].

The complementary penalties for contravention are: confiscation of assets intended, used or resulting from contraventions, suspension or cancellation, as appropriate, of the permit, agreement or authorization to pursue an activity, closing the unit, blocking the bank account, suspension of the economic unit, withdrawal of the license or permit for certain operations or activities of foreign trade, temporarily or permanently, the dismantling of works and bringing the land to its initial state.

Application of the penalty for contravention

Applying the penalty is the second stage of the liability for contravention, which comes, naturally, after finding the fact. Without the application of the penalty, the finding report[57] of the contravention does not produce any legal effect to the offender; it is necessary for the offender to be informed on the penalty through a report ordering that penalty[58].

[55] The penalty of imprisonment for contravention is a criminal penalty which was taken exclusively from the criminal law, in the matter of contraventional law. The imprisonment for contravention consists of the offender's deprivation of freedom, for a period of one to six months and it is applied only by the court; the inspector is the body that proposes its application. Currently, under the Constitution, the imprisonment can only be of criminal nature. (Mihai Adrian Hotca, *The legal regime of contraventions. The report uncontested within the term and the irrevocable court decision resolving the complaint shall be enforceable.

In the field of environmental protection, the application of penalties for contravention pursues the achievement of the following purposes[59]:

- compelling the pollutant agent to precisely respect the law, in other words, to promote technologies and techniques that would protect the environment, preventing pollution or reducing its consequences as much as possible;
- usually, the amounts paid as a fine enter into separate special funds for financing anti-pollution investments, supporting research, providing incentives to entrepreneurs who invest in this field and for ecological reconstruction etc.;
- the fine for pollution also fulfills the role of factor of economic balance between pollutants and those that do not pollute the environment. In this way, it is intended that pollutants do not obtain, following the avoidance of investment in order to prevent or reduce pollution, higher profits than units complying with the social requirements.

Persons competent to apply penalties for contravention

The framework law in contravention matter, G.O. no. 2 / 2001 provides the application of the penalty, by the inspector.

In the field of environmental protection, G.E.O. 195/2005 establishes, in art. 97, the competent persons that can find and punish contraventions:

- commissioners and persons authorized under the National Environmental Guard and the "Danube Delta" Biosphere Reservation;
- public local authorities and their authorized personnel;
- the National Commission for Nuclear Activities Control, Ministry of National Defense and Ministry of Administration and Interior, by authorized personnel, in their fields, in accordance with powers established by law.

Paragraph 2 of the same piece of legislation provides that, finding contraventions and applying penalties is performed also by the personnel of management structures and custodians of natural protected areas, only within the protected area managed.

Applying the penalty for contravention, by the competent body, requires an accurate appreciation of the social danger of the act, in order to achieve a correct individualization of the penalty, taking into account the causes that exclude or remove the character of the contravention or the perpetrator's liability for contravention[60].

Conclusions

In this study we reached the following conclusions:

- the liability for contravention completes the forms of classic legal liability applicable in environmental law;
- this form of liability is predominantly penalizing, intervening when a subject of law does not comply with a conduct established by a rule of public law;
- liability for contravention in environmental law represents that form of legal liability which consists of the application of sanctions to persons guilty of violating environmental laws which provide and sanction offenses committed in connection with the protection and development of the environment;
- although the liability for contravention is not a specific liability of environmental law, it has an important economic role and it represents a serious means of prevention;
- penalties for contraventions are most often applied in cases of non-compliance with rules of environmental protection

Therefore we believe that the Law for environmental protection and special laws concerning environmental protection should be modified for the purpose of introducing some situations regulating the relapse, instituting severe penalties, differentiated depending of the severity of the repeated offense, and also taking into account if the relapse into contravention was committed by a natural or legal person, in order to discourage the repetition of such illegal acts.

NEW ANALYSIS OF INTERNATIONAL PROTECTION OF REFUGEES

MĂDĂLIA COCOŞATU*

Abstract
Throughout the entire world and along centuries, the human beings lived within states, under whose protection, as citizens, they exercised the entirety of the fundamental rights and liberties recognized to them on the grounds of this legal status. In spite of the increasingly accentuated development of the international regulations in the matter of the protection of human rights, even now, in the whole world is abundant in refugees[1], determining a constant concern of the international community in the area of their protection.

Keywords: Statue of refugees, asylum, international protection, asylum-granting procedures, regulations.

Introduction

The paper „New analysis of International Protection of Refugees" aims to analyse in an inter-disciplinary manner the tendencies and causes of the increase of the refugee phenomenon and to conduct a preliminary delineation of the concepts that govern this area.

Also, the aims of this study is to analyse the content of the international protection of refugees and to present special cases of refugees.

In our days, when the phenomenon of globalization is more and more actual and has many social implications, I consider that the study of this subject s very important and actual. This idea is sustains from many specialists, professors and practitioners and also from the number of studies realized by international authorities and institutes involved.

Considering that the topic of the international protection of refugees has been and still remains a crucial issue of humanity, in the paper at hand, we aim to analyze some of the most important elements necessary for outlining an overview of the current process of the international protection of refugees.

But, what determines a person to leave his/her own country? The fear of persecution, torture, prison or even death, represented the reason why the citizens lacking the fundamental human rights and liberties were forced to seek protection and assistance in a state other than their country of origin. In this situation, the protection of refugees has proven to be the responsibility of the host states; however, while the individuals were determined in increasingly large numbers to flee from the path of the dangers threatening their lives, liberty or dignity, the governments of the host countries started to face, more and more often, economic problems. Thus, the states found themselves forced to allow the performing of different activities by means of which the international organizations to be able to grant socio-legal and material assistance to the individuals who found refuge on their territory.

Although, nowadays, the tendency is to place the equal sign between the international protection of refugees and the system based on the UN Convention of year 1951, respectively the Protocol of year 1967 regarding the statute of refugees, in reality, the problem of the international protection of refugees emerged much earlier, at the end of the First World War, and continues to exist afterwards, determining the adoption of numerous instruments applicable at the regional level.

[1] In year 2008, approximately 10 million persons of the 31 million persons of interest for the United Nations High Commission for Refugees needed international protection under the benefit of the statute of refugee;

1. CONCEPTUAL OUTLINING REGARDING THE STATUTE OF REFUGEES

Establishing the fact that, within the national regulations adopted in the matter of refugees, there is the tendency to put the equal sign between the state of the refugee, the statute of the immigrant and the statute of the asylum seeker[2], the analysis of the international protection of refugees based on the UN Convention of year 1951 cannot be debated correctly and comprehensively without making a precise outline of the concepts governing this field.

Thus, a first step in the analysis of the problematic of the international protection of refugees will be represented by the differentiation of the statute of refugee in the wider frame of the migration process and in comparison to the right to asylum.

Population mobility at the world level is an economic and social phenomenon which has significantly increased in the last decade of the 20th century. Thus, at the level of the European continent, the fall of the Iron Curtain in year 1989 and the breaking of the Soviet Union in year 1991 marked the best moment in which men, women and children chose to leave their own countries and to migrate towards the western states. Faced with the numerous waves of migrants, the western states were forced to adopt a new policy regarding the statute of aliens, characterized by the diminishing of the number of assistance programs for the refugees, which no longer allowed for a clear differentiation between them and migrants. From the interpretation of the dispositions comprised in the UN Convention of year 1951 regarding the conditions a person must fulfill in order to be granted the statute of refugee and, implicitly, in order to benefit from international protection[3], it is derived the fact that the persons willingly leaving their country of origin as a result of economic conditions, famine, natural disasters, cannot benefit of this statute. Therefore, while the majority of migrants travel in order to improve their life standard, level of education, or in order to join their family members, the refugees are those who were forced to leave their countries of origin, because of the persecutions they were subjected to. We consider, however, that, when they can demonstrate the fact that the precarious economic situation in which they lived in their country of origin is a result of the persecution resulted from discrimination, oppression or breach of human rights, capable of putting their life or liberty in danger, the migrants can be granted the statute of refugees.

The statute of the refugee must not be mistaken for that of the asylum petitioner or for the right to asylum, per say. The refugee is the person who, recognized through the prism of „justified fears of being persecuted due to the race, religion, nationality, belonging to a certain social group or his/her political opinions, is outside the country whose citizenship he/she holds and who cannot or, because of this fear, does not wish to have the protection of that country; or who, not having any citizenship and being outside the country where he/she had his/her usual residence as a consequence of such events, cannot or, because of the respective fear, does not wish to return"[4], benefits of the right to asylum. The right to asylum is recognized at the international level as having a special importance in the field of refugees because it ensures both a framework for protection, and the guarantee that solutions will be sought with respect to their situation. If the statute of the refugees is regulated at the international level by means of the UN Convention of year 1951, which comprises dispositions regarding the procedure for granting the statute, the refugee' rights and obligations, the termination, withdrawal or annulment of the privileged statute, the asylum institution is regulated only at the national level and in some regional conventions[5]. However, it must be mentioned that the granting of the statute of refugee and of the right to asylum does not automatically derive from the fulfillment of the conditions listed in art. 1 letter A para 2. of the UN Convention of year 1951. Thus, any person who has committed a crime against peace, a war crime or a crime against humanity, a serious common law crime outside the recipient country, respectively facts contrary to the UN goals and principles, will be excluded from the protection granted on the basis of this international document[6].

On the other side, the asylum seeker is a generic term which designates the person who has not yet benefitted from a final decision regarding his/her application to determine the statute of refugee; the term can include either a person who has not submitted an application yet, or a person who submitted an application and is waiting for an answer. In spite of the fact that the asylum seeker is not recognized as refugee, in his/her favour is consecrated the principle of not returning as derived from the dispositions of the UN Convention of year 1951, principle which will be detailed in the pages that follow. Therefore, the asylum seeker benefits from the right to not be returned from the moment of submitting the petition and until when it will be examined equitably.

Therefore, in order to benefit of the international protection consecrated by the UN Convention of year 1951, a person, who is not on the territory of the country whose citizenship he/she holds or on whose territory he/she has his/her usual residence, as a consequence of a justified fear of being persecuted due to the race, religion, nationality, belonging to a certain social group or as a result of his/her political opinions, must go through the following steps: asylum seeker, refugee, beneficiary of the asylum right.

2. THE CONTENT OF THE INTERNATIONAL PROTECTION OF REFUGEES

2.1. Access to the territory and access to asylum-granting procedures

At the international level, an important role in the protection of human rights belongs to the activities performed by the High Commission.

According to art. 35 of the UN Convention of year 1951 and to art. 2 of the Protocol of year 1967 regarding the statute of refugees in the burden of the signing states is established the obligation to apply the dispositions of the Convention and of the Protocol, under the careful supervision of the High Commission. The persons of interest for the High Commission, for whom it is obligated to ensure the fundamental rights, are both the refugees and the related groups, such as the asylum seeker or the voluntarily repatriated refugee. The practical modalities for achieving this objective start with the safe admission to the territory of a state of the asylum seeker, where he/she can exercise his/her right to have access to the procedures for granting asylum and continue with the identification of sustainable solution such as local integration, resettlement, or voluntary repatriation. In this sense, the Executive Committee of the High Commission acknowledged the need for the national governments, the High Commission, respectively the entire international community to continue to answer to the need for asylum and assistance of refugees, until finding sustainable solutions[7].

The access to the territory of a signing state of the UN Convention of year 1951 is performed, as previously indicated, on the basis of the principle of non-return, non-discrimination, respectively family unity. What needs certain nuances and explanations in this matter is the access to the asylum granting procedure. Although there is no unitary legislation at the level of the signing states and the UN Convention of year 1951 does not expressly regulate the procedure for granting asylum, the High Commission has issued certain recommendations. In this sense, it was established that within the asylum granting procedure, an essential element is represented by the personal documents with the role of proving the identity and statute of the protected person. From this point of view, the asylum applicants must benefit of legal assistance and representation, in order to submit the asylum petition as soon as possible. On the basis of the asylum petition, the applicants will benefit of an identity document and of the proof to have submitted the petition, which will allow them access to the territory of the asylum state until the making of a final decision with respect to the application submitted. In spite of this need, the asylum seekers face difficulties, most times, in submitting the application within a reasonable time, as a result of the psychological traumas suffered in the country of origin or as a consequence of their inability to find or pay legal assistance in the matter. Once the asylum application is submitted, both the petitioners and the asylum country gain if it is rapidly examined, such as the people in need of protection to be able to benefit from it, and those who cannot be classified in the statute of refugee to benefit of the procedures made available to the immigrants. Before the authority competent to grant or refuse the statute of refugee makes a decision in the first stage, it is important that the applicant is able to personally defend his/her case before a qualified worker entrusted with analyzing the data and making an objective and impartial decision. At the same time, the asylum seekers whose petition was rejected must be given the right to formulate recourse in view of the re-examination of the application before an authority independent and impartial from the one who first decided the matter.

Following the granting of the statute of refugee, the role of the recipient states to protect the persons in question extends beyond the obligation to have access to the territory and to the asylum granting procedures, targeting, mainly, the discovery of sustainable solutions, either in the countries of origin, or in the countries of asylum or the states of resettlement.

2.2. Voluntary repatriation

At the international level, the return to the country of origin represents for the great majority of refugees the best solution to end their tragic situation. For this reason, voluntary repatriation is the sustainable solution enjoying the greatest support both from the countries of asylum and from the international community. In this sense, the Executive Committee of the High Commission established that while „ voluntary repatriation, local integration and resettlement are traditional sustainable solutions for refugees ... voluntary repatriation is the preferred solution"[8].

As derived from the conclusion of the Executive Committee, international support is given not to the process of voluntary resettlement or of repatriation, but only the voluntary repatriation process. From this point of view, we believe that we must outline the three concepts, such as to not be mistaken one for another, since they have numerous common elements.

Therefore, voluntary resettlement presupposes the return of the refugee in the country of origin, following a free decision, in spite of the fact that the risk of being persecuted still persists. Given the fact that the country of origin is not capable of offering the adequate living conditions, we consider that resettlement in the country of origin cannot be considered a sustainable solution with respect to the refugee, but only from the perspective of the host country, the protection obligation ceasing with the refugee's decision to assume the risks in the state of origin. The refugee's possibility to resettle voluntarily in the country of origin comes from the interpretation of art. 1 letter C point 4, according to which the UN Convention will cease to apply to persons who benefit of the statute of refugee, if they willingly return to their country of origin, in view of resettlement. Since the refugees benefit of the right to establish when they do and don not need international protection, the state of asylum cannot intervene in the refugee's decision to return to the country of origin, in spite of the dangers he/she is subjected to. Most times, the states of asylum can only offer refugees current and clear information regarding the condition in the country of origin. For this purpose, the refugees' representatives can benefit of the possibility to make visits in the country of origin and to present the reports drafted to the refugees in the asylum communities.

On the other hand, repatriation targets the return of the refugee in the country of origin, but, this time, against his/her will, with the mention that the risk to which he/she was subjected in country of origin ended. According to art. 1 letter C points 5-6, the Convention provisions will not apply in case the circumstances that led to the granting of the statute of refugee ceased and the person in question benefits of the protection of the state of origin. When these conditions are fulfilled, the state of asylum has the right to ask the refugee to leave its territory, even if the only option the latter has is to return to the territory of the state of origin. In order for the previous provision to be invoked, in the doctrine it was established that the change occurred at the level of the state of origin must fulfill three conditions: to be truly fundamental, to be long-lasting, to presuppose not only the elimination of the justified fear of being persecuted, but also the re-establishment of protection[9].

In what concerns voluntary repatriation, it is similar to the voluntary resettlement and is different from repatriation through the fact that the return to the country of origin is performed following a free decision; it is different from the voluntary resettlement and similar to repatriation through the fact that the risk to which the person was subjected in the country of origin has ceased to exist. Hence, by voluntary repatriation we understand the return of the refugee to the country of origin as a consequence of a freely expressed decision, at the moment when the danger of persecution ends, and the country of origin is capable of offering national protection.

Voluntary repatriation is guaranteed through a tripartite agreement concluded between the state of asylum, the state of origin and the High Commission, which undertake different international obligations, in view of the refugee's return in safety and dignity. If the asylum state and the state of origin have the obligation to contribute to the promotion of voluntary repatriation as a sustainable solution, respectively the obligation to allow its citizens to return safely, without fear of harassment or discrimination, the role of the High Commission can be summarized in terms of promotion and facilitation of voluntary repatriation. Thus, in case the asylum state cannot achieve voluntary repatriation due to the high costs it cannot cover, it can resort to the high Commission, in order to organize transport and to provide assistance necessary for reintegrating the refugees in their country of origin.

Therefore, voluntary repatriation is not limited to the process of returning to the country of origin, the High Commission also having the obligation to ensure refugees access to material resources, opportunities and services in condition equal to the other citizens, from the social, economic and cultural point of view.

2.3. Local integration

In search of sustainable solutions for the refugees, when voluntary repatriation is not possible, at the international level there is mentioned the possibility of local integration. In spite of the fact that this concept does not differ much from the states' obligation to observe the refugees' rights, established through the UN Convention of year 1951, once the right to asylum is granted, the person in question benefits from the possibility to remain in the asylum state for undetermined time, without feeling marginalized.

The rights enjoyed by the refugees in the asylum country differ from one region to another, depending on their level of development. Thus, the less developed regions do not put at the disposal of refugees the same material and social advantages of which benefit refugees in states belonging to Western Europe, North America or Australia. Therefore, most refugees targeting other sustainable solutions, such as those made available by member states, are those who have as asylum state a country in the less developed areas. Hence, in order for the integration process to be successful, it is necessary that at the international level responsibilities are divided, in view of increasing the capacity of less developed states to help refugees interact as equal members to the citizens of the host country.

On the other side, in the developed areas, the integration programs, such as foreign languages classes, professional training and the occupation of the work force, housing, have allowed refugees and their children to adapt, weakening their desire to return to the country of origin. The refugees' desire to remain in the developed countries for undetermined time was also consolidated by other factors, such as the states' practice of not withdrawing the right of stay to persons whom asylum was granted or the low number of voluntary repatriation programs made available. Although the UN Convention regulates the possibility of the signing states to withdraw the statute of refugee in case the respective person has the possibility to safely return to the country of origin, the developed states did not apply this disposition, not even in what concerns the refugees from countries where the persecution regime was replaced with a democratically elected government[10].

The national policies of local integration make available to the refugees a wide range of rights, such as the freedom of movement, access to education and to the labour market, which, on the long term determines the refugees to become less dependent on the state aid and to contribute to the development of the state of asylum.

Since local integration targets, first of all, the obligation of the states to respect all refugees' rights, as regulated by the UN Convention of year 1951, we consider that in this section of the paper the focus must be placed on art. 34[11] which establishes the possibility of the refugees to gain the citizenship of the asylum state. The granting of the citizenship of the asylum state implies both the end of the refugee statute, with all its advantages and disadvantages, and the benefit of all rights recognized to the state's own citizens. For example, the naturalized refugee will granted the right to participate to the political life of the asylum state, right which is not recognized today through the UN Convention of year 1951.

In spite of the fact that it is not expected for the states to proceed to the granting of citizenship in mass or to substantially reduce the requirements necessary for granting the statute of citizen, art. 34 institutes two specific forms by means of which this process would be facilitated for the refugees. Therefore, it is expected that the states accelerate the process of analyzing the naturalization applications submitted by the refugees and reduce the fees and costs for such as procedure, as much as possible.

Therefore, the process of local integration of refugees represents a sustainable solution combining three dimensions. Firstly, it is an economic process through which is aimed to ensure to the refugees subsistence means and a level of living comparable to the citizens of the asylum state. Secondly, it is a social and cultural process of adaptation and acceptance in the social life of the host country and of living without fear of discrimination. Thirdly, it is a legal process by means of which the refugees have a wide range of rights in the asylum state, reaching the point when they are ensured all economic, social and political rights, as a consequence of naturalization.

2.4. Resettlement

In case a refugee cannot be voluntarily repatriated and not even naturalized in the country where he/she found refuge, at the international level was developed a third sustainable solution meant to protect the persons in a situation so difficult, by granting them the possibility to transfer to another state which accepted to receive and protect them.

As refugee, a person first requires a country of asylum, which to ensure conditions of safety; however, in numerous situations, the state where he/she goes first is not capable or is unwilling to offer him/her the protection he/she needs. Therefore, the causes that determine a refugee's resettlement to a third country target either the refugee's special needs, which cannot be fulfilled in the country that granted the right to asylum, or the state's refusal to grant protection, since the acceptance of the refugees would determine a threat to national security or public order. For instance,

[10] UNHCR, The State of The World's Refugees 1995: In Search of Solutions, Chapter 2, (Oxford University Press, 1995), p.18;

[11] The contracting states will facilitate, as much as possible, the assimilation and naturalization of refugees. They will especially try to accelerate the naturalization procedure and to reduce, as much as possible, the fees and costs of this procedure.

since Turkey does not acknowledge non-Europeans as being refugees, settlement into a third country has long represented the only viable solution for the refugees from Iran[12].

The UN Convention of year 1951 indirectly regulates the possibility of the refugee to resettle in a third country in art. 30[13] which recognized to him/her the right to transfer the assets he/she introduced on the territory of the state he/she reached first, to the territory of another state, which admitted him/her in view of resettlement. Taking into account the fact that in year 2001 almost two third of the countries identified by the High Commission as being asylum states are between the first 40 countries identified through the UN Development Program as being the poorest in the world, their inability to offer long-term sustainable solutions determines the need to resettle refugees with the aid of the High Commission, to states which are capable and willing to commit national financial resources in order to integrate refugees[14].

The refugees' resettlement process presupposes a close cooperation between the state on the territory of which the refugee first fled, the resettlement third state, and the High Commission, for the purpose of sharing the responsibilities of the refugees; protection between the countries throughout the world, signatories of the UN Convention of year 1951 and of the UN Protocol of year 1969.

According to art. 2 letter f of the Statute of the High Commission, the state on whose territory the refugee arrives first must issue travel permits and other documents in view of facilitating the resettlement of the refugees. In what concerns the role of the High Commission, it targets, among other things, the capacity to encourage states to develop resettlement programs, to introduce more flexible resettlement criteria. On the other hand, the third state, although it uses its own criteria to establish who is eligible to resettle on its territory, must take into consideration the proposals made by the High Commission and analyze each separate case.

The resettlement countries benefit, however, of the possibility to refuse certain resettlement cases, as a consequence of the problems and special needs of the refugees, which would require costs much higher than the funds available. In spite of these factors, there are third parties motivated in resettling refugees difficult to place, both for humanitarian, and for economic, social, cultural reasons. Therefore, on the long term, the refugees can have an important contribution at the level of the resettlement society as a consequence of creating new enterprises and jobs, of improving productivity, the intellectual, social and cultural capacity specific to their area of origin.

3. SPECIAL CASES

3.1. The international protection of female refugee

The female refugees have, to a high extent, the same protection needs against forced repatriation, armed attacks and other violence, prolonged and unjustified detention, similar to all other refugees. In comparison with men, the women refugees have also a series of specific needs resulted from their vulnerable physical and psychic condition[15]. The High Commission, recognizing the fact that the statute of refugee has different effects on women, compared to men, prepared in year 1991 the document entitled „Guidelines on the Protection of Refugee Women", with the role of

[12] Simeon James, Critical Issues in International Refugee Law, (New York: Cambridge University Press, 2000), p.194;

[13] „A Contracting State shall, in conformity with its laws and regulations, permit refugees to transfer assets which they have brought into its territory, to another country where they have been admitted for the purposes of resettlement.

A Contracting State shall give sympathetic consideration to the application of refugees for permission to transfer assets wherever they may be and which are necessary for their resettlement in another country to which they have been admitted"; identifying the problems and risks that women refugee face, in view of outlining specific measures which can be taken in order to improve their protection.

[14] UNHCR, Refugee Resettlement: International Handbook to Guide Reception and Integration, (Geneva, 2002), p.7;

The document adopted by the High Commission targets first the problems faced by women refugee in the asylum state and does not regulate to the same extent the risks to which they are subjected at the moment of reintegration in the country of origin, as a result of repatriation. Since the risks to which women are subjected as a consequence of reintegration cause the same massive breaches of human rights as the risks to which they are subjected in the asylum country, in the paper at hand we attempt to analyze the problems and the risks, respectively the applicable measures, in view of reducing them from the two possible perspectives.

Once arrived in the asylum state, the women refugees are, most times, separated from the male family members, as a result of the chaos or as a consequence of their death during the hostilities in the country of origin, which makes the women refugees susceptible of sexual aggressions or other forms of violence. The authors of the acts of violence can be represented either by the military staff of the male citizens of the asylum state, or by the male refugees. For example, in case in the refugee camps a certain group of men control the distribution of aid, women can find themselves forced to have sexual intercourse in order to obtain food for themselves, respectively for their more vulnerable family members, such as children and the elderly, left in their care. In case a woman refugee from Somalia is subjected to rape, she will be a victim of both the attack itself, and of the social values in the country of origin which condemn a raped woman to living her entire life in shame. Also, there are cultures that establish that women cannot feed until the men have ensured all necessary surpluses, and in the refugee camps where supplies are limited, women end up insufficiently hydrated, which may lead, in certain cases, even to death[16]. In spite of the fact that women are accompanied by male family members, they can still be subjected to aggressions, either of a psychic nature, or of a physical nature. For instance, in case the man's application for asylum was rejected, the women refugee has the possibility to submit a separate application, as a result of the sexual persecution in the country of origin. At the moment when the person before who the woman refugee must have her interview for granting the right to asylum is a man, the mentioning of the aspects of a sexual nature may determine a psychic aggression, as a consequence of the details means to affect her honour. Even if sex is not explicitly mentioned in the UN Convention of year 1951 as representing grounds for justified fear of persecution, at the international level, many times, the applications for granting the statute of refugee for reasons pertaining to sex which presuppose acts of sexual violence, genital mutilation of the woman, force family planning, were accepted. In addition, some women refugees, together with their male family members, in Nepal, found themselves forced to accept to continue to live together with them, in spite of the violent and abusive relations exhibited, because the internal law presupposed that the food products and the other aids destined to refugees be distributed through the male family members[17].

In order to protect women refugees before sexual aggressions or other forms of violence, the High Commission, targets, among other things, the identification of the aggressors and their criminal prosecution, for the crimes committed. Also, the women refugees subjected to aggressions of any kind may resort to social counselors and psychologists made available to them by the high Commission. We believe that this mechanism is not efficient in the protection of female refugees because it presupposes the punishment of the aggressors as a consequence of a previous breach of the rights of women refugees, respectively the aiding of women already assaulted, and not the prevention of such criminal facts. From this point of view, the mechanisms proposed by the High Commission evolved towards a preventive system, which starts with the persons targeted by aggressors. Thus, the education of female refugees with the help of non-governmental organizations regarding their rights, guaranteed both in the national and in the international system, which not all women refugees end up knowing, may often represent a solution to the problem of aggressions to which they are subjected[18]. For example, in Pakistan, the High Commission, with the help of the local partners, established a legal assistance service of which to benefit, mainly, the female refugees, and, also, is constantly supporting workshops regarding human rights, including women's rights. In order to ensure that women refugees are not forced to offer sexual favours for the purpose of obtaining food, it is targeted that they benefit from the direct distribution of food. Also, the High Commission targets the reunification of separated families, such as the number of unaccompanied women to be reduced, and the number of women subjected to sexual assault or to other forms of violence to implicitly decrease.

[16] Hathaway, The Rights of Refugees under International Law, p. 475;
[17] Hathaway, The Rights of Refugees under International Law, 476;

The return of the female refugees to their country of origin does not represent, most times, the best applicable sustainable solution. In some situations, the female refugees must repatriate as a consequence of the decisions made for them by the male family members, and in other situations the absence of information regarding the situation in the country of origin determines them to make the decision to repatriate without knowing the real situation[19]. Since the problems women refugee face are not reduced only to the period during which they are on the territory of the asylum country, once returning to their country of origin, the women refugees risk becoming again targets of sexual aggressions or of other physical or psychic violence. For instance, they can be subjected to aggressions by the Government, the army or other persons, due to revenge for having fled the country of origin or they can be susceptible of sexual blackmail, in exchange for material assistance or in view of obtaining the documents required by the governmental officials[20]. From this perspective, the High Commission wishes to ensure women refugees equal access to the repatriation procedures, such as those who fear the situation existing in the country of origin to be protected on the grounds of art. 33 para. 1, which forbids the return. In order to allow women refugees the knowing of the situation existing in the country of origin and in order to help them make a correct choice regarding voluntary repatriation, they will be given correct and current information.

Since the role of the High Commission is to supervise the protection of refugees both in the asylum country and in the country of origin, in case of repatriation, the female refugees will benefit of international protection regardless of the country on whose territory they are, providing them legal, material and social assistance, meant to prevent possible physical or psychic aggressions.

3.2. The international protection of children refugees

As a consequence of their dependence on parents or on other adults capable of supplying them all needed for survival, as well as of their development needs, which make them more vulnerable to certain breaches of human rights, the children refugees, as the women refugees, need special protection and care. In this sense, the High Commission and the entire international community developed a multitude of international norms and policies in order to protect children refugees, both in the asylum country and in the country of origin, in the situation in which they are repatriated. The treaty establishing the standards applicable to children is the UN Convention of year 1989 regarding children's rights. In spite of the fact that this treaty does not target expressly the refugee children, the obligation of the signing states to apply it to persons under the age of 18, without any discrimination, determines the High Commission to consider the Convention regarding human rights and being the reference normative act for its actions[21]. Recognizing the fact that the statute of refugee has different effects on children, compared to adults, the High Commission prepared in year 1994 another special document called „ Refugee Children: Guidelines on Protection and Care".

[18] UNHCR, Guidelines on the Protection of Refugee Women, paragr. 52;
[19] UNHCR, Guidelines on the Protection of Refugee Women, paragr. 68;
[20] UNHCR, Sexual Violence Against Refugee: Guidelines on Prevention and Response, (Geneva, 1995), paragr. 1.4; [21] UNHCR, Refugee Children: Guidelines on Protection and Care, (Geneva, 1994) 19;

The risks to which children refugees are subjected in the asylum country vary from the ones of psychological nature, such as the act of suddenly leaving the country of origin, the leaving behind of family and friends, until those of social nature, such as the forced interruption of education, the lack of time or places for play, the pressures for recruitment from the armed groups. For the children separated from their family, these risks amplify, in comparison to the other children refugees. In a new society with different cultural characteristics, children refugees learn to adapt with the help of their parents, separation from one or the other of the parents depriving the child from the right to have a model in life[22]. The absence of either parent determined the children refugees to undertake many of the parents' responsibilities, their development needs being ignored. For instance, in case a female child refugee is in the asylum country with her brother and other smaller siblings, the daughter is forced to replace her mother in the process of caring for her siblings, thus being deprived of her right to play or to go to school. Also, female children refugees often face protection problems greater than the male children. In some societies, girls being considered inferior to boys, they risk being subjected to neglect and, in more serious cases, even to physical or sexual abuse.

The protection and assistance of children refugees before the above-mentioned dangers follows the „triangle of rights" regulated by the Convention regarding the rights of the child (the rule of the best interests, non-discrimination and participation), by promoting both the direct aiding actions and the indirect aiding actions, through the families and the entire asylum community.

The activities by means of which the direct protection of children refugees is targeted may comprise the creation of play spaces, the establishment of support groups, the granting of the right to participate in making the decisions regarding their future. In the healthy development of a child, an important place is represented by the possibility to play. Therefore, the refugee camps or the refugee admission centers must put at the disposal of the children refugees places for play, without danger, which to help their integration in the community together with the citizens' children. The establishment of support groups allows the children refugees to understand that they benefit of moral support from the persons before who they can express their thoughts and can search for advice for the problems troubling them. Together with the development of the children refugees, it is important that those who can formulate their own opinions have the opportunity to express them and to have them taken into account, and in case when the depression specific to the statute of refugee prevents them to make objective decisions, they must benefit of professional counseling.

Considering the fact that, usually, children refugees are dependent on the adults, both for physical survival and for their psychic and social welfare, one of the most beneficial protection modalities includes indirect protection by means of the family and of the asylum community. Therefore, the High Commission aims, first of all, to prevent the separation of children refugees from their families and to promote family unity. In the situation when the family members have already been separated, there are developed programs for the search and re-establishment of the contact between them. The identification of the parents or of other relatives is very important for children refugees because it offers them the hope of reuniting the family. The role of the community in the protection of children refugees derives, first of all, from the granting of the right to education, school proving to be one of the best solutions in the creative stimulation of children, respectively the development of their social skills[23]. The quality of education for the children refugees must be, though, of the same quality as that supplied for citizens of the same age. For example, in year 2004, many of the 65,000 Sudanese children refugees discovered in Uganda what in their country of origin proved to be a luxury for the majority of them, namely free primary education.

In spite of the fact that voluntary repatriation also represents in case of children refugees the sustainable solution that enjoys the greatest support at the level of the international community, the return to the country of origin does not imply the cease of the obligation of the High Commission to offer protection and assistance. Once returned, the children refugees must have access to basic resources and services, enjoying the fundamental rights and liberties to the same extent as their fellow countrymen. Hence, it is essential that the High Commission establishes partnerships with the social assistance services, the governmental and non-governmental organizations in the country of origin, in order to ensure the welfare of children refugees after their return. In this sense, there must be intensified the activities for tracing the parents or other relatives of the children refugees separated in the country of origin. In addition, since access to education represents one of the most important measures allowing children refugees to reintegrate, the High Commission must contact the Ministry of Education in the country of origin, such as upon their repatriation their studies completed in the asylum country are recognized.

[22] UNHCR, Refugee Children: Guidelines on Protection and Care, 31;
[23] UNHCR, Refugee Children: Guidelines on Protection and Care, 45;

In conclusion, the obligation to protect children refugees exceeds the territory of the asylum state at the moment when they are repatriated, being ensured legal, material and social assistance, meant to prevent the possible physical or psychic aggressions, regardless of the country of whose territory they are.

3.3. The international protection of elderly refugees

In spite of the fact that there is no express definition of the notion of elderly refugee, since the age starting with which persons can be classified in this category varies between 40 years old in some countries in Africa and 70 years old in certain states of Latin America, the older refugees wherever face common problems, both in the asylum country, and in the country of origin, following repatriation.

Elderly refugees are more difficult to integrate in the asylum country. While youngsters leave the refugee camps searching for jobs, the elderly refugees are most often left behind, abandoned by the family members who feel they do not have the resources necessary for caring for them. Because of their age, they have reduced access to the forms of occupation or the work force, to the information regarding the rights, services and facilities placed at their disposal by the national or international legislation. Often, the older refugees are not even aware of the existence of the High Commission or of the agencies entrusted with their protection or, in the situation in which they are aware of the existence of these services, they do not feel confident enough to resort to them[24]. Therefore, the elderly refugees end up facing in the asylum country extreme situations such as marginalization as beggars, horrible life conditions, absence of medical care making them vulnerable to different illnesses.

In order to avoid such situations, the High Commission must, first of all, take into account the special needs of the elderly refugees when elaborating social and legal assistance programs. The reduction of the vulnerability characteristic to the elderly refugees does not necessarily target the creation of special services for them, but it aims to ensure equal access with the other refugees to the services vital for them[25]. Since the elderly refugees may often have difficulties in accessing the clinical services or the food and aid distribution points, as a result of mobility problems, the High Commission may conclude partnerships with non-governmental organizations in sectors such as health, law, professional training in the asylum countries, through which to ensure that the elderly refugees receive the care they need. The most beneficial modality of helping the elderly refugees in the local integration process remains, however, the granting of the possibility to become involved in the projects at the level of the asylum community. In this sense, the elderly refugees can be involved in the process of teaching or caring for children. The active persons should, also, be included in non-formal educational programs or in professional training programs.

In spite of the efforts made at the level of the asylum states, the older persons are most affected by the phenomenon of social disintegration, often being forced to repatriate. Once in the country of origin, the problems of the elderly refugees are not solved, in many cases these persons remaining dependent on the High Commission for long periods of time. Therefore, upon repatriation, the High Commission must first facilitate the reunification of the family when needed, requesting the support of the countries of origin in the process of local reintegration. For example, in Croatia, the vast majority of the elderly refugees who repatriated contributed to the peace and reconciliation measures at the community level.

[25] UNHCR, Policy on Older Refugees, (Geneva, 2000), paragr. 14;

Thus, the goal of the High Commission in what concerns the elderly refugees is to offer them the possibility to live their last years in dignity and security, regardless of the country on whose territory they are, either by means of an active contribution within the asylum community, as much as possible, or by offering case and support when they become fragile from the physical or psychic viewpoint[26].

Conclusions

As a consequence of the research performed in view of achieving this paper, we can state that the adoption of the UN Convention of year 1951 regarding refugees represented an important moment within the process of the international protection of refugees, marking both the codification of all international norms in the matter, until that date, and their development by means of elaborating new rules. The character of fundamental norm of the international protection that the UN Convention of year 1951 enjoys could not, however, prevent the adoption of complementary regulations at the regional and national level.

In spite of all efforts made at the international, regional, respectively national level, the regulation of the statute of refugee experiences even today numerous gaps that determine a weak quality of the protection granted on long or short term to persons exiled from their country of origin as a result of fear of persecution.

On the one hand, we can state that through the adoption of the UN Convention of year 1951 it was not created the desired unitary international system which to allow all needy persons equal access to international protection.

First of all, the dispositions of the international document generated from the moment of the adoption and until today a variety of interpretations in the national doctrine and jurisprudence, the imprecision of the language often preventing the attorneys or judges to argue their pleas or decisions. An eloquent example is represented by art. 1 letter F of the UN Convention of year 1951, which regulates the institution of the exclusion from international protection. In the absence of express definitions, in the text of the international document, regarding fundamental notions of the process of exclusion from protection, such as crime against peace, war crime, crime against humanity etc., the interpretation of the international dispositions in the matter may differ radically at the level of the signing states, by granting extended senses, as a consequence of the national interest. Therefore, the applicant for international protection may be deprived of his/her rights recognized by the UN Convention of year 1951 and may even be forcefully returned to the state of origin, where there is a risk of persecution. An important role in the unification of the interpretations of the dispositions in the matter belongs to the United Nations High Commission for Refugees, since the documents adopted by it have a guiding role for the domestic doctrine and jurisprudence of the signatory states. Still, we believe that this guiding character is not sufficient in order to completely unify the international system of refugees' protection and, in this sense, we would propose an obligatory character of the documents for the signatory states. We consider that together with the international obligations undertaken as a consequence of signing UN Convention of year 1951, the obligatory character of the documents adopted by the United Nations High Commission for Refugees would place refugees' protection in the foreground, and the national interest would not prevail.

[26] UNHCR, Policy on Older Refugees, paragr. 11;

Secondly, in spite of the increasing number of states parties to the UN Convention of year 1951, respectively to the Protocol of year 1967, at the international level there continue to exist numerous states that did not undertake the international obligation to protect refugees. It is also true that some states host the largest part of refugees without being party to the international mechanisms regarding the refugees, but this fact does not ensure the observance of all right that this social category should enjoy. In this sense, we can take into account the case of India, which, although it is not a party to the UN Convention of year 1951, stated, through its representatives that it has always been generous with the refugees. In spite of these declarations, analyzing the legislation regarding aliens at the level of the Indian state, we will see that in order to enter the Indian territory, the foreign citizens must present at the border a valid passport and a proper visa, documents that, most often, the refugees do not have, and, therefore, their entry into India is denied. In the situation in which the refugees are able to enter the Indian territory, they can resort to the regional office of the United Nations High Commission, located in New Delhi, the refugee certificates issued by it being actually recognized by the Indian government. Still, the United Nations High Commission is not allowed to perform its activity in other regions of India, except for New Delhi and Tamil Nadu, and, therefore, the refugees located in remote parts of the country do not have access to international assistance, risking to be returned, since the Law regarding aliens, ignoring the principle of non-return, recognized both at the level of the international legal instruments, such as the UN Convention of year 1951, and at the level of custom, allows the Indian government to return aliens, including the applicants for the statute of refugee. We believe that these situations should be avoided, the United Nations High Commission having the obligation to positively influence the states in expressing their consent for becoming parties to the UN Convention of year 1951.

On the other hand, the UN Convention of year 1951 can be considered inefficient, since it is not flexible before new risks to which the refugees are subjected. From this point of view, we believe that the dispositions of the UN Convention of year 1951 are not eternal, such as, in order to not become obsolete and a relic of the Cold War, they should be modified in view of adapting to the new socio-legal conditions met today at the international level. The necessary direction for developing a system of refugees' protection by means of which to provide answers to the new requirements in the matter must be given by the High Commission as international organization with the role of searching for sustainable solutions regarding the statute of refugees.

First of all, we consider that the definition offered to the notion of refugee, based on the justified fear of persecution due to race, religion, nationality, belonging to a certain social group or political opinion, is incomplete before the new flows of refugees. Starting with year 1980, the refugee movements had a new basis, namely certain civil wars, ethnic conflicts, generalized violence, which put numerous applicants in impossibility to prove their justified fear, as regulated by art. 1 of the UN Convention of year 1951. Moreover, of the international protection promoted by the UN Convention of year 1951 can only benefit the persons outside their country of origin, thus ignoring the needs of the persons displaced internally, which are often of the same nature as that of refugees. In this sense, we can remember the millions of people relocated as a result of the civil war in Sudan and in the Democratic Republic of Congo.

Secondly, the UN Convention of year 1951 is the only major treaty regarding human rights which does not benefit of a mechanism for promoting the obligations undertaken by the states, by establishing an independent organism at the international level, with the role of contentious court. We consider that the role of the United Nations High Commission for Refugees, which targets exclusively the supervision of the observance of the dispositions comprised in the UN Convention of year 1951 is not sufficient and it should be extended such as to have elaborated a mechanism by means of which to facilitate the access of the refugees whose rights recognized by the UN Convention of year 1951 have been breached. In this sense, Government would be under the obligation to justify the measures taken, and in case of breach of the convention dispositions, to by applied drastic sanctions, in the form of money, which to enter the budget of the High Commission.

We believe that in this way would be ameliorated another important problem seen at the level of the international protection of refugees, namely the increase of the financial funds, insufficient at present, in order to find and apply sustainable solutions.

Therefore, we consider that the establishment of the international system of refugees' protection represents an important step in the development of humanitarian law and, therefore, must be properly appreciated since the first regulations and until the advanced system based on the UN Convention of year 1951, respectively on the complementary and additional regional regulations. Still, without denying the role played on the scene of the international protection of refugees and taking into account the historical changes, the UN-based system must not remain static, but must evolve in parallel with the different needs of the persons of interest to the United Nations High Commission for Refugees.

TERRITORIAL AND NON-TERRITORIAL AUTONOMY: "ROMANIAN PARADOX"

CRISTIAN JURA*

Abstract
Whereas in Romania there are 19 national minorities officially acknowledged by Romanian state, up to present, one did not manage to adopt a special law of national minorities. We identify special disposals related to national minorities in Romanian Constitution, in the law of local public administration, the law of education, the law concerning the election of the Chamber of Deputies and Senate, the law related to political parties, the law for the election of the authorities of local public administration, the law concerning the combating of all forms of discrimination.
In the last project of the Law concerning the statute of national minorities in Romania, a new concept is introduced: cultural autonomy of minorities. The cultural autonomy is a form of non-territorial autonomy.
Nevertheless, Romania is criticised by some international organisations for the fact that the organisations of national minorities represented in the Parliament of Romania have instituted a monopole, therefore no other organisation of any minority is allowed to participate to the elections.

Keywords*: non-territorial autonomy, persons who belong to national minorities, inherent rights, Council of Europe, United Nations Organization.*

Introduction

In Romania, there are 19 national minorities officially acknowledged by Romanian state: Albanians, Armenians, Bulgarians, Croatians, Greeks, Jews, Germans, Italians, Hungarians, Poles, Roma, Russians, Serbs, Czechs and Slovaks, Tartars, Turks, Ukrainians, Macedonians and Ruthenians. Disposals related to the national minorities of Romania were included in the national legislation starting with 1991. Also, Romania has ratified the most important international treaties concerning the protection of national minorities.

However, up to present, one did not manage to adopt a special law of national minorities. We identify special disposals related to national minorities in the Romanian Constitution, in the law of local public administration, the law of education, the law concerning the election of the Chamber of Deputies and Senate, the law related to political parties, the law for the election of the authorities of local public administration, the law concerning the combating of all forms of discrimination.

In the last project of the Law concerning the statute of national minorities in Romania, a new concept is introduced: cultural autonomy of minorities. The cultural autonomy is a form of non-territorial autonomy.

Nevertheless, Romania is criticised by some international organisations for the fact that the organisations of national minorities represented in the Parliament of Romania have instituted a monopole, therefore no other organisation of any minority is allowed to participate to the elections. These criticisms appear in the Report presented by Romania during the 77th CERD Session – August 2nd – 27th 2010, Annual Report of USA State Department related to the practices in the field of human rights – 2009 and the third ECRI Report about Romania adopted in June 24th 2005 (point 24).

Practically, a paradoxical situation appeared. There are minorities in Romania, but we do not have a law of national minorities, nevertheless, one requires a form of non-territorial autonomy.

The study intends, in the first part, to clear up conceptually the notion of national minorities and the evolution of this notion, and, in the second part, to analyse the inherent rights of national minorities and the role of autonomy in this situation. In the last part one presents the criticisms presented with respect to Romania in the foregoing international documents.

Evolution of the notion of «national minority»

In order to refer to persons that belong to national minorities, we have to discuss first about the apparition, crystallisation and formation of nations, as they are currently appear on the map of Europe. A particularly important principle for the formation of nations, principle with an extremely high number of supporters, was the principle of nationalities. The promotion and application of this principle, mainly in the inter-war period, had to consequences extremely important on the international plan:

- formation of modern states-nations;
- crystallisation of the awareness of affiliation to another nation, awareness manifested in case of the persons that belong to national minorities.

The apparition of the knowledge of affiliation to another nation, as joint collective awareness, generated not only several conflicts in history, but it caused as well major transformations of positive law, since 1648 – date considered by some doctrinaires as inaugural for the application of the principle of nationalities in Europe[1], up to present.

Therefore, in a scientific approach, one must firstly analyse the manner of formation of nationalities and subsidiarily the formation of modern states, and therefore the manner of separating certain segments, that formed the subsequent national minorities.

Another extremely important aspect for the analysis of the evolution on international plan of legal regulations related to the rights of persons belonging to national minorities is represented by the attempt to define the „national minority", as well as the „rights of the persons belonging to national minorities", definitions to which we shall refer during the entire work.

The issue of defining such notions is controversial and up to present no unanimously approved definition was determined. The terms related to such definitions are often ambiguous and sometimes even absent. Most of the times, one uses homonyms or synonyms, with different signification depending on the nature of the situation, with different shades, which are merged sometimes, without determining clearly the senses or without presenting enough data that may suggest the correct sense, therefore the final conclusions are sometimes ambiguous or confused.

The clear definition of senses is a key condition, since it is the only manner to emphasize the limits of the notion of rights of the persons belonging to national minorities, during the evolution of their protection on international plan.

Since 1937, it was outlined the fundamental connection between the persons belonging to national minorities and the mother nation. Therefore, the minorities are characterised by affiliation to a nation different to that which forms the main substance of such state. And here appears the controversy, as the issue of minorities is thus reduced to the problem so much discussed and unsettled, of knowing what a nation is[2].

During the same inter-war period, another doctrinaire noticed with respect to the nation that this cannot be considered but an entity belonging to the psychological field, being the creation of heart, of the feeling and of the will of each individual that forms it.

The language, the race and the common religious beliefs have, definitely, a major influence over the national feeling, however, it may happen, and it happens often, that such elements are special and there is the willing of living together. The United States of America and Switzerland are good examples in this respect.

[2] Radu Meitani, Protection of minorities, (Ph. D. Thesis, Bucharest, 1931), p. 45.

First of all, one must thus consider the willing of living together expressed by individual. It is the key factor of a nation[3], as well as of a minority.

Georges Scelle[4] expressed an opinion about this definition: „What is a minority? It is almost impossible to provide an accurate definition of this". Further on, the same author analyses the case of Switzerland, model of inter-ethnic living, where the population is spread in groups of different race, language, religion and they form thus different political, autonomous and federalised divisions, without mentioning a relation between the majority and minority population.

Without attempting to provide a definition, the International Permanent Court of Justice delimits the rights of the persons belonging to national minorities, when it passes a judgement on the protection of minorities: „firstly, make sure that those belonging to the minorities of race, religion or language are, from all points of view, equal to the other population of state. Secondly, provide the similar means for the maintenance of ethnical characters, of traditions and of national physiognomy"[5].

During the same period of the League of Nations, Paul Fauchille, in his treaty of public international law, it is made for the first time a distinction between the rights belonging to minorities and the rights of national minorities, drafting thus the theory related to individual rights and collective rights.

He stated that: „It seemed that the treaties would have been better inspired if they had provided under the protection of minorities as individuals and not as communities, the character of a universal principle, applicable to all states, regardless their rank or situation, be it large states or small states, reduced pursuant to the war or created by it, victorious, defeated or neuter. Thus, becoming indeed a fundamental rule of contemporaneous law, it would have produced everywhere its beneficial effects, without the secondary states to experience a humiliation feeling related to the idea that the protection of minorities is imposed only to them, without a state being entitled to consider it a kind of capitis diminutio, as an unfair and unilateral restriction of its suzerainty"[6].

The definitions provided to national minorities were numerous during the inter-war period, both on the level of Romanian doctrine, and on the level of foreign doctrine, and mainly of French doctrinaires. All these definitions became on a certain moment sterile, since the only thing they did was to resume, under a form or another, certain characteristic traits of minorities. Such definitions, referred to, were almost unanimous in considering that by national minority is understood a group of individuals who are living on the territory of a state and who are different from the majority of population by few distinct characteristics: race, language, religion, and which must be mainly protected. A characteristic trait of such range of definitions is the fact that minority opposes a living resistance to assimilation and does not have, as community, international rights[7].

This incoherence in defining national minorities, in fact the incapacity of states of approving a definition, continued as well after 1945, after the end of the Second World War.

The bipolar model of post-war society determined the issue of the rights of persons belonging to national minorities to be less promoted, preferring rather the promotion of non-discrimination principle on international plan, than granting, by conventional means, of some rights to the persons belonging to national minorities. However, the block policy made almost impossible the approach of such specific issue, until 1975, when, in the Final Document from Helsinki, was introduced, as a counter-weight to the principle of non-interference in the internal business of states, the principle of promotion and protection of human rights as fundamental principle of public international law. this point of view, we may consider that the principle of observing the human rights was extremely important as well for the protection of the rights of individuals belonging to national minorities, the latter being included in the general system of protection of human rights.

The most important achievements for the promotion and protection of the rights of individuals belonging to national minorities were obtained after the disappearance of what was called bipolar international society, namely at the end of `90s. We consider the most important documents related to the protection of the rights of individuals belonging to national minorities the following: Declaration on the rights of individuals that belong to national or ethnic, religious or linguistic minorities[8] on universal level, within the Organisation of United Nations, as well as the European Charter of regional or minority languages of 1992 and the Frame-Convention for protection of national minorities of 1994, both documents having a regional dimension, being adopted within the Council of Europe.

During the period 1990-1994, one did not agree either on a definition related to national minorities, preferring either apophantic definitions, or definitions similar to that provided by the International Permanent Court of Justice[9].

However, as stated, the issue of national minorities is not new; a definition of national minorities unanimously approved wasn't provided yet. It is noticed that the rights of the individuals that belong to national minorities are approached in documents related to the range of human rights, in separate articles, parallel to disposals that stipulate the same rights for all persons. We notice as well that, beside the documents that refer to national minorities, one speaks about minorities in general, the national minority being one which, regarded from a certain angle, may incorporate the others as well, countrywide. Thus, a cultural minority may be integral part of a national minority, whereas the latter may include several cultural minorities.

A shading of such approach of the issue of minorities is definitely enforced. Opposite to the manner of approaching such field in Central and Eastern Europe, where national minorities represent an important segment of social-political life – situation influenced as well by the historical conditions faced by this geographical area, in Western Europe, we may practically say that no one speaks about national minorities, but about the so-called „ethno-cultural groups", category which includes both ethnical minorities and the migrants.

Returning to the definition assigned to national minority, it must be said that in the preamble of each international document one states the signification that such document provides to a certain concept, in this case to national minorities, fact which supports the idea that one did not agree yet a definition of national minorities.

The recommendation 1134 with respect to the rights of national minorities, adopted by the Parliamentary Meeting of the Council of Europe on October 1st 1990 defines the minorities as „ separate or distinct, well-defined groups, settled on the territory of a state, the members being citizens of such state and presents certain religious, linguistic, cultural, or other traits that distinguish them of the majority of population (art. 11)".

In terms of the Recommendation 1177 related to the rights of minorities, adopted by the Parliamentary Meeting of the Council of Europe on February 5th 1992, the national minorities are „citizens that share specific cultural, linguistic or religious traits" and who „may want to be acknowledged and secure the possibility to express them", following that, in the next paragraph, to be stipulated that „these are groups sharing such specifications inside a state, which the international Community, after the first world war, calls them minorities, without implying any inferiority in any field".

[9] The International Permanent Court of Justice defined minority as a „group of persons who are living in a country or locality, having their race, religion, language and traditions, united by their identity in a solidarity feeling, with a view to maintain the traditions, the religious forms and providing education and raising children in the spirit and traditions of their race and mutual help"; see P.C.J.I., series B, no. 17, p. 19, quoted by Raluca Miga-Beşteliu, International law. Introduction in public international law, (All Publishing House, Bucharest), 1998, p. 192; taken over from F. Capotorti, Study on the Rights of Persons belonging to Ethnic, Religious and Linguistic Minorities, (United Nations, New York, 1991), p. 5.

Also, in the meeting report, CSCE of experts on national minorities' issues (Geneva, July 19th 1991), it is tried another approach of defining minorities, outlining that „not all ethnic, cultural, linguistic or religious differences entail necessarily the creation of national minorities".

It is known the fact that, submitted to influences during the formation process, the language of a people has many dialects, in some countries the differences being higher, in other smaller, but, on a whole, without differences meant to create a new language, different of that of the country where such area is situated. Concerning the cultural differences, by a brief historical incursion, we shall notice the influences of migrants and then the feudal division of territories, division that determined these to be successively submitted to several cultural influences. With respect to religion, it must be stated that, pursuant to international consecration of religious liberty, each individual is free to choose any officially acknowledged religious cult, the enfranchising of the concept of religious minority generating a religious intolerance, that should be abandoned in the immemorial times of Middle Ages. One may definitely speak, from a strictly statistic point of view, about religious minorities, however a national minority cannot and must not be defined in terms of religion.

The U.N.O. subcommission for the prevention of discrimination and protection of minorities, in 1950, proposed the following definition: „The term of minority includes only those non-dominant groups of population, which possess and want to maintain stable ethnical, religious or linguistic traditions or characteristics, obviously different from those of the rest of population. Such minorities must properly include an appropriate number of individuals, in order to be able to develop such characteristics. The members of such minorities must be loyal to their citizenship state". In this approach, what draws the attention is the fact that it is imposed a so-called relative limit, that of an „appropriate" number of persons so a group may be considered a national minority. At the same time, in the last part is determined as well an obligation meant to secure and determine the frame of manifestation of the rights of national minorities.

Leaving from this definition, twenty years later, in a study related to minorities, Francesco Capotorti said about a minority that it is: „A group numerically inferior to the rest of population of a state, in a non-dominating position, the members – citizens of state – possessing, from an ethnic, religious, or linguistic point of view, different characteristics than those of the rest of the state and expressing even implicitly a solidarity system with respect to the purpose of preserving their culture, traditions, and religion".

A wide definition, maybe the broadest one, is provided in a document project submitted to the Council of Europe in 1993, as Annex to the Recommendation 1201 of the Parliamentary Meeting of Council, respectively the project of Additional Protocol to the European Convention of human rights related to the individuals that belong to national minorities:

„In terms of this convention, the expression of national minority designates a group of individuals in a state, who:

a) have the residence on the territory of such state and are citizens of it;

b) maintain old, solid and durable relations with this state;

c) present specific ethnical, cultural, religious or linguistic traits;

d) are enough representative, although they are less numerous than the rest of the population of such state or region;

e) are inspired by the will to maintain together what forms their common identity, mainly their culture, traditions, religion and language".

Pursuant to such definitions, one may conclude that the basic criteria to define a group as national minority are:

- the proper number of individuals to be considered national minority;
- citizenship of the state where they are living;

- the maternal language, ethnie, culture or religion, to be different than that of majority of population.

An interesting position, relevant to be mentioned herein, is that of European Union which, on the institution level, does not operate a concept of national minority. It is a signal for the future to waive this concept, to eliminate the privileged status of all national minorities, comparatively to ethnical groups, and to focus on the protection of specificity of ethnical diversity.

One must state as well the Instrument of Central European Initiative of 1994 for the protection of the rights of individuals belonging to national minorities. In this document, one defines national minority in art. 1 par. (1) as follows: „For the purpose of this instrument, the term of national minority will have the signification of group which is less numerous than the rest of the population of a state, having citizen-members with ethnic, religious or linguistic traits different of those of the rest of population and who are animated by the will to safeguard their culture, traditions, religion or language".

Pursuant to analysing the definitions assigned to individuals belonging to national minorities, we propose the following definition: the individual belonging to a national minority is that person who is a part of a group on the territory of a state and having the citizenship of such state, representative, but numerically inferior, distinct from the majority in terms of specific, ethnic, linguistic, religious traits and who exercises its rights individually, with the other members of the group culturally related to.

Rights inherent to individuals belonging to national minorities

Considering that an individual belonging to national minorities is a person related to a minority group, but citizen of a state, it enjoys thus all rights provided to the citizens of such state. Thus, it is raised the question whether such person needs special protection, to be granted by the state to which it belongs as citizen, either directly, by the internal legislation of such state, or indirectly, through the participation of such state to specific international conventions.

In order to be able to answer this question, it is necessary to analyse whether there are inherent rights of the persons belonging to national minorities, different from those of majority.

During the inter-war period, such issue was weakly theorized. It was the principle of non-discrimination that one applied in the peace treaties, for instance art. 9 of the special Treaty between the Main Powers Allied and Associated as well in Romania[10].

After the second world war, the Declaration on the rights of individuals who belong to national or ethnic, religious and linguistic minorities dated 1992 is the first document that clearly enumerates the specific rights of the persons belonging to national minorities.

According to this document, the inherent rights are:

- the right to its own culture, to its own religion, to use its own language;
- the right to organize and manage its own organisations;
- the right to entertain relations with the other members of the same group;
- exercising such rights individually and jointly.

In the text of this Declaration is stipulated as well the obligation of states to the protection of existence and national or ethnic, cultural, religious, linguistic identity of minority.

The Frame-Convention for protection of national minorities relies to a great extent on the application of non-discrimination principle opposite to individuals that belong to national minorities, but the specificity of such Convention consists in instituting a mechanism of supervision by the Committee of Ministers of the Council of Europe to apply it.

In the specialised doctrine[11] it is considered that a right inherent to the individuals belonging to national minorities is the right to identity and the correlative obligation of the states to protect such right. Thus, there are several kinds of identity:

[10] The Treaty was signed in Paris on December 9th 1919 and was effective on September 4th 1920

- cultural identity;
- linguistic identity;
- religious identity.

In this context, it is deemed that protection of identity represents a synthesis of the protection of the rights of individuals belonging to national minorities. It is also distinguished between „common field", as a range of rights and obligations incumbent upon all citizens and secured to all, without discrimination, and the "specific field", including specific rights of individuals belonging to national minorities, related to the protection of different issues of their identity.

The identity balance must be attached a fair balance between rights and obligations.

Pursuant to the analysis of the range of inherent rights and correlative obligations of individuals belonging to national minorities, it results a certain legal paradox: the individuals belonging to national minorities have inherent rights that are not different from those of majority, but they need a special protection.

1. Right to use maternal language[12]

The realities show that several populations from all states remain loyal to their language, different from that of majority or from other languages. The prediction of some specialists, a few decades ago, that a universal law will be determined, which, being better adapted to a harmonious collaboration with the computers, would impose upon humanity, proved to be an utopia. The maternal languages maintain an important social function meaning that they represent the ground of national identity.

With respect to the right to use maternal language, the European Charter of Regional or Minority Languages stipulates in the preamble that „the right to practice a regional or minority language in the private and public life represents an imprescriptibly right, according to the principles included in the International Pact related to civil and political rights of United Nations and in conformity to the spirit of Convention for the protection of human rights and fundamental liberties of the Council of Europe".

Therefore, the right to use maternal language is a fundamental right of national minorities, breaching it entailing, eventually, its disappearance.

However, it is known the fact that, although language is an indispensable element of culture, maintaining and developing one's own culture depends on the study of maternal language or even on the education in such language.

Nevertheless, there is a difference between studying maternal language and education in such language, difference worth to mention and analyse. The study of maternal language involves that the educational process to be carried out in the official language of a state following that, in the education curriculum, to be introduced courses study maternal language. Regarded from this point of view, the right to use maternal language could seem limited. It must be considered however the fact that, since infancy, the children belonging to national minorities learn the maternal language both within the family and in the community.

The education in maternal language is a more complex process, which involves adjusting the legislative frame in several fields, as proved in the situation from Romania. It worth mentioning the fact that the educational process in maternal language cannot be carried out on the highest level in all specialisations as long as the constitutions of states stipulate the existence of an official language, language used in justice, medicine, research etc. At the same time, in the areas with high concentration of national minorities, one may allow, by law, the use of the language of such minorities on official level in the relations determined by them in the foregoing fields. If knowing the official language is an obligation of the citizens belonging to national minorities, the European Charter of Regional or Minority Languages stipulating that „protecting and encouraging regional or minority languages must not be done in the detriment of official languages and of the need to appropriate them".

There are cases when persons belonging to national minorities do not know the official language of the state of their citizenship. This may generate problems mainly when the work carried out involves multiple connections with the citizens of other minorities or of majority or in technical fields where knowing specific terms is a must.

The problem is delicate, far of being settled, generating several polemics and even tensions inside a mixed community, mainly where the communities of national minorities are a majority. The faulty application of this right or the existence of a legal frame rather unclear and incoherent lead inevitably to discrimination, exclusion of national minorities from certain fields of public rights, separation and isolation of communities, absence of dialogue and occurrence of interethnic tensions.

In the last years, it was attempted in Romania[13] to promote some measures in order to support the protection of national minorities' languages by adopting highly liberal laws (for instance, law of local public administration, law of education, statute of public officers), laws that did not solved yet entirely the problem.

2. Right to its own culture[14]

As seen in the previous section, the cultural criterion is an important one in terms of including a group in the national minorities.

Consequently, the observance of such criterion generates a legitimate right both for the person belonging to the national minority, and for the communities in this category.

The Universal Declaration of Human Rights and the International Pact related to the economic, social and cultural rights stipulate the right of every individual „to get involved in cultural life". The Pact adds the obligation of member states „to take the measures necessary to maintain, develop and spread science and culture". In order to conclude, we may add the Declaration related to the principles of international cultural cooperation, proclaimed in the general Conference of UNESCO in 1966, where it is mentioned that „Any culture has its own dignity and value that must be observed and maintained; (...) in their fecund variety, diversity and mutual influence that they exercise one over the others, all cultures are a part of common patrimony of humanity".

Both pacts related to human rights stipulate several rights that more or less concern the benefit of one's own culture, such as the right of parents to enrol their children to any school, on their discretion, the liberty of expression, the liberty of press, of reunions, religious liberties and others. All these are elements of the right to culture of any individual.

However, this position generally expressed of application of the right to culture, reported to all communities regardless if they belong or not to national minorities. The problem is to find the specificity of such right opposite to minorities and the components included by it during the process of its manifestation.

Some authors refer, in this respect, to customs, habits, traditions, rituals, kinds of dwelling, as well as to the manufacture of pieces of art, cultivation of music, founding cultural organisation, publication of books in their own language, as well as the right of transmitting one's own culture by education to future generation, either by separate schools, or by providing respect to the cultures of minorities in public schools, and, with respect to indigene populations, to their ancestral connection with the land.

Returning to national minorities, it must be stated that, in the performance of such right, the state authorities must firstly provide the conditions necessary for the manifestation of such specific customs in the sense of securing a «controlled permissiveness» related to the freedom of using maternal language in the education of children belonging to national minorities, access to information and free circulation of it in the language of minorities, as well as the encouragement of their cultural manifestations.

I have used the term of « controlled permissiveness » to outline the fact that the existence of this right entails obligations of both parties, meaning that exercising the minority specific rights, in general, and that to its own culture, with everything it involves, must be included in the sphere of national interest, principle synthesized in the collocation «policy of minorities subscribed to national policy».

The frame convention concerning the protection of national minorities adopted by the Council of Europe in 1994 includes much more complex and detailed disposals. The member states undertake to promote the necessary conditions so the minority persons may maintain and develop their culture and to maintain the essential elements of their identity, mainly the religion, the language, the traditions and cultural inheritance. It is resumed the obligation member states to observe the right of such individuals to peaceful reunion, freedom of association, expression, thinking, consciousness and religion. Examining thoroughly this field, the Convention stipulates the freedom of having opinions, of receiving and sharing information and ideas in the language of minority, without the interference of public authorities. This interference of public authorities must be construed in terms of not controlling the circuit of information, but, on the other hand, it is necessary a minimum supervision related to that information concerning the national safety.

The member states undertook, as well, to adopt the measures necessary in order to facilitate the access of such persons to the means of information and to allow cultural pluralism. In this respect, the member states undertook to encourage the spirit of tolerance and intercultural dialogue, to take effective measures in order to promote the mutual respect, understanding and cooperation between all persons on their territory, mainly in the field of education, culture and means of information.

It must be outlined as well the fact that the origin of a national minority is important, meaning that the past and the manner of arriving on the territory of a state acquiring the capacity of minority, highly influence the manner of manifestation and the customs. Therefore, we distinguish several categories of minorities:

a) historical national minorities – those minorities on the territory of a state for several centuries, arriving there pursuant to some historical events (Hungarians, Germans in Romania);

b) migrants – those minorities on the territory of a state for a short period, arriving there pursuant to social, economic conditions in their origin country (Arabians in Western Europe);

c) national minorities originated from slaves – those minorities brought from their origin countries as slaves, obtaining subsequently their freedom (Roma in Romania, Afro-Americans in USA).

Synthesising the foregoing, we may conclude that exercising the right to one's own culture is performed within an organised state frame governed by international rules, but considering the interests specific to each geographical area and the characteristics of national minorities in such area.

3. Right to practice and profess one's own religion[15]

As determined, religion does not represent a distinguishing criterion of a minority group from a majority. The Universal Declaration of Human Rights[16] stipulates in art. 18 that „any person has the right to freedom of thinking, consciousness and religion, this right involves the liberty to change its own religions and beliefs, individually or collectively, both publicly and privately, by education, practices, cult and performance of rituals". This concept was taken over by the majority of world's

[16] Declaration of Human Rights available at: http://www.un.org/en/documents/udhr/

Constitutions, the religious liberty not being discussed in democratic countries. The religious liberty involves, first of all, the acknowledgement by state of the religion or cult practiced by a religious community. This right cannot survive alone, but with other fundamental human rights such as liberty of expression or freedom of consciousness.

It must be outlined the fact that religions are universal. They are not limited to the territory of a state, but, given the free circulation and freedom of consciousness, they have supporters worldwide. Therefore, it is erroneous the assertion according to which we may speak about religions specific to national minorities and, implicitly, assimilation of the term of national minority with that of religious minority

From the point of view of the supporters of a religion on the level of a state, the right to practice the religion in the language of a minority is fully grounded meaning that, where a minority community represents a religious majority, one may adopt the language of such minority in practicing such cult, this involving as well the preparation of clerks in this respect. However, the officials of the clerk of such cult are competent in this respect, the state having the obligation to provide the frame of manifestation of religious liberty and to combat the manifestation of intolerance of other religious communities.

4. Autonomy[17]

Enumerating the rights specific to national minorities, we must analyse as well the concept of «autonomy» much claimed currently.

The term of «autonomy» represents a delegation of central power to local authorities, offering them a wider range of competences in settling the problems of interest for the territorial units of the state.

In the democratic countries, in their great majority, the autonomy is the result of power decentralisation, many attributions belonging to the local authorities elected by the communities in such area.

The same is valid as well in the case of federal states, however, due to the system, the signification of the term of «autonomy» is rather different, involving several components than in the case of unitary states.

It must be emphasized the fact that the issue of autonomy, referring directly to the constitutional field, represents an internal problem of every state, any external involvement being rejected, in terms of suzerainty principle.

Referring to autonomy in the context of national minorities relies on the idea according to which adopting autonomy on ethnical bases would create the proper frame for the development of a minority and for exercising its specific rights.

This idea is wrong, the development of the communities of national minorities as well as the exercising of their rights cannot be done by excluding other minorities or even the majority. The frame for the manifestation of citizens' rights is unitary, any attempt to ignore it being sanctioned by society.

However, in terms of this issue, the report of CSCE[18] meeting of experts with respect minorities (Geneva July 1-19th 1991) shows that „considering the diversity and variety of their constitutional systems, which determine that no approach is generally-applicable, the participating states notice that some of them have obtained positive results in a democratic manner, such as:

- local and autonomous administration, as autonomy on territorial base, including the existence of some consulting, legislative and executive bodies, elected by free and periodical elections;

[17] Ion Diaconu, Minorities of third millennium – between globalism and national spirit, (Romanian Association for Democratic Education, 1999), p. 237.

[18] See the tansformation of CSCE see http://www.osce.org/

- self-administration by a national minority of the issues related to its identity, in situations when territorial autonomy does not apply;

- forms of decentralised or local government".

The track followed by Romania is local autonomy relying on territory, the legislation determining this principle.

It would be interesting to analyse, briefly, the three models of autonomy proposed by the states participating to CSCE meeting of experts concerning the minorities.

The first model relies on local elections that may lead, by increasing the attributions, to bodies competent to solve locally the issues in their sphere of attributions, such as to adopt a certain strategy for the development of the area.

The second model, created mainly for national minorities, stipulates the existence of a system specific to the communities of national minorities, able to solve their particular problems, problems known better by persons belonging to a minority. But this does not involve eluding the attributions of the bodies of local public administration, liable for a wider community, which may include several minorities and majorities.

Eventually, we believe that the last model refers to federal states, the term of local government involving the delegation of the most important attributions of the executive, in the unitary states, this model not being able to operate satisfyingly.

Against the autonomy relying on ethnical criteria, it is adopted the European Charter of Local Autonomy in Strasbourg on October 15th 1985, defining the concept of «local autonomy» as „effective right and capacity of local communities to settle and manage in terms of law, under their own liability and in the advantage of such populations, an important part of public works". It is stipulated that this right is exercised by councils or meetings formed of members elected by free, secret, equal, direct and universal vote and who may dispose of executive bodies subordinated to them. It is expressly stipulated that the exercise of such rights has a territorial base, namely the administrative-territorial units for which such bodies are elected, by vote.

Also, the Charter stipulates expressly the application of the principles of local autonomy opposite to local communities from all administrative-territorial state units, without exception. No connection is determined between the ethnical and minority dimension and the local autonomy, between ethnical origin of the inhabitants of a territorial unit and the concept of local autonomy.

Local autonomy is thus defined as principle of internal organisation of states, as manner of performance of decentralised government system, integral part of democracy, without ethnic or minority connotations.

Discussing about local autonomy, we cannot ignore the Recommendation 1201/1993 of the Parliamentary meeting of the Council of Europe, entitled „referred to an additional Protocol to the European Convention of human rights, concerning the rights of national minorities"[19].

In the „Proposal of additional Protocol", which is integral part of the recommendation, it is stipulated, in art. 11, that: „In the areas where they form a majority, the individuals belonging to a particular national minority are entitled to dispose of proper local or autonomous administration, or of a special statute, in terms of the national legislation of the state".

We must outline here the legal character of recommendation which is not obligatory, according to Communitarian Law, the disposals therein may be applied by each state according to its own interpretation.

Concluding, the concept of «local autonomy» does not refer directly to national minorities, by transposing it in practice, one must consider the constitutional issues of a state, the ethnic structure of an area, as well as the regional social-economic realities.

In the last law project related to the status of national minorities, one attempts to introduce a new form of autonomy, namely the cultural autonomy. Therefore, such form of autonomy is non-territorial. According to the foregoing project, cultural autonomy is defined as being the capacity of the community of a national minority to have decisional competences in the problems related to its cultural, linguistic and religious identity, for councils elected by its members. For the operation of the disposals of such project, the organisations of citizens belonging to national minorities may initiate the incorporation of the National Council of Cultural Autonomy. The National Councils of Cultural Autonomy are administrative autonomous authorities, with legal personality.

The cultural autonomy of national minorities refers to the following categories of competences:

a) elaboration of strategies and priorities with respect to the education in the maternal language of national communities;

b) organisation, management and control of education in the maternal language in private institutions of education, or participation in partnership with competent public authorities to the accomplishment of such attributions, in case of the institutions from the public system of education;

c) organisation, administration and control, in terms of law, of cultural institutions of private law in maternal language, or of research and development of one's own culture, or, if the case, the participation in partnership with competent public authorities to the accomplishment of such attributions, in case of cultural institutions of public law;

d) incorporation and management of one's own means of mass communication, or participation in partnership with competent public authorities to the organisation of some positions, sections, editorial offices, or programs within public companies of radio and television;

e) participation to the elaboration of strategies and protection priorities and the valuation of historical monuments, respectively of movable cultural patrimony of such national minority;

f) management or, if the case, participation in partnership with competent public authorities, or supervision of management of funds meant for financing specific activities in the field of maintaining, developing and expressing cultural, linguistic and religious identity of national minorities;

g) designating the management of private institutions of education teaching in the language of national minorities, as well as of cultural institutions of private law of such national minorities;

h) approving the designation of the management of state institutions of education teaching in the language of national minorities, as well as of the public institutions of culture of such national minorities, in terms of law;

i) proposing the designation of the management of state institutions of education, where are operating subunits with teaching in the maternal language;

j) proposing to designate some representatives of such national minorities within the Ministry of Culture and Cults and the Ministry of Education and Research, within some departments with attributions related to the culture of national minorities and education in the maternal language of national minorities;

k) setting-up and offering some grants and cultural and scientific prizes.

l) determination of some special fees for persons belonging to national minorities, in terms of law, with a view to provide the operation of the institutions of cultural autonomy.

5. System of protection of national minorities in Romania in terms of some international institutions.

Disposals of the 3rd report of ECRI about Romania, adopted on June 24th 2005[20]

A law project related to the statute of national minorities is being currently discussed in Romanian Parliament. This project, elaborated in 1995 and amended several times since then, includes in Article 3 a definition of Romanian national minorities. They are defined as communities living in Romania for at least a century, having their own national, ethnic, cultural, linguistic and religious identity, and intend to maintain, express or promote such identity. This law project includes a chapter about cultural autonomy which guarantees the right of national minorities to have their own institutions in fields such as culture, education and mass-media. Moreover, this chapter defines the manner of operation and supervision of such institutions and stipulates the right to education in the languages of minorities, the political representation of national minorities and a more supported involvement of them in the process of adopting decisions. This law project proclaims the non-discrimination principle, forbidding any kind of discrimination and instigation to discrimination.

However, ECRI notes concernedly that the section of such law project referring to the organisations of national minorities determines all new organisations willing to represent minorities to be governed as well by the conditions stipulated by Law No. 67/2004 concerning local elections. This chapter includes thus a range of conditions that such organisations cannot practically accomplish. It maintains as well the status quo principle, stipulating that all organisations of national minorities already members of the Council for National Minorities and represented in parliament, will maintain their legal status and will hold the rights and duties stipulated in the law project related to the status of national minorities. Since one of the effects of such conditions is that of obstructing the right of national minorities to elect their representatives, ECRI considers that national minorities are on a disadvantaged position opposite to the majority of population, free to elect its political leaders on all levels.

Disposals of the report of USA State Department related to human rights published in 2011[21]

Organizations representing ethnic minorities may also field candidates in elections. If the minorities in question are "national minorities," defined as those ethnic groups represented in the Council of National Minorities, their organizations must meet requirements similar to those for political parties. For organizations representing minorities not represented in the parliament, the law sets more stringent requirements than those for minority groups already represented in the parliament; they must provide the Central Electoral Bureau with a list of members equal to at least 15 percent of the total number of persons belonging to that ethnic group as determined by the most recent census. If 15 percent of the ethnic group amounts to more than 20,000 persons, the organization must submit a list with at least 20,000 names distributed among at least 15 counties plus the city of Bucharest, with no fewer than 300 persons from each county.

According to the constitution each recognized ethnic minority is entitled to have one representative in the Chamber of Deputies even if the minority's organization cannot obtain the 5 percent of the vote needed to elect a deputy outright, but only if the organization received votes equal to 10 percent of the average number of votes nationwide necessary for a deputy to be elected. Organizations representing 18 minority groups received deputies under this provision. There were 49 members of minorities in the 471-seat parliament, nine in the Senate and 40 in the Chamber of Deputies. At the end of the year, there were four members of minorities (all ethnic Hungarians) in the 17-member cabinet. Ethnicity data was not available for members of the Supreme Court.

Ethnic Hungarians, represented by the Democratic Union of Hungarians in Romania, an umbrella party, were the sole ethnic minority to gain parliamentary representation by passing the 5 percent threshold. Only one Romani organization, the Roma Party-Pro Europe, was represented in the parliament, by one member of parliament. Low Romani voter turnout likely resulted from a lack of awareness, inability to demonstrate an established domicile, and absence of identity documents.

Conclusions

In Romania, there is no doubt that human rights and the rights of individuals belonging to national minorities are observed. In this respect there are several guarantees, some deriving from internal rules, others from transposing some international norms in the internal legislation by ratification.

Nevertheless, the initiators of the law project concerning the statute of national minorities follow to reach two objectives. The first objective refers to the introduction of a new concept in the national legislation: cultural autonomy, as non-territorial form of autonomy. The second objective concerns the maintenance of stats – quo for the organisations belonging to national minorities represented in parliament. As may be noticed in the analyses of some international documents, Romanian state is criticised on international level for such initiative in the field of the rights of individuals belonging to national minorities.

The future will reveal as whether this legislative proposal is to concretize and which is going to be the final form of initiative or whether it remains a simple law project never adopted.

THE RESULT OF THE FIRST CASE AGAINST ROMANIA REGARDING THE IMPLEMENTATION OF THE RACIAL EQUALITY DIRECTIVE (2000/43/EC) AND OF THE EQUAL TREATMENT DIRECTIVE (2000/78/EC)

CRISTIAN JURA*

Abstract
The main objective is to present and analyze the final result of the first case against Romania regarding the transposition of The Racial Equality Directive (2000/43/EC) and of The Equal Treatment Directive (2000/78/EC) into national legislation: preliminary ruling C-310/10 (Agafiței and Others, Romania) and the possible impact of this case.
In 2011 I published in CKS 2011 an article regarding the firs case against Romania regarding the transposition of The Racial Equality Directive (2000/43/EC) and of The Equal Treatment Directive (2000/78/EC) into national legislation.
Meanwhile the European Court of Justice decided in this case.

Introduction

In 2011 CKS, I analyze the first case introduced against Romania in front of Court of Justice of European Union, Case C-310/10[1].

In 2010 there was introduced Reference for a preliminary ruling from the Curtea de Apel Bacău (Romania) lodged on 29 June 2010 — Ministerul Justitiei si Libertătilor Cetătenesti v Ştefan Agafitei and Others[2]. The case was about salary rights of judges - Discrimination on grounds of membership of a socio-professional category or place of work - Conditions for compensation for the harm suffered - Directives 2000/43/EC and 2000/78/EC.

This was the first case first case against Romania regarding the transposition of The Racial Equality Directive (2000/43/EC) and of The Equal Treatment Directive (2000/78/EC) into national legislation: preliminary ruling C-310/10 (Agafiței and Others, Romania).

On 7th of July 2011 the Judgment Court (Fourth Chamber) ruled that the reference for a preliminary ruling from the Curtea de Apel Bacău (Romania) is inadmissible.

Based on the facts mentioned above, I took the decision to analyze the whole C-310/10 case for CKS 2012. This research could be one of the fewest on the cases submitted to Court of Justice of European Union.

In order to have a clear picture of this case, I will introduce also the procedure for the preliminary ruling in front of Court of Justice and the EU legal frame work on combating discrimination.

The preliminary ruling in front of Court of Justice of European Union

The procedure of preliminary ruling is based on the Chapter 9 Preliminary Rulings and other References for Interpretation, art. 103 – 104 from Consolidated Version of the Rules of Procedure of the Court of Justice (2010/C 177/01)[3] and on Information Note on References from National Courts for a Preliminary Ruling (2009/C 297/01)[4].

Under the preliminary ruling procedure, the Court's[5] role is to give an interpretation of European Union law or to rule on its validity, not to apply that law to the factual situation underlying the main proceedings, which is the task of the national court. It is not for the Court either to decide issues of fact raised in the main proceedings or to resolve differences of opinion on the interpretation or application of rules of national law.

8. In ruling on the interpretation or validity of European Union law, the Court makes every effort to give a reply which will be of assistance in resolving the dispute, but it is for the referring court to draw the appropriate conclusions from that reply, if necessary by disapplying the rule of national law in question.

Under Article 267 TFEU[6], any court or tribunal of a Member State, in so far as it is called upon to give a ruling in proceedings intended to arrive at a decision of a judicial nature, may as a rule refer a question to the Court of Justice for a preliminary ruling

All national courts must therefore refer a question to the Court when they have doubts about the validity of such an act, stating the reasons for which they consider that that act may be invalid.

A national court or tribunal may refer a question to the Court for a preliminary ruling as soon as it finds that a ruling on the point or points of interpretation or validity is necessary to enable it to give judgment; it is the national court which is in the best position to decide at what stage of the proceedings such a question should be referred.

A reference for a preliminary ruling calls for the national proceedings to be stayed until the Court of Justice has given its ruling.

Base on these rules of procedure Curtea de Apel Bacău introduced Reference for a preliminary ruling[7]:

1. Do Article 15 of Council Directive 2000/43/EC implementing the principle of equal treatment between persons irrespective of racial or ethnic origin (1) and Article 17 of Council Directive 2000/78/EC establishing a general framework for equal treatment in employment and occupation (2) — both transposed into national law by OG (Ordonanta Guvernului (Government legislative decree)) No 137/2000, as republished and amended — preclude national legislation or a judgment of the Constitutional Court (Constitutional Court) prohibiting the national judicial authorities from awarding to claimants who have been discriminated against the compensation for material and/or non-material damage which is considered appropriate in cases in which the compensation for the damage caused by discrimination relates to salary rights provided for by law and granted to a socio-professional category other than that to which the claimants belong (see, to that effect, judgments of the Constitutional Court No 1325 of 4 December 2008 and No 146 of 25 February 2010)?

2. If the answer to Question 1 is in the affirmative, are the national courts required to await the repeal or amendment of the provisions of national law — and/or a change in the case-law of the Constitutional Court — which are, ex hypothesi, contrary to the provisions of Community law, or are the courts required to apply Community law, as interpreted by the Court of Justice of the European Union, directly and immediately to the proceedings pending before them, declining to apply any provision of national law or any judgment of the Constitutional Court which is contrary to the provisions of Community law?

Basically the question asked is Do Article 15 of Council Directive 2000/43/EC and Article 17 of Council Directive 2000/78/EC preclude national legislation or a judgment of the Constitutional Court prohibiting the national judicial authorities from awarding to claimants of the Constitutional Court prohibiting the national judicial authorities from awarding to claimants?

Legal Framework of European Union on Combating Discrimination

It is well known that the combating discrimination legislation lies at the level of European Union in three distinct Directives. The three Directives are:

- Council Directive 2000/43/EC – Racial Equality Directive: establishes a framework against discrimination based on racial or ethnic origin inside and outside the labour market[8];

- Council Directive 2000/78/EC – Employment Equality Directive: establishes a framework for equal treatment in employment and occupation, and in Article 1 lays down a general framework for combating discrimination on the grounds of religion or belief, disability, age or sexual orientation as regards employment and occupation[9];

In addition to the Council Directives, European Union considers combating discrimination one of the top priorities. In 2008 was issued another proposal for a new Directive, so called Horizontal Directive, on implementing the principle of equal treatment between persons irrespective of religion or belief, disability, age or sexual orientation.

There are another two documents important for this issue, both Communications From The Commission To The European Parliament, The Council, The European Economic And Social Committee And The Committee Of The Regions: 2008 Non-discrimination and equal opportunities: A renewed commitment[10] and 2008 Renewed social agenda: Opportunities, access and solidarity in 21st century Europe[11].

The referring court, Curtea de Apel Bacau, refers to only 2 EU directives out of the three mentioned above. The referring court refers to Directive 2000/43/EC – Racial Equality Directive and to Directive 2000/78/EC – Employment Equality Directive: establishes a framework for equal treatment in employment and occupation.

More precise Curtea de Apel Bacau refers to the art. 15 of Directive 2000/43/EC – Racial Equality Directive: establishes a framework against discrimination based on racial or ethnic origin inside and outside the labour market and to art. 17 of Directive 2000/78/EC – Employment Equality Directive

The content of the two articles mentioned are very much similar.

The art. 15 of Directive 2000/43/EC is named "Sanctions" as has the following content: "Member States shall lay down the rules on sanctions applicable to infringements of the national provisions adopted pursuant to this Directive and shall take all measures necessary to ensure that they are applied. The sanctions, which may comprise the payment of compensation to the victim, must be effective, proportionate and dissuasive. The Member States shall notify those provisions to the Commission by 19 July 2003 at the latest and shall notify it without delay of any subsequent amendment affecting them."

The art. 17 of Directive 2000/43/EC is named "Sanctions" as has the following content: "Member States shall lay down the rules on sanctions applicable to infringements of the national provisions adopted pursuant to this Directive and shall take all measures necessary to ensure that they are applied. The sanctions, which may comprise the payment of compensation to the victim, must be effective, proportionate and dissuasive. Member States shall notify those provisions to the

Preliminary ruling of Court of Justice of European Union in case C-310/10 (Agafiței and Others, Romania)

After Curtea de Apel Bacău referred the question mentioned above to the Court of Justice of European Union for a preliminary ruling, the Court of Justice asked the romanian Government and other interested EU member states to make observations related to the question referred.

The Romanian Government[12] and Ireland entertain doubts in their written observations as to whether the questions referred are admissible, in particular on the ground that the situation at issue in the main proceedings does not fall within the scope of Directives 2000/43 and 2000/78 or, more generally, of European Union law.

In that regard, under Article 267 TFEU[13], the Court of Justice has jurisdiction to give preliminary rulings concerning the interpretation of the Treaties and of acts of the institutions of the European Union.

According to settled case-law, the procedure provided for in Article 267 TFEU is a means of cooperation between the Court of Justice and national courts. It follows that it is for the national courts alone which are seized of the case and are responsible for the judgment to be delivered to determine, in view of the special features of each case, both the need for a preliminary ruling in order to enable them to give their judgment and the relevance of the questions which they put to the Court.

Consequently, where questions submitted by national courts concern the interpretation of a provision of European Union law, the Court is, in principle, obliged to give a ruling.

Nevertheless, the Court in exceptional circumstances, can examine the conditions in which the case was referred to it by the national court, in order to confirm its own jurisdiction. The Court may refuse to rule on a question referred for a preliminary ruling by a national court only where it is quite obvious that the interpretation of European Union law that is sought bears no relation to the actual facts of the main action or its purpose, where the problem is hypothetical, or where the Court does not have before it the factual or legal material necessary to enable it to give a useful answer to the questions submitted to it.

It is therefore apparent from settled case-law that a reference by a national court can be rejected if, inter alia, it is obvious that European Union law cannot be applied, either directly or indirectly, to the circumstances of the case.

In the present case, it should be noted at the outset that the Curtea de Apel Bacău is not asking the Court whether a situation such as that at issue in the main proceedings falls within the scope of Directives 2000/43 and 2000/78, in particular Articles 15 and 17 respectively thereof, to which the questions referred relate.

Article 1 of Directive 2000/78 states that the purpose of the directive is to lay down a general framework, as regards employment and occupation, for combating discrimination on the grounds of religion or belief, disability, age or sexual orientation. The purpose of Directive 2000/43, as is apparent from Article 1 thereof, is to lay down a framework for combating discrimination on the grounds of racial or ethnic origin.

However, it is apparent from the order for reference that the discrimination at issue in the main proceedings is not based on any of the grounds thus listed in those directives, but operates instead on the basis of the socio-professional category, within the meaning of national legislation, to which the persons concerned belong, or their place of work.

[13] Text of article 267 TFEU available in: Consolidated Treaties. Charter of Fundamental Rights, (Published by Publications Office of the European Union, Luxembourg, 2012).

It follows that a situation such as that at issue in the main proceedings falls outside the general frameworks established by Directives 2000/43 and 2000/78 respectively for combating certain forms of discrimination.

As is apparent from Article 2(1) of those directives in particular, the principle of equal treatment enshrined in the directives applies by reference to the grounds exhaustively listed in Article 1.

It should also be recalled in that connection that Article 13 EC – now Article 19 TFEU[14] – which contains only rules governing the competences of the Community and on the basis of which the directives in question were adopted, does not refer to discrimination on grounds of socio-professional category or place of work, so that neither Article 13 EC nor Article 19 TFEU can even constitute a legal basis for Council measures to combat such discrimination.

It follows from all the foregoing that a situation such as that at issue in the main proceedings falls outside the scope of measures adopted on the basis of Article 13 EC, in particular Directives 2000/43 and 2000/78, so that Articles 15 and 17 respectively of those directives, to which the reference for a preliminary ruling refers, do not relate to such a situation.

However, since the Curtea de Apel Bacău has stated, both in the grounds of the order for reference and in the first question referred, that Legislative Decree No 137/2000 transposes Directives 2000/43 and 2000/78 into national law, it is necessary also to consider whether an interpretation by the Court of Articles 15 and 17 is capable of being justified, as submitted by the Commission, on the ground that those provisions were rendered applicable by domestic law to circumstances such as those at issue in the main proceedings as a result of the reference made by that law to those provisions.

The Court has repeatedly held that it has jurisdiction to give preliminary rulings on questions concerning European Union provisions in situations where the facts of the cases being considered by the national courts were outside the scope of European Union law and therefore fell within the competence of the Member States alone, but where those provisions of European Union law had been rendered applicable by domestic law due to a reference made by that law to the content of those provisions.

The Court has stated in particular in that regard that where, in regulating purely internal situations, domestic legislation seeks to adopt the same solutions as those adopted in European Union law in order, for example, to avoid discrimination against foreign nationals or any distortion of competition or to provide for one single procedure in comparable situations, it is clearly in the European Union interest that, in order to forestall future differences of interpretation, provisions or concepts taken from European Union law should be interpreted uniformly, irrespective of the circumstances in which they are to apply.

As has just been pointed out and is admittedly clear from the order for reference, the purpose of Legislative Decree No 137/2000 is, inter alia, to transpose Directives 2000/43 and 2000/78 into national law and Article 27 of the decree, which provides that discrimination prohibited under the decree gives rise to liability on the part of those responsible for it and to the right to obtain compensation on the part of victims of such discrimination, implements Article 15 of Directive 2000/43 and Article 17 of Directive 2000/78. None the less, it does not follow that the interpretation of Article 27 of the decree, in cases in which it is applicable to discrimination which is prohibited under national law alone and falls outside the scope of those directives, should be contingent on the provisions of the directives or, more generally, those of European Union law.

Indeed, it has not in any way been established that, in the present case, it is clearly in the European Union interest that provisions or concepts taken from European Union law should be interpreted uniformly, irrespective of the circumstances in which they are to apply, in such a way as to confer jurisdiction on the Court to answer the questions referred to it for a preliminary ruling by the national court.

First of all, the order for reference does not contain sufficiently precise information from which it can be inferred that, by making infringements of rules prohibiting discrimination under Directives 2000/43 and 2000/78 and infringements of rules prohibiting discrimination under national law alone subject to one and the same compensation scheme, the national legislature intended, as regards infringements of the national rules, to refer to the content of provisions of European Union law or to adopt the same solutions as those adopted by those provisions.

Next, it should be noted, first, that rules on sanctions such as those which the Member States are required to implement under Article 15 of Directive 2000/43 and Article 17 of Directive 2000/78 constitute an adjunct to the substantive rules prohibiting discrimination laid down by those directives, such rules on sanctions being intended to ensure that those substantive rules are effective. However, as pointed out at paragraphs 31 to 36 above, those directives do not contain any rule prohibiting discrimination on the ground of professional category, such as the rule at issue in the main proceedings.

Second, Article 15 of Directive 2000/43 and Article 17 of Directive 2000/78 simply require the Member States to introduce rules on sanctions applicable to infringements of the national provisions adopted pursuant to those directives and state that such sanctions must be effective, proportionate and dissuasive and that they may comprise the payment of compensation. It follows that the various specific measures required to implement the provisions of European Union law concerned can hardly be regarded, where they are intended to apply to situations which fall outside the scope of those provisions, as referring to concepts used in those provisions or as adopting the same solutions as those adopted by those provisions, which it would be necessary to interpret in a uniform manner irrespective of the circumstances in which they are to apply.

In the present case, the questions referred do not in essence seek an interpretation of the substantive content of Article 15 of Directive 2000/43 and Article 17 of Directive 2000/78. They seek rather a determination as to whether the principle of the primacy of European Union law precludes a rule of domestic law having constitutional status, as interpreted by the constitutional court of the Member State concerned, which, in a situation falling outside the scope of those provisions of European Union law, requires the domestic rule which moreover transposes those provisions of European Union law to be disapplied or that rule to be interpreted in a way that would be contrary to those provisions if that situation fell within their scope.

The need to ensure uniform interpretation of the provisions of European Union law may, as pointed out above, justify extending the Court's jurisdiction in matters of interpretation to the content of such provisions, including in situations in which, because a rule of national law refers to such provisions, they are applicable indirectly to a given situation. Such a consideration cannot, however, without disregarding the divisions of powers between the European Union and its Member States, confer on that provision of European Union law primacy over higher-ranking provisions of domestic law which would require that, in such a situation, the rule of national law or any interpretation of it must be disregarded.

It follows from all the foregoing that the questions referred by the Curtea de Apel Bacău, the purpose of which is not to ascertain whether a situation such as that at issue in the main proceedings falls within the scope of Article 15 of Directive 2000/43 or Article 17 of Directive 2000/78, but which are in fact based on the assumption that that is the case in order to seek an interpretation from the Court, even though those provisions of European Union law clearly cannot be applied, either directly or indirectly, to the circumstances of the case, are inadmissible.

On those grounds, the Court (Fourth Chamber) ruled on 7th of July 2012 that the reference for a preliminary ruling from the Curtea de Apel Bacău (Romania) is inadmissible[15].

[15] Decision of the Court available in JO C 234, 28.8.2010

Conclusion

On July 7th 2011 the European Union Court of Justice passed a judgement in the cause C-310/10, Agafiței and others, declaring inadmissible the preliminary questions formulated in terms of article 267 TFUE Bacău Court of Appeal, Romania.

The purpose of preliminary questions was the UE Court to determine whether art. 15 of Directive 2000/43 and art. 17 of Directive 2000/78 oppose to a national legislation and to some decisions of the Constitutional Court of Romania to forbid the national courts to grant to some salary discriminated persons depending on social-professional category or the job the salary rights stipulated by law and granted to other social-professional categories that that of such persons, with a view to amend the prejudice caused.

If the answer is positive, it is asked to be determined whether a national court has the obligation to remove the application of such disposal of internal law or constitutional jurisprudence without expecting that such disposal forms the object of a legislative amendment or of a new interpretation provided by the constitutional court able to assure the conformity of it to the Union law.

With respect to the application admissibility, the Court showed that it may refuse to pass a judgment on a preliminary petition submitted by a national court if it is obvious that, considering the circumstances of the case, the Union law applied directly or indirectly to the situation that forms the object of dispute presented to the national court.

Thus, the Court considers that, given such discrimination, not grounded on any of the reasons stipulated by the Directives 2000/43 and 2000/78, but on the criterion of social-professional category that includes the interested persons or by their work place, a similar situation to the one discussed on the docket of Romanian court exceeds the application field of the foregoing EU directives.

Simultaneously, the Court considers that, relying on the case data, we do not conclude that the norm of transposing the art. 15 of Directive 2000/43 and art. 17 of Directive 2000/78, when it is applicable with respect to the discriminations forbidden by the national law and which do not belong to the field of application of the two directives, is conditioned by the disposals of the foregoing directives or of the EU law in general. Therefore, the Court considers that it was not proved „a certain interest to provide uniformity to the interpretation of some disposals or of some notions taken over by EU law, regardless the conditions of application, which authorises the Court to answer to the preliminary questions submitted by the sending court ".

Within its observations, the Romanian Government, by the governmental agent for the European Union Court of Justice, supported the inadmissibility of the demand of passing a preliminary judgement, formulated by Bacău Court of Appeal.

THE ROLE OF THE EUROPEAN EXTERNAL ACTION SERVICE IN THE EU'S INSTITUTIONAL SYSTEM

DAN VĂTĂMAN*

Abstract
European External Action Service (EEAS) is a new institution of the European Union, whose foundation was laid by the Treaty of Lisbon with the role to support the High Representative of the Union for Foreign Affairs and Security Policy in fulfilling his mandate and, also to assist the President of the European Council, European Commission, President and other Commissioners to exercise their powers in international relations. Since the establishment of the European External Action Service (EEAS) is relatively recent, this article tries to highlight the crucial role of the European External Action Service (EEAS) in the European Union's institutional system and its contribution to strengthening the coherence and increasing impact and visibility of European Union action at international level and thus the one of the Member States.

Keywords: European External Action Service, European Union institutions, diplomatic services, external action, Foreign Affairs and Security Policy.

1. Introduction

Following developments for nearly sixty years, the European Union today is an economic power, the largest donor of humanitarian aid and a reference point for stability, democracy and human rights.

Under these conditions, to increase political and economic influence of the European Union in the world, we need a common foreign and security policy more effective and with higher impact, contributing to better promotion of the values and the interests of the Union and hence, its Member States.

To achieve this goal, the Lisbon Treaty envisaged the establishment of the European External Action Service (EEAS), with the role of supporting the High Representative for Foreign Affairs and Security Policy in fulfilling his mandate.

Given the recent date of establishment of the European External Action Service (EEAS) and, thereby, the relatively small number of papers describing the organization, functioning and tasks of the new European diplomatic service, this study attempts to highlight the important role of European External Action Service (EEAS) in the EU's institutional system and its contribution to strengthening the coherence and impact of growth and international visibility of EU action.

How it is treated researched theme highlights concerns about its analysis both from a general perspective, but also an analysis was gradually directed to evidence on the establishment, organization and functioning of the European External Action Service (EEAS).

Starting from the fact that specialized literature is particularly poor in terms about EEAS activities, currently being published only one book that describes in detail this issue, we believe that is much to say about this subject and consider that addressing a topic in the field of European Union foreign policy is an attempt both, bold and useful.

2. The evolution of EU foreign policy

The idea that EU countries should act together to promote and protect their strategic interests is as old as the very idea of European Union.

* Senior Lecturer Ph. D., Faculty of Economics, Law and Administrative Sciences - Romanian University of Sciences and Arts "Gheorghe Cristea", Bucharest, Romania, (email: danvataman@yahoo.com).

The roots of current foreign and security policy can be found in the final Communiqué of the summit in The Hague (1 to 2 December 1969) of the Heads of State or Government of Member States of the European Communities, which reaffirmed the imperative to strengthen political ties between the Member States. On this basis, the following year, the foreign ministers meeting of the six member states in Luxembourg (27 October 1970) adopted the Davignon report, which marked the beginning of European Political Cooperation (EPC).

Following the Davignon Report on 23 July 1973 in Copenhagen, the Foreign Ministers of the Member States of the European Communities adopted a second Davignon report on political cooperation, which highlighted the need for Europe to establish itself as a distinct entity on the world arena, especially in international negotiations, to identify common positions on major international issues and to consider their impact on international politics[1].

A decade later, the Heads of State or Government meeting within the European Council in Stuttgart (19 June 1983), have signed a solemn declaration on European Union, which is known as "Declaration in Stuttgart." According to this document, seeking to consolidate the progress achieved so far both in economics and in politics, the Heads of State or Government have established a series of objectives to be achieved, including: increased consultation between Member States, progressive development and defining common principles and objectives and identify common interests, coordinate positions of the Member States relating to political and economic aspects of security, and closer cooperation between their diplomatic missions in third countries[2].

Official consecration of European cooperation in foreign policy took place in February 1986 with the adoption of the Single European Act (SEA). According to Article 30 of SEA, the signatory states undertook to inform and consult on any foreign policy issues of general interest so as to ensure that their combined influence is exerted as effectively as possible by coordinating the convergence of their positions and implementation of joint actions.

According to Article B of the Maastricht Treaty (TEU), signed on 7 February 1992, one of the objectives of the European Union was that of the affirmation of an identity on the international scene, particularly through the implementation of a common foreign and security policy, including defining a common defense policy which might lead in the future time, to a common defense.

Fundamentals of foreign policy and security policy can be found in Title V of the TEU, which established a Common Foreign and Security Policy (CFSP). According to Article J.1 TEU[3], the Union and Member States shall define and implement a Common Foreign and Security Policy covering all areas of foreign policy; its security objectives are: to safeguard the common values, fundamental interests and independence of the Union, to strengthen security Union and its Member States in all forms, maintaining peace and strengthening international security in accordance with the principles of the UN Charter, Helsinki Final Act and Paris Charter objectives, promote international cooperation, development and strengthening of democracy and the rule of law, and respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms.

With the adoption of the Amsterdam Treaty were a number of changes to the Maastricht Treaty regarding CFSP. According to Article J.2 TEU was created a new tool in the field of CFSP, common strategies[4] respectively. It was also created a position of "High Representative for CFSP"

[3] According to the amendments made by Article 1.10 of the Treaty of Amsterdam (TAM), Article J.2 TEU became Article 12 and partially reproduced the old text Article J.1, Section 3 of the TEU.

[4] According to Article 13 TEU (former Article J.3 by renumbering adopted by TAM), common strategies were decided by the European Council, which also serve to develop principles and guidelines of the CFSP. Common strategies are adopted in areas where Member States have important interests in common. In one common strategy objectives are set, the time covered and the tools to be used by the European Union and its Member States. Common having the role to assist the Council in matters of common foreign and security policy, particularly through contributions to the formulation, preparation and implementation of decisions and, where appropriate, acting on behalf of the Council and at the request of the EU Council Presidency, through conducting a political dialogue with third countries[5].

Also Declaration no. 6 annexed to the Treaty of Amsterdam established a "Policy Planning Unit and Early Warning" within the Council Secretariat, which consists of diplomats and officials attached to the Council of Member States, Commission and the Western European Union (WEU) as well as of officials coming from the General Secretariat. The Nice Treaty also brought a number of changes to the CFSP. Thus, Article 17 TEU[6] provides that the foreign policy and security policy shall include all aspects of EU security including the progressive framing of a common defense policy, which could lead to a common defense if the European Council decides it. In this case, the European Council recommends Member States to adopt that decision in accordance with their respective constitutional requirements. Union policy for the purposes of this Article shall not affect the specific character of the security and defense of individual Member States and will meet their obligations under the North Atlantic Treaty for those countries who felt that their common defense through NATO perform better. Progressive framing of a common defense policy was to be supported, provided that Member States will consider appropriate, by their cooperation in the production of weapons. Matters referred to by Article 17 TEU included humanitarian and rescue tasks, peacekeeping and crisis management missions, including peacemaking. The provisions of Article 17 TEU is not an obstacle for the development of strengthened cooperation between two or more states at bilateral level, in the WEU or NATO to the extent that such cooperation does not conflict with those referred in respective article. To promote these objectives defined in Article 17 TEU, its provisions were revised to agree with Article 48 TEU (former Article N of TEU[7]).

Article 25 TEU (as amended in accordance with Article 1 of the Treaty of Nice) provides that, without conflict with Article 207 TEC, a Political and Security Committee monitor the international situation in the relevant areas of common foreign and security policy and contribute to the definition of policies by delivering opinions to the Council, at its request on its own initiative. The Committee also exercises, under the responsibility of the Council, political control and strategic direction of crisis management operations. Council authorizes the Board to take appropriate decisions regarding the exercise of political control and strategic direction of operations without affecting the art. 47 (former Article M of TEU).

In the Declaration on European Security and Defense annexed to the Treaty of Nice it is shown that in accordance with the texts approved by the Nice European Council on European Security and Defense Policy (Presidency report and its appendices), the Union's objective was to make it operational as soon as possible. A decision in this regard was to be taken by the European Council in 2001 and later by the European Council in Laeken / Brussels based on existing provisions in the TEU, the entry into force of the Treaty of Nice not being a prerequisite condition.

For a more firm position on the world stage and greater coherence in EU external action, the Treaty of Lisbon has brought a number of changes and additions to the TEU. According to Article 24 TEU (consolidated version following the adoption of the Lisbon Treaty) EU competence in matters of common foreign and security policy shall cover all areas of foreign policy and all questions relating to the Union's security, including the progressive framing of a common defense policy which can lead to a common defense.

strategies are applied by the EU Council, in particular by adopting joint actions and common positions. Also, the EU Council may recommend the adoption of a European common strategy in a particular field.

[6] Former Article J.7 TEU

[7] In its original form, the Treaty on European Union (TEU) had articles indexed with letters. The Treaty of Amsterdam introduced a new numbering system, with digits.

Pursuant to Article 25 TEU (consolidated version following the adoption of the Lisbon Treaty), the Union Common Foreign and Security Policy is defining the general guidelines by adopting decisions defining Union positions and actions and ways of implementing them and by strengthening systematic cooperation between Member States on policy. Thus, the European Council shall identify the Union's strategic interests, determine the objectives and define general guidelines for the common foreign and security policy, including matters with defense implications. If international developments so require, the President of the European Council shall convene an extraordinary meeting of the European Council to define the strategic lines of the Union in relation to this development.

The Council also formulates foreign policy and security policy and takes decisions necessary for defining and implementing it on the basis of general guidelines and strategic lines defined by the European Council.

For the implementation of the CFSP, the Treaty of Lisbon has created the post of High Representative of the Union for Foreign Affairs and Security Policy which, together with the Council, ensure the unity, coherence and effectiveness of Union action. According to Article 27 TEU (consolidated version following the adoption of the Lisbon Treaty), the High Representative chairs the Foreign Affairs Council and contributes by his proposals to the common foreign and security policy and ensures the implementation of decisions adopted by the and Council. The High Representative shall also represent the Union for matters relating to common foreign and security policy, carrying out, on behalf of political dialogue with third parties and expressing the Union's position in international organizations and international conferences. In fulfilling his mandate, the High Representative shall be assisted by a European External Action. This service shall work in cooperation with the diplomatic services of Member States and shall comprise officials from relevant departments of the Secretariat of the Council and Commission and staff seconded from national diplomatic services. Organization and functioning of the European External Action Service shall be established by Council decision. European Council on a proposal from the High Representative after consulting the European Parliament[8] and Commission approval[9].

3. Establishment of the European External Action Service (EEAS)

As noted above, by the reform implemented by the Treaty of Lisbon it was created the post of High Representative for foreign affairs and security policy, which, according to Article 27 (3) of TEU, is supported in its mandate by a European External Action Service.

Considering that on 13 November 2009 it was completed the process of ratifying the Lisbon Treaty by the deposit of the last instrument of ratification, it took a summit in order to determine who will occupy key positions created under the Treaty[10]. Thus, during the informal meeting of Heads of State or Government of Member States held in Brussels on 19 November 2009, it was reached a political agreement on the appointment of Catherine Ashton as High Representative for Foreign Affairs and security policy.

Also, on 30 October 2009, the European Council agreed on guidelines for European External Action Service (EEAS), during which the future High Representative was asked to submit a proposal for the organization and functioning of the EEAS as soon as possible after coming into force of the Treaty of Lisbon on the adoption by the Council, no later than the end of April 2010. This proposal

[8] According to Article 36 TEU, the High Representative shall regularly consult the European Parliament on the main aspects and basic choices of CFSP and Common Security and Defense Policy (ESDP) and inform on their evolution. It also ensures that the views of the European Parliament are duly taken into account. Special representatives may be involved in briefing the European Parliament.

[9] For details on the evolution of CFSP see Dan Vătăman, European Union Law (Bucharest, "Universul Juridic" Publishing House, 2010), p.177-181.

was made on 25 March 2010 as a project for a Council Decision on the organization and functioning of the EEAS. The structure was agreed in the General Affairs Council in April 2010 and will consult European Parliament and the European Commission.

On 21 June 2010, there has been a quadripartite meeting between representatives of the Council presidency (represented by Foreign Minister Miguel Moratinos and Spanish Secretary of State Lopez Garrido), the European Commission (represented by Maros Šefčovič, vice president for institutional relations and administration), the High Representative for Foreign and Security Policy - Catherine Ashton, as well as representatives of the European Parliament, who met in Madrid to discuss about the establishment of the European External Action Service. Following discussion, it was a political agreement on the proposal for a Council Decision on the organization and functioning of the European External Action Service and the text of two statements by the High Representative on political responsibility, namely the basic structure of the central government. Based on the agreement, participants pledged to seek approval of package by the institutions they represented, in order to move to adopt provisions concerning the organization and functioning of the EEAS.

During the plenary meeting of 8 July 2010, European Parliament passed the agreement reached by the quadripartite negotiations on the European External Action Service (EEAS). Although European Parliament was only consulted on the establishment and functioning of the European External Action Service, MEP-s negotiated major changes in the initial proposal in March 2010 of Catherine Ashton. Resolution to the Council decision on the organization and functioning of the European External Action was adopted with 549 votes for, 78 against and 17 abstentions[11].

Having consulted the European Parliament and the European Commission approval on 26 July 2010, the Council adopted Decision 2010/427/EU on the organization and functioning of the European External Action Service (EEAS)[12].

In accordance with Council Decision, the EEAS is placed under the authority of the High Representative of the Union for Foreign Affairs and Security Policy and has its headquarters in Brussels and is a functionally autonomous body of the European Union, separate from the General Secretariat of the Council and from the Commission with the legal capacity necessary to perform its tasks and attain its objectives.[13]

4. European External Action Service Tasks

European External Action Service (EEAS) support the High Representative in exercise of its mandate, particularly as provided in Articles 18 and 27 of the TEU:

- In fulfilling his mandate to lead the Common Foreign and Security Policy (CFSP) of the European Union, including the Common Security and Defense Policy (CSDP) to contribute by his proposals to develop the policy, which he conducted in accordance with the mandate granted by the Council and ensuring the consistency of EU external action;

- In his capacity as Vice-President, in carrying out within the Commission, the responsibilities incumbent on it in external relations and for coordinating other aspects of the Union's external action, without prejudice to the normal tasks of the Commission services.

[11] In the legislative resolution of 8 July 2010 on the draft decision on the organization and functioning of the European External Action Service, the European Parliament invited the Council to notify Parliament if it intended to depart from the text approved, requesting Council to consult Parliament again if you intend to amend the proposal from the High Representative for Foreign Affairs and Security Policy - for details see www.europarl.europa.eu

In particular, the EEAS should immediately take the necessary decision under that regulation on the terms and conditions for internal investigations. The High Representative shall decide on the implementing rules for the EEAS.[30]

7. Conclusions

Until recently, the EU's institutional system included numerous posts that prevented the Union to represent a single voice in external relations. Legend says that three decades ago, Henry Kissinger, U.S. Secretary of State at the time, would have asked the following question: "Who should I call if I want to talk to Europe?" Although the American diplomat denied the authenticity of the moment, it remained as a landmark in transatlantic relations, reason for which today we can formulate an answer to this question.

Thus, the reforms implemented by the Treaty of Lisbon created the position of President of the European Council, chairing its work towards facilitating consensus among Member States, ensuring dialogue with other European institutions and representing the Union externally, without prejudice to the powers of another newly created position, that of High Representative for Foreign and Security Policy.

High Representative for Foreign Affairs and Security Policy, who is at the same time one of the vice chairs of the Commission and presides the External Relations Council's work, represents the Union for matters relating to common foreign and security policy, carrying out, on behalf of political dialogue with third parties and expressing the Union's position in international organizations and international conferences. However, the Lisbon Treaty provided that for optimal conditions in the exercise of its mandate, the High Representative shall be assisted by a European External Action Service, working in cooperation with the diplomatic services of Member States and shall comprise officials from relevant departments of the General Secretariat of the Council and Commission and staff seconded from national diplomatic services.

So the establishment of the post of High Representative for Foreign Affairs and Security Policy and the European External Action Service can translate into practice the EU answer to the question of Henry Kissinger.

It remains to be seen whether the High Representative for Foreign Affairs and Security Policy, supported by the European External Action Service will be able to bring more coherence in external action and outline the profile of the European Union on the international stage, creating a distinct identity of it.

WAYS OF PEACEFUL SETTLEMENT OF DISPUTES WITHIN CERTAIN INTERNATIONAL ORGANIZATIONS

DANIEL-ŞTEFAN PARASCHIV*

Abstract

Peaceful settlement of international disputes is one of the fundamental principles of international law, mainly formed via custom, but enshrined in numerous international treaties.

For the dispute management and settlement, some specific procedures were created in the United Nations, the UN specialized agencies and the regional organizations.

These procedures are complementary, to those who work directly between states, but the organization authority gives the necessary juridical strength for solving arising disputes.

Research of this matter aims at knowing concrete ways of settling disputes arising in intergovernmental organizations, in order to correctly apply instruments governing them, and to refine specific system of measures and procedures.

Keywords: disputes, intergovernmental organisations, regional organizations, Security Council of UNO, peaceful solving.

Introduction

While international organisations function, many types of disputes may appear[1], such as:

- which concern the relation between the member states of the organisation, related to the interpretation and application of a constitutive document;

- between a member state and the above-mentioned organisation;

- between the different bodies of an international and which generally concern competence conflicts;

- between the different international organisations with a similar profile and which regularly regard the limitation of their competence;

- between the organisations and private, specific to the integration organisations;

- between the organisation and the employees or its agents.

The majority of disputes within one international organisation appear between two or more member states, relating to the interpretation and application of the constitutive document of the organisation or when a member state is in dispute with the respective organisation.

The peaceful researches that allow the management and solving of disputes[2], and the specific procedures created within the framework of the United Nations Organisation, in the specialized institutions of UNO, as well as within regional organisations contribute to making the best measures for preventing conflicts among the state members of the international organisations.

These procedures have a complementary character, compared to those that act directly among states, however the authority of the organisation provides increased strength[3].

The competence of the United Nations Organisation in solving disputes

The U.N.O can regulate the disputes within the organisation by peaceful ways or methods of constraint.

Regarding the peaceful methods, UNO, within the General Assembly, can approach any issues referring to the maintenance of peace and international security, can invite the parties to join the dispute, through the Security Council, as to solve them using peaceful methods, can investigate (also by means of the Security Council) any dispute or situation which could give rise to a dispute, or may recommend the parties joining the dispute different procedures or methods more appropriate to solving the issues.

Thus, UNO does not directly solve the disputes among state members (excepting those of a juridical nature, which depend on the competence of the International Court of Justice), but contributes to their solving or non-aggravation, to the extend that the parties involved accept the solutions proposed or are convinced to proceed directly to solving them.

The United Unions Organization is competent, by means of its bodies, to settle or solve disputes, as well as international situations which might lead to the infringement of peace or which might endanger the peace and international security.

In conformity to art.2 par.6 and art.35 par.2 from the UNO Charter, this organization may regulate not only litigations which may occur between its members, but also litigations in which other states are involved, provided that the latter have priorly approved to the solving of disputes by means of the peaceful methods stipulated in the Charter.

• The UNO Security Council has, in conformity with art. 24 from the UNO Charter, a main responsibility in maintaining the peace and international security.

In order to exercise this function, the Security Council is entitled to act in conformity with the dispositions of the chapters VI-VII of the UNO Charter, which enables it to take preventive or coercive measures as to peacefully solve disputes „in case of threats against peace and acts of aggression". Likewise, chapter VIII of the Charter, with the title „Regional agreements" establishes the competence concerning the agreements or regional organisms to take certain measures referring to the maintaining of peace and security, as well as their relation with the Security Council.

The Security Council may intervene, in conformity with the Charter, as to solve disputes in the following situations:

- when the parties present to a dispute requests the intervention by a common initiative or separate demands;
- if a third state, member of the UNO, states that prolonging the dispute in which it is not personally involved, would endanger the peace and international security;
- when an UNO member state, refers to a dispute in which it is involved, accepting the solving conditions stipulated in the Charter;
- at the initiative of the General Assembly or General Secretary of UNO;
- at personal initiative.

After the statement, the actions of the Security Council mainly depend of the nature of the dispute which it has to stabilize.

Thus, it may initiate an investigation to establish whether the present situation is susceptible to threaten the maintenance of peace and international security[4].

In order to perform the investigation, the Security Council may assign a subsidiary body or a commission formed of representatives of the states in litigation, or from independent personalities.

[4] Art. 34 from the UNO Charter stipulates: „The Security Council may investigate any dispute or situation which might lead to international conflicts or could give rise to a dispute, as to establish whether prolonging the dispute or the situation would endanger the maintenance of peace and international security".

In conformity with art.36 par.1 from the Charter, the Security Council may recommend procedures or methods of settling conflicts by means of peaceful methods to the states in litigation, taking into consideration the conclusions of the investigation (when it has been proposed).

The recommendations may be general, inviting the parties to appeal to peaceful solutions in order to solve the dispute, or concrete (precise), indicating the use of mediation, of the good offices etc., depending on the nature of the dispute and the present situation. Moreover, the Council may recommend that a dispute may be sent to a regional organisation to be regulated, without losing its right to supervise the solving of the dispute.

In the situation in which a dispute is extremely serious as to constitute a threat to the peace, an infringement of the peace or an act of aggression, the Security Council may adopt decisions which embody a mandatory power. Decisions may refer to measures that do not comply using armed force or measures that imply the use of an armed force [5].

From the first category of measures, we can mention: partial or total interruption of economic relations and rail, sea, air, postal, telegraphic, radio communications and other means of communication, as well as interrupting diplomatic relations.

The measures from the second category are decided by the Security Council when it considers that those which do not imply the use of armed force failed to prove adequate. In this situation, in order to maintain and re-establish peace and international security, demonstrations, measures of blockade and other operations executed by air, naval and land forces of the Members of the United Nations may be used.

• The General Assembly of the United Nations Organisation has, in conformity with the UNO Charter, the following competence regarding the peaceful regulating of international disputes[6]:

- examines the general cooperation principles for the maintenance of peace and international security, making recommendations regarding the later both to the UNO members and to the Security Council (art.11 par.1);

- debates any issue with which it is consulted and make recommendations regarding it (art.11 par.2);

- draws the attention of the Security Council on situations which would endanger the peace and international security (art.11 par.3);

- recommends measures for settling any situation in a peaceful manner that is suspected to cause damage to the relations among states (art.14).

In conformity with art.12 par.1 from the UNO Charter, the General Assembly can not intervene with recommendations regarding the disputes or situations which are subjected to the examination of the Security Council, if the later exercises, regarding these disputes or situations, the functions which are attributed by the Charter. In these cases, the General Assembly may pronounce itself only when the Council expressly demands to state its position regarding a dispute

Moreover, in conformity with art.11 par. 2 from the Charter, when an international issue requires coercive measures, it will be remitted by the General Assembly to the Security Council, who holds a monopoly situation in coercive matters[7].

• The General Secretary of the United Nations Organisation may draw the attention of the Security Council regarding any issue which might endanger the peace and international security (art.99 of the UNO Charter). This may fulfill missions of good offices, mediation or invite the parties in a dispute, as to solve it by negotiations[8].

These functions are exercised, in conformity with art.98 of the UNO Charter, based on a mandate granted by the General Assembly or the Security Council.

In conformity with art.99 from the Charter, the General Secretary is authorized to trigger the intervention of the Security Council, if this is not performed by the state or a group of states involved in an international dispute.

The regional organizations to which UNO Charter offered the role of peacefully regulating disputes

In art. 52, paragraph 2 from the United Nations Organisation Charter it is stipulated that the UNO member states which conclude agreements and the regional organisations must make every effort in other to solve these local disputes peacefully, with the aid of the regional organisation, before these disputes are submitted to the Security Council.

The Charted does not stipulate a hierarchy or a distribution of competences as to solve disputes, between the UNO and the local structures[9].

However, by corroborating the dispositions of art.52 par.3, with those of art.34 and art.35 from the Charter, in conformity to which the Security Council has the competence to involve itself in any dispute which threatens the peace and international security, it results that this organism may decide in each concrete case, if the case requires it to be directly involved in the peaceful solving of the dispute or the issue can be transferred to local structures.

In the situation in which measures of coercion are imposed, these will not be undertaken based on the local agreements or by the regional bodies, without the authorisation of the Security Council.

The most representative regional organisations which aim at maintaining the peace and security, by anticipating the solving of disputes by peaceful measures are: The Organisation of African Unity (O.A.U.), the American States Organization (A.S.O.), The League of Arab States and Organisation for Security and Cooperation in Europe (O.S.C.E.).

• The Organisation of African Unity was created in the year 1963, and one of its role being the peaceful regulating of disputes between state members, by negotiations, mediation, conciliation or arbitration.

In the framework of this organisation the Commission of Mediation, Conciliation and Arbitration was founded, by a Protocol enclosed to the OAU Charter, signed in Cairo in the year 1964, the month of July.

The African states which present disputed may appeal to the Commission, if this is commonly agreed upon or at the initiative of a party involved in the litigation. Moreover, the Commission may be referred by the Council of Ministers or the Conference of Heads of State and Government of the OAU, as to solve the disputes that embody an international character.

If one or more state-parties involved in a dispute do not accept to solve it by the Commission, the solving competence passes to the Council of Ministers or even the Conference of the African Unity Organisation.

Regularly, the African states have not appealed to legal procedures, but have resorted to mediation by means of special committees or ad-hoc committees, or have resorted to the good offices of certain personalities in the African states..

• The American States Organization was created in the year 1948, the Charter from Bogota containing many regulations concerning the peaceful solving of disputes among state members, by means of investigation, good offices or conciliation.

The bodies which have the competence of solving international disputes among state members, if these issues were impossible to solve in usual diplomatic ways, are the OSA Council and the Committee for dispute regulation (which in the year 1967 replaced the Inter-American peace committee).

• The League of Arab States, which was created in the year 1945, did not found a specialized organ for the peaceful solving of international litigations, but accomplishes this activity by means of the League Council. It is formed from the representatives of the member states and, in conformity to art. 5 from the Covenant of the League of Arab States, it can solve disputes, at the request of the parties in litigation, provided that they do not refer to independence, sovereignty or the territorial integration of states.

The Council uses, as to solve disputes, procedures of mediation, conciliation and good offices.

The parties in litigation do not participate to the debates of the Council, and its decisions, as an arbitrary body, are mandatory for the states in dispute.

• The Organisation for Security and Cooperation in Europe

In conformity with Principle V, stipulated in the Declaration of Principles from the Final Document of the Conference in Helsinki (1975) concerning security and cooperation in Europe, the Organisation for Security and Cooperation in Europe grants a particular importance to the peaceful solving of international disputes.

In conformity with the dispositions from the Final Document and the Charter from Paris for a new Europe (1990), the member states militate for peaceful, fast and efficient solving of the disputes among them, based on the international law, resorting in this purpose to means such as: negotiating, investigating, mediating, conciliating, arbitrating, legal regulating etc. (at the choice of the parties) or using any other procedure of regulating which has been agreed upon[10].

The systems of peaceful regulating within the Organisation for Security and Cooperation in Europe are based on the following main principles[11]:

- litigations non-regulated by means of direct contracts between the parties (negotiations or consultations) are applied;

- regulatory systems of the Organisation for Security and Cooperation in Europe to which they resort have a subsidiary nature, having the role of completing the pre-existent ones and not replace them.

From the practice of negotiations, performed especially in the years 1991 and 1992, four systems of peaceful regulatory systems for the disputes within the Organisation for Security and Cooperation in Europe were defined.

a) The Procedure from La Valetta stands for a document adopted in the year 1991, following an expert reunion, held in Malta, which establishes a pan-European mechanism, based on the intervention of third parties, to which member states of the C.S.C.E. may result to, as to solve the disputes among them.

At the request of a party involved in the litigation, a C.S.C.E. body is created, formed from one or more members selected by common agreement from a list of qualified candidates, held at the Center of the Organisation for Security and Cooperation in Europe for conflict prevention, in Viena. This body first attempts to establish a contact with the parties in dispute, as to choose the method of approach: investigation, conciliation, mediation, good offices, arbitration or the legal method.

If the parties do not reach an agreement regarding the means to solve the dispute, any of the parties, in term of 3 month from the notification concerning the disagreement, may request the Body to formulate notifications or observations upon the background of the dispute, the parties being free to accept these notifications or refuse them.

b) The Convention regarding the conciliation and arbitration within the Organisation for Security and Cooperation in Europe, adopted in December 1992 and that entered in force on the 5th of December 1994, decided the founding of the European Court of Conciliation and Arbitration, headquartered in Geneva.

[10] Miga-Beşteliu, Drept internaţional. Introducere în dreptul internaţional public, p.377.

[11] These elements result from the final document of the reunion from Viena (1989) and from the Charter in Paris for a new Europe (1990).

If a dispute occurs among the member states, any party may request the establishment of a Conciliation Committee, which must support the parties in order to solve the litigation, in conformity with the international law and commitments to which the parties subscribed within the Organisation for Security and Cooperation in Europe, the Commission accomplishes a final report which is sent to the Organisation for Security and Cooperation in Europe for it to utilize the coercive measures at its disposal, if in term of 30 days from the notification of the parties, they refuse the proposals for solving the litigation.

The Convention also includes the possibility of arbitration, as an optional means to solve disputes among state members. The Arbitral Court may be formed by a common agreement of the parties or by the unilateral demand of a state in litigation, this being formed of 5 members. The sentence of the Court is definite and mandatory, being pronounce in conformity with the international law or „ex aequo et bono", when the parties agree

c) In the year 1992, at the proposal of Great Britain within the Organisation for Security and Cooperation in Europe, a document entitled „Dispositions regarding a Conciliation Commission" was adopted, which completes the „La Valetta" procedure.

The use of this conciliation procedure must be based on the agreement of the states involved in the disputes, except the situations in which the parties accepted the procedure by reciprocal unilateral declarations, prior to litigations. The conciliation procedure is applied only to disputes between two states (not more than two).

The conciliation commission is founded ad-hoc for every dispute, and its works are finalized in a report in which propositions for the solving of the dispute are made.

In case it is rejected by both state parties, the report will be sent to the Committee of Senior Officials of the Organisation for Security and Cooperation in Europe to provide the measures which are imposed.

d) In the year 1992, at the initiative of the United Nations of America, the Organisation for Security and Cooperation in Europe adopted another document regarding the peaceful regulation of disputes, entitled „Dispositions regarding conducted conciliation". This document does not establish a new procedure to solve disputes, however, it conducts the parties to follow the British conciliation procedure or the procedure stipulated in the Convention regarding the conciliation and arbitration within the Organisation for Security and Cooperation in Europe.

The Committee of Senior Officials of the Organisation for Security and Cooperation in Europe or the Committee of Ministers of Foreign Affairs may conduct the parties in dispute to resort to conciliation, without them having the right to oppose (except litigations regarding territorial integrity, national defence, sovereignty upon the national territory or competing claims upon the jurisdiction of other areas). This procedure does not apply when the parties involved in the litigation agreed to resort to a means of regulation except for Security and Cooperation in Europe [12].

Conclusions

The procedure for solving international disputes by peaceful means reflects one of the fundamental principles of international public law, as it allows a faster restoration of the law order and prevents the alteration of relationships among states, in contradiction with the option of applying sanctions of international public law. Moreover, one may say that the application of sanctions constitutes the exception, the basic rule being the peaceful solving of disputes.

Reflecting upon the entire subject of discussion, we conclude that no matter how well the system of international public law may be adjusted, and how much would be achieved on acception the principles which are at the basis of applying it within the international organisations, it would still be more important that the contentious issues be solved by means of preventive diplomacy, by means of dialogue from positions of equality and by respecting to sovereignty of every state, thus avoiding tensed relations within the international entities and the alteration of state relations.

THE SIGNIFICANCE OF THE INSTITUTION OF THE EUROPEAN CITIZENSHIP IN THE INTERNATIONAL LAW

PAULINA DINA*

Abstract
Romania's adhesion to the European Union has given a stronger impulse for the examination and better understanding of the European Community regulations which become a part of our own legislation.
In this context, the interpretation and execution of legal provisions regarding citizenship, the status of foreigners and that of people who are not citizens of any other state, present multiple significations and implications regarding social, political and even economical life of our country. The European citizenship is a flexible institution which serves the inhabitants of the member states. It is to be mentioned that the purpose of this institution is not to substitute national citizenship, but to complement it. On the other hand, the internal legislation of the member states – which is rather diverse and controversial in most cases – has the role to regulate the access of the citizens to the European citizenship. Citizenship is a complex process, which implies maintaining a negotiated social integration, which refers to all those living the today's Europe and who, starting today, have a support point for the future.

Keywords: European Union, European Council, citizenship, European Citizenship, statelessness.

Introduction

Therefore, the first impact of EU integration is changing the status of the Romanian citizen. Even if the majority of rights covered by European citizenship coincide with those covered by the current Romanian Constitution, change of status still remains essential, by changing the entity to which it belongs.

In our society are discussed at length the issue of citizenship. The central issue is the question of whether one and the same person may simultaneously hold two or more nationalities and also considering the advantages of being a citizen of one EU Member. This latter statute is wished by more and more people because it gives you some rights, such as freedom of establishment, the right to move freely in the EU countries, the right to participate in a stable and continuous economic life of a Member State other than the State of origin, to obtain a non-wage income from an activity, enables the visa-free travel within Europe or around the world, to engage in gainful employment where it is better.

Paper content

The ruling principle in this regard is the prohibition of discriminatory measures based on nationality against the nationals of the Member States, and assimilation to nationals of persons established in another EU Member State than the State of origin.

Timeliness of national citizenship is due to the practical importance that the notion "citizenship" has in terms of a democratic society and the fact that the benefits accruing from citizenship depends on the knowledge offered by the holder of the rights and obligations it involves the quality of being a citizen of a State.

Consequently, the paper is to highlight the specific nature of European citizenship which is still in training at European level, to determine the nature of European integration as well as its effects.

* Senior Lecturer Ph. D., „Dimitrie Cantemir" Christian University, Department of Tourism and Commercial Management, Constanta, (email: pauladina2004@yahoo.com)

Starting with the signing of the Treaty of Lisbon[1], in the European political, legal, philosophical and sociological debate, reference to the notion of "European citizenship" is made. The notion of "nationality" is indeed related to fundamental questions such as identity, nation, political rights, sovereignty, membership, equality, democracy, migration, etc.

European citizenship was defined through the Treaty of Lisbon, entered into force on 1 December 2009, which includes rights, obligations and a more profound implication of the citizen in the process of European integration.

Article 20 of the Treaty of Lisbon provides that "any person having the nationality of one of the Member States is a citizen of the European Union, in accordance with the valid laws in the respective state". The European Union citizenship does not replace national citizenship, but completes it, offering the possibility of exercising some of the Union citizenship rights on the territory of the Member States it lives on (and not only in the country he belongs to, as it happened in the past). The following practical conclusions emerge from here:

1. it is more necessary that a person has the citizenship of a member state in order to benefit from the Union citizenship;

2. European citizenship will complete and add to the rights offered by state citizenship.

A declaration attached to the Treaty reinforces the fact that „if a person detains the citizenship of a member state, this will be determined only by reference to the national laws of the respective state". Thus, it's for each state to indicate which persons are its citizens. This way, the Union citizenship gives a more profound and real meaning to belonging to the European Union. Additionally, the Europeans citizenship is based on the common principles of the member states: freedom, democracy, the principle of respecting the human rights and the rule of law. These principles are included in the Treaty of Lisbon and they emerge from the human fundamental rights and the special rights granted to the European citizen (free movement and civil rights), described in the Treaty.

The Treaty of Lisbon[2] that entered into force on the 1st of May 1999 consolidated the protection of fundamental rights, condemning any form of discrimination and it recognized the right to information and consumer protection. The citizenship of European Union offers rights to the citizens of the member states and consolidates the protection of their interests. The above-mentioned include: the right to free movement, the right of visit, the right to settlement, the right to work and study in the other member states of the Union. The Union law establishes many conditions for exercising these rights. For a visit longer than 3 months one needs a visitor pass. The entrance on the territory of another Member State can be forbidden only for reasons of security and public health, and the interdiction must be justified (as well as for expulsion).

Apart from the rights and obligations written in the Treaty for the foundation of the European Community[3], the Union citizenship offers the following special rights:

- the right to vote and to be elected in the European Parliament and in the local elections in the resident state, in the same conditions as for the citizens of the respective state;

- the right to benefit on the territory of a third party state (which is not member of the European Union) of consular protection from diplomatic authorities of another Member State, if the state of provenience has no diplomatic representation in the respective third party state;

[1] The Treaty of Lisbon entered into force on 1 December 2009

[2] The Treaty of Lisbon is the most recent of all the treaties which, in the past, have modified the treaties based on which the European Community and European Union have been formed, as well as the Single European Act (1986), the Treaty regarding the European Union (Maastricht) (1992), the Treaty of Amsterdam (1997) and the Treaty of Nice (2001).

[3] The Treaty establishing the European Community was signed on March 25th, 1957 and came into force on January 1st, 1958. After signing, the treaty was amended by the Single European Act (17-28 February 1992) Treaty of European Union (Treaty of Maastricht – February 7th, 1992) Treaty of Amsterdam (October 2nd, 1997) and by numerous special regulations, becoming now the of European Community Treaty (ECT).

- the right to petition in front of the European Parliament and the right to appeal to the European Ombudsman for the examination of deficient administration of cases by communitarian institutions and bodies.

The Treaty of Lisbon, which entered into force on 1 December 2009, regulated the "European citizen" status which, in addition, includes the following rights:

- the right to address the European institutions in an Union official language and to receive an answer written in the same language;

- the right to access the documents of the European Parliament, Council and the European Committee, given certain conditions;

- the right to non-discrimination, based on nationality, sex, race, religion, disability, age or sexual orientation, between the Union citizens;

- the right to equal access to a public communitarian position.

In what concerns the right to information, the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union, art. 42 specifies that any European citizen and any physical and juridical person, having its headquarters in a member state has the right to access the documents of the European Parliament, of the European Council, limited on public and private interest reasons. Information of citizen is considered to be a priority by the European institutions.

The European Committee, with the role of supervising the abidance to the Treaty, supervises the application of the provisions related to the European citizenship and elaborates periodic reports referring to the progress realized and on the difficulties encountered.

The fundamental rights and the democratic values are respected in the European Union member states, as signatories of the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union. Observance of human rights has been confirmed by the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union[4] and was incorporated in the Treaty of Lisbon. The guarantee of respecting the fundamental rights was reinforced by including the abidance of rights that derives from article 6, in what concerns the activities of the European institutions. In the same time, the suspension clause was introduced, through which measures can be taken in case of severe and repeated violation by a Member State of the principles that stand at the base of the Union. The engagement of the Union was reaffirmed, officially, in December 2000, when the Bill of Fundamental Rights of the European Union was proclaimed.

The Member States, with a great number of citizens from other Member States can reserve the rights to vote for the communitarian voters resident on their territory, for a minimum period that cannot exceed five years (and the right to candidate in elections can be reserved for communitarian voters resident on their territory for a minimum period that cannot exceed ten years). This derogation is applicable when the proportion of European citizens resident in a Member State without detaining its nationality exceeds 20% of the total number of Union citizens that are resident there. In the last three European elections, Luxembourg was the only Member State which invoked this derogation. In the case of municipal elections, the minimum necessary period of residence cannot exceed the period for which the municipal authority is elected, in what concerns the rights to vote, neither the double of this period, in what concerns the right to candidate. Two Member States (Luxembourg and Belgium) benefit from such derogation. Anyways, Belgium can impose a minimum period of residence only in a limited number of electoral districts and must announce its intention on doing so a year before the elections.

An analysis of the nature and content of European citizenship allows a better assessment of the society, which is in training at European level, but also tailors the way to a series of fundamental questions, such as: What rights are attached to the status of "European citizen"? Who can access European citizenship? Is there a link between territory, nationality and citizenship?

[4] The C*harter* of Fundamental Rights of the European Union, dated 7 December 2000, has been solemnly proclaimed by the European Parliament, the European Council and the European Commission

It is significant that, creating a concept of "European citizenship" has led many states to modify their constitutional right. This has fuelled significant debate about the meaning and consequences of establishing one citizenship at European level and how will it affect each Member State's nationality and sovereignty

In the same time is desired an analysis of how the notion of "European citizenship" is regulated and the extent to which it can make an effective contribution to European integration. Although since 1948 was stated, by the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, a set of principles concerning the right to a nationality of every person and the right not to be arbitrarily deprived of his nationality, in many countries, even in Europe, these rights are not respected. And those affected by these violations are generic called "stateless". A stateless person is a person who is not considered as a national by any State in accordance with its domestic law. Some of them are refugees or migrants who have left their country of origin; others live in their country of origin but are not recognized as citizens. Many of them face a brutal discrimination relative to employment, provision of housing, access to education and health care. Hence the need to regulate the status of stateless persons in the European Union and the importance of further improving the legal system to protect this category of persons.

Up to this date, the Council of Europe adopted the Treaty of Lisbon and the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union in order to guide a rights-based approach on the avoidance of statelessness in relation to State succession. Both treaties contain general principles, rules and procedures of the greatest importance for the effective exercise of human rights to citizenship in Europe.

Conversely, due to lack of uniformity between the laws of various states regarding the criteria for citizenship award, by the combined game of national rules, an individual can be found in a position to have more citizenships or to be denied the right any nationality, although no law was broken. We are facing a conflict of citizenship that creates the multi-citizenship, dual citizenship is the most common. In general, dual citizenship results from the acquisition of a new citizenship without losing the state of origin one.

Dual citizenship is, in principle, a favourable legal situation for the person holding it, but in some cases it can lead to complications in his legal status, rather in the exercise of rights and obligations of the person concerned, and to some conflicts of interest between the states of whose citizen member is. Internationally, it tried the conclusion of multilateral conventions in order to avoid any dual citizenship situations, but gave no significant results. Still, there were concluded numerous bilateral agreements for avoidance of dual citizenship, which establish criteria of choice for the person with dual citizenship. At the same time the international practice is increasingly emerging the trend to favour the real and effective citizenship from the two.

As a result, European citizenship is a complex process that involves maintaining a negotiated social integration, which can adequately surround everyone living in today Europe, with direct implications on our state too. Also, it needs to be granted a high priority to the issue regarding stateless persons living in Europe by adopting a proactive policy by the Council of Europe, by developing measures to reduce and eliminate statelessness with the effect of current conflict resolution.

Conclusions

Regarding the legal status of dual-citizenship, although apparently it is favourable to the citizen, due to the adverse implications that may produce to its legal status, however, based on European regulations in force, it is necessary to deepen the concept and to adopt viable solutions applicable in all EU Member States.

Although European citizenship confers a new status to nationals of Member States, involving a series of rights that may be exercised throughout the European Union, however, implementation of this concept may create tensions with some legitimate interest of Member States, as would be the desire to preserve national policies or sovereignty. Education for citizenship is considered, on European level, as a priority of educational reforms. It is seen as an instrument for social cohesion, based on the citizens' rights and responsibilities. Also, it represents a major dimension of educational policies in all European countries. Thus, it can be said that education for citizenship is an educational purpose, leading the educational system to a set of common values, such as: diversity, pluralism, human rights, social justice, wellbeing, solidarity. If a member state severely and systematically violates the fundamental rights and the democratic values, the Union can impose on it political or economical sanctions. One of the conditions that must be fulfilled for the adhesion to the European Union is the abidance of these fundamental rights.

EU CLIMATE POLICY FROM KYOTO TO DURBAN

ELENA ANDREEVSKA*

Abstract
The risks posed by climate change are real and its impacts are already taking place. The biggest challenge about climate change is that there is no one single answer, no one single solution. This characteristic, together with the long history of political frictions and disputes worsened by environmental stresses suggests that global climatic changes have the potential to exacerbate existing international tensions. On December 31, 2012, the Kyoto Protocol's first commitment period will expire. Unless states agree to a second commitment period, requiring a further round of emissions cuts, the Protocol will no longer impose any quantitative limits on states' greenhouse gas emissions. Although, as a legal matter, the Protocol will continue in force, it will be a largely empty shell, doing little if anything to curb global warming.
Unlike the Kyoto Protocol negotiations, which focused exclusively on developed country emissions, the ongoing negotiations on a post-2012 climate change regime have also addressed developing country mitigation actions, without which a solution to the climate change problem is impossible. This has made the current negotiations as much between developed and developing countries as between the U.S. and the European Union. Key issues include: Legal Form; Regulatory approach; and Differentiation. By the Durban conference in December 2011 the EU needs to decide whether - and how - it will sign-up to a second commitment period for the Kyoto Protocol. This article focuses on the European Union needs to decide whether – and – how it will sign- up a second commitment period for the Kyoto Protocol. Because asking, whether others will act is the wrong question. The real question is whether signing- up to some form of second Kyoto commitment period will support Europe's fundamental interests.

Introduction

"Climate" and "policy" – less than fifty years ago, these two words were never heard in combination. But at least since June 1992, when about a hundred heads of state and government leaders from all over the world came together at the "Earth Summit" in Rio de Janeiro, the climate has featured on the developed nations' political agenda. And over the last 20 years, international efforts to fight climate change have intensified in view of the global challenges being faced in the areas of food, migration and security. At the "Earth Summit", more than 150 countries signed up to a Framework Convention on Climate Change (UNFCCC).[1] First a framework convention is adopted, establishing the basic system of governance for a given issue area. Then, regulatory requirements are negotiated in a protocol to the convention.[2] The UNFCCC, followed five years later by the Kyoto Protocol,[3] which elaborates specific regulatory requirements to limit greenhouse gas emissions.

The ozone regime followed this pattern, starting with the adoption of the Vienna Convention for the Protection of the Ozone Layer in 1985, and continuing with the adoption of the Montreal Protocol on Substances that Deplete the Ozone Layer in 1987. Similarly, the climate change regime began with the negotiation of the 1992 U.N.

[3] The Kyoto Protocol was adopted in Kyoto, Japan, on 11 December 1997 and entered into force on 16 February 2005. The detailed rules for the implementation of the Protocol were adopted at COP 7 in Marrakesh in 2001, and are called the "Marrakesh Accords.

1.Three features of the Kyoto Protocol are noteworthy

First, the Protocol sharply differentiates between Annex I and non–Annex I parties (roughly translatable as "developed" and "developing" countries respectively).[4] The UNFCCC established the principle of "common but differentiated responsibilities and respective capabilities" (CBDR),[5] but did not draw an absolute separation between developed and developing countries. It elaborated general obligations common to all parties, additional commitments relating to reporting and financial assistance for Annex I and Annex II[6] parties respectively, a "degree of flexibility" for countries with economies in transition (i.e., the former Soviet bloc), special consideration for least developed countries, and a procedure by which the classification of countries could be reconsidered as circumstances change.[7] In contrast, the negotiating mandate for the Kyoto Protocol categorically excluded any new commitments for non–Annex I countries, operationalizing a comparatively flexible principle in an extremely rigid way.[8] Second, because the Kyoto Protocol negotiations focused exclusively on developed country emissions reductions, the primary axis in the negotiations was between the two main developed country powers, the United States and the European Union, in the case of the United States with support from Japan, Australia, and other members of the so-called "Umbrella Group." Third, the Kyoto Protocol's regulatory approach was modeled on the Montreal Protocol on Substances that Deplete the Ozone Layer, adopted ten years earlier. Like the Montreal Protocol, the Kyoto Protocol establishes legally-binding commitments, consisting of quantitative national performance standards, defined through a process of "top-down" international negotiations.[9] In contrast, the UNFCCC had elaborated a bottom-up process requiring countries to develop and report on nationally-defined policies and measures to mitigate climate change.[10]

The active role of the EU in the international climate change negotiations is vital and must continue. The new EU member states which have joined since 2004 have set their own targets within the framework of the Kyoto Protocol. In order to meet the targets set by the Kyoto Protocol, in June

[4] The UNFCCC refers in article 4.2 to "the developed country Parties and other Parties included in Annex I," leaving open the possibility that not all Annex I parties qualify as "developed." Conversely, the term "developing country" is never defined in the UNFCCC or the Kyoto Protocol. It is usually equated with non–Annex I status, although it is debatable whether all of the non–Annex I countries should be considered "developing," particularly since they include South Korea, Mexico, and Chile, which are now members of the Organization of Economic Cooperation and Development (OECD).

[9] The Kyoto Protocol's performance standards consist of quantitative limits on national greenhouse gas emissions. In contrast, the quantitative targets specified in the Montreal Protocol limit production and consumption (rather than emissions) of ozone-depleting substances. Kyoto's quantitative emissions targets are defined as percentage reductions from a base year emissions level (generally 1990 emissions), and apply to a basket of six greenhouse gases. For the Protocol's first commitment period, which runs for a five year period from 2008 to 2012, European Union member states are required to reduce their emissions by 8% relative to 1990 levels, Japan by 6%, and Russia by 0%. In addition to these emissions targets, the Protocol establishes detailed requirements for the monitoring, reporting and review of national emissions inventories. It also establishes several market mechanisms that parties can use to achieve their emissions targets, including emissions trading and the Clean Development Mechanism (CDM).

2000 the European Commission launched the European Climate Change Programme (ECCP).[11] This programme has the aim of supplementing the domestic efforts of EU countries with European strategies.[12] It is already clear that the EU will meet its Kyoto Protocol targets. The 15 EU countries have in fact managed to reduce their emissions by 14% compared to 1990. The ten new EU members have also either hit or exceeded their targets, so the EU-27 should have no problem in meeting their obligations. Only Austria and Italy are having problems meeting their targets, but this will have little impact on the overall EU result.[13]

The 15th United Nations Climate Change Conference and the 5th Meeting of the Parties to the Kyoto Protocol took place on December 7 and 8, 2009 in Copenhagen, one year on from Poznan. In line with the "Bali Action Plan",[14] negotiations on international climate protection plans for the period after 2012 should have been concluded in Copenhagen. However, after some difficult negotiating, the conference ended with nothing more than a political agreement, the "Copenhagen Accord", which covered certain core elements of future climate policy.[15] The Copenhagen Accord is not a legally-binding agreement but just a political declaration which is "acknowledged" by the party states.[16] Even though the climate summit ended without any binding agreement, it should be stressed that the Accord contains major core elements of climate policy. It was also agreed in Copenhagen that talks on future climate policy under the Framework Climate Convention and the Kyoto Protocol should be continued until the next climate conference in Cancun.[17]

The United Nations Climate Change Conference took place in Cancun, Mexico from November 29 to December 10, 2010, and encompassed the 6th Meeting of the Parties to the Kyoto Protocol. In the run-up to the conference, the EU Council formulated its goals for Cancun. The EU

[14] The 2007 Bali Climate Change Conference culminated in the adoption of the Bali Road Map, which consists of a number of forward-looking decisions that represent the various tracks that are essential to reaching a secure climate future. The Bali Road Map includes the Bali Action Plan, which charts the course for a new negotiating process designed to tackle climate change, with the aim of completing this by 2009, along with a number of other decisions and resolutions.

[15] In this Accord, the vast majority of countries confirmed that average global temperatures should not be allowed to increase by more than two degrees Celsius. But the conference failed to provide any binding international agreements or any kind of instrument to allow this two-degree target to be met.

bis 18. Dezember 2009," http://www.bmu.de/15_ klimakonferenz/doc/44133 (accessed February 3, 2011). During the talks, China, India and the USA in particular were not keen to commit to binding agreements. The President of the European Council, Herman Van Rompuy, said at the end of February 2010 that Europe had been left sitting in the corridor while the USA and China struck their own deal. "We were excluded from the crucial deal between the USA and the four major developing countries." [17] In 2010 the EU continued their efforts in the sphere of European energy and climate policy. As the Lisbon Strategy expired in 2010, the European Council adopted a successor strategy, "Europe 2020": a new European strategy for employment and growth. See European Commission (2009). Working Document. Consultation on the Future "EU2020" Strategy.

wanted specific actions on emission reduction, adaptation to climate change and deforestation.[18] After some tough negotiations the international community reached an agreement which – unlike the Kyoto Protocol – also included the USA, China and other emerging and developing countries. The two-degree target was officially recognised by more than 190 participating countries, providing a basis for a successor to the Kyoto Protocol.[19]

The challenge is now to make the right preparations for the Climate Conference in South Africa in 2011. This means that countries have to decide how much they can reduce their emissions and how much they are prepared to pay for this. The EU already held an energy summit on February 4, 2011.[20]

2. How should the Europe Play the Kyoto question at the Durban 2011 Climate Summit?

On December 31, 2012, the Kyoto Protocol's first commitment period will expire. Unless states agree to a second commitment period, requiring a further round of emissions cuts, the Protocol will no longer impose any quantitative limits on states' greenhouse gas emissions. Although, as a legal matter, the Protocol will continue in force, it will be a largely empty shell, doing little if anything to curb global warming. Ever since the Kyoto Protocol's entry into force in 2005, the question of what to do after 2012, when Kyoto's first commitment runs out, has been a central focus of the U.N. climate change negotiations. Developing countries such as China and India want the Protocol to continue in its present form, imposing quantitative limits on developed country emissions but not their own.

The European Union might be amenable to a new commitment period under the Protocol, but only as part of "a global and comprehensive framework engaging all major economies,"[21] including the United States and China. Meanwhile, some Kyoto parties, such as Japan, Canada, and Russia, want to replace the Kyoto Protocol with a comprehensive new agreement with commitments by both developed and developing countries. In 2007, at the Bali conference, the parties to the U.N. Framework Convention on Climate Change established a parallel negotiating process, involving the other big emitters such as the United States and China, to consider long-term cooperative action under the Convention, with the goal of reaching a comprehensive outcome addressing mitigation, adaptation, finance, and technology.[22]

Unlike the Kyoto Protocol negotiations, which focused exclusively on developed country emissions, the ongoing negotiations on a post-2012 climate change regime have also addressed developing country mitigation actions, without which a solution to the climate change problem is [18] This groundwork strengthened the EU's negotiating position because it allowed it to push for concrete and realistic actions during the talks.

[19] NGOs considered the acceptance of the twodegree target to be a step in the right direction towards a new climate change treaty. Between 2013 and 2015 there will even be an appraisal of how the targets can be adapted to limit global warming to 1.5 degrees Celsius.

impossible.[23] This has made the current negotiations as much between developed and developing countries as between the U.S. and the European Union. Key issues include: Legal form;[24] Regulatory approach;[25] and Differentiation.[26]

Positions vary widely on these issues. The European Union is open to considering a new round of legally-binding Kyoto targets, but only as part of a global and comprehensive framework that includes the United States and China. The United States would be willing to negotiate a legally-binding agreement, but only if the mandate provided that the agreement would apply with equal legal force to all of the major emitters (including China and India). Although it accepts that developing country commitments should be differentiated from those of developed countries as to content, it insists on symmetry of legal form, meaning that the provisions for major-emitting developing and developed countries should have the same legal character. Meanwhile, the big developing countries such as China and India would like developed countries to continue Kyoto's top-down, legally-binding approach, but are unwilling to accept this approach themselves. They insist on maintaining the Kyoto "firewall" between developed countries (which have emissions limitation commitments), and developing countries (which don't).

The negotiations on a post-2012 climate change regime were initially supposed to wrap up at the 2009 Copenhagen Conference. But the Copenhagen Accord — a political agreement establishing a bottom-up process based on national pledges — was not formally adopted by the conference.[27][16] And although the following year, the Cancun conference adopted decisions that elaborate the Copenhagen framework and anchor the Copenhagen pledges in the Convention, it extended the negotiating process and left open the final legal form of the regime, including the possibility of a second commitment period under the Kyoto Protocol.[17] So the battle over policy architectures will continue at this year's conference of the parties in Durban, South Africa, and most likely at the 2012 climate conference scheduled in Qatar.[28]

[23] According to some estimates, developing country emissions will grow so rapidly over the next 20 years that, even if developed countries were to phase out their greenhouse gas emissions completely, global emissions would still be higher in 2030 than today. Project Catalyst, "Limiting Atmospheric CO2e to 450 ppm — The Mitigation Challenge," at 13 (Feb. 2009).

[24] Will the post-2012 regime be established through a legally-binding agreement (or agreements), such as an amendment to the Kyoto Protocol, a new legal agreement defining mitigation commitments for states that do not have Kyoto targets (such as the United States and China), or a comprehensive agreement that embraces all states and replaces the Kyoto Protocol? Or will the post-2012 regime be defined through a political agreement or decisions of the parties? See Jacob Werksman," Law and Disorder: Will the Issue of Legal Character Make or Break a Global Deal on Climate"? German Marshall Fund of the United States Policy Brief (July 2010).

[25] Will the post-2012 regime continue the top-down approach of the Kyoto Protocol, in which internationally-defined commitments are adopted in order to drive national action? Or will the regime switch to a more bottom-up approach, in which countries unilaterally define their own national climate change approach, or adopt some kind of hybrid approach?

[26] Will the post-2012 climate change regime continue to draw an absolute wall between developed and developing countries, as the Kyoto Protocol does? Or will it provide for greater parallelism or symmetry between developed and developing countries — for example, by imposing legally-binding commitments on both, or by adopting common rules on accounting, mechanisms, reporting, review and/or compliance? See Jacob Werksman, "Legal Symmetry and Legal Differentiation under a Future Deal on Climate Change," 10 Climate Policy 627 (2010).

[27] Rather than defining emissions targets from the top down through international negotiations, the Copenhagen Accord establishes a bottom-up process that allows each country to define its own commitments and actions unilaterally. The Accord specifies that developed countries will put forward national emissions targets in the 2020 timeframe, but allows each party to determine its own target level, base year, and accounting rules. Other key elements of the Copenhagen Accord include: (1) a long-term aspirational goal of limiting climate change to no more than 2° C; (2) significant new financial assistance for developing country mitigation and adaptation; and (3) a process for international analysis and review of national actions. See Daniel Bodansky, "The Copenhagen Climate Change Conference: A Postmortem," 104 Am. J. Int'l L. 230 (2010).

The next UN climate summit will take place in Durban, South Africa from 28th November to 9th December. This follows the unsuccessful 2009 Copenhagen summit and the partially-successful one in Cancun in 2010. The EU has the opportunity to lead the world in climate negotiations by strengthening its climate and energy policies, and by offering bilateral financial deals to developing countries which accept obligations under the UN climate framework.

There is no doubt that the Durban summit will not lead to final agreement on new international legally-binding commitments. Differences between negotiating parties, on how deep emissions reductions should be and who should foot the bill, remain too great. At best the summit can lay the groundwork for a new legal agreement. But progress will only be possible with greater leadership, and only the EU can provide such leadership. US politics make leadership by the Obama administration impossible. China, India and other emerging global powers regard international climate negotiations with deep suspicion – part of attempts by 'the West' to keep them in their place.

The EU should provide leadership in Durban by stressing that climate policies can strengthen, not hinder, economic recovery. It should outline how its own climate policies will be made more effective. And it should offer countries resisting UN targets on climate change strong economic and financial incentives to accept such targets. The EU line at Durban should be based on four main points: Continuing to promote the Kyoto Protocol framework; Continuing to offer an increase in its 2020 emissions reduction target from 20 per cent to 30 per cent,[29] if other countries commit to ambitious targets; On energy efficiency and renewables, outlining how the existing 20 per cent targets will be met, notably by stressing that the draft energy efficiency directive will be top of the EU's agenda in 2012; and A statement that the EU's ETS will be strengthened with a Europe-wide floor price, with border tax adjustments to protect energy-intensive European decarbonisation policies should be introduced and implemented whatever the state of international climate negotiations.

However, the top down approach is needed too.[30] EU institutions can themselves implement top down policies to require unenthusiastic or ineffective member-states to take action. But global agreement gives arguments for Europe-wide action greater traction.[31]

3. Was Durban a significant step forward?

The United Nations Climate Change Conference in Durban, South Africa, was held from 28 November - 11 December 2011. The conference involved a series of events, including the seventeenth session of the Conference of the Parties (COP 17) to the UN Framework Convention on Climate Change (UNFCCC) and the seventh meeting of the Conference of the Parties serving as the Meeting of Parties to the Kyoto Protocol (CMP 7).[32]

[30] Not all governments are committed to protecting the climate, and many of those that are committed rhetorically have made little progress on delivery. For example, UK governments under Prime Ministers Tony Blair, Gordon Brown and David

Cameron have repeatedly emphasized their commitment to reducing emissions and moving to clean energy, but the UK gets a lower proportion of its energy from renewables than all other European countries except Malta and Luxembourg.

[32] In support of these two main bodies, four other bodies convened: the resumed 14th session of the Ad hoc Working Group on Long-term Cooperative Action under the Convention (AWG-LCA); the resumed 16th session of the Ad hoc Working Group on Further Commitments for Annex I Parties under the Kyoto Protocol (AWG-KP); and the 35th sessions of the Subsidiary Body for Implementation (SBI) and the Subsidiary Body for Scientific and Technological Advice (SBSTA). The Conference drew over 12,480 participants, including over 5400 government officials, 5800 representatives of UN bodies and agencies, intergovernmental organizations and civil society organizations, and more than 1200 members of the media.

The meetings resulted in the adoption of 19 COP decisions and 17 CMP decisions and the approval of a number of conclusions by the subsidiary bodies.[33] These outcomes cover a wide range of topics, notably the establishment of a second commitment period under the Kyoto Protocol, a decision on long-term cooperative action under the Convention, the launch of a new process towards an agreed outcome with legal force applicable to all parties to the Convention, and the operationalization of the Green Climate Fund. After the frustrations at the Copenhagen conference and the struggle to rescue the multilateral climate regime in Cancun, negotiators in Durban turned a corner and not only resuscitated the Kyoto Protocol but, in doing so, adopted a decision that will lead to negotiations on a more inclusive 21st century climate regime. There was a strong sense that elements of the Durban package, guided by a need to fulfill long overdue commitments that go back to the Bali Roadmap, restored sufficient momentum for a new negotiation process, one that will continue to witness a anthropogenic interference" with the climate system.[34]

The talks resulted in the adoption of the 'Durban Platform' – a roadmap to a global legal agreement applicable to all parties. Negotiations for the new agreement, to begin early in 2012, are to conclude, as early as possible, and not later than 2015. The commitments in the new agreement will take effect from 2020.

This was accompanied by an agreement to a second commitment period of the Kyoto Protocol from 2013, [35] and the launch of the Green Climate Fund to distribute the US$100 million in assistance pledged by developed nations to assist developing nations with mitigation efforts.[36]

The agreed second commitment period to the Kyoto Protocol will begin in 2013 and will avoid a gap in reduction commitments that could have arisen when the current phase of the Kyoto Protocol expires at the end of 2012. The parties that signed up to the Kyoto extension must commit to firm emission reduction targets by next year. They must also decide by next year whether the second commitment period will last until 2017 or 2020 and whether surplus emission rights from the first commitment period will be eligible for carry-over into the second period.[37]

Actually, the key points of the Durban Platform are as follows:

- Agreement to negotiate a new international climate treaty as an "outcome with legal force" by 2015.
- Provides for a second commitment period for the Kyoto Protocol.
- Effectively secures the future of the Clean Development Mechanism.
- Little short-term impact on the EU's Emissions Trading Scheme.

Finally, one of the positive aspects at Durban was that the EU regained a central position, having been sidelined in Copenhagen. The EU was calling for a 'roadmap' for future negotiations.[38] This was agreed – eventually. China, India and the US all signed up to negotiating an agreement with binding targets by 2015, with the targets coming into force in 2020. Getting China and India to agree that they could at some stage have targets was progress.[39] However, the rich and powerful fossil fuel [35] Thus preserving the 'Kyoto architecture' – the rules and legal framework for managing emissions.

[36] Whilst EU representatives applauded the Durban Platform as an historic breakthrough in the fight against climate change, the agreement has received mixed reactions from politicians, green groups and climate change experts.

[38] Roadmap being the current jargon term of choice for anything the EU does on climate and energy.

[39] Back in 1997, the US senate voted 96-0 against any international agreement that didn't impose binding targets on China and India. Therefore, a US President would theoretically have a chance of getting a future treaty based on the Durban agreement ratified by Congress.

lobby in the US would then inevitably find other reasons to oppose a new climate treaty. And China and India still have the option of refusing binding commitments in 2015. All they've agreed so far is that they will talk about them.

Having a top-down international agreement would be valuable. Governments and negotiators should certainly keep talking, but a top-down framework is not essential. Bottom-up progress can be made without one. So politicians and policy makers should not allow the UNFCCC process to take their attention away from national or regional policies.

The EU should give priority to adopting the draft energy efficiency directive and rescuing the Emissions Trading System from irrelevance.[40]

Conclusion

The international political response to climate change began with the adoption of the UNFCCC in 1992. The UNFCCC sets out a framework for action aimed at stabilizing atmospheric concentrations of greenhouse gases to avoid "dangerous anthropogenic interference" with the climate system. In December 1997, delegates to the third session of the Conference of the Parties (COP) in Kyoto, Japan, agreed to a Protocol to the UNFCCC that commits industrialized countries and countries in transition to a market economy to achieve emission reduction targets.[41] COP 13 and COP/MOP 3 took place in December 2007 in Bali, Indonesia. Negotiations resulted in the adoption of the Bali Action Plan. Parties established the AWG-LCA with a mandate to focus on key elements of long term cooperation identified during the Convention Dialogue: mitigation, adaptation, finance, technology and a shared vision for long-term cooperative action.[42] The UN Climate Change Conference in Copenhagen, Denmark, took place in December 2009. The event was marked by disputes over transparency and process, as well as with political agreement "Copenhagen Accord."[43] Following four preparatory meetings in 2010, the UN Climate Change Conference in Cancun, Mexico, took place from 29 November to 11 December 2010. By the end of the conference, parties had finalized the Cancun Agreements, which include decisions under both negotiating tracks.[44] In 2011, three official UNFCCC negotiating sessions were held in the lead up to Durban. In April, the two AWGs convened in Bangkok, Thailand. The AWG-LCA engaged in procedural discussions on its agenda, finally agreeing on an agenda for its subsequent work. Two months later, negotiators gathered in Bonn, Germany, for sessions of the SBI, SBSTA, AWG-LCA and AWG-KP. SBSTA

[40] Proposal for Directives 2004/8/EC and 2006/32/EC [COM (2011) 370, 22/06/201]. The Danish government, which holds the EU presidency in the first half on 2012, has said that it will try to do both of these things.

[41] These countries, known as Annex I parties under the UNFCCC, agreed to reduce their overall emissions of six greenhouse gases by an average of 5.2% below 1990 levels between 2008-2012 (the first commitment period), with specific targets varying from country to country. At the end of 2005, the first steps were taken to consider long-term issues. Convening in Montreal, Canada, the first session of the COP/MOP 1 decided to establish the AWG-KP on the basis of Protocol Article 3.9, which mandates consideration of Annex I parties' further commitments at least seven years before the end of the first commitment period. COP 11 agreed to consider long-term cooperation under the Convention through a series of four workshops known as "the Convention Dialogue," which continued until COP 13.

[42] The Bali conference also resulted in agreement on the Bali Roadmap. Based on two negotiating tracks under the Convention and the Protocol, the Roadmap set a deadline for concluding the negotiations in Copenhagen in December 2009.

[43] It established a process for parties to indicate their support for the Accord and, during 2010, over 140 countries did so. More than 80 countries also provided information on their national emission reduction targets and other mitigation actions. On the last day of the Copenhagen Climate Change Conference, parties also agreed to extend the mandates of the AWG-LCA and AWG-KP, requesting them to present their respective outcomes to COP 16 and COP/MOP 6.

[44] See Doc. /SB/2011/INF.1/Rev.1 and FCCC/ AWGLCA/2011/INF.1, both issued after Cancun), and Decision 1/CP.16, created the Green Climate Fund (GCF), which was designated to be the new operating entity of the Convention's financial mechanism and is to be governed by a board of 24 members. They also recognized the commitment by developed countries to provide US$30 billion of fast-start finance in 2010-2012, and to jointly mobilize US$100 billion per year by 2020.

agreed to a new agenda item on impacts of climate change on water and integrated water resources management under the Nairobi Work Programme. This item will be taken up in Durban.[45] The AWG-LCA and AWG-KP reconvened from 1-7 October 2011 in Panama City, Panama.[46] The outcome for most of the informal group discussions was some "form of text" forwarded to Durban as a basis for further discussions. Since the negotiations in Panama, a number of meetings have been held that are relevant to Durban.[47]

Another climate change conference has come to an end at which the hope of binding global action to combat climate change has not been fulfilled.[48] Instead, this has once again been adjourned. With the document agreed (the Durban Platform for Enhanced Action), a road map has been drawn up that foresees a global treaty by 2020. This will mean almost ten more years of the negotiation marathon with an uncertain outcome and no fixed global measures.[49] The EU and some of the world's poorest countries vulnerable to climate change impacts have launched a joint bid for a strong outcome for binding targets by 2015. With the EU pact gaining support from over 120 countries, the world's largest polluters, China and India, could come under pressure to come on board.[50]

The alliance between the EU, the Alliance of Small Island States (AOSIS) and the Least Developed Countries (LDCs), facilitated by Denmark and Gambia, includes over half the world's governments. Other countries in Africa and Latin America also back its goals. This show of unity between developed and developing countries is possibly the first in the history of the UN climate convention, and marks a new dynamic in the often fractured process. The US and a number of big developing countries including Brazil, China and India want any negotiations to start in 2015 at the earliest, and not come into effect until after 2020.[51]

As part of a transition to the wider international climate regime that is needed, the EU is open to a second Kyoto period on condition that agreement is reached on:

- The roadmap and deadline for a comprehensive and legally binding global climate framework that should enter into force no later than 2020;
- Strengthening Kyoto's environmental integrity through a robust accounting framework for forest management and through a solution to the issue of the surplus of emission budgets ("AAUs")

[45] No agreement was reached on other proposed new items, such as blue carbon and rights of nature and the integrity of ecosystems, and a work programme on agriculture.

[46] The AWG-KP concentrated on outstanding issues and further clarifying options concerning mitigation targets, the possible nature and content of rules for a second commitment period, and the role of a possible second commitment period within a balanced outcome in Durban.

[47] For more information on many of these events, visit IISD Reporting Services' Climate Change Policy and Practice knowledgebase: http://climate-l.iisd.org.

[48] At the Durban Conference the EU has clearly stated that any new agreement would need to be binding according to international law. General expectations as regards the legal form consist of a clear wording, with clearly defined commitments and monitored implementation. It is very important that all commitments, no matter whether they are high or low, have a similar form, i.e. are of the same legally binding status.

[49] Scientists have been warning of the ever smaller time window for effective measures to limit global warming to 2°C for years now. Extension of the Kyoto Protocol with binding aims is considered too weak. Leading polluters such as Canada, Russia and Japan have already declared their unwillingness to support an extension of the Kyoto Protocol – Canada even wishes to withdraw from the Kyoto Protocol before it has even expired. However, the remaining states produce just 15 percent of greenhouse gas emissions. The reduction commitments for a further commitment period are only to be agreed next year, and it remains unclear when exactly this period should begin and end.

[50] China has however shown promising signals, although skepticism remains over its position. India has insisted it is unfair to expect them to slash emissions when it could hamper economic development and poverty reduction. Brazil, an emerging economy that plays a significant role in climate negotiations, also said there was convergence on a deal in Durban.

[51] AOSIS and the LDCs say that is too late as such a plan will most likely result in mean global temperatures increasing by more than 1.5C, wreaking havoc with climate change disasters such as drought and sea-level rises.

from the first commitment period. This solution must be non discriminatory and preserves incentives for overachievement of emission targets;

- Establishing one or more new market-based mechanisms in order to boost the development of a robust international carbon market.

As is always the case at international conferences where diplomacy and the different interests of individual states play an important role, one must take a closer look at the details. It then becomes clear that with its refusal policy, the USA is losing influence – primarily to China. The EU has entered into a strategic alliance with the small states affected the most by climate change, such as the island states that fear that their territories could already be submerged in just a few years time. For them the international process is one of the few opportunities to bring their interests to the attention of more influential governments.

The setting up of a Green Climate Fund, which is to primarily make funding available to the poorer states for climate protection and adjustment to the consequences of climate change, was celebrated as a key success (100 billion US dollars each year until 2020). The interim committee established at last year's conference in Cancun was officially confirmed, and the fund designated an operating entity of the financing mechanism of the Convention. However, it remains unclear where funding for this should actually come from. Several states have applied to host the fund, including Germany.

As trailblazer in climate policy, the EU has to continue to pursue ambitious goals, [52] but must also be aware that climate change is not afforded the same importance in other countries. In order to encourage countries like the USA to get on board, the EU will have to be willing to make compromises. On an international level, Europe needs to be seen as a role model, not as a teacher. If it manages this, then more important progress may be made after the Durban's 2011 Conference in the fight against climate change. But, it remains to be seen whether this will be sufficient to succeed in limiting global warming to two degrees Celsius in the long-term.

[52] The EU needs to adapt its emissions reduction targets to reflect these changes and set itself the goal of reducing emissions by 30% by 2020. This would cost very little more than the previous 20% target, but would boost the EU's credibility in international climate talks and put the European economy in a good position for the future. Estimates suggest that an increase to 30% would only cost an extra 11 billion Euro compared to the original 20% figure. This represents less than 0.1% of the EU's economic output. And the cost of delaying is high: the International Energy Agency (IEA) estimates that delays in investing in low-carbon energy sources worldwide incurs annual costs of 300 to 400 billion Euro. THE IMPORTANCE OF PRINCIPLES IN THE PRESENT CONTEXT OF LAW RECODIFYING

ELENA ANGHEL*

Abstract

In its grand historical-spatial diversity, in spite of the natural differences between civilizations, law presents a permanent and universal nature, represented by a bunch of constants. These constants of law are, doubtlessly, the juridical principles, those indispensable tools meant to facilitate harmonization, on international level, of the legal systems. Along with the global trend of unifying space and time and escalation of a new stage of civilization, a more diversified society, we are witnessing today a reconfiguration of the Romanian legal system, reflected in the adoption of new legal codes. In this historical context in which Romania is placed, researching the importance of law principles becomes a necessity.

Law principles have a privileged place within the positive juridical order, representing the foundation of any juridical construction: they certify the continuity of law during the centuries and that is why here we have to dig in order to find out the foundation of law, its permanent nature, its substance; they precede and give birth to positive law, which lies ahead of legal rules; principles build and guide the entire system of law, conferring to the legal order its necessary stability; being the underlayer of positive law, the principles of law represent a factor of stability and, also, a source of unity, coherence, consistency and efficiency for that legal system.

Keywords*: principle, new legal codes, continuity, stability, unity.*

Introduction

Being a facet of society, law does not reduce to the ensemble of applicable legal norms. At the basis of positive law we can find a handful of principles that have been an adjunct to society from the beginning of its existence and before the founding of state. These principles are the ones that confirm law's continuity in time and this is where the fundament of law, its permanent nature or its substance, need to be looked for. Therefore, regardless of the changes involved in the process of legal systems' evolution and of the number of qualitative and quantitative modifications recorded by the legal phenomenon, the essence remains unaltered.

In the present historical context, in which humanity is ascending a new level of civilization while embracing "the unity in diversity", the role of general principles of law, as a legal expression of the fundamental relations in society, is amplifying. We consider that in order for "the unity in diversity" to actually become possible, it is absolutely necessary for the European Union to specialize in principles and values situated in the area of the eternal legal for the individual's rationality as well as for the states' national identity.

On the other hand, we must not neglect the fact that great social-economic changes also determine modifications in the legislation's content along with changes in the construction of law systems, and the law principles are those that assure the legal system's opening and trace the directions that need to be followed. By placing the principles at the foundation of law evolution in the periods marked by legislative changes, we are highlighting the necessity of reconsidering the importance of law principles in the present context in which new legislative codes are being adopted in Romania.

The necessity of reconsidering the role of law principles is more obvious in the contemporary period, in which society's progress implies the continuous gradual decline of traditional forms and contents. The permanent struggle of emancipating from the traditions' arduousness, the lack of fondness towards the moral values and principles and the multiplication of principles into arbitrary, impart relativity, instability and incertitude to law. We are visibly drifting away from Portalis' belief, according to which "what is essential is to impart to the new institutions that character of permanence and stability that can guarantee them the right to grow old."

The symptoms of the crisis crossed by law are legislative explosion, a frantic tendency to reform everything that has proved to be sufficiently stable, obscure laws borrowed from other law systems and sometimes translated without sense, dispositions with imprecise, inconsistent and incoherent character. In this entire normative "chaos", also amplified by the continuous diversity of social relations and, in consequence, of those with legal character, the law principles striving to bring light and orientate the legislator during the process of creating law, as well as the practitioner during the difficult task of applying it.

Given that, such as Hayek sustained, "we must resort to the abstract where we cannot master the concrete", we believe that the need to return to principles is proven to be nowadays impetuously more necessary than in the past.

1. The importance of general principles in the process of elaborating law

The general principles represent a factor of stability in law, whilst being a counter-weight of the legislature's disorders. It is easily observed that the law regulations experience an alert rhythm of changes, whereas the principles maintain society in equilibrium, are long-lived and, thus, assure continuity for the legal order. Bergel observed that while the disappearance or modification of a simple law regulation has only an "episodic character", the elimination of a principle "risks causing a high prejudice to legal order because the faith of numerous legal regulations is at stake"[1].

The principles are genuine constants of law. However, this aspect should not lead to the conclusion that eternal and immutable law principles exist. Mircea Djuvara brought into notice the danger of considering the principles in a purely metaphysical way: "We are very easily inclined to committing the error of believing that a law or judiciary principle is the product of a pure speculation and that it would appear in our minds before an experience…This is why immutable law principles, that are valuable for any time and place, cannot exist".

Sofia Popescu emphasizes that the principles "do not block the law dynamics", but guarantee the law order's cohesion through their "migration" from a law branch to another[2]. At the same time they assure the evolution of the legal system and law renewal while constituting "the vectors of legal development, meaning that while progressing, they impel the progress of the legal system". For these reasons they are named development principles[3].

Nicolae Popa mentioned that the general principles of law are crossed by a double dialectic: external and internal[4]. The external dialecticism "concerns the principles' dependence to the social conditions assembly", while at some point they are reflected in the legal conscience of a nation; the evolution of this conscience imposes "the rethinking of some principles in accordance to the social-economic mutations that require a corresponding adequacy for the legal regulations and institutions"[5].

The internal dialecticism concerns "the assembly of internal connections characteristic to the legal system, the interferences of its component parts". Under this aspect, law principles are those that assure the coherency of the entire legal system. The subordination of the normative assemble to a minimum of guiding assumptions contributes to affirming the legality's principle, as a fundament of the positive legal order and to assuring a logical unity as part of it.

The law system does not constitute the constant, static, arithmetic, mechanical, sum of the effectual legal norms, but the unity and assembly of legal norms that are systematically structured and organized on the base of certain principles[6]. The cohesion of law system is assured through the interdependency of its composing elements. Buche mentioned that structure and system's development are subordinated to the principles. Therefore they are structure principles. General principles of law "tend to change the legal order into a coherent system. They have the role to assure the systematic unity of law, in the middle of positive regulations' disorder, by forming check points that allow the placement and arrangement of law regulations in accordance to certain conducting ideas"[7].

On the other hand, as a facet of society, law does not reduce to the assemble of applicable legal norms. At the basis of positive law we can find a handful of principles that have been an adjunct to society from the beginning of its existence. Guided by ideals, law is for an individual a mean of social control: the person conforms to the legal norms because these offer him cultural–normative models, of which he is aware they are necessary and thus follows them. Law is valorized and integrates the behavior standards resulting from society's value conscience. Therefore, the elaboration of law is based on principles and values: the principles of law are to the extent of positive law, specify it and stand at its base[8].

The general principles of law occupy a privileged spot in the positive legal order and constitute the foundation of any legal construction. Hayek observes that law principles "determine in a real method the legal system, its general spirit, as well as every particular norm contained by it and the method in which it is applied"[9]. In a similar way,

Adhémar underlined that "in order to be viable and at least durable, the various institutions of a nation need to be founded on principles between which a general adequate harmony exists: this method of thinking, superior to the others, is simultaneously accessible to any real legal advisor"[10]

For Bergel the principles fulfill a fundamental function and a technical one. The fundamental function resides in the fact that while being the base of legal thinking, the principles impose themselves to the actual legal advisor[11]. Thus, the entire legislative assemble is governed and conforms to the principles' authority. The legal norms cannot be proclaimed outside the directives contained by the law principles. The technical function intercepts the interaction of various general law principles: some principles are directors because the legal order itself depends of them; therefore, the principle of law equality and of fundamental liberties constitutes "foundations of the legal structure". Other principles are rectifiers, since they aim only at the disposal of certain mistakes or of the eventual unjust solutions; for instance, the principle of good faith.

In the process of law creation, we are interested in the directing principles that orient the legislator's activity from a methodological point of view. "The entire law creating process involves the skillful combination of tradition and innovation, so that the most adequate legislative solutions are imposed"[12]. The legislator must permanently capture the requirements of social life and offer them an actual expression by establishing legal norms. However the effectiveness of these norms depends on their conformity with the ensemble of principles that govern the normative system so that the "law's principles trace the directing line for the legal system; without them the law could not be conceived"[13]. The positive law must organize, develop and apply these principles that guide society towards reaching ideals.

Law must itself contain the equilibrium between the letter and spirit of rules. The entire official legislation, instituted or approved by the state, otherwise said "the law's letter", must be crossed by the "spirit" of law principles. The principles constitute guiding marks for the legislator and assume the function of conforming the positive law's system. The law's spirit orients the legislator's will: "the normative act's text acknowledges that certain will of the legislator that is in accordance to the law spirit, itself configured in the values principle of justice and, on a larger scale, in the century's spirit"[14].

Franck Moderne attributes a functional legitimacy to the general principles of law: these assure the exigency of legal order coherency, by contributing to the consolidation of certainty in legality[15]. The author refers to Max Weber's belief in the fact that "that which answers to the coherency's imperative is rational".

The coherency of legal order signifies the lack of antinomies in law. In C. M. Stamatis' opinion, the law order has never been an absolutely coherent integral normative system, without internal flaws and in perfect conformity with the social, political, cultural domain, instead the antinomies are resident in its interior. However, it has been shown that they must not be seen necessarily as "mistakes" of legislative policy, caused by the legislator's negligence. The existence of antinomies in law is explained by the fact that, on hand, the legal norms serve not just for different purposes but to opposed ones as well, and, on the other hand, by the fact that certain legal regulations are inefficient since they cannot keep up with the tendencies of society's development.[16]

The principles represent the arching key of the entire legal structure. As the base for positive law, they are reservoir of unity, coherency, uniformity and efficiency for the particular law system. The entire law science consists in reality of "generating from the multiplicity of law dispositions their essential, namely these exact last justice principles, from which all the other dispositions derive. Hereby, the entire legislation becomes of a great clarity and is caught in the so-called legal spirit"[17].

2. The importance of general principles in the process of law establishment

The continental legal system rigorously distributes the tasks dictated by the fulfillment of society's ideals: the legislator is entitled to create the law and the judge must apply it, in its letter and spirit. The law, however, cannot be mechanically applied to some actual cases because it is general in its nature; it cannot cover all legal situations that rise from social reality, being insufficient; the law also cannot live forever since it is naturally temporary. The generality, insufficiency and perishable aspect of law make the judge's assignment extremely difficult.

Applying the law, as the judge's primordial assignment, demands a unitary and harmonious interpretation of the legal dispositions, along with the permanent adaptation of law to actual cases, but also to the continuous evolution of social facts. Also the necessity of solving causes under the sanction of justice refusal, dictated by the civil Code, imposes to the judge the obligation to establish the justice act, indifferent to the silence, obscurity or insufficiency of law.

Interpreting the law is art, an act of creation, because it necessarily implies the issuing of some value judgments, leading to an "alteration" of the text's content. Every case is unique and reclaims innovative solutions, and the judge cannot apply in a mechanical way, instead he must particularize the law, shaping it according to the necessities of the actual cause. "The legislation's entire complexity thus reflects as an intense light, concentrated by a mirror in a single point, in that given text. Afterwards, this light must be aimed as a shred of convergent rays at the actual case that needs to be judged; all of the law's complexity must find its solutions in every test case"[18].

When the texts are no longer equivalent to the necessities of time, the judge will elude the law and apply solutions according to the new conditions of social life, divulging the law's spirit. If the law is silent, the judge will resort to general law principles, interpreting their significance. Therefore, the law principles constitute a guidance to which the judge can appeal to whenever the difficult task of applying the law places him in a deadlock. In this section we refer to the judge as being a representative figure for applying the law. We emphasize, however, that during the process of law establishment, the law principles constitute the key factor on which all actors implied in the justice act's achievement rely on, lato sensu.

First, while interpreting, the judge must determine the authentic sense of normative texts. For the achievement of this objective it is required that the judge guides himself not only according to the sense of words and the legislator's intention, instead he must take in consideration the law's spirit itself. "It is contrary to the law to discard its spirit and take in consideration only the words used by the legislator", was the warning int Justinian's Code[19]. The judge's activity is not exhausted in the passive lecture of law texts, the identification of concepts and while applying them to the test case. It has constantly been highlighted that "it is not the text containing the norm that adjusts the actual case, but the attorney, as a subject of the objectifying process of the abstract normative significations used for decisively solving a practical problem"[20]. The legal norm has an abstract existence, being incapable to satisfy on its own the exigencies of practice. It constitutes a model that the attorney bears on to the actual case through a creating interpretation. The interpretation thus resides in finding the perfect equation between the form's generality and the content's particularity, between the letter and spirit of law. Or, the law's spirit is situated above the attorney's will and the positive law; it is found in the principles that establish the law.

Other times, the existence of a "unique" sense for the words and any easily recognized attorney's intention are thought to be non-existing. The significance of normative texts is "a variable that depends on interpretation and therefore the interpretation itself must be considered as a constitutive discourse instead of a descriptive one of significations: thus, to interpret does not mean to describe, but to decide what is the significance of the normative text that will be expressed in a text with a value of norm, norm that is not characterized through the value of true or false, but through its validity in the legal system"[21].

Gh. Mihai specifies that, in interpretation, we resort to the law's principles either being intermediate or direct[22]: intermediate, because the law principles especially dedicated or deducted from normative texts, are engaged in any interpretative procedure; direct, they are invoiced as natural law principles or as an accepted common law.

Our attention is aimed at the fact that the interpretation should not be absolutely autonomous. If we refuse the interpretive intercession's any element outside the legal aspect, we obtain "perfectibility that tends to close under the limits of strictly legal principles", but we thus build an unprincipled and apolitical law, correct from a logical-formal point of view, but inefficient from a practical point of view. The law is constructed in a practical way and concerning values, so that even in interpretation an axiological base exists, resulting exactly from legal, moral, political values' compound[23].

The law's principles constitute guiding marks that the judge uses especially when the law's text has an ambiguous, vague character or can have multiple interpretations. It has sometimes been emphasized that it is preferred the rule's absence or a slighter perfect rule, instead of an uncertain rule. In this case, the judge is bound to appeal to the law's principles in order to clarify the meaning and to establish the adequate sense. Hart showed that the language involves an area of "half-shade", uncertain from the significance point of view, in which the renderer's discretionary power develops.

For D. C. Dănişor, I. Dogaru şi Gh. Dănişor, the law is "full of inconsistent areas and is often lost in an ocean of vague". The law's inconsistency results from its linguistic nature, but also from reality's complexity to which the law must answer to. On the other hand, the law sometimes resorts to concepts that are intentionally imprecise (for example, that of "exceptional situations"), since "this vague aspect can play a vector role of progress of law and of text's adaptability to situations impossible to be taken in consideration by the legislator in the regulation moment, through the constructive interpretations"[24].

In the context of law regulations' imprecise character, Franck Moderne attributes an explanatory function to the general principles of law: whenever doubts exist regarding the significance of a legal norm in a given context, an appeal is made to these principles that allow the establishment of the text's sense and understanding of the rationality for which this must be applied. At the same time, it is shown that principles also fulfil a function of justification: being recognized as having value on their own, any norm based on a law principle bears a presumption of legitimacy[25].

The author analyses the general principles of law also under the aspect of their contribution to assuring the legal order's completeness, element of the formal rationality of law. Because any legislative system involves, virtually, certain gaps, the law itself authorizes the judge to supply the existing gaps, deciding from the general principles at the base of law. Moreover, rationality through analogy is considered to be "one of the methods of elaborating general law principles, as long as they justify the application, through the association of some actual hypotheses, of a solution regarding a similar case". Formulating general principles with normative character, through analogy, the judge contributes to the law's "completion" and to assuring an accomplished legal order. Another method is that of "increasing induction", that allows the disengagement of new general principles of law for supplying the gaps, through the generalization of some particular dispositions applicable to some cases determined to other unexpected hypotheses.

Since a long time ago, the Romans have admitted the existence of law gaps, so that they surpassed the rigidity of literally approaching the law text and admitted the completion of law through analogy and fiction. To the Romans the law spirit was found in justice, the law being the art of good and the equitable. The Roman legal advisors considered that an appeal could be made to something similar (ad simila procedere), if identity rationality exists. The Roman judges had, however, the possibility to declare at the end of debates that matters are unclear and to refuse to bring the verdict in.

Such a possibility is not recognized today, the judge being obligated, instead, to solve the cause under the sanction of justice refusal, regardless of the silence or insufficiency of law, presuming that only the legislative system can be defective. The law, in its ensemble, does not admit gaps, thus the judge has the possibility and obligation to solve the cause in the base of general principles of law. Therefore, if the law emitted a statute and its sense is clear, the judge must limit to applying it, according to the Roman principle optima lex, quae minimum judici, optimus judex qui minimum sibi – the best law is that which leaves as little as possible to the judge's judgment, and the best judge is the one who relies more on the law than on himself[26]. However if the law emitted a statute and its sense is ambiguous or if the law gave no such statute, the judge must solve the cause by resorting to either a norm that regulates similar situations (laws analogy), or to general principles of law (law analogy).

Analogy is a logical, inductive procedure, based on the idea that rapports presenting the same essential character must, actually, be subjected to the same law rule: ubi eadem ratio, ibi idem jus. Professor Vălimărescu highlights the fact that analogy most not be confused with the extensive interpretation of law, through which the "legal formula is expanded by being applied to some cases unexpected by the legislator, but which enters the spirit and purpose of the law". In the case of analogy, "it surpasses the law's spirit and applies to a rapport not taken in consideration by the legislator, not even implicitly"[27]. Therefore, if the analogy has an inductive character, the extensive interpretation of law is purely deductive.

Sofia Popescu mentions that applying law through analogy, represents, at the same time, a logical and creation activity. Analogously, the inexistence of a direct legal regulation of the case can be observed and the procedure of filling the gaps takes place[28].

The judge must find solutions for eliminating law obscurity. In the case of law analogy, he will attempt to apply a legal disposition to another rapport than the one predicted by law. For example, the jurisprudence appealed to law's analogy on the matter of guardianship, taking over the causes that exclude a person from the quality of guardian of a minor or forbid it, and applying them to the trustee, the purpose of establishing the two procedures being the same: the protection of an incapable person[29]. In case the judge does not find a legal norm proclaimed for a similar situation, he will resort to law's analogy, attempting to establish the real content of legal norms in the light of general principles of law. Through law analogy, the jurisprudence extracted from the dispositions that readjust the guarantee against the eviction with regard to sale, a general institution of guarantee, applying it to all contracts with onerous title that transfer property. Law's analogy surpasses the legislator's will and is established on law's general principles with the role of filling the gaps that exist on a legislative level, assuring at the same time the versatility of law. Law analogy must not, however, disestablish the legislator's will or the legislation's spirit.

The Calimach Code disposed that whenever a business cannot be decided after the literal text, nor after the sense of law, similar cases determined by law must be taken in consideration, as well as the motives of law that refer to similar matters. Furthermore, "if even then doubts exist, the fault should be researched with measure and attention through all circumstances and should also be decided according to the natural law's principles"[30].

The existence of some gaps in positive law is also explained by the fact that legal regulations are unable to promptly answer the spectacular dynamics of society's evolution. Beyond the law's necessity of permanently adapting to social needs, the law authorizes the judge to find solutions by the aid of a creating interpretation of law's principles. This solution is implicitly consecrated in the French and Romanian civil Code that allows the law completion in case it is silent, obscure or insufficient, but finds its absolute expression in the Swiss civil Code, that provides in article 1 that "The law determines all materials to which the letter or spirit of its dispositions refers to. In the absence of an applicable legal disposition, the judge shall act according to the unwritten law and, in the lack of a common law, after the rules he would establish in case he would act as a legislator. He inspires from the solutions consecrated through doctrine and jurisprudence". Recognizing the imperfection of legislative actions, the Swiss Code thus proclaims deliberately the judge's role of creator.

Vălimărescu mentions that for us "the jurisprudence constitutes a source of law subordinated to laws, when it has decided, but a creator of new rules as far as the law cannot face all necessities. If we abandon the fiction of the written law's amplitude, we no longer need to appeal to fictions, like that of historical theory. The jurisprudence, the same as the legislator, will search solutions in the real sources of law, in which the rational and experimental elements will constitute the required directives"[31].

Situated in the rational law, from where they are transmitted in positive law, the general principles of law prove to the judge to be "resources" of the existing legal order. The law's principles allow the accomplishment of exigencies concerning the completion of the legal system, a necessary requirement, since in spite of the attempts to perfect the legislative system, the complete character of the legal system remains an ideal of perfection, not being capable of "defining the statute of any specific fact with the aid of its elements ensemble"[32].

Besides assuring a soft interpretation of legal texts and filling the gaps in the legislative system, law's principles also fulfill another role in the legal order: as soon as they are established by jurisprudence, "the general principles and established solutions serve as support for other legal constructions and contribute to creating new law rules, therefore contributing to the evolution of the legal system"[33]

The general principles constitute the access key for the interpreter in the law domain. Synthesizing J.P. Gridel's considerations regarding the principles contribution in the process of law establishment, we show that these serve to: circumscribing the sphere of application of particular legal texts, highlighting the necessity of an extensive interpretation or, on the contrary, a restrictive one; establishing some exceptions that were previously not expected or admitted by law; determining the mandatory forces of legal norms; creating some new law principles by generalizing some special and analog legal dispositions (for this purpose we are offered as an example the principle of contractual responsibility for another's action, consecrated as a result of abstracting some wasted legal texts that refer to the entrepreneur's, transporter's or hotel-keeper's action); removing some inequitable solutions that result from a purely formal logic[34]

Law's principles are indispensible to the moderated functioning of legal order. They assure the adaptation of the written law, which is static, slow and often surpassed by the evolution of social actions, by clarifying it, completing it and assuring its uniformity, continuity and progress. In addition, they "give those guarantees required by individuals since the norms of law are applicable in accordance to the fundamental exigencies of society"[35].

Conclusions

Since it is connected to the social environment, the law must permanently respond to the requirements of the actual social life, which are continuously transformation. In a reality marked by the gathering of legal civilizations, the jurists can no longer approach the phenomenon only from the perspective of national legal traditions, but also from the perspective of interdependencies on a regional or global scale. Such as the English teacher Twining mentions, in a globalized and cosmopolitan world, the general studies regarding law science, as well as those on the matter of law comparison, must become cosmopolitan, as a pre-condition for the revival of a general law theory and for the reconsideration of the law comparison.

While offering the conclusions for the legitimacy of law's general principles, Franck Moderne illustrates that they express "the most deeply rooted assumptions that accompany the ideal of a rational and modern law". These depended on assuring the coherency's and completion's exigencies of the law's systems, the insertion itself of the principles in a normative hierarchy constituted a guarantee of the ensemble's functioning; creating some interdependencies between the elements of the system, that are situated on the same level or on different ones; protecting some implicitly or explicitly admitted values; consecrating a judge enabled to speak the law. In essence, the author considers that in the context of contemporary liberal democracies the law's general principles "contribute to consolidating the legitimacy of law itself".

All these grounds explain the overwhelming importance of law principles in an era marked by profound legislative transformations, such as the one we are experiencing.

CONSIDERATIONS REGARDING THE GUARANTEEING OF HUMAN RIGHTS IN ROMANIA

ELENA PARASCHIV*

Abstract

In our country existed and exists still a constant concern to respect and guarantee human rights and fundamental freedoms, especially after 1989, when Romania became a member or acceding to international or regional treaties and conventions enshrining such rights.

Taking into consideration the importance of respecting human rights, we consider that is necessary to research how they are secured in Romania, because only when these guarantees are known by their beneficiaries and those involved in their protection, actions which affect these values of humanity can be avoided.

In human rights, rules of international law have priority over those entered in the domestic law if they contain provisions which may be interpreted differently on the same matter, unless the Constitution or national laws contain more favourable provisions.

Keywords: ensuring human rights, fundamental liberties, constitutional dispositions, freedom of thought, rights of foreigners.

Introduction

Ideas concerning human rights have existed from the dawn of Romanian civilization, in all the areas of the planet, reason for which it may be affirmed that human rights are not the exclusive attribute of none of the time periods, or of any corner of the world, or of any culture[1].

Knowing the stage of progress achieved in ensuring human rights by the Romanian country, permits the establishment of future objectives for correlating the regulations and means of protection of rights with the aid of international instruments from the domain.

Over the years, Romania has been actively involved in promoting the principles upheld by the UN, including through the dissemination of the ideals and universally accepted principles and norms enshrined in the United Nations Charter, The Universal Declaration of Human Rights and relevant international human rights instruments.

Romania has assumed the highest international standards in the area of human rights, becoming party to all major regional and international treaties and protocol in the field of human rights, international humanitarian law and refugee law.

Up to present our country has ratified the most important universal treaties, such as: the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights and its Optional Protocols, the International Covenant of Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, the International Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination, the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women, the Convention on the Rights of Child and its Optional Protocol, the Convention against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment, the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide, the four Geneva Conventions and two Additional Protocols, the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court etc. The provisions of these treaties and of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights are directly applicable within Romanian legal framework.

Similar to other states of the Council of Europe, Romania is interested in achieving the standards stipulated in the European Convention of Human Rights[2]. Moreover, the dispositions of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights were transformed into legal obligations, as well as in other member states of the United Nations Organization, as to create a legal system for protection, guarantee and implementation of human rights[3].

The Romanian Constitution adopted in the year 1991, amended and completed[4], regulates in Chapter II the rights and fundamental liberties of the citizen, thus correlating them with the dispositions of international treaties from this domain.

Regarding the relation between international law and internal law in human rights area, art. 20 of the Romanian constitution regulates the primacy in enforcement of international rules over the national ones as regarding human rights, establishing two special rules: interpretation and enforcement of constitutional norms regarding human rights and primacy in enforcement of international acts over internal laws. Through this provision is given effect to the principle of supremacy of international law over the national law, the supra-constitutional character of international law in a multilevel state being outlined.

As regarding the first rule, constitutional provisions concerning the human rights and freedoms shall be interpreted and enforced in conformity to the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, with the covenants[5] and other treaties Romania is a party to. This rule starts from the idea that, according to art. 11, all the treaties, including those regarding human rights are incorporated into the national law only if they are in conformity to the constitution. In other words, the inconsistencies between the two types of norms are inappropriate and if so, their interpretation and enforcement should assure the mutual conciliation and should remove any conflicts of norms. The second rule endorses the primacy of enforcement of international provisions over the internal laws. In this case also the interpretation of internal laws should assure the conciliation with international rules in human rights area. If there are inconsistencies between the two types of norms, the conflict is solved following the principle of primacy of enforcement of international rules over the internal ones. But the derivative constituent power added the principle mitior lex according to which the primacy of enforcement of international rules is valid only if internal laws and Constitution of Romania comprise more favorable provisions[6].

Two major consequences can be inferred from these provisions: the legislator should mandatory check if the bills adopted are in correlation with the international treaties Romania is a party to; the public authorities with competencies in negotiating, concluding and ratification of the international treaties should be aware of the correlation between an international act and Romanian laws and in difficult situation it should make reserves and declarations to the treaties.

Rights guaranteed in the Romanian Constitution and other regulations

In the Romanian Constitutions there are regulations regarding the nine categories of guaranteed international rights, which are discussed throughout the content of this paper.

a) Concerning the right to non-discrimination, in art. 16 from the Constitution, the principle of citizen equality before the law and public authorities is proclaimed, without privileges and discriminations, as nobody is above the law.

Moreover, in art. 4 par. 2, it is stated that „Romania is the common and indivisible homeland of all its citizens, without discrimination in race, nationality, ethnic origin, language, religion, sex, opinion, political affiliation, fortune or social origins".

The equality in rights constitutes a guarantee referring to the exercising of fundamental rights stipulated in the content of the Constitution, but also whose rights and subjective liabilities are regulated in the content of other normative documents.

As a guarantee of observing this right, in the art. 247 from the Penal Code, the offense of abuse in service by limiting certain rights, which sanctions the limitation by an agent of using or exercising of these rights by a citizen, or creating situations of inferiority for the later based on nationality, race, sex or religion is considered a crime.

b) Regarding the right concerning the integrity of every person, guaranteed by international instruments, in art. 22 of the Romanian Constitution it is stated that the right to life and to physical and mental integrity of a person are ensured. Nobody may be submitted to torture, any type of punishment, inhuman or degrading treatment, the death punishment being also prohibited.

In the Romanian Penal Code the offenses against life, as well as against physical integrity or health are considered punishable (art. 174 – art. 184), which constitutes an important guarantee for protecting these rights by sanctioning of those which breach them.

Moreover, in conformity with art. 266-268 from the Penal Code, the illegal arrest and abusive investigating, submitting the persons under arrest or detained or in execution of a safety or educational measure to ill-treatments and unjust repression against persons that are legally searched are punishable

In these cases, the Romanian authorities apply domestic legal dispositions in conformity with the regulation of the European Convention regarding Human Rights, of other international instruments and the practice of the European Court of Human Rights.

c) Concerning the right regarding liberty of every natural person, guaranteed by international documents, guarantees are stipulated in the Romanian Constitution, as well as in other laws, in view of the fact that our country grants a particular importance to the defence of this right.

Thus, in art. 23 of the Constitution it is stipulated that the liberty of each individual and the safety of each person are inviolable, and the search, detention or arrest of a person is permitted only in cases and with the procedure stipulated by the law.

The withhold, which can be ordered by the public prosecutor or the legal police, can not surpass 24 hours, and the arrest may be ordered for a maximum of 30 days by the judge, who has the right to prolong its duration in the conditions admitted by the law. The person in case will be informed of the reasons of retain or arrest as soon as possible, and the accusation will be transmitted before an elected or appointed lawyer.

The release of the person retained or arrested is mandatory, if the motives on which these measures are based have disappeared.

No punishment can be established or applied except in the conditions and based on the law.

These constitutional principles, which defend the liberty of each person, are detailed in the Penal Code in which the case and procedures for ordering the measures that deprive a person's liberty are stated.

The guaranteeing of the right referring to the liberty of the person is also achieved by incriminating illegal arrests (art. 266 par. 1 penal Code), illegal retain or detention or submitting a person to execute a punishment, safety or educational measures, in another manner than the one stipulated by legal disposition that are punished with jail. Moreover, the liberty of a person is guaranteed by incriminating unjust repression (art. 268 Penal Code) which criminally sanctions the act of disposing arrest or condemning a person, knowing that she is innocent.

Referring to the right of free circulation (consecrated by art. 39 of the Treaty establishing the European Community), in art. 25 from the Romanian Constitution it is stated that „the right to free circulation in the country and abroad is guaranteed", the ordinary law establishing the conditions of its exercising. Moreover, each citizen is guaranteed the right to establish its domicile or residence in any locality in the country, to emigrate, as well as to return in the country.

The regulations from the Romanian Constitution complies with the subject of international dispositions[7], as it contains a general form which does not state the legal exceptions regarding the exercising of the right of free circulation, which will be established by ordinary laws.

As a guarantee of these rights being defended stands the incrimination of the act of limiting the liberty of every person, in an illegal manner (art. 189 Penal Code).

d) Regarding the procedural rights, as in the international domain, in the domestic law these do not refer to a material liberty, but the guarantees a person disposes of in a state of law as to value its rights and liberties.

Thus, the right to a fair trial is proclaimed in the art.21 of the Romanian Constitution, in which it is shown that every person may address the law for the defence of its rights, liberties and legitimate interests, as no law may restrict the exercising of this right.

The parties have the right to a fair trial and to solve the causes in a reasonable term, as the administrative special jurisdictions are optional and free of charge.

The right to petitioning is proclaimed in art. 51 from the Constitution, where it is stated that the citizens and organizations that are legally founded have the right to address the public authorities with petitions, being exempted of stamp duty. The public authorities are compelled to respond to the petitions in the terms and conditions established by the law.

In conformity with art. 52 in the Constitution, a person who is harmed in its right or legitimate interest, by a public authority, by an administrative act or by not solving the request in a legal term, is entitled to obtain the acknowledgement of the right claimed or of its legitimate interest, as well as the annulment of the act and compensation for the damage.

The State shall bear patrimony liability for the damage caused by the legal errors and the magistrates who exercised their function in ill will and gross negligence will not be exempted from their liability.

In art. 124 from the Constitution it is stipulated that the justice is rendered in the name of the law, this being unique, impartial and equal for every one.

Art. 126 states that justice is achieved by legal instances, their competence and procedure being stipulated by the law; moreover, the founding of courts of exception is prohibited.

Still as a guarantee of the capitalization of legal rights, the hearings are public, except the cases stipulated by law (art. 127).

In art. 128 from the Constitution certain rights for minorities referring to the possibility of using interpreters before the courts of justice are guaranteed, and in art. 129 the right to use legal appeals against the decisions of the courts is stated.

The right to a fair trial, the right to an appeal, the legality principle of criminal offenses and penalties, as well as other procedural rights are also guaranteed by regulations stipulated in ordinary laws such as: the Criminal Code and Criminal Procedure Code, as our country is facing a process of permanent correlation of the dispositions in the domestic law with communitary and international regulations.

e) The right to compliance with private and family life

The protection of the private and family life occupies an important role in the preoccupations of the Romanian legislator, as Romania is adhering or is taking part in the international instruments that have this object[8].

In conformity with art.26 in the Constitution, the public authorities respect and protect the intimate, private and family life. The natural person has the right to dispose of itself, if it does not breach the rights and liberties of other persons, the public order or the good morals.

Thus, the Romanian state guarantees the liberty of the private life and the right to engage in marriage. Moreover, it respects ad protects the private life of every person, depending on the preferences, provided that it does not harm the rights of other persons, the public order or the good morals.

The intimacy of the private life[9] and the right to make connections and relations with other persons is also guaranteed.

The right to respect private life also embodies the person's right to a healthy environment, this principle being guaranteed by the art. 35 in the Romanian Constitution, in which it is stipulated that „The state acknowledges the right of any person to a healthy and ecologically balanced environment". It is also stated that „the state ensures the legislative framework for exercising this right, and the natural and legal persons have the duty of protecting and improving the environment".

Except for the principles contained in the Constitution, these rights are also guaranteed by the dispositions stipulated in the ordinary laws, such as: the Family Code in which the conditions for concluding a marriage are established, as well as the relations between the parents and children, the rights and obligations of family members, etc. It is the case for the Penal Code, where incriminations by which the influences brought to the rights analysed are stipulated, such as the offense for abandoning the family (art. 305), according to which the breach of the obligations stipulated by the law in favour of the family members etc. and that are related to maintenance and mutual assistance are punished.

f) The freedom of thought, respectively the liberty to think freely, the liberty of consciousness and religion are also stipulated in our country's legislation, thus ensuring all means of manifestation and other guarantees to ensure that they are respected.

Thus, in art. 29 of the Constitution it is stipulated that the freedom of thought and opinions, as well as the freedom of religious beliefs can not be restricted under any circumstance. Nobody is to be constraint to adopt an opinion or to adhere to a religious faith, which is contrary to its beliefs.

Moreover, the freedom of consciousness is guaranteed; it just expresses itself in the spirit of tolerance and mutual respect.

Religious cults are free and are organized according to personal statute, in the conditions permitted by the law, as in the relations between cults any form, means, acts or actions of religious enmity are prohibited.

Religious cults are autonomous towards the state and enjoy its support, including by the facilitation of religious assistance in the army, hospitals, penitentiaries, shelters and orphanages.

The parents and tutors have the right to ensure, according to personal convictions, the education of minor children in their care.

These dispositions stipulated in the Constitution are in accordance with the dispositions of the European Convention of Human Rights and with the practice of the European Court of Human Rights, as well as with other international instruments regarding the freedom of thought, of religious beliefs or the spirit of tolerance and mutual respect between the persons that have different beliefs or who practice other religious cults, thus imposing one single limit, namely of religious enmity.

In conformity with the Constitution, the Romanian citizens are guaranteed not only the right to these liberties, but also the possibility to manifest their convictions in the social and political life of the country.

The liberties presented are also guaranteed by ordinary laws, thus existing even regulations according to which those who negatively influence these rights, such as incrimination for preventing the liberty of cults are sanctioned. Thus, in conformity with art.318 in the penal Code, the acts of preventing or disturbing the liberty of performing religious cult, that is organized and functions in accordance with the law, or to compel a person, by forcing her, to participate to the religious services of a cult or to fulfill a religious act related to the performance of a cult are sanctioned.

g) The freedom of social and political actions

The right to freedom of assembly and association are also guaranteed by the regulations in our country, similarly to those stipulated in the international instruments.

Thus, the freedom of assembly is consecrated by the dispositions contained in art. 39 from the Romanian Constitution, in which it is stated that: „ The meetings and demonstrations are free and can be organized and performed only in a peaceful manner, without the use of weapons".

The freedom of peaceful assemblies can also refer to private, as well as public meetings.

Some of them are submitted to authorization, however this measure does not influence the freedom of assemblies, but aims at ensuring their peaceful nature by the state authorities; public manifestations can be prohibited if there are serious signs that the public order and security are being threatened.

The regulations in our country referring to the peaceful nature and absence of weapons related to assemblies are in conformity with the practice promoted by the European Court of Human Rights.

The right to association is proclaimed in art. 40 par. 1 and 2 in the Romanian constitution, in which it is stated that citizens may freely associate in political parties, syndicates, patronates and in other forms of association, however the organizations that militate against the political pluralism, of the principles regarding the state of law, of sovereignty, integrity or independence of Romania are unconstitutional.

Associations are groups with a durable character, a permanent target and that function based of a structure that is accepted by its members[10].

In conformity with par. 3 of art.40 in the Constitution, the Judges of the Constitutional Courts, the lawyers of people, the active members of the army, the police and other categories of public workers established by the organic law, may not be part of the political parties. They may however, participate in professional and scientifical associations, etc.

The Constitution limits the right to association for the organizations that embody a secret nature, which are forbidden. (art. 4 par. 4).

h) The right to a property

In art.44 from the Romanian Constitution the right to property is stipulated and guaranteed, also stating the circumstances in which this right may be limited.

Thus, it is stated that the property right and the debts of the state are guaranteed, the contents and limits of these rights being stipulated by the law. Moreover, it is stated that public property is guaranteed and protected equally by the law, regardless of the owner. In the same text from contained in the Constitution it is stated that nobody may be expropriated except for a cause of public utility, established in conformity with the law, with the just and prior compensation.

The nationalization or any other measures of forced passage in the public property of goods based on social, ethical, religious, political affiliation or any other discriminating nation of owners is prohibited.

As a limitation of the use concerning property right, the Constitution establishes that referring to the works of general interest, the public authority may dispose of the basement of any real estate, with the obligation of compensating the owner for the damages brought to the soil, plantations or constructions, as well as for other damages imputable to the authorities. The compensations are established, similar to the expropriation, as a mutual agreement with the owner, or, in case of dispute, by appealing to court.

[10] Nicolae Purdă and Nicoleta Diaconu, Protecția juridică a drepturilor omului, 2-nd edition, revised and added (Bucharest, Universul Juridic, 2011), p.339 and foll.

Another limitation of exercising prerogatives concerning the property right is that the owner will guarantee the observance of tasks regarding environment protection. Moreover, the later must ensure the Neighbourhood policy and other tasks that, according to the law or custom, are in the care of the owner.

As a guarantee of observing the right to property, the Constitution also stipulates that the fortune gained in an illicit manner will not be confiscated, as the legal nature of acquiring it is presumed. Moreover, the goods destined, used or resulted from offenses or contravention may be confiscated only in the conditions of the law.

As it can be observed, the principles from the Romanian Constitution, regarding property or the right to property, correspond in their majority, to the dispositions and the spirit of the European Court of Human rights and other international instruments in the domain.

Moreover, the ordinary laws that refer to property are adopted in the spirit of the principles stipulated in the Constitution and are meant to ensure the appropriate exercising and guaranteeing of the right to property.

An extra guarantee of observing the right to property is the fact that in the Penal Code many acts are incriminated by which this right is influenced negatively, such as: theft (art. 208 şi 209), destruction of property (art. 217), fraudulent management (art. 214) etc.

i) The rights of foreigners

Foreign and stateless citizens living in Romania enjoy the general protection of persons and fortunes, guaranteed by the Constitution and other laws (art. 1 in the Constitution).

Generally, foreigners and stateless persons have the same rights as Romanian citizens, but with certain limitations imposed by the social-political realities, such as the one resulting from the art. 16 par. 3 in the constitution, according to which the public, civil or military functions and dignities may only be occupied by persons which have the Romanian citizenship and are domiciled in the country.

In the Constitution there are also other applicable dispositions referring to the rights of foreigners or stateless persons, such as in art. 18 par. 2, according to which the right to an asylum is granted and refused in conformity with the law, with the observance of international treaties and conventions to which Romania took place. Moreover, in conformity with art. 19 par. 3 in the Constitution, foreign citizens and stateless persons may be extradited only based on an international convention or in conditions of reciprocity.

Conclusions

For all the nine categories of analysed right, their regulation in the Constitution constitutes a guarantee of achieving a special protection, a reality which enlists Romania among the countries capable of ensuring the persons the necessary conditions for accomplishing the fundamental rights and liberties.

The control over the constitutionality of laws and organizing the legal system in such a manner that it may take measures for the restoration of rights breached by the state bodies or other individuals, also constitutes strong guarantees for observing the human rights and liberties in our country.

The most important guarantee in the sense of observing the rights and liberties of persons, in accordance with the international regulations, is the principle subscribed in art. 20 from the constitution, according to which the constitutional dispositions concerning the rights and liberties of the citizens will be interpreted and applied in conformity with the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, with the pacts and other treaties in which Romania has taken part.

Romanian government pays constant attention to matters related to the implementation of human rights norms. Over the last sixteen years, a thorough process of reform has been carried out in order to bring the national legislation and institutional mechanism in full compliance with the relevant international requirements. However, Romanian law and practice in some areas (for example the housing legislation) falls far behind international human rights standards.

As there are still numerous infringements of the human rights, it is necessary to act in the direction of improving the legislation, as the bodies of the state will have been clearly informed of their attributions in this domain, as well as the liabilities for breaching the respective norms. Moreover, it has been imposed that more serious acts, by which the human right have been negatively influenced, to be incriminated by the penal law, which would prevent the majority of actions that affect these social values.

Since the events of December 1989 until nowadays, Romania crossed a sinuous road during which it registered both notable events and many failures trying to edify a real democratic society. Therefore, even if in post-Decembrist Romania we cannot speak about a large range disrespect of the basic rights and liberties consecrated both in the constitutions stipulations and in the international and regional documents our country participates to, we cannot ignore the fact that, on December, 31st 2008, our country was the third, after the Russian Federation and Turkey, as a defendant in different causes placed in the examination of a judicial formation of the European Court of the Human Rights in Strasbourg[11].

LIABILITY AND RESPONSIBILITY

ELENA EMILIA ŞTEFAN*

Abstract
The violation of a social norm establishing a rule of conduct engages the violator's liability.
Responsibility is a social phenomenon and it expresses, in its shortest definition, an act of commitment of the individual in the process of social interaction.
This study aims to analyze the concepts of liability and responsibility, but also the relationship between them, starting from their common fundamentals and ending with the main differences between the two notions.

Keywords*: liability, responsibility, social relationships, violation of the rule of law, social order.*

1. Introduction

Man is essentially a social being. He ripens in the society and is a creator of social relationships.[1] The social history of mankind is nothing else but the history of their individual development, regardless of whether they are conscious of it or not.[2]

Several surveys[3] on legal sociology warn about the fact that the failure to meet the society's expectations regarding the law is particularly connected to liability, that the law cannot exercise its influence in the society, unless it succeeds to identify the person responsible and to establish the liability (…).

In the doctrine of specialty[4] an interesting question has been raised with regard to the specificity of justice, namely that of the relationship between law and justice, which is essential, and of the relationship between justice and social order. As regards the second relationship, the social order, different from justice and unmistakable for it, is the foundation of a stable social organization, but also the most important. "The established social order is the one that separates us from the catastrophe; most people in the civilized countries prefer to tolerate some injustice than suffer the risk of the catastrophe".[5]

Historically speaking, states have been concerned with inserting the subject matter of responsibility of human action under various terminologies, both in Constitutions and in the common acts[6].

Two distinct texts in the Declaration of the Rights of Man and of the Citizen of 1798 underlies the natural right of the citizen to control the governor.[7]

Thus, the French Declaration of the Right of Man and of the Citizen of 1789 sets forth the following in its article 15: "Society has the right to call any public servant to account for the way they perform their function".

The Universal Declaration[8] of Human Rights in its article 8 sets forth that: "Everyone has the right to an effective remedy by the competent national tribunals for acts violating the fundamental rights granted to him by the constitution or by law", and according to article 29 paragraph 1 "Everyone has duties to the community in which alone the free and full development of his personality is possible".

As a witted remark emphasized in the Romanian administrative doctrine, the political liability of the Government is engaged on the background of the committed harm, therefore it triggers a special procedure and finally materializes into a constitutional sanction.[9]

2. Literature review

The subject matter we are dealing with herein will be approached from several perspectives: of the philosophy, of the legal sociology, of the general theory of law, but also of the administrative law, bringing into attention, as a synthesis, the opinions of foreign doctrinaires such as: Paul Fauconnet, La responsabilité, (Éd. II. F Alcou, Paris, 1928), Hans Jonas, Le principe de responsabilité, (Paris, Cerf 1990), etc. but also of Romanian doctrinaires: Mihai Florea, Responsabilitatea actiunii sociale (Responsibility of Social Action), (Ştiinţifică şi Enciclopedică Publishing House, Bucharest, 1976), Lidia Barac, Răspunderea and sancţiunea juridică (Liability and Legal Sanction), (Lumina Lex Publishing House, Bucharest, 1997), Mihai Bădescu, Sacţiunea juridică în teoria, filosofia dreptului and în dreptul românesc (Legal Sanction in the Theory and Philosophy of Law and in the Romanian Law), (Lumina Lex Publishing House 2002), Nicolae Popa, Prelegeri de sociologie juridică (Lectures on Legal Sociology), (Bucharest, 1983, Bucharest), A. 3.1. Short considerations on "responsibility"

Almost all authors who dealt in their studies with the subject matter of liability started their research by conceptualizing the terms of liability and responsibility.[11]

The issue of man's responsibility has been a meditation subject for a long time.[12] Currently we use, at least in the Romanian language, the two terms of "liability" and "responsibility" with the same meaning or with very close meanings, but never accurate enough.

Usually, the meaning of the terms of liability and responsibility is that of a formally imposed obligation to do or not no a particular thing, in relationships imposed to the social agent (to the individual) from the outside[13].

[10] This itemization is merely given by way of example and does not exhaust the vast range of doctrinaires who approached this subject.

[12] Mihai Florea, Responsabilitatea acţiunii sociale (Responsibility of Social Action), (Ştiinţifică şi Enciclopedică Publishing House, Bucharest, 1976), p.5.

A possible starting point[14] for setting up a theory of responsibility may have been the French sociology, represented by Emile Durkheim, but it was altered afterwards particularly by A. Bayet[15] for whom the human behaviour is dictated by a series of inner needs, specific both to society and to the individual, the felon being the victim of the social agents who inoculated the crime to him: "…how come we are able to consider a criminal responsible for his actions, as if his committing the crime or not depends on his own will?" This way, the abolition of responsibility is suggested.

At the beginning of our century, the French sociologist Paul Fauconnet[16] attempted to rehabilitate the idea of responsibility, analyzing the issue of responsibility in his treatise "La responsabilité" as seen from the perspective of the individual who commits a felony, the responsibility being of legal nature, being in fact a legal (criminal) liability, with moral dimensions.

In Fauconnet's opinion, the concept of responsibility is part of the system of collective representations. It is the abstract summary of all the collective ways of thinking and feeling thoroughly experienced in the rules and judgments of responsibility.[17]

In his mind, the criminal is a "falsely accused"[18] who bears the liability that society rests upon him, to purify himself from the deeds that even its rules contain virtually and which it inspires individually, as he is unable to avoid them.

In Fauconnet's opinion, responsibility is a social fact: "all beings are virtually capable of becoming responsible. The responsibility of a subject does not derive from features that would be inherent to him, but from the situation he is engaged in."[19]

Paul Fauconnet asserts in his work "La responsabilité, Étude de sociologie"[20] that responsibility in general corresponds to the sanction in general. However, since there are various kinds of sanctions, they correspond to the various kinds of responsibility. Among these count: legal sanctions and moral sanctions, criminal sanctions and civil sanctions, sanctions with the meaning of compensation or punishment, restitutive or retributive sanctions.

Also, Fauconnet specifies that this parallel classification of responsibility with the sanction revealed difficulties regarding the nomenclature. Thus, there is a distinction between legal responsibility and juridical responsibility (we refer to juridical responsibility through organized sanctions), moral responsibility (through diffuse sanctions - and refers to the responsibility of the moral agent towards its own conscience), criminal and civil responsibility and mixed responsibility, restitutory and retributory responsibility, responsibility corresponding to repressive sanctions, and remunerative (premium) responsibility.

In his same work "La responsabilité, Étude de sociologie"[21] in Part I called "Description of responsibility", Paul Fauconnet makes a presentation of the subject matters of responsibility. Thus, he asserts that man is responsible because he is able to play the role of: "patient de la peine". Legally speaking, responsibility is a particular case of capacity; the adult and normal man is fit for being punished. However, Fauconnet mentions, the adult and normal man is not the only possible subject of a judgment of responsibility. The child, the insane, the corpse, the animal, collective objects and beings may become responsible, but in the chapter regarding the subject matters[22] of responsibility Fauconnet states that the following are entirely irresponsible: children (providing historic examples of cases where children were judged starting from the age of 3, 7 and up to 14 years in various archaic societies), alienated persons, dead persons, animals and legal persons.

It seen from another perspective, responsibility is magisterially approached in a monograph dedicated to the study of law and morale by the author Irineu Popa[23] in the section called "Libertatea ca fundament ontologic al răspunderii (Freedom as the ontological foundation of responsibility)", from the researcher's point of view who sees the world through the prism of religion.

Thus, the author[24] considers that man is a rational and volitional being. Though will, his thought is transposed into practice and thus he becomes a subject, i.e. a person who wants to undertake and undertakes responsibilities. His freedom, even if related to actions exterior to him, is still related to man.

Responsibility, in general, is conditional[25] on:

a) Man's knowing what there is and what there will be, and on the control powers on the development of events that the subject assesses through deductive and inductive proofs;

b) Man's capacity to project achievable conducts;

c) Man's weighing, depending on the purpose, among the possibilities he has in order to choose "the best, the most efficient, the most suitable for him, the most cost-effective, etc."

The author Irineu Popa also states in the work mentioned above that, regardless of the perspective from which we look at responsibility, it should be freed from compulsion.[26]

The author Lidia Barac[27] provides a definition of social responsibility in her work called: "Răspunderea şi sancţiunea juridică (Legal Liability and Sanction)". Thus, the author specifies that "as an institution, social responsibility could be defined as the social institution which includes man's complex of attitudes in relation to the system of values, institutionalized by the society he lives in, for the preservation and promotion of those values, for the perfection of the human being and the preservation of life in community, with a view to maintaining and promoting social order and the public good".

3.2. Short considerations on "liability"

In general, in the usual terminology, the notion of "liability" means that a person or an authority has the obligation to justify and explain its own actions.

Transposed in the administrative law applicable in the European Union, we think fit to interpret this meaning of liability by the fact that any regulatory body must be liable for its actions before another authority.

[22] Paul Fauconnet conducts an exceptional research work as regards the subject matters of responsibility, providing examples for each separate case, at least one example for each subject matter, specifying even the sources of inspiration for them: the vendetta against the crocodiles happens in Madagascar, trials against children, insane people, and animals are described. On the same occasion, the horrors committed during the Inquisition are described among others (when besides the bodily punishments there were also spiritual or temporal punishments like excommunications, burning of houses, seizure of the heretic's assets, etc.), with a highlight on the taboos and rituals of the ancient period.

Liability as an essential component of any form of social organization existed even in the primitive society. In the primitive society (...) there was no state, no law, and implicitly at that time the institution of legal liability did not exist.[28] In this society, the victim instinctively responded with an immediate physical reaction, as strong as possible. The idea of revenge contains the entire idea of law, as it was developed afterwards.[29]

As early as the Ancient Times, Plato, in his works, determined, among others, the meaning of legal liability, establishing that nobody must remain unpunished for violating the law, regardless of the damage they cause through such violation.

The legal sociology operates with notions such as the statute and role of the individual.[30] According to Lidia Barac[31], the word "liability" is connected to everything that is organized. According to professor A. Laubadere[32], the French administrative law envisaged the public servant's personal responsibility and the responsibility of the administration.

In Valentin Prisăcaru's mind, the legal liability, considered in its broad meaning, consists both of a sanctionative liability and of a reparatory liability. If the sanctionative liability is the manifestation of the attitude that the state has towards the person who violates a legal rule, then the reparatory liability is the method through which the prejudiced person is entitled to a repair of the prejudice caused by a guilty action – by violation of a legal rule or of a convention[33].

Mircea Djuvara believed that the legal rule will have a "social efficiency" if there is a conviction that the government body who created the legal rule was competent to do it: "a state that is recognized as being legitimate issues commandments through its bodies which, more often than not, are recognized by it as legitimate. Also, even a factual authority which, because of a higher necessity, issues regulations can be sometimes recognized as legitimate.[34]

If we consider the two large parts of law – as a whole of the legal rules – the public law and the private law, we will notice that even the legal liability[35] is divided in two parts:

a) legal liability in the public law
b) legal liability in the private law

Besides this division, the legal liability is also divided depending on the branches of law that the rules regulating the legal liability belong to, specifically for each branch of law:

a) civil liability
b) criminal liability
c) administrative liability

The reason of being, i.e. of the concrete forms of legal liability, can only be the same as that of liability[36] itself. The existence the categories of liability is based on the fact that the legal rules of management and organization are grouped into subsystems depending on the nature of the social relationships they regulate.

The evolutions[37] of law, as compared to the requirements of social life, generate new forms of legal liability, which are different from the traditional legal form due to their specific nature. Thus, the legal liability in the environmental law tends to form its own institution of legal liability in the event of a trial in which it the court holds, in a certain stage, in the environmental protection and development field, "the civil, misdemeanour, or criminal liability, as the case may be".

The entry into force of the new Civil Code[38] determined a reconsideration of the institutions of law, including the legal liability. Here are some examples of novelties, among others:

- He who occupies a real estate, even without any title deed, is liable for the prejudice caused by the fall of or throwing an object into the real estate,
- Another amendment refers to the codification of the doctrine and of the case-law regarding the misuse of law. The misuse of law is expressly sanctioned in article 15 "no right can be exercised so as to damage or prejudice another person or in an excessive and unreasonable way, contrary to good faith", and in article 1353 "he who causes a prejudice while exercising their rights shall not be obliged to repair it, unless such rights were abusively exercised".

At European level, there is an institution called the European Ombudsman[39]. The role of the European Ombudsman is to defend the rights and interests of citizens, receiving their complaints regarding faulty administrative acts in the activity of community institutions or bodies, except for jurisdictional institutions.

3.3. Foundations of "liability and responsibility"; differences

We find particularly interesting Lidia Barac's inclination towards the subject matter of liability, who in her work "Răspunderea şi sancţiunea juridică (Legal Liability and Sanction)" dedicated a section called "The biological levers of responsibility" to research. Thus, in Lidia Barac's opinion[40], as responsibility involves values, it must be sought in the individual's existence, as it depends on feelings, attitudes, being expressed by what we call human behaviour.

Understanding that responsibility is a dimension of the individual, connected to his spiritual life, in discovering the premises of responsibility the author Lidia Barac is of the opinion that it is not enough to point out only its social levels, but it is also necessary to move the problem beyond these levers, by researching and studying thoroughly the spiritual life of man. In this framework we will acknowledge that the foundation of man's spiritual life is the experience, as it is the result of the complexity of organization at psychological level.[41]

In the understanding of Mihai Florea, the factors[42] that liability and responsibility are based on are multiple and dissimilar and refer basically to the totality of objective and subjective elements that condition the existence and functionality of liability and of responsibility.

The most general and common factor of the foundation of liability and responsibility is the need of social cohabitation of human individuals. As a determining historical and social phenomenon, responsibility is based on three fundamental factors, as Mihai Florea believes, namely the objective needs of social life, the freedom of agent, and its wilful self-commitment, based on an option in the achievement of a social objective.[43]

The social-objective needs to which certain values were associated or which are manifested as values, Mihai Florea continues with his argumentation, witness a complex differentiation process, depending on how the society or a given collectivity relates them to its concrete historical requirements, on the way it interprets them and, consequently, on the choice it makes among the various possible directions of evolution of this society or collectivity.

Starting from this aspect, by analyzing the three categories of actions: obligations, interdictions and permissions, Mihai Florea asserts that they originate in the same objective social needs, in the same directions and trends of evolution of the given social life, which differentiate one from another particularly by the way the relate to the agent.

Another particularly interesting approach is the conception of professor Nicolae Popa on the subject matter of liability and responsibility.

At the same time, we also notice that sometimes the way the forms of legal liability are defined reveals an identity of the sanction (punishment) with the liability, professor Nicolae Popa asserts. The author criticizes such a point of view because the sanction refers to only one aspect of responsibility and entitles[44] the assertions of some sociologists claiming that the law does not envisage responsibility as such, only its limits; responsibility is reduced to liability[45].

The legal responsibility, as Nicolae Popa asserts, must be defined as "a conscious and deliberate attitude of assuming concerns for how legal rules are achieved, for the integrity of the legal order, and for the actions that the individual carries out in order to ensure a climate of legality".

Opposite to this meaning of legal responsibility, the legal liability "is not as much a relationship between the individual and the collectivity as it is a relationship between the authority of a collectivity and the individual".

As seen from this perspective, professor Nicolae Popa continues, "the legal responsibility does not exclude liability, but it is not reduced to it either, and the legal liability does not exclude responsibility, but it does not necessarily require it". Among the various forms of social liability - political, moral, etc., legal liability "is an aggravated form of liability that never loses its social features and which enjoys a special treatment as compared to the other forms".[46]

As for the differences between liability and responsibility, we are going to continue presenting Mihai Florea's opinion, as expressed in the aforementioned work, Responsabilitatea acţiunii sociale (Responsibility of Social Action).

Thus, the author identifies a number of 6 dissimilarities[47], namely:

1. They are not only based on different external factors, but their manifestation itself requires a series of different subjective factors from the agent. Whereas liability only requires the agent's obedience, responsibility requires much more elements from the agent.

2. If liability and responsibility do not coincide in terms of the content or of the factors they are based on, they are sometimes dissimilar to a certain extent in terms of the collectivities and social structures and in terms of the objectives they relate to.

3. Liability and responsibility do not coincide in terms of their nature either. If liability is more of a normative nature and particularly or preponderantly of a legal nature, responsibility preponderantly and directly involves values.

4. Liability and responsibility are different from each other also through the main direction in which the relationships between the agent and the society are taking place. In the current social action, liability is manifested particularly as the active presence of society, as an expression of certain requirements that society imposes to the agent, who finds himself as a potential patient of the system of social rules. In exchange, responsibility is manifested as a free human presence.

5. Also, liability and responsibility do not entirely coincide as regards the consequences of their functioning, their social functions. (...) While liability more particularly and directly refers to the conservation of the given social system, responsibility results in a greater improvement of the social system and in its development.

6. Liability and responsibility are also dissimilar in terms of the ways and methods by which society stimulates and ensures their normal functioning; on the one hand they depend on the deontological foundations of liability and of responsibility, on the other hand they depend on their role towards society.

Conclusions

In this study we have sketched the notions of liability and responsibility, trying to present to the reader, in our own fashion, the most interesting opinions of the legal literature.

According to our analysis, liability and responsibility concern equally the citizen and the state, they are concepts that evolved together with the society, were transformed and adapted to the modern times, entering the age of computerized society.

The fact that things are as described above, namely that there is responsibility including from the public authorities, is proven by the multitude of cases in which the state was condemned. Thus, in 2010[48], after the Court issued the decisions acknowledging the violation of the provisions of the Convention or of its additional Protocols, the Romanian State was condemned to pay EUR 3,874,287. During the period of 01 January 2010 - 31 December 2010, the legislative power is responsible in 79.26% of the cases where condemnation decisions were issued (107 out of 135), the executive power is responsible for 65.92% of the cases (98 out of 135), the judiciary power is responsible for 54.812% of the cases (74 out of 135), the Public Ministry for 15.55% of the cases (21 out of 135), and the Constitutional Court is responsible for 0.74% of the condemnations (1 out of 135 cases).

The widest area for the assessment of legal responsibility[49], as an attitude of the individual in relationship with the legal regulatory system in general, remains the area governed by the constitutional law. The constitutional rules were the object of the individual's reflection, a measure for his social responsibility.

The integration of the legal rules and liability in the wide sphere of the social rules and liability takes place as part of a correlation process between the various forms of social liability which manifest in a permanent interdependence and mutual influence.[50]

There are legal sociology surveys warning that the disappointment of the society's expectations towards the law is particularly connected to liability, that the law cannot exercise its influence in society unless it succeeds to identify the person responsible and to establish the liability[51].

In conclusion, we have the pleasure to mention the opinion of professor Antonie Iorgovan[52] who said that "liability must be regarded as the phenomenon that manifests itself on the background of the committed harm". This is a conception rather classical and at the same time dominant suggestively expressed by an author[53] by this wording: "the illicit deed is the objective ground of liability and the application of the legal sanction its main consequence".

THE CONCEPT OF LEGAL LIABILITY

ELENA EMILIA ŞTEFAN*

Abstract
The failure to abide by the social rules could determine the application of sanctions of various types that could restore the social balance. The legal liability, unlike other forms of social liability, refers to the obligation of being held responsible for violating a legal rule. Starting from the hypothesis that the social rules and values may be violated or omitted in the individuals' actions, one can assert that the social liability may take several forms, depending on the affected social relationships, namely: moral liability, political liability, legal liability, etc.
This study aims at dealing with only several aspects related to the concept of legal liability.

Keywords*: the fundamental legal category, the social rules, legal liability, values, the legal sanction.*

1. Introduction

The legal liability is a form of social liability. The social liability can be encountered in everyday life under several and various forms. Although the legal liability is a series of specific particularities that configure its personality, in relation with the other forms of the social liability it is in a permanent interdependence and mutual influence.[1] Therefore, one can assert that the legal liability is accessory to any other form of social liability.

Nicolae Popa[2] conceives responsibility as an assumption of liability for the results of man's social action. Sociologically speaking[3], "responsibility" as part of the social life evolved together with society. The social[4] responsibility appears when the individual deliberately opts for a variant of social behaviour. The legal responsibility is a form of social responsibility, a legal phenomenon with an independent object of research.

The notion of liability is specific to law[5] and is seen as a legal obligation according to a legal regulatory act.

In this study, we have tried to select, out the multitude of works dealing with the subject matter of the legal liability or responsibility, those we considered relevant for defining the concept of legal liability.

The first section of this survey will make a historical approach of the evolution of liability, will be followed by a section regarding the etymology of the words liability and responsibility, and in its last part the concept of legal liability will be defined under three aspects. Finally, we aim at making a synthesis of the conclusions deriving from our analysis.

Literature review

The subject of legal liability is not a new one in the legal science debates. The concern for the sanction of those who break the laws, the established order has existed since the oldest times, however the subject is far from being fully discussed.

In this respect, we mention from older times the works of Plato, Thomas Aquinas, Montesquieu, Rousseau, Locke, Spinoza, Leibnitz, Paul Fauconnet who dealt in their works with the subject matter of responsibility; from the more recent period we mention Romanian authors such as: Dimitrie Gusti, Mircea Djuvara, M. Costin, Mihai Florea, Ion Craiovan, Gheorghe Boboş, Nicolae Popa, I. Humă, etc. and from the field of administrative law or constitutional law we mention Paul Negulescu, Anibal Teodorescu, Tudor Drăganu, Valentin Prisăcaru, Antonie Iorgovan, Ion Deleanu, Ion Muraru etc.

2. Paper content

In dealing with the subject matter of the legal liability, we start our theoretical demarche with a rhetoric question raised by Ion Craiovan[6] in his work, General Theory of Law, namely: "What could we understand for example from the complex institution the legal liability without resorting to social responsibility and to a conception on society and man?"

Deservedly, we agree with the question raised as there is no possibility to deal with legal liability, which we consider a part of the social liability, without dealing with its relationship with the legal responsibility, and last but not least with the social responsibility. As responsibility involves values, it must be sought in the individual's existence, as it depends on feelings, attitudes, being expressed by what we call human behaviour.

Any society and any form of social power is characterized by a certain regulatory system, a set of rules of conduct.[7]

Any holder of a right – regardless of whether it is a particular person before its equals or the state, or the state before its subjects, or the state before other states – must be liable for its actions, assuming the consequences of the commitments its makes or of the disregard of a legal debt.[8] Thus, liability is very similar to responsibility as a general principle of law, although it allows for a certain touch of constraint, without being mistaken for the sanction, but rather being a general framework where the law is implemented.[9]

Although distinct in terms of their content, but directly relying on different factors, liability and responsibility are rightly connected to each other.[10] On the one hand, they represent the manifestation of the multiple and various relationships between the individual and the collectivity, and on the other hand, liability and responsibility are forms or rather successive steps of the same general phenomenon of integration of individuals in the collectivity.[11]

In the regulatory systems determined exclusively and objectively by the necessity of the social cohabitation of the members of society in their accession to their Common Good, in the systems where man is sympathetic to them because the protected values and the ordering criteria for these values are his own values and criteria, the observance of behavioural rules is a conscious and deliberate undertaking of the necessity, originating in conviction, therefore it is seen as responsibility.[12]

The social responsibility does not exclude the liability – including the legal one, as one of the segments of responsibility – nor is it reduced to it. The social responsibility[13], which is an interiorized dimension of the social agent, refers to the activity carried out on one's own initiative, sometimes through an original contributive action, depending on its strictly regulatory-legal basis.

Dumitru Maziu[14] makes a historical incursion into various ages to highlight the manifestation forms of liability in time.

Thus, the author divides the evolution of the various forms of liability into three large periods: Ancient Time, Middle Ages, the period after the French Revolution (year 1789).

a.) In the Ancient Times, revenge seemed like a natural solution to an aggression. Dumitru Mazilu quoted some authors on this subject, namely: Seneca who, in his work "On anger", compared the sanctioning measure to the medical act, aiming to maintain the health of the cohabitation relationships within the citadel; and the Greek philosopher Socrates drew attention to the dangers in social relationships if the laws are violated and destroyed by each private person. If in Athens and Rome the sale of insolvent debtors was allowed, Solon suppressed this custom, saying that nobody should suffer any bodily violence for debts between private persons.

b.) In the Middle Ages, the sanctions were particularly severe, characterized by cruelty to intimidate and discourage the infringement of the existing rules. Also, the author mentioned that during that period the ecclesiastic law had an overwhelming influence. People guilty of having committed reprehensible deeds had to account for their deeds before the great feudal seigneurs who often applied sanctions arbitrarily in the cases they judged. To understand the meanings given to liability during that time, the works of Thomas More and Tommaso Campanella (...) should be researched, says the author Dumitru Mazilu.

c.) After the French Revolution of 1789, a true doctrine is developed regarding liability for breaking the law. The criticism against the feudal system expressed by the arbitrariness of the great seigneurs and by the cruel sanctions, often unjust, defined little by little the parameters of legal liability, at the foundation of which is the guilt stipulated in a legal norm. Dumitru Mazilu believes that the most prestigious things in this field are "Lettres persanes" and „L'esprit des lois" of Charles Montesquieu[15] and "Dei delitti e della pene" of Cezare Becaria.[16]

Also, the author Lidia Barac[17] enounces an interesting point of view, from the same perspective of the analysis of the concept of legal liability. Thus, understanding that responsibility is a dimension of the individual, connected to his spiritual life, in discovering the premises of responsibility she is of the opinion that it is not enough to point out only its social levels, but it is also necessary to move the problem beyond these levers, by researching and studying thoroughly the spiritual life of man. In this framework we will acknowledge that the foundation of man's spiritual life is the experience, as it is the result of the complexity of organization at psychological level.[18]

Antonie Iorgovan[19] asserted that, as regards the institution of liability, either seen from the perspective of the general theory of law, or from the perspective of the legal sciences of the branch, the Romanian authors have been broadly concerned about the clarification of three essential issues:

a.) Identification of the fundamental legal category through which the notion of legal liability may be defined.

b.) Determination of the delimitation criteria (classification of the forms of legal liability).

c.) Determination of the conditions and grounds of legal liability (and implicitly of each of its forms).

Liability[20] is the natural consequence of any commitment. In a state of law nobody can go beyond liability as regards the way they fulfill their duties or the commission they accepted. When somebody accepts a public function, they accept rights, obligations, liability in the universality of their dimensions.

2.1. Etymology of the words: "liability" and "responsibility"

To present the etymology of the words "liability" and "responsibility", we are going to mention the opinions of some foreign doctrinaires.

The author Henri Lalou[21] asserts in his work "La responsabilité civile. Principes élémentaires et applications pratiques", in chapter "Generalities on civil responsibility", that etymologically speaking the word liability derives from the Latin word spondeo, which in the verbal contract (verbis) of the Roman law means the solemn obligation of the debtor towards his creditor to fulfill his obligations undertaken in the contract. In the same work, Henri Lalou asserts that the issue of responsibility was raised in all fields having to do with human activities: in morale, in international relations, in public law, in private law. In morale, responsibility refers to a double issue: human freedom and existence of a moral law.

As regards the international liability[22], we are well aware of the controversies born from the responsibility for war or from the responsibility of the states for crimes or offenses committed on their territory at the expense of foreigners (...).

In the public law, the constitutional laws regulate the responsibility of the head of state, the ministerial responsibility, the responsibility of public servants.

The criminal responsibility that conditions the application of punishments requires a social unrest caused by a felony for which the responsible individual should be held accountable.

Whereas civil responsibility[23] requires essentially, on the one hand, a victim who suffered a prejudice and, on the other hand, another person who should repair the prejudice.

Henri Capitant[24] specified that the term liability derives from the Latin verb respondere which means both to respond and to pay in one's turn.

Another French author who dealt with the subject matter of responsibility, around year 1977, was Michel Villey.

According to the assertions of the French author Michel Villey[25], the word responsibility appeared in the French language rather late (1783) and it seems it was used for the first time by Wecker: "the trust in this paper is born from the responsibility of the Government".

Another author, the English professor A. Hart[26], analyzes legal liability bringing into the light the multiple meanings that can be ascribed to the notion of liability.

The same well-known representative of the analytical philosophy of law, A. Hart[27], drew the attention on the fact that the following distinct meanings can be ascribed to "liability":

a.) The liability deriving from a certain role – the person is liable for fulfilling the duties deriving from the role they have, from the position they fill in a certain organization (e.g. the parents are responsible for raising their children);

b.) The causal liability – it can be ascribed not only to human beings but also to natural events, to dangerous things and to animals (the frost is liable for the road accident it caused, meaning that the accident happened because of the frost);

c.) Liability – when a person infringes the legal norm that obliges them to do a certain action or when the person is obliged by the law to bear a punishment or to repair the damage caused (either by their deed or by somebody else's deed);

d.) The capacity to be held liable – the person meets the requirements for being able to be held liable.

A whole range of theoreticians set out to defining the concepts of liability and responsibility, using the dictionaries of that time.

We notice that in the French language the term "responsibility" (responsabilitate) of the Romanian language has no equivalent, the only known term being that of liability, i.e. "responsabilité".

Thus, the dictionary of the modern Romanian language[28] defines liability as the "fact of being liable, responsibility", whereas responsibility is defined as the "obligation of doing something, of being liable, of accounting for something, liability".

Similarly, the dictionary Larousse defines responsibility as being the "obligation of repairing damages caused to somebody else by themselves, by a person depending on them or by an animal or thing guarded by them; the obligation of bearing the punishment established for the committed felony; the capacity to make a decision without first referring to a higher authority; the need of a minister to abandon his functions when the Parliament refuses to trust in him…", whereas "collective responsibility", "the fact of considering all the members of a group as jointly responsible for the deed committed by one of the members of the group".

2.2. Possible definitions of legal liability

In presenting the possible definitions that have been given in time to the legal liability, we start from the acknowledgement that we cannot find in the legislation any definition of the legal liability, regardless of the field.

On the other hand, the various pieces of legislation present the principles of holding someone liable, the conditions in which a person, regardless of their statute, can be held liable[29].

We should also mention that the selection of the definitions we are going to present followed the three directions that have underlain the attempts to define the concept of legal liability, namely:

a.) the obligation category

b.) the legal relationship category

c.) the legal situation category

Definition of legal liability as seen from the perspective of the category "obligation"

[29] Hence, we refer not only to natural or legal persons, but also to dignitaries, public servants, etc.

Ilie Iovănaş[30] envisages legal liability as "an expression of the condemnation by the state of an illicit conduct, which consists in an obligation to bear a privation".

M. Costin[31] envisages liability as an obligation to bear the consequence of having failed to abide by some rules of conduct, an obligation falling upon the author of the deed which comes in conflict with these rules and which always carries the mark of social disapproval of such conduct.

Gheorghe Boboş[32] agrees with M. Costin's point of view, according to which legal liability is a complex of rights and accessory obligations which, according to the law, is born as a result of committing illicit deeds and which constitutes the framework for imposing governmental constraints by applying the legal sanction in order to ensure the stability of social relationships and guidance to the members of society in the spirit of observing the rule of law.

Among the French authors of civil law who connect the idea of liability to the idea of obligation we mention Henri Lalou[33]. Also, we mention Rene Savatier[34] who gives the following definition to civil liability: "civil responsibility is the obligation falling upon a person to repair the damage caused to another by their deed or by the deed of the persons or things depending on that person".

Definition of legal liability as seen from the perspective of the category "legal relationship"

The author Dumitru Mazilu[35] defined legal liability as a constraining legal relationship whose content consists of the state's right to hold liable the one who violated the legal rule, applying the sanction established by the violated rule, and of the obligation of the defaulting party to be held liable for its deed and to be subject to the applicable sanction based on the violated rule.

A similar point of view is that of the author Gheorghe Boboş[36] who defines legal liability as a constraining legal relationship whose aim is the legal sanction.

According to the statements of Dan Ciobanu[37], legal liability is the situation deriving from a previous legal relationship, it is the legal relationship that finds its source in an illicit deed.

In the mind of Lidia Barac[38], legal liability could be defined as the institution containing the set of legal norms referring to relationships that are born from the activity conducted by the public authorities, in observance of the law, against all those who infringe or ignore the rule of law, in order to ensure the respect and promotion of the legal order and of the public good.

Also, we would like to mention the authors C. Stătescu and C. Bârsan[39] who claim that legal liability has an essential feature, i.e. "the possibility to apply the governmental constraint, if necessary".

Definition of legal liability as seen from the perspective of the category "legal situation"

Thus, as regards the third category, i.e. that of the legal situation, we mention the conception of Antonie Iorgovan.

Antonie Iorgovan[40] believes that legal liability can be defined as "the legal situation consisting of the complex of rights and accessory obligations, the content of legal relationships determined by the legal norms that fulfil, at the level of the system of law, a self-regulatory & sanctionative function of the global social system".

Through liability one aims both at re-establishing the regulatory order, by ceasing any actions that are contrary to this order using certain constraints, and at materializing a negative reaction of the social authorities (considered at the micro-, meso- or macro-social level) on the author of such deed, by placing the latter in an unpleasant, unwanted situation so that he may become conscious of the negative meaning of his deed and of the need to adopt in the future a conduct complying with the social rules.[41]

Consequently, Mihai Florea[42] asserts, liability does not necessarily involve any option or conviction or initiative or interest from the agent in relation to the aims that are offered to him and for whose achievement he is committed, not even the understanding of their content. It simply contemplates the compliance with or infringement of certain prescriptions (obligations or interdictions), while the agent has rather a passive role rather than an active one.

Conclusions

In our study we have tried to make an inventory of the most interesting definitions of the concept of legal liability. We took into account both the opinions of sociologists and the opinions of Romanian and foreign jurists.

Considering the opinions of the reputed authors in this field presented above, we conclude that the subject matter of legal liability still remains unelucidated.

The legal liability is currently in the middle of a transformation process, together with the evolution of society actually, it has new dimensions, new correlations.

In this context of the redefinition of the concept of legal liability, we acknowledge how actual the famous expression of Juvenal[43] is: "quis custodient custodes?" Deservedly, this question[44] summarizes one of the most difficult problems standing in the way of accomplishing the rule of law: find the most efficient procedural ways to make the state's bodies, which directly or indirectly have constraining force in view of making the citizens be compliant with the laws and, in their turn, be forced to comply with them.

BREACHING AN INTERNATIONAL OBLIGATION-THE OBJECTIVE ELEMENT OF THE INTERNATIONAL RESPONSIBILITY OF THE STATE FOR INTERNATIONALLY WRONGFUL ACTS

FELICIA MAXIM[*]

Abstract

The responsibility of states for internationally wrongful acts can be triggered in case two essential elements are cumulatively met, namely: the subjective element, the chargeability of the wrongful act and the objective element, the violation of the obligation assumed internationally. The violation of an international obligation is the objective element of the international responsibility of the state for internationally wrongful acts. The subject of international law is the holder of various rights and the subject of various obligations. Such rights or obligations arise from concrete legal cases, that is they have been determined by the agreement of will of the subjects of international law. The subject of law acts or does not act for the purposes of exerting the subjective act, its faculty or power lead to a violation of international obligations.

The obligation has been created and imposed to the subject of international law based on a legal document, be it an international treaty, a decision of a arbitral or jurisdictional court, a decision of an international organization, etc. The violation of this obligation, by omission or action, constitutes the element of responsibility. There is a breach of an international obligation by a State when an act of that State is not in conformity with what is required of it by that obligation, regardless of its origin or character. An act of a State does not constitute a breach of an international obligation unless the State is bound by the obligation in question at the time the act occurs.

1. Introductory aspects

The responsibility of the state for internationally wrongful acts can be triggered if two essential elements are cumulatively met, that is: the subjective element, the chargeability of the wrongful act, and the objective element, the breaching of the obligation assumed internationally.[1] The delimitation between the conduct required by the international norm law and the wrongful conduct by the respective state constitute the essence of the wrongful act and the existing situation can be expressed in various ways. For instance, International Court of Justice (I.C.J.) uses phrases such as "incompatible with the state's obligations"[2], "contrary fact" or a fact "improper" to an existent rule and "the failure to meet and obligation assumed conventionally". It is recognized the breaching of an obligation, even in case where the act of the state is only partly contrary to an obligation assumed internationally. In some cases, the conduct required by the international law norm is clearly established, in other cases it is shaped by indicating a minimum standard according to which the state is free to act. The conduct may consist in an action or failure, as it may be constituted in a combined way of an action and failure. The wrongful character of the act is invoked independently of the existence of the guilt, negligence; the doctrine, practice and case law being in favour of instating the objective responsibility.[3] In each case, the comparison between the conduct adopted by the state and the required conduct can determine whether a breach of an international obligation has occurred. In order for an wrongful act to exist, there needs to exist a conduct contrary to the international law norms in force, irrespective of the source and nature of the international obligation breached. As a result, the obligation needs to exist, therefore to be present, irrespective of its source and content. Breaching an obligation also leads to the creation of a new rapport of international law, being considered a new source of obligation for the state guilty of committing the wrongful act.

Although the aspects presented have been subject to the works of the UNO International Law Commission (ILC), the identification of the characteristic features of the international obligations is necessary so that this way we would be able to appreciate whether we have the second element of the wrongful act.[4] The absence of the international obligation triggers the inexistence of the wrongful act and state's responsibility under international law.

On another hand, the study of each category of obligations is not important in codifying the responsibility of the states, but we deem it important from the point of view of the responsibility of the states and international case law. It would be very easy to assert that it is not relevant the delimitation of the obligations according to content, but it is very difficult to identify in each particular case whether an international obligation has been breached and if yes, what the obligation is and what the breaching consists in.[5]

In conclusion, we consider that it is welcome the attention paid to the objective element of responsibility, as this way the rules applied internationally can be better understood.

2. Origin of the obligation

Establishing the origin of the international obligation is determined by the existence of various sources of international law and by the possibility of triggering specific consequences according to the source of the obligation. Thus, there can be identified obligations assumed based on customary law, obligations the arise from treaties, obligations determined by the application of a general principle of international law, obligations imposed under decisions adopted by a relevant body of an international organization, obligations arisen from the I.C.J. decisions or arbitral decisions assumed based on a unilateral act of the state.[6]

The practice of the states and the decisions of international courts confirm the existence of the principle stating that the responsibility of the states is triggered by breaching an international obligation irrespective of the origin of such obligation.

This principle is applied in the Armstrong Cork Company Case by the Conciliation Commission of the United States and Italy, set up based on art. 83 of the Peace Treaty dated 10 February 1947. The Commission says that the responsibility of the state triggers the obligation to repair the prejudices caused, if such are the result of a failure to meet international obligations. In this regard, the Commission refers to any obligation instated by the public international law rules.[7]

Such a decision also results from the works of the Committee preparing the Hague Conference of 1930 which requested that the states' governments should decide on the relevance or irrelevance of the origin of the breached obligations. All the states' governments agreed with the principle already instated in international practice, according to which it was of no importance the origin of the obligations assumed, the responsibility of the states being triggered in all cases in which a wrongful act was committed, the arguments formulated were, however, different.

In the decision ruled by the I.C.J. in the Barcelona Traction, Light and Power, Limited Case, it is said that the Belgian government could be entitled to formulate a request if it proved that one of the violated rights and facts reported by it had been determined by breaching an obligation arisen from the treaty or from breaching a general rule of law.[8]

The analysis of each source of international law as a source of obligations can lead to disclosing certain particularities. Thus, in case of customary law it is easy to say that it can constitute a source of obligations, but it is more difficult to prove. Being defined as "a relatively long, repeated and uniform general practice considered by the state as expressing a rule of conduct with mandatory legal force in the rapports between them"[9], it needs to prove the subjective element and the objective element. There are cases where states have not accepted a certain customary law, in cases of this type responsibility cannot be established as the obligation pertaining to it does not exist. The inexistence of the obligation is proven by considering various acts and opinions by means of which the state has manifested its objections.

In case of treaties, specialized literature claims the existence of special cases.[10] There can be identified cases where a state can breach a norm regarding the conclusion of the treaties, in order to determine another state to conclude a treaty, which constitutes a case of responsibility for the wrongful act; if it breaches a norm established under the treaty, it is a responsibility according to the respective treaty. In treaties law, the Vienna Convention states that the provisions of the Convention do not prejudice any of the issues that might be raised in relation to a treaty from the point of view of international responsibility of a state.[11] Nevertheless, the Convention states that a material breach of a treaty by a party state authorizes the other party to a bilateral treaty to invoke the breaching as a reason for terminating the validity of the treaty or for suspending the application of the treaty in full or in part.[12]The articles regarding the treaties declared terminated, out dated or whose application has been suspended, the Convention assumes the related authority.

Referring to the relationship between the treaties law and the law of the international responsibility of the states, the Court mentions that these two branches of international law have obviously distinct scopes. According to the treaties law, there needs to be established whether a convention is in force or whether it has been suspended or denounced. However, according to the law of the responsibility of the states, there needs to be appreciated to what extent the suspension or denouncing of a convention, which would be incompatible with the treaties law, engage the responsibility of the state that has taken such action.[13]

As a result, we support the assertion, formulated in specialized literature, which underscores the interference between the two categories of norms, appreciating that the law of the responsibility of the states contributes to the consolidation of the treaties law.[14]

The use of the concept of "principle" makes use invoke the distinction between the fundamental principles of international law and the general principles of law. The fundamental principles constitute the core of international law, they determine the contents of the other principles, norms and institutions of the entire system of international law. The fundamental principles are instated based on customary law and multilateral treaties that are universal, their normative contents giving them a mandatory legal character.[15] As a result, disregarding the provisions of the conventions and customary law having the value of jus cogens, which instate the fundamental principles of international law, triggers the responsibility of the states.

The general principles of law refer to the complex of general rules that form the basis of operation of each system of law, national and international. The recognition of the general principles of law as source of international law generally covers certain gaps of this type of law. Such principles, however, do not have a mere complementary role as against the treaty and customary law, but are independent legal norms, not being included in the category of ancillary means, and being placed on the same standing as the treaty and customary law. Invoking the rich doctrine and practice of the states that attest the value of the general principles of law, but especially the fact that the text of 38 of the C.I.J. Bylaws has not been abrogated, the authors of international law consider that the states are obligated to observe them.[16] Thus, disregarding the general principle of law equals a breach of international obligations.

Part of the ancillary means, art. 38 of the I.C.J. By laws refers to the court decisions and doctrine of the best qualified experts of various states. The doctrine of the best qualified experts cannot be brought into discussion, as it consists in the contribution of various specialists and works of international scientific forums of utmost importance to the codification and progressive development of international law, but without mandatory legal value. However, court decisions have mandatory legal force only for the litigating parties and only for the case settled. As a result, disregarding the contents of a decision may trigger the responsibility of the state that has disregarded the contents of the ruling pronounced. The category of the international courts whose decisions are taken into consideration also includes international arbitration tribunals.[17] The decisions of international courts being appreciated for their high scientific level can be invoked in similar cases.

Although not regulated by art. 38 of the I.C.J. Bylaws, still the unilateral acts are recognized as part of the category of sources of rights and obligations in international law. In order to determine the responsibility of the states for breaching the obligations instated by unilateral acts, it is necessary to invoke the distinction between the unilateral acts of international organizations and the unilateral acts of states. Within the acts of the international organizations we distinguish between: the acts that form the internal law of the organization, which, even if mandatory are not relevant to the issue of sources and the acts referring to reaching the objectives of the organization, which may be subdivided into acts with mandatory legal force and acts having the character of recommendation.[18]

Part of the category of acts with mandatory legal force, we can mention the resolutions that regard peacekeeping and international security and especially the ones adopted based on chapter VII of the UNO Charter. In this respect, art. 25 of the UNO Charter states that: "The members of the United Nations agree to accept and execute the decisions of the Security Council in accordance with this Charter." The resolutions with mandatory legal force adopted by the Security Council regard the reaching of precise objectives or establishing international standards in special fields.[19] Thus, if a state adopts a behaviour contrary to the conduct established under the resolution, it is triggered the responsibility of the state and as a result the sanctioning of the respective state.[20]

In principle, the resolutions of the UNO General Assembly have the value of soft law, that is they are recommendations, the states being free to choose whether to observe the provisions of the resolutions. A distinct category is represented by the resolutions adopted under the form of declarations that refer to fields of special importance to international law, such as: human rights, outer space, decolonization, principles of international law, etc. The declarations of the UNO General Assembly can acquire a conventional character, when, subsequently to adoption, they are formally accepted by the states (under the form of treaties or conventions).

At first sight, the unilateral acts of the states cannot be considered sources of international law, as they represent a unilateral manifestation of will, not being the result of the joint agreement of the states. Still, certain unilateral acts of the states are susceptible to have effects, that is to engage the state which has issued them or even to create rights and obligations.[21]

3. Existence of the obligation

In order to be able to talk about the international responsibility of the states, we need to refer to a conduct contrary to the conduct established under an obligation in effect as at the time of occurrence of the wrongful act. The problem that leads to unclear aspects is establishing the time when the obligation arises and the time when the obligation ceases to have effects. The controversy has been determined by the succession of the rules of international law and of the obligations assumed under the rules instated. If the obligations did not suffer changes in time, then this aspect could not be invoked and it would be very easy to prove that the state has engaged a conduct contrary to an obligation in effect, which has led to triggering its responsibility. Actually, this issue is far more complex, as international law is not a static system, the norms are issued when this is deemed necessary and they cease to exist when they become obsolete.[22]

The existence of the international obligation triggers three general cases which should be considered. The first case regards the situation where the obligation requiring a certain conduct has ceased to exist before the state has adopted a contrary conduct. It is obvious that we do not deal with a conduct contrary to international law, this not being a wrongful act. However, there needs to be clearly delimited the time when the obligation has ceased to exist. The second case regards the adoption by the state of a conduct contrary to the conduct prescribed by an existing obligation in force. Although the resolution could be considered to be a simple one, in the sense that it is obvious that the existence of the obligation determines the state to adopt a proper behaviour, still, in the practice and case law of international law, there have been controversies regarding the delimitation of the time of occurrence of the event from the time of settling the dispute.

Thus, if the obligation exists between the time of occurrence of the wrongful act and the time of settling the dispute, the decisions is easy to make. Disputes occur when the obligation assumed ceases to exist in the time span between the time of occurrence of the wrongful act and the time of settling the dispute. The analysis of the decisions pronounced internationally has confirmed the application of the principle that establishes the responsibility of the state, if the state has adopted a conduct contrary to the conduct required under the obligation assumed as at the time when the wrongful act has taken place. Moreover, it has been confirmed that it is of no importance the fact that the existence of the obligation assumed has ceased as at the time of settling the case. In respect of the third case, identified in the practise of the states and specialized literature, which might refer to a case where the state might adopt a conduct which at the time of occurrence was not contrary to the norms of international law, subsequently, however, a rule might come up setting a conduct that against the conduct of the state makes the latter wrongful. Is it possible to determine the responsibility of the state for a conduct contrary to a conduct imposed under a new rule, which did not exist at the time of the action of the state? In domestic law, a person cannot be criminally liable for an act that was not prohibited at the time when it was committed. The principle has been instated by the constitutional provisions of various states or of criminal codes, as well as of various international documents or conventions, such as for instance: The Universal Declaration of Human Rights of 1948[23], European Convention of Human Rights of 1950[24] etc. In the field of the civil responsibility of the states, this principle is often not states expressly, but it is no doubt that in this field also it represents a general rule. Being a general principle of law, accepted by all the law systems, it can be said that it is a valid principle also to the international society, which can be applied in the field of the international responsibility of the states.[25] As a result, we can conclude that the responsibility of the states for adopting a conduct contrary to the one prescribed by the obligation assumed is triggered if the obligations exist at the time of occurrence of the wrongful act.

In international case law, the aspects presented above are generally resolved implicitly, rather than explicitly. The best known thesis is the one formulated in 1928 by arbiter Max Huber in the Island of Palmas Case*,* the aspect that needed to be clarified regarded the problem whether it could be established the exertion of Spain's sovereignty over an island, as this state had discovered the island in XVI century. The arbiter decided that: "Both parties agree that an act should be appreciated in light of the law contemporary with it and not with the rules in force as at the time of occurrence of the dispute or the rules existing as at the time of resolving the case. "Therefore, we need to admit that the rule stated represents a general principle that can be applied also in other cases.

An example may be the decision ruled in the J. Bates Case as arbiter in the Joint Commission regarding Great Britain and the United States set up based on the Convention of 8 February 1853. The case brought forth to the Commission regards the conduct of the British authorities in respect of the American vessels engaged at the time in the slaves trading. The United States requested compensations from Great Britain, as the British authorities had freed a number of slaves aboard the American vessels which belonged to American nationals. The specificity of the case was, however, determined by the fact that the incidents occurred at different times, the arbiter having to establish for each incident whether slavery was allowed. The incidents occurred in the period when slaves trading was allowed, including in the British dominions, triggered the responsibility of the British authorities. As different from these, the incidents occurred in the period when slavery had been forbidden by the "civilized nations", including by the United States, could not be considered wrongful. In conclusion, the arbiter ruled that there was a breach of an international obligation if the conduct of the state bodies was contrary to an obligation in force as at the time when the conduct took place.[26]

The European Commission of Human Rights has often had the opportunity to apply the rule mentioned above. The most mediatized application is the one regarding decision 1151/61. A Belgian citizen invoking the provisions of art. 5 paragraph 5 of the European Convention of Human Rights claimed damages from the German Government for the prejudices caused to him by the detention and death of his brother in a concentration camp in 1945. The Commission overruled the request saying that although art.5 paragraph 5 of the Convention stated that any person who was the victim of an arrest or detention under conditions contrary to the provisions of this article was entitled to reparations, the case invoked did not fall under the scope of this provision, as it took place in a period of time when the Convention was not in effect.[27]

The practise of the states and the authors of international law have recognized the application of the principle according to which an act of the state is considered to be wrongful, if the breached norm was in force as at the time of occurrence of the act.

The instated principle is not only necessary, but is also sufficient to trigger the responsibility of the state. Once the responsibility has been triggered as a result of breaching the obligation, it cannot be affected by the subsequent cessation of the obligation as a result of the cessation of the treaty that has been breached or of another change to international law. Thus, the Court in the Northern Cameroons Case mentioned that if during the existence of the custodianship the custodian was responsible for the acts of violating the Custodianship Agreement as a result of which damage was effected to another member of the United Nations or to other citizens, the claim for damages cannot be eliminated by the cessation of the custodianship[28]. Similarly, in the Rainbow Warrior Case, it was stated that although the conventional obligations had expired with the passage of time, France's responsibility for breaching its obligations has effects as the breaching had occurred when the obligation was in force.[29]

From the above, it results that, according to international practice, doctrine and case law of international courts an act of a state cannot constitute a breach of its international obligation, unless the respective state was bound by the respective obligation at the time of the breaching.[30]

4.Contents of the obligation assumed

The specific contents of the obligation assumed or the particular type of conduct required to the state will not have effects on responsibility.

In the Gabcikovo-Nagymaros Project Case, C.I.J., referring to the provisions of the draft articles adopted by ILC in 1976 in supporting the solution ruled, underscored that it is a well-known fact that when the state commits a wrongful act, international responsibility is established irrespective of the nature of the obligation breached by it.[31]

In a similar context, it has been argued that the obligation regarding certain aspects can be considered as breached when a wrongful act is committed corresponding to the contents of the obligation. The rule formed the basis of the objection formulated in the Oil Plaforms Case in front of CIJ. It has been said that a treaty of friendship, trade and sailing cannot, in principle, be breached by a conduct that has involved the use of armed force. The Court has very prudently formulated an answer pointing out that the 1955 Treaty required to each party various obligations regarding various aspects. Any action from any of the parties that was incompatible with those obligations was considered wrongful, irrespective of the means by which it was taken. A breach of the rights of one of the parties according to the treaty, by means that involve the use of force, was considered as wrongful as a breach by means of an administrative decision or by any other means. The matters referring to the use of force were not, as a result, excluded per se from the scope of the Treaty, thus the breaching of an international obligations was an international wrongful act, irrespective of the subject and contents of the obligations breached and irrespective of the type of the noncompliant conduct.[32]

The breaching of an international obligation can sometimes be determined by the contents of the provisions of the domestic law, which may happen in case where the provisions of the domestic law conflict with the international obligations assumed. Thus, all the states are obligated to observe the international obligations assumed, in this respect the legislative bodies will take all the necessary measures to put domestic legislation in agreement with international legislation, and the judicial bodies will apply the law adopted by the legislative bodies. In case where disregarding the international obligations is determined by the conflict between the domestic legislation and the international provisions, guilty are considered those domestic bodies that are in charge of adapting the domestic legislation to the internationally accepted norms of law. However, as pointed out above, the state is responsible for the internally wrongful acts of the state bodies.

The contents of the obligations assumed determines the necessity of making various distinctions between obligations according to the importance of the interest pursued. Thus, it can be identified the category of crimes and delicts, the category of the obligations of result and the obligations of means, as well as the category of the obligations that establish the adoption of a behaviour in an imperative manner or forbid a certain behaviour. The distinctions made have led to contradictory discussions on the cases where it is triggered the international responsibility of the states for wrongful acts or on whether such a distinction is necessary as part of the responsibility of the states for wrongful acts. The controversies have been brought to an end by reaching a unanimous agreement between practitioners, theoreticians and states, an agreement that points out to the principle according to which any breach of an international obligation triggers the responsibility of the state, irrespective of the object of the obligations assumed.

4.1 The triad: wrongful act, crimes and delicts

In classic international law the wrongful acts of the states which breached an international obligation were considered "international delicts", as it was not recognized the distinction between crimes and delicts as in domestic law. Together with the manifestation of the tendencies to outlaw war, war has started to be considered by doctrine an international crime. A valuable contribution in this respect was made by Romanian lawyer V.V.Pella, who supported the necessity of instating international responsibility for the war of aggression, qualified as being the most serious international crime.[33] The necessity of the distinguishing, within the general category of wrongful acts, a separate category that regards violations of norms of top importance to international society became obvious after the end of World War II. The terrible consequences of World War II consisting in the disappearance of a big number of people, destruction of property, massacres executed on human beings led to the necessity of adopting at international level a category of norms to ensure the observance of human rights and human being.

As a result, from the point of view of the responsibility of the states, in its initial works, ILC made a net distinction between international crime and international delict. According to art. 19 of the draft articles of 1996 a wrongful act consisting in a violation by a state of an international obligation so essential to the protection of fundamental interests of international community, that its breaching is recognized as a crime by this community overall, is an international crime.[34]

Para. 4 of art. 19 of the draft shaped the concept of international delict stating that any internationally wrongful act that is not a crime according to the above provisions is an international delict. The provisions mainly aimed at delimiting the category of international crimes from the residual category of international delicts.[35]

However, the delimiting was no longer kept in the final form of the Draft articles (2001), considering that no criminal consequences can be developed for states in case of violation of the fundamental norms. The distinction made between crimes and delicts is important as it underlines the protection of the values essential to international society, but also it was not well placed in the draft articles, as it presented a criminal approach rather than an international one.

In the reports presented, J.Crawford tried to reach a consensus between the members of the Commission replacing the notion of crime with the concept of "serious violation by a state of an obligation to the international community overall, essential to the protection of its fundamental interests"[36]. ILC has regulated the serious violations of the obligations established based on the imperative norms of general international law in Chapter III of Part II of the Draft regarding the contents of the responsibility of the states.

4.1.1. Serious violations of the jus cogens norms

The identification of the serious violation of an international obligation is done by using two criteria: the first criterion regards the violation of an obligation established according to an imperative norm of general international law, and the second criterion regards the effects considered under the aspect of their extent and nature.

In order to determine the contents of the obligations violated we need to consider the concept of imperative norms of the international law.[37] Based on the Convention regarding the treaties law of 1969, a norm of general international law is a norm accepted and recognized by the international community of states overall, as a norm from which no derogation is allowed and which cannot be amended unless by a norm of the general international law having the same character (art.53). Still, the Convention presents the concept of jus cogens, but does not identify, exempli gratia, categories of norms that do not fall under the scope of the concept.

Within the works of ILC, it cannot be reached a consensus with regard to listing various categories of this type of norms, and most authors of international law have referred to criteria related to the importance of the values protected by norms. Thus, it has been noticed that one of the prohibitions regards aggression, the norms that forbid such actions being considered imperative norms. In the comments made by ILC on the treaties law, as well as in the debates that took place in the Vienna Conference, the governments of the states agreed that not resorting to force or to the threat of force was an imperative norm. The states also agreed with other examples supported by the Commission in respect of the norms that forbid slavery and slaves trading, genocide, racial discrimination and apartheid. These aspects have been subject to international regulations, the states ratifying the conventions and treaties with no exception. In respect of slavery and slaves trading, it can be said that they are no longer important, as such cases are rather isolated occurrences. However, the importance given to human rights and the fact that slavery and slaves trading would be a denial of the human rights have determined international community to establish norms which forbid such acts having the value of jus cogens. Supporting the position of imperative norms of the norms that forbid genocide has also been identified by the international case law. The position of imperative norm was also applied in case of the provisions regarding the banning of torture in art. 1 of the December 1984 Convention against torture and other cruel, inhuman and degrading treatment and the punishment of such acts.

Eventually, we mention the international existence of the imperative norms that regard the right to self-determination. C.I.J. stated in the East Timor Case that the principle of self-determination was one of the most important principles of the contemporary international law, which led to an imperative obligation which ensured the exertion and observance of the principle as a fundamental principle of international fundamental law.[38]

The obligations imposed by the imperative norms aim at defending the most important values and interests for international community, which regard the existence of the states and their citizens, protecting the basic human values.

The concept of imperative norms of the general international law has been recognized by the practice of the states, international case law, as well as the courts and tribunals of the states. The position of C.I.J. was expressed, for instance in the Barcelona Traction case as follows: "An essential difference needs to be established between the obligations of the states to the international community overall and those that arise as against another state part of diplomatic protection. Given their very nature, the first regard only the states. Given the importance of the rights involved all the states can be considered as having a common legal interest in protecting them, and the correlative obligations are erga omnes obligations"[39]The Court was interested to present a position contrary to the one presented by the victim state against the background of the diplomatic protection, underscoring the position adopted by all the states with regard to the violation of an obligation recognized by the international community overall. Although the case presented dealt with no such case, the Court clearly underscored that the responsibility of the states would be triggered in case of a violation of various obligations that are characteristic to the whole international community, and given the importance of the protected law, all the states have a legal interest in protecting those rights.[40]

The shaping of the position of the states, but also the international case law regarding the category of imperative norms, as well as the theories prepared in the literature of international law have led to the identification of the respective fields, thus they will be grouped in: norms that regarding the banning of the use of force and the threat of force; norms the regard the principle pacta sunt servanda; other fundamental principles of international law stated in the UNO Charter; the elementary rights to life and human dignity, the norms that refer to rights generally recognized to all members of the international community, such as the freedom of seas and outer space.

The qualification of the violations of international obligations as serious has been introduced by the provisions of art.40 of the ILC Draft, considering that the violation of such an obligation is serious if it shows an obvious or systematic disregard of the respective obligation on the behalf of the relevant state.

We believe that the provision mentioned above is not correctly formulated, even if in the comments made, ILC points out that the word "serious" regards the representation of the intensity of the violation of the obligation and not that a violation of such obligation is not serious. In order to be serious, two alternative criteria are established in order to appreciate seriousness: the violation of the obligation should be obvious or systematic.[41] In order to be systematic, it needs to take place in a deliberate and organized manner and in order to be obvious the intensity of the violation is taken into account, established according to the values protected by the violated norms and by the effects resulted.[42]

Specialized literature[43] says that art. 40 of the Draft sets two distinct regimes of responsibility:

- "ordinary" international responsibility, that which is established based on meeting the conditions stated by art.2 of the Draft,[44] whose general consequences consist in the obligations to halt the wrongful behaviour, to meet, under the conditions required, the obligation initially violated and to repair the prejudice effected by the wrongful conduct;

[44] These conditions regard the violation of an international obligation and, respectively, the attribution of the wrongful behaviour to the state.

➢ aggravated international responsibility, involving two conditions (nature of the violated obligation and the intensity of the violation), which need to be met in order to trigger various specific consequences.[45] In the literature of international law, it has been asserted that among the factors that have contributed to determining the degree of seriousness there are: the intention to breach the norm, the extent and number of the violation and the seriousness of the consequences.[46]

4.1.2.Consequences specific to serious violation of the jus cogens norms

First of all it is very clear that a serious violation of the obligations assumed determines the legal consequences stipulated for breaching an obligation of "common law"[47], thus the guilty state has the obligation of ceasing the wrongful act, the obligation of giving assurance and guarantees that the act will not be repeated, as well as the obligation of repairing the prejudice caused. The occurrence of the obligations listed will not be affected by the seriousness of violating the obligation, however supplementary consequences might appear in case of serious violations, consequences determined by the special circumstances of such violations.

As noted, the first condition regards the obligation of the state to cease the wrongful act, but it is obvious the possibility of cases where the guilty state should not comply. In this respect, the states need to cooperate to put an end to the violation occurred. The interventions shall be made firstly by means of the international organizations, these being the main forms of international cooperation. Generally, the focus is on the intervention of the United Nations which is a well organised framework, whose members of most states of the world. Cooperation, however, cannot be reduced only to a framework organized by the scope of the United Nations, it can also be achieved by a reduced number of states or may take the shape of non-institutionalized cooperation. The obligation to cooperate in order to repress wrongful acts exists for the victim states, but also for the states that have not suffered and which need unite their efforts to counteract the effects of the violations occurred. Cooperation has been manifested internationally pre-emptively, but also for the purpose of doing away with the effects, however in this case cooperation has been rather low and without a significant efficiency.

No state should encourage the commissioning of serious violations of the imperative norms of general internal law, but on the contrary should make efforts to remedy the situation, without giving aid, assistance or supporting the situation created. A state that helps guilty states, supports them or gives them assistance shall be considered guilty and shall be responsible. In a related development, collective manifestation of non-recognition is an efficient way of repressing the serious violation occurred internationally, but also a form of implicit cooperation, aiming at isolating the guilted state and forcing it to remedy the situation the has been condemned.

Although it was normal that specific consequences of a serious violation of the obligations should include the consequences of a violation of a common obligation, it was also necessary to add new ones. As a result, it is established that the states should cooperate in order to end, by licit means, any serious violation; no state should recognize a licit a situation created by a serious violation and support the maintaining of this situation; there are not excluded the legal consequences stated for breaching an obligation or the supplementary consequences, which may appear on the basis of international law further to a serious violation.[48]

[47] R Miga Beşteliu, op.cit., 2006,p.11.

[48] art.41 of the Draft artciles of ILC regarding the responsibility of the states for internationally wrongful acts.

Authors of international law claim that the Draft does not require overwhelming obligations to the guilty state, but that are certain measures to be taken by all in order to achieve an "isolation" of the guilty state and paralysation of the consequences of its conduct.[49]

4.2.Obligations of means and obligations of result

Based on the claims in the specialized literature, it can be asserted that the delimitation between the two categories is based on the fact that in case of the obligation of means the purpose of the obligation needs to be achieved by means, behaviours, precisely determined actions, whereas in case of the obligations of result it is of no interest how this result is to be obtained.[50] The category of obligations of means, there can be introduced the states' obligation of adopting certain laws or legislative measures, such as the ones in the field of human rights; the obligation of submarines to sail on surface in the territorial sea of another state or the obligation of police forces not to enter the premises of the diplomatic missions without the acceptance of the head of the diplomatic mission.[51] An obligation of means is breached when the state adopts a behaviour that is not conformant in accordance with the conduct determined specifically under the respective obligation.

The distinction becomes important when the existence of a violation is established, but it is not relevant from the point of view of the responsibility of the states for wrongful acts. In the Colozza case, the European Court of Human Rights was requested to rule in a case where the trial had been conducted in the absence of a person, the latter not being informed of the trial; the person had been convicted to a 6-year term in prison and could not subsequently challenge the sentence. The person claimed that they did not have the possibility to defend themselves as per art.6 of the European Convention of Human Rights.[52] The Court pointed out the following: "The contracting states enjoy a great liberty of appreciation in choosing the means to ensure the surety that their legal systems comply with the requirements of art.6 para. 1 in this field. The task of the Court is not to indicate to the states what these means are, but to establish whether the result required under the Convention have been obtained. To this end, the resources offered by the domestic legislation need to prove efficient, and the accused, who was in a similar situation to the one in which Mr. Colozza found himself, needs not to be obligated to prove that they had not tried to elapse from justice or that his absence was due to a case of force majeure.[53]

As a result, the Court rules that art. 6 requires an obligation of result. In order to settle the cases invoked in such circumstances it is not sufficient to analyse what measures have been adopted in order to realize an effective application of art. 6. The distinction between the obligations of result and the obligations or means is not conclusive to prove a breach of art.6.

It is important for the determination of the responsibility of the states for wrongful acts to determine the conduct that needs to be adopted, that is the indication of the result pursued or the adoption of concrete actions presented by the international legal provision. Thus, if the state fails to obtain the result pursued, it is guilty of committing a wrongful act, and in case of the obligations of means it is guilt as it has not adopted the behaviour described in the norms of international law. Irrespective of the case, the state will be responsible for the wrongful acts committed, of essence being the wrongful character, that is why in the field of responsibility the distinction is not important, the specialized literature saying that it is more a distinction of interest to civil law.[54]

4.3. Actions or omissions

The conduct attributed to the state may consist in an action or omission. The cases where the international responsibility of the states is triggered by an omission are at least as numerous as the ones where the international responsibility of the states is triggered by an action, in principle, there being no difference between the two. Furthermore, as also specified in the ILC, there cannot be isolated an omission from other relevant circumstances to determined responsibility[55]. Specialized literature claims that the violation may take place as a result of a positive action -delicta commissiva- (when the obligation was of not doing) or of an omission, of refraining - delicta omissiva-(when the obligation was of giving or doing).[56]

In conclusion, the international responsibility of the states may be triggered by committing a wrongful act that may consist in an action or omission originated by both causes. For instance, the international dispute regarding the Corfu Strait, between Great Britain and Albania, settled by the I.C.J. in 1949 gives a classical example of establishing the responsibility of the states both for action and for omission. As at October 22, British ships passing through the Albanian territorial waters hit a mine field placed in the strait, incurring of deaths and material damage[57]. I.C.J. held Albania responsible for not having notified the existence of the mine field placed in its territorial waters, as well as the fact that it allowed its territory to be used contrary to the right of other states, according to the theory that the sovereign of that territory knew all the actions or inactions taking place on its territory. I.C.J. also held responsible Great Britain for undertaking demining operations in the Albanian territorial waters without any consent.[58] In the case of the diplomatic staff in Teheran, triggering responsibility took place due to the Iranian authorities' omission to take all the measures necessary to protect the US diplomatic and consular staff.[59]

4.4.Hypothesis of the complex delict

4.4.1 Continuous wrongful act

According to the established principles, a breach of a specific obligation of international law takes place when the respective obligation was in force for the state at the time when it adopted the conduct contrary to the behaviour required by the obligation. The mentioned rule is very clear for instantaneous conducts, but difficulties are encountered when the conduct is extended for a certain period of time. In this case, three situations can be identified*: the first situation* regards an obligation that was not in effect at the time when the state adopted a certain conduct, and as a result, the state acted legally, however, subsequently, the obligation came into effect and the acts of the state have become wrongful*; the second situation* regards the case where the conduct of the state was contrary to the norms of international law in the beginning, however, subsequently the obligation became no longer effective and the conduct has become licit; the third situation regards the possibility where the state acted wrongfully in a continuous manner, the obligation being permanently into effect.

The application of the principle is not difficult on condition that the acts committed be continuous and the time span during which the acts took place should coincide with the period in which the obligation was in force. If at the time when it acted, the acts of the state were perfectly legal and the obligation of the state came into effect subsequently, the state will be responsible only for the violations occurred as of the time when the obligation came into effect. On the other hand, when the conduct of the state was wrongful at the time when it started to act, but subsequently it became licit as the obligation ceased to have effects, the state will be responsible for the wrongful act committed correspondingly to the time when the obligation was in effect.

The notion of continuous act is common to all the great system of law, being also recognized in international law. International courts have encountered many cases where the continuous wrongful act has been invoked. For instance, in the Diplomatic and Consular Staff Case, the Court took into account the fact that Iran had successively and continuously breached its obligations to the United States of America as stated in the Vienna Conventions of 1961 and 1963.[60] The consequence of the continuous wrongful act depend on the circumstances in which it has occurred and during the violation effected. For instance, in the Rainbow Warrior Case[61] the arbitration invoked the France's omission of withholding two of its agents on Hao Island for a period of three years, a request formulated in the agreement between France and New Zeeland. The arbitral tribunal made a distinction between continuous acts and instantaneous acts pointing out that by making this classification in this case it was obvious that the continuous violation consisted in the omission to go back to the Hao Island, the two agents having committed a continuous act. The classification mentioned is not a pure theoretical one, but on the contrary it has effects in practice, determining serious violations, playing an important role also in determining the prejudice effected.[62]

ILC noting the implications of the continuous wrongful acts has deemed it necessary to include a special provision in the Draft articles which have provided for the three cases regarding the length in time of the act.[63]

Thus, the Draft establishes, to a certain extent, that the distinction between the violation that is instantaneous and the continuous wrongful act by underscoring the importance of the identification of the starting moment and the moment when it ended, mentioning that the subsequent effects are not considered an extension of the wrongful act committed.

We consider that the introduction in the category of continuous wrongful acts of the obligations of vigilance, of the obligations that are required in order to prevent the occurrence of wrongful acts, as being important and conclusive in the field. The violation of an obligation of vigilance can be considered a continuous act, if the state fails to adopt any measure during the period in which the event continues to occur and to constitute an act contrary to the conduct required by the obligations assumed. For instance, the obligation to prevent across border air pollution in the Trail Smelter Case was violated by acts of continuous pollution.[64] Indeed, in such cases, the violation can be progressively aggravated by the length of time during which the acts continue to have effects. We mention that the violation of the obligation to prevent can be effected by an instantaneous wrongful act, whereas if the conduct remains contrary to the norms assumed during a period of time, it changes into a continuous wrongful act.

The breach of an international obligation requiring a State to prevent a given event occurs when the event occurs and extends over the entire period during which the event continues and remains not in conformity with that obligation.

[64] A similar situation occurred in the case of Romania vs. Hungary and to a certain extent Serbia, with regard to the incident in Baia Mare, in the year 2000, when River Tisa and other rivers were polluted with cyanides and when the polluted waters reached Danube, the situation mentioned occurred.

4.4.2 Complex wrongful act

As different from the acts analysed above, the wrongful acts to which we will refer are neither instantaneous nor continuous. Doctrine says that the complex wrongful act consists in a series of separate acts that regard different situations, which creating a unitary whole can constitute a violation of an international obligation or the complex wrongful act may consist in a succession of acts that regard the same situation, a circumstance that determines eventually a violation of an international obligation.[65]

In the first case, the complex wrongful act consisting in a series of acts that regard different situations, which overall form together a violation, there can be considered the case where each act is a violation of the obligations assumed, or each of them is a violation, other than the one constituted by the whole of them.

We consider that the notion of complex act is limited to violations of the obligations that regard a sum of conducts and not acts considered individually.[66] Examples may be the obligations regarding genocide, apartheid or the crimes against humanity, systematic acts of racial discrimination etc. Some of the most serious wrongful acts are defined in international law by presenting their complex character. The importance of the obligations mentioned in international law also determines the necessity of instating responsibility of the states for such acts.

The crime of genocide may be an illustration of a complex wrongful act. It is regulated as crime distinctly by the Convention of 1948 regarding the prevention and punishment of the crime of genocide, in the By-laws of International Criminal Court, as well as in the by-laws of the ad-hoc tribunals. All the legal instruments present the content of the crime of genocide by listing the acts that can be committed. Thus, based on the Convention in 1948, genocide is defined as being any of the acts committed with the intention of extermination, in whole or in part, a national, ethnic, racial or religious group, consisting in: the physical extermination of the members of the group; serious harming the physical or mental integrity of the members of the group; intentionally subjecting the group to living conditions that would lead to its physical destruction, partial or total; measures that aim at preventing births within the group, forced transfer of children from one group to another.[67]

Of essence is the identification of the period when this complex delict took place. It is asserted that the occurrence takes place at the time of the latest action or inaction, which cumulated with other actions or inactions, is sufficient to determine a wrongful act, not being necessary to be the past in a series. Determining the time when it is identified the violation of the international obligation is made by reference to the primary rules of international law. The number of actions or omissions that need to constitute wrongful acts is also determined by the phrasing and purposes contained in the primary rules. The legal provisions do not clearly establish the number of actions or inactions that need to be part of a series in order to constitute a complex wrongful act, requiring only a sufficient number, which sometimes might determine uncertainty on the moment of committing a complex wrongful act.[68]

It is recognized the existence of complex acts that are constituted from a series of actions or inactions regarded as a whole, which determines a wrongful act, but it is not excluded the possibility that each act should be wrongful by reference to another international obligation.

In the ILC. Such cases are regulated as follows: 1. The breach of an international obligation by a State through a series of actions or omissions defined in aggregate as wrongful occurs when the action or omission occurs which, taken with the other actions or omissions, is sufficient to constitute the wrongful act; 2. In such a case, the breach extends over the entire period starting with the first of the actions or omissions of the series and lasts for as long as these actions or omissions are repeated and remain not in conformity with the international obligation. [69]

Conclusions

The analysis of the objective element of the internationally wrongful act has involved approaching the specific issues related to it, namely: the origin of the obligation violated, the existence of the obligation violated, as well as the analysis of the content of the obligation assumed. Establishing the obligation violated is determined by the existence of a number of sources of international law and by the possibility of occurrence of specific consequences according to the source of the obligation. As a result, there can be identified obligations assumed based on customary laws, obligations arising from treaties, obligations determined by the application of a general principle of international law, obligations imposed by decisions adopted by a relevant body of an international organization, obligations arisen from the decision of I.C.J. or arbitral decisions and obligations assumed under a unilateral act.

Part of the existence of the obligation violated, the problem on which the research has focused was that of the time when the obligation arises and the time when the obligation ceased to have legal effects, the controversies being determined by the succession of the rules of international law. The conclusion reached, according to international practice, doctrine and case law, in case where the state was bound by the respective obligation at the time of the occurrence of the violation.

The content of the obligations assumed has led to making a series of distinctions between obligations according to the importance of the obligations pursued. Thus, it has been analysed the triad wrongful act, crimes and delicts; the category of the obligations of result and obligations of means; as well as the category of the obligations that establish the adoption of a behaviour in an imperative manner or that forbid a certain behaviour.

In respect of the triad wrongful act, crimes and delicts, the attention has been focused on the concept of "serious violation of the jus cogens norms" and on their consequences, a concept that has replaced the notion of international crime presented in the ILC Draft of 1996.

The hypothesis of complex delict has brought into discussion the concepts of continuous wrong act and complex wrongful act. With regard to the continuous wrongful act it has been underscored the importance of identifying the moment when the act ceased to be, mentioning that the subsequent effects are not considered an extension of the wrongful act effected. In a different development, the research of the complex wrongful act has been conducted by reference to violations of the obligations that regard a sum of conducts and not facts considered individually.

The identification of the feature characteristics of the international obligations is necessary in order to prove the existence of the objective element of the wrongful act, this aspect having a major importance to international case law.

NATIONAL AND INTERNATIONAL CONTEXT OF TRAINING FOR ROMANIAN MAGISTRATES

VIORICA POPESCU*

Abstract

In the context in which human resources management has an international dimension, the paper briefly analyzes the process of training for magistrates, both from the perspective of general international principles, as well as from the perspective of national legislation. The importance of permanent development of training programs for magistrates is reflected in the professionalism of magistrates and assumes a certain adequacy to the specific needs of the judicial system. From this perspective, the training for magistrates has a compulsory feature not only in relation with the national or European legislation, but also is a practical need for adjustment to continuous changes that occur in the judicial relations, by legislative reforms, some radical, as a consequence of the dynamic social life.

Introduction

In the present socio-technological evolution, it is natural that every category of organization to be concerned that its employees have a serious professional background, with a large cultural horizon, able to use modern techniques and technology. In this context, training and professional development are premises and essential conditions which determine the efficiency of all social work.

Training is a complex and lengthy process, preparing each person for the chosen job or occupation, using all existing methods and forms for acquiring basic scientific, technical, general and specialized knowledge and for acquiring the required job skills. In other words, training must embed learning process and work, acting in two directions, namely:

- Insuring each employee a high volume of general and specialized knowledge
- Training professional skills[1].

By training each organization aims the practical development of the strategic ability, encouragement and eases of efforts to perfect and develop the intellectual capital. The encouragement of the development of an organization can only be achieved by conception and implementation of knowledge management, using personal development plans, as a component of the performance management[2].

In the legal system, the quality of the staff is essential for the achievement of organizational objectives. It is expressed by the fact that the ensemble of requirements necessary for the fulfillment of attributions, jobs stated by the law set a true status of the staff working in justice, but in the same time the exercise of professional attributions shapes the idea of mission in the system[3].

In this context, the present study aims the research of the means of professional training for magistrates, referring to the principles and the national and international framework.

Being an area of research provided for by the legislator, the references to the literature are minimal, prevail the analysis of the normative texts. My own contribution to this study, besides the synthetic analysis of the legislative framework, consists of the indication of the vulnerabilities of the presented means of in-service training for magistrates, but also of suggested means to improve the system.

1. Principles and international normative framework settling the training for magistrates

According to international documents, training for magistrates is important because each judicial system is the supreme guarantor of democratic function of national, European or international institutions.

According to Opinion No 4 (2003) of the Consultative Council of European Judges (CCJE) on appropriate initial and in-service training for judges at national and European levels[4] it is essential that judges, selected after having done full legal studies, receive detailed, in-depth, diversified training so that they are able to perform their duties satisfactorily. Such training is also a guarantee of their independence and impartiality, in accordance with the requirements of the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms. Lastly, training is a prerequisite if the judiciary is to be respected and worthy of respect. The trust citizens place in the judicial system will be strengthened if judges have a depth and diversity of knowledge which extend beyond the technical field of law to areas of important social concern, as well as courtroom and personal skills and understanding enabling them to manage cases and deal with all persons involved appropriately and sensitively.

Principles grounding the development of training for magistrates are found in the European Charter on the statute for judges[5], according to which "certain precautions must be taken in preparing judges for the giving of independent and impartial decisions, whereby competence, impartiality and the requisite open-mindedness are guaranteed in both the content of the training programs and the functioning of the bodies implementing them. This is why the Charter provides that the authority/court must ensure the appropriateness of training programs and of the organization which implements them, in the light of the requirements of open-mindedness, competence and impartiality which are bound up with the exercise of judicial duties. The said authority must have the resources so to ensure. Accordingly, the rules set out in the statute must specify the procedure for supervision by this body in relation to the requirements in question concerning the programs and their implementation by the training bodies".

The importance of training was also stated by Art 6 Point 3 of the Bangalore Principles of judicial conduct[6] according to which "a judge shall take reasonable steps to maintain and enhance the judge's knowledge, skills and personal qualities necessary for the proper performance of judicial duties, taking advantage for this purpose of the training and other facilities which should be made available, under judicial control, to judges".

The Resolution of the Council and of the Representatives of the Governments of the Member States meeting within the Council on the training of judges, prosecutors and judicial staff in the European Union[7] adopted in the reunion of the Justice and Home Affairs Council on 24 October 2008 in Luxembourg, established the following:

1. To contribute to the development of a genuine European judicial culture, based on diversity of the legal and judicial systems of the Member States and unity through European law;

2. To improve the knowledge of the European Union's primary and secondary law among judges, prosecutor and judicial staff, including fostering the knowledge of the procedures before the European Court of Justice;

3. To promote, through appropriate training, the application of European law by judges, prosecutors and judicial staff, in a way which is in keeping with the fundamental rights and principles recognized in Art 6 of the Treaty on European Union and reflected in the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union;

4. To foster the knowledge of the legal systems and law of the other Member States, notably by promoting relevant courses of comparative law.

2. Training for judges in the Romanian judicial system

In the light of the international principles, the training for Romanian judges was settled by Law 303/2004 modified and amended on the statute of judges and prosecutors[8], the methodological norms being established by the Regulation on in-service training for judges and prosecutors and certification of results, approved by the Superior Council of Magistracy Decision No 322/2005 modified and amended.

There are two ways of training stated by the Romanian legislation, namely:

- Initial training for future judges and prosecutors
- In-service training for judges and prosecutors[9]

Initial training for future judges and prosecutors is settled by Art 16 of the law, stating that it is performed "by the National Institute of Magistracy and consists of theoretical and practical training of future judges and prosecutors". The duration of training for future judges and prosecutors is 2 years.

Also, during courses, the future judges and prosecutors perform an internship in the courts and prosecutor's offices, assist in courtrooms and in criminal prosecutions to directly familiarize with the activities of judges, prosecutors and judicial staff.

Training for future judges and prosecutors is approved by the Superior Council of Magistracy, at the proposal of the National Institute for Magistracy.

In-service training must consider the dynamics of the legislative process and consists mainly in the knowledge of national legislation, of European and international documents to which Romania is part, of the jurisprudence of courts and Constitutional Court, European Court of Human Rights and of the Court of Justice of the European Union, of compared law, of deontological norms, in the multi-disciplinary approach of novelty institutions, as well as in the knowledge of foreign languages and computer skills (Art 35).

The National Institute for Magistracy is responsible for in-service training for judges, prosecutors, presidents of courts or prosecutor's offices where the first perform their duties, namely for judicial managers and for each judge or prosecutor by individual training.

Regarding the in-service training of judges and prosecutors, it is performed by two ways:

It was republished based on Art 12 of Title XVII of the Law No 247/2005 on reform in fields like property and justice, as well as on some adjacent measures, published in the Official Gazette, Part 1, No 653/22 July 2005, renumbering the texts,

I. Organizing regular activities within each court of appeal and prosecutor's office attached to a court of appeal consisting of consultations, debates, seminars, sessions or round tables, with the participation of the National Institute of Magistracy, their agenda being approved by the Superior Council of Magistracy. Within this form of training a special role belongs to judicial managers of the courts of appeal or, of prosecutor's offices attached to a court of appeal, who have the obligation to name judges or prosecutors responsible with in-service training. The responsible for decentralized in-service training in courts and prosecutor's offices have the possibility to use as staff for training university teachers from the superior legal education system, judges and prosecutors, specialized judicial staff or other national or international specialists. Using the staff for training who is not qualified as trainer of the National Institute of Magistracy it is necessary the approval of the leading board of the court or prosecutor's office.

II. Participating, at least every 3 years, on in-service training organized by the National Institute for Magistracy, by national or foreign superior education institutions or on other forms of professional training.

In 2009, proposed by the National Institute of Magistracy, the plenum of the Superior Council of Magistracy has approved three new strategies of NIM on initial and in-service training for magistrates, as well as on the recruitment, training and evaluation of NIM's trainers for 2009-2012. Also, the Strategy of the Superior Council of Magistracy in the area of human resources, adopted in the plenum of SCM by Decision No 1320/27 November 2008, included objectives on the initial and in-service training for judges and prosecutors.

In establishing the strategic objectives were considered: the analysis of trainings organized/coordinated by the National Institute for Magistracy in previous years, the necessities for training in the judicial system resulted from the structure of judicial staff, the obligation to provide training stated by national laws and strategic documents containing Romania's commitments assumed in the adhesion document, mainly the obligations resulted from the Action plan for the fulfillment of the terms within the cooperation and verification mechanism of the progress registered by Romania in the area of the reform of the judiciary and of the fight against corruption, adopted by the Romanian Government according to the Decision no. 1346 of October 31, 2007, especially the priorities in the area of training resulted from the European Commission's monitoring reports; the obligations for training for judges and prosecutors resulted from the analysis of international documents, studies or reports on the judicial system or on the statute of judges and prosecutors.

3. Vulnerabilities of the training process for Romanian magistrates

Nevertheless, despite the fact that the process of training for magistrates has a solid legal basis, in practice was noticed that it presents a series of vulnerabilities, such as:

- The absence of evaluation of the socio-professional profile of the future magistrate;
- The centralized emphasized feature of training, found both in the curricula of seminars, as well as in the way they are carried out;
- The lack of practical feature of the initial training within NIM;
- The lack of the formative feature which aims the development of abilities and skills specific to magistracy, the appropriation of deontological norms, awareness on the professional role and membership in the judicial system.
- Regarding in-service training, the number of places for training offered for magistrates varies from a year to another, depending on the budget received by NIM, access to European funds subsequent to pre-adhesion period being an insignificant moment. In addition, the normative framework regarding budget, old and inflexible, significantly heavies the development of decentralized in-service training process.
- The presence of a large number of theoreticians among trainers, inexperienced in legal practice, limits the development of practical skills of future magistrates.

- The lack of balance among NIM teachers between the number of judges-trainers and the number of prosecutors-trainers.
- The participation of Romanian magistrates to stages, trainings or study visits in courts, prosecutor's offices or other judicial institutions in EU Member States, though it has increased from year to year, it is still insufficient in relation to the needs of the legal system. The main obstacles are the budgetary and organizational limitations, as well as the level of linguistic competences of judges.

4. Implementing measures to improve the training process for magistrates

In order to overcome the above-mentioned issues, we propose the following solutions for the improvement of the initial and in-service training process:

- Creation of an uniform and homogenous program for initial training, which will alternate modules of training in the Institute with internships in courts and prosecutor's offices attached to them, and internships in other institutions, from the first stage of the training program, common for judges and prosecutors, as well as in the stage of specialized training for the role of judge or prosecutor;
- Congestion of the initial training program;
- Modularization of the training program based on specific competences, by regrouping disciplines adjacent to civil and criminal law, so that interdisciplinary transfer becomes possible, useful in the assimilation and connection of different law institutions;
- A higher responsibility of internship judges, by their participation in courts, as well as the obligation to draft court decisions/procedural documents for prosecutors etc;
- Emphasis on the extracurricular component of training;
- On-line seminars held either by national authorities, or by international organisms, represent efficient methods for training, both from the perspective of results, as well as from the perspective of costs;
- Attracting specialists from other judicial areas to participate on in-service training;
- Expanding the capacity of NIM to organize in-service seminars, which will allow the participation in seminars of a large number of magistrates;
- Regularly access European funds for training for magistrates, in order to complete the budgetary resources and to annually provide a sufficient number of seats in trainings, including the contribution of Romanian magistrates to build an European area of freedom, security and justice;
- Insuring a coherent management of NIM, as well as regarding the budget for training for magistrates;
- Strengthening the capacity of NIM to access and manage European funds assigned to training for magistrates, assumes some measures such as: training for the NIM's Department of Public Policies staff in the management of European funds, adjusting the budget as to insure co-financing from the national budget, including by an increased budgetary autonomy of NIM in relation with the Superior Council of Magistracy etc.

Also, budgets of the Superior Court of Magistracy, Ministry of Justice and National Institute of Magistracy should insure the necessary funds:

- For the participation of Romanian judges and prosecutors in European training sessions (internships, conferences, exchanges between judicial organisms based on European exchange programs, such as the European Judicial Training Network - EJTN);
- For the adoption of modern solutions for training and professional motivation (for instance, supporting the change in specialization for magistrates by granting scholarships for 6-12 months);
- In order to unfold projects proposed to by the professional associations of judges.

To achieve these objectives it is necessary the promotion of some legislative changes in order to:

- Adjust the management of funds for training
- Insure an appropriate level of the initial training, regardless the recruitment methods;
- Insure the coherence of management of NIM.

Conclusions

Training magistrates as professionals of law has acquired new meanings and values, national training institutions, along with their supra-national structures, being called to identify proper answers, but also to share expertise, resources and training actions to achieve the objective, represented by the training, in the next few years, for judges and prosecutors in order to fulfill the act of justice, the desiderate of every civil society.

A common European jurisdiction ideally assumes at least a relative uniformity in judicial training; this is why Romania must permanently adjust not only its legislation, but also its jurisprudence in training for magistrates, by permanently staying connected to the changes that occur in the large area of human resources management.

EXPORTING LAW OR THE USE OF LEGAL TRANSPLANTS

LAURA-CRISTIANA SPĂTARU-NEGURĂ*

Abstract
From the general theory of law, we are aware of the migration of legal concepts, practices and institutions. We believe that there are no legal system anywhere in the developed world that has not used legal transplants, that has not borrowed from another country's laws. This paper intends to explore the concept of "legal transplants". Why are they used? Where do they come from? Is their assimilation uncomplicated? Why are they rejected in some cases? A transplanted law should be comported with the host state in order to be accepted? Should be discussed the relationship between law and culture when contemplating a study of legal transplants? What forces propel those borrowings? However, this paper does not claim to offer definite answers to the above mentioned questions. Its goal is more modest. In understanding the phenomenon of legal transplants, we underline the fast growing importance of using the comparative research.

Keywords: legal transplants, legal transfers, globalization, culture, borrowing.*

Introduction

It is interesting that "as far as we can look, the law, it seems, is an experienced and eager traveller. As far as we can look, the migration of legal concepts, practices, and institutions has been a commonplace occurrence all around the world: from the "reception" of Roman law in many countries; from America's constitutional exports to the defeated countries after World War II to the large-scale transfer of Western legal knowhow to the post-socialist countries of Eastern Europe. We will not find a legal system anywhere in the developed world that has not borrowed from another country's laws. That much is undisputed."[1]

In the present, the process of globalization (economic, political, legal) engages a redimension of the law sciences functions'. The debates on the evolution of law concern the harmonization of the legislation in the 27 states that compose the European Union, the creation of effective instruments at EU level able to cope with the "globalization" of organized crime and, in general, with the crime phenomenon, the increase of the cooperation in combating international terrorism, the improvement of traditional legal instruments (e.g., the entire contractual arsenal). As professor Nicolae Popa underlines[2], there is a real legal process of ideological and institutional contamination. In this context it is familiarized the concept of "legal transplant" or "legal transfer". In a reality marked by the encounter of the legal civilizations, lawyers can not only address the phenomenon only from the perspective of national legal traditions, but from the perspective of interdependencies that competition of legal values from different areas of law imposes.

Alan Watson, the legal historian and comparativist, created the notion of legal transplant and in a monograph described its effect as „the moving of a rule or a system of law from one country to another, or from one people to another"[3].

From a theoretical perspective, his choice of terms has been criticed[4]; for instance, Rodolfo Sacco, head of the Italian Guild of Comparative Law, prefers the expression legal formants[5], Gunther Teubner, a leading German legal sociologist, suggests legal irritants[6], Pierre Legrand, a Franco-Canadian comparativist, denies the possibility of legal transplants[7]. But, beyond the terminological dispute, what is legal transplant and why do we need it? Where do they come from? When are they used? And how does it work as a balance between the globalization of law and the indigenization of it?

My own work has been to critically examine the doctrine on this topic and to try to answer the above mentioned questions. However, this analyse should go deeper, because more interesting findings could be revealed.

Paper content

It is interesting that in the doctrine there is disagreement about what forces determine those borrowings and what happens to the borrowed laws and institutions as they are "planted" into foreign soil. Doctrinaires like Alan Watson see no problems with exporting law from one country to another, from one historical period to another. Watson believes that law is not "the natural outgrowth of a particular society, but the intellectual creation of clever lawyers, easily adaptable to local use by other clever lawyers elsewhere on the globe"[8].

What is globalization? Globalization is not a new phenomenon; it has existed for a long time in different forms: from the military expansion of the Roman Empire through Genghis Khan, to the so-called capitalism of today, these are all different types of globalization in different times. Therefore, all through history, globalization has always existed in military, religious and economic form. The word "globalization" we use refers to an economic, technological and cultural transnational process since World War II, and particularly refers to how this transnational process surmounts national boundaries and becomes a new challenge to national sovereignty.

However, the globalization of law and the indigenization of it are two inalienable elements in contemporary legal development. They do have certain contradictions and conflicts, which are inevitable. But how should we co-ordinate these conflicts? Legal transplant is introduced by most countries to the homogenization of international rules. In other words, legal transplant has become a method used to balance the conflicts between the globalization of law and the indigenization of it.

Doctrinaires sustain that a positive legal transplant is an effective way for indigenization to resist the globalization of law.

And it does make legal traditions continue even under the explosion of globalization. Even more, it does, to some extent, prevent legal colonialism.

Although globalization does exert such a huge influence, indigenization also appears similarly strong. Every nation is seeking to gain maximum benefits from the impacts of globalization. In that case, legal transplantation is of course the first and best choice.

It was discovered that ancient Phoenicia and countries around the Mediterranean had systematically transplanted the Commercial Code from Babylonia, which has been proved by massive unearthed legal literature[9]. Afterwards, the Phoenician Commercial Code was absorbed by its colony Rhodian, and it became the famous Rhodian Law[10]. Then, the Rhodian Law was copied to a great extent by Greek Law and Roman Law[11]. Moreover, most western countries' private law was more or less directly from either Roman Civil Law or English Common Law in Middle Ages. Also, most Asian and African countries' laws were transplanted from Mohammedan law. It is obviously that the phenomenon of transplantation is not restricted to the modem world, it happens all the time whenever law exists[12].

In modern times, this kind of phenomenon occurs on a large-scale, and legal transplantation becomes more common. For example, France transplanted law from Ancient Rome, Germany transplanted law from France, the United States from the United Kingdom, Japan from France and Germany, Asian countries from Japan and western Europe, Japan from the United States after World War, and most developing countries in Africa, Asia and Latin America transplanted their laws from either Common Law or Civil Law country, and so on. There are so many that we cannot point all of them out.

The literature on transplants showed that legal systems can accommodate a plurality of models. Though only some legal systems are currently classified as "mixed", many more exhibit features revealing that borrowing or transplantation are regular occurrences, even across boundaries that would not have seemed to be so permeable. This finding casts serious doubts on the utility of the established approach to comparative law with its heavy reliance on the classification of legal systems into legal families[13].

Please note that the legal transplant is possible and it is a quite complex process. Concerning the institutions and the content we choose, there are some important points to be considered prior to transplanting the institutions. Firstly, do we want to transplant the entire legal system or only the specific legal rules, legal concepts or legal principles? Secondly, is the law we want to transplant closely linked to politics, the economic system, ideology or value sense or is there no relationship between them? Thirdly, does the rule in question have different political purposes or social functions? Fourthly, do we want to transplant international law or specific national and traditional law? It is obvious that what we discussed above is much more closely linked to the possibility of legal transplant and the methods we use.

But what are the causes of legal transplant? Two types of law reform can be discerned: one is qualitative law reform and the other one is quantitative law reform. Moreover, of all the legal changes that occur, perhaps one in a thousand is an original innovation.

We consider that nowadays most legal changes are imitation, in other words, they adopt or transplant institutions from other nations and it is rare that one sees an original innovation.

But must the rules or institutions transplanted fulfil the same aims and achieve the same results in their society of adoption as in their society of origin? Thus, it is important to notice that the question of success can arise at more than one stage of the transfer of legal rules and institutions. We may be concerned about how a legal transplantation emerges or the way it exerts its influence.

Why is a legal transplant necessary? First, it needs low experimental costs and can achieve results in a short time. Comparing to original innovation, it is fair to say that legal transplantation require low costs in investigation of problems, research and testing of systems, and drafting bills. Second, it can help to adjust the new social relations evoked by reform and also avoid legal backwardness during the reform. Third, in learning international conventions and universal procedures in various countries, it can ultimately decrease unnecessary transaction costs due to differences between different countries.[14]

Therefore, legal transplantation is exactly what legal modernization needs. The differences between legal systems are not only caused by differences in legal methods and legal techniques, but also in legal values and legal mentalities. It is actually the differences in legal spirits and legal values that distinguishes traditional and modern, developed and underdeveloped legal systems. In those legal systems which are still traditional and backward, it is better to transplant some laws and institutions from developed countries, especially those laws or institutions which are well developed and tested, in order to accelerate their legal innovations. Without doing that, they will face an enlarging distance between developed countries and themselves and the delay of their legal modernization. Moreover, they will lose opportunities to modernize their legal systems.

But when should we solve the problems arising from transplanting the law? Should we start to solve it when it arises after every single law is transplanted? This would be a inefficient. Why not solve the issues properly before the transplant? In this way, a lot of problems can be avoided or solved before legal transplantation takes place.

The experience of "moving a rule or a system of law from one country to another" has indicated that the transplanted laws usually cannot achieve the same results and fulfil the same aims in their society of adoption as in their society of origin. This is because the result caused by the law usually is limited to the specific time and place.

Moreover, transplanting laws which deal with citizens, marriage, family, property, assignment etc., will be extremely difficult, because those laws are based on a country's social values which vary from one country to another. Transplanting these laws would involve putting different social values together. In most cases conflicts exist between these different values, which make the implementation difficult.

However, transplanting laws which are dealing with nature relations, social management, maintenance of public security etc., might be easier and more successful. These laws usually come from national rules, and are an accumulation of social experience, for example, environmental protection law and technology law. Moreover, international conventions and international treaties can be transplanted easily, especially those that deal with international trade, because these international conventions and treaties are usually negotiated among many countries and meet their interests.

When transplanting laws, one country should not only make some choices according to its actual situation, but also create some corresponding systems to make sure that the transplanted laws can be implemented successfully. It will take some time to be able to assess the result of legal transplantation. The goals of legal transplantation set by the country of adoption should be reasonable, because there would be the same laws or institutions, implemented in the same way, but they could not possibly have the same domestic resources as the donor country. The transplanted laws usually cannot achieve the same results in the country of adoption as in the country of origin.

Therefore, legal transplantation is a massive systems engineering project; it is not simply transplanting a single law or institution, but also creating the circumstances and the legal framework to make sure that the transplanted law can perform successfully.

Moreover, a successful legal transplantation also sets certain requirements on an acceptor's social circumstance. Legal transplantation usually happens on a large-scale as social reform happens. Thus, if one country's social, economic and political situation has seen remarkable changes, and it is changed to have more enlightened social values, then it will inevitably accept legal transplantation more easily.99 In that case, those countries which have a market economy and democratic political systems will find it easier to transplant laws then those who do not.

[14] See He Qinhua, Fa de yizhi yu fa de bentuhua, China Legal Science. Vol. 3. at 90 (2002);

Legal culture, in other words how to deal with the relations between different legal cultures, is another factor. As an important part of national culture, legal culture is usually based on social values, local customs and national feelings.' When transplanting laws, we should not only have a comprehensive understanding of the legal culture of the country of origin, but also have a scientific appraisal of the compatibility between transplanted laws and local legal culture, after making a rational choice." 2 It is again those laws which deal with citizens, families and marriages that have close relations with domestic culture and are more difficult to be transplanted; those laws which have more technical elements and are commonly used in international trade, such as securities law, patent law and contract law are easier to be transplanted for these laws are less influenced by domestic culture.

Defining the word "culture" is the subject of debate in every language. However, culture:

„includes speech, knowledge, beliefs, customs, arts and technologies, ideals and rules. That, in short, is what we learn from other [persons], from our elders or the past, plus what we may add to it. ... Culture might be defined as all the activities and non-physiological products of human personalities that are not automatically reflex or instinctive"[15].

Cultural identity plays a significant role in individual identity and in personality formation. Although culture is inseparable from the existential and experiential state of persons, it is not uniform from one region of the world to another. In the doctrine, there is underlined the idea that „there is tremendous amounts of cultural variation around the world. This fact is important before analyzing the concept of „legal transplants" because it raises the possibility that the culture into which a law is transplanted will differ from the culture in which that law was created. Thus, the relationship between law and culture must be discussed when contemplating a study of legal transplants"[16]. Between law and culture there is a very close relationship, because the law must comport with the cultural context in which it is located in order to that law to be effective.

Thus, legal indigenization is a key point in a successful legal transplantation. It is believed that the law is a mirror of society and it reflects specific national histories, cultures and social values. The legal systems of any two countries cannot be possibly the same. Without legal indigenization, it is difficult to transplant a legal culture to another successfully. And in order to harmonize different legal cultures, it is necessary to pay attention to both external and internal legal cultures, particularly the internal legal culture. By harmonizing the internal legal culture, the external culture will be harmonized as well.

After more than twenty years from the first edition of his influential monograph on legal transplants, Alan Watson underlined in a law review article that "The act of borrowing is usually simple. To build up a theory of borrowing on the other hand, seems to be an extremely complex matter"[17].

Watson used the concept of "legal transplant" in the very narrow sense of the transfer of a legal rule from one jurisdiction to another, and did not seem to consider it necessary to acknowledge the strong determining role of culture of the "sending" or "receiving" society when assessing the fate of any such rule.

A Japanese jurist, Masaji Chiba, defines it in the wider sense of a "law transplanted by a people from a foreign culture". Very pertinently, Chiba includes the transfer of law through the migration of people from one place to another in his concept, specifically mentioning the immigration of people from the Korean peninsula in the 3rd century AD as having involved "probably the first transplantation of foreign law to Japan"[18].

But there is also negative opinions regarding the use of legal transplants. For example, Sir Otto Kahn-Freund considers that the use of foreign law as a model for domestic law "becomes an abuse only if it is informed by a legalistic spirit which ignores this context of the law"[19]. This idea is based on the observations of Montesquieu who stated that it is „un grand hazard" (a great coincidence) if the laws of one nation fit into the legal system of another one[20]. He concludes that "Montesquieu's pessimism has remained valid in all matters". Allan Watson, responding to Kahn-Freund argued that "Montesquieu badly – very badly – underestimated the amount of successful borrowing which had been going on, and was going on, in his day"[21]. The best argument is, according to Watson, the reception of Roman law in Western Europe.

It seems that Alan Watson may, at times, be right about the ease of legal transfers[22]. Some legal innovations work indeed like clever mechanical contraptions that the law reformer can pack into a suitcase and unpack where needed. For instance, the abolition of the death penalty. This proposition does not take its strength from the cleverness of experts but from a society's basic moral principles. One would assume that legal culture plays an important role in its acceptance or rejection. But while you need legislative approval to repeal the death penalty, you do not need public compliance. The hurdles to abolition lie in parliament, not among the people. Since renouncing the death penalty is a prerequisite for joining the European Union[23], Eastern European parliaments have been eager to comply with a reform requirement that at very little cost can signal their political maturity. Like their Western European role models, they have done so in the face of a strong public preference for retaining capital punishment[24]. But as in the case of electoral reform, the public, in this case, cannot avoid, bypass, or undercut by daily acts of disassociation and defiance a liberalization of which it does not approve. No administrator needs to worry about the hangman going it alone. With luck, the public may eventually come around to share the abolitionists' convictions, as it did in Germany. But it will not matter if that does not happen. In the case of self-executing law reforms, transplanting legal rules seems indeed, as Watson claims, "socially easy".

That means that transplants such as antitrust, bankruptcy, or money laundering laws do not arrive like bare-root plants in their new surroundings but come with at least a little bit of soil clinging to their roots that may help them grow. Take bankruptcy, for instance. Bankruptcy statutes do not deal only with the consequences of economic failure. They address many other questions (often implicitly relying on answers that a legal culture has provided elsewhere): questions about securing credit, concepts of property or contract, social fairness, and moral rights and wrongs. Like a tent fastened by the stakes that surround it on all sides, a bankruptcy scheme might begin to wobble if some of the stakes that uphold it break or are left ungrounded. That means that bankruptcy reforms cannot be designed in splendid isolation.

They are much more susceptible to being undermined by cultural dissonances than my "potted plants". Despite their "newness" to Eastern European citizens, bankruptcy or antitrust reforms still must mesh with the instincts and convictions that former Socialists carry over from their pasts.

That makes the choice of the model from which these law reforms are copied crucial to their success. Again, take bankruptcy. In times of fundamental economic change, the law might want to encourage new beginnings and reward entrepreneurial risk-taking that for so long had to lay dormant under Socialism. Thus, Eastern European countries might favour laws modelled after the American Bankruptcy Code of 1978, which is debtor-friendly and with its provisions on reorganization, consumer bankruptcy, and debt forgiveness, gives even ordinary citizens the chance to start anew after economic failure. The liberating aspects of America's bankruptcy model also appeal to Western Europeans: the new German Insolvency Law of 1994, which after much debate entered force in 1999, introduced reorganization and, for natural persons, a court-managed procedure for debt release, in the Federal Republic.

But the German example also shows how tricky it can be to establish reforms that clash with deeply held cultural convictions. Because, to Germans, debt forgiveness looks very much like moral capitulation, German creditors have been reluctant to contractually agree to cancel unpaid debts.

Moreover, the path to court-managed debt forgiveness for natural persons under the new German law is littered with substantive and procedural obstacles. Already in the first year of the new law's application, commentators were calling for "a reform of the reform".

Conclusions

So where does all this leave us? With some fairly banal and unreliable rules of thumb about the likely viability of legal transplants. Legal rules requiring no individual compliance are easily incorporated into foreign legal systems.

Reforms that carry with them their own surroundings ("potted plants") will do better, the more institutional support and personnel they have and the less dependent they are on local cooperation and approval. Law reforms that are inconsistent with deeply held moral and political beliefs may work if they only slightly affect convictions at the periphery of the local value system. But their success is doubtful if they contradict fundamental cultural gut reactions. The more complex and multilayered a particular environment, the greater the danger that legal imports will irritate local sensibilities. For this reason, procedural changes might be riskier than substantive reform because procedure is based on repetition, role-playing, and tradition ("we've always done it like this") and is saturated with unspoken assumptions and conditioned reflexes. Finally, law reform that corresponds to common habits and beliefs or that can connect with institutions and procedures that have performed reasonably well in the past-grounded change-seems much more promising than change that had to start from scratch.

It is actually very difficult to decide whether a legal transplant is a success or not.

In conclusion, the topic of legal transplantation will never be out of date. And we should always bear in mind that, as different countries exist with different levels of legal development, legal transplantation will always be unavoidable.

I have merely sketched some outlines of current legal debates concerning legal transplants. It remains vital for more research to be conducted. The study of legal transplants provides a vital critical supplement to mainstream theories about legal change.

However the doctrine considers that it is worthwhile continuing this intellectual and interdisciplinary endeavour[25].

CASES OF INDIRECT EXPROPRIATION IN INTERNATIONAL ECONOMIC LAW

LAURA-CRISTIANA SPĂTARU-NEGURĂ*

Abstract
Unforeseen difficulties arise along with the government measures whose object is not to expropriate or to nationalize the foreign investment, but to deprive the foreign investors of the rights attached to their investments. These measures are generally known as measures of indirect expropriation or nationalization. When asked about what falls into the concept of indirect expropriation, a simple answer can not be given easily, but the circumstances in which these measures may occur can be described and discussed. These measures could be grouped as follows: forced sale of property; forced sales of shares of an investment through a corporate vehicle; indigenization measures; taking control of investment management; determination of others to take physical property; failure to provide protection when there is interference with the foreign ownership; administrative decisions that cancel licenses and permits required for foreign businesses to operate in the host state; exorbitant taxation; the expulsion of the foreign investor contrary to the international law; harassment (e.g. freezing of the bank accounts).
This paper therefore argues that in practice there are many situations which may be analysed as measures of indirect expropriation.

Keywords: indirect expropriation, host state, taking, dispossession, foreign investor.*

Introduction

This paper argues that in practice there are many situations which may be analysed as measures of indirect expropriation; however, the law can provide a basis to answer the above mentioned question, but the circumstances leading to the question can scarcely be determined.

As a general principle, a state may do whatever it wants on its territory. Modern assertion of sovereignty in the economic sphere is also carried by the principles of economic self-determination and permanent sovereignty over natural resources. The right to control the economic affairs of the state is one of the rights that European countries have supported and exercised regularly. This is an inherent aspect of state sovereignty: to control all people, incidents and objects found on its territory. Due to the principle of states equality, there is no reason why the same right should be exercised by all States[1].

It is interesting that in the international economical law the minimum standard of international existence is being used. The content of this standard is difficult to identify in a concrete manner. In addition to the rule on compensation for expropriation and settlement of disputes through a court which is outside the state host, it appears that there are no further guidance on the content of this standard. It is said that the assessment of compensation by a foreign court, and the requirements that expropriation is discriminatory and for a public purpose under all the international minimum standard. Besides the rules regarding to compensation for expropriation advanced by developed countries, it seems that there are no other rules associated with the international minimum standard[2].

The right to property is a human right and this right must be respected also for foreigners, so, if his property is taken, he must be compensated. Major conventional sources of human rights such as the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights and the European Convention on Human Rights do not contain references to the right to property. Instead, the Protocol. no. 1 to the European Convention of Human Rights proclaims this right. However, the case law generated under the provisions on property rights does not recognize a right to property without reservation. Other human rights conventions recognize this right, but also the right of the state to interfere with the right to property when there is a public interest.

The treatment of foreign investment is defined as the set of principles and rules of international and national law governing the international investment, since its creation until its liquidation. Principles and rules of international law can be derived either from non-conventional sources and, in particular, from the general principles of international law or conventional sources, treaties and agreements, both multilateral and bilateral.

The national principles and rules are developed not by the investor's home state, but by the host state. These laws and regulations translate the host state policy choices regarding the international investors. These political choices vary from state to state depending on a number of considerations, in this case there are three types of legislations or regulations - legislation and regulations aiming a policy of incitement, control or deterrence, as underlines the famous professor Carreau[3].

Paper content

The transfers from the private sector to the public sector are becoming rare. The priority became the transfer from public sector to the private sector. In the 1960s and 1970s, the states from the South used expropriation and nationalization very often for the investments made by the Northern states and in the 1980s and 1990s privatizations were imposed, in the Northern and in the Southern states, as well as in the Western and in the Eastern states[4]. These transfers do not rise the same problems in international economic law.

Thus, there are transfers negotiated between the private transferor and the public transferee (there is no interest for them in the international economic law, because they are made through contractual operations, revealing at the same time microeconomics and micro-legal[5]) and forced transfers from the private sector to the public sector, towards which we turn our attention.

The generic term is taking[6], which we encounter frequently in the protection clauses of bilateral instruments. This term is not great because it implies that the private investor not to be deprived only of the right of possession. The measure of taking is depriving the investor of the investment essential rights for the benefit of the public authority, irrespective of how the taking was made and whether or not it would be consistent with the international law.

But within the category of measures of taking, there are some specific differences. First, expropriation and nationalization are the most important forms of dispossession. Expropriation and nationalization are acts of public power which cause the transfer of ownership from the private sector to the public sector, with some differences between the two notions. Expropriation results from an administrative measure, while nationalization arises from a legislative measure. Expropriation is made under judicial control, while nationalization is beyond any control. Asymmetry of these procedures is translated into economic and legal realities. Expropriation concerns individual property while nationalization concerns a collection of goods which are not necessarily individualized. Expropriation is to satisfy a need of general interest, but for a local scope, nationalization is to satisfy a need of general interest, but for a national scope.

Expropriation and nationalization should respect the principle of compensation. If this principle is respected, they are considered legitimate under international law, if not respected, they are considered illegal under international law. In other words, expropriation or nationalization which does not respect the principle of compensation would be distorted in relation to the qualification attached to it by its author. Thus, the respective measure of expropriation or nationalization would obtain the character of a spoliation[7].

Thirdly, seizure, within the meaning of many Western countries, has a special place in the category of generic measures of takings. Expropriation and nationalization are two different forms of public transfers, while the seizure is a penalty, it punishes individual behavior, considered reprehensible by the law. Thus, it can be stated that seizure punishes economic crimes. By definition, it excludes granting of any compensation.

Unforeseen difficulties arise with the governmental measures whose purpose is not to expropriate or to nationalize the foreign investment, but to deprive investors of rights attached to their investments. Some international instruments mention in different terms these measures (sometimes these differences are significant) in order to subjugate them to the same principles and rules of expropriation or nationalization measures.

These measures generally known as indirect measures of expropriation or nationalization are not new. The Permanent Court of International Justice (PCJI) and the International Court of Justice (ICJ) have ruled on the government interference threshold that would have been taken as indirect expropriation or nationalization - PCJI: the case concerning the Factory at Chorzów (1926), the case of Oscar Chinnor (1934) and ICJ: the Barcelona Traction case (1970). The same guidelines are found in Starrett[8] and Tippetts[9] cases of the famous Iran-U.S. Claims Tribunal.

Therefore, we can state that the concept of indirect measures is not new. But what is new is the context in which these indirect measures are taken. If in the past, it was about individual actions, in the present it is about non discriminatory general measures taken for a public interest, such as environmental protection.

Defining indirect takings becomes difficult because there are diverse ways of affecting property interests. These types of taking have been identified as "disguised expropriation", to indicate that they are not visibly recognisable as expropriations or as "creeping expropriations"[10], to indicate that they bring about the slow and insidious strangulation of the interests of the foreign investor. In Middle East Cement Shipping and Handling Co. v. Egypt[11], indirect expropriation was described as "measures taken by a state the effect of which is to deprive the investor of the use and benefit of his investment even though he may retain nominal ownership of the respective rights".

Creeping expropriation may be more appropriate to denote the slow and progressive measures adopted to initiate attrition of ownership and control rights. See Tecmed v. Mexico (2006) 10 ICSID Reports 54, para. 114, which emphasises that such expropriation takes place "gradually and stealthily";

[11] ICSID Case No. ARB/99/6 (2002), para. 107. The sentence goes on to equate creeping expropriation with the phrase "tantamount to a taking", in investment treaties;

Moreover, the awards of the Iran–US Claims Tribunal have been a fruitful source for identifying such types of taking. The Tribunal dealt with types of taking that took place in the context of a revolutionary upheaval following the overthrow of the Shah of Iran, and the propositions the Tribunal formulated may not have relevance outside the context of the events that attended that upheaval.

The assimilation of indirect expropriation to direct expropriation is seen as crucial, as it builds a platform for an analysis of the remedies that are to be provided[12].

As mentioned above, the types of indirect taking that could amount to expropriation (involving also conduct by the state) have been identified in the doctrine[13] and in arbitral awards. Unless the conduct of those committing the acts is directly attributable to the state, the taking cannot involve state responsibility.

Professor Sornarajah has done an impresive work by grouping these different types of taking as follows:

1) forced sales of property;
2) forced sales of shares in an investment through a corporate vehicle;
3) indigenisation measures;
4) taking over management control of the investment;
5) inducing others to take over the property physically;
6) failure to provide protection when there is interference with the property of the foreign investor;
7) administrative decisions which cancel licences and permits necessary for the foreign business to function within the state;
8) exorbitant taxation;
9) expulsion of the foreign investor contrary to international law; and
10) acts of harassment such as the freezing of bank accounts.

Using the information obtained from professor Sornarajah, we will discuss point by point the above mentioned types of indirect takings.

1) Forced sales of property

From the beginning, we should cross a line between forced sales of the foreign investment which are brought about by civil unrest or economic downturns and those brought about by a state policy such as the indigenisation of the economy. A state cannot be held responsible for such conduct on the part of the foreign investor, unless it has taken measures that affect the investment. But, if the unrest is engineered by the host state and the violence is directed at the foreign investors for the specific purpose of ensuring that they leave the host state, clearly there is a situation that involves a taking. Where the foreign investor abandons the property or makes a quick sale of the property in these circumstances, there is no voluntary conduct on his part. The conduct is induced by the state. State responsibility could therefore arise in such a situation[14].

Moreover, where there is racial discrimination that motivates conduct, this gives rise to a separate head of liability.

[12] In Biloune v. Ghana Investment Board (1993) 95 ILR 184, para. 75, the tribunal held that no distinction should be drawn between direct and creeping expropriation. The decision was followed in Metalclad v. Mexico (2000) 5 ICSID Reports 209; (2001) 40;

[13] Sornarajah M., The International Law on Foreign Investment, Third edition, Cambridge University Press, New York, 2010, pag. 375;

[14] There could also be an argument that the duty to give full protection and security to the investment is violated;

Also, some modern investment treaties protect the foreign investor against abuse of the process of liquidation[15]. The protection usually appears in the treatment provision of the treaty. There must be a demonstration that the ordinary process of justice attended the liquidation process and that there was nothing that could be seen as a denial of justice. The mere fact that there is a court-ordered liquidation may not provide legitimacy to the taking. The court may be used as an instrument to effect the taking, in which case, clearly, the liquidation could amount to a taking depending on the circumstances[16].

2) Forced sales of shares in an investment through a corporate vehicle

The question whether there could be diplomatic protection and state responsibility where wholly foreign-owned companies incorporated in the host state are taken over has been debated in international law. Such companies, incorporated in the host state, have personality only under the law of the host state and are corporate nationals of the host state. Many bilateral treaties now contain provisions which contemplate the protection of shareholders. Shareholder protection becomes important because of the requirement found in host state laws that entry by the foreign investor be made through an incorporated joint venture company formed in association with a local entrepreneur or state company. The foreign partner will usually be only a shareholder of such a company, and the protection of his investment in the company would be on the basis that he is a shareholder. The foreign investor or his home state will ordinarily have no standing to protect the company or its assets. The only way in which the investment could be protected through international law mechanisms is to confer treaty protection upon the shareholding of the foreign investor. The effect of this would be that, even where the management of the company is taken over as a result of state interference but shareholdings are kept intact, there will be no taking in respect of which the foreign shareholder can invoke protection. This will not be an acceptable result from the point of view of the foreign investor for the profits of the company may diminish considerably in the absence of a vigorous management. It is quite possible that the treaty is widely worded so as to include the right to management and control within the definition of an investment, provided the shareholdings were such as to create management rights in the foreign investor. In any event, investment treaties usually cover contractual rights. This would be so where the foreign investor had made entry through a corporate joint venture. The joint venture contract should have provided for such management and control rights, in which case they will become protected. Another factor to note is that the shareholder protection that has evolved through treaties should not be taken to include portfolio investments. However, there are treaties which provide for the protection of portfolio investments.

On the other hand, since many privatisation measures do not restrict shareholdings by foreigners, there are likely to be many foreign investors who have bought shares in foreign privatised public companies. Thus, renationalisations can be expected to be effected through forced sales on the local stock markets on which the real value of the shares cannot be raised for the obvious reason that the sales will be confined to the local investors and there will be a flood of the shares on the stock exchange. The question will arise as to whether such forced sales amount to takings or whether the situation is akin to one of interference with portfolio investments, in which case the shareholders will have to bear the risk of loss or seek remedies provided by the local law. The buying of shares during privatisation is more akin to the making of a portfolio investment and the answer, resulting from the analogy, may be that there would be no taking by the state in these circumstances. But, the Argentinian cases suggest that, even if there may be expropriation involved, there could be liability for violation of treatment standards.

[15] Thus, the ASEAN Investment Treaty (1987) states that: „Each contracting party shall, within its territory, ensure full protection of the investments made in accordance with its legislation by investors of the other Contracting Parties and shall not impair by unjustified or discriminatory measures the management, maintenance, use, enjoyment, extension, disposition or liquidation of such investments" (Article IV(1));

[16] In Yaung Chi Oo Ltd v. Myanmar (2003) 42 ILM 540; (2003) 8 ICSID Reports 463, the claimant argued that the liquidation proceedings before the Myanmar courts were themselves an act of taking. But, the tribunal did not find on this;

3) Indigenisation measures

What do indigenisation measures involve? Well, they involve a progressive transfer of ownership from foreign interests into the hands of local citizenry (therefore, there is no vesting of any property in the hands of the state or a state organ, there is no direct or even indirect enrichment of the government as a result of such measures). This kind of measures were undertaken in many Asian and African countries after independence in order to ensure that the termination of political control also meant the termination of economic control and the passing of such control into the hands of local entrepreneurs. Another possibility is that the foreign investor may remain in control of his venture and his control because the local entrepreneurs may lack the skill to run the business as efficiently at least in the initial stages. When, eventually, the local shareholders displace the foreign managers, the displacement will take place in accordance with the corporate laws of the host state and not through any government fiat. Yet, the transfer of the ownership is involuntary and the timing of the transfer of the shares in the venture owned by the foreigner is not left to him. As a result, he may not be able to secure the optimumprice for his shares. There is no doubt that there is a resemblance to forced sales in indigenisation measures. However, foreign investors were content to accept it rather than face a protracted dispute with the host state. They reckoned that they would come out losers in the dispute and prejudice their continued business prospects in the host state. The maintenance of links with the host state was a much prized asset which multinational corporations did not want to lose.

Ethnicity has a role to play in government measures which seek to restructure companies on the basis of their racial compositions so as to achieve a measure of economic equity. In Malaysia, the bumiputra policy was intended to ensure this, and companies had to restructure in accordance with specified ethnic quotas as to shareholdings by each of the races in Malaysia, and foreigners were restricted to a percentage of the shareholdings.

Divestment measures which do not benefit the state directly will not amount to an expropriation.

4) The exercise of management control over the investment

Interference by the state to take over management and control of the foreign investor's affairs is prima facie a taking by the state which should be compensated. The foreign shareholder is entitled to such control and management of his investment or property as he pleases, subject to the general laws of the host state. The extent of this exception that the regulatory laws of the host state have a role to play in the determination of the rights of the foreign investor generates considerable problems. The exception may be wide enough, if some views are accepted, to undermine the general rule altogether. The exception flows from the fact that the host state has interests to safeguard as far as the operation of the investment is concerned.

In the ELSI Case, when the foreign company contemplated the dismissal of a part of its workforce, there was widespread industrial action. The state had an obvious interest in ensuring that the dismissals did not lead to unemployment in an already economically depressed part of the country. Bankruptcy proceedings that were later instituted prevented the management from conducting an orderly liquidation of the company, which may have enabled the foreign company to realise a greater value for its assets. Interference in these circumstances in the management and control of the company by the host state was held to be justifiable. The state had a compelling interest in ensuring that the impact on its economy of the failure of the company was reduced or eliminated. The steps it takes to achieve this objective cannot be considered to be such an interference with the foreign investor's management rights as to amount to a compensable taking. Again, a regulatory interference was involved, and the approach of the International Court of Justice was not to second-guess whether the interference was necessary.

5) Takings by agents and mobs

The rule is that, where there is destruction of property during civil strife or an insurgency, the state is liable for the destruction if it failed in its duty to protect the property of the foreign investor. It follows that, if there is active participation or instigation of the persons causing the damage by the state or its agents, then responsibility for the damage will arise. It is also clear that there must be a definite link between the perpetrators of the damage and the state or some attributability of the damage to the state through a theory of negligence. These rules have been established through many arbitral awards. They have also been stated in the Draft Code of the International Law Commission on State Responsibility. The Iran–US Claims Tribunal dealt on several occasions with the situation where property was taken or destroyed by mobs. In all these situations, the essential element was the establishment of the link between the revolutionary gangs and the new government which emerged. In the early stages of the revolution, there were several gangs with which the emerging government did not have any links whatever. The Tribunal refused to hold Iran liable for the activities of these gangs. But, when the revolution took hold, groups emerged with links to and authority from the state. Iran was held liable for the acts of these groups.

Where the armed forces of a state are involved in a taking of property, the attribution of the act to the state is clear. In Amco v. Indonesia, the taking was effected by the army, but the tribunal held that there was no attributability, as the army was acting in order to further the interests of its own pension fund. In AAPL v. Sri Lanka, there was destruction of property by the army during hostilities. Liability was based on the state's failure to protect the property. In Wena Hotels v. Egypt, there was interference by the army.

Therefore, where the army is involved, the attributability of the act of taking to the state is easier to establish.

6) Interference with property rights

There has been a general tendency in the international protection of alien property to transfer domestic norms of property protection into the international sphere. The view that only an outright takeover of physical assets amounts to expropriation by a state no longer holds.

Whereas stress on the physical nature of property was sufficient to protect ownership in times when there was a laissez-faire philosophy, the coming of the welfare state meant an increase in the nature and frequency of state interference with the ownership of property by individuals. Interference with the exercise of property or ownership rights by the host state could amount to takings which require compensation. Once the jurisprudential fact that ownership itself involves a bundle of intangible rights in relation to property is acknowledged, then it follows that it is not only the outright taking of the whole bundle of rights but also the restriction of the use of any part of the bundle that amounts to a taking under the law. It is necessary to understand the course of developments relating to the concept of property in the municipal systems, in particular of the United States, as the leading capital-exporting states will contend for the transference of the system of property protection in their domestic sphere into the international sphere. There is evidence of such transference in the past.

7) Cancellation of permits and licences

The cancellation of permits and licences involves a regulatory taking, and has been dealt with above in that context. But, where such cancellations are made without due process, are discriminatory and violate commitments made regarding their issuance and validity, their subsequent withdrawal could amount to a compensable taking. Where licences and permits are necessary to operate in certain sectors of the economy and these licences are withdrawn, the foreign investor's ability to conduct his business will be adversely affected. It could be argued that such measures involve a taking even if they do not affect the ability of the foreign investor to continue with the business or in any way affect the ownership of the property of the foreign investor. In modern investment treaties, such licences are protected, as they fall within the definition of investments.

Where the privilege is revoked, the state is not benefited in any sense. Hence, it would be difficult to say that there had been a taking by the state in situations where there is a revocation of a licence. However, the foreign investor may have to relinquish his business as a result of such a termination and the assets of the business may then vest in some state entity. This will be so where the state entity is a partner in the venture with the foreign investor. In the alternative, it may have to be sold for a lower price than would otherwise have been the case. In the administrative law systems in the common law world, there is generally no review permitted for the revocation of licences, as they are privileges the conferment of which is entirely at the discretion of the state. There are many awards of arbitral tribunals and claims commissions which have asserted that the withdrawal of licences or the imposition of controls do not amount to the taking of property.

But, the law stated in these older cases must be reviewed in light of new developments. The law is increasingly coming to accept that such a withdrawal must not be lightly done without warnings to the licensee to desist from the offending behaviour or to fulfil conditions attached to the licence. It must be preceded by an opportunity for the licensee to explain why the licence should not be withdrawn. The withdrawal of a licence may be considered a regulatory act, particularly where the conditions attached to the licence have not been satisfied. But, the substantive right is subject to procedural regularity. The proper exercise of the substantive right of revocation for non-satisfaction of the condition is not compensable, as it is a regulatory act. But, if it is done without procedural regularity, that irregularity gives rise to the duty to pay compensation. Cancellation of licences on environmental grounds will become more frequent with the increasing concern for the protection of the environment. Such cancellations will often put an end to the foreign investment. They will usually not amount to compensable takings.

In Murphyores Ltd v. The Commonwealth, a concession had been given to two US companies for sand-mining on Fraser Island, close to the Great Barrier Reef. The minerals did not have a local market. They had to be exported. An environmental study found that the sand-mining was harmful to the Great Barrier Reef. The Australian government refused to grant export licences for the export of the minerals. This effectively terminated the operations of the companies. The Australian High Court rejected the claims of the two companies for compensation on the basis that no compensable taking was involved. The Australian government also resisted efforts on the part of the home state of the foreign investor to ensure that compensation be paid to the foreign investor.

Recent awards have emphasised the need for due process safeguards prior to the cancellation of licences and have deemed cancellations without due process as violations of treatment standards as well as of the expropriation provisions[17].

[17] In addition to Biloune v. Ghana Investment Board (1993) 95 ILR 184; and Metalclad v. Mexico (2000) 5 ICSID Reports 209 (2001) 40 ILM 55, see Middle East Cement Shipping and Handling Co. v. Egypt, ICSID Case No. ARB/99/6 (12 April 2002), para. 143; Lauder v. Czech Republic, UNCITRAL Arbitration Proceedings (Final Award, 3 September 2001); CME v. Czech Republic, UNCITRAL Arbitration Proceedings (Award, 14 March 2003) (both decisions are available on the website of the Department of Finance of the Czech government); and Goetz v. Burundi (1999) 15 ICSID Rev 457; (2001) 26 YCA 24. The creeping of administrative law theory into the area is evidenced by these awards. From such awards, it is possible to launch into the whole array of administrative law notions such as legitimate expectations, which has been done in cases like ADF v. United;

8) Excessive taxation

As indicated earlier, taxation is within the sovereign power of a state. There is no rule in international law limiting the power of a state to impose taxes within its territory. But, "excessive and repetitive tax" measures have a confiscatory effect and could amount to indirect expropriation[18]. A uniform increase in taxation cannot by itself have such an effect. But, where a foreign investment is singled out and subjected to heavy taxation, a clear situation of expropriation can be made out. Such a result may not follow where sufficient justification for such taxation exists. The taxing of windfall profits (i.e. profits which arise without any act on the part of the investor) cannot amount to a taking. Thus, taxation of the oil industry for windfall profits due to price hikes cannot amount to a taking[19]. Where the situation of excessive taxation is dealt with in investment treaties, the mechanism used is joint consultation between the parties to determine whether the excessive tax should be imposed. Except in certain obvious circumstances, it is unlikely that a charge of unfair taxation would succeed. Many investment treaties deal with taxation separately, requiring that allegations of unfair taxation be dealt with through consultation between the two treaty partners. This removes the area from the scope of the taking provision in the treaty.

9) Expulsion of the foreign investor

The expulsion of the foreign investor will amount to a taking if the purpose of the expulsion is the taking of his property. But, where national security or other sufficient grounds exist for the expulsion, this will be different. Objectively reasonable factors for the expulsion must exist if it were to be justifiable on national security grounds. A tribunal which has jurisdiction over the taking on the basis that it is a violation of a foreign investment agreement does not have jurisdiction to pronounce on the human rights issues involved in the taking. This is a sensible idea, for a tribunal which deals with commercial matters is not justified in pronouncing upon disputes that are not commercial in nature.

10) Freezing of bank accounts

The freezing of the bank accounts of a foreign investor could amount to a taking of property in certain circumstances. Where bank accounts are frozen on the ground that it is necessary to do so in order to investigate a crime or a violation of banking regulations, the interference could be justified. But, where it is done in the process of an expropriation of the property of the foreign investor and as a part of a plan to deny him all his property rights, there is a strong case for the view that the freezing of the accounts amounts to a taking.

Having all that in mind, we underline that the taking of foreign property by a state is prima facie lawful. Such legality is, however, subject to conditions. The taking of foreign property will be lawful only if such taking was for a public purpose and is not discriminatory (a racially discriminatory taking is unlawful in international law). The principle against racial discrimination is an ius cogens principle of international law. It is odious to international law that nationalisation or any act of state should be based on considerations of race. But, please note that a postcolonial nationalisation which is designed to end the economic domination of the nationals of the former colonial power is exempted from this general rule. Here, nationalisation would be directed at the citizens of a distinct state identifiable by race for the obvious reason that they alone are in control of the economic sectors of the nationalising state. A German court accepted the existence of this exception when considering the legality of the Indonesian nationalisations. It rejected the argument that the nationalisation measures were illegal as they were directed only against Dutch nationals. The court emphasised the fact that the Dutch were the colonial rulers of Indonesia and that they had control over the Indonesian economy.

[18] World Bank, Report and Guidelines (1992) 31 ILM 1375;

[19] See, for the US, Crude Oil Windfall Tax (United States Crude Oil ProfitWindfall Tax Act, 1980, PL 96–223), upheld in United States v. Ptasynki, 462 US 74 (1983);

We should bare in mind that there is a duty in international law to pay compensation for the taking of alien property. Non-payment affects legality. Moreover, where a taking is done in violation of a treaty, the taking will be considered illegal. The Chorzow Factory case concerned a taking in violation of a treaty. The view of the Permanent Court of International Justice was that, in circumstances of takings in violation of treaties, restitution was the proper remedy for the international wrong.

Conclusions

Though the law recognised that there could be takings of alien property other than through direct means, the indirect methods of taking have not been identified with any certainty either in arbitral decisions or in the literature. It is unlikely that this deficiency of the law will be cured. The law on alien takings, especially the law on state responsibility arising from such takings, was developed at a time when the state rarely interfered with the marketplace, and interference was effected for rather crude purposes such as the self-aggrandisement of ruling elites. It was easy to identify and stigmatise such takings as unlawful. Investment protection was facilitated by the uniform application of this rule to all types of taking. But, with increasing state intervention in the economy, the maintenance of this rule became unacceptable.

The increasing tendency among both developed and developing countries to control foreign investments, albeit through different types of regulatory structures, will keep this issue in the forefront of the law in this area. As indicated, this issue has replaced the theory of internationalisation of foreign investment contracts and the debate on compensation as the central issue in the area of expropriation of foreign investments. But, it is an issue that involves interests that are so inconsistent that the challenge of reconciling them would prove difficult.

So we must ask what the foreign investor who wishes to understand the law on protection against expropriation should do? How can a foreign investor know if the host's state conduct affecting the investment is compensated? How can a foreign investor know whether the host's state conduct affecting the investment is compensable? Since the law is indeed in a state of flux, the best answer to the question when, how or at what point the valid regulation becomes, in fact and effectively an expropriation? should be we will recognize it when we will see it. However, the law may provide a basis to answer the question, but the circumstances which determine the question remain crucial for the determination. It is obvious that some governmental actions, in some cases, almost always, will give rise to indirect expropriation finding cases, and therefore to compensation. Other measures, will not. Between the two categories will be the "very brief and hard" are about which the famous professor Dolzer was speaking, still full of gaps.

DELIMITATION OF THE DISCRETIONARY POWER FROM THE POWER EXCESS IN THE ACTIVITY OF THE STATE'S AUTHORITIES

MARIUS ANDREESCU[*]

Abstract

A problem of essence of the lawful state is to delimitate the discretionary power and respectively, the abuse of right in the state's institutions activities. The legal behavior of the state institutions is being materialized by their right of appreciation, and the power excess yields in the violation of a subjective right or a legitimate interest of the citizen. The application and observance of the lawfulness principle in the activity of the state authorities is a complex problem because the exercise of the state's functions assumes the discretionary power with which the state's organs are invested with, or otherwise said the 'right of appreciation'' of the state's authorities regarding the moment of adopting and the contents of the disposed measures. The discretionary power cannot be opposed to the lawfulness principle, as a dimension of the lawful state.

In this study we propose ourselves to analyze the discretionary power concepts and respectively, the excess of power, having as landmark the legislation, jurisprudence and the doctrine in the matter. At the same time, we wish to identify the most important criterions that will allow the practitioner, no matter whether he / she is an administrator, a public clerk or a judge, to delimit the legal behavior of the state's institutions from the power excess. In this regard, we appreciate that the principle of proportionality represents such a criterion.

We consider that the law courts, by applying the principle of Constitution's supremacy, can censor some juridical acts contrary to the constitutional norms, if the Lawmaker does not foresee the competence of the Constitutional Court in this matter. In our opinion, all law courts, within the limits of the competence granted by law, can control and censor the juridical acts of some public authorities issued by power excess. In order to demonstrate these assertions some theoretical and juridical practice arguments are being brought.

Keywords: The discretionary power excess, the abuse of right public authorities, principle of proportionality, fundamental rights and liabilities, general control for respecting the constitution supremacy.

I. Introduction

The applying and observance of the principle of lawfulness in the activity of state's authorities is a complex problem because the exercise of the state's powers implies also the discretionary power with which the state's bodies are invested, or otherwise said the right of appreciation of the authorities regarding the adopting moment and the contents of the disposed measures. What it is important to underline is the fact that the discretionary power cannot be opposed to the principle of lawfulness, as a dimension of the rightful state.

In our opinion, the lawfulness represents a particular aspect of the legitimacy of the juridical acts of the public authorities. Thus, a legitimate juridical act is a legal juridical act, issued outside the appreciation margin recognized by the public authorities, that does not generate unjustified discriminations, privileges or restraints of the subjective rights and is adequate to the situation in fact, which is determined by the purpose of the law. The legitimacy makes distinction between the discretionary power recognized by the state's authorities, and on the other side, the power excess.

Not all the juridical acts that fulfill the conditions of lawfulness are also legitimate. A juridical act that respects the formal conditions of lawfulness, but which generates discriminations or privileges or unjustified restrained to the exercising of the subjective rights or is not adequate to the situation in fact or to the purpose aimed by the law, is an un-legitimate juridical act. The legitimacy, as a feature of the juridical acts of the public administration authorities should be understood and applied in relation to the principle of supremacy of Constitution.

II. Paper content

Antonie Iorgovan asserted that a problem of essence of the rightful state is that of answering to the question: "where ends the discretionary power and where begins the law abuse, where ends the legal behavior of the administration, materialized by its right of appreciation and where begins the subjective law or the legitimate interest of the citizen? "[1]

Approaching the same problem, Leon Duguit in 1900 makes an interesting distinction between the "normal powers and the exceptional powers" conferred to the administration by the constitution and the laws, and on the other side the situations in which the state's authorities act outside the normative framework. The last situations are split into three categories by the author: 1) the power excess (when the state authorities exceed the limits of the legal mandates; 2) the embezzlement of the power (when the state's authority fulfils an act that enters its competence aiming a different scope, other than the one the law stipulated), 3) the power abuse (when the state's authorities act outside their competence, but through acts that don't have a juridical character)[2].

In the administrative doctrine, that studies mainly the problematic of the discretionary power, it was underlined that the opportunity of the administrative acts cannot be opposed to their lawfulness, and the conditions of lawfulness can be split in general lawfulness conditions and respectively in lawfulness specific conditions on opportunity criterions[3]. As a consequence, the lawfulness is the corollary of the conditions of validity, and the opportunity is a requirement (a dimension) of the lawfulness.[4] Nevertheless, the right of appreciation is not recognized by the authorities of the state in the exercising of all duties they have. One must remember the difference between the linked competence of the state's authorities that exists when the law imposes them a certain strict decisional behavior, and on the other side the discretionary competence, situation in which the state authorities can choose between more decisions, within law limits and its competences. To remember the definition proposed in the literature in specialty to the discretionary power: "it is the margin of liberty that is let to the free appreciation of the authorities, so that in view of fulfilling the purpose indicated by the law maker, to use any means of action within its limits of competence."[5]

Yet the problematic of the discretionary power is studied mainly in the administrative law, the right for the appreciation in the exercise of some duties represents a reality met in the activity of all state's authorities.[6] The Parliament, as a supreme representative organ and with a unique law making authority, disposes of the largest limits in order to show its discretionary power, which is identified by the characterization of the legislative act. The discretionary power exists in the activity of the law courts. The judge is obliged to decide only when it is noticed for, within this notification limit. Beyond these it is manifested the sovereign right of appreciating the facts, the right to interpret the law, the right to fix a minimum punishment or a maximum one, to grant or not extenuating circumstances, to establish the quantum of the compensations etc. The exercising of such competences means nothing else but the discretionary power.

[6] In the doctrine, Jellinek and Fleiner sustained the thesis according to which the discretionary power is not specific only to the administrative function, but also it appears in the activity of the other functions of the state, under the form of a liberty of appreciation upon the content, on the opportunity and the extent of the juridical act. (see Dana Apostol Tofan, quoted works. p. 26)

Exceeding the limits of the discretionary power signifies the violation of the principle of lawfulness and of legitimacy or, of what in legislation, doctrine or jurisprudence is named to be the "excess of power".

The power excess in the activity of state's organs is equivalent with the law abuse because it signifies the exercising of the legal competences without the existence of a reasonable motivation or without the existence of an adequate relation between the disposed measures, the situation in fact and the legitimate purpose aimed at.

The law of the Romanian administrative prosecution[7] uses the concept of "power excess of the administrative authorities" which is defined to be the "exercising of the right of appreciation belonging to the public administration, by the violation of the fundamental rights and liberties of the citizens stipulated by the Constitution or by the law" (item 2, paragraph 1, letter m). For the first time the Romanian law maker uses and defines the concept of power excess and at the same time acknowledges the competence of the administrative prosecution instances to sanction the exceeding of the discretionary power limits throughout the administrative acts.

The exceptional situations represent a particular case in which the Romanian authorities, and mainly the administrative ones, can exercise the discretionary power, obviously existing the danger of the power excess.

Certainly, the power excess is not a phenomenon that manifests itself only in the practice of the executive organs it can be seen in the Parliament activity or in the activity of the law courts.

We appreciate that the discretionary power acknowledged by the state's authorities is exceeded, and the measures disposed represent a power excess, anytime it is ascertained the existence of the following situations:

1. The measures disposed do not aim to a legitimate purpose;
2. The decisions of the public authorities are not adequate to the situation in fact or to the legitimate purpose aimed, in the meaning that everything that is needed in order to reach the aimed purpose, is exceeded;
3. There is no rational justification of the measures disposed, included the situations in which it is established a juridical treatment that is different for identical situations, or a juridical treatment identical for different situations;
4. By the measures disposed the state's authorities limit the exercise of some fundamental rights and liberties, without the existence of a rational justification that would represent, mainly, the existence of an adequate relationship between those measures, the situation in fact and the legitimate purpose aimed at.

The essential problem remains that for the identification of criterions through which are to be established the limits of the discretionary power of state's authorities and to differentiate them from the power excess, that should be sanctioned. Of course there is the problem of using some criterions in the practice of the law courts or in the constitutional prosecution.

In connection to these aspects, in the literature in specialty it is expressed the opinion according to which the "purpose of the law will be then the legal limit of the right to appreciate (the opportunity). Therefore the discretionary power does not mean a liberty outside the law but one allowed by the law."[8]

Of course, "the purpose of the law" represents a condition of lawfulness or, as the case may be, of constitutionality of the juridical acts of the state bodies and that's why it can be considered as a criterion to delimit the discretionary power from the power excess.

Such as results from the jurisprudence of some national and international law courts, in relation to our search topic, the purpose of the law cannot be the only criterion to delimit the discretionary power (synonymous with the margin of appreciation, term used by C.E.D.O.), because a juridical act of the state can represent a power excess not only in the situation in which the measures adopted do not aim to a legitimate purpose, but also in the hypothesis in which the measures disposed are not adequate to the purpose of the law and are not necessary in relation to the situation in fact and with the legitimate purpose aimed at.

The suitability of the measures disposed by the state authorities to the aimed legitimate purposes represents a particular aspect of the principle of proportionality. Significant is the opinion expressed by Antonie Iorgovan which considers that the limits of the discretionary power are established by the: "written positive rules, the general law principles subscribed, the principle of equality, the principle of non retroactivity of the administrative acts, the right to defense and the principle of contradictoriality , the principle of proportionality" (s.n.).[9]

Therefore, the principle of proportionality is an essential criterion that allows the delimiting of the discretionary power from the power excess in the activity of state's authorities.

This principle is consecrated explicitly and implicitly in the international[10] juridical instruments or by the majority of the constitutions of the democratic[11] countries. Romania's Constitution regulates explicitly this principle in item 53, but there are other constitutional dispositions that imply it.

In the constitutional law, the principle of proportionality finds its use mainly in the field of protection of human fundamental rights and liberties. It is considered as an efficient criterion of appreciation of legitimacy of the interventions of the state authorities in a situation limiting the exercise of some rights.

Much more, even if the principle of proportionality is not consecrated expressly in the constitution of a state, the doctrine and jurisprudence considers it as being a part of the notion of a rightful state[12].

This principle is applied in many branches of the law. Thus, in the administrative law it is a limit of the discretionary[13] power of the public authorities and represents a criterion in the exercising the jurisdictional control of the discretionary administrative acts. Applications of the principle of proportionality exist in the criminal law[14] or in the civil law[15].

The principle of proportionality is found also in the community law, in the meaning that the lawfulness of the community rules is subject to the condition that the means used to be adequate to the aimed objective and not to exceed what it is necessary to reach this objective.

[14] The provisions of item 72 of the Criminal Code refer to the proportionality as a general criterion of judicial individualization of the punishments or the provisions of item 44, paragraph 3 of the Criminal Code considers the proportionality as a condition of legitimate defense.

[15] The provisions of items 951 and 1157 of the Civil Code, allow the cancellation of a contract for the obvious disproportion of the service conscriptions (lesion).

The jurisprudence has an important role in the analysis of the principle of proportionality, applied in concrete cases. Thus, in the jurisprudence of the European Court of the Human Rights, the proportionality is conceived as a just, equitable ratio, between the situation in fact, the restraining means of the exercise of some rights and the aimed legitimate purpose, or as an equitable ratio between the individual interest and the public interest. The proportionality is a criterion that determines the legitimacy of state interference of the contracting states in the exercising of the rights protected by the Convention.

In the same meaning, the Constitutional Court of Romania, by several decisions established that the proportionality is a constitutional principle[16]. Our constitutional instance asserted the necessity to establish some objective criterions, by the law, for the principle of proportionality: "it is necessary that the legislative institutes objective criterions that should reflect the exigencies of the principle of proportionality" [17].

Therefore, the principle of proportionality is imposed more and more as a universal principle consecrated by the majority of the contemporary law systems, to be found explicitly or implicitly in constitutional norms and acknowledged by the national and international jurisdictions[18].

In the literature in specialty were identified three jurisdictional levels of the administrative acts: "a) the minimum control of the procedure rules (form); b) normal control of the juridical appreciation of the facts; c) the maximal control, when the judge asserts upon the necessity and proportionality of the administrative measures".[19]

The maximal control, to which the quoted author refers to, represents the correlation between the legality and the opportunity, otherwise said, between the exigencies of the principle of lawfulness and the right of appreciation of the public authorities, the proportionality couldn't be considered as a super legality criterion, but as a principle of law, whose main finality is to represent the delimiting between the discretionary power and the power excess in the activity of the public authorities.

There are situations in which the Constitutional Court used a "proportionality reasoning" as an instrument for the interpretation of the correlation between the legal contested dispositions and on the other side the constitutional dispositions, and in situations in which the proportionality, as a principle, is not explicitly expressed by the constitutional texts. Self evident in this meaning are two aspects: invoking in the Constitutional Court's jurisprudence of C.E.D.O. jurisprudence, which, in the matter of restraining the exercise of some rights, analyzes also the proportionality conditions, and the second aspect, the use of such a principle in situations in which it is raised the question of respecting the principle of equality.

Declaring as non constitutional a normative disposition on the ground of non observance of the principle of proportionality, applied in this matter, signifies in essence the sanctioning of the power excess, manifested in the activity of the Parliament or of the Government. Also excess of power, sanctioned by the Constitutional Court, using the criterion of proportionality, are the situations in which the principle of equality and non discrimination are violated, if by the law or by the Government ordinance it is applied a differentiated treatment to equal cases, without the existence of a reasonable justification or if exists a disproportion between the aimed purpose and the means used.

III. Conclusions

There are two most important finalities of the constitutional principle of proportionality: the control and the limiting of the discretionary power of the public authorities and respectively the granting of the fundamental rights and liberties in situations in which their exercising could be conditioned or restricted.

The proportionality is a constitutional principle, but in several cases there is no explicit normative consecration, the principle being deducted by different methods of interpretation from the normative texts. This situation creates some difficulties in the application of the principle of proportionality.

In relation to these considerations we propose that in the perspective of a reviewing of Romania's Constitution, that at item 1 having as a side denomination "Romanian state" to be added a new paragraph that will stipulate that :"the exercising of the state power must be proportional and non discriminatory".

In such a manner many of requirements have been answered:

a) The proportionality is consecrated expressly as a general constitutional principle and not only with a restrained application in case of restraining of the exercise of fundamental rights and liberties, such as it may be considered presently, when having into consideration the provisions of item 53 in the Constitution:

b) This new constitutional provision corresponds to some similar regulations contained in the "Treaty instituted by the European Community" or in the draft for the Treaty for the establishment of a Constitution for Europe, which is very important in the perspective of Romania's adhering to European Union.

c) This new regulation would represent a genuine constitutional obligation for all state authorities to exercise their duties in such a way that the measures adopted, to subscribe within the limits of the discretionary power limits acknowledged by the law and not to represent a power excess;

d) To create the possibility for the Constitutional Court to sanction, by the means of control of constitutionality of the laws and ordinances, the power excess in the activity of the Parliament and the Government, using as criterion the principle of proportionality;

e)To make a better correlation between the principle of proportionality and the principle of equality.

NATIONAL PUBLIC LAW IS BACK, EUROPEAN LAW DISAPPEARS?

MARIUS VACARELU[*]

Abstract
Analyzing the last two years main titles in daily press, we discover not only great economic problems inside the EU, but also big concerns about the future of EU, when a lot of states are victims of their public debt. For this big deficit, only national budget was good to help, at European level money are missing.
In this idea, the concept: "EU with two speeds" really appears, and every government is forced today to have a position. But on this case, a good part of European laws are menaced by the national law coming back – it must be a legal system able to replace the holes, because every human situation must be regulated by a kind of law.
In fact, last years discovered why a lot of political constructions are made only of "perfect papers", not according with the reality. In this case, when integrationist plans are rejected by the reality, only the national states and the national public law are forced to intervene and to support the fury.
Our text try to analyze where is the limit of EU law appliance in this case and how much national law will come back.

Introduction

Last year offers to public a common speech: economic crisis and its consequences, Greece and Italy prime ministers, national public debt and the Maastricht criteria of 60% debt, defeat of "multi-kulti", etc.

As we can see, the economy is the engine of every day television news journals and after few years, Occupy Wall Street time appeared – expressing a social wish. However, in this public speech, it was a problem: if we found a guilty element – the cause of everything bad, today is time to think to the future: because it must be someone who was not able to function correct and it will not function well too, despite big amount of Euro introduced by Central European Bank.

As always, every specialist and whole political class offered an answer for the next decade – a crisis has not only causes, but it has its victims. The globalization was one of them; human rights – in few states, young generation is a perpetual victim – today, the Spain unemployment rate for young people is almost 50%[1].

In this idea, the concept: "EU with two speeds" really appears, and every government is forced today to have a position. But on this case, a good part of European laws are menaced by the national law coming back – it must be a legal system able to replace the holes, because every human situation must be regulated by a kind of law.

The author try to analyze and describe where is the limit of EU law appliance in this case and how much national law will come back, because it is clear that last two years were not profitable for European unionist ideas.

The author intends to answer underlining few ideas who are still available in legal science, especially in their relation with new socio-political paradigm. In the same time, we must offer a perspective for the future: the dispute between national public law and the European law will have, on this lack of resources time, a long continuation: the pressure for both direction of human activity is too big now to can be avoided.

This "war" is now between image – EU law and reality – national public law. On this case, to not be schizophrenic, we believe that it can be a negotiated solution, but is not forever.

There is some literature for this subject: less in Romanian doctrine, more in Western Europe and other developed part of the world. But this idea is not too much studied, because it is a Pandora box for a fundamental change to some truths understood as "eternal", after 1989: the complete victory of image (EU supremacy in everything) was not possible, but too many people forget that is still possible to have an efficacy existence the national public law.

The author believes that is time to come back to normal logic in public law and politics, because the old ideas cannot be replaced by propaganda.

Paper Content

1. Last year was almost mad – according with normal political standard. In this time, almost everything was changed by few elements that join together, being able to defeat the official paradigm.

Nicolas Sarkozy is causing a big stir after calling on November 8th for a two-speed Europe: a "federal" core of the 17 members of the euro zone, with a looser "confederal" outer band of the ten non-euro members. He made the comments during a debate with students at the University of Strasbourg[2]:

"You cannot make a single currency without economic convergence and economic integration. It's impossible. But on the contrary, one cannot plead for federalism and at the same time for the enlargement of Europe. It's impossible. There's a contradiction. We are 27. We will obviously have to open up to the Balkans. We will be 32, 33 or 34. I imagine that nobody thinks that federalism—total integration—is possible at 33, 34, 35 countries.

So what one we do? To begin with, frankly, the single currency is a wonderful idea, but it was strange to create it without asking oneself the question of its governance, and without asking oneself about economic convergence. Honestly, it's nice to have a vision, but there are details that are missing: we made a currency, but we kept fiscal systems and economic systems that not only were not converging, but were diverging. And not only did we make a single currency without convergence, but we tried to undo the rules of the pact. It cannot work.

There will not be a single currency without greater economic integration and convergence. That is certain. And that is where we are going. Must one have the same rules for the 27? No. Absolutely not [...]. In the end, clearly, there will be two European gears: one gear towards more integration in the euro zone and a gear that is more confederal in the European Union."

These ideas was completed by another ones, presented on 1 December 2011, in Toulon, considered as the main speech for the presidential elections in France of April 2012[3]:

"The reform of Europe is not a march towards supra-nationality. The integration of Europe will go the inter-governmental way because Europe needs to make strategic political choices."

Sarkozy said he would meet German Chancellor Angela Merkel in Paris on Monday to push ahead with joint proposals for a new EU treaty to fix flaws in the Maastricht Treaty and create a true economic government for the bloc.

He said France and every other euro zone country needed to enshrine a budget-balancing "golden rule" in their constitutions, to force stricter fiscal discipline as the bloc strives to reform itself or get left behind.

He also said the European Central Bank must stay independent and decide for itself when to act against the risk of deflation.

"Europe is no longer a choice. It is a necessity. But the crisis has revealed its weaknesses and its contradictions. Europe must be rethought," Sarkozy said.

"Let us not hide it, Europe may be swept away by the crisis if it doesn't get a grip, if it doesn't change. A consensus has already emerged on budgetary and fiscal convergence as well as harmonization. There is also consensus about euro zone countries' commitments to deficit-reduction targets".

2. It may be asked: why such a log presentation of Sarkozy speech?

There are two reasons:

a) The importance of French economy. Despite all problems with rating agencies, in Europe Paris voice is still strong. The engines of European Union project are Germany and France and their economies: without them, in less than 6 months every EU institution collapse and

b) French legal system is very important for many countries, the basics of public law is settled by Law faculty of Sorbonne from 19th century and their disciples.

3. In this case, we must see that the possibility of a change in the triumphant road to totally integration in European continent can be fulfilled or is something inevitable?

In May 2010 it had appeared a special text: "PROJECT EUROPE 2030. Challenges and Opportunities. A report to the European Council by the Reflection Group on the Future of the EU 2030".

Form the first pages the destiny of European Union it was underlined that[4]:

"The choice for the EU is clear: reform or decline:

Many of these developments have been accelerated by the current financial and economic crisis, the worst crisis of its kind since the Great Depression, and one from which the EU will take some years to fully recover. The crisis has highlighted the structural weaknesses which underline most of the European economy: lower productivity, structural unemployment, inadequate labor market flexibility, outdated skills and poor growth. ….

If the EU does not adjust to the needs of the global economy, there is a real danger that Europe's relative decline may become absolute. ….

Embracing a global ambition should not result in scaling back domestic reforms, far from it; external influence cannot be achieved without solid growth and internal cohesion throughout the European Union. But our current era has decisively become a global one, a transformation which is creating new winners and losers. If we do not want to join the losing ranks, we have to take bold action now."

3. As we notice here, is only the economy who speaks. But the economy is commercial law (mainly) and public law for instrument used by the government: the tax regime, the different regulations adopted to create a profitable framework for economy, the demography politics.

The EU has often found itself at the center of global historical processes. There would have been no European integration at all without the Cold War, to cite but one example. The Cold War made it impossible for the actors most responsible for the international bloodbaths of the first half of the twentieth century to engage in the brutal realpolitik that had led to such disasters[5].

But European integration, once begun, was based on market and economic matters, making its course sensitive to major shifts in the international economy. After 1945, helped substantially by American aid via the Marshall Plan, each Western European country refined its specific strategies for governing the economy, growing its welfare state, steering and subsidizing national industrial development, regulating credit, priming the pump to stimulate demand, and sometimes outright planning[6].

The end of the Cold War created a puzzling new international situation for the EU. The rapid collapse of the Yugoslav Federation illustrated how treacherous this new world order could be, as key member states, faced with an explosion of warfare and ethnic cleansing, could do little but squabble, issue solemn pronouncements, and send a few unarmed emissaries to the Balkans.

Despite much talk about common EU foreign and defense policies, it took US intervention to begin recreating order.

4. The collapse of the Soviet bloc posed even greater challenges. The ex-communist central and eastern European countries aspired to become market democracies, implying that they would eventually want to join the EU.

Adding ten or more poor and mostly small members in the midst of other very complicated and uncertain transitions was daunting, especially because the EU 15 were still digesting very large economic changes that had begun in the middle of 1980s.

Moreover, a flock of new members with different histories and interests from Western Europeans would complicate EU decision-making and involve reforms to EU institutions initially designed for six Western European countries.

5. The 2005 political 'emergencies' made the EU's difficult situation much more visible. On May 29, the French held a referendum to ratify the European Constitutional Treaty. This document was the product of long public consultations and discussion by the European Convention, set up to remove matters of institutional reform from a seemingly bottomless mire of intergovernmental disagreement[7].

On referendum day, 70 percent of French voters turned out and 55 percent voted "no". The French debate had been thorough. Every citizen received the text – very expensive cost, and the first decade of 21st century introduce in public debate a new problem: the cost of EU institutions and the cost of propaganda for EU – and the issues had been discussed exhaustively by political leaders and the media. But unemployment was high, economic growth lagged, and there was widespread anxiety about the future of the French welfare state.

Sociologically, the middle classes, the better-educated, and the better-off voted "yes". Blue-collar workers, rural dwellers, the young, the poorer and less well-educated were more negative, many fearing for the future of France's social model and seeing the EU as a liberalizing threat to it. A majority of "no" voters also believed that by defeating the referendum they could thereby precipitate renegotiation of the ECT in a more "social" direction[8].

Thus, the propaganda was addressed to the people with a high level education. In fact, it is something from the psychology science: educated people believe more in ideas, and they try to analyze fact according with official doctrines; less educated people think and act more in reality.

What is as not underlined: it was a discussion about losing of national sovereignty in both countries that used referendum – but not very decided, because the world economy still had good profit.

When the Dutch held their own ECT referendum a few days later on 1 June, their verdict, harsher than the French, was 62 percent against. Like France, the Netherlands was a founding EU member and had traditionally been strongly pro-European. The results of the French vote played a role in Dutch negativity, but the opposition had its own roots.

This was the first referendum in Dutch history and the government of the day was unpopular, partly because after long years of a supposed Dutch Miracle, the economy had turned sour. Politicians, confused by the new referendum procedure, did not campaign effectively and national debate was unclear. Perhaps more significant was the timing; Dutch society was in the throes of debate and upheaval about immigration and cultural diversity[9].

What is was surprising here: the first referendum in the history of Netherlands, despite important acts that creates a different political entity inside Eastern Europe. Where is the democracy?

6. Since 2007, when the EU enlargement had a break, it was time to think if the expansion was good and profitable. In that moment, it started the global economic crisis, which introduces all states on the same position: private economy is down; the only one change for escape was the public budget. And public budget means that public law is back (no mater if is national or supranational).

Once the Eurozone troubles exploded, however, the Union's responses confirmed the worst of their fears about deeper institutional dynamics. It was true that key Eurozone actors eventually reached some agreement on courses to follow, but whether it would be successful remained to be seen. What was clear was that it was much too slow in coming and dangerously costly in economic and political terms[10].

National public law was the only one able to help states during the private banks crisis (2008 – 2009). The national budget represents a reserve and politicians was forced for the first time after many years to think more to the capacities of their national states to pay.

In this case, the cost of banking operations was paid by all citizens, and a big problem appeared: the legitimacy of national politicians – who saved the big banks – almost disappeared. A lot on internet blogs and forums was suffocated with critics: why national state must pay for the mistakes of private enterprises?

But this saving time made only one thing: create stronger holes on national budgets. In these cases, politicians were forced to recognize that the price of citizen's bribe was the public debt. The citizen's bribe was the comfort and the social services created in late 50 years.

Here EU law and EU social principles appeared again and the anger increase: the European standards of living were accepted by any state and any national politician: the cost was, of course, public debt[11], because the big jumps made by EU member states were not according with their economic potential.

So, almost all profit made by governments before private banks economic crisis was lost in 2008 – 2009; from 2010, when the holes of public budgets was difficult to be covered, the politicians understand that the European Union must help from its central budget, unless, the prestige will collapse and all integrative measures adopted in last 50 years will represent only a piece of cake.

Of course, it was impossible, national budget of big states was claimed – and Berlin and Paris started to ask for special conditions. Without them, the European construction will disappear, and from the big Corpus Juridicus Europeanum will remain only its values – which are, in a real interpretation, the high level of humanity moral.

7. A sign of this coming back of national public law is represented by the Treaty on stability, coordination and governance in the economic and monetary union, adopted on 31 January 2012.

In this text, the first article underlines the correct interpretation of European Union level of politician's purposes:

"By this Treaty, the Contracting Parties agree, as Member States of the European Union, to strengthen the economic pillar of the Economic and Monetary Union by adopting a set of rules intended to foster budgetary discipline through a fiscal compact, to strengthen the coordination of economic policies and to improve the governance of the euro area, thereby supporting the achievement of the European Union's objectives for sustainable growth, employment, competitiveness and social cohesion."

[11] About public debt, watch Emil Balan, Drept financiar/ Financial law, (C.H. Beck, Bucharest, 2007), p 116

For sure, today sustainable growth has a different interpretation: before 2007 this means economic growth for every state, and preserving high position for Western Europe; today it means: if we don't grow again fast, the EU will collapse. This is the correct interpretation of the text: "strengthen". Today EU legal texts are more important to don't let the national states to run away!

For this we can watch more the preamble, which contain few dispositions impossible to fulfill today:

"… RECALLING the need to facilitate the adoption of measures under the excessive deficit procedure of the European Union for euro area Contracting Parties whose planned or actual government deficit to gross domestic product exceeds 3%, whilst strongly reinforcing the objective of that procedure, namely to encourage and, if necessary, compel the Member State concerned to reduce a deficit which might be identified, RECALLING the obligation for those Contracting Parties whose government debt exceeds the 60 % reference value to reduce it at an average rate of one twentieth per year as a benchmark …".

Thus, the national public law must do everything to respect these dispositions, no matter the costs. We can consider that its role increase now (for sure, not for innocent purposes), but the law practitioner lost partially their skill of working with national law. In fact, this treaty is more an official invitation: "save who can", because … the main actor of EU had a public debt bigger than 60% (almost 100%, it seems).

So, today generation of politicians are confused: their "career plan" is menaced by the national public law (financial law, mainly) and citizens are now more informed like no other time. "Sto delat?"/What we can do? Lenin asked this – but the answer is, for sure, not communism, but a re-evaluation of national public law and its role, and, for sure, a different EU construction, only for big liberties and rights, but not more for public affairs.

Conclusions

Our text underlined few directions of research about the difficult problem of transforming European Union and its treaties – which change, as main consequences, the pillars of EU law – into a coherent organization, where the limits of national public law are not violated by the Brussels organizations.

The results of our research offer a small understanding for the big confusion which exists at the politic level, both directions: national and European. Now, the economy forces the politicians to recreate themselves, because the population starts to make pressure on streets and on internet.

It might be possible that our text to not be accepted for its ideas – the national public law is back; it is necessary to build now a new generation of politicians, etc. – but in "battle of ideas" the history proved many times that the ideas who are not on the same level with the official doctrines resists better then he "fashion on public debates", because it is more sincerity on it. It is necessary – for a real impact of this article – that the lawyers must think a little for the destiny of their states and not only to read articles to discover new techniques for a blind appliance of any law, no matter its purpose or its effect.

This kind of researches are made more with the ear connected to the social noise – new direction of study can appear only if people will want to think in a normal way: the states are to different – as history and economic power – for a coherent and functional political integration. Internet can create a different psychology, but no one can replace the national tax system and the politician ambitions, which are more pillar of any political system: no politician, no promises; no money from the tax law, no money to fulfill the politician promises.

CONSIDERATIONS CONCERNING THE REVOCATION OF ADMINISTRATIVE ACTS WHICH ARE CONTRARY TO EUROPEAN UNION LAW

CONSTANȚA MĂTUŞESCU*

Abstract

In the process of adopting administrative acts, public authorities are obliged to respect both the national provisions legally superior and European Union law with superior legal force and also the general principles of law, including those imposed by the constant practice of the Court of Justice of the European Union.

Implementation and maintenance at the level of the Member States of inconsistent acts with EU law affect the obligation of community loyalty and ensure the full effectiveness of EU law which rests on their failure could result in an action of breaching community obligations.

Revocation is the legal transaction that the issuer has withdrawn its own body act on its own initiative or pursuant to the provisions of the superior authority. The disappearance of the illegal administrative act of domestic law doesn't necessarily involve restoring legality community as for this may be necessary the adoption of a new act.

While acknowledging the procedural autonomy of the member states, the European Union law requires that national administrative rules concerning the acts revoking to respect two of its general principles - the principle of legal certainty and legitimate expectations principle, which can cause a number of complications, constraints on public administrations. The present contribution aims at examining the various influences on which the Union right performs towards this matter.

Keywords*: administrative acts, EU law, revocation, principle of legal certainty, legitimate expectations principle.*

Introduction

The influence that the European Union law exerts on the public law of the European Union Member States is undeniable[1], and the rules and general principles of the administrative law were not excluded from any such influences, resulting a circulation of the principles established at communal level to the national administrative rights, with the consequence of achieving a certain harmonization of them. But the influence is mutual, as the European law is based on traditions and legal realities of the European Union Member States.

Instrumentalization of the administrative law, as a result of European integration, its transformation in the main mechanism of enforcement for the communal action (along with the traditional role of national instrument of exercising public power) led not only to expand its mission, but also to a considerable increase in its complexity, being forced to develop in respect with the development of the communal law in order to ensure its execution[2]. The europeanization of administrative law object necessarily entailed a profound transformation of its regime[3], and the influences of European Union law were extended to areas that are not about the communal law, being exclusively part of the national jurisdictions. It is about a "progressive influence using persuasion and voluntary recognition by the national law of certain European legal features of the administrative law", as noted in the doctrine[4].

Developing the subjective dimension of administrative legal system by recognizing, by using the case law path, of certain existing legal principles and their realization, in order to strengthen the protective effect of the citizen, is the main feature of the recent development of the law in the European Union[5]. Identifying, in the Union law, of some certain solutions, of some waivers arising from the European requirements, which departs from traditional principles of the administrative law, threatens the coherence of the administrative regime systematization, leading to a dual legal system in which a differential treatment is applied to the administrated persons, as it lies or not within the scope of European Union law. Since such a situation can not be maintained on a long term, the predictable evolution seems to be that of extending its own rules of EU law to all administrative law. As such a situation can not be maintained on a long term, the predictable evolution seems to be that of extending to the European Union law own rules to all the administrative law[6]. From this point of view, the Court of Justice role is essential, and one of the most pressing problems faced by the Court in the recent years was that of establishing a set of standards to define clearly enough the legal consequences of inconsistent application of the national law with the European legislation, directing this way the action of the Member States as regards the elimination of inconsistencies between legal internal order and European Union law.

We will consider in present paper, to what extent the solutions identified in the European Court of Justice Jurisprudence on the principles governing administrative papers revocation[7] as a mean of restoring the communal legality find their applicability in the Romanian law system. The question being asked, as we consider, in Romania's case, is whether the current state of the domestic legal order allows to the authorities and to the jurisdictions to ensure the compatibility with European Union law.

1. The obligation of the national administrative authorities to restore the legality in relation to the European Union law

The conflict with European Union law is one of the cases that determine the illegality character of an administrative act, and the effective restoration of legality is an essential requirement arising from the commitments the Member States have assumed in relation to the European Union law.

European Union membership entails, among others, the need to give a full effect to the European norms. Legal European Union order is based on a complementarity between different levels of authority – the European and the national authorities[8]. Ensuring the implementation of European Union law is - in the absence of a specific empowerment of the European institutions - the [7] Given its various meanings (see, in this respect O. Podaru, Administrative Law, Vol I. The administrative act, Hamangiu Publishing House, Bucharest, 2010, pp. 280-283), the term "revocation" is here used with its general sense, of operation by which the administration withdraw from the legal internal law an act that it previously issued. Throughout this paper the reference is limited to the individual acts, meaning to decisions taken by the administration in individual cases and not to the normative acts which impose general and abstract rules and on which revocation fewer doubts remain (see in this regard A. competence of the administrative and judicial authorities of the Member States[9], which thus have principle competence[10], the Union not being able to intervene unless if a uniform regulation proves to be necessary[11]. The Court of Justice made a number of statements that converge on the idea that this competence does not represent a simple need, but a genuine obligation[12].

The communal loyalty clause involves for the states the obligation to equip themselves with the necessary means to discharge their duties under the law of the Union. However, the Court of Justice recognizes to the Member States the institutional and the procedural autonomy, which means that in the absence of some specific dispositions of communal law, when implementing the European Union law, Member States shall act, in principle, accordingly to the materials and procedural norms provided by their national law[13]. Nevertheless, the need to ensure a full effect and a uniform application of the European Union law led to the formulation, in the Court's jurisprudence, of some of the requirements of the communal law regarding the national conditions.

The Court has consistently decreed that, when the Member States foreseen, in accordance with what is called procedural autonomy, the applicable procedural rules to judicial proceedings designed to protect the rights of the parties conferred by the communal law, they must ensure that these arrangements are not less favorable than those applicable to some similar actions based on dispositions of internal law (the equivalence principle) and that they are not organized to make virtually impossible the exercise of the rights conferred by the communal law (the effectiveness principle)[14]. The states are not compelled to create other legal ways than the existing ones so that the national law may be respected[15].

A general obligation regarding the application of the European Union law by the Member States arises directly - and "objectively", in other words, even independent of the context of "invoking some communal rights by the private community" – from the supremacy principle of the communal law and from the obligation to ensure its full application[16], the Court stating that the obligation is both of the national administrative institutes and of all courts to ensure the compliance of the communal norms in their respective fields and, if necessary, to refuse appliance of a national norm which precludes the full effectiveness of the communal law[17].

The incompatibility between an administrative act and the European Union law can take different forms. It may result either from failure or improper application of European standards benefiting from a direct effect, either from the conflict with European Union law of the norm of internal law on which the administrative act is based.

The task of restoring the legality belongs both to the government itself and to the courts. We will especially refer below to the case in which the restoration of legality is ensured by the administration through its traditional power to revoke the illegal administrative acts, which can also be exercised to remove a violation of the European legislation through an administrative act. In general, neither in legislation nor in case laws of the Member States no distinction is made regarding the illegal administrative acts, between acts contrary to the European legislation and acts contrary to another source of law, all administrative acts being treated the same way regarding their revocation.

2. Conditions of exercising the right to revoke administrative acts contrary to European Union law developed in the European Court of Justice jurisprudence Essential institution of the general law, the revocation theory of the administrative acts enjoys a special characterization of the European Court of Justice Jurisprudence. Starting from its early case law, the Court has tried (having as the ultimate prohibition argument the interdiction, for a judge, of the justice disclaiming[18]) to fill the absence of this subject from treaties and even, with few certain exceptions, from the secondary law, and to develop, based on a comparative study of the Member States' judicial orders, a series of principles concerning the revocation of the administrative acts. Thus, using the traditional distinction of administrative law between legally adopted acts and illegal decisions, the Court determined as the main rule, recognized today as true general principles of the communal law[19], the irrevocability of the legal administrative acts that create rights[20], on one hand, and the revocability of the illegal administrative acts, on the other hand[21].

With regard to the legal acts, the Court considers that "the retroactive revocation of a legal act which gave subjective rights or similar benefits is contrary to the general principles of law[22]" and that a legal document giving subjective rights to the concerned person can not be, in principle, withdrawn, "in this case the subjective right being gained, the need to preserve the confidence in the stability of the situation thus created has priority over the interest of administration that wants to reconsider its decision[23]".

From the Court wording stands out that, theoretically, it would be possible a revocation with ex nunc effects of such an act, but from the Decision given in the Algera causes is stated that the ex nunc revocation is also inadmissible in these acts cases.

In respect with the illegal administrative acts, they can be, in principle, abrogated, "the absence of a legal objective basis of the act affecting the subjective right of the interested person"[24]. However, the administration has no discretionary power to revoke the illegal administrative communal acts, but this possibility is conditioned on the fulfillment of two requirements: to interfere in a reasonable time (expression of the legal security principle) and the institution making the request takes into account sufficiently the measure in which the recipient of the act could possibly trust in its legality (to meet his legitimate expectations)[25].

Retaining the principle of legal security[26] under the form of the protection principle of concerned person's legitimate interests, the European Court of Justice did not give an abstract interpretation for the two requirements of revoking the illegal administrative acts, but was pleased to determine, from case to case, to what extent they are fulfilled. The Court's solutions reflects, in fact, the balance to be achieved under the specific circumstances of the cause, between the requirements of communal legality, which requires it to restore the legal position in relation to the European Union law, and the legal security. Thus, the Court considered that the principle of legal security is not absolute, since its application must be accompanied by the principle of legality, this principle and the concrete situation of the parties can sometimes prevail over the principle of legal security[27]. The balance between public interest, of restoring the communal legality and private interest (good faith of the beneficiary, his legitimate expectations) will be found in each case according to the actual circumstances of the cause[28].

A particular series of case law developed in the recent years by the European Court of Justice in conjunction with the principle of judicial security follows the problem reexamining the administrative decisions that have become final and prove to be contrary to the communal law, as was after interpreted by the Court[29]. In this series of causes, the judicial security is used as a interpretation tool regarding national administrative decisions within the scope of the communal law, an approach that reflects, as noted in doctrine, the ambivalent nature of this principle that encourages and restricts in the same time the effective application of the communal law[30] in so far as it seeks to ensure both the quality and the integrity of the norm and also the stability of legal situations[31].

In the Kühne & Heitz case[32], the problem that arose was, in essence, if the obligation of a national authority to apply a norm of communal law, as it was interpreted by the Court, even the legal relationships aroused and established before the notifying of the Court's decision on the request of interpretation, may be imposed, despite the final character of the administrative decision acquired before its requested review, in order to take into account this decision of the Court. Kühne & Heitz decision allowed the Court to show how it intended to reconcile the requirements that leave from the supremacy principle of the communal law, and also from the retroactive effect of preliminary decisions with requirements that leave from the legal security principle in conjunction with the authority principle of judged thing[33].

Kühne & Heitz decision allowed the Court to show how they intend to reconcile the requirements that ensue from the supremacy principle of the communal law, as well as from the retroactive effect of the preliminary decisions with the requirements that ensue from the legal security principle in conjunction with the judged issue principle[34]. Thus, in the consideration of the task that is for all of the Member States' authorities, that to ensure compliance communal law norms within their jurisdiction, and since the interpretation that the Court, in exercising the competence which is conferred the article 234 EC, gives to a communal law norm, it clarifies and defines, if necessary, the meaning and scope of this norm as it should or ought to be understood and applied from the moment of its entry into force, the Court considers that the communal law norm interpreted as such must be applied by an administrative institution within its powers, even to legal relationships created and established before the Court gave its decision regarding the request for interpretation[35]. Stating that legal certainty is between the general principles recognized by the communal law and the final character of an administrative decision, acquired at reasonable deadlines for lodging appeals, or by the exhaustion of those procedures, contribute to this conviction, the Court considers that the communal law does not require that an administrative institution to be, in principle, obliged to reopen an administrative decision which has acquired such a final character[36]. In respect with the context proper to the case, as an exception, the administrative authorities are required to review their final decision, as a consequence of a preliminary decision, if there are met four "circumstances" that characterizes the main proceeding and that, cumulatively, will have to be delivered, in terms of article 10 EC, an obligation of reviewing in the administrative institution's task that received a request for this review: 1) the national law has to recognize for the administrative institution the possibility to return to that final decision; 2) the decision has become final as a consequence of a court of last instance decision; 3) the respective judgment is, in light of subsequent case-law of the Court, based on a misinterpretation of the communal law, adopted without being brought before the Court with a preliminary title in the conditions foreseen by the article 234 paragraph (3) EC[37]; 4) the concerned person addressed to the administrative institution immediately after becoming aware of mentioned jurisprudence. In such circumstances, the Court concluded that it is the administrative institution obligation, in accordance with the principle of cooperation which follows from Article 10 EC[38], to re-examine the decision in order to take into consideration the interpretation of the relevant disposition of the communal law upheld in the meantime by the Court. In addition, "the administrative institution should set, according to the results of this review, whether it is obliged to reconsider the decision in question without affecting the third parties' interests"[39].

Although designed to solve a specific situation, this decision (issued by the Grand Chamber) has become of a paramount importance, acquiring the character of a principle decision, the solution pronounced in this case being subsequently confirmed in similar cases (like i-21 şi Arcor and Kempter[40]). However, it suffers a certain lack of clarity because its not concise enough character of motivation[41], which gave rise to some questions. If it is mainly clear that the review obligation must be interpreted restrictively, as derogation from the legal security principle, a matter on which there were differences of opinion concerns the length of the obligation of the administrative institution. Following the the distinction made by the Court between the review and the revocation of the final administrative decision[42], the question arises whether the requirement established in the decision of the administrative institution regards only the obligation to review that specific decision (to reopen the proceedings) or also the obligation to revoke the decision, following this examination, that interpretation is contrary to the communal law interpretation further emphasized by the Court. The European Commission opinion[43] and that subsequently results from the case law of the Court[44] is that that this decision must be interpreted as the competent administrative institution, when the communal law allows it to revoke a final administrative decision and in the circumstances explicitly described in the mentioned decision, is also required, under article 10 EC, to revoke this decision, if from its review shows that it has become incompatible with the interpretation of the communal law given by the Court in the meantime.

Proving to be protective towards the procedural autonomy of the Member States, the national authorities following to appreciate each particular situation in light of their internal legislation, the Court's decision proves to be incomplete regarding the extent of the effects of any review of that decision, if they occur with retroactive character, or, in the future, following therefore that this thing to be considered in the light of all the provisions of the national law. As noted in the doctrine[45], both the disparate solutions that can be provided by the national legislation to this question, and also the fact that it is possible that the national law of some states can not provide for the administrative institutions to reopen a final decision make that the application of Kühne & Heitz jurisprudence in different European Union member states to determine discrepancies in the protection of the individuals' rights. The subsequent Court's case - law has allowed, in some degree, the clarification of some questions raised about Kühne & Heitz decision. Thus, in the first place, the four circumstances hold in this case are qualified as "conditions" by the Court[46], but they do not apply in the situation in which the one who request the revocation of a final administrative decision did not make use of the right to lodge an appeal against the mentioned decision (i-21 decision Germany and Arcor[47]). Principles in the light of which it is judged the i-21 Germany and Arcor cause are those of the effectiveness and equivalence used to the appreciation of the national procedural law, applied in regard with the obligation of revoking a decision that rests with the administration and with the right to appeal, that must exist both in relation with internal matters and with the communal law. According to the Court, "if the applicable national norms to the appeals require the obligation to revoke an unlawful administrative act in respect with the internal law, although this act has remained final, if the specification of this act would be <simply unacceptable>, the same obligation of revocation must exist in equivalent conditions, in the case of an administrative act which is not according with the communal law"[48]. The Court is asked to verify if the criteria derived from the German jurisprudence, which allow evaluating the concept of "purely and simply intolerable", are not applied differently, as it is considered or not the national or the communal law.

The decision of the Court in Willy Kempter Case offered the solution of clarifying the last two criteria retained in Kühne & Heitz decision. Regarding the third condition, the Court stated that, if appropriate, the revocation of a final administrative decision with the scope to consider the interpretation of a communal law disposition upheld in the meantime by the Court do not require that the applicant to invoke the communal law in the appeal brought under internal law against such decisions[49]. Regarding the last criterion concerning the interpretation of Kühne & Heitz, when asked by the national court whether there is a term to require the review and the revocation of a final administrative decision contrary to the communal law, the Court also made reference to the effectiveness and equivalence principles. Bearing in mind that in order to ensure legal compliance of the judicial security, the Member States may require that a request for review and revocation of an administrative decision remained final and contrary to the communal law, as it was subsequently interpreted by the Court, to be submitted to the competent administration in a reasonable time after finding out of the Court of Justice decision[50], the Court stated that it is for the national law to determine such terms.

As a conclusion of the two series of the Court jurisprudence, it may be noticed the effort that the Court of Justice has put in time to find a balance between the requirements of a full insurance applicability of the communal law, on one hand, and the establishment of the legal reports with the meaning of protecting the legitimate interests of individuals, on the other hand.

Between the public interest (communal) and the private one, the Court has chosen, in principle, for a conditioned remediation rather than for a restoration with any price of the prior position to the violation of the communal legal order through an administrative act. Through the last series of jurisprudence can be considered to occur, in a certain extent, an erosion of the legal security on national level (regarding the stability of the administrative decisions), which is sometimes sacrificed for achieving the compliance of the European Union legal order. The Casuistic character of the Court's rules and the reference to the procedural autonomy of the Member States moderate thou this effect. The principle of cooperation, often invoked by the Court in these cases, requires, among others, that the obligation to ensure the compliance of the communal law is incumbent for all the Member State's authorities within their jurisdiction[51]. In these conditions, although the organization

[48] i-21 Germany şi Arcor Decision*,* previously quoted, point 63.

[49] Kempter Decision*,* points 40-46. According to the general lawyer (point 94 from his conclusions), what is important is the fact that considered court's decision is based on an incorrect interpretation of the communal law and confirms, as a consequence, its misapplication.

[50]Idem, point 12. Although it was suggested that the term "to be aware of the Court's jurisprudence" to refer to the time when the applicant was actually informed of this jurisprudence, and not at the date on which the Court pronounced its decision, this solution was not retained.

[51] See also the Decision from 12th of June 1990, Germania/ Commission, C-8/88, Rec., p. I-2321, point 13, and also Kempter şi Kühne & Heitz Decisions, previously quoted.

and the powers of the public administration represent a national prerogative, by using the European court rules upon this principle it is produced a growth of the revocation power of the administrative acts of which the public administration benefits, when this concerns an act contrary to the communal law. Article 10 EC requires, in this case, involving all instruments which may exist in national procedural law to achieve, if the latter enables it, a review and, where appropriate, a revocation of the final administrative decision contrary to communal law[52].

3. The relevance of the Court's solutions in national context

Without proposing a development of administrative revocation theory as it appears in the internal law [53] (action that might be, in fact, quite complicated given that this area is the subject of much controversy in Romanian doctrine [54]), closely related to the principles and rules identified above in the jurisprudence of the European Court of Justice, we can raise a few issues regarding the way in which the revocation of administrative acts (in this case the illegal ones) may represent, in the Romanian legal system, an effective tool for restoring the legality in compliance with European Union law. Thus, in terms of general principles of the revocation of illegal found administrative acts by the European instance, if the juridical security, in reasonably meaning is fully respected, the current law allowing the revocation of an administrative act only within the general term of exercising the action in administrative Court, not the same can be said about the principle to respect the legitimate expectations of the beneficiary of the act (in the sense that the institution that issued to take into account in a sufficient extent that the addressee could eventually to trust its). The legal regime of administrative acts revocation in Romanian law is an objective one, based mainly on the nature of the act and the establishment of an objective time at which it becomes irrevocable, and not on the subjective attitude of the addressee of the act. There are no, therefore, premises to customize the solutions to specific cases, specific solution to European law, which may put the administration in the situation that could not always meet European. However, this guidance does not benefit of using the revocation procedure as an effective means of restoring legality in relation to European Union law.

In the context of principles mentioned above, a provision of Romanian law of the administrative Court shows the disadvantage in which find the administration in relation to our courts, as regards to the possibility to withdraw their own acts. Under Article 1 (6) of Law 554/2004, "public authority issuing an unlawful administrative act may apply to the court its nullity, in case the act can not be revoked, as he entered the civil circuit and produced legal effects. In case of admission the action, the court will decide, on request, also on the legality of civil concluded acts under the unlawful administrative act and also on the occurred civil effects ". Administration, therefore, deprived of the opportunity to cancel its act, may still invest with such a task the Court, which undoubtedly is not justified in relation to the principles of juridical security and to the principles of legitimate trust of the beneficiary of the act, considering that the act would need to be "untouchable" in the sense that it can not be revoked by any government, or canceled by the Court[55].

[52] The conclusions of Yves Bot General Lawyer in Willy Kempter Cause, point 79.

[53] In the absence of administrative procedure's code, still in draft phase, the administrative court's law (Law no. 554/2004), which represents the common law in the administrative procedure matter, establishes in article 7 paragraph (1) that "Before apply to the competent administrative court, the person who considers himself injured in one of his rights or in a legitimate interest through an individual administrative act must require to the emitting public authority or the higher authority, if it exists, within 30 days from the date of the document notification, its revocation, in whole or in part thereof.

[54] For a largely consideration of this matter, see also I. Brad, op. cit.

[55] For such a conclusion, see also O. Podaru, op. cit., p. 294.

A special problem is posed by the obligation of administrative authorities, in accordance with jurisprudence Kühne & Heitz of the Court in Luxembourg, to reconsider a final decision and proves to be contrary to European Union law as interpreted by the Court later. In our opinion does not exist in internal law criteria for mandatory revocation of a decision by an administrative authority for the purposes noted in the first condition in Kühne & Heitz, that the national law to recognize the administrative bodies the possibility of revert to respective final decision. Law on Administrative Court, as amended in 2007[56], a new means of review final and irrevocable decisions: breach of the principle of precedence of Communal Law. This solution provided for the possibility of revision of a final court decision if the Communal Law was not considered during the administrative adoption of the decision or during proceedings before administrative courts. Reason for revision it is, as this provision, "pronunciation" the decision contrary to the principle of priority. Or, for our situation in the case provided by jurisprudence Kühne & Heitz, the third condition requires that the final decision is, in light of subsequent case-law of the ulterior Court, based on a misinterpretation of Communal law, adopted without noticing the Court with preliminary title[57].

Conclusions

To those presented above, it can be concluded that if in regard to the application of European law, national government has a role, not the same can be said about the role reserved for it in terms of removing the effects of possible infringements of Union. The principle of effectiveness, which requires that national law does not render virtually impossible or excessively difficult the exercise of rights conferred by Union law, justifies an extension of the power to revoke the administration when it concerns a national act contrary to European Union[58]. Although European Union law in principle does not require states to create legal means other than those for ensuring compliance with national law, with strict reference to the objective of ensuring the compatibility of national law with European law, can be taken into consideration an eventual entry into the Romanian legislation of some provisions to facilitate the revocation of the administrative organs of the acts that prove to be contrary to European Union law. For example, could be considered formal consecration on Administrative Court law and in the future administrative procedure code the possibility of review of administrative decisions if the three conditions Kühne & Heitz are met[59]. It would be also useful the introduction of the public interest criterion (of restoring of Communal legality) to allow revocation of a creative of rights act, that will allow the appreciation, from case to case, on the interest that has to be protected (obviously, with the right of the individual to compensation)[60]. Such a solution could be analyzed also in relation to the principle of State liability for breach of Communal obligations that would justify the imposition of the obligation even on the administration to revoke a final decision incompatible with European legislation and that is likely to engage state responsibility.

PARLIAMENTARY OVERSIGHT IN ROMANIA, A GUARANTEE OF ACHIEVING SEPARATION OF POWERS IN THE STATE

SILVIA MIHALCEA*

Abstract

This paper focuses on the dimension of the relationships between the Parliament and other state institutions in Romania (Government, chief of state, public administration authorities) from the point of view of the parliamentary oversight. The reason and the necessity of the parliamentary oversight comes naturally from the existence of the democratic principle of representation: using the mandate entrusted by the people in the electoral elections, the members of the Parliament are entitled and, in the first place, have the obligation to verify the public affairs related to the safeguarding of the national interest and achievement of the well being. This mechanism is a flexible one and involves collaboration, cooperation, balance and thus, it appears as the strongest form in accomplishing the separation of powers in the state.

The paper approaches the early developments and the evolution of the parliamentary oversight, the wide range of tools used by the Parliament to carry out this function (procedures and forms) according to the stipulations of the Constitution, laws and European Treaties and emphasizes the role of the parliamentary practice in this field. The study also puts forward a series of detailed recommendations aiming to improve the quality of this act. A new element is the parliamentary oversight in the field of European affairs, introduced by the implementation of the Lisbon Treaty, which consolidates the role of the national assemblies in order for them to become important actors in the European construction by their active involvement in the decision making.

Introduction

The people are the sole holders of the power, which is exercised by the state through its institutions. A division[1] of the powers occurs and we distinguish between the legislative power, the executive power and the judicial power. The importance of this segmentation brings a balance, each power has control instruments on the others, limiting and preventing the power seizure and thus, avoiding abuses.

The parliamentary institution has remote origins, being recorded in Island in 1930 for the first time, when it was founded and when the first national forum met under the name of Althing; in Romania, the parliamentary history started in 1831 along with the Organic Regulations, in 1831 in Wallachia and in 1832 in Moldavia.

The mission assigned to the parliament is very much connected to its functions, namely to provide the citizens' needs according to the mandate received from them. One of these functions is the parliamentary oversight (control), which represents a democratic mechanism for ensuring that necessary balance between the powers in the state in order to prevent the seizing of the . Using specific means, the legislative authority exercises influence on the Government and the public administration, but also on chief of state, pursuing the general interests of the society.

Even if there are very clear and precise provisions in the Romanian Constitution and other laws, in practice things are very often different and this study aims to underline these aspects taking into account the latest approaches and developments, identifying the slippages also targeting to put forward proposals for future amendments of the actual legislation.

1.Evolution of the parliamentary oversight concept

The Parliament, „the supreme representative body of the Romanian people and the sole legislative authority of the country"[2], is composed of the Chamber of Deputies and Senate, elected by universal, equal, direct, secret and freely expressed vote according to the electoral rules, each of them having different duties.

Professor Ioan Muraru identifies six tasks for the Parliament[3]:

a) adoption of laws;

b) establishment of the socio-economic, cultural, state and legal guidelines;

c) election, appointment or removal of some state authorities;

d) parliamentary oversight;

e) executive board in foreign politics;

f) own organization and operation.

The occurrence of the parliamentary control concept was born long time before the development of modern political parties. Etymologically, the word control comes from the old French, contreroller, undertaken from the mediaeval Latin word contrarotulare (to check by registering in a second register). In English, scrutiny is used for defining this concept, undertaken also from the French word scrutin, which comes from the Latin word scrutinium – exam and the verb scrutari – to search, to look over.

Adopted by the French National Assembly on the 26th of August 1798, the Bill of Human Rights and Citizens set at the art. 14 and 15[4] the principle of the governors' accountability to people, principle developed subsequently by the French Constitution from 1791, Title III About public powers: „ministers are liable for all the crimes perpetrated by them against national security and Constitution [5] meanwhile the regulatory power has the authority to prosecute ministers and main agents of the executive body before the High National Court.

In our country, as well as in the other European ones, the transparency of the scrutiny (parliamentary control concept) can't have its origins but in the constitutional provisions, proceeding from the competencies assigned to the state institutions and their inter-relations on the state power separation-based principle.

Once the state power separation principle has been established in the Constitution, we can analyze the existence, size and forms of the parliamentary control within that period of time.

One of the first constitutional moments was present in Romania in 1822, „the first attempt to give consistency to the Romanians' liberal trends and democratic ruling principles worldwide"[6], by the commissary's, Ionică Tăutu, constitutional project, known also under the name of "Carvunarilor Constitution". Being inspired by the Bill of Human rights and citizens*,* the text broadly underlined the separation of power between the Lord and the Public Assembly. The executive power belonged to the Lord; the legislative power could be carried out by the Lord together with the Public Assembly, while the judicial power was subordinated to the executive one. The great historian, A. D. Xenopol named it as "the first Moldavian constitutional project", but the act couldn't be applied because of the great boyars' opposition, supported by the Ottoman Porte. We do not consider that it has significant items which could have specified the idea of a control performed by the legislative power, but „it announced even from the first years of the earthling reigns the institutional searches which were to mark out the second half of the century"[7].

The first constitutional delimitation of the state power duties, although faulty and "confusedly described in a less clear style,"[8] can be found in the Organic Regulations, acts which instituted a modern state machine, ousting a series of feudal-like institutions.

The executive power was in hands of the Lord, vassal of the Turks and protected by Russia, who appointed and discharged ministers, he also granted clemency and could reduce punishments, he granted and withdrew noble titles, he concluded treaties with foreign powers, within certain limits, but he could also enjoy exclusively the right of legislative initiative, and he shared the legislative prerogatives with the unicameral parliament established under the name of Public Assembly. The Public Assembly was elected for a five-year mandate and although it had the right to vote legislative proposals with full majority, it had no legislative power as the modern parliaments, as the Lord held a veto right.

We have reached to the matter in question for the present research, being found within the text of article 49 of the Wallachia's Organic Regulations and in article 52 of the Moldavian Organic Regulations: „The ordinary deliberations of the Public Assembly shall only have legal power when approved by the Lord who is free not to approve them without giving an explanation on his reason of not doing it". As Marian Enache noticed, within the Lord's right to vote for the implementation of the adopted laws, we find "the origins of the Romanian parliamentary control, origins which were valued in the next constitutional acts of Romania"[9].

There are also similar provisions, but more consolidated, in the Developing Statute of the Paris Convention, adopted within Alexandru Ioan Cuza's reign, in 1864, according to which, due to the state power collaboration, the Assembly was supposed to listen the ministers within the legislative process, if those were asked for taking the floor; The Lord could reject law promulgation.

The provision of Alexandru Ioan Cuza's constitutional project is also deemed to be mentioned, being published in a French newspaper, La Nation in 1863 and unapproved by the great powers through which the MPs were granted the right to address questions to a minister without involving the government's political liability. Moreover, the questions were supposed to be notified to the president of the correspondent forum who decided in respect to their opportunity but under the conditions to be appointed for that position by the Lord's decree.

The 1866 Constitution, of Belgian inspiration, was the one which would really establish the state power separation and in consequence a more consolidated form of the parliamentary control; „by its essence it is a modern, democratic constitution"[10]. The legislative power was collectively granted to the monarch and to the National Representation, the executive one exclusively to the monarch and the judicial one to the Courts.

The control performed by the Parliament over the executives took concrete shape by establishing the institutions of parliamentary inquiry, questions and by the citizens' right to petition.

Article 47 stated that „Each and every Assembly had the right of inquiry", being performed by each chamber the way they thought suitable and provided in the parliamentary regulations as well. The right of MPs' to address questions to ministers was established for the first time in a promulgated constitutional text (although that was also provided in Cuza's constitutional project as we have shown above): art. 49 - „Each and every member of Assembly has the right to address questions to Ministers".

The parliamentary control was also performed by the motion (petition) right stipulated in art. 50: „Anyone has the right to address motions to Assemblies by means of office or any of its members. Each and every Assembly has the right to submit the addressed motions to Ministers. Ministers have to give explanations over their activity each time the Assemblies would ask for it". In this way, ministers are obliged to notify the Assemblies regarding the solutions to the corresponding requests. There is also important to underline the fact that the right of motion was recognized regardless age, sex, political affiliation, ethnical origin, etc.

Not last, article 99 established „as a pregnant necessity"[11], the collaboration that should exist between the state powers, by a minister's attendance to the parliamentary chambers' debates: „If the ministers aren't members of the Assemblies, they can participate in law debates, but without having right to vote. There is necessary the presence of at least one minister to the Assemblies' debates. Assemblies can ask for the ministers' attendance to their deliberations".

According to the new adopted Constitution, the Lord, exercising the executive power, was deemed to be „inviolable" and couldn't be made liable in the terms of the fundamental law. This situation had to be balanced somehow, and so the official papers issued by the monarch had to be countersigned by the ministers, being liable for that before the Lord and the Parliament, too.

The vote of non-confidence represented a component of the control performed by the Parliament and although in the previous parliamentary practice prior to 1866 there were cases related to the ministers' joint or individual political liability – the so-called reprimand passed in the Assembly of Deputies - (on the 18th of February 1863, Nicolae Crețulescu government -50 pro votes, 5 against votes, 50 abstention votes), the Constitution of 1866 did not comprise any explicit provision related to those situations, acknowledged in a customary manner[12]. After the adoption of the fundamental law, the Government was supposed to resign not only after a negative vote passed in the Assembly, but also in the Senate, but in practice, if an express motion of confidence was adopted in the Assembly, the vote given in the Senate didn't have much importance; moreover, that parliamentary chamber would have been dissolved by the Lord, as it happened in the case of Lascăr Catargiu Government in 1876.

The ministers' legal liability was stipulated in the fundamental act of 1866, in article 101: the Assembly of Deputies, the Senate or the Lord could send them before the High Court of Cassation and Justice, in joint sections.

If things were clear at the level of constitutional provisions, related to the parliamentary control and performance methods, in practice they were totally different. The executive power succeeded many times to assign a predominant role by majority mechanism, dependent on the government's influence, as it used many times the state machinery for the candidates' service in order to win the elections. There were many cases when ministers asked the MPs, who constituted the majority, to vote laws they did not agree with. As an example, we present the confession of Constantin Argetoianu, minister of internal affairs, regarding the situation occurred in 1921, when more MPs of the Peoples' Party didn't want to vote certain articles of agrarian law: „Within the 2-3 days prior to voting, we arranged the groups and on the voting day I assigned my people to demand a vote with nominal appeal. I sat down on the office stairs in front of the banks – I was nearly to say the rack – and on calling each name of our party, I was looking into the called person's eyes and no one dared to be "against" under my stare[13]".

After a five-year reign, Carol I noted in a dateless Memory[14] the insufficient level of development of the Romanian parliamentary regime caused by the existing traditions and continuous confrontations among politicians and came to the conclusion that the Constitution of 1866 needed to be revised for the parliamentary power to be limited, using: withdrawal of the right to control finances, the Lord's approval for the election of the president of Assembly of Deputies, the reduction of time assigned to questions addressed to ministers and the debates related to the vote for the answer of the throne message. But, following "the received suggestions from the diplomatic groups of Berlin"[15], that desire of the monarch was to remain at the level of a mere initiative.

The constitution of 1866 suffered a series of revisions in 1879, 1884, 1917, but the amended dispositions are not important for the subject approached in our research.

The new social, economical and political reality of the country will be regulated by the Constitution of 1923, one of the most European democratic Constitutions of the inter-war period[16], based on the governmental act of 1866, of which 87 articles were entirely kept. The state powers were equally kept, but some improvements were brought in, regarding the Parliament control over the Government.

Besides the MPs' rights to start investigations (article 50) and to address questions and petitions received from citizens to ministers, the obligation to answer the questions was established within the terms provided by the rules of each chamber (article 52), but also the obligation to give explanations about the forwarded petitions (article 53- ministers are obliged to give explanations over their activity each time the Assembly asks for it).

Regarding the subjects approached by the members of the two chambers within the questions addressed to ministers, those had in view matters of different fields as economy, culture, external politics, minorities, education, various social categories, etc.

It is interesting to notice that concerning the collaboration between powers, provided in article 96 of the Constitution[17], this gets new values by the amendment of the two chambers' regulations, in the sense that public sessions of the two Assemblies could only be opened in front of at least one minister.

As an innovation regarding the executive power, the Government is regulated as a distinct body in article 92: „The Government performs the executive power on the King's behalf as established by Constitution" and the Council of Ministers is established in article 93 being ruled by a person appointed by the monarch in order to create the Government: „The gathered Ministers constitute the Council of Ministers which is presided under the title of President of the Ministers' Council by the one in charge with the government creation".

Under the auspices of those new fundamental laws, they also kept the ministers' liability and the practice of censure votes given in Parliament, a minister or even the entire Government being likely to resign in the event of receiving a vote of non-confidence within the Assemblies.

During that period, the executives manifested their tendency to prevail over the Parliament power, but also to elude the debates on the normative acts of the two Assemblies by using the decree-law method, method which was frequently used starting from 1934 by the governments ruled by Gheorghe Tătărescu.

In 1938, on an intense political tension background and on external threats as well, the King Carol II installed the monarchical dictatorship by introducing a new Constitution approved by the Assemblies can request the ministers' presence at their deliberations.

Referendum of the 24th of February, held under a state of siege conditions, by open vote, with a separate list for opponents.

The democratic rights and freedoms were severely limited, but the mimed principle of state power separation was maintained. The Parliament's power was diminished, being granted the limited right of normative initiative[18], and the executive power, the King, was assigned a more important role being the "head of the state". The Constitution stipulated throughout Chapter 3, About the Government and Ministers the composition of the government, the necessary requirements for acceding the office of minister or secretary of state, liability and restrictions after the mandate expiry.

In the parliament control field, we can't find anymore the right of parliament chambers to initiate inquiries and to submit the received petitions to ministers, art. 25 stating as follows: „ Anybody has the right to address petitions, undersigned by one or more persons, to public authorities, but on behalf of the undersigned only. The authorities have the right to address collective petitions by themselves".

Ministers are accountable from the political point of view only to the King, the Parliament has no more power to sanction and dismiss the Government, having only a small influence, most of the time invested with a greater importance by some authors of the time[19], just from their desire to justify the new constitutional provisions.

Interpellations were replaced by the institution of the parliamentary questions, article 55 stating as follows: „Each member of the Assemblies has the right to address questions to ministers to which they are obliged to respond within the regulation provided term". The debates are avoided in this way within the Parliament which could have led to the passage of motions and to a censure vote for government as the „question didn't have the value of a question anymore"[20].

The Constitution was suspended in the fall of 1940 following to the forced abdication of King Carol II, the two parliamentary chambers dissolved and Romania was to be ruled for four years throughout decrees by Ion Antonescu's military dictatorship regime. In 1946 the Parliament restored the unicameral Chamber of Deputies and it became the Grand National Assembly by the Constitution of 1948.

This fundamental law, as well as the subsequent ones from 1952 and 1965, established the authoritarian character of the communist regime and visibly diverted from the "state power separation principle"[21]. Gheorghe Gh Tănase believed that those „did not establish the state power separation principle, as the Marxist doctrine stated the uniqueness of state power and defined it as an organized power of one class oppressing the other"[22].

We'll summarize below the means of the so-called parliamentary control stipulated in these fundamental acts, adapted means which led to the application and fulfilment of the unique party's policy, Romanian Communist Party: the questions and interpellations addressed to the Government or ministers individually, investigations and researches in any field, hearing the reports of the state administration chiefs, of the Prosecution and Supreme Court by the parliament standing committees.

After the Revolution of 1989, Romania returned to a democratic regime based on free elections, political pluralism, separation of state powers, the observance of human rights and the governors' liability before representative bodies. The new Constitution was adopted in 1991 and reviewed in 2003.

2.Parliamentary control – actual constitutional provisions

2.1 Control mechanisms and procedures

In his work,[23] professor Ioan Muraru underlines the parliamentary control and he divided it into six directions, mentioning the powers of the legislative:

1.control performed by giving explanations, messages, reports, programs;
2. control performed by parliamentary commissions;
3. control performed by questions and interpellations;
4. the MPs right to request and obtain necessary information;
5. control performed by settling the citizens' claims;
6. control performed by the Ombudsman.

In the French professor's opinion, Yves Mény[24] we can distinguish three types of parliamentary control over the executives:

- Partisan control, led by the opposition being efficient under the government's condition of vulnerability;
- non-partisan control, by means of the parliamentary control which can embrace various forms: questions, commissions, hearings, etc;
- control with sanction, as a censure motion, which is the most drastic, but it cannot be used many times without destabilizing the system;

2.1.1 Motion

The punitive dimension of control function refers to the effective sanction for the Government. This can be done, as in Romanian Parliament case, by censure or simple motions and it may concern, in increasing order of importance: forcing the Government to adopt certain policy measures (by approving a simple motion), the dismissing one or more ministers (by approving a simple motion where expressly required) or dismissing the entire cabinet (by voting a censure motion).

The procedure for submitting and adopting a motion is basically the same in Romania as in the other former-communist countries, with some small differences. Romania does not practice the so-called "constructive motion of censure" which obliges the initiators to mention the name of the potential prime-minister who would probably undertake that charge in case of motion approval. Poland and Hungary are the ones which apply this system. Another noteworthy difference refers to the necessary number of signatures for putting forward a censure motion. Poland has the most permissive Constitution which allows the introduction of a non-confidence vote by 46 MPs of the total of 460. As for the other Central and East European countries, the number equals to one-fifth (Bulgaria, Hungary) or a quarter (Czech Republic) of all those which have the right to initiate a motion of censure. From this point of view, Romania is part of the more restrictive states, being necessary one-third of the total number of MPs.

Due to the system drawbacks described in the previous chapter, for the MPs forming the opposition, the motion of censure has acquired another stake, which is missing for the countries where communication between Parliament and Government works normally. The initiation of a censure motion has become almost the only opportunity on which the Prime Minister may be brought before Parliament for an effective debate on actual acute problems. This is also valid for simple motions which determine the presence of the other cabinet members before the regulatory forum, depending on their subject. In this way, the Romanian, "parliamentarism" is the generator of a paradoxical and abnormal phenomenon for an operative system: in conditions in which, on one hand, the information dimension of the parliamentary control function is atrophied and on the other hand the chances that a simple or censure motion to be adopted are minimal, as a translation produces between the punitive and information dimension of the control function. In other words, the second dimension – represented by motions – loses its punitive character and it assumes the role and purpose of the information dimension. Given the fact that the mechanisms designed to generate debates among the MPs and cabinet members and to ensure communication, information – interpellations and questions – slightly fulfil their role, they were undertaken by stronger mechanisms - motions. Thus, the tolls of parliamentary struggle involving sanctions are used to generate debates which questions and interpellations would have meant. This aspect explains the increasing frequency of filed simple motions in both Chambers.

Moreover, the public "attention"-enjoyed motions and in general parliamentary debate of utmost importance is extremely low. The public character of Parliament sessions does not equal and does not trigger their promotion. Only motions of censure enjoyed some publicity in the last legislation (there were 10 censure motions initiated in the actual legislature).

2.1.2 Questions and interpellations

These tools represent the most common and convenient way to control the executive power activities. According to article 112, par. (1) in the Romanian Constitution „The Government and each of its members shall be bound to answer the questions or interpellations raised by the deputies or senators, under the terms stipulated by the regulations of the two Chambers of the Parliament". Thus, the Romanian fundamental law, unlike other European constitutions (Austria, Bulgaria, Cyprus, Ireland, Luxemburg, Russian Federation), provides the difference between these two parliamentary tools, belonging to the so-called non-legislative activity of Parliament.

The differences between questions and interpellations are basically related to procedure and content.

Questions

In European countries with a rich parliamentary tradition, to address questions to Government is one of the most ancient rights of the members of legislative power, being used for the first time in 1721 by the House of Lords in UK. Also in that country in 1902, there was inaugurated the system of written responses for the questions which couldn't receive one due to lack of time.

This mean of parliamentary control is defined both in the Regulation of the Chamber of Deputies in article 165, par. 2, and in the Senate's in article 158, par. 2, as a "simple request to answer whether or not a fact is true, whether or not an information is accurate, whether or not the Government or other public administration bodies will release to the Chamber the information and documents required by the Chamber of Deputies or by the Parliamentary Committees, or if the Government intends to rule on a particular matter".

Thus, certain information is required by means of questions, explanations and the Government, ministers or other leaders of public administration are their targets. An MP cannot address more than two questions in the same week.

Regarding their content, the questions of personal or private matter are not allowed, as well as the ones which aim to obtain legal advice, or refer to lawsuits pending before courts or the ones concerning the activity of some persons who do not hold public offices.

The questions raised by the Romanian MPs should have a single author, while in some countries there are regulations regarding the number of persons who can initiate such question: for instance five in Austria or Latvia or nine in Lithuania.

We can distinguish between oral and written questions, each category being subject to certain procedural rules which varies depending on parliamentary chamber.

The Chamber of Deputies has schedule for receiving questions on Monday at every two weeks, between 18,30-19,30, provided prior notification of the object, the answer being received within 15 days after sending. The answer cannot exceed 3 minutes and another 2 if there are comments from the author or clarifications are required. Also, for justified cases, the answer can be delayed, fact which occurs in the absence of the targeted minister.

Written questions are sent to the appointed secretary of the Chamber of Deputies and there should be mentioned the type of desired answer: oral, written or both which will be done within maximum 15 days from filing. No deputy can address more than two questions in the same meeting.

Questions pending on answer are published in the Official Gazette of Romania, Part II, at the end of each ordinary session.

In the Senate, although not stipulated in the Regulation, according to the parliamentary custom, the answer to the oral questions addressed by senators is given on Mondays too, being the last point on the agenda between 18:00 -19:30 and they are usually broadcasted live on public radio station. The time allocated to an intervention is also of three minutes and it may be extended with another two minutes for further clarifications or comments. If the orally asked person is not present, the answer will be given in the next week meeting.

Oral answers to written questions are given after the questions are over and the written ones are sent to the author within maximum 15 days.

Questions and answers are recorded in the transcript and they are published in the Official Gazette of Romania, Part II.

The questions' subjects cover a large range of topics and they can be both of local issues, of the parliamentary constituency and of general interest.

Sometimes, using this mean of parliamentary control can be a launching springboard, being used by the MPs to improve, enhance the public image or inside their own party. In this way, the remarks, made in the XIX century by the famous essayist and British journalist, Walter Bagehot, are still valid: „there are no limits concerning the parliament curiosity. (...) Some of them address question from a genuine desire of knowledge or a real desire to improve the subject of what they ask; others to see their names in newspapers; others to demonstrate to a vigilant constituency they are always in alert; others to go ahead and get an office in the government; others because their habit is to ask questions"[25].

[25] Walter Bagehot, undertaken by Matti Wiberg*, Parliamentary Questioning: Control by Communication*, in the work Parliaments and Majority Rule in Western Europe, edited by Herbert Dőring, St. Martin's Press, New York, 1996, p 181

Interpellations

An interpellation is, according to article 173, par. 1 in the Regulation of the Chamber of Deputies and article 161, par. 1 of the Senate's, a request addressed to the Government or to a minister by one or more MPs or by a parliamentary group by means of which they require explanations on Government policies.

They differ from questions both by their high importance and their regulatory procedure.

In the Chamber of Deputies, interpellations are made in writing by underlying their object and they are read in public sessions assigned to questions, following to be sent by the president to the chamber of the receiver; they occur on Mondays in the same time with the question sessions and the time of an interpellation cannot exceed five minutes. The answer has to last five minutes too and it can be extended with another two minutes if any further questions or comments from the author.

An interpellation is formulated to create a debate, sometimes its object can turn into a simple motion adopted by the Chamber of Deputies.

Interpellations addressed to the prime-minister are filed to the Secretary of the Chamber of Deputies till Wednesdays, hours 14,00, from the week preceding the prime-minister's responses and they should refer to the Government policy on important issues of its external or internal affairs and the answers are given on Mondays at every two weeks, hours 18,00-18,30, and they can be postponed one week only.

The Regulation also provides, at the request of one or more parliamentary groups or of the prime-minister, the possibility to organize political debates in the plenary with the prime-minister's attendance at issues of major interest for the political, economical and social development. The same parliamentary group can ask for a political debate just once per session, while the prime-minister can ask for maximum two political debates per session.

In the Senate, unlike the lower chamber, interpellations are filed in writing by underlying the object and the motivation, following to be sent after their reading in public session established by the Standing Bureau. The deadline for answering is of two weeks and sometimes three weeks in certain occasions.

The author of an interpellation has three minutes in the debate session and the prime-minister or his representative five. These terms can be extended by the same ones in case of replies. The answer to the interpellations addressed to the Government members is presented by the minister or, as it might be, by a state secretary.

The Senate may also pass a motion by which it can express its position on a matter which was the object of an interpellation.

As the lower Chamber of Parliament, interpellations are written, in chronologic order, in a special register and they are displayed at the Senate's.

Due to the blooming activity of the parliamentary groups in the opposition, the number of questions and interpellations addressed to Government has dramatically increased so that we can notice by comparing them to the registered figures in the Chamber of Deputies in fig. 1 for 2000 and 2010, that the number of questions has multiplied by more than 13 times and the interpellations by approx. 10 times. The Senate has recorded the same upward trend.

Another factor which increased the number of questions and interpellations is represented by the electoral law amendment, as the uninominal vote was preferred instead of the party list, a fact that generated a stronger relationship between the MP and his electoral constituency. There can be noticed the great importance of local issues within the approached topics by these parliamentary control means.

Analyzing the actual regulations of the Chamber of Deputies and Senate and the way they are reflected in practice, we can notice certain inadvertences which influence directly the relations between Parliament and Government and also the efficiency of the parliamentary control.

Thus we take into account the fact that many times the prime-minister or ministers don't answer the questions and interpellations addressed to them. In order to illustrate this fact we'll use the data presented in a report[26] elaborated by The Institute of Public Policies which reveals that 24% of the formulated interpellations in the February – June 2009 session by MPs remained unanswered.

Another important element is the fact that the direct receivers of questions and interpellations attend the plenary debates very seldom. The parliamentary rules have been amended and they allow the prime-minister's replacement with a representative and the ministers' with a state secretary, but we do consider that their direct involvement would improve the scrutiny performance and would fully justify the institution of the executives' political accountability to the legislative power as found in modern states with strongly consolidated democracy.

Also, the two-week interval, long enough for receiving answers, leads in certain situations to the topic out of date, to the loss of attention and topicality. In order to avoid such situations, we consider as compulsory the introduction of the institution of urgent questions/interpellations on current issues at least in the regulations of one parliamentary chamber as demonstrated by some member states in the EU: Austria, Denmark, France, Germany, Greece, Ireland, Latvia, Lithuania, and Luxembourg. In UK, questions can be addressed from Monday to Thursday, after exhausting the agenda and answered within maximum 3 days, except the emergencies, whose answer is formulated on the same day.

2.1.3 Committees of Inquiry

In order to conduct further inquiries, clarification of cases or circumstances related to particular events or facts, the parliamentary control can be performed the standing committees, but, basically, these powers may be assigned to some special inquiry committees.

Article 64 par. (4) in the Romanian Constitution states that „Each Chamber shall set up Standing Committees and may institute inquiry committees or other special committees. The Chambers may set up joint committees". The Chambers can also constitute joint committees; the dispositions related to their establishment and functioning are detailed within the rules of each parliamentary chamber as well as in the rules of joint meetings.

In order to establish an inquiry commission there are required signatures of at least 50 deputies coming from two parliamentary groups or of 1/3 of the number of senators, and the joint decision shall be submitted to the Standing Bureau/Joint Standing Bureaus of the respective chamber or parliament, accompanied by the list of signatures; the vote will follow in the plenary. The committee starts its activity and it can hear any person who may be aware of facts or circumstances which can lead to the truth and can also instruct for an expertise to be conducted. After finishing and submitting the report to be voted, the committee ceases its activity.

The reports originated from such a committee have a consultative character and they do not constitute legal evidences, but they can be a start for criminal prosecutions by the judiciary bodies. The influence of such an inquiry committee on the public opinion shouldn't be overlooked.

2.1.4 The investigation of citizens' petitions

Citizens can send petitions to MPs in virtue of the received popular mandate, being an intermediary between citizens and the Government. In the Chamber of Deputies works the Committee for the Investigation of Abuses, Corrupt Practices, and for Petitions and in the Senate the Committee for the investigation of Abuse, Corruption and Petitions.

The cases reported by petitions are examined, processed, investigations can be made regarding the reported cases or they can notify the competent public authorities.

2.2 Parliamentary control on European affairs

One of the goals of the Lisbon Treaty, ratified by the member states on the 1st of December 2009, was to strengthen the role of national parliaments, making them important players for the European construction by active involvement in decision-making.

Under the Treaty decisions, the European institutions (The Commission, the European Parliament and the Council) send their draft projects of normative acts to national parliaments, the latter being able to express its motivated point of view regarding the subsidiarity principle within 8 weeks.

Thus, the Romanian Parliament is granted the competence to perform parliamentary control on the government's activity with respect to the European affairs as well. The received informational flow is also relevant (either it is about projects of normative acts, consultative documents as white, green books or communications or by the Council's agendas and minutes), which can be fructified and also the political dialogue[27] with the European Commission.

Parliamentary control on European affairs (scrutiny) is a control which has in view the following documents issued by the institutions of the European Union:

a) draft projects of eligible normative acts for checking the compliance or breach of the subsidiarity principle (it also bears the name of subsidiarity test);

b) draft projects of normative acts of the European Commission, European Union Council or European Parliament and the consultative documents of the European Commission selected by their political, economical, legal, social or financial relevance;

c) draft projects of normative acts of the EU for which the Romanian Government elaborates general mandates.

The procedure of parliamentary control on European affairs is an ex-ante intervention, performed before the adoption of the European acts (directives, regulations, decisions), unlike the legislative ordinary procedure, which operates after their adoption in order to be implemented in the national law. Its final product is an opinion, a point of view formulated after analyzing those policies which do not generate legal obligations and do not produce direct applicable effects, while the final product of the legislative procedure is the law itself which is directly applicable.

In order to perform this operation, it is necessary to establish a whole construction with implications to normative, institutional and administrative level. At institutional level, a cooperation [27] Also named the „Barroso initiative". It was initiated on September 2006 and it meant an important change especially in the countries where Parliament depended on the information offered by Government regarding legislation discussed in Strasbourg or Brussels.

law is required between Parliament and Government on European affairs; finally, after a long delay the Government put forward, on the 18th of January 2012, a draft bill[28].

According to the Treaty's provisions, the Chamber of Deputies and the Senate have each one vote and also a specific procedure.

3 Relations between the Parliament and other institutions

3.1 Chief of state

We chose to use this title as, in our opinion, these two institutions, the Parliament and the chief of state, should have permanently collaboration and balanced relations, considering the fact that they both express the will of the majority among citizens and also the fact that the President is a mediator between ''the state powers and between the state and society''[29]; the control mechanisms should be used responsibly, without generating crisis and constitutional instability.

These relations between the Parliament and the President can only come from the Constitution and are determined by analyzing and interpreting the provisions of the fundamental act.

Article 88 from the Constitution gives the President the power to address ''messages on the main political issues of the nation" and does not represent a mechanism of parliamentary control; but it was long discussed when we came to the moment of the debates in the two chambers of the Parliament and lead to the conclusion that it can even be rejected, which, in our opinion, is the equivalent of exercising parliamentary control.

The Constitutional Court of Romania was called in 1994 to decide on the issue of constitutionality of Article 7 in the Standing Rules on the joint sessions of the Chamber of Deputies and of the Senate. On this occasion, the Court[30] defined the message as ''an exclusive and unilateral politic act of the President of Romania, which the Chambers, met in joint session, have … only the obligation of receiving it ''. Therefore, a parliamentary debate cannot be organized in order for the message to be discussed with the participation of the President, because this would mean engaging his political responsibility; after the presentation of the message, the Parliament can debate it and even adopt measures, without rejecting the message, as ''receiving'' cannot be confused with ''rejecting''. In the same document, the Court interpreted the provisions from article 88 as a ''modality of cooperation between the two authorities, elected by direct vote – The Parliament and the President of Romania".

The parliamentary control resides in other two constitutional articles: suspension from office and impeachment.

Article 95 refers to what professor Ioan Muraru calls ''the political responsibility of the President…in order to differentiate it from the criminal liability"[31]. The same author considers that the suspension from office is in fact an element of the parliamentary control exercised upon the executive power represented by the President of Romania[32].

Thus, in case of having committed grave acts infringing upon the provisions of the fundamental law, the President may be proposed for suspension from office by at least one third of the number of deputies and senators. The proposal must include a motivation, all the imputations and all the proofs. This initiative is debated in the joint meeting of the two chambers which can decide, with the vote of the majority and after a consultation with the Constitutional Court[33]. The President may participate in the debate in order to explain the facts which are imputed to him. After a positive vote, the Parliament decides the date for the referendum, organised for the dismissal of the President[34], but no later than 30 days, according to Law 3 / 2000. The interim chief of state is the President of the Senate, second in the state line.

When the 1991 Constitution was written, the provisions of article 95 were taken from the Austrian Constitution, but in an incomplete way, as that article states the dissolution of the Parliament in case of a favourable result in the referendum for the chief of state. This is a fair situation, so in case the initiative for the dismissal of the President fails, before term parliamentary elections should come as a natural consequence. In our opinion, this change should be also introduced in case of a future amendment of the Constitution.

The criminal liability of the chief of state is engaged in case of high treason and the members of the two chambers, in joint session, based on a two thirds votes, can impeach him, according to article 97, paragraph (1) from the Constitution.

The New Criminal Code, coming into force on the 1st of September 2012, introduces the high treason offence in article 398 and it defines the following facts: treason by transmitting secret state information, treason by helping the enemy, actions against the constitutional order, which are punished with life imprisonment or prison from 15 to 25 years and prohibition of certain rights.

The decision issued by the Parliament and signed by the presidents of the two chambers is sent to the General prosecutor for the High Court of Cassation and Justice to be notified.

3.2 Authorities of the public administration

The fundamental law institutes three types of control for the activity of the authorities of the public administration: parliamentary – the Government and other bodies of the public administration have the obligation to present the information and documents requested by the Chamber of Deputies, the Senate, or parliamentary committees, through their respective presidents (article 111), judicial – article 25 and 52 and administrative – article 102.

Some of the instruments presented above are also used in this type of control performed by the Parliament: questions, interpellations, inquiry committees, but in this case we shouldn't be dealing with a strict political control aiming for the law, human rights and citizens' freedoms to be observed, for the prevention and sanctioning of the abuses of the public servants.

A peculiar aspect is represented by the autonomous administrative authorities which may be established by an organic law and are also situated in the area of the parliamentary control. They are not under the authority of the Government but they have a special relation with the legislative body, either by presenting annual reporst or by having their leadership appointed by the Parliament:

- Court of Accounts
- Legislative Council
- Romanian Ombudsman
- Romanian Intelligence Service
- Competition Council
- Foreign Intelligence Service
- Guard and Protection Service
- Special Telecommunications Service

2. On the 19th of April 2007 regarding Traian Basescu's suspension, initiated by 182 members of the Parliament; it was adopted with 322 votes in favour, 108 votes against and 10 null votes.

[34] The Referendum for Traian Băsescu's dismissal took place on the 19th of May 2007 and the results were: 24,75% in favour and 74,48% against.

- National Council for the Search of Security Archives
- Romanian Television Society
- National Authority for Communications
- National Council for Combating Discrimination
- Private Pension System Supervisory Commission
- Romanian National News Agency AGERPRES
- National Bank of Romania
- Romanian National Securities Commission

As for the parliamentary oversight of the intelligence agencies, there are The Joint Standing Committee of the Chamber of Deputies and the Senate for the exercise of parliamentary control over the activity of the Romanian Intelligent Service SRI and The Joint Standing Committee of the Chamber of Deputies and the Senate for the exercise of parliamentary control over the activity of the Foreign Intelligent Service SIE. These committees permanently evaluate the manner in which the political option is converted and applied. Thus, the parliamentary control represents a dimension of the decisional activities accomplished by the public supreme authority.

The powers of the two committees extend over examining the observance of the constitutional provisions and of other acts in this field, controlling the way the money from the state budget is spent, approving the draft bills and resolving the complaints and petitions of the citizens which consider their rights and freedoms affected by the means used in intelligence.

4.Conclusions

The dimension of the mechanisms of parliamentary control, their intensity and quality may vary according to the state's form of governance – political regime, electoral system, unicameral/bicameral organization of Parliament, its political structure, criteria which are also heightened by the tradition and parliamentary culture of each state. An interesting situation and transformation might follow in case of the announced changes to take place in Romania: unicameral Parliament (as a result of the referendum held on the 19th of May 2007), amendment of the electoral laws (also from the point of view of the results of the census conducted in 2011), establishment of regions as a new form of territorial organisation of the Romanian state (political as in Spain or administrative as in France).

The Romanian Parliament must prevent any possible slippages which sometimes are common in practice and avoid becoming a voting machine without amending the texts put forward by the Government. A very dangerous approach, an abuse in the relation between the Parliament and Government is the use of the responsibility assumptions (14 times for 19 laws during the last 3 years) and government ordinances by eluding the legislative debate and thus threatening the democracy rules. Thus, in our opinion, it is necessary to provide in the constitutional text a limitation in time and number regarding these instruments.

Using the sociological method, in our next future papers we intend to conduct a poll/survey among the members of the actual legislature of the Romanian Parliament, from all political parties represented, regarding the efficiency of the parliamentary on the executive by the means presented in our current study. The questionnaire, the sample and the methods for data interpretation will be set in collaboration with experts in sociology.

None of the three powers in the state prevails, there are many cooperation, collaboration areas, traced wider or narrower and despite its critics, Montesquieu's principle remains one of the main values of contemporaneous democratic political regimes.

CLASSIFICATION OF FUNDAMENTAL RIGHTS AND FREEDOMS – A DIACHRONIC APPROACH AND CURRENT TRENDS

NICOLAE PAVEL*

Abstract

What seems relevant to this study is the current trend of the classification of rights and fundamental freedoms according to the universal and indivisible values criterion, criterion established by the Charter of Fundamental Rights of European Union. Taking as reference the new scientific criterion, we propose a diachronic approach classification in terms of rights and fundamental freedoms in the light of juridical doctrine and in terms of European and international documents on human rights and citizen. It is necessary to point out from the beginning that the classification of fundamental rights and freedoms does not imply a hierarchy and, from this point of view we consider it necessary to classify or group the rights and fundamental freedoms by scientific criteria, at least from the following reasons: it facilitates their explanation, their general characteristics and basic understanding, and the progress of their content and scope. By this approach, the proposed study opens a complex and complete vision, but not exhaustive on the classification classification of the current human and citizen rights. That is why the study begins with preliminary specifications that establish the terminology used in the content of the study, the correlation between domestic regulations and international human rights and the relationship between law and the law of European Union. Following a key – scheme we analyse successively the two major parts of the study, namely the classification of fundamental rights and freedoms in terms of constitutional doctrine and the doctrine of human rights, and the current trends on the classification of fundamental rights and freedoms.

Keywords*: fundamental rights, fundamental freedoms, diachronic approach, current trends, values.*

1. Introduction The subject of scientific endeavor will be circumscribed to the scientific analysis of two large parts of it: 1. The diachronic and selective approach of the classification of fundamental rights and freedoms in terms of Romanian and French constitutional doctrine and the doctrine of human rights; 2. Current trends regarding the classification of fundamental rights and freedoms, their diachronic and selective approach in European and international documents on human and citizens rights from the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and other subsequent documents adopted at international and European level, in the Romanian constitutional doctrine and the doctrine of European human rights and in the constitutions of certain EU member states.

In our opinion, the study is important for the constitutional doctrine in the field, the doctrine of human rights and for the European law doctrine of human rights, as by this scientific approach, we propose to establish, diachronically and selectively, a complex and complete illustration, but not exhaustive of the entire current trends on the classification of human rights and fundamental freedoms. For full but not exhaustive coverage of the field of study, following the preliminary specifications, we propose the classification of fundamental rights and freedoms in the Romanian constitutional doctrine. This classification was made according to a conceptual model representing the analysis on the contribution of Romanian authors of constitutional law, starting with the holder of the first constitutional law course at the Law Faculty of Bucharest, from 1915 until today.

By comparing the legislation, we selected for this study the French constitutional doctrine and the doctrine of human rights, as described in Section 3.1, which was the primary source of inspiration for the Romanian constitutional doctrine.

* Associate Proffesor Ph. D., Constitutional Law and Political Institutions, Faculty of Law and Public Administration, Bucharest, Spiru Haret University, 4 Berceni Str., Sector 4, Bucharest, (email: nicolaepavel0@yahoo.com)

Also, from the French constitutional and human rights doctrine we present briefly, in a diachronic and selective approach, classifications of public freedoms, which in our opinion are synonymous with the classification of fundamental rights and freedoms of Romanian constitutional doctrine.

In terms of full but not exhaustive coverage of the area of classifying the fundamental rights and freedoms, we have introduced in the conceptual model, a diachronic and selective approach of the current trends on classification of rights and freedoms. By this approach, we aim to identify the classification of human rights and citizen in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and other subsequent documents adopted at international and European level, in the Romanian constitutional doctrine and European law doctrine of human rights, and in the constitutions of certain states of the European Union.

Even if the classification of fundamental rights and freedoms traces back in time from the adoption of the first written constitution, the theoretical interest to resume it is determined by the fact that the existing literature in the field has not always paid sufficient attention to theoretical classification of fundamental rights and freedoms.

Moreover, in the literature considered, in our opinion, the approach has not reflected diachronicaly and selectivele the complex and complete but not exhaustive classification area of fundamental rights and freedoms.

In addition, in the study we have analysed the new criterion of universal and indivisible values for classifying the universal and fundamental rights and freedoms.

2. Preliminary specification

This study is a continuation and extension of the scope of previous research on human rights and fundamental freedoms. The previous study focused on the study of Concept of fundamental human rights in the light of juridical values theory.[1]

The study includes in paragraph 3 the diachronic approach to the concept of fundamental rights in terms of classic constitutional doctrine and the doctrine of human rights. At the end of the study, we defined the concept of fundamental rights in the light of juridical values theory.

The concept of fundamental rights approached from the perspective of juridical value theory reads: "Fundamental rights are those subjective rights of man and citizen, components of the human dimension, which in axiological approach are vital to the dignity and freedom of the people and for the free development of human personality, universal values, common European values and Romanian supreme values enshrined and guaranteed in the universal and European standards and in the Romanian Constitution and which subsumes four determinations of relativity: first determination of relativity relates to approaching the temporal evolution of human rights, the second determination of relativity relates to addressing the economic, social, political and cultural context of a society organized in a state, the third determination of relativity refers to the lack of synchronicity between the provisions at universal or regional level and those at state or national levels, and the fourth determination of relativity refers to the diversity of approaches to human rights issues explained by the heterogeneity of the international community."

Regarding the components of fundamental rights concept outlined above, for this study we observe the following:

a) Fundamental rights and freedoms have the same juridical status, both being subjective rights.

b) We define subjective rights as prerogatives or powers guaranteed by the Constitution and law to the will of the subjects to the juridical relation to act or not in a particular way, which implies recognition of a sphere of individual autonomy, or to require an appropriate attitude from the other subject or subjects, and ultimately to seek protection for his right from state authorities if it is illegally harmed. As mentioned in the previous study, we observed that in legal terms, the right is a freedom and freedom is a right, and, in this regard, between the two terminological nuances there is no difference in terms of legal nature, which in our opinion constitutes one fundamental concept, namely the fundamental right.

c) The terminological distinction of fundamental right and fundamental freedom has at least one historical explanation.[2] Initially, the so called liberal freedoms appeared in the catalog of human rights as exigencies of man as opposed to public authorities, and these freedoms required the other only a general attitude of restraint from any action that might prejudice these freedoms.

The development of freedoms, in the broader context of political and social development, resulted in a crystallization of the concept of human right, concept with complex legal content and meaning. Furthermore, in relation to state authorities, human rights involved also correlative obligations, at least of protection. In time, these freedoms were not only proclaimed, but also promoted and especially protected, guaranteed.

d) Throughout the study we use the terms rights and fundamental freedoms, with reference to Chapter II of Title II of the Romanian Constitution, republished in 2003, and entitled Rights and Fundamental Freedoms. In our opinion, the title of this chapter is such a formulation at least from the following reasons.Within a state, there are citizens, foreign citizens and stateless persons. According to article 15 paragraph (1) of the Constitution of Romania, republished, citizens enjoy the rights and freedoms enshrined in the Constitution and other laws. In accordance with the article 18 paragraph (1) of the Romanian Constitution, foreign citizens and stateless persons shall enjoy general protection of persons and property, guaranteed by the Constitution and other laws. Furthermore, in accordance with article 1 paragraph (3) of the Romanian Constitution, republished, rights and freedoms are supreme and guaranteed values.

Also, in the present study we use the terms fundamental rights and freedoms of citizens when we refer to rights and freedoms enshrined in the Constitution and other laws.

e) We note that the European standards on human rights and fundamental freedoms make use of the term right to freedom. This term can be found in European standards in article 5 of the Convention on Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms and in article 6 of the Charter of Fundamental Rights of European Union, and proclaims the right to freedom of any person. In our opinion, by using this term, the initiators of the mentioned documents wanted to establish an additional guarantee to the freedom proclaimed at the European level, by combining the general attitude to refrain from any action that might prejudice this freedom by the state or European authorities with the obligation of these authorities to protect it.

f) In our opinion, the need to classify the fundamental rights and freedoms does not imply a hierarchy, and in this regard we consider it necessary to classify or group rights and fundamental freedoms by scientific criteria, at least taking into account the following two reasons: to facilitate their explanation and understand their general and essential characteristics.

g) The study of classifying the fundamental rights and freedoms is also necessary in terms of the current trend to classify the fundamental rights in universal and European standards on human rights and the newly revised constitutions of member states of the European Union. This trend, in our opinion should be correlated with constitutional regulations in the field, regarding the relationship between domestic, international and European law. From this perspective, we must mention at least three basic rules:

[2] Muraru, Ioan and Tănăsescu, Elena Simina, Constitutional Law and Political Institutions, 13 edition, Vol. I. (Bucharest: All Beck, 2008), 141.

- A first fundamental rule in the matter is identified in the content of the article 11 paragraph (2) of the Romanian Constitution,[3] revised, referring to Relationships between international and domestic law, and establishes that Treaties ratified by the Parliament, by law, are part of the domestic law.

- The second fundamental rule in the matter is established by the article 20 of the Romanian Constitution, republished, referring to International treaties on human rights, and also establishes the following two constitutional rules: the first rule states that the constitutional rights and freedoms shall be interpreted and applied in accordance with the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, the covenants and other treaties to which Romania is part, and the second states that if there is a conflict between the covenants and treaties on fundamental human rights to which Romania is part, and the national laws, international regulations shall take precedence, unless the Constitution or domestic laws comprise more favorable provisions.

- The third fundamental rule is stated in the article 148 paragraph (2) of the Romanian Constitution, revised, and establishes the relationship between domestic law and EU law, as follows: Following the accession, constituent treaties of the European Union and other mandatory community regulations have precedence over the provisions of the national laws, in compliance with the act of accession.

3. Classification of fundamental rights and freedoms in terms of constitutional doctrine and the doctrine of human rights

3.1. Classification of fundamental rights and freedoms in terms of Romanian constitutional doctrine

The need for classification, an order in grouping and enumerating the fundamental rights, appeared only after these rights were proclaimed in declarations of rights and especially in constitutions[4]. We must observe from the beginning that many classifications of fundamental rights and freedoms were made in the constitutional doctrine in diachronic evolution. This multitude of classifications can be explained by the evolution of constitutional regulations in time, both in terms of content and scope of fundamental rights and freedoms and human and citizen rights generations.

For this study, we mention that the second chair of constitutional law in Europe was founded only in 1834, in Paris, and it was entrusted to Pellegrino Rossi, an Italian. The author, in his Treaty of French Constitutional Law, considers insufficient the classification as civil and political rights and prefers the classification as private rights, public or social rights and political rights.[5]

Of the Romanian constitutional doctrine we present briefly, in a diachronic approach, the classifications of fundamental rights and freedoms of citizens, proposed by various authors.

a) In Romania, the field of constitutional law is strengthened by teaching and publishing the course Constitutional Law[6] by Professor Constantin Dissescu at Faculty of Law, University of Bucharest, in 1915. The author names Chapter IV of course The Rights of Romanians, but defines right as a regulation of freedoms and notes that the fundamental problem of social organization is the harmonization of freedoms in their coexistence, and concludes that the fundamental law of the United Principalities in 1866 regulates these freedoms and guarantees them in articles 5-30. The author states that when accepting a form of government, freedom and its cases may be reduced to three types. Based on this conclusion, he classifies the different types of freedoms into three major types of freedoms

a.1.) individual freedom, includes the right not to be arrested illegally, inviolability of domicile, judicial guarantees, ie the right not to be distracted from his natural judges, freedom of locomotion and emigration and religious freedom, which includes: freedom of conscience, religious liberty and freedom of propaganda.

a.2.) civil liberty, includes freedom of labour, that give rise to the right to property, freedom of speech and correspondence, and in connection to it, the freedom of press, freedom of assembly, freedom of association, and freedom of education.

a.3.) political freedom includes the right to vote, the right to stand as candidate, the right to hold public office, to serve on a jury and to serve in the military.

b) For the present study, it is appropriate to mention Professor Paul Negulescu's[7] contribution to the classification of fundamental rights and freedoms, of course, with the terminology of the historical period in which he conducted the study.

In our opinion the author proposed the classification of civil liberties based on the idea of individual liberty proclaimed by the French Declaration of Human Rights and Citizen which shows that public rights, also called public freedoms, or the rights of man and citizen, are faculty, opportunities recognized by the constituent legislative to all members of society except for specific restrictions in order to help improve and preserve the individual himself. Also, from the course Romanian Constitutional Law results that the professor had as reference the normative content of the Constitution of the United Principalities in 1866 and the Constitution of the United Kingdom of Romania in 1923.

According to the author's opinion, public freedoms fall into three categories: primary or basic freedoms, secondary or complementary freedoms, and collective freedoms.

b.1.) Basic or primary freedoms are: individual freedom, freedom of movement, inviolability of domicile, freedom of labour, trade and industry, the right to property, freedom of opinion, freedom of conscience and of religion.

On these freedoms, the author states: All these freedoms are absolutely necessary, without them the safety of the individual is inconceivable, we can not talk about individual freedom.

b.2.) Secondary or complementary freedoms: freedom of press, freedom of association or assembly.

On these freedoms, the author mentions that these freedoms shall be exercised without prior authorization, but that which, in their exercise, violates public policy, will suffer the consequences arising from this course.

The content of the course also gives way to a subclassification, named by the author Collective freedom. These are the right to association and assembly, enshrined in the article 28 and article 29 of the Constitution of the Kingdom of Romania in 1923.

In connection with the paragraphs a) and b) above, we also observe the following opinions:[8]

A typical aspect of the juridical literature before the Second World War was that the classification of rights included neither the socio-economic rights (which, of course, were not proclaimed by the constitutions), and with some exceptions, nor the political rights, because based on the fact that the French Declaration of the Rights of Man and Citizen of 1789 did not include any aspect in connection with the political rights, it seems that the authors of the Declaration did not considered them rights, but ways of exercising a function. Meanwhile, new aspects on their classification have been revealed.

Building on the above in the paragraphs a) and b), we observe the following aspects:

[7] Negulescu, Paul, Romanian Constitutional Law Course. (Bucharest: Edited by Alex. Th. Doicescu, 1927), 512-537.

[8] Muraru, Ioan and Tănăsescu, Elena Simina op. cit., 153-154.

1. Both authors cited were influenced by the French Declaration of the Rights of Man and of the Citizen and by French studies in the field.

2. The three categories of freedoms proposed by the first author correspond to three categories of relations that the individual can experience when he exercises his freedoms: in relation to himself, in relation to things and in relation to the other people.

3. The second author groups public liberties in the two categories that correspond, the first one to ensuring the individual's safety, and the second enablesman to spread his ideas.

4. For the first time in the Romanian constitutional doctrine before the Second World War, Collective Liberties are mentioned, and in our opinion this classification takes into account their way of exercise.

5. From the above, we note that although the Romanian Constitution of 1866, 1923 and 1938 constantly proclaim in the Title II Romanians' Rights, they are mentioned in the stuies in the field as public liberties, or public rights, or rights of man and citizen.

c) After the Second World War, after the totalitarian regimes were installed in Eastern Europe, including Romania, and especially after adopting the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and the two Pacts, many of the states Constitution were inspired by this model, incorporating its provisions, which led to increasing the complexity of the classification of rights and freedoms of citizens.

During the totalitarian regimes in Romania, we note for the present study, the classification of fundamental rights and freedoms proposed by Professor Nistor Prisca, in his course of Constitutional Law[9]. The author names the Title IV of the course Rights and fundamental duties of citizens, and in Chapter II of the mentioned Title, using the content criterion of fundamental rights of citizens, determines their classification. The author takes as reference of his classification the normative content of the Constitution of the Socialist Republic of Romania of 1965, republished[10].

On the opportunity to classify the fundamental rights of the citizen, the author states that this classification is necessary to facilitate explanation and understanding of many rights granted to citizens, it is necessary to group, to classify them according to certain criteria.

Thus, after some theoretical explanations, Nistor Prisca suggests the following classification of rights and freedoms of citizens:

c.1.) equal rights of citizens, Equality is defined by the author, as the right of citizens to have and equally exercise all rights under the Constitution and other laws, the right to participate equally in political, economic, social and cultural life, without any discrimination and the right to be treated on equal terms, both by the state and other citizens.

c.2.) socio-economic rights, which include: the right to work, right to rest, the right to material security from the state, the necessary conditions of physical and intellectual development, personal ownership, right of inheritance.

c.3.) social and political rights and freedoms of the citizen, which includes political rights: electoral rightsand rights to association and democratic freedoms: freedom of speech, press, meetings, and demonstrations, freedom of conscience.

c.4.) inviolability, which includes: personal inviolability, inviolability of the home and the secrecy of correspondence and telephone conversations.

c.5.) rights guarantees, which includes: the right to petition and right of the injured in his right by an illegal act of a state body, to request the competent bodies, as provided by law, its annulment and damages.

Building on the above in the paragraph c), we observe the following aspects.

[9] Prisca, N. Constitutional Law. (Bucharest: Editura Didactică şi Pedagogică, 1977), 239-278.

[10]  Constitution of The Romanian Socialist Republic of 1965, republished, was published in the Official Gazette of Romania, of February 20, 1968.

1. We notice that in the Romanian literature in the field, during the reference period under review, important changes occur in connectiom with the classification of fundamental rights and freedoms of the citizen.

2. These changes can be explained by the reception in the Constitution mentioned of the fundamental rights and freedoms contained in the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights and International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, ratified by the Romanian state.

d) After the Romanian Revolution of December 1989, the Constitution was adopted in 1991, revised in 2003, and republished. With reference to normative content of the Romanian Constitution of 1991, Professor Tudor Drăganu[11], in his course Constitutional Law and Political Institutions, reveals that for solving scientific classification of fundamental rights and freedoms it is necessary to apply a uniform and substantial criterion.

The author concludes that a classification can not claim to be scientific if the distinction between the groups of analyzed phenomena starts from a certain aspect of their own, while for others, on a different basis.

On the other hand, classification of phenomena studied in general must be based on consideration of their fundamental aspects, since only thus can reach the knowledge of the essential nature of the matter studied.

Using regulatory object criterion, the author sets the following classification of the fundamental rights of citizen:

d.1.) individual freedoms, which includes: the right to life and physical and mental integrity, right to live in the state and to move both at home and abroad, security, inviolability of domicile and residence, secrecy of correspondence and other means of communication, freedom of conscience and religious freedom, right to information.

d.2.) socio-economic rights, which includes: the right to work, right to health, right to strike, right to private property, right to inheritance, right to education, the right of the injured in its right by a public authority, through an administrative act or failure to solve a legal term requests to obtain recognition of his right, annulment and damages act, freedom of access to justice.

d.3.) political rights, which includes: the right to elect representatives in Parliament, the right to elect the President, the right to vote in the referendum, the right to initiate, together with the number of citizens eligible to vote according to art. 73 of the Constitution and the conditions there set the enactment, amendment or repeal of an ordinary or organic law, the right to initiate, together with the number of citizens eligible to vote according to art. 146 of the Constitution and the conditions there set revision of the Constitution, the right to elect representatives to local and county councils the right to be elected in Parliament, President of the Republic, member of the local authority in villages and towns.

d.4.) social and political rights, which includes: freedom of expression of thoughts, opinions or beliefs of any kind, by speech, writing, images, sounds or other means of communication, freedom of religion, freedom of assembly; freedom of association, right to petition.

d.5.) equal rights; on equal rights, the author sets the following clarifications. Equality refers to the universality of rights and obligations of citizenship. Also, equality encompasses all areas in which the person operates.

e) For this study, we note the contribution of professors Ioan Muraru and Elena Simina Tănăsescu to the classification of fundamental rights and freedoms[12]. Regarding the scientific criterion used for classification of fundamental rights and freedoms, the authors mention that the scientific criterion, verified, of the rights of citizens is that of their content, knowing that it is risky to give a classification of human rights based on their weight or importance.

Folosind criteriul conținutului drepturilor şi libertăților cetățeneşti, conținut ce determină şi finalitatea acestor drepturi, autorii clasifică drepturile şi libertățile fundamentale ale cetățenilor români în următoarele categorii:

Using the content criterion of rights and liberties, content that determines the purpose of rights, the authors group the rights and freedoms of the Romanian citizens in the following categories:

e.1.) inviolability; those rights and freedoms which by their content, ensure life, the possibility to move freely, the physical and mental health, individual and home safety. In this category are included: the right to life, right to physical integrity, right to mental integrity; individual freedom; the right to defense; the right to free movement; right to private life and private family protection; inviolability of domicile.

e.2.) socio-economic and cultural rights and freedoms, those rights and liberties that ensure by their content the social and material life conditions, education and the possibility of protection. This category includes: the right to education; access to culture; right to health; right to a healthy environment; right to employment and social protection of labor; the right to strike, ownership, right to inheritance; right to a decent living; the right to marry; the right of children and young persons to protection and assistance; the right of people with disabilities to special protection.

e.3.) exclusively political rights; ie rights which by their content may be exercised only by citizens for participating in governance. In this category are included: the right to vote and be elected, including to the European Parliament.

e.4.) social and political rights and freedom; ie those rights and freedoms which by their content may be exercised by choice, either to solve social and spiritual issues, or to participate in government. This category includes: freedom of conscience; freedom of expression; right to information; freedom of assembly, freedom of association, and secrecy of correspondence.

e.5.) rights guarantees, ie those rights which by their content play mainly the role of constitutional guarantees. This category includes: the right of petition, the right of the person injured by a public authority.

f) Throughout this study we observe the contribution of Professor Ion Deleanu[13] to the classification of rights and freedoms.

On the classification and nomination of the main rights and freedoms, the author makes the following preliminary comments; the complexity of discourse universe, multiplicity and variety of criteria that can lead to a possible classification make it difficult for this trial; the difficulty of classification is increased by the fact that one and the same freedom can be examined in various facets, in other words, it is likely to group it in two or more categories; however, attempts have been made, each with advantages and disadvantages; all these criteria and classifications have a formal character; yet in some degree, they involve and evoke both the substance of that right or freedom, and the purpose targeted by enshrining and ensuring that right or freedom; the nomination of main rights and freedoms is also difficult.

Under such difficulties and methodological limitations, the author proceeds to the classification and nomination of the main rights and freedoms, using the mode of exercising them as criterion, thus:

f.1.) rights and freedoms exercised individually or in person: f.1.1.) rights and freedoms that protect person and private life: the right to life, right to citizenship, right to personal security, privacy, freedom and inviolability of domicile, the secrecy of correspondence, the right to move; f.1.2.) rights and freedoms that protect individual options in private and social life: the right of person to dispose of himself, freedom of thought, freedom of speech, freedom of press, right to education, freedom of conscience, electoral rights, the right of petition, right to health insurance, the right to start a family, right to work or freedom of employment, social security, right to rest, freedom of association, right to strike, right to property, inheritance rights, freedom of trade and industry;

f.2.) group exercised freedoms: freedom of association, freedom of assembly, freedom demonstrations.

g) For the present study, we observe the contribution of the study author to the classification of rights and freedoms. [14] Also, we mention that we use the term rights for classification, since rights and freedom have the same legal status.

Using as method of study the theory of criterion relativity in terms of rights and fundamental freedoms' content; complex content with interdependent variables that can be analysed under different aspects, for the classification of these rights and freedoms and their nomination relativity according to this criterion, we establish the following classification:

g.1.) The right to equality.[15] From the systematic analysis of constitutional provisions it results that equality is a constitutional principle proclaimed in the article 16 paragraph (1) of the Constitution, and applies to fundamental rights and freedoms, but in our opinion, it can be approached as a subjective right. In this respect, equality is a possibility given to a person in his interest, allowing him to enjoy something of value or to require someone else a benefit; equality is part of subjective rights in the sense that it is a legally protected interest enjoyed by individual and that also is an obligation for public authorities.

As a subjective right, equalty enables people to claim infringement of the principle of equal rights before the Constitutional Court by raising the objection of unconstitutionality, and attacking the administrative acts before the administrative court.

g.2.) Inviolability. In our opinion, indicating inviolability in the classification of rights and freedoms is necessary because the inviolability of rights and freedoms is provided expressis verbis in the normative content of the Romanian Constitution republished. Inviolability guarantees human dignity and free development of human personality. This category can include: right to life and physical and mental integrity, individual freedom, right to defense, free movement, private life, the right to family and private life, inviolability of domicile.

g.3.) Economic, social and cultural rights. These rights guarantee: Protection of economic interests of the person, the right of everyone to social security, right of everyone to a decent living, that right of everyone to enjoy the best physical and mental health, the right of everyone to education and right to participate in cultural life.

g.4.) Political rights. It represents the rights that are guaranteed to citizens to participate in government, at state, local and at EU level. These rights include the right to elect and to be elected.

g.5.) Social and political rights. These rights have a complex content, social or political.

g.6.) Rights guarantees. These rights are at constitutional level guarantees to other rights and freedoms against their illegitimate violation.

g.7.) The right of asylum. In our opinion, this right may be mentioned in the catalog of classifying fundamental rights and freedoms, even if under the Constitution of Romania, it is part of the contents of Chapter II of Title II, entitled common principles on rights and fundamental freedoms. Furthermore, the right of asylum is mentioned expressis verbis in article 18 of the Romanian Constitution; it is true that it does not apply to Romanian citizens, but foreigners and stateless persons are guaranteed under the current constitution and enjoy general protection of persons and property.

Building on the above paragrapfs d), e), f) and g) we observe the following aspects:

1. For classification of fundamental rights and freedoms, nominated authors use two criteria: the content of these rights and the exercise thereof.

2. Although the authors use the same criteria for classification, ie the content of rights and fundamental freedoms, their actual classifications differ, in our opinion, because of the complex content with various interdependencies that can be analysed under different aspects.

3.2. Classification of fundamental rights and freedoms in terms of French constitutional doctrine and the doctrine of human rights

For this study, we have chosen the French constitutional doctrine and the doctrine of human rights for the reason that, as we have mentioned in the section 3.1., it was the primary source of the Romanian constitutional doctrine.

Moreover, from the French constitutional doctrine and that of human rights, we present briefly, in a diachronic approach, the classifications of public liberties which, in our opinion, are synonymous to the classification of fundamental rights and freedoms in the Romanian constitutional doctrine, classifications proposed by various French authors.

a) A. Esmein considers that the list of individual rights was gradually completed and the theory and historical facts successively signal the importance of two major categories: [16] a.1.) civil equality includes: equality before the law, equal justice, equal taxes, equal eligibility for functions and public office.

a.2.) individual freedoms includes: individual liberty, individual property, inviolability of domicile, freedom of trade, labor and industry, freedom of conscience and religious liberty, freedom of assembly and freedom of press, freedom of association and freedom of education.

b) George Burda states that public freedoms have gained the city rights (status of special privileges in legal terminology), being for individuals or groups an opportunity to request an attitude of the state, constituting an obligation to it. According to the author, public freedoms could be included in a list with two entries that can not be disputed:[17] b.1.) rights that under the classical tradition are considered inherent to human nature. They are basically those rights through which the autonomy of individuals is stated: individual security, freedom to go and come, freedom of privacy, freedom of opinion and belief, property. To this list the author adds rights that, also from the traditional perspective, appear as an addition to the above as they allow more fully pursue: the right to join or unite with others, the right to celebrate religious cults, the right to choose education for children.

b.2.) economic and social rights. Given the generosity with which they are listed by the authors of the Declarations and Preambles, it is necessary to distinguish among them. There are: the right to organize, right to strike, right to safety at work.

Differently from public freedoms, the author considers civil rights as those rights through which citizens participate directly in political decision.

c) Taking into account the exercise of public freedoms, Jean Morange classifies these into two major categories:[18] c.1.) individual freedoms rely on the individual in society, and include*: individual autonomy*: the freedom to go and come, security, privacy and liberties of free chioce, freedom of conscience, freedom to dispose of himself.

c.2.) collective liberties, which involve the individual's right to act with others, noting that ther are no collective freedoms without individual freedoms, which is a dogma of liberal democracies. These include: freedom of association, freedom of press, freedom of broadcasting, free education, and freedom of religion.

d) Jacques Robert, [19] before proceeding to the classification of public freedoms, makes the following terminological comments on the definition of freedom. When the philosopher attempts to define human freedom is tempted to research on his inner and spiritual freedom, above all. The lawyer, as he is concerned, has no access to the inner life because the right is a rule of social constraint, so external. He will consider only material freedom in its meaning, as most of opportunities and choices left to individuals. From this perspective, the author analyses the natural liberty and legal freedom. In a first sense, freedom is the quality of which is not subject to constraints, namely physical, psychological or moral. It is a negative quality since it results specifically from the lack of constraint. Coercion occurs when a man's actions are subject to the will of another man, serving not his own purpose but the purpose of the other. Freedom means the guarantee of private sphere so that each is master of himself. It follows that the freedom of a being is self-being. In a second sense, to be free to act is to have the right or power to commit an act or another.

The author also distinguishes between public freedom and private freedom. Public freedom is a freedom for all that its exercise by everyone not in any way affects the exerciseof the same freedoms to another. The criterion of public freedom is that it belongs to everyone. Conversely, private freedom is characterized by being reserved only to some individuals. It is a privilege granted to a small number, refused to others.

Moreover, the author distinguishes between freedom-autonomy and freedom-participation. These two forms of freedom involve a distinction between rulers and ruled. Each brings a very different answer to the question raised by the relationship between the two parties. Freedom - participation lies in control of the ruling government, in the permanent attitude of certain rulers to become one day the ruled. Freedom - autonomy implies the absence of any social constraints.

It is difficult to establish a specific criterion for classifying public liberties. To establish this criterion, the author defines public freedoms in narrow and broad sense. In narrow sense, public freedoms are freedoms enshrined in the texts of Declarations of Rights, the purpose of Declarations and Preambles being certainly to state the essential rights and freedoms. But any public liberty is not a liberty declared constitutionally. Broadly speaking, would be, on the contrary, considered as public liberty any right recognized by law, this course encompassing constitutional texts and declarations of rights.

Jacques Robert, after stating that liberties have a fundamental component when there is a coincidence between the public freedoms and human natural rights, he propose a classification of the public liberties into two categories, personal liberties and collective freedoms.

d.1.) Personal freedoms include: d.1.1.) physical or individual freedom, ie freedom to move freely, not to be arbitrarily arrested or seized, to be tried with all legal guarantees, not to affect their physical integrity, their privacy. d.1.2.) spiritual freedoms, i.e. freedom of speech, of religion, freedom of press, freedom of education. d.1.3.) economic freedoms including: the right to work, freedom of trade and industry.

d.2.) collective freedoms, including: freedom of assembly and association, freedom of organization, right to strike.

e) Claude Albert Colliard[20] states that the terms public freedoms comes from the article 34, paragraph (2) of the French Constitution of 1958, which reserves the field of public freedoms to be regulated exclusively by Parliament. According to the paragraph mentioned, the Law establishes the rules on civil rights and fundamental guarantees granted to citizens to exercise the public freedoms. The author also states that the law must define the content and the precise meaning of the concept of public freedoms as the doctrinary definition is never very precise, being always based on excesses of exegesis or refinements of subtlety.

Following these considerations, we propose a general definition of public freedoms which are rights enjoyed by individuals and are analysed by their recognition for an area of autonomy.

Regarding the collective character of public freedoms, this means that public freedoms are individual, but when the individual acts without constraint and the action takes place in a social context in relation to other people, they can gain collective character.

Claude-Albert Colliard proposed a classification of public freedoms on the one hand according to the opposite relationship between freedoms of economic nature and other freedoms and on the other hand, according to the character strictly individual and the collective character. Thus the author classifid them into three distinct categories:

e.1.) fundamental freedoms or individual liberties, which include: security of person, freedom to go and come, bodies and individual freedoms, respect for personality.

e.2.) freedom of thought or intellectual freedoms, these include: freedom of speech, freedom of religion, freedom of education, freedom of thought, theater system and film-television broadcasting system, freedom of assembly and freedom of association.

e.3.) freedoms of economic nature, they include: labour freedom, right to property, freedom of trade and industry.

Building on the above, we observe the following aspects:

1. The same variety of classification of public freedoms exists also in the French literature in the field.

2. We observe that the French literature studied above addresses human rights, public freedoms, rights and freedoms of citizens and the fundamental freedoms.

3. We observe that the terminology is not uniform.

4. The Romanian concept of fundamental rights and freedoms is synonymous with the concept of public freedoms in the French literature.

4. Current trends on the classification of fundamental rights and freedoms

a) In our opinion, a first classification of human rights universally has been established by the personalities who participated in drafting the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. According to UN document, named UN Activities in the Field of Human Rights[21] we learn the following specifications: Universal Declaration of Human Rights consists of a preamble and 30 articles setting out the essential rights and fundamental freedoms to which without discrimination can claim all men and women around the world. These articles concern civil and political rights (article 3 – article 21) and economic, social and cultural rights (article 22 – article 27). This universal classification includes civil and political rights and economic, social and cultural rights.

Often, the literature cites the definition of human rights given by the French jurist René Cassin who participated in drafting the Universal Declaration of Human Rights: the science about human rights is defined as a distinct branch of social science and studies human relationships in accordance to human dignity to determine the rights and faculties that overall are necessary to personality development of every human being.[22]

This document, as its title indicates, is merely a declaration and not a legally binding agreement. Due to its moral status and legal and political importance acquired over time, the Universal Declaration of Human Rights stands next to Magna Carta, the Declaration of Independence of America, the Bill of Rights and the French Declaration of the Rights of Man and Citizen.

Given the above, UN adopted the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights and the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights on 16 December 1966. These documents are legally binding, being ratified by the states, and include content development of universal human rights under the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, in areas established therein.

b.) The second current trend of classification of human rights is their classification on generation of rights. Of the Romanian constitutional doctrine, we observe for the present study the classification of human rights that includes four generations of rights[23]. Regarding the causes of this classification, the authors point to the existence today of a whole range of legal issues in the field. One of them refers to the heterogeneity of human rights, both in terms of their origin and of the goals they declare and pursue. Also, technically speaking*, it has now become common for human rights to be presented in a classification that includes four generations*, allowing an overview with historical character which emphasizes their complementarity, both at the moment of claim and at the moment of legal recognition.

b.1.) First generation rights encompass civil and political rights, considered the most necessary to assert the individual against state power. Civil and political rights and especially the individual freedoms have appeared mainly as measures to protect individuals against violence and arbitrary government, as claims of a legal position equal before the law.

Also, these rights are defined by the action of their owner, who draws a sphere of individual autonomy, which implies and determines a specific abstention of the state power to intervene in such protected areas. The role of state power is reduced in this situation to protect freedoms in general, by providing guarantees of self-limitation of its action.

b.2.) Rights of the second generation include economic, social and cultural rights, involving state action, measures, and guarantees. These rights are recognized to all individuals, but not on the basis of their quality as human being, but as members of specific social categories based on criteria that are closely connected with the production or their social or economic status.

b.3.) Rights of third generation came amid increasing internationalization of the concept of human rights, and they are called solidarity rights, such as right to peace, right to development, right to a healthy environment etc. They express new social and political aspirations that any individual can validly oppose to public power. These rights raise many questions, because it is not clear yet whether the holder is an individual or humanity as a whole.

It is also not clear yet whether the public power is national or international. But without doubt these powers can not be acheived in their content by individual countries, but necessarily involve the cooperation of states.

b.4.) Rights of the fourth generation. Facing the unprecedented development of information and communication technologies, some authors have mentioned a fourth generation of rights, which would include the right to personal data protection, right to privacy, etc.

The analysisof the above classifications of human rights shows in our opinion that the authors took as reference the universal standards of human rights standards and the scope of human and citizen rights established in the field by these standards.

c) The third trend of classification of human rights, observed for this study, is the tendency for the classification of rights guaranteed in Europe, in European human rights law doctrine.[24]

At the beginning of this classification, the author makes the following preliminary comments:

---

[23] Muraru, Ioan and Tănăsescu, Elena Simina, op. cit. 142-144.

[24] Renucci, Jean-François, Treaty of European Human Rights Law. (Bucharest: Hamangiu Publishing, 2009), 80, 85, 533-534, 843.

- Proposing distinction between human rights can be in itself objectionable, internationally established principle is that of the indivisibility of these rights. The principle of indivisibility is, of course, important and meaningful to the extent that all human rights contribute to the development of human dignity, which is clearly not divisible.

- However, in the positive law, all rights enshrined in this area, although essential, can not be placed on an equal footing, and can not have the same legal status.

- Human rights, being exclusively rights of individuals, should be considered only individual rights, even though we can not deny the collective dimension of some of them.

Given the indications mentioned, the author, using the criterion of protection of human rights considered fundamental rights, classifies at first these data into three categories as follows:

c.1.) Rights of the first category: From human rights, some are particularly important because their they form the hard core: the right to life, the right not to be subjected to ill-treatment, the prohibition of slavery and servitude and the right to protection from retroactivite criminal law or the prohibition of discrimination. These rights, because of their importance require absolute protection.

c.2.) Rights of the second category: other human rights being conditioned, they benefit only of a relative protection, the state may affect them in certain conditions.

c.3.) Rights of the third category: their protection is quasi-absolute, and can not be suspended except in time of war or other public emergency threatening the life of the nation.

The second classification proposed by the author, is a ranking of four generations of rights:

c.1.1.) The first generation of rights encompasses civil and political rights. Civil and political rights are essential rights: they are the backbone of the European Convention on Human Rights, its reason to exist, although the Convention has also established some economic and social rights. These rights called of the first generation, which are the most fundamental rights and freedoms appear to be resistance rights, involving freedom of choice and action of individuals, and abstention from the state. On the other hand, in this category of resistance rights, we can distinguish between the rights – freedoms, which notably includes human rights and labor rights, and rights – participation, which are those of citizens, and finally, rights-guarantees, rights of the litigants.

c.1.2.) The second generation of rights encompasses economic and social rights. Economic and social rights are usually presented as human rights of the second generation. In the Council of Europe, economic and social rights are enshrined primarily but not exclusively, in two texts: on the one hand, the European Convention on Human Rights which is quite limited on this plan, and prevents a strong guarantee of some economic and social rights retained; on the other hand, the European Social Charter, a text centered specifically on these rights and, finally, completes the Convention in this regard. These rights have the following particularity: the state should play a more active and demanding role to ensure economic and social rights. Regarding the role of the EU Charter of Fundamental Rights in this matter, the author states that: the reference to the text of the Amsterdam Treaty and the Charter of Fundamental Rights can only enhance its importance.

c.1.3.) The rights of third generation include rights of solidarity. These rights are: the right to peace, development, environment and the right to respect the common heritage of humanity. However, the problem in question is to know precisely whether these rights of solidarity can be considered as human rights. It is true that they are universal values. But their assimilation with human rights is not obvious, especially since the European Convention on Human Rights does not refer to them. Certainly, an extension of human rights is always possible, but it is necessary to pay attention to the potential negative impact that might weaken, ultimately, the fundamental rights.

c.1.4.) The rights of the fourth generation. In connection to these rights, the author states the following: It is, however, very difficult to propose a classification of human rights universally accepted, because difficulties may arise and appearances are often misleading, especially since the fourth generation rights appeared, in order to protect human dignity from certain abuses of science. But we should also avoid too great an extension of fundamental rights; a perpetual addition of new rights would be dangerous to liberty itself.

d) For this study, we propose to retain the current trend of classification of fundamental rights and freedoms, enshrined in the juridical content of the Constitutions of European Union member states.

d.1.) Constitution of the Italian Republic of 1948[25]. Constitution of the Italian Republic in its Part I, entitled Rights and duties of citizens, classifies these rights and duties into four basic categories, namely: *Civil Relations (*art. 13 - art. 28), Ethical and Social Relations (art. 29-art. 34), Economic Relations (art. 35-art. 47) and Political Relations (art. 48-art. 54). In our opinion, the four relations mentioned in the Constitution, put out a true classic classification of rights and duties of citizens, namely: civil rights, ethical and social rights, economic rights, and political rights.

d.2.) Spanish Constitution of 1978[26]. The Spanish Constitution in Title I, entitled Fundamental Rights and Duties, establishes the following principles, rights and duties grouped into five basic categories, namely: Spaniards and Foreigners (Art. 11-13); Rights and Freedoms: Fundamental Rights and Public Freedoms (art.15-art. 29), Rights and Duties of citizens (art. 30-art. 38), Guiding Principles of Social and Economic Policy (art. 39 - art. 52), Guarantees for Fundamental Rights and Freedoms (art. 53-art. 54), Suspension of Rights and Freedoms (art. 55).

d.3.) Constitution of the Portuguese Republic, the seventh revision of 2005.[27]

Constitution of the Portuguese Republic in Title II, entitled Rights, Freedoms and Guarantees, establishes the following classifications, grouping them into three basic categories, namely: Personality Rights (art. 24-art. 47); The Fundamental Rights, Freedoms and Guarantees of Political Participation (art. 48-art. 52); The Fundamental Rights, Freedoms and Guarantees of Workers (art. 53-art. 57). Also, in Title III, entitled Economic, Social and Cultural Rights and Duties, establishes the following classifications, grouping them into three basic categories, namely: Economic Rights and Duties (art. 58-art. 62), Social Rights and Duties (art. 63-art. 72), Cultural Rights and Duties (art. 73-art. 79);

d.4.) Constitution of the Slovak Republic of 1991[28]. In Title II establishes Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms (art. 14-art. 65), and in Title III establishes Economic and Social Relations (art. 66-art. 79).

e.) For this study, we propose to retain the current trend of classification of fundamental rights and freedoms by four universal and indivisible values, proclaimed in the preamble to the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union[29], namely: human dignity, freedom, equality and solidarity.

e.1.) Dignity. The Charter does not specify the meaning of the concept of dignity, but dignity in our opinion, is acclaimed as a genuine inviolability, respecting and protecting the dignity as universal value and treated as indivisible.

Also to respect and protect the dignity as universal and indivisible value the Charter subsumes: right to life; right to integrity of person; prohibition of torture and inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment; prohibition of slavery and forced labor.

e.2.) Freedoms. On freedoms, we find that in connection with this fundamental category, the Charter does not establish the notion of freedom as a universal and indivisible value, but subsumes to freedom the following components: the right to liberty and security, right to privacy and family, protection of personal data, the right to marry and right to found a family, freedom of thought, conscience and religion, freedom of expression and information, freedom of assembly and association, freedom of the arts and sciences, right to education, free of choice of occupation and right to work, freedom to conduct a business, property rights, right to asylum, protection from removal, expulsion or extradition.

After listing the components of freedom, in our opinion, it follows that the source of inspiration for the Charter was the European Convention on Human Rights, of course taking into account the extensions introduced by it.

e.3.) Equality. On equality, we also notice that to this fundamental category the Charter does not establish the concept of equality approached as universal and indivisible value, but it subsumes the following components: equality before the law; non-discrimination; cultural, religious and linguistic diversity; equality between women and men; child rights; the rights of the elderly; the integration of persons with disabilities.

After listing the components of equality, it follows in our opinion, that the source of inspiration for the Charter was the European Convention on Human Rights, which seems substantial, but of course not exclusive.

e.4.) Solidarity. On solidarity, we notice that also to this fundamental category the Charter does not establish the concept of solidarity approached as universal and indivisible value, but subsumes the following components: the right of workers to information and consultation within the undertaking; the right of negotiation and collective action; right of access to placement services; protection for unjustified dismissal; fair working conditions; prohibition of child labor and protection of young people at work; family and professional life; social security and social assistance; health protection; access to services of general economic interest; environmental protection; consumer protection.

Listing the components of solidarity, it follows in our opinion that these components are economic and social rights, and draw their inspiration from the European Social Charter and the Community Charter of Fundamental Social Rights of Workers, and also from the articles on consumer and environment, namely: article 153 and article 174 of the Treaty establishing the European Community, the consolidated version[30]. Environmental and consumer protection are new components introduced in the Charter that created controversy regarding their application.

5. Conclusions

The objective of the study on classification of rights and fundamental freedoms in diachronic and selective approach, and to identify trends of these classifications, has been achieved, in our opinion. The main directions of study for achieving the goal were the following:

1. the diachronic and selective, but not exhaustive, approach of the classification of fundamental rights and freedoms in terms of constitutional doctrine and the doctrine of human rights. This section contains two parts.

The first part of the section is dedicated to the classification of fundamental rights and freedoms from the perspective of Romanian constitutional doctrine and is systematically divided into three great periods. The first period refers to the contribution of the Romanian authors of constitutional law to the fundamental rights and freedoms up to the World War II. The second period includes the contribution of Romanian authors of constitutional law to the classification of fundamental rights and freedoms, after the installation of totalitarian regimes in Eastern Europe, including Romania; the adoption of Constitution of this period and up to the Revolution of 1989. The third period refers to the contribution of Romanian authors of constitutional law to the classification of fundamental rights and freedoms after the Revolution of December 1989, the adoption of Romanian Constitution of 1991 and its revision in 2003, up to date.

[30]  Version consolidée du Traité instituant la Communauté Européenne, Journal officiel n°C 325 du 24 décembre 2002.

Studying the periods mentioned above, we have identified the terminology used, the criteria proposed by the mentioned authors to classify the fundamental rights and freedoms and the classifications resulting from scientific endeavor.

The second part of the section studies the classification of fundamental rights and freedoms, in terms of French constitutional doctrine and the doctrine of human rights. Throughout this section we present selectively in a diachronic approach, the classifications of public freedoms, which in our opinion, are synonymous with the classification of fundamental rights and freedoms in the Romanian constitutional doctrine. Applying the same grid, we have identified the methodological terminology used, the classification criteria proposed by the mentioned authors for grouping the civil liberties, and the classification resulting from the scientific enterprise of French authors.

2. current trends on classification of fundamental rights and freedoms, by diachronic and selective approach, in the European and international documents on human rights and citizens, starting from the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and other subsequent documents adopted at international and European level, in Romanian constitutional doctrine and the doctrine of European human rights and also in the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union and in the Constitutions of European Union member states. Studying the documents and specialized doctrine, mentioned above, we have identified the development trends for the classification of human and citizen rights and freedoms.

The two parts of the study can be considered a contribution to expanding research on classification of fundamental rights and freedoms, in line with current trends in the field.

We also mention that the above study opens a complex and complete vision, but not exhaustive, in the area.

Given the selective approach of classifying fundamental rights and freedoms, the proposed key – scheme can be multiplied and extended to other studies in the field.

ASPECTS ON THE INTERNATIONAL LEGAL PERSONALITY OF INTERNATIONAL ORGANIZATIONS

NICOLAE PURDĂ*

Abstract

An international organization is an association of states, holder of rights and duties which it acquires by the will of the founding states and which acts as an entity which is distinct and independent from the states that form it. The constituent instrument of the organization proclaims the establishment of such, as well as its character of being a subject of international law, but at the same time it delimitates the domain in which the international legal personality can manifest and also the content of its capacity.

Keywords: Subjects of international law, international organization, legal personality in municipal law, international legal personality, Viena Convention.

1. Introductory Considerations

An international organization represents a form of harmonization of efforts of certain states targeted in the direction of an international collaboration, for the achievement of which the said states have created a legal-organizational (institutional) framework - structures with permanent status.

The contemporary notion of international organization features a relatively recent origin. A precise definition of the international organization has yet to be established, especially one that is unanimously accepted.

In the definition he proposed, El-Erian (special rapporteur with the U.N. International Law Commission) appreciated the international organization as a legal entity created by states or international organizations with a certain purpose and which possesses a will that is expressed through its own permanent structures.

In the Comment to Vienna Convention in 1975 regarding the representation of states in their relations with international organizations with universal character, it is shown that, with regard to the international organization, was considered"an association of states constituted through a treaty, having constituent instruments and its own structures, as well as a legal personality which is distinct from that of the member states that form it".

A definition of the concept of international organization is also to be found in the Vienna Convention of 1969, regarding the treaties' law, which, in article 1, paragraph 1, letter "i" stipulates that "by the expression international organization" it is understood "an inter-government organization".

In the same terms is defined the international organization in art. 2, paragraph 1, letter "i" of the Vienna Convention of 1986, regarding the law of treaties concluded between states and international organizations or between international organizations.

It is generally acknowledged that international organizations are secondary subjects of international law. The international legal order has been in place before the appearance thereof and, in theory, it can exist without it.

International organizations are defined by several elements, as follows: they have an inter-state character, they are created by states by means of international treaties, on a voluntary basis, they have permanent structures, they have autonomous will, they have their own competencies and pursue to achieve a cooperation between states in order to promote common interests[1].

International organizations possess certain features that allow us to distinguish them both from states and from other institutions with international status, namely: they are created by means of international treaties, they feature a functional competency, in virtue of this competency, they adopt acts that are directly attributed to them, independent from the member states, their activity is regulated to a certain extent directly by the international law[2].

At the origin of any international organization lies a conventional act, negotiated and concluded by the subjects of international law creating it.

The willful agreement for the creation of an international organization is most often expressed in a written treaty which determines the objectives and purposes of the organization, the competencies that it has in order to achieve these objectives and purposes and the structure of the organization.

Characterizing these constitutive treaties in a relatively recent advisory opinion, the International Court of Justice stated that "instruments constituting international organizations are, furthermore, treaties of a special kind; their object is to create new subjects of law, endowed with a certain autonomy, to which the parties entrust the task of achieving common objectives".[3]

Treaties that represent the constituent instruments of international organizations regularly have sovereign states as parties. However, depending on the objective of the said treaties, international organizations too can become parties thereto.

International organizations receive, through the treaties through which they are created, a specific competence in various fields of activity, in order to exert determined functions. International law practice and doctrine have established the concept of functional competency of international organizations.

A series of acts adopted thereby binds them as organizations, can be attributed to them as such, independent from the member states. They have at their disposal structures that, in view of exerting their attributed competencies, adopt such acts which cannot be attributed to the member states.

The activities of international organizations are directly regulated by the international law, to the extent to which they engage in relations with other subjects of international law. This ensues directly or implicitly from their constitutive treaties.

By all means, international organizations also have their own internal order which regulates the operation of their various structures, their respective competencies, including those of the structures that bind the organization, the internal dependencies, procedures, the rights and duties of the officials thereof. The respective provisions are included in the treaty as well as in other norms, adopted based on the treaty.

2. The Legal Personality of International Organizations

2.1 The Legal Personality of Municipal Law of International Organizations

International organizations have their own legal personality, both with regard to the municipal legal order (in the state on the territory of which the organization is headquartered and carries on its activity), and with regard to the international legal order.

Public (inter-government) international organizations have a civil legal capacity and are therefore endowed with legal personality of municipal law.

[3] Report of the ICJ, 1996, paragraph 19,

The recognition of the legal personality of municipal law of international organizations is usually established in their constituent instruments, so by means of explicit provisions.[4]

Headquarters agreements come to develop the provisions included in the constituent instruments. The act, which is opposable to the states which are parties to the treaties, whereby is established the acknowledgment of the legal personality of an international organization by the said states takes place in virtue of this act. The rule is formulated as follows: "The Organization shall enjoy in the territory of each of its Members such legal capacity as may be necessary for the exercise of its functions and the fulfillment of its purposes (art. 104 of the Charter of the U.N.; art. XII of the U.N.E.S.C.O. Constitution; art. 4 of the North-Atlantic Treaty; art. 39 of the I.L.O. Constitution, etc.)".[5]

In the constituent instruments of most international organizations, it is stipulated that the organization shall have the legal capacity as may be necessary for the exercise of its functions or, even more specific, that it shall have the legal capacity and the capacity to contract, acquire and have at its disposal movable and immovable properties and to make use of legal procedures.[6]

With regard to international organizations with legal personality of municipal law it is said that in each national legal system they must benefit from a treatment at least equal to that of foreign legal person.

The holding of a legal personality of municipal law by international organizations is not equivalent to the assimilation thereof to subjects of municipal law in these states, because international organizations have certain privileges and immunities which derogate from the common law.[7]

2.2 The legal personality of international law of international organizations

The notion of "international legal personality" is in close relation with that of "subject of international law", these notions being often defined one through the other. For the identification of a subject of international law it is required to ascertain whether such subject possesses legal personality in the international legal order, in other words, whether it has the legal capacity to act internationally.

The analysis of the concept of subject of international law was made accurately by the International Court of Justice (ICJ) which, in its Advisory opinion of April 11th 1949 issued at the request of the U.N. General Assembly in the case "Reparations for injuries suffered in the Service of the United Nations" shows that U.N. is a subject of international law, which means that it "capable of possessing international rights and duties and that it has the capacity to maintain its rights by bringing international claims".

In the same advisory opinion, the ICJ shows that U.N. enjoys functions and rights "which can only be explained based on it possessing to a greater extent the international legal personality and the capacity to act internationally", and as a consequence "The Court reached the conclusion that the organization is an international person [...] which means that it is capable of possessing international rights and duties".[8] Although the advisory opinion of the ICJ only refers to the United Nations, for the identity of reasons, it may also be applicable in the case of all the other international organizations which through their constituent instruments obtain rights and assume duties within the international law order.

Until year 1945 there was a live controversy on whether international organizations could be deemed to have international legal personality and whether they were subjects of international law.

Nowadays, however, it is generally accepted that all public international organizations have a certain international legal personality, limited, of course, to the domains in which they have the competency to act and in practice almost all international organizations make acts governed by the international law. Despite all that, there are few constitutive texts which explicitly establish the legal personality of international organizations.[9]

The only multilateral regulations in which the international legal personality is expressis verbis recognized are the provisions of art. 10 of The International Fund for Agriculture Development ("The Fund shall possess international legal personality") and art. 18 of the Convention on the Settlement of Investment Disputes between States and Nationals of Other States (Washington, 1965), where it is stipulated that the Center shall enjoy "full international legal personality". The Treaty of Rome by which was instituted the European Economic Community also explicitly states that the respective organizations possess international legal personality (art. 250; idem, art. 6 of E.C.S.C.). The acknowledgment of the international legal personality is explained in the case of E.C.S.C., E.E.C and EURATOM (The community possesses legal personality - art. 210 of the C.E.E.)

Lately, constituent instruments have been increasingly explicit (the U.N. Convention on the Law of the Sea (1982) - art. 176; W.T.O., art. VIII); the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court ("The Court shall have international legal personality"); in the Treaty of Lisbon it is stated that the European Union possesses legal personality (art. 47).

It must be said that not any international organization has the quality of being a subject of international law and that the simple establishment of an international organization is not equivalent obligatorily with the appearance of a new subject of international law. In some cases, states establish an international organization on which they confer the quality of subject of international law - at least implicitly. In other cases, states can only confer on it attributions and competencies, but not the quality of subject of international law.[10]

The international legal personality of different international organizations is not identical, but it is different not only depending on the quality of the subject (state or international organization), but also on the character of the competencies established through the constituent instruments and it varies from one organization to another or, at the least, from one category of organizations to another. Being derivative subjects of international law, they cannot have a personality identical to that of states and in any case, their capacity is limited to what indicates the purposes and functions of the respective organization; in other words, the coverage of the personality varies from one organization to the next. [11]

The concept of international legal personality appears to be firmly established, but infinitely variable, and the ultimate criterion of control is constituted by the provisions in the constituent instruments of each organization.

The international legal personality of an international organization is essential for the proper operation of such. The constituent instruments of several international organizations establish such organizations with rights and duties that confirm that the said act at least confers on it a limited degree of international personality.

The international legal personality of international organizations is characterized by two fundamental elements: - the existence of attributes - the legal rights and duties the organization is mainly entitled to in its relation with the member states; - the existence of its own structures within the organization by means of which it carries on its official activity as a subject of international law.[12]

2.2.1 Forms of manifestation of the international legal personality of international organizations

International organizations have a capacity limited to what constitutes their personality. They have the right to conclude treaties, the right of legation (active and passive), the right to bring international claims, the right to recognize other subjects of international law, financial autonomy and the capacity to have their own budget at their disposal.

A) The capacity to conclude treaties

International organizations have the capacity to conclude treaties with states, with each other and with other subjects of international law.

In the Vienna Convention on the law of treaties between states and international organizations or between international organizations (1986), it is stated that: "The capacity of an international organization to conclude treaties is governed by the rules of that organization" (art. 6), while the expression "rules of the organization" is defined as "in particular the constituent instruments, decisions and resolutions adopted in accordance with them and the established practice of the organization" (art. 2.1, letter j).

The treaties concluded by international organizations generally refer to their administrative operation and to the activity they can carry on, either on the territory of the states, or in the relations between them, in order to attain their purposes and objectives. This category includes headquarters agreements, agreements regarding the privileges and immunities the organization and its officials enjoy, as well as the agreements concluded with other organizations regarding the cooperation between them or the coordination of their respective activities.[13]

With regard to the headquarters agreements, it should be stated that it is considered not only the agreement with the state in which the main headquarters is located, but also the agreements with the states on the territories of which are established secondary headquarters or headquarters of structures belonging to the respective organizations. This category includes the agreements regarding regional headquarters, headquarters of offices, of administrative or information centers, or even of legations found on territories of certain states for temporary missions.

International organizations also conclude other types of agreements, more directly related to the attainment of their objectives and purposes, namely technical assistance agreements regarding the attainment of economical and social development projects, of certain public works, of feasibility studies regarding the evaluation of natural resources, granting of loans, organizing conferences, assemblies and others, depending on the specificity and objectives of each organization. The Charter of the U.N. explicitly stipulates that member states can make available to it armed forces, assistance and facilities, based on special agreements, in order to contribute to maintaining international peace and security (such agreements were concluded in connection with the peace maintaining operations in Cyprus and Congo).

The conventions concluded by international organizations are subjected to the same rules as the conventions concluded by states. This clearly ensues from the fact that the text of the Convention adopted in 1986 on the law of treaties concluded between states and international organizations or between international organizations is almost identical to that of the 1969 Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties.[14]

[12] Ibidem, p.398
[13] Ion Diaconu – idem, p 150

B) The capacity to establish diplomatic relationships (the right of legation)

International organizations possess what is traditionally referred to as "right of legation". They receive and send diplomatic representatives from and to other subjects of international law. Thus, member states usually send permanent missions to the main organizations they are part of.

Although there are many similarities between embassies to states and permanent missions to international organizations, one fundamental difference requires emphasizing. If the embassy represents a state and acts on its behalf in relation with another state, the permanent mission ensures not only this representation within the respective international organization, but it also participates in fulfilling its functions. Thus, the diplomats of permanent missions represent, together with delegates in the country of origin, their state within structures of the organization which adopt decisions and act on behalf of the organization.

Even certain states which are not members are represented by permanent missions within organizations (Switzerland within the U.N., New York, until year 2002 when it became a member), and numerous states are represented by separate permanent missions within the European Union or within NATO.

The representation of states in their relations with international organizations of a universal character is regulated by the 1975 Vienna Convention bearing the same title.

In turn, international organizations send representatives within other international organizations. Most specialized institutions are represented by permanent offices within the U.N., in New York, in order to attend the activities of the U.N. and, if needed, to coordinate common schedules of activity. The U.N., the International Labor Organization and the European Council are represented at Brussels within the European Union.[15]

The U.N. and specialized institutions also have representatives in numerous states. The United Nations Development Program, a structure of the U.N., disposes of more than 100 representatives in various countries, some providing representation in several states. In order to coordinate various development and assistance programs, performed by several structures of the U.N. and by specialized institutions, the U.N. General Assembly decided in 1997 to create the position of resident coordinator.

According to the Charter of the U.N., the representatives of U.N. member states and the officials of the organization enjoy the privileges and immunities as are necessary for the independent exercise of their functions in connection with the organization. The organization itself enjoys on the territory of the member states the privileges and diplomatic immunities as are necessary for the fulfillment of its purposes (art. 105).

C) The capacity to bring international claims

The right to bring international claims for damages suffered by the organization, as a distinct entity, or by its agents, is not explicitly provided in the Charter of the U.N. or the constituent instruments of other organizations. However, in order to fulfill its functions and to protect its agents (who can suffer damages in the exercise of their attributions), international organizations must benefit from the possibility to regulate their differences which may ensue from their activity and which could make them opposable to states or to other international organizations.[16]

[14] Andrei Popescu, Ion Diaconu – idem, p.32-33

[15] Ibidem, p.34

[16] Raluca Miga-Beşteliu, Organizaţii internaţionale interguvernamentale, ("C.H.Beck" Publishing House, Bucharest, 2006), p.45-46

These objective determinations caused the International Court of Justice to show in its advisory opinion related to the case regarding the Reparation for Injuries Suffered in the Service of the United Nations, with reference to the issue of determining whether the U.N. could bring a claim in international law: "the competence to bring an international claim is... the capacity to resort to the customary methods recognized by international law for the establishment, the presentation and the settlement of claims. Among these methods may be mentioned protest, request for an enquiry, negotiation and request for submission to an arbitral tribunal or to the Court". On the same occasion, the ICJ recognized the right of the U.N. to bring international claims regarding the suffered damages, even against states which were not members, also stating that the U.N. can bring claims for the damages incurred to its agents.

A dispute between the international organization and a state, an international organization or a private party on the one side, regarding the coverage of the competencies, the modification of a decision made by such and so on, could not be settled except using the ways and modalities provided in its constituent instruments.[17]

Thus, in the case of the U.N., the 1946 Convention on the privileges and immunities of the United Nations (art.VIII) stipulates that for dispute settlement, the Organization shall have to establish appropriate settlement methods. With regard to any appeal regarding the interpretation or application of the Convention, such is to be submitted to the ICJ. If a dispute arises between the U.N. and a member of the organization, there shall be a request, according to art. 96 of the Charter and art. 65 of the Statute of the Court, for an advisory opinion on any legal question. The Charter of the U.N. stipulates that the General Assembly or the Security Council may request an advisory opinion from ICJ. Similar provisions are also to be found in the case of the specialized institutions of the U.N., and other international organizations also drew inspiration from these models, to a greater or lesser extent.

D) The right to recognize other subjects of international law

The right to recognize new subjects of international law constitutes, basically, a prerogative of states. However, international organizations too can recognize new subjects of international law, for instance by admitting new states as members. In practice, the admission of a state as a member of an inter-government organization is much more important than the recognition by individual states, as it operates as a decision of the bodies formed by the representatives of those states. States would not vote for the admission of a member they are not willing to recognize. At least for most of them, the admission in the organization also means the recognition as subject of international law. Certainly, for the organization admission also means recognition.[18]

E) Other aspects regarding the legal personality of international law of international organizations

In some cases, international organizations constituted, on their own behalf, armed forces and undertook peace maintaining operations. Thus, armed forces bearing the flag of the U.N. participated in military operations in Egypt (1956), in Congo and in Cyprus, and more recently in Somalia and Bosnia-Herzegovina. In some cases, the U.N. concluded agreements with the countries involved in the conflict (with Egypt in 1957, with Congo in 1961, with Cyprus in 1964) and adopted regulations for the respective armed forces. These acted as a body of the United Nations, under the authority of the organization which assumed the duties arising from this situation. [19]

In many cases, international organizations are depositories of international treaties, fulfilling attributions specific to a depository. According to the Charter of the U.N., international treaties and agreements concluded with member states must be registered with the Secretariat of the U.N. and are to be published by such (art. 102).

A special case is represented by organizations that tend to achieve the economical, even political integration of member states, especially with regard to the European Union, which currently comes in succession after the three communities created in the Western Europe after World War II - the Coal and Steel Community, the European Economic Community and EURATOM.

By the Treaty of Lisbon for amending the Treaty on the European Union and the Treaty Establishing the European Community (signed on December 13th 2007), was instituted the European Union which is based on the T.E.U. (amended) and the Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union. This treaty signals a new stage in the process of creating an increasingly profound Union, a lead forward, indispensable and unavoidable, bearing a political significance.

According to the Treaty of Lisbon, disposing of an adequate institutional structure - and the member states, by the transfer of some of their attributes of sovereignty, conferring competencies on it (based on the principle of attribution), the European Union has legal personality (art. 47) By this short provision, it is stated comprehensively and in a non-differentiated manner that the E.U. has a general legal personality in the international, community and municipal law order.

The legal personality of the E.U. is one of unique complexity, it is heterogeneous (a mixture of stability and international structures, with a community, above-state segment, for governing and a inter-government segment for the policies of cooperation).[20]

The treaty of Lisbon brings important changes with regard to the legal and institutional standing of the U.E., as well as with regard to the mode of functioning thereof. Becoming for the first time a subject of international law, but not being a legal-political entity, which is a state, but at the same time more than an international (inter-government) organization and impossible to include in any of the existing patterns, the E.U. appears as a sui generis institution, a player of a new and atypical kind on the contemporary international stage.

Thus, the European Union enters the category of international organizations, having the typology thereof; an association of states, done with a certain purpose, constituted as an entity which is distinct and independent from the states that form it - with its own legal order, established based on a multilateral international treaty (the institutive treaty) -, disposing of its own bodies ordered following a certain organization and functioning structure and being conferred legal personality, the E.U. does not constitute, however, an international organization in the classic sense of the concept (inter-government), but it is a supranational one, with substantial supranational attributes that change its essence of association of states into a union of states that share a part of their sovereignty - by transferring sovereignty attributes from states to the E.U., all to way to complete fusion (pursuing their integration).[21]

The European Union is becoming a full and reckoned player of the international scene. It has at the basis of its legal capacity the attributes of a subjects of international law: capacity of representation in view of establishing and maintaining relations with the other subjects of international law; capacity to participate in international conferences; a certain capacity to conclude treaties on its own behalf, as well as on the behalf of its member states; capacity to stand trial; capacity to bind itself to be liable according to the international law; the capacity to enjoy privileges and immunities.

In the Treaty of Lisbon there is a special set of regulations by which is considered the external side of its legal personality, pertaining to its legal capacity as a participant to the international life, meaning its external actions. Thus, the E.U. is developing a common foreign policy and security policy, it concludes agreements with one or more international organizations, it concludes treaties on behalf of the member states, it establishes any form of cooperation useful within the U.N. and within its specialized institutions with the European Council, it develops privileged relations with neighboring countries, the delegations of the Union in third party countries or in international organizations ensures its representation and others. Moreover, the European Union concludes those legal acts of international law that are adequate for the attainment of its objectives and for its functioning, it earns rights and assumes duties, it has the capacity to make claims and ask for damages. The duties assumed by the E.U. bind both itself and its member states.[22]

In the Treaty (art. 6) it is provided that "The Union recognizes the rights, freedoms and principles set out in the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union of 7 December 2000, as adapted at Strasbourg on 12 December 2007, which shall have the same legal value as the treaties" and that "The Union shall accede to the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms".

In accordance with art. 343 (former art. 291 T.C.) of the Treaty on the functioning of the European Union, the Union enjoys on the territories of its member states the privileges and immunities as are necessary for the fulfillment of its mission, in the conditions defined by the 1965 Treaty on the privileges and immunities of the European Community. This provision of principle is transposed and developed in the Protocol (no. 7) on the privileges and immunities of the European Community (annex to the Treaty on the European Union, pursuant to the amendments made by the Treaty of Lisbon). Subsequently, the buildings of the European Union shall be inviolable, and shall be exempt from search, requisition, confiscation or expropriation. The property and assets of the Union shall not be the subject of any administrative or legal measure of constraint without the authorization of the Court of Justice. The archives of the Union shall be inviolable and the official correspondence and other official communications shall not be subject to censorship. The Union, its archives, revenues and other property shall be exempt from all direct taxes.

For their official communications and the transmission of all their documents, the institutions of the Union shall enjoy in the territory of each member state the treatment accorded by that state to diplomatic missions.

Conclusions:

International organizations, subjects of international law, with functional legal capacity, remain instruments of inter-state cooperation, the activity and even existence of which depend constantly on the cooperation between states and consequently on their will.

The requirements of international cooperation and interdependence determined the increasing growth of the competencies of organizations, and so the extension of their capacity as subjects of international law to new domains and activities, especially with regard to the conclusion of treaties. They represent a path to conciliate the sovereignty of states with the requirements of a permanent and institutionalized cooperation.

Currently, there is a constant tendency of adaptation of international organizations to the new requirements of international relations, to the changes that occur in the world. These reflected into preoccupation for modifying the statutes, as well as the organization and functioning of international organizations.

OVERVIEW ON THE PRINCIPAL MEANS OF APPEALS LODGED BEFORE THE COURTS OF THE EUROPEAN UNION

OANA-MĂRIUCA PETRESCU[1]

Abstract
Knowledge and understanding the means of appeals lodged before the courts of European Union (Court of Justice and Tribunal – a. n.), limited only to the points of law, are very important taking into account that the modality to control a judgment delivered by an inferior court exists since ancient times, being governed, among others, by the Latin principle: res judicata pro veritate accipitur.
In the following, we will examine, in general, the judicial control of the judgments and orders delivered by the General Court and by the Tribunal of Civil Service, as a specialized tribunal on civil servant issues, but also the sui generis means of appeals and the extraordinary means of reviews of the judgments and orders. We have to mention that all of them are exercised in accordance with the rules of procedure of the European courts and the Statute of the Court of Justice of the European Union.
Another aspect to be mentioned is that the judgments of the Court of Justice cannot be challenged to another court, as they remain final and irrevocable.

Keywords: Treaty of Lisbon, European courts, means of appeals, sui generis means of appeals, extraordinary remedies.

I. Introduction

The theoretical and practical importance of knowledge the role that the means of appeal have for each of national judicial system, including for the European Union, has determinate the analysis during the present paper of the following issues:

- the appeal, which can be brought before the Court of Justice against the judgments and orders of the General Court and against the decisions of the Civil Service Tribunal, as a specialized tribunal with observance of the European provisions on the conditions to lodge an appeal, the general and special procedural terms, the principal categories of the judgments that can be appealed, the grounds for appeal which shall be concise, clear and without any other meanings;
- the sui generis means of appeal (opposition and complaint when the court omitted to give a decision on a specific head of claim or on costs), as exceptions from the ordinary procedure, which can be exercised when the court does not take into consideration the defendant defences for various reasons or when the court omitted to decide on one of the heads of complaint invoked by the applicant in his application. Bearing in mind all these, we can observe that the specificity of these means of appeal consist in combining characters of many means of appeals which may be brought before the European courts;
- exceptional review procedures (third – party proceedings and revision), which represent the possibilities offered to interested parties, in the cases and conditions stipulated by the Statute of the Court of Justice and in the rules of procedures of the European courts, to request the court that delivered the contested judgment or decision to withdraw its own judgment or decision and to proceed to a new trial. This seems to be fair since any new fact discovered, relevant and unknown prior to the original judgment, may determine a different solution.

II. The appeal

In the European Union law, the appeal represents the mean of appeal by which the parties (e.g. institutions, bodies, agencies and offices of the European Union, the Member States, the natural and legal persons or other persons) may request to Court of Justice or General Court, as the case maybe, cancellation of the judgment, whenever it is consider to be illegal. The general rules concerning the appeal are provided in the article 256[2] of TFEU[3] para.1 in accordance to which the "decisions given by the General Court[4] […] may be subject to a right of appeal to the Court of Justice […]" in "the actions or proceedings referred to in articles 263, 265, 268, 270 and 272, with the exception of those assigned to a specialised court set up under article 257 and those reserved in the Statute for the Court of Justice" limited only to "points of law, in the conditions and the limits provided for by the Statute", while the judgments delivered by the Civil Service Tribunal in the first instance, according to art. 270[5] of TFEU can be challenged with appeal to the General Tribunal, on points of law, such as: grounds of lack of competence of the Civil Service Tribunal, a breach of procedure before it which adversely affects the interests of the appellant; the infringement of Union law by the Civil Service Tribunal.

We can noticed that once the General Court have been established in 1989, and later, the Civil Service Tribunal in 2004, the court in Luxemburg received the second grade of jurisdiction, namely court of appeal[6], underlining that the judgments and the orders delivered by the latest remain final and irrevocable, as the court in Luxembourg "doesn't know these means, as it judges in first and last instance[7]".

In the following we shall analyze shortly the principal elements of appeal, as follows:

a. Categories of decisions that can be appealed

According to the above mentioned, we can notice that the appeal may be lodged in the cases strictly provided by the Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union and in accordance with the rules of procedure of the European courts, in the following situations:

- before the Court of Justice against the judgments delivered in first instance by the General Court and before the later one against the judgments and orders delivered by the Civil Service Tribunal, in first instance;
- before the Court of Justice or the General Court against the decisions when the General Court or Civil Service Tribunal, as the case maybe, are "disposing of the substantive issues in part only or are disposing of a procedural issue concerning a plea of lack of jurisdiction or inadmissibility", in accordance with article 56 of the Statute of the Court of Justice and article 9 of Annex I to the Statute of the Court of Justice concerning the Civil Service Tribunal;

• against the decisions delivered in the sui generis means of appeal and exceptional review procedures[8].

A special situation exists when the decision have been delivered in absence of the defendant, in which case the appeal can be lodged only against the second decision, which is adopted following the opposition lodged by the defendant.

Regarding the latest aspect, in the doctrine[9] has been raised the question if the first decision delivered in the original dispute, in which the defendant was absent, can be appealed by him/her, jumping over the trial of the opposition. Answering to this question the specialised literature considered that[10] if the rules of procedure of Civil Service Tribunal does not provide such situation, then no appeal against such decision should be lodged by the defendant who have missed in the original dispute bearing in mind the Latin principle: ubi lex non distinguit nec nos distinguere debemus. We are agree with this opinion having regard the defendant cannot appeal a decision which is not be enforceable to him/her, but only one that will take effects to him/her.

Finally, can be appealed the following:

- the decisions delivered in the cases when the application to intervene in the original dispute, formulated by the intervener, was dismissed (article 57 of Statute of the Court of Justice);
- the decisions of the General Court concerning: suspension of a measure taken by a institution of European Union (art.278[11] of TFEU); suspension of the necessary interim measures provided in article 279[12] of TFEU etc. (art.57 para. 3 of Statute).

b. Categories of applicants

Without going into further details, in general, the applicants are provided in article 56 para.2 of the Statute of the Court of Justice which stipulates that the appeal: „may be brought by any party[13] which has been unsuccessful, in whole or in part, in its submissions[14]". However "the interveners, other than the Member States and the institutions of the Union, may bring such an appeal only where the decision of the General Court directly [and independently] affects them", in all the cases when such decision has violated their rights by rejecting the application to intervene in the original dispute, without waiting for the original parties to lodge the appeal as well[15].

In addition, according to paragraph 3 of article 56 of the Statute of Court of Justice and „with the exception of cases relating to disputes between the Union and its servants, an appeal may also be brought by Member States and institutions of the Union which did not intervene in the proceedings

[11] Article 278 of TFEU stipulates that: „actions brought before the Court of Justice of the European Union shall not have suspensory effect. The Court may, however, if it considers that circumstances so require, order that application of the contested act be suspended".

[12] In accordance with art.279 of TFEU „the Court of Justice of the European Union may in any cases before it prescribe any necessary interim measures".

before the General Court […]", which means that they become interveners, with a view to comply with the legal order of the European Union[16].

Instead, the Court of Justice of European Union, through the Advocate-General, cannot file an appeal against the delivered judgment taking into account its neutral position to the parties in the litigation, but also the position of the Advocate-General who „acting with complete impartiality and independence", makes "in open court, reasoned submissions on cases which, in accordance with the Statute of the Court of Justice of the European Union, require his/her involvement" (article 252 para.2 of TFEU).

c. Terms of appeal

As the term of appeal against the decisions delivered by the General Court and the Civil Service Tribunal is concern, the European Union provisions[17] stipulate that, in principle, the term is two months from the notification date of the decisions and "in accordance with article 278 or article 279 or the fourth paragraph of article 299 of the Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union or article 157 or the third paragraph of article 164 of the EAEC Treaty".

Within the same term of appeal can be also challenged the decisions of the General Court ordering, amongst other things: suspension of a measure taken by a institution of European Union (article 278 of TFEU); suspension of the necessary interim measures provided for in article 279 of TFEU or suspension of the enforcement of the decision (article 299 para. 4 of TFEU).

Notwithstanding from the above rules, the Statute of the Court of Justice[18] regulates a special term of appeal, that can be filed by any person to the Court of Justice or General Court, as appropriate, of "two weeks from the notification of the decision dismissing the application" to intervene in the original dispute.

Bearing in mind the lack of any explicit procedural provisions, we share the point of view issued by the specialised literature[19] according to which the terms of appeals above-mentioned cannot be prolonged, because of the particularities of this mean of appeal.

Furthermore, taking into consideration that the doctrine did not analyse the character of the term of appeal, we consider that, similar to the Romanian civil procedural law, this term is imperative and peremptory[20], which means that its violation will lead to the forfeiture of the interested party from the right to exercise this mean of appeal, so that the unchallenged decision will remain irrevocable on the date of expiring the term of appeal.

Another aspect to be highlighted refers to fact that the European provisions and the doctrine in the field do not stipulate, directly or indirectly and in a clear manner, the situations in which the term of appeal can be suspended. In this context, we believe that, at the European level, the term of appeal can be suspended rightful in the following situations, which should be applied only to the natural and legal persons and provided expressis verbis in the rules of procedure of the European courts, namely:

- the death of the natural person;
- opening the judicial reorganization and bankruptcy of the legal person based on a final decision rendered by the national court of the respective legal person;
- the death of the advocate who assists or represents the party in the dispute;

- the intervention of a fortuity situation, which is beyond the control of the natural person to exercise this mean, which can be, from our point of view, an unforeseeable and unavoidable event such as: natural disasters (e.g. flood, fire, earthquake), state of siege, state of emergency or state of urgency.

d. The grounds of appeal

According to the provisions regulated by the Statute of the Court of Justice[21], the appeal to the Court of Justice or General Court, as the case maybe, shall be limited to "only points of law[22]", based on:

- grounds of lack of competence of the General Court,
- a breach of procedure [...] which adversely affects the interests of the appellant as well as
- the infringement of Union law (by the General Court or the Civil Service Tribunal – a. n.)

Instead, the appeal cannot be lodged against the taxes and the costs or the party cannot be forced to pay the costs[23], otherwise the appeal will be declared inadmissible.

Similar to the grounds of appeal invoked in the Romanian procedural law[24], those invoked before the court in Luxemburg must be concise, precise and clear; they can be resolved regardless the order in which they have been mentioned in the application initiating an appeal. Also, it is important that the grounds of law should be written in detail in order to understand better which the grounds for cassation the contested judgment are because it is not enough only to write them, briefly[25].

Amongst the most invoked grounds of appeal[26], we can mention:

a. procedural errors. In order to be admitted by the court several conditions should be meet:

i. the applicant shall demonstrate that its interests have been affected, directly and substantially by misapplication of certain rules of procedure, except those which aren't the basis of the solution adopted by the court or those who have been tacitly accepted by the applicant during the original dispute[27].

ii. a serious prejudice to the interests of the applicant should be brought by the procedural error. Concerning this condition, from our point of view not any prejudice is likely to justify the interest for the appellant to file an appeal against the judgment delivered by the European court.

b. another ground of appeal which is raised by the appellants very often is the infringement of Union law. Moreover, the phrase "infringement of Union law" is generally used to designate the primary and the secondary law, the principles of law generally recognized as well as the fundamental rights. In many cases, the applicant seeks to obtain a new management of evidence in the court, when in the original dispute he/she either did not have enough time to provide evidence or he/she did not provide the useful evidence at that moment to assure the winning of the dispute or other reasons[28].

In the end, as a general condition provided by the rules of procedure of the European courts[29], the appeal cannot modify the object of the litigation filed before the General Court or Civil Service Tribunal, which means that the parties shall present the same final conclusions as those presented before the first instance[30].

e. Trial the appeal and the legal effects of the judgment

The procedure of trial the appeal is regulated, in detail, both by the Statute of the Court of Justice[31] and the rules of procedure European Court, according to which "where an appeal is brought [….] the procedure before the Court of Justice shall consist of a written part and an oral part" which can be eliminated in the conditions established by the court in Luxembourg.

A basic condition to trial an appeal in good conditions is represented by the preliminarily admissibility of the application, which will be considered filed "by lodging [it] at the Registry of the Court of Justice or of the General Court". Whenever it is lodged directly to the Registry of the General Court or the Civil Service Tribunal, the court "shall immediately transmit to the Registry of the Court of Justice [or the General Court, as the case maybe] the papers in the case at first instance and, where necessary, the appeal". Furthermore, the application initiating an appeal shall be drafted in the language of the case used in the judgment delivered by the General Court or by the Civil Service Tribunal which is appealed by the interested party[32].

In other manner of speaking, an appeal shall meet the same formal requirements, as those required for the written application; otherwise the sanction will be the dismissal of the application as inadmissible.

After the trial of the application initiating an appeal, the judges can delivered one the following solutions[33]:

a. the applicant withdraws his appeal, in conditions stipulated by the rules of procedure. If, meanwhile, the term for appeal has expired, the principal effect of the judgment will be the irrevocability of it, gaining res judicata. Also, the case will be erased from the Registry of cases and the appellant shall pay the costs, except when these costs have been provoked by the defendant or when the court in Luxembourg order the parties to share the costs where equity so requires, according to article 69 para.3 of rules of procedure of the Court of Justice;

b. when the appeal is obviously inadmissible or unfounded, the Court of Justice or the General Court, as the case maybe, may anytime, based on the report of the Judge-Rapporteur and after the hearing of the Advocate-General, to dismiss the appeal, in whole or in part, through reasoned order. With the same occasion, the court shall decide related to the costs, as well. Usually, this decision is taken before opening the oral procedure or at latest by hearing the Advocate-General[34] or the judge in charge with this attribution, as in the case of General Court;

c. admission of the appeal, in whole or in part, by the Court of Justice or General Court, as the case maybe, in which situation:

i. the decision delivered in first instance by the General Court or Civil Service Tribunal is dismissed or;

ii. the dispute is trailed by the Court of Justice or General Court, as the case maybe, when the case may be tried by the court which was filed it;

iii. the case is transmitted to the General Court or Civil Service Tribunal, as the case maybe, but only regarding the points of law.

Regarding the modality to trial the appeal, although the European provisions in the matter does not provide for anything, we believe that several elements concerning the judgment in first instance of the written application (e.g. modality to deliberate and to deliver the judgment) can be apply by similarity taking into consideration that during the appeal "the judgment shall be delivered in open court; the parties shall be given notice to attend to hear it[35]" (article 64 para.1 of rules of procedure of Court of Justice). In this context, the minute or the operative part of the judgment shall be presented in public session.

In addition, "the Registrar shall record on the original of the judgment the date on which it was delivered[36]", which means that the judgment "shall be binding from the date of its delivery" (article 65 of rule of procedure of Court of Justice). Furthermore, the written text of the entire judgement together with the grounds are at the disposal of the interested parties in the language of the case or in French language, in front of the trial room[37].

In other formulation, similar to the file lodged before the Romanian courts[38], the judgment delivered by the European court of appeal aims to solve any dispute brought before, aiming at achieving a more effective judicial control made by the court of appeal (whether is the Court of Justice or the General Court) than the first court and at avoiding that a illegal judgment shall become final.

In general, the judgment delivered by the court of appeal produces its effects upon the parties and the interveners or in other manner of speaking; they are inter partes and not erga omnes. In addition, an appeal shall not have suspensory effect[39] (in accordance with article 60 of the Statute of the Court of Justice), except when the Court of Justice decides otherwise, in articles 278 and 279 of the Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union or in article 157 of the EAEC Treaty.

Another effect consists of in divesting the court of appeal, by delivering its judgment, which shall determinate the enforcement of the judgment by the party who won the trial, automatically.

III. Sui generis means of appeal

In principle, the decisions, regardless the legal order in which they have been delivered by the courts (national, European Union or international) may be appealed through ordinary or extraordinary means of appeal.

In European Union law, in comparison with the judicial system of the Member States, including Romanian, the judgments can be also appealed through sui generis means of appeal, namely: opposition and complaint when the court omitted to give a decision on a specific head of claim or on costs.

Using these means of appeal represents an exception from the ordinary procedure, taking into account that they combine characters of many means of appeals which may be brought before the European courts.

The doctrine[40] considers that one notion is proper to be used as regards these means of appeal such as "opposition" taking into consideration that both of them are having a common origin, namely: for various reasons the court either did not consider the defendant defences or does omit to give a decision on a specific head of claims coming from the applicant[41].

a. The opposition

According to the Statute of the Court and the procedural provisions[42] whenever the defendant "after having been duly summoned, fails to file written submissions [through the defence], in the proper form within the time prescribed, the applicant may apply [to the court] for judgment by default".

After the written procedure is finalised, the court shall decide the date for opening the oral procedure in order to continue the debates in the absence of the defendant, hearing the conclusions of the Advocate General and analyzing, in the same time, whether:

- the appropriate formalities have been complied with;
- the conclusions of the applicant are well founded. Their validity is verified only briefly and regarding the state of facts, whilst the legal grounds shall be analysed in detail[43].

In addition, the court shall rule on the admissibility of the written application, in which situation shall decide, if necessary, conducting preparatory inquiry[44].

The decision rendered, in a case when the defendant has been absent, is final but it can be "challenged (by the defendant – a. n.) within one month from the date when it was notified[45]" through an opposition, "which must be lodged in the form prescribed by Articles 37 and 38 of these Rules". In this context, "the objection shall not have the effect of staying enforcement of the judgment by default unless the Court of Justice decides otherwise" (article 41 of the Statute of the Court of Justice).

Bearing in mind all the above mentioned, we can observe that the opposition is a genuine written application, when the defendant asks either for the annulment of the judgment rendered in absentia or the admission of his claims formulated against the applicant[46]. This application shall meet the formal formalities provided for in the rules of procedure of the European courts.

After the notification of the opposition, the court sets the date by which the other party may submit written comments, and the following procedure is carried out by general rules, no matter the court of European Union before which the case was brought.

Nevertheless, the court may decide to suspend the enforcement of the judgment until the trial of the opposition lodged by the defendant, in accordance with the provisions of the rules of procedure.

Regarding the application lodged in term by the defendant, the court shall decide by way of a judgment which may not be challenged again with another opposition[47], but may be contested with appeal.

To avoid the abuse of using this sui generis mean of appeal by the parties and taking into consideration that the European legislation keeps the silence related to it, in our opinion the defendant is allowed to use this mean of appeal only one time.

The original of this judgment shall be annexed to the original of the judgment by default and a note of the judgment on the opposition shall be made in the margin of the original of the judgment by default[48].

b. Complaint when the court omitted to give a decision

Another sui generis mean of appeal is complaint when the court omitted to give a decision[49], which can be filed by any interested party (applicant, defendant, intervener, which can be, as the case maybe: an institution, an agency, a body or office of the European Union, a natural or legal person) "within a month after service of the judgment" or the decision when "the court [omitted] to give a decision on a specific head of claim or on costs", in which situation the court rendered minus petitia (article 67 para. 1 of the rules of procedure of the Court of Justice). The same situation can be found in other national legislations of the Member States, including Romanian[50].

Although the rules of procedure of the General Court and Civil Service Tribunal[51] do not mention anything, from our point of view these provisions should be modified and amended, by allowing the two courts to rule not only on the costs of the dispute but also on a complaint when the court omitted to give a decision on a specific head of claim, which should be decisive and different from the others heads of claim, according to the doctrine in the field[52].

Through the Registry, the application is notified to the opposite party in the dispute and the „President shall prescribe a period within which that party may lodge written observations". "After these observations have been lodged, the Court shall, after hearing the Advocate General, decide both on the admissibility and on the substance of the application [53]" in order to stop parties to suffer to much the consequences of an error committed by an European court when rendered its first judgment[54].

To be admissible, the complaint, as the opposition lodged by the defendant, shall meet the same formal conditions, taking into account that both of them are sui generis means of appeal. The application will be also admissible when, by its error, the court omitted to give a decision on a specific head of claim or on costs from the original judgment.

Although the procedural rules of the General Court and Civil Service Tribunal keep the silence in the matter, in our opinion, the decision can be appealed in the similar way as the origin judgment that has been the object of the complaint.

IV. Exceptional review procedures

In the proceedings brought before the courts of the European Union, the judgments can be also appealed with third-party proceedings or revision, which can be considered to be exceptional review procedures because of their special nature.

These two exceptional review procedures represent the possibilities given to the parties and other interested parties to ask to the court that delivered the contested judgment to dismiss its own judgment or decision and render a new decision in the case, with the observance of the conditions stipulated in the Statute of the Court of Justice and the rules of procedures of the European courts.

Bearing in mind the above mentioned, we highlight then fact that these exceptional reviews procedures do not imply a new trial before a higher-level court, as it is in the case of appeal.

a. Third-party proceedings

Without putting in discussion the principle res judicata pro veritate accipitur, the third-party proceedings[55], well known as contestation in annulment, represents one of the two exceptional remedies procedures, which can be lodged exclusively by the third parties, in the following conditions:

- "in the cases and in the conditions [stipulated] in the rules of procedure";
- against the decisions delivered by the courts of the European Union;
- "to contest a judgment rendered without their being heard, where the judgment is prejudicial to their rights[56]", especially when the third parties haven't the possibility to participate in the original dispute[57], because of independently reasons.

The specialised doctrine[58] emphasized that to file an application for third-party proceedings the contested judgment shall bring serious damages to the rights of the third-parties. In this context, it is not enough for them to have a legitimate interest to protect, as it is regulated in article 97 para.1 letter b.) of the rules of procedure of the Court of Justice.

Furthermore, the prejudice suffered by the third party shall be resulted from the content or from the motivation of the judgment, in which situation the court will analyse from case to case, in a seriously manner, if their rights have been prejudiced or not.

The category of the third parties who can file such application is broad and can include the institutions, the bodies, the offices and the agencies of the European Union, the Member States as well as the natural and legal persons[59].

The application initiating third party proceedings will be considered inadmissible when it is introduced by:

- the intervener, who participated in the original dispute;
- the legal persons who, although they had the possibility to intervene as interveners in the original dispute, from reasons non imputable to them, they did not participate in the original dispute[60].

Instead, an application initiating third party proceedings shall be admissible if it is lodged only by the parties who, theoretically, could take part in the original dispute, but practically weren't present in the litigation as interveners.

Natural and legal persons can not intervene in the disputes regulated by articles 258 and 259 of TFEU, having as main object failure of the Member States to fulfil an obligation under the Treaties, by lodging an application initiating third party proceedings even when they have been prejudiced in their rights[61].

According to the rules of procedure[62], in order to be admissible an application initiating third party proceedings shall meet the same formal conditions and shall respect the same procedural terms, as in case of written application. In addition, the application shall include supplementary mentions regarding: "the judgment [or the decision] contested; the [legal reasons why] that judgment is prejudicial to the rights of the third party; the [facts] reasons for which the third party was unable to take part in the original case" and shall be also supported by relevant documents.

The application initiating third party proceedings is "made against all the parties to the original" dispute and the term to file the application is within "two months of the publication" of the judgment contested in the Official Journal of the European Union, according to the provisions stipulated in the rules of procedure of the European courts.

Upon the request of the third party, the court may suspend the enforcement of the judgment contested, but only for justified reasons.

Analysing the application lodged by the third party, the court may take one the following solutions:

- admission of the application in which case the judgment appealed shall be modified accordingly;
- dismissal of the application, which can be appealed in the same conditions as for the judgment contested.

Finally, "the original of the judgment in the third-party proceedings shall be annexed to the original of the contested judgment. A note of the judgment in the third-party proceedings shall be made in the margin of the original of the contested judgment" (article 97 of the rules of procedure of the Court of Justice).

b. Revision

The revision[63] represents the second exceptional review procedure regulated by the rules or procedure of the European courts[64] and can be lodged by the interested party against the final judgment rendered by the courts of the European Union. In this context, a new trial of the original dispute is required, whenever "the court expressly recording the existence of a new circumstance"

"which has a determined influence and, before the rendering of the final decision, was unknown by the court and the party that request this revision", from reasons non imputable to the parties[65].

In the European doctrine[66], in order to be admissible, an application for revision shall meet certain conditions, as follows:

a.the existence of new circumstances, which can be only "facts" having decisive influence on the context of the judgment rendered, which could change the judgment, least from the theoretical point of view. In this case it is about previous facts unknown by the court or by the party from reasons beyond of their will[67];

b. the previous fact, unknown by the court or by the party, should have decisive influence in the case. Instead, the measures adopted by the European Commission to enforce a contested judgment cannot be considered as decisive facts[68].

In order to open the revision on the grounds concerning the contested judgment or decision, the court shall proceed to an examination of admissibility of the application[69].

Concerning the moment when an application for revision may be lodged, the European procedural provisions[70] regulate that the application "shall be made within three months of the date on which the facts on which the application is based came to the applicant's knowledge" but no later than "the lapse of 10 years from the date of the judgment" (article 44 para.3 of Statute of the Court of Justice). The latest term, from our point of view, is calculated from the delivery of a judgment is a limitation period, which means that any overcoming of the term determinates the loss of the right by the interested party to file the revision.

To be admissible, in accordance with the European procedural provisions[71], the application for revision shall meet the same formal conditions as the written application and shall respect the same procedural terms. In addition, the application for revision shall "specify the judgment [or the decision] contested; indicate the points on which the judgment [or the decision] is contested; set out the facts on which the application is based; indicate the nature of the evidence to show that there are facts justifying revision of the judgment [or the decision], and that the time-limit laid down in Article 98 has been observed" and shall be also supported by the appropriate documents.

In addition, "the application must be made against all parties to the case in which the contested judgment [or decision] was given"(article 99 last para. of rules of procedure of the Court of Justice).

Although the European provisions in the field keep the silence, nevertheless we share the point of view stated by the Fabian Gyula in his work "Dreptul institutional comunitar", that: "the application for revision may be filed only by those who have participated in the original dispute as a party" under the article 44 of the Statute of the Court of Justice, moving forward to the idea of providing special regulations in its rules of procedure to allow the intervener to file the application as well, whenever he/she considers that the fact of which he/she was aware, subsequently, has a decisive influence for the dispute. Instead, the doctrine considered that "it must be prevented the possibility for the intervener to invoke reasons for revision about which, for the party in the original dispute, the limitation period has already occurred[72]".

"Without prejudice to its decision on the substance", after the hearing of the Advocate – General and taking into consideration the written observations of the parties, the court shall analyze, in camera, the admissibility of the application for revision and give the decision, in accordance with the procedural provisions. This decision is likely to find, specifically, the existence of a new fact, recognizing its characters that allow the opening of the revision.

"The original of the revising judgment shall be annexed to the original of the judgment revised. A note of the revising judgment shall be made in the margin of the original of the judgment revised[73]" and the new judgment shall be notified to the parties.

Since the European procedural provisions do not mention anything we believe that the revising judgment can be challenged with appeal, in the similar conditions as the contested judgment.

V. Conclusions

A better knowledge of the role that the means of appeal have for every judicial system, including for the European Union determinateed an in-depth research of these means, bearing in mind the Latin principle of res judicata pro veritate accipitur (the decision of a court is assumed to be correct).

Thus, the appeal cannot be understand better without analyzing the main components of it, as follows: the notion; the modalities to lodge an appeal and its general and special terms; principles categories of judgments and decisions that can be appealed by the interested parties; the applicants and the grounds of appeal.

Analyzing this mean of appeal have shown us that only the judgments and decisions of General Court and Civil Service Tribunal can be challenged with appeal, whilst the judgments delivered by the Court of Justice remain final and irrevocable, as the court in Luxembourg "doesn't know these means of appeal, as it judges in the first and last instance".

Whenever the court do not taken into consideration the defendant defences or omitted to decide on a specific head of claims filed by the applicant, the interested party can use one of the sui generis means of appeal (the opposition and the complaint). The specificity of these means, as an exception from the ordinary procedure, consist in combining the characters of many means of appeal which can be brought before the Court of Justice, and can be used only in the conditions provided for by the rules of procedure of the European courts.

Finally, the Statute of the Court of Justice and the rules of procedure of the European courts regulated specific conditions for lodging the exceptional review procedure (third –party proceedings and revision) as possibilities for the interested parties to request to the court that delivered the contested judgment or decision to withdraw it and to proceed to a new trial. From our point view, this seems to be since every new fact discovered, relevant and unknown prior the delivery of the judgment or decision, may determine a different solution from the European court.

CHILD RIGHTS AND THE LIMITS OF PARENTAL CONSENT IN MEDICAL PROCEDURES

OANA-MARIA HANCIU*

Abstract
Parental consent regarding a child includes the right of them to consent or not to a certain treatment on behalf of the child, but for this to be valid it must be governed by the child best interest.
Even if the parents believe in a sincere way of the rightness of their decision regarding the child interest, if the procedures are not adequate for the child age and for his real needs and this has a irreversible and damaging effect, the parental consent must be limited.
Also, the right for life and medical treatment of a minor child is prior to any religious beliefs of parents.
This paper has the purpose to present some procedures in order to protect the children and to limit the parental consent, so that the parental rights to determine medical treatment for the child will not be used in damage of child best interest.

1. Introduction

One of the most important achievements of the Council of Europe, as an intergovernmental organisation, is the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms (ECHR). This international treaty defines the inalienable rights and freedoms of all citizens and asks the State parties to guarantee these rights. Meanwhile, it institutes an international system of protection: the states and private individuals may inform the authorities from Strasbourg in case of the Convention violations. Romania has ratified both the European Convention of Human Rights and the European Social Charter.

The international community, particulary in the second half of the last century, has permanently expressed interests related to the issue of human rights. In this respect, was adopted in 1948 the Universal Declaration of Human Rights by the General Assembly of the United Nations and two international covenants of human rights, further followed by different treaties, resolutions and declarations related to the protection of human rights.

Concerning the protection and promotion of children's rights on 20th November 1989 the General Assembly of the United Nations developed the Convention on the Rights of Child, followed by the Optional Protocol to the Convention relating to the Rights of the Child, on the involvement of children in armed conflicts, and Optional Protocol to the Child's Rights Convention, concerning the sale of children, child prostitution and child pornography in 2000. In Romania, the human rights and therefore the children's rights are promoted and mainly protected by the Romanian Constitution which specifies in article 15: The citizens benefit from rights and freedoms established through the Constitution and any other laws and have the duties stipulated by them.

In Romanian legislation, the protection of the children's rights is mainly governed by Law no. 272/2004 concerning the protection and promotion of the children's rights. But, as member state of the Convention on the Rights of the Child, Romania has assimilated in its internal law the principles and standards assumed by the international commitments related to the protection of the children's rights.

* Lawyer, Bucharest Bar (oanahanciu@gmail.com).

This paper aims to present the importance of observing the superior interest of children in the medical procedures, and as well presenting some procedures for their protection even by limiting of the parental consent when this is not in accordance with the child best interests.

The Human Rights legislation is relevant to health care providers, since it regulates the relationship between individuals and medicine. Doctors should be well aware of the human rights legislation and be focused on patient interests closely linked to the law requirements.

Therefore, in the present case, it is of paramount importance that state institutions and medical staff closely observe the children's rights and when doctors and parents disagree about the best interest of the child, the courts should be in the position to determine the destiny of a sick child.

2. Law impact related to the child rights and medicine

The the human rights law influences directly the medical decisions. It is important for the decisions made, both from the individual point of view and from the medical deontology point of view, to be adopted with transparency and accuracy and by observing the human rights.

Human rights are legal instruments which represent fundamental human interests and are therefore closely aligned with ethical practice. As part of the general ethical treatment of patients, all health professionals should be familiar with their obligations keeping in mind fundamental human rights regulations in accordance with human rights legislation. As for instance, in 1998 in United Kingdom was adopted the Human Rights Act by Medical Ethics Department[1].

Relevant to health professionals are the articles from ECHR, as follows:

• right to life (Article 2)
• prohibition of torture, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment (Article 3)
• right to liberty and security (Article 5)
• right to a fair trial (Article 6)
• right to respect for private and family life (Article 8)
• freedom of thought, conscience and religion (Article 9)
• freedom of expression (Article 10)
• right to marry and found a family (Article 12)
• prohibition of discrimination (Article 14)

According to the European Convention, the rights can be divided into three types: [2]

- absolute rights (Article 3), from which no derogation is permitted although even these rights are open to interpretation;
- limited rights (Article 2, 5 and 6) where the limitations are explicitly stated in the wording of the Article; and
- qualified rights (Articles 8, 9, 10 and 12) where derogation is permitted but any action must: be based in law, meet Convention aims, be non-discriminatory, necessary in a democratic society and proportionate.

The introduction of a "right to life" in the European Convention does not mean that doctors must always strive to prolong life but that specific consideration must be given to this right as part of the medical decision-making process. Article 2 imposes positive and negative obligations on public authorities. They have positive duties to take adequate and appropriate steps to protect the life of individuals in their care, as well the negative duty not to take life intentionally[3].

By all means, patient 's best interest should be the priority to any medical decision and if there is a dispute between doctors and patient wish or patient relatives, the courts will be often asked to determine which is the best decision regarding patient's best interest.

Many decisions in medical practice involve patients' human rights. The rights that are affected needs to be identified first. The next stage of the process is to consider whether it is legitimate, in the circumstances, to interfere with those rights. In order to assess this, it is necessary to be familiar with the concept of proportionality.

Any interference with a Convention right must be proportionate to the intended objective. This means that even if there is a legitimate reason for interfering with a particular right, the desired outcome must be sufficient to justify the level of interference proposed. This involves a similar thought process to that used by doctors in many contexts, for example, to decide whether a breach of confidentiality is justified in the public interest. In those cases, doctors must consider whether the legitimate aim in disclosing information (to prevent or detect a serious crime, for example) is sufficiently serious to justify breaching confidentiality. These decisions are made by balancing the competing interests and by careful assessment of the individual factors in the particular case. In some cases a breach of confidentiality will be justified and in others it will not and those making the decision may be called upon to justify their actions. Although the term "proportionality" may be new to doctors, the concept is not.

In every decision doctors must consider relevant Convention rights and must be able to demonstrate legitimate grounds for interfering with such rights.Where different rights come into conflict (such as Articles 2 and 3), the doctor must be able to justify choosing one over the other in a particular case. Any decision, either to provide or withhold treatment, could be open to challenge using the Human Rights Act. It is therefore essential to build into the decision-making process consideration of how the decision could be justified from a human rights[4] perspective.

There are some cases, like emergencies, when doctors may proceed without parental consent or court authority. For example, it could be the case of parents who are Jehovah's Witnesses and refuse to consent blood transfusion for a child, transfusion which is vital to child survival. In this case parents would say that article 8 (endorsing their right to family life) and article 9 (guaranteeing religious freedom) of the European Convention of Human Rights offers them the right to decide child medical treatment. But in this case, when it is a matter of survival, the child best interest should be prior to any parents religious convictions.

In contrast with this example, the decision of ECHR[5] in Glass versus United Kingdom is relevant. According to this decision doctors are warned not to stretch the definition of emergency. It also places a strong emphasis on a presumption of parents' right to make decisions about the treatment of their young children.

David Glass was a child with multiple disabilities. In 1998, he suffered a series of infections after a tonsillectomy. Doctors believed that David had little awareness or pleasure in his surroundings, and that he was dying. They decided that if David stopped breathing he would not be resuscitated, and administrated diamorphine to relieve any distress. His mother vehemently objected both to the administration of diamorphine and the doctors' decision not to resuscitate David. On one occasion she successfully resuscitated David herself. The relationship between Davids' family and doctors deteriorated into acrimony and violence. Mrs. Glass unsuccessfully challenged her son to English Courts. She eventually took his case to the European Court of Human Rights in Strasbourg and won. The court rules that administrating diamorphine to David, against the wishes of his mother, violated Article 8 of European Convention on Human Rights. Doctors violated David's right to respect for his privacy, notably his bodily integrity. Where children are too young, or otherwise unable to make their own decisions about medical treatment, doctors must normally seek consent from the parents who speak on their child's behalf. Where doctors consider that parents are not acting in the child's interests, they must seek authority from a court before overruling the parents – except where intervention is immediately necessary to save the child's life[6].

Also, the Convention related to the children's rights specifies in Article.3par.1:

In all actions concerning children, made by the institutions of public or private social assistance, courts, administrative or legal authorities, the children's interests will prevail.

2. The Party states engage to provide to the children the necessary protection and care in order to assure their welfare, taking into account the rights and obligations of their parents, legal representatives or of any other persons to whom they were legally trusted and for this all the appropriate legislative and administrative measures will be taken.

Parental responsibility refers to the rights, duties, powers and responsibilities that most parents have in respect of their children. Parental responsibility includes the right of parents to consent to treatment on behalf of their children, providing the treatment that it is in the interests of the child.

Parental responsibility means that parents have a statutory right to apply for access to their children's health records, and if the child is capable of giving consent, he or she must consent to the access. Competent children can decide many aspects of their care for themselves. Where doctors believe that parental decisions are not in the best interests of the child, it may be necessary to seek a view from the courts, whilst meanwhile only providing emergency treatment that is essential to preserve life or prevent serious deterioration.

Parental responsibility is a legal concept that consists of the rights, duties, powers, responsibilities and authority that most parents have in respect of their children. It includes the right to give consent to medical treatment, although as it is discussed below, this right is not absolute, as well as, in certain circumstances, the freedom to delegate some decision-making responsibility to others.

People with parental responsibilities are entitled to give consent for medical treatment on behalf of their children. Usually parents wish to make the right decision about their young child's best interests, and most decision making is, rightly, left to children and parents with appropriate input from the clinical team. In cases of serious or chronic illness, parents may need time, respite facilities, possibly counseling, and certainly support from health professionals, but in most cases they are best placed to judge their young child's interests and decide about serious treatment. There are limits on what parents are entitled to decide, however, and they are not entitled to inappropriate treatment for their children or to refuse treatment which is in the child's best interests.

The decision capacity of the children, related to the agreement with medical treatment, depends on several factors, such as: the intelligence degree, the comprehension level and their capacity to assess correctly the medical advice.

Competent minors may be able to invoke their rights to challenge a decision to provide treatment against their wishes. It is possible that a young person could use the Convention rights (in Articles 5, 8, 9 or 14) to appeal against a decision to provide treatment against his or her wishes. So, people under 18 can give valid consent to treatment, proving they have sufficient understanding of the proposed treatment.

However in case the treatment is dangerous and might generate permanent sequels, obtaining the parents agreement becomes compulsory. Also, in all the agreements concerning the medical procedures, there should be a balance between the real psychical capacity and the legal capacity of agreement, in this respect being some essential differences.

In the support of this statement is the Declaration from Helsinki, updated by the World Medical Association in 1996, which mentions: "In case of legal incapacity, the agreement should be obtained from the legal guardian, as stipulated by the national laws. Where the physical or mental incapacity makes impossible to obtain an agreement in full knowledge or when the subject is a minor, the agreement of the relatives who are liable for him replaces that of the subject, always in compliance with the national laws. When the minor is indeed able to express his own agreement, this should be obtained together with that of the legal guardian."

For instance, in Switzerland, Germany, England, concerning minors, the agreement in full knowledge, signed of the parents or of those exercising the tutor authority, is enough. In France, it is necessary, except the parents agreement also the interference of three experts, of which two doctors outside the team that will assess the taking-off or the transplant. In case of taking off from a minor unable of any agreement, recently the Convention on bioethics has set that, unto the general forbiddance to take off organs or tissues from a subject unable to express his agreement (art. 20, paragraph 1), take off regenerative tissues (such as bone marrow) from a subject unable of agreement may be consented under some specific conditions [7](art. 20, par. 2).

However the parents rights to determine a medical treatment for their children derives from the parental liability and these rights may be removed only under the conditions when there are clear indications that the superior interest of the child is damaged by the inopportune and inadequate decisions of the parents. The usual procedures and the preventive measures do not generate any problem. The situation becomes more complicated when these procedures have a harmful and irreversible effect, case when if the parents decisions are not compliant with the best interests of the children, their agreement should be limited, even ig they believe sincerely that they act in the superior interest of the children.

As to the above stated, it may be the case of the cosmetic operations. Does the parent have the right to submit his child to such an intervention only to be promoted in his career of model or simply just for esthetical reasons absolutely useless? Certainly not. It is not any longer the case of the best interests of the child, but of some parental ambitions.

So any medical procedure should be conceptually based on the best interests, and also, except the cases of medical emergency when life is in danger, the administration of a medical treatment in the absence of a consent may be considered an illegal action.

Also[8] the treatment of the persons not being able to make a decision, may require a certain behaviour to the clinician:

- Act in the superior interest of the person
- Follow a legal provision or a regulation, valid for the respective case or
- Use one of the substitutes for the decision factors.

Nevertheless, the doctor should protect the patient life when the patient is not enough informed about his denial or he has an irrational decision behaviour and in this case the doctor may address to the courts for an equitable and legal settlement of the situation. The patient denial should be recorded by the doctor in the observation chart both when it is about the personal denial of the patient or when the patient appoints somebody else for this.

The principles which should govern both the medical activity and the patient autonomy are the patient safety, the absence of the negative effects and the justice principle.

3. Conclusions

In conclusion when there are different opinions related to the child treatment between the parents and the medical staff, the solution is granted in the care of the courts. In principle the parental rights are practiced commonly by both parents. However there are cases according to the New Civil Code, when this minor protection may not be obtained by the aid of the parents, the tutor or guardianship, assign to foster home or any other measures specially provided by the law may be instituted.

Also, when a child is able to communicate, they should take into account his opinion related to the medical treatment that he is going to be subject to. There should be a balance between his best interests and his will or not his to attend the treatment. There is a good practice to obtain the child agreement in these cases. The forced treatments which imply a major psychic stress of the child should have a strong justification.

The general principle that should have the precedence is saving the life.

The challenges of the modern world in the medical field should be compliant with the legal system of the human rights protection.

It is however necessary to put in practice better the internal, European and international law, in force related to the superior interest of children in medical procedures and a greater legal liability of all the decision factors.

Keywords: fiscal-administrative solicitor's office, fiscal solicitor's office, fiscal-administrative document, act of enforcement, title executory.

Introduction

Comparative study of fiscal-administrative solicitor's office and fiscal solicitor's office seeks to highlight the two institutions of the fiscal law. Comparative scientific research of fiscal-administrative solicitor's office and fiscal solicitor's office is important because through these procedural means taxpayers can defend their rights and interests are violated when the tax administrative bodies, being the major means of achieving fiscal equity.

By means of the two institutions, taxpayers are given the opportunity to bring their conflict with the tax before a judge who will decide on the conflict, thus restoring the legal order.

Intended objectives are to analyze the current state of research on fiscal-administrative solicitor's office and fiscal solicitor's office, definition of fiscal-administrative solicitor's office, definition of fiscal solicitor's office, analysis of the two institutions and to identify features and characteristics regarding the subject action, the time limit for action, courts of law, the parties, the identification of similarity between fiscal-administrative solicitor's office and fiscal solicitor's office and to identify differences between the two institutions.

Scientific research was done based on comparative study of national legislation (Government Ordinance no. 92/2003 regarding the Fiscal Procedure Code, republished, with subsequent amendments, Law no. 554/2004 on administrative solicitor's office, as amended and supplemented, Code Civil Procedure), by addressing the literature in the field, and jurisprudence.

Addressing fiscal-administrative solicitor's office and fiscal solicitor's office is based on the work of specialists in administrative law, financial law and fiscal procedure and fiscal-law of civil procedure.

Paper content

In our approach will start from the classification of the institution of solicitor's office, which the literature[1] was classified according to several criteria, as follows:

- generated by the subject stands out constitutional solicitor's office, administrative l solicitor's office, fiscal solicitor's office.

- by the authority before which settlement takes place, solicitor's office may be: judicial solicitor's office (the jurisdiction of the courts) and jurisdictional litigation (the competence of administrative courts or the very special nature).

- parties involved in nature and effects delivered solutions, solicitor's office may be: internal solicitor's office and international solicitor's office.

Analyzing the first criterion, which classified the solicitor's office after the dispute, we propose a different classification by this criterion, namely: constitutional solicitor's office, administrative solicitor's office (which in turn is subdivided into general administrative solicitor's office and administrative-fiscal solicitor's office, the species general administrative solicitor's office) and common law fiscal solicitor's office[2].

The fiscal-administrative solicitor's office is a species of administrative solicitor's office[3]. The special character of fiscal-administrative solicitor's office of regulation appears different, namely the administrative phase of its regulation by Ordinance no. 92/2003 regarding the Fiscal Procedure Code, republished, with subsequent amendments[4], as well as recognition of fiscal-administrative solicitor's office as part of administrative solicitor's office by Law no. 554/2004 on administrative solicitor's office.

In the legal literature of our country, the fiscal-administrative solicitor's office was defined as „all the rules for the conduct of litigation documents and discussing the effects of fiscal administrative acts committed by public power"[5], or a recent definition, The fiscal-administrative solicitor's office is „all legal remedies against acts of tax which requires the reduction or cancellation of taxes, contributions to special funds, the delay increases and penalties and fines or other sums found and applied by the fiscal authorities central and local authorities, by law, to conduct the audit or tax, which is solved by a special procedure by administrative bodies and / or courts"[6].

The fiscal-administrative solicitor's office is defined as „all disputes between the public and manage the generated tax acts"[7] or, in another definition, the fiscal-administrative solicitor's office is regarded „as a means derived from human rights, for the purposes procedurally, all actions and remedies that are resolved by the judicial authority of the state, the power of truth all legal disputes arising from the tax and put in front of the taxpayer (natural or legal person) and the fiscal and administrative the state"[8].

Also, the fiscal-administrative solicitor's office was defined as all legal remedies against debt and other fiscal-administrative acts, which requires the reduction or cancellation of taxes, contributions, customs duty and the increase of delay times other amounts identified and measures implemented by administrative bodies and local tax, which is solved by a special procedure of administrative bodies and courts[9].

In our opinion, the fiscal-administrative solicitor's office is the activity of disputes between taxpayers and tax, litigation dealing with the cancellation of all or part of an administrative act, tax act by which the taxpayer is considered a right or injured in legitimate interest recognized by law[10].

Organized in two phases, phase administrative (fiscal appeal) and phase jurisdictional the fiscal-administrative solicitor's office comes to the taxpayers provide free access to justice, leaving the first to comment on litigation fiscal-administrative, trying to rule on conflict situations .

In terms of the fiscal-administrative solicitor's office object, we must have regard to the object of fiscal and object to administrative appeal proceedings before the court.

Person who considers themselves wronged in their rights recognized by law by an administrative-fiscal or lack thereof can make fiscal appeal, according to the Fiscal Procedure Code, and then action.

Accordance with article 205, paragraph 1 of the Fiscal Procedure Code, the fiscal claim against the title against other administrative acts appeal may be made under the law. This article shows that the debt instrument is a fiscal administrative act, along with other administrative acts subject to the fiscal appeal. Other administrative acts which may be fiscal appeal are fiscal decision (are assimilated to fiscal decisions and administrative acts following: decisions on value added tax refunds and decisions on refunds of taxes, fees, contributions and other revenue of the budget consolidated, decisions on taxation bases decisions on payment obligations accessories, unchanging base decisions on taxation[11]), the provision of measures, the decision on establishing joint liability, compensation notes, payment notices, minutes of the interest calculation due taxpayer debt on customs duty[12] (customs declaration, which sets the protocol and specifies the customs duty, including accessories) etc.

The object may be fiscal appeal fiscal administrative act itself, typical („document issued by the fiscal authority in the legislation for the establishment, modification or termination of rights and fiscal obligations") and assimilated administrative act, atypical (no act „silence" fiscal body, that failure to resolve a claim within the legal deadline for issuing the administrative act, or unjustified refusal to resolve the request - explicit expression, with excess power will not solve the request)[13].

Accordance with article 206, paragraph 2 of the Fiscal Procedure Code is the only object of dispute amounts and measures set by the fiscal body and the debt-claim or appealed fiscal administrative act, except an appeal against unjustified refusal to issue the fiscal administrative act.

Fiscal-administrative acts can not be appealed in administrative court without fulfilling the prior administrative proceedings. If admission appeal is decided, as appropriate, annulment or dissolution of all or part of the contested act. If the decision is wholly or partly dissolved appealed fiscal-administrative act will enter into a new fiscal-administrative act will be considered strictly considerations settlement decision.

Regarding the object of fiscal-administrative solicitor's office that is the decision or order issued after settlement of appeals against fiscal-administrative acts.

We believe that the object of fiscal-administrative solicitor's office or decision-fiscal is available to resolve fiscal appeals and fiscal-administrative act indirectly to the subject of fiscal appeal[14].

Accordance with article 207, paragraph 1 of the Fiscal Procedure Code, the appeal deadline is 30 days from the date of the fiscal-administrative act, under penalty of forfeiture. This term is a period of decline and not recommendation. Notwithstanding, if the fiscal- administrative act contains no provisions regarding the possibility of being challenged, the closing date of the appeal or the appeal body that is submitted, the deadline for appeals is 3 months of notification of the fiscal-administrative act.

The deadline for notifying the administrative solicitor's office court is 6 months, which commences from the date the response to challenge fiscal settlement date of unjustified refusal of the application deadline to resolve the fiscal dispute, that the legal deadline settlement demand, the deadline of 30 days calculated from the document issued in settlement favorable administrative application or, where applicable, the fiscal appeal. The term is six months limitation period.

For good reasons, if an individual administrative act, the application may be introduced over the term of 6 months but not later than one year from the date of the act or the date of the acknowledgment, the date of the request, as appropriate. Within 1 year is a period of decay.

Jurisdiction to hear fiscal appeal is given by the total amount of disputed amounts, taxes, fees, contributions determined by the tax payment and accessories thereof, or the total amount of fees, taxes, contributions, approved reimbursement such refund, if applicable.

Appeals against decisions of tax, fiscal administrative acts assimilated to tax decisions, decisions to regulate the situation issued in accordance with customs legislation, the tax loss mitigation measure established by measuring device, and against the decision of reverification is solved by[15]:

a) specialized structure for settling the appeals of the general directorates of public finance county or Bucharest, as appropriate, in whose jurisdiction the fiscal domicile challengers for appeals dealing with the taxes, fees, contributions, customs duties, accessories, tax loss mitigation measures, amounting to 3 million, and for appeals against the decisions of reverification, except those issued by the central bodies with powers of tax audit;

b) appeals a specialized structure for solving the general direction of public finances Bucharest county or, if necessary, jurisdiction under article 36 paragraph 3 to manage nonresident taxpayers who do not have a permanent establishment in Romania, to appeals made by them, having as taxes, fees, contributions, customs duties, accessories, tax loss mitigation measures, in the amount of up to 3 million, and for appeals against the decisions of reverification, except those issued by the central bodies with powers of tax audit;

c) the general solution of the appeals of the National Fiscal Administration Agency for appeals dealing with the taxes, fees, contributions, customs duties, accessories, as well as tax loss reduction in amount of 3 million or higher for appeals made by taxpayers, and those made against the acts listed in this article, issued by the central bodies of the inspection tax, regardless of amount.

Complaints made against other administrative acts shall be settled by issuing fiscal authorities.

The complaints raised by those who consider themselves aggrieved by unjustified refusal to issue a fiscal administrative act shall be settled by superior authority competent fiscal authority to issue that document. Appeals lodged against administrative acts issued by fiscal authorities, local government and other public authorities, by law, administer fiscal receivables are resolved by these authorities.

In the jurisdictional phase, background material competence of the courts is determined by the provisions of art. 10 of Law no. 554/2004, as follows:

- fiscal-administrative courts have unlimited jurisdiction in disputes concerning administrative acts issued or entered into by local authorities and county, and those relating to taxes, contributions, customs duties and accessories thereof up to 500,000 lei. By establishing their competence is polling in the administrative and fiscal courts;

[15] Article 209 of the Fiscal Procedure Code, republished, with subsequent amendments.

- fiscal-administrative departments of the Courts of Appeal judges in disputes over administrative fund issued or signed by the central government and those relating to taxes, contributions, customs duties and accessories thereof exceeding 500,000 lei.

The appeal shall be settled as follows:

- appeal against sentences pronounced by fiscal-administrative courts judged and fiscal administrative departments of the courts of appeal.

- appeal against sentences handed down by cutting administrative and fiscal courts of appeal shall be heard by the administrative and fiscal division of the High Court of Cassation and Justice, if the special organic law provides otherwise.

Regarding the territorial jurisdiction, in accordance with article 10, paragraph 3 of the Administrative Litigation Law, the applicant may appeal from his residence or domicile of the defendant. If the applicant has chosen to court the defendant's residence, except for lack of jurisdiction can not claim territory.

Along with fiscal-administrative solicitor's office in our country specialist authors examine the institution of common law fiscal solicitor's office that is contesting the enforcement actions of fiscal claims.

Based on the criterion of the competent body to resolve the dispute arose and procedure applicable in the legal literature specialist[16] fiscal solicitor's office was classified as common law fiscal solicitor's office and administrative-fiscal solicitor's office.

The literature[17] of common law fiscal solicitor's office was defined as the actions and remedies which common law courts resolve disputes by common procedural rules arising between taxpayers and fiscal authorities of the state or administrative-territorial units.

Whenever they are breached legal requirements relating to enforcement proceedings, the person concerned, if our taxpayer subject to enforcement, is able to notify the court of execution, seeking to obtain cancellation of acts contrary to the law enforcement. Means procedure which puts the law for this purpose to the person concerned is the challenge to execution[18].

The appeal to enforcement has been defined in the literature[19] as specific complaint that enforcement is achieved before the court, cancellation or correction of acts of enforced or sometimes even the annihilation of an enforceable effect.

Fiscal solicitor's office are identified with to appeal enforcement regulated by Title VIII, Chapter XI art. 172-174 of the Fiscal Procedure Code, the special enforcement[20] because an appeal to the general rule of enforcement complaints contained in art. 399-404 of the Code of Civil Procedure shall apply to a number of special rules contained in the Fiscal Procedure Code[21].

Accordance with article 172, paragraph 1 of the Fiscal Procedure Code, interested persons may appeal against any enforcement act done in violation of the Fiscal Procedure Code by enforcing bodies and where these bodies refuse to perform an act of execution the law.

According to paragraph 2 of the same article, the appeal may be made against enforcement pursuant to which the execution was started, where this title is not given a decision by a court or other judicial authority for such appeal and if there is another procedure prescribed by law.

The provisions on temporary suspension of enforcement by presidential ordinance under article 403 par. 4 of the Code of Civil Procedure are not applicable.

From the above, identify elements of similarity between the two institutions, fiscal-administrative solicitor's office and fiscal solicitor's office, as follows:

- Both are means by which taxpayers, individuals or legal rights and defend their interests under the law;
- Both designate disputes occurred between taxpayers and fiscal administrative organs;
- Both are ways that change or abolish fiscal-administrative acts;

Article 47 of the Fiscal Procedure Code provides for the abolition or alteration of the fiscal-administrative acts. Thus, in accordance with this article, paragraph 1, fiscal administrative act may be terminated or modified under the Fiscal Procedure Code.

Rules for the application of O. G. No. 92/2003 regarding the Fiscal Procedure Code, provided in section 46.1 where change or abolish fiscal-administrative acts, namely: if straightening material errors; when finding invalid fiscal-administrative act; it is shown that the owner of the ownership of property or taxable value is indicated by someone other than the fiscal administrative act; as a result of the abolition or modification of the fiscal decision, subject to further verification, in case of cancellation or straightening of the execution or enforcement of the challenged, because resolution by the court of appeals to enforcement; total or partial abolition of the administrative act attack, as part of the settlement of the dispute referred to the fiscal authority.

- In terms of parties, both for fiscal-administrative solicitor's office and fiscal solicitor's office where the defendant is an administrative body which is part of fiscal administration and taxpayers who are plaintiffs are citizens, but they are a special category , namely those who owe taxes and other contributions to the budget.

The two institutions are different:

- The fiscal-administrative solicitor's office takes place in two phases: administrative and legal phase, whereas if we just fiscal solicitor's office jurisdictional phase;
- Fiscal-administrative solicitor's office are governed by a legal regime of public law, that the rules contained in the Fiscal Procedure Code and those contained in Law no. 554/2004 on administrative solicitor's office, as amended and supplemented, and in terms of fiscal solicitor's office in addition to general rules of enforcement complaints contained in art. 399-404 of the Code of Civil Procedure shall apply to a number of special rules contained in the Fiscal Procedure Code, so disputes are governed by a mixed regime;

• In the object action for fiscal-administrative solicitor's office is an fiscal-administrative and fiscal solicitor's office if the action object is an act of execution, a writ of execution;

With regard to fiscal enforcement, in accordance with article 141 par. 2 of the Fiscal Procedure Code, the debt-claim becomes enforceable claim on the fiscal is due by the payment deadline set by law or determined by the competent body or otherwise provided by law.

According to paragraph 4 of the same article, in addition to the items specified in article 43 paragraph 2[26] of the code necessary for fiscal administrative act, the enforcement will include: fiscal identification code, residence fiscal and any other identifying information, amount and nature of the amounts due and unpaid under legal binding power of the title.

• In the competent court to settle disputes, if the fiscal-administrative solicitor's office in fact be the competent court is the court or court of appeal, and for fiscal solicitor's office, the competent court is the judge.

Conclusions

Scientific research has suggested the institution's comparative study of fiscal-administrative solicitor's office and fiscal solicitor's office institution, resulting in the analysis of the two institutions and to identify similarities and differences between them.

We wanted to highlight similarities and differences between the two institutions since both belong to fiscal law and procedural means by which taxpayers are defending their rights and interests by law, and often can create confusion between the two institutions, wishing to make themselves distinction between the two institutions.

The future requires detailed analysis, punctual and to the point, the fiscal-administrative solicitor's office and fiscal solicitor's office, leading to a thorough knowledge of issues related to the two institutions, problems that arise in fiscal-administrative solicitor's office or fiscal solicitor's office.

THE JURIDICAL PROTECTION ON GLOBAL DISCRIMINATION

CRISTINA OTOVESCU FRĂSIE*

Abstract
In this study I wished to evidence the main juridical documents referring to discrimination, adopted world wide by the United Nations Organization. Thus, can be identified several types of definitions concerning the discrimination against women, the race discrimination, the torture etc. within the analyzed documents. The democratic countries have laws that punish the discrimination, but, unfortunately, there are discrimination phenomena for example regarding the ethnicity, the gender, the language, the convictions, the age, at the working place, inside the family etc.

Keywords*: discrimination, law, Pact, human rights, Declaration.*

Introduction

In this study I have intended to research a very important and vast field for the contemporary world, such is the observing of the human rights at global level. Because during the last period of time discrimination is a very often met phenomenon, I have evidenced and commented the most important international juridical documents that refer to this aspect.

The study I have made is important because I have presented the main documents that were adopted under the auspices of The United Nations Organization, having as goal their popularization.

The objectives that I took upon myself in this study were the exhibiting of the international documents that refer to discrimination. During this article I have evidenced only a part of them, such are: The Universal Declaration of Human Rights, The International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, The International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights.

At international level, there are juridical documents concerning discrimination that have been evidenced in this article and, moreover, I have presented the events that took place abroad and regarded discrimination, to which Romania attended. The Representatives of the National Council for Fight against Discrimination (NCFD), in order to make connections with other similar institutions from Europe, attended several events on the human rights from world-wide.

In the same time, for making clear the situation of discrimination in Romania, I have used a poll, The phenomenon of discrimination in Romania, made in November 2010, by TOTEM and NCFD, the target population being the Romanian citizens (men and women), resident in the urban and rural area from Romania, over 18 years old, and the volume of the sample was of 1400 persons.

2. The main international juridical documents regarding discrimination

"Discrimination represents the distinct treatment applied to a person because of his/her belonging, real or presumed, to a certain social group. Discrimination is an individual action, but if the members of the same group are treated systematically in a similar way, this constitutes a social pattern of aggregate behaviour. In the social sciences, the term generally leads to a prejudiced treatment, with negative effects on the person in case. The researches identified the existence of several types of discrimination. Generally, it is operated the distinction between the direct and the indirect discrimination. The first type appears when the differentiate treatment is generated deliberately, while the second type appears when this treatment is based on an inequitable decision taken previously. Kirshna Mallick (2005) proposes two more typologies, based on the distinction made between the deliberate and the conscious discrimination and the unintentional one and also between the discrimination practiced by the individuals and groups and by institutions" [1].

Under the patronage of the United Nations Organization were adopted several documents regarding discrimination: The Universal Declaration of Human Rights, The International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, The International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, The Convention on the Elimination of all forms of Discrimination against Women, The Convention against Torture and other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment, The Convention on the Elimination of all Forms of Racial Discrimination.

In this article I will render evident only a part of them: The Universal Declaration of Human Rights, The International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, The International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights.

The Universal Declaration of Human Rights, adopted on the 10th of December 1948, stipulates in its Preamble that "the foundation of freedom, justice and peace around the world" is constituted by "the recognition of dignity inherent to all the members of the human family and their equal and inalienable rights". The states members of the Declaration committed themselves "to promote, together with the United Nations Organization, the universal and effective respect of all the human rights and fundamental freedoms and also their universal and effective observing"[2].

In art. 1 it is stipulated that, from the moment of birth, all the human beings are free and equal in dignity and rights. Also, they are endowed with reason and conscience and they should behave towards one another in the spirit of brotherhood.

Any person can avail oneself of all the rights and freedoms proclaimed in this Declaration, without making difference regarding the race, colour, sex, language, religion, political or any other kind of opinion, national or social origin, wealth, birth or other circumstances. Thus, we must not draw a distinction regarding "the political, juridical or international statute of the country or territory to which a person belongs, either this country or territory are independent, under guardianship, non-autonomous or subjected to any limitation of the sovereignty"[3].

The law must equally protect all the people against discrimination. In art. 7 from the Declaration it is stipulated that "All the people are equal before the law and are entitled, without any discrimination, to equal protection. All have the right to equal protection against any discrimination that would violate this Declaration and against any incitation to such discrimination".

As concerning the job, according to art. 23, all the persons, without discrimination, must benefit by the right to have an equal salary for equal work[4].

The International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights was adopted and opened for signing by the General Assembly of the United Nations on the 16th of December 1966 and came into force on the 23rd of March 1967. Romania ratified The Pact on the 31st of October 1974 through the Decree no. 212, published on the "Official Gazette of Romania", first part, no. 146 from the 20th of November 1974.

In the dispositions of this Pact, the states parties commit themselves to observe and to guarantee to all the people who live on their territories and are within their competence, the right recognized in this pact, without any difference, especially as regarding the race, the colour, the sex, the language, the religion, the public or any other opinion, national or social origin, wealth, the birth or any other circumstances[5].

The law forbids "any provocation to national, racial or religious hate that constitutes a incitement to discrimination, hostility or violence"[6].

In art. 26 it is stipulated that "All the persons are equal before the law and they have, without discrimination, the right to equal protection. Therefore, the law must forbid any discrimination and guarantee to all the persons an equal and efficient protection against any discrimination, especially of race, colour, sex, language, religion, political or any other, national and social origin, wealth, birth or of any other circumstance".

The moment when The International Covenant on the Civil and Political right was adopted so was its optional Protocol (the same day). Romania ratified The Protocol through the Law no. 7/1991, published in The Official Gazette of Romania, Part I, no. 18 from the 26th of January 1991.

The International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights was adopted and opened for signing by the General Assembly of the United Nations on the 16th of September 1966 and came into force on the 3rd of January 1967.

The states parties of this Pact, commit themselves to take action, both on their own or assisted and with international cooperation, especially in the economic and technical field, though using at the maximum level the available resources, in order that the exercising of the rights stipulated in this Pact to be progressively provided though all the adequate means, including though the adopting of the legislative measures. The states parties to this Pact commit themselves to guarantee all the rights specified in the stipulations of the articles from it, being exercised without discrimination based on race, colour, sex, language, religion, political or any other opinion, national or social origin, wealth, birth or any other circumstances[7].

The most important category that need education and access to cultural and artistic activities are the children[8]. In the provisions of art. 10 it is stipulated that "Special measures of protection and assistance must be taken for all the children and teenagers, without discrimination based on parentage or other reasons. The children and teenagers should be protected against the economic and social exploitation. Using them for activities that would harm their morality or health, that would endanger their lives or affect their normal development, must be punished by law. The states should also establish age limitations under which the use of the children for paid work would be forbidden and sanctioned by law".

As referring to The International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, this doesn't include provisions referring to a system of individual or inter-states complaints, but it requires to the states parties to present reports that would include the measures they had adopted and also the progress registered as regarding the observing of the rights acknowledged in the Pact. The reports would be addressed to the General Secretary of the United Nations Organization, who would transmit them in order to be examined by the Economic and Social Council (ECOSOC)[9].

„The EU has some of the most advanced anti-discrimination laws in the world. European legislation in this field is based on Article 19 of the Treaty of Lisbon (formerly Article 13 of the Treaty of Amsterdam) which gives the EU powers to combat discrimination on the grounds of racial or ethnic origin, religion or belief, disability, age,sex or sexual orientation. Current legislation comprises 2 Directives:

- The Racial Equality Directive (2000/43) prohibits discrimination on the grounds of racial or ethnic origin in the workplace as well as in other areas of life such as education, social security, healthcare and access to goods and services.

The Directives were agreed by all EU Member States in 2000. Each Member State was then obliged to incorporate these new laws into their national system"[10].

3. The representations of Romania to different events from abroad on discrimination[11]

The National Council for Fight against Discrimination, in Romania, is the autonomous state authority, under parliamentary control that carries on its activity regarding discrimination.

Through discrimination it is understood any differentiation, exclusion, restriction or preference based on the criteria stipulated by the in force legislation. The criteria established by the Romanian legislation are: race, nationality, ethnicity, language, religion, social category, beliefs, sex, sexual orientation, age, handicap, non-contagious disease, HIV infection, belonging to a disadvantaged category and any other criterion that leads to the restraint, the removal of the recognition, the use or the exercising of the rights recognized by the law, in the political, economic, social and cultural field or in any other field of the public life[12].

In 2010, in order to consolidate the visibility regarding the activities from the non-discrimination field and the perpetuation of the relations and the collaboration of The National Council for Fight against Discrimination (NCFD) with other similar institutions from Europe, the representatives of NCFD attended numerous international events related to the human rights, such are:

- In August, the head of the Romanian delegation, mister president Csaba Asztalos, attended the seconding of the periodic report of Romania at The UNO Convention on the elimination of all forms of racial discrimination. In the Romanian delegation were also included persons who represented the national minorities. In the report drawn up by Romania was accentuated the situation of the Roma people, the education in the Hungarian language, the use of the minority languages in administration, justice.

- February – The Seminar for the practitioners from the juridical field The anti-discrimination directives 43/2000 and 78/2000 in practice that took place at Trier, in Germany, being discussed: the European Union legislation regarding the anti-discrimination, the role of the equality institutions, the role of the evidence in case of discrimination and the situation of the Roma people from the European Union.

- The Campaign For Diversity. Against Discrimination

- The Reunion of the Committee of Specialists on the Roma people and Travellers (MG-S-ROM)

- The Seminar Good practices exchange on Public policies combating discrimination based on racial and ethnic origin in accessing and progressing in employment; it took place at Berlin, in Germany.

- The Reunion of the Committee of Governmental Specialists on non-discrimination from the European Commission

- The Seminar The community legislation as regards the equality between men and women put into good practice.

5. Conclusions

"A major problem with which the society deals is discrimination that represents the discernment of quality and the recognition of the differences between concepts. Discrimination is impossible to eliminate, because we don't live in an ideal society. Not all the people adapt themselves in a perfect manner to the circumstances and to the people around them because they take into account certain unjust criteria. For some, this thing would mean to renounce their own identity. But we shouldn't confuse it with the prejudice that translates as negative attitude towards each individual, member of a group, being motivated only by their belonging to the group. The difference between people is the most spread form of discrimination, because of the prejudices due to some characteristic treatments to certain groups of persons. The racial or religion discrimination is illegal in most of the occidental democracies, while the merit discrimination is most of the times tolerated by the legislative systems, being explained as a form of differencing between the performances of several people. The National Council for Fight against Discrimination (NCFD) carries on its activity according to the normative documents on the prevention and sanction of all forms of discrimination, concerning the organization and the functioning of the National Council for Fight against Discrimination.

The discrimination can undermine the reaching of a high level as concerning the employment and the social protection, the increasing of the living standard and life quality, cohesion and economic and social solidarity.

A hard disease of the humankind that should be eradicated is intolerance. As dwellers of the Earth, we must fight for a society of understanding and tolerance. In order to become wiser, to gain friendship, agreement and happiness, we need tolerance. We must reject the concepts of racial discrimination, anti-Semitism and xenophobia. With wisdom one can build an empire, a society.[14]"

PROFESSIONALIZATION OF THE JUDICIARY BY RECRUITMENT AND SELECTION

VIORICA POPESCU*

Abstract
Considered as key elements of the human resources policy of an organization, recruitment and selection influence the status of human potential. Given that the main resource of each judicial system is the human resource, the present study aims to analyze the means of recruitment and selection of magistrates, both from the perspective of the national legislation, as well as from the perspective of the international provisions, identifying all vulnerabilities and directions for improvement.

Keywords: national legislation, human resources management, recruitment, selection, international provisions.*

Introduction

The present study which is part of the area of the judiciary organization aims the synthetic analysis of the recruitment and selection of magistrates (judges and prosecutors), both from the perspective of the international provisions, as well as from the perspective of the national legislation. As the research area approached is exclusively in the competence of the legislator, references to the literature are general and come from the area of human resources management.

Regarding my original contribution, it consists of the indication of the vulnerabilities of recruitment and selection of the Romanian magistrates, by referring both to the legislation in force, as well as to the Romanian actual socio-economic context, for in the end to present the ways in which the two managerial processes can be perfected.

The success of an organization can be ensured only if the employees are recruited and selected following the appropriate procedures. Recruitment ensures the number of persons on who the selection will be applied on. Having a bigger number of candidates, it is possible the recruitment of those who best fit the job requirements and who, by their skills guarantee performance.

Recruitment is the process by which the organization seeks candidates for its vacancies[1]. This process is unfolded continuously, permanently and systematic or spontaneous, triggered at certain time intervals[2] and must consider the following requirements: provide the organization the necessary personnel both quantitative as well as qualitative, create a rational relation between different categories of personnel, preoccupation to achieve a stability of the employees and reduce fluctuations, comply with the legal provisions in the area etc[3].

Because recruitment consumes money and resources, it is necessary to be unfolded following a methodology that will make possible the identification and attraction of the right persons and a well thought out plan[4].

On the other hand, selection is defined as the process by which the organization is trying to identify the candidates who possess the knowledge, skills and any other characteristics necessary for the organization to achieve its objectives[5].

Professional selection assumes a confrontation between the particularities of the job considered and the individual characteristics (skills, qualifications, personality etc) of each job seeker who applies for that vacancy[6].

1. Recruitment and selection of magistrates

Because magistrates are the best jurists, due to the social importance of the position as judge or prosecutor, democracies consider as very important the recruitment and selection of magistrates, but also of the authorities invested with prerogatives in this area, being established the principles and methodology which must be followed when these two essential processes are unfolded.

1.1 Principles and normative framework establishing the recruitment and selection of magistrates

The United Nations General Assembly, starting from the necessity of granting a special attention to judges in the legal system and to the importance of selection, training and professional conduct, adopted by the Seventh United Nations Congress and endorsed by resolutions 40/32 of 29 November 1985 and 40/146 of 13 December the Basic Principles on the Independence of the Judiciary[7]. According to this international document Member States have the obligation to ensure and promote the independence of justice, considering and introducing these principles in their national legislation and judicial practice. Any method of judicial selection shall safeguard against judicial appointments for improper motives. In the selection of judges, there shall be no discrimination against a person on the grounds of race, color, sex, religion, political or other opinion, national or social origin, property, birth or status, except that a requirement, that a candidate for judicial office must be a national of the country concerned, shall not be considered discriminatory (Point 10).

Recommendation No 94 (12) of the Committee of Minister to Member States on judges: independence, efficiency and responsibilities[8] adopted by the Committee of Ministers on 13 December 1994 recommends to Members States to adopt or to enforce all necessary measures for the promotion of judges as individuals and of the judicial system, to state their independence and efficiency, by implementing a number of principles.

According to the first principle stated (I), selection and career of judges must be based on merit, having regard to the evaluations, integrity, skills and efficiency. The authority competent with the selection and promotion of judges must be independent from the Government or public administration. Express provisions must be stated in order to guarantee its independence, to insure the appointment of its members by the judiciary itself, the latter one having the power to decide over the procedural rules of the appointment.

For the application of the Recommendation No 94 (12), the Consultative Council of European Judges (called CCJE) adopted the Opinion no 1 (2001) for the attention of the Committee of Ministers of the Council of Europe on standards concerning the independence of the judiciary and the irremovability of judge[9] stating that the independence of the judges is not a prerogative or a privilege in their own interest, but also in the interest of the state of law and of those who seek justice.

CCJE has established that in the Member States there is a variety of methods by which judges are appointed, also noticing that there is a unanimous opinion that appointments must be grounded on merit and performed based on objective criteria, any political considerations being inadmissible.

Any "objective criteria" seeking to guarantee that recruitment and career of judges are based on merit, considering their professional background, integrity, capacity and efficiency can only be defined in general terms. Thus it is primarily followed the insurance of a content for the general aspirations for an "appointment grounded on merit" and "objectivism", aligning theory with reality.

In the CCJE opinion it is necessary that the authorities of each Member State responsible with the appointments and proposals for appointments and promotion to insert publish and immediately apply objective criteria insuring that selection and promotion of judges is made based on merit, considering qualifications, integrity, capacity and efficiency.

Opinion no 10 of 23 November 2007 of the Consultative Council of European Judges for the Judiciary[10] at the service of society states important provisions regarding the competencies of the authority independent of the executive and legislative, competent with the selection, appointment and promotion of judges. It is shown that, in order to maintain the independence of the judiciary, it is essential that the selection and promotion of judges be made independently by the Superior Council of Magistracy, with the exclusion of the implication of the legislative or executive powers. The Opinion emphasizes the features necessary for the appointment of magistrates: total transparency of the conditions of selection by the dissemination of the criteria for appointment and promotion, a selection based on the merits of the candidates, appreciated by their qualifications, competence, integrity, independence, impartiality and efficiency, opening the procedures for appointment for a large area of candidates, who are representative for the community.

The European Charter on the statute for judges[11], adopted in a reunion organized by the Council of Europe in 1998, regarding the procedure for the selection and appointment of magistrates, states that the selection and recruitment of judges must be performed by a court of an independent commission and must be grounded on their capacity to freely and impartially appreciate all the judicial situations they face and to apply the law in the spirit preserving the dignity of persons.

Not only the selection and career of judges have been a preoccupation for European and international organisms, but also the statute and methods of selection and appointment of prosecutors, considering the same principles. Recommendation 19 (2000) of the Committee of Ministers to Member States on the role of public prosecution in the criminal justice system[12], adopted on 6 October 2000, emphasizes that Member States should take measures to ensure that the recruitment, the promotion and the transfer of public prosecutors are carried out according to fair and impartial procedures embodying safeguards against any approach which favors the interests of specific groups, and excluding discrimination on any ground such as sex, race, color, language, religion, political or other opinion, national or social origin, association with a national minority, property, birth, or other status. The careers of public prosecutors, their promotions and their mobility are governed by known and objective criteria, such as competence and experience.

The Eighth United Nations Congress on the Prevention of Crime and the Treatment of Offenders (27 August-7 September 1990) adopted the Guidelines on the Role of Prosecutors[13].

[13] Guidelines on the Role of Prosecutors available at: http://www2.ohchr.org/english/law/prosecutors.htm

These stated as main principles the need that all prosecutors possess the professional qualifications required for the accomplishment of their functions through improved methods of recruitment and legal and professional training, and through the provision of all necessary means for the proper performance of their role in combating criminality. These guidelines have been formulated as to assist Member States in their tasks of securing and promoting the effectiveness, impartiality and fairness of prosecutors in criminal proceedings, and should be respected and taken into account by Governments within the framework of their national legislation and practice.

According to these guidelines, persons selected as prosecutors shall be individuals of integrity and ability, with appropriate training and qualifications. States shall ensure that selection criteria for prosecutors embody safeguards against appointments based on partiality or prejudice, excluding any discrimination against a person on the grounds of race, color, sex, language, religion, political or other opinion, national, social or ethnic origin, property, birth, economic or other status.

1.2 Recruitment and selection of magistrates settled by the actual Romanian law – Law 303/2004 on the statute of judges and prosecutors

Title II of the Law No 303/2004 on the statute of judges and prosecutors settles the career of judges and prosecutors, the first chapter of this Title being dedicated to the admission into magistracy and the initial professional training of judges and prosecutors.

According to Art 12 of the Law No 303/2004 the "admission of judges and prosecutors into magistracy shall take place through competitive examination, based on professional competence, aptitudes and good reputation". We do not consider necessary to emphasize even more the clarity of the quoted text, the legislator establishing the rule that the admission into magistracy be made based on a competitive examination.

Starting from this rule, two different possibilities of admission into magistracy are distinguished: the promotion of the competitive examination organized by the National Institute of Magistracy or the promotion of the courses of the National Institute of Magistracy. The examinations organized by the N.I.M are performed based on a detailed methodology drafted by the Superior Council of Magistracy.

1.2.1 Admission to the National Institute of Magistracy

Legal texts (Art 13, Art 14, Art 26 Para 1 and Art 33 Para 2 of the Law No 303/2004) establish the main coordinates of the activity of the National Institute of Magistracy, namely the organization of the competitive examinations for the admission into magistracy and initial professional training of judges and prosecutors.

According to Art 14 Para 1 of the Law No 303/2004, the admission to the National Institute of Magistracy is made by observing the principles of transparency and equality, exclusively on the basis of a competitive examination. The same article establishes the requirements which have to be met cumulatively by the persons who apply for the National Institute of Magistracy, namely:

- to be Romanian citizens, with permanent residence in Romania and have full legal capacity;
- to be bachelors of law;
- to have no criminal and fiscal record;
- to speak Romanian;
- to be able, medically and psychologically, to exercise this office.

The candidates must pass theoretical exams and then an interview establishes the evaluation both of their psychological profile, and of their capacity to react accordingly to the professional deontological norms in different situations, as well as a logical test.

The persons who have promoted this examination have the quality of auditors of justice and will attend, for the next 2 years the initial professional training courses at the N.I.M, consisting of academic education and practical training, according to the training program approved by the Scientific Council of the Institute and by the Superior Council of Magistracy, according to Law No 303/2004 and to Art 17-20 of the Regulation of the National Institute of Magistracy[14].

Based on their general average marks the graduates may choose either the position of debutant judge or prosecutor in courts or prosecutor's offices attached to these courts, in accordance with Art 21 Para 2 of the Law No 303/2004.

The length of the probation is of one year, during which the debutant judges or prosecutors have to continue their initial professional training under the coordination of a judge or prosecutor especially appointed by the president of the first instance court or, as the case may be, by the prime-prosecutor of the prosecutor's office attached to this court. After completing the probation period, the debutant judges and prosecutors shall be obliged to sit for the capacity exam, according to Art 25 Para 1 of the Law No 303/2004. The capacity exam shall consist of verification of the theoretical and practical knowledge, by way of written and oral examinations. Theoretical tests shall concern the constitutional foundations of the rule of law, the basic legal institutions, judicial organization and the Deontological Code for judges and prosecutors. The practical tests shall consist in solving moot cases and drafting judicial acts, separately for judges and prosecutors, according to the specific nature of their activity according to Art 28 of the Law No 303/2004.

1.2.2 Appointment into magistracy

This mean of appointment into magistracy is stated by Art 33 Para 1 of the Law No 303/2004, previous to its modification by the Government Emergency Injunction No 100/2007 "persons who were judges or prosecutors and ceased their activity for reasons not imputable to them, judicial specialized personnel provided by Art 87 Para 1, lawyers, notaries, judiciary assistants, legal advisers, the probation personnel with higher legal education, judiciary police officers with higher legal education, the court clerks with higher legal education, persons who have held judicial specialized offices within the apparatus of the Parliament, the Presidential Administration, the Government, the Constitutional Court, the Ombudsman, the Court of Accounts or the Legislative Council, the Juridical Research Institute within the Romanian Academy and the Romanian Institute for Human Rights, the professors at law within the accredited institutions, as well as the assistant-magistrate with the High Court of Cassation and Justice with at least 5 years length of service within the specific field, may be appointed into magistracy, based on a competitive exam, if they meet the requirements provided by Art 14 Para 2". First of all we must note the addressability of the text, this mean of appointment being opened for a large, diverse and representative for the society group of candidates, the quoted law being in accordance with the recommendations of the Opinion No 10/2007 of the Consultative Council of European Judges.

As it is shown by the Opinion No 1/2001 of the CCJE "seniority requirements based on years of professional experience can assist to support independence", this being an important condition for the promotion of magistrates, without being absolute, in the prejudice of the one regarding professional skills.

According to Art 33 Para 13 as modified by the Government Emergency Injunction No 100/2007, and approved by Law No 97/2008[15] it is necessary that the candidates admitted have the obligation to attend to professional training courses organized by the N.I.M. These courses ensure training appropriate for the needs of the system, and closely respect the recommendations made by the international organisms, aiming the necessity of initial professional training for all categories of magistrates, regardless of their mean of admission into magistracy (see in this regard Recommendation R 94(12)/1994, the European Charter on the statute of judges and the Guidelines on the Role of Prosecutors).

2. Weaknesses in the area of recruitment and selection of magistrates in the Romanian judicial system

- It has not yet been established a policy of personnel for the Romanian judicial system, in accordance with the requirements of the European Commission[16], thus it is impossible both the correlation between midterm and long term needs of the system and the number of posts open for competition, as well as the stabilization of the number of posts opened for competition. From this point of view, until this moment, the decision on the number of posts opened for competition consider the near future, exclusively based on the number of posts opened at the moment of the decision. Such system promotes the present lack of balance in the future.
- Though according to the law, the main mean of recruitment into magistracy is by N.I.M, more than half of the recruitments made in the past five years were made by exceptions and simplified (including in the perspective of the rigorous selection and training subsequent to admission)[17].
- The examination based on multiple choice tests, which does not valorize professional reasoning, but shows a "muscle mind" and not a judicial thinking.
- The important elements in the profile of the magistrate remain insufficiently or not at all tested at the admission into magistracy (critical thinking, capacity to persuade in writing, linguistic competences, axiological system, general culture).
- Two years as the duration of the training courses is too long if we correlate it with the system's crisis of human resources.
- The inefficient capacity of the N.I.M to administrate the professional training of human resources necessary for the judicial system in relation to the large number of retirements.

To all of these we must add:

- Excessively rigorous selection of the candidates[18].
- The initial professional training of the auditors does not emphasize enough the social component of the training, the transfer of values and attitudes or the understanding of the economic mechanisms[19].

[19] Recommendation CM/Rec (2010)12 of the Committee of Ministers to member states on judges: independence, efficiency and responsibilities, Point 56 states that "Judges should be provided with theoretical and practical initial and in-service training, entirely funded by the state. This should include economic, social and cultural issues related to the exercise of judicial functions. The intensity and duration of such training should be determined in the light of previous professional experience", available since 15 June 2011 at:

- Insufficient practice of the future magistrates.
- The admission examination way too exaggerated, without any utility for the future magistrate.
- Within courts, the poor professional communication between N.I.M graduates, leading to vague judicial decisions and with a reduced responsibility.
- The lack of feedback from the graduates of the professional training courses organized by N.I.M and the Superior Council of Magistracy.
- Overloading the curricula with disciplines that are useless in training the magistrate as a practitioner of the law.
- The presence of theoreticians among trainers, without judicial practical experience limits the development of the practical skills of the future magistrates.
- The lack of balance between the number of judges-trainers and prosecutors-trainers.
- The absence of the evaluation of the socio-professional profile of the future magistrate.

Though the consulted factors have emphasized a series of conjunctures which have aggravated these vulnerabilities, namely:

- The deficiency of the stimulation of retirement of the magistrates against the stimulation of staying in the system.
- "The passenger entry" intro the system, the magistrate's pension it is not assimilated for other categories of personnel. The principle of the service pension is violated.
- The lack of financial motivations for the magistrate to stay into the system, as a consequence of the substantial wage cuts.

3. Directions to improve the recruitment and selection process

Because it has not yet been defined a policy for the Romanian judicial system personnel, in accordance with the requirements of the European Commission[20], it is impossible the correlation between the midterm and long-term needs of the system and the number of vacancies, but also the stabilization of the number of vacancies.

From this point of view, until this moment, the decisions concerning the number of vacancies were taken considering the near future, based exclusively on the number of vacancies available at the moment of the decision. Such system can only push to the future the present imbalances. The advantages in ensuring a constant number of vacancies are obvious: predictability of costs, the correct estimation of the number of trainers and the necessary spaces for the initial training courses etc.

The admission into magistracy, regardless of the followed procedure, as we have already shown, tests in a significant measure, the knowledge about the law of the candidates, and the important elements in the profile of the candidate are insufficiently tested or are not tested at all (critical thinking, capacity to persuade in writing, linguistic competences, axiological system, general knowledge). Psychological test is inefficient, for reasons of regulation, but also its validation on specific population.

3.1 Midterm objectives

- The correlation of the number of posts opened for competition with the midterm and long-term need of personnel of the judicial system, in accordance with the human resources policy of the Superior Council of Magistracy;

[20] See the European Commission reports under the Cooperation and Verification Mechanism, avail;able at: http://ec.europa.eu/dgs/secretariat_general/cvm/progress_reports_en.htm; by Decision No 1320/27 November 2008, SCM approved the Project on the analysis of the human resources management between 2005 – August 2008 and the strategy in this area between August 2009 – 2011; this strategy was revised following a program for technical assistance financed by the EU and unfolded between December 2009 – September 2010; nevertheless, the conclusions presented are still valid, due to the short time, insufficient for the evaluation of the application of this revised strategy.

- The stabilization of the entrances into the system on a midterm area;
- Ensuring the objective, transparent, relevant, efficient and equitable feature of the means of recruitment into magistracy;
- The attraction into the system of the most valuable law graduates of each generation.

3.2 Implementation means

Regarding the first objective, the preconditions for its fulfillment are: completion and maintain updated the magistracy human resources database; the implementation of some midterm and long-term forecasts regarding the exits from the system and the development of an appropriate human resources policy.

A second set of measures aims the stabilization of the entrances into the system, so that it is permanently ensured a correct dimension of the N.I.M (costs, spaces, trainers), as well as an equitable access to the superior levels of jurisdiction, regardless of the generation. Thus, are necessary: the establishment of a realistic target (minimal and maximal number of vacancies annually), the creation of a number of tampon/reserve posts, which will allow the amortization of occasional imbalances caused by the exits from the system, a correct dimension of the number of posts opened for promotion etc.

The achievement of the third objective – the insurance of an objective, transparent, relevant, efficient and equitable feature of the means of recruitment – assumes the adoption of some measures such as:

- The limitation of the maximum number of posts which can be occupied by extraordinary recruitment means (for instance, no more than 30% of the total number of posts annually opened for competition).
- The insurance of similar standards of difficulty for the admission into magistracy, regardless of the procedure followed and the target group of candidates.
- Rethinking the examination for the admission into magistracy, such as to verify as many as possible psychological elements from the candidate's profile and the weight shown in the profile (the reduction of the weight of the tests of law knowledge and memory skills and the increment of those which test the abilities and attitudes, including general culture and linguistic competences).
- The professionalization of the development of examination subjects (establishing a theme, selection of a team of specialists who will continuously work and concluding a collaboration with them, applying these subjects in examinations, creating a database of exam subjects, development of partnerships with institutions specialized in the development of exam subjects etc).

The last objective is probably the most difficult to be achieved in the context of the immediate financial advantages that the lawyer's profession can offer for graduates and depends, without a doubt, on the improvement of the image of justice and of the material and financial conditions attached to the statute of magistrate. Among them, can be adopted other measures, such as:

- The development of long-term partnerships between the National Institute for Magistracy – law schools, which will assume promoting campaigns in universities, the possibility of training stages into magistracy for students and
- An increased transparency, objectiveness and predictability of the exam for admission into magistracy.

Conclusions

Aiming the consolidation of the integration of Romania into the "European Area of freedom, security and justice", in which the preoccupations on the quality are constant and durable, the Romanian judicial system by the mechanisms offered by the human resources management is in a process of reformation and modernization, which assumes a resize of the judicial organizations so that these will be able to answer in a more efficient way to the requirements of the society, corresponding to their role to insure justice.

Though the admission into magistracy of judges and prosecutors is made by competition, based on their professional competence, skills and reputation, the recruitment means does not cover the need of personnel, nor does it insure justice above all suspicions. Even more, it is necessary a rethinking of the examinations for the admission into magistracy, so that it will test as many elements as possible from the psychological profile of the candidate and in the weight indicated by the profile, the diminution of the tests verifying law knowledge and memory skills and the appropriate increment of the test verifying abilities and aptitudes, including general knowledge and linguistic competences.

GENERAL ASPECTS REGARDING THE PRIOR DISCIPLINARY RESEARCH

ANDRA PURAN (DASCĂLU) [*]
RAMONA DUMINICĂ[]

Abstract
Disciplinary research is the first phase of the disciplinary action. According to art. 251 paragraph 1 of the Labour Code no disciplinary sanction may be ordered before performing the prior disciplinary research.These regulations provide an exception: the sanction of written warning.
The current regulations in question, kept from the old regulation, provides a protection for employees against abuses made by employers, since sanctions are affecting the salary or the position held, or even the development of individual employment contract.
Thus, prior research of the fact that is a misconduct, before a disciplinary sanction is applied, is an essential condition for the validity of the measure ordered.
Through this study we try to highlight some general issues concerning the characteristics, processes and effects of prior disciplinary research.

Keywords*: disciplinary misconduct, disciplinary sanctions, prior research, liable to disciplinary action, sanctioning decision.*

Introduction

According to Art.251 paragraph 1 of the Labor Code, no disciplinary sanction, except the written warning can be ordered before the prior disciplinary research.

In the same way, a series of normative acts regarding work reports provide the obligation of doing a disciplinary research, before taking disciplinary measures.[1]

This disposition of the Labor Code is justified by the protection of employees against the discretionary power of the employer, especially because the most severe disciplinary sanction consists in the termination of the work contract. Since a prior research is not done, the sanction cannot be individualized and its disposition discretionary, with no legal basis.

In such a way the Constitutional Court ruled, by decision no. 95/2008[2], stating that "juridical work reports have to be held in a legal surrounding, in order for the rights and duties and also the legitimate interests of both sides to be respected. In this scenery, disciplinary research prior to enforcing the sanction mostly contributes to the prevention of abusive measures, illegal or without proof, disposed by the employer, taking advantage of its dominant situation.

[2] Published by Official Monitor of Romania, part I, no.153 from 28th February 2006.

The conditioning of enforcing disciplinary actions by making prior researches does not diminish at all the disciplinary responsibility of the employees and does not give them any privileges. In the situation in which the work conflict triggered by enforcing disciplinary sanctions is required to be solved in a judicial court, both parties benefit of the principle of equality of arms, each having at their disposal the same procedural means and guarantees which govern the full exercise of the right of defense and the right of a fair trial".

Article 23, paragraph 11 of the Constitution states the presumption of innocence, presumption applicable in penal matters, and by analogy the presumption also applies in the disciplinary field, its compliance being mandatory.

Stating the disciplinary deviation is as such the result of an investigation conducted by the employer named by the Labor Code: disciplinary inquiry. Not doing such an analysis by the employer leads to the absolute nullity of the taken measures. As such, in the case in which the courts are notified, they "will state the nullity of the decision to terminate the work contract, and as a consequence, they will admit the appeal and will issue the occupation of the former position"[3], observation which will be done without the court going further into the problem, because doing the prior inquiry is an imperative condition foreseen by the regulations of the labor right.

1.The authorities which are competent to do a disciplinary inquiry

Regarding the authorities competent to do a disciplinary inquiry, the Labor Code makes no reference. Still it provides, in Art.271, paragraph 1, that "the employer has disciplinary prerogative, having the right to enforce, according to the law, disciplinary sanctions to his employees each time he states that they have had disciplinary deviations".

It does not do, at the same time, any distinction between the employer – juridical person and the employee – physical person. Or, the category of juridical persons includes: commercial societies, autonomous administrations, national societies and companies, budgetary units, etc, which could not directly, between themselves, as juridical persons, apply disciplinary sanctions. But, all these juridical persons have lead authorities, (collegial and also individuals)[4].

In the case of physical person employers, it is obvious that he is the only one who can do the disciplinary inquiry and who can enforce sanctions.

As regards to juridical persons, these have at their disposal leading bodies, the most important role in doing the disciplinary inquiry, establishing and enforcing sanctions falling to the single individuals in leadership, no matter their positions: director, general director, administrator, etc. They have general competence in the matter, being able to apply any disciplinary sanctions. The competence of single persons in leadership results, mainly, from legal, statuary or contractual dispositions, according to which they represent the link between physical and juridical persons, and, secondly, from those who provide their prerogative to organize the selection of new employees and dismissal of personnel. Considering these facts it is obvious that they also have competence in disciplinary inquiry.

The law also foresees the possibility of delegating attributions in concern to discipline, the single person in leadership being able to delegate one of his subordinates to enforce even the harshest of sanctions, firing.

The employer can assemble a discipline commission to establish prior inquiry and to propose the enforcement of a sanction, which will be established and enforced by the employer.

From this commission can also be part, if it is required, a representative of the syndicate from which the employee is part of.

In the case of certain categories of employees, the law states the organization of special discipline committees.

As such, the Education Law no.1/2011 states for pre-university teaching personnel a disciplinary inquiry commission competent in the matter, and for university teaching personnel, analysis and ethics commissions.

In the case of judges and prosecutors, according to Law 317/2004 regarding the Magistrate's Superior Council, modified and republished, comes into effect the discipline commission of the Magistrate's Superior Council, which initiates disciplinary action.

As regards to attorneys, Art.72 of Law 51/1995 states that within each bar it is organized and functions a discipline commission. This discipline commission judges the disciplinary deviations done by attorneys of that specific bar, and is formed of three members.

At a national level, in the case of the Union of Romanian Attorneys, the Superior Discipline Commission comes into effect.

2.The procedure of researching disciplinary deviations

Actual prior inquiry starts with the notification of the employer with the commission of a disciplinary deviation by one of its employees.

The employer can be informed by any person who has knowledge of such a fact or can act ex-officio.

After he was informed of the deviation done by one of his employees, the employer empowers a commission to make the prior inquiry. The Commission can be made especially for this purpose, through internal regulations or by any act of the employer.

In order for the inquiry to be genuine, it is mandatory for the employee to be summoned. According to Art.251, paragraph 2, "in concern to the development of the prior disciplinary inquiry, the employee will be summoned in writing by the person empowered by the employer to make the inquiry, stating the object, date, time and place of the meeting."

As it results from these legal depositions, the convocation will be made mandatory in a written form. If the employee is at its place of work and is brought to notice verbally of the reasons of the inquiry, the legal obligation of convocation is not accomplished, because the law does not distinguish in such a way[5].

In a way, we understood that "under the aspect of convocation, the legislator provides only that it be made in writing, not being necessary to make proof of a warrant, recommended letter with confirmation on arrival, as it is foreseen, under the sanction of absolute nullity, where the law does not distinguish, neither the interpreter can, adding in extra other conditions than those who were brought to the attention of the legislator".[6]

A "convocation note", which does not have the elements provided in Art.251, paragraph1 of the Labor Code, through which the employee is invited to e meeting which has the purpose of analyzing his activity and is in no way a disciplinary inquiry of his, dose not fulfill the conditions enforced by the law.[7]

The reason for which the legislator, in Art.251 of the Labor Code, inserted the requirement of a written notice, by stating the object, date, time and place of the meeting, was that of giving the employee the possibility to prepare a defense and the evidences knowing the fact of which he is investigated for and which has to be communicated to him.[8]

In practice and in doctrine it is shown the existence of two ways regarding the communication of the action of being summoned:[9]

- The first, consists in the direct handing of the document to the summoned employee, which assumes his written signature of acceptance in the employers books (normally, on a copy of the convocation);

- The second, in the case of refusal to receive or the absence of the employee from the building, the convocation will be made through a recommended letter at the domicile or residence which the employee gave to the employer. Also an official report can be made in which it is stated the refusal to receive.

As regards to the term of convocation for the employee's disciplinary inquiry, the Labor Code does not establish any, prior to the date established for doing the inquiry. But, the employer has to fall within the terms provided by Art.252, paragraph 1 of the Labor Code. According to this legal disposition, the employer has to emit the sanction decision in term of 30 monthly days from the date in which he became aware of the disciplinary deviation, but no later than 6 months from that time.

The 30 monthly days term is a prescription term, even if the 6 months term is not accomplished.

The two terms are maxim terms for doing the prior disciplinary inquiry and for making a sanction. As such, from the date of notice, which does not have to be outside the limitation term of 6 months, the employer has at its disposal a maximum of 30 monthly days for the whole stage of prior inquiry, which is for establishing the commissions, convocation of the employee, for the actual research and for making the sanction.

We consider this term to be insufficient for such an action, taking into account that from the date of the convocation and to the date established for research has to be a reasonable period in which the employee can prepare a defense. The convocation cannot be handed in the exact day set for the inquiry[10] and neither with a day before.[11]

At the date of the meeting, the employee will present itself in front of the commission, being able to defend itself, presenting evidences and motivations which it considers necessary.

Also, according to Art.251, paragraph 3 the employee has the right to be assisted, at his request, by a representative of a syndicate which he is a member of.

There is also the possibility that that employee is not a member of a syndicate or for a syndicate not to exist in that company. For this reason it would be convenient to use the French juridical solution (Art.L1232-4 Code du travail) in the way that assistance is possible by another employee, at the request of the accused.[12]

In the doctrine there are different opinions as regards to the assistance of the accused by an attorney. As such it is considered that, according to the law, the assistance of the employee by a person outside the unit cannot be possible, even an attorney.[13]

According to another opinion[14], "the employee has the right to be assisted by an attorney, on the grounds of the proclaimed norms for exercising the profession of attorney, this right being superior and distinct to the one in which the employee can be assisted, at his request by a representative of the syndicate of which he part of".

The Labor Code[15] complies with the international rules in matter of human rights and also the Romanian Constitution, as such guaranteeing the right to defense.

The employee has the right to bring all evidences and present all necessary motivations for proving his innocence.

After hearing the employee and analyzing the evidence, the commission will draft a report in which it will mention the results of the prior inquiry, the motivation for which the employee's defense had been rejected, the proposal of sanction or proposal not to sanction as well as the possible sanction. Also it will be noted the employee's absence to the convocation, if it is the case or its refusal to defend itself.

The authority competent to enforce the sanction can take notice of the commission's proposal or can decide on itself after the analysis of the result of the inquiry provided in the act drafted by the commission.

In light of the dispositions of Art.251, paragraph 3 from the Labor Code, the absence of the employee at the convocation made under the law with no objective reason gives to the employer the right to make the sanction, without making a prior disciplinary inquiry.

The above dispositions are very clear as regards to the effect of absence with no objective reason of the employee from the prior inquiry.

But, in the doctrine, the question weather the absence of the employee legally summoned, with no objective reason, is in itself a disciplinary deviation.

The absence for objective reasons of the employee summoned legally to the prior inquiry has as a first consequence the employer's prerogative to make the sanction without doing a prior inquiry. This consequence is in fact an exception from the obligation of making a disciplinary inquiry.

A second consequence is the non-exercise to the right of subjective defense which the employee has. As such, he will no longer be able to formulate a defense and bring evidence to state his innocence, the non-exercise of the right to defense being from its own fault.

3. Individualization and enforcing sanctions

In establishing disciplinary sanctions, the employer has to take into consideration the dispositions of Art.250 of the Labor Code, dispositions which provide that the employer establishes the disciplinary sanction applicable in report to the severity of the disciplinary deviation done by the employee.

Also, the following aspects have to be taken into consideration:

a) the surroundings in which the act was committed;

b) the employer's degree of guilt;

c) the consequences of the disciplinary deviation;

[15] Art 251 paragraph 1 of the Labor Code.

d) overall behavior at the work place;

e) possible disciplinary sanctions priory suffered by him.

According to the legal rules, a sanction cannot be established arbitrarily by the employer, who has disciplinary prerogative, but respecting in all the conditions shown above. The sanction will have to be individualized taking into account the criteria stated by the law in order for the preventive role of the disciplinary responsibility to be accomplished.

For example, when the employer applies a sanction "to severe in comparison to the gravity of the disciplinary deviation done by the employee, taking into consideration its overall behavior at work and the fact that he has not been disciplinary sanctioned before" will determine the court to replace the sanction enforced with an easier one (for example 10% per month with a written warning – Bucharest Appeal Court, section VII civil and for cause regarding work conflicts and social security, decree no.3670/R/2007)[16].

The sanctions provided by the Labor Code are in a gradual order, from the smallest one – written warning, to the harshest one – the termination of the work contract.

According to the criteria showed above, the employer can set one of these sanctions, which has to be proportional to the gravity of the deviation. Still, it will be taken into account the extenuating circumstances like for example the exemplary behavior and the lack of other deviation until that time.

As such, it is noticed that although the employee did undeniably severe deviations, in order to attract an even disciplinary sanction, breaking the rules of behavior at the place of work and work discipline, still the court decided that for that person who, for 23 years since he worked there, had correctly fulfilled his tasks and had never been sanctioned before, the gravest disciplinary sanction is not justified.[17]

According to Art.249 of the Labor Code, the employer cannot decide the measure of the disciplinary sanctions, these being totally forbidden by the dispositions of paragraph 1 of the mentioned article. This legal disposition defends the employer from the dominant position which the employer has, the latter not having a discretionary power in matter of disciplinary responsibility.

Another guarantee of the balance between work reports is instituted by paragraph 2 of article 249. As such, it is forbidden the enforcement of more sanctions for the same deviation. The employee will be sanctioned in only one way, proportional to the gravity of the deviation.

In the doctrine[18] it is shown that when the Code of conduct of the profession is not respected or deviations regarding the profession are made, such an illicit fact will attract a double disciplinary sanction.

4. The sanctioning decision. The report between the commission's proposal of disciplinary inquiry and the juridical act of sanctioning

The result following the actual disciplinary inquiry done by the disciplinary commission will be recorded, after the employee will be heard and the evidences will be analyzed, in a report, in which will be also mentioned, the motivation for which the employee's defense had been rejected, the proposal for sanction or the proposal not to sanction him and also the possible sanction. Also, it will be noted the absence of the employee to the convocation, if it is the case, or refusal to defend itself.

The disciplinary inquiry procedure done by the commission will not void the employer's right to exercise its right provided by Art.40, paragraph 1 letter e of the Labor Code, which is the right to establish the committed disciplinary deviations and to enforce the appropriate sanctions, according to the law, the collective work contract applicable and the internal regulation.

As such, the employer can take into consideration the commission's proposal or can decide on its own after the analysis of the inquiry's result provided in the act drafted by the commission.

As a consequence to this analysis, the employer's decision will be seen in the sanction of the employee, if the case calls for it.

Paragraph 2 of article 252 of the Labor Code provides the conditions of validity of the sanctioning act, called by the legal rules a "decision".

Under the sanction of complete nullity, the decision of sanctioning has to include the following elements:

a) description of the fact which constitutes a disciplinary deviation;

b) stating the provisions from the statute of personnel, internal regulations, the individual work contract or the applicable collective work contract which were broken by the employee;

c) the reasons for which the formulated defenses by the employee were dismissed during the prior disciplinary inquiry or the reasons for which , under the conditions provided by Art.251, paragraph 3, an inquiry was not done;

d) the rightful ground on the basis of which the disciplinary sanction is enforced;

e) the term in which the sanction can be contested;

f) the appropriate court to which the sanction can be contested.

From the legal dispositions mentioned above it is to be understood that for the legality and validity of the sanctioning decision it is required to include all mentioned elements, condition sine qua non for the mentioned aspects. The lack of one of them will mean the nullity of the sanctioning decision by the employer.

As regards to the absolute nullity which appears in the case of not respecting all elements of the sanctioning decision, it is considered[19] that "this nullity has the character of an express nullity, in which case the law develops a presumption juris tantum of harm, as so its beneficiary does not have to prove the injury, but only the lack of observation of legal forms. The character of the legal rule is imperative, and breaking it most definitely draws the sanction of absolute nullity".

The decision has to contain the description of the deed which constitutes disciplinary deviation, respectively, what the deed is, the way in which it was committed and eventually the aggravated circumstances or, on the contrary, extenuating. By this description we have to point out the essential aspects which lead to the conclusion that the employee's deed was done in connection to his work and in violation of the rules which commit him to a certain behavior.

Beside the detailed description of the deed done by the employee, the decision will include the date of the action[20], in order to verify the legal terms regarding the disciplinary action.

Resembling the acts emitted by the courts regarding the solving of conflicts with which they are invested, and also to the requests of summons, the labor legislation provides for the decision of sanction the motivation in fact and also in right.

If the in fact motivation is done through an as detailed description as possible of the deed, the in right motivation is done by showing the provisions which were broken by the employee.

In practice[21] it was shown that the "generic mention of the intern regulation, without individualizing an express disposition whose violation draws the qualification of grave disciplinary deviation of the employee, does not have to complement the request provided by Art.268, paragraph2 letter b (the actual Art.252, paragraph 2, letter b) of the Labor Code".

This request is necessary in order for the court to verify whether the employee's deed does or does not constitute disciplinary deviation.

The decision of sanction will also include the reasons for which the defenses formulated by the employee during the prior disciplinary inquiry were removed or the reasons for which the inquiry was not made.

Stating these reasons constitutes a guarantee of the fundamental right to defense which the employee has.

But if the employee refuses to formulate a defense this must be mentioned in the act drawn by the committee as well as in the sanctioning decision.

Also, in the situation in which the employee confesses the deed charged with, the employer is no longer forced to mention why the employee's defense was removed, because they never existed.[22]

The Labor Code provides also that the rightful grounds on which the sanction is enforced, the term in which it can be contested and the court in which the contestation can be made.

In order to clarify these dispositions, the Labor Code provides in paragraph 5 of the in question article, the duration in which the employee can address the competent courts in order to contest the sanctioning decision, more exactly 30 monthly days from the starting date.

As it is noticed, the legislator did not specify a certain court but used the term of "competent court", resorting to the rules of civil procedure, common rules, in order to establish this court.

As regards to the duration in which the sanctioning decision can be contested, the moment from which it starts to develop is the date on which the employee is notified.

In this regard, the Labor Code establishes in Art252, paragraph 3 that the sanctioning decision will be communicated to the employee in at most 5 monthly days, from when it was emitted.

The date from which the sanctioning decision comes into effect is not the date in which it was emitted, but, according to the same dispositions of the Labor Code, the date when it was communicated.

From these dispositions we deduce that not communicating the decision draws the lack of its effects, the communication date being also the date in which the employer can proceed towards the implementation of the sanction and also the date when the 30 days term in which the employee can contest the sanctioning decision begins.

If the decision is not communicated within 6 months from the starting date, the employer looses the right to enforce the sanction, the decision becoming void.

The communication will be handed personally to the employee, with a receiving signature, or, in case of a refusal, a recommended letter, at the domicile or residence communicated by the employee (article 252, paragraph 4 of the Labor Code).

If new elements emerge, in favor of the employee, before a competent jurisdictional authority can give a ruling, the employer can revoke the sanctioning decision, the retraction producing retroactive effects, from the date at which it was issued.

In practice was raised the exception of unconstitutionality of the text of the analyzed article in this subsection. The Constitutional Court[23] stating that "this text is placed among those which have as a purpose to ensure stability in work relations, their ongoing in legal conditions and respecting the rights and duties of both parties of the juridical work report. At the same time, they are meant to insure the defense of legitimate rights and interests of the employee, taking into consideration the objective dominant condition of the employer in the ongoing work reports.

Enforcing disciplinary sanctions and, especially, the termination of the work report from the single desire of the employer are permitted if there are respected certain basic conditions and strictly regulated in the work legislation, with the purpose of preventing eventual abusive conducts from the employer's part.

The mentions and statements which strictly have to include the decision to enforce disciplinary sanctions have the role, first of all to correctly and completely inform the employee regarding the rightful facts, reasons and grounds for which he is being sanctioned, including the means of attack and the terms under which he has the right to state the validity and legality of the measures disposed at the single desire of the employer.

The employer, because he has all the data, evidences and information on which the respective measure is founded, has to make proof of the validity and legality of that measure, the employee being only able to fight them through other pertinent proofs. As such, the mentions and precisions provided by the law are necessary and for the courts, in regards to the legal and grounded settlement of any upcoming litigation determined by the employer's actions."

Conclusions

Making a disciplinary research is an imperative condition as regards to the disciplinary responsibility of the employee; without this stage disciplinary actions cannot be enforced.

The dispositions from the Labor Code regarding disciplinary inquiry are justified by the employee's protection against the discretionary power of the employers, especially because the most severe disciplinary sanction is of terminating the individual work contract. Because prior inquiry is not done, the sanction cannot be individualized and its arrangement is discretionary, without legal grounds.

The procedure of disciplinary inquiry includes more mandatory stages: notifying the employer, be it from the office by the person who has knowledge of a deviation; the writing convocation of the employee; drafting the report by the commission to include the conclusions of the inquiry and proposal; emitting the decision to sanction, if it is the case, by the employer.

Within the actual research the employee can present itself in front of the commission or not. The absence for objective reasons of the employee summoned legally to the prior inquiry has as a first consequence the employer's prerogative to decide the sanction without a prior inquiry.

Before issuing the sanctioning decision, the employer has to individualize the enforced sanction. In establishing the disciplinary sanction, the employer has to take into consideration the dispositions of Art.250 from the Labor Code, dispositions which foresee that the employer establishes disciplinary sanction in report to the gravity of the disciplinary deviation done by the employee.

According to article 249 of the Labor Code, the employer cannot decide the measure of the disciplinary fines, these being strictly forbidden by the dispositions of paragraph 1 of the mentioned article. Another guarantee of the balance between the work reports is instituted by paragraph 2 of article 249. As such, it is forbidden the enforcement of more sanctions for the same deviation.

The employer will decide the enforcement of disciplinary sanctions through a decision in a written form, in term of 30 monthly days from the date on which he became aware of the deviation, but no more than 6 months from that time, according to article 252, paragraph 1 of the Labor Code.

The 30 days term and the 6 months term are prescription terms, and can be interrupted or suspended.

From the legal dispositions of article 252 we understand that for the legality and validity of the decision to sanction, this has to include all the mentioned elements, a sine qua non condition for the mentioned aspects. The lack of one of these will lead to the absolute nullity of the decision to sanction emitted by the employer.

Disciplinary inquiry is a mandatory and necessary stage in order to stimulate the employee's disciplinary responsibility. The conditions for this are strictly provided in the rules of the Labor Code but also by special laws.

ACCESSORIES OF FISCAL OBLIGATION. LEGAL REGIME

RADA POSTOLACHE[*]

Abstract
The interest – which is an institution typical to private law, has been taken over by the fiscal field and adapted to the specific features of fiscal obligation – being defined by its imperative legal regime, which has at the least the following characteristic elements: unitary character, imposed legal percentage, compulsory demand of interest, automatic application. In order to render responsible fiscal debtors, the lawmaker has reintroduced, as an accessory of fiscal obligation, delayed payment penalties, which have a distinct nature and legal regime, but without the principle non bis in idem being transgressed. Our study aims to establish the legal regime of accessories typical to fiscal obligation, from the perspective of special normative acts, but also of the common law within the field – Civil Code and Government Ordinance No. 13/2011 – by pointing out at the same time both the particular circumstances and procedural ones regulated by the Fiscal Procedure Code, shedding light upon the controversial legal nature of accessories.

Keywords: interest, delayed payment penalty, delayed payment addition, civil interest, legal regime.

1. Introduction

The accessories of fiscal obligation are unitary regulated by the Fiscal Procedure Code[1], Title VIII "Collecting fiscal debts", Chapter III "Interests, delayed payment penalties or delayed payment additions", articles 119-124[1], accompanying any instituted obligation which has the specific features of a tax or contribution. Special law currently operates on the basis of three notions: interest, delayed payment penalties, delayed payment additions; although they seem apparently similar, they are different one from another, being at the same time different also from civil interest. The element which sets them apart is their specific legal regime, the three bearing the influence of fiscal field and constituting the object of the current analysis

The present work will establish the legal regime of the accessories of fiscal obligation, by carrying out not only a comparative analysis of them, but also by taking common law as reference point, underlining at the same time the particular features of the accessories in question.

Since there is no complete analysis of the accessories of fiscal obligation within specialized literature, we consider ourselves entitled to elaborate a thorough study of them, on the basis of the elements which provide legal substance to them.

2. Interest

2.1. Definition

Fiscal interest has a specific meaning, different from that attributed to interest by the Fiscal Code[2], Civil Code[3] and Government Ordinance No. 13/2011 – regarding legal remunerative and penalty interest for financial obligations, but also the regulation of some financial-fiscal measures within bank field[4].

[4] „Romanian Official Gazette, Part I, no. 607 from August 29th 2011.

The Civil Code regulates interest in the context of "payment conditions", at article 1489 called "Interests for amounts of money", which constitutes the maximum general ground of interest; the article in question deals with the legal remunerative interest or the interest-price for a borrowed amount of money.

The Government Ordinance No. 13/2011, article 1 paragraph (5) – the common law in the field of legal interest[5] - attributes a broader meaning to interest, namely: "the amounts calculated in money, with interest title, but also other performances, with any title or name, to which a debtor commits himself, as an equivalent of the capital he uses". According to the normative act mentioned above, interest has two components: a) remunerative interest – "the interest which is due by the debtor having the obligation to give back an amount of money at a certain term and which is calculated for the period which precedes the maturity of that obligation" [article 1 paragraph (2)] – this is in fact the definition attributed to remunerative interest by the Civil Code as well, at article 1489 b) penalty interest – "penalty which is due by the debtor of a payment obligation, for the failure to fulfill that payment obligation at the maturity" [article 1 paragraph (3)]; the meaning attributed to penalty interest is according to provisions of article 1535 of the Civil Code, which regulates "moratory damages in case of payment duties"[6].

The Fiscal Code, at article 7 paragraph (1) point 13, attributes the following definition to interest: "Any amount of money which must be paid or received for the use of an amount of money, irrespective of the fact that it must be paid or received in the context of a debt or a deposit, or in accordance with a financial leasing contract, sale with payment in installments or any sale with payment in installments"; moreover, interest is here conceived as profit or income ("gains out of interests"), in order for the interest tax to be applied.

While the Civil Code regulates interest and damages (moratory damages, compensatory damages), the Fiscal Procedure Code institutes, by providing them with a specific meaning, the following: fiscal debt, delayed payment penalties and delayed payment additions, also called generically:

a) accessory fiscal debt title – signifies the "right to levy interests, delayed payment penalties or delayed payment additions, according to the case and legal conditions [article 21 paragraph (2) letter b) of the Fiscal Procedure Code] – from the perspective of the fiscal creditor;

b) accessory payment obligation – signifies the "obligation to pay interests, delayed payment penalties or delayed payment additions, as the case may be, corresponding to taxes, contributions and other amounts of money due to the general consolidated budget [article 22 letter d) of the Fiscal Procedure Code] – from the perspective of fiscal debtor.

According to the Fiscal Procedure Code, article 119 paragraph (1), interest, just like delayed payment penalty, is due as a result of the fact that "the debtor does not comply with his payment obligations within the maturity term"

Regulated in the context of taxes administration[7], fiscal interest has an application scope limited to the delayed payment of a fiscal obligation – expressed, by definition, in money, and which, according to article 22 of the Fiscal Procedure Code, is represented by taxes, contributions, and so on. In the field of interest is also included the interest for the amounts of money which must be reimbursed or paid back from the budget to a taxpayer, according to article 124 of the Fiscal Procedure Code; this kind of interest is nonetheless particularized at least by the elements

[5] In relation to the features of legal interest within civil law, see Silvia Lucia Cristea, "Cumulul dobânzilor cu penalitățile de întârziere", in "Revista de drept comercial" Magazine (6/2004): 87.

[6] According to which: "If an amount of money is not paid ad the due date, the creditor is entitled to receive moratory damages, from the due date until the payment date".

[7] Defined as all the activities carried out by fiscal authorities in relation to: a) fiscal registration; b) declaration, establishment, verification and cashing of taxes, contributions and other amounts of money due to the general consolidated budget; c) settlement of the appeal against fiscal administrative acts [article 1 paragraph (3) of the Fiscal Procedure Code]

(hypotheses[8]) which generate it and by the procedural elements, becoming comparable with the restitution of the amounts of money not due within common law.

Fiscal interest and delayed payment penalties are levied for the fiscal debts which must be paid to the general consolidated budget, except for those debts which are due to the budget of administrative-territorial units and which trigger delayed payment additions.

2.2. Characteristics

The Fiscal Procedure Code institutes a "legal" interest, which is nonetheless different from the legal interest regulated by the Government Ordinance No. 13/2011, and which is characterized, in essence, by the following elements:

a) is mandatory, so that the fiscal creditor cannot give up on it; is quantified through the decision of a fiscal authority, with the exception of article 142 paragraph (6), which provides that the quantification is performed by the enforcement authority, the interest in question constituting an income of the budget to which the main fiscal debt belongs.

b) starts to operate from the day following the maturity term of the fiscal obligation.

Yet, special law also contains some exceptions from the rule mentioned above, regarding: differences of fiscal debt titles (additional or negative, as the case may be), resulting from the amendment of statements or the modification of a taxation decision; taxes and contributions extinguished by foreclosure; taxes, contributions and other amounts of money due to the general consolidated budget by the debtor declared insolvent or who does not have incomes or assets which ca be pursued; the calculation method of the interest corresponding to the corporate tax, resulting after the annual regularization; the calculation method of the interest corresponding to the income tax, resulting after the annual regularization[9];

Fiscal interest is automatically applied, not being necessary for the fiscal debtor to be put on default. Just as it happens in common law, the creditor is not interested in the reasons for the non payment, the simple fact that the maturity term of the main obligation is overcome leading to the automatic application of interest; for that matter, lawmaker establishes an absolute guilt presumption, which cannot be challenged.[10]

c) does not have a ceiling, so that it is calculated and due after the maturity term is reached[11], until the day the fiscal obligation is extinguished (included), for each day of delay;

d) has an unitary level, the same for all fiscal obligations, which is currently of 0,04% for each day of delay; this level is established by law and can be modified only through the annual budgetary laws, law giving up at the regulation of some criteria[12] for modifying interest.

[8] According to article 117 paragraph (1) of the Fiscal Procedure Code ("Restitution of money"): "There are restituted to the debtor, on demand, the following amounts of money: a) those paid without a debt title; b) those paid in addition to the fiscal obligation; c) those paid as a result of a calculation error; d) those paid as a result of the erroneous enforcement of legal provisions; e) those reimbursed from the state budget; f) those established by means of decisions of judicial authorities or of other competent authorities, according to law; g) those remaining after the performance of the distribution provided for by article 170 of the Fiscal Procedure Code; h) those resulting from the valorization of the seized assets or from seizures by garnishment, as the case may be, on the basis of the judicial decision ordering the abolishment of foreclosure

[10] See for that matter Daniela Moțiu, "Creanțele bugetare în procedura insolvenței" (I), in "Revista de drept comercial" (12/2007): 63-4.

[11] The absence of financial resources for insuring the financing of debtor's activity cannot constitute a reason for removing the fiscal obligation – tax on salaries and accessories of the amounts of money due with such title; for that matter, see the Supreme Court of Justice, Department Contentious-Administrative, December, Decision No. 1093 from March 18th 2003.

[12] Previously, the value of fiscal interest was being established by taking into account the reference interest instituted by the National Bank of Romania, similar to how legal interest is established within common law.

Practically, we are talking about a legal valuation, so that interest cannot be established by the parties of the fiscal legal relation[13];

e) is generalized, being due for any fiscal duty, including for custom duties, not paid at the due time, including for the particular circumstances regulated by articles 120-124 of the Fiscal Procedure Code.

There must not be paid interests or delayed payment penalties for the following: amounts of money due as fines of any type; fiscal obligations – accessories, established according to law; foreclosure expenses; judicial expenses; confiscated amounts of money, but also amounts of money representing the equivalent in lei of confiscated assets and amounts of money [article 119 paragraph (2) of the Fiscal Procedure Code]. The modified legal text mentioned above does nothing but confirming the specificity of fiscal interest, by delimiting its scope to the main fiscal obligation, special law observing the rule non bis in idem;

f) it can be subject to the facilities provided for by law, which can be usually granted by the authority administering taxes and contributions, according to special norms; facilities have a regime which is imposed as well, must be justified, not leaving place for the so-called "negotiation".

g) is due also for the period for which were granted postponements or payment schedule files, in relation to the payment of the remaining fiscal obligations

2.3. Legal nature

Interest does not constitute an absolute novelty brought by the Government Ordinance No. 39/2010[14] on the modification of the Fiscal Procedure Code. It also existed under this name in a previous period, being preceded and succeeded by the institution of delayed payment additions – which actually replaces, completely preserving their legal essence – the only different element being the name.

Throughout time, the legal nature of interest was differently understood by specialized literature, as it follows: pecuniary administrative sanction[15], sanction typical to public law[16], given that it is the result of a constitutional duty being transgressed[17]; "patrimonial accountability form, typical to fiscal law"[18]; specific sanction [19] generated by administrative-financial transgressions within financial law; institution with a mixed nature – sanction for a delayed payment, but also partial damage of the state for levying with delay its rights[20].

We include interest and other accessories of fiscal obligations in the field of legal financial accountability[21], which is accomplished by a variety of sanctions, such as: fine, blocking of a [13] According to common law, parties "can stipulate that the debtor commits himself to a certain performance in case the main obligation is not complied with", through a penal clause concluded for that purpose, according to article 1538 paragraph (1) of the Civil Code. Moreover, according to article 1541 paragraph (1) letter b) of the Civil Code, the court can reduce the penalty when it "is obviously excessive in comparison with the prejudice which could be foreseen by parties at the conclusion of the contract, in relation to the non fulfillment of the contractual obligation". budgetary credit, suspension from function of the persons who are responsible for committing deeds generating important damages or serious transgressions with a financial character, suspension of debtor's activity, seizures, interest, delayed payment additions, delayed payment penalties and so on, which have a legal regime provided for by the special norms which institute them.

By being included in the field of financial legal accountability, fiscal interest is clearly separated from remunerative interest, while the phrase "the non-payment at the due term generates interests" points the nature of reparatory interest of fiscal interest, having a special legal regime, governed by the provisions of the Fiscal Procedure Code. Understood like this, but preserving nonetheless its specific nature, fiscal interest can be compared with the interest for damages – moratory interest or penalty interest within common law, which is also due after the maturity date of the main obligations is reached. Following this reasoning, we consider fiscal interest as being a specific fiscal institution, reintroduced by the special law, with view to recover the prejudice caused to the general consolidated budget, by not paying in time the amounts of money due as taxes and contributions; it is easy to include fiscal obligation in the definition of legal accountability – "obligation to deal with the consequences emerging from the non observance of some behavioral rules" – here fiscal.

To conclude, as a result of interest being particularly taken over from the field of private law to the field of public law"[22], fiscal interest has a specific identity and legal regime, not being classified by the Fiscal Procedure Code in any way.

3. Delayed payment penalties

3.1. Legal nature

Together with interest, the lawmaker has reinstituted also the obligation to pay delayed penalty interests, at article 120^1 of the Fiscal Procedure Code, by attributing a distinct legal regime to them. Delayed payment penalty sanctions the delayed payment of fiscal obligations, being accordingly regulated – "for each month and/or division of a delayed payment month" ("the delayed payment is sanctioned with a penalty").

Delayed payment penalties have the quality of a typical fiscal sanction and they can be cumulated with fiscal interest ("delayed payment penalties do not remove the obligation to pay interests"), but we cannot talk about two sanctions for the same fiscal transgression, law observing the principle non bis in idem. The regulation of delayed payment penalties upholds rather the idea of completely awarding damages to the fiscal creditor, similarly to what happens in common law[23], but delayed payment penalties are not similar to institutions regulated by Civil Code (damnum emergens and lucrum cessans, author's note).

Delayed payment penalties are at the same time a legal institution which is different from the legal or conventional penalties within common law, regulated by the provisions of article 1535 and the following of the Civil Code, any analogy for that matter being absurd.

[22] Silvia Lucia Cristea, "Cumulul dobânzilor cu penalitățile de întârziere*"*, in "Revista de drept comercial" (6/2004): 95.

[23] According to article 1531 of the Civil Code, "the creditor is entitled to receive complete amends for the prejudice which he suffered as a result of the non fulfillment of the legal obligation. The prejudice includes the loss effectively suffered by the creditor and the benefit of which he is deprived (…)". According to jurisprudence, the principle of complete amends for the prejudice caused by not paying an amount of money at the due term, allows, besides the interest which is due, also the updating of the amount of money which is due, by applying the inflation index. Interest is considered damages – moratory interests, while the amount of money resulting from application of inflation index represents damages – compensatory interests. For that matter, see the Supreme Court of Justice, Commercial Department, Decision No. 4579/2002", comment, Vasile Pătulea, in „Dreptul" Magazine (2/2005): 202 – 206.

In brief, interests and delayed payment penalties have a reparatory-sanctioning character, accompanying the payment over the due term of the main fiscal obligation by the fiscal debtor and being integrated to the institution represented by fiscal legal accountability.

3.2. Percentage

Delayed payment penalties regulated by the Fiscal Procedure Code are added to the amounts of money representing interests and have a percentage which is legally determined, according to the delay period (art.120^1 of the Fiscal Procedure Code):

a) if extinguishment is performed within the first 30 days from the maturity date, there are not due and calculated any delayed payment penalties for the main fiscal obligations extinguished; practically, law institutes here a grace term, with the view to motivate debtor to pay his fiscal duty;

b) if extinguishment is performed in the following 60 days, the value of delayed payment penalty is of 5% from the main fiscal obligations extinguished;

c) after the term provided for by letter b) above is reached, the level of delayed payment penalty is of 15% from the main fiscal obligations which were not extinguished.

From a procedural point of view, penalties follow the rules instituted for fiscal interest.

The situations in which delayed payment penalties are due and the particular cases are identical to those instituted for fiscal interest.

4. Special situations regarding fiscal interest and delayed payment penalties

Special law, at articles 120-124, regulates some particular situations regarding the application of interest and delayed payment penalties, thus:

a) Interests and delayed payment penalties for payments performed through bank channel

According to article 121 of the Fiscal Procedure Code, "If banking units do not transfer the amounts of money to which the general consolidated budget is entitled, within 3 working days from the date the taxpayer's account is billed, this does not exempt the taxpayer from the duty to pay the amounts of money in question and causes him interests and delayed payment penalties at the value of those provided for by articles 120 and 120^1, after the term of 3 days" [paragraph (1)]. "In order to recover the amounts of money due to the budget and not transferred by banking units, but also the interests and delayed payment interests provided for by article (1), the taxpayer can file an action against the banking unit involved [paragraph (2)]. The text mentioned above does nothing but reinforcing the principle "accessorium sequitur principalem", but also preserving the quality of fiscal debtor, not only for the amount of money withheld and not transferred by the credit institution, but also for the accessories of that amount of money, the recovery of which can constitute the object of a legal action, according to common law.

b) Interests and delayed payment penalties in case of compensation

According to article 122 of the Fiscal Procedure Code and in the spirit of common law, in what concerns fiscal debts extinguished by compensation, interests, delayed payment interests or delayed payment additions, according to the case, are calculated by the date the mutual debts of creditor and debtor exist all together, being certain, liquid and demandable.

c) Interests and delayed payment penalties due in case the insolvency procedure is opened

Interests and delayed payment penalties due for fiscal debts which emerged before or after the date when taxpayers' insolvency procedure was opened have the legal regime provided for by the law regulating the insolvency procedure (article 122^1 of the Fiscal Procedure Code).

d) Interests and delayed payment penalties relating to taxpayers for which a dissolution decision was passed

As a result of taxpayer's dissolution, ceases the obligation to pay interest and delayed payment interests (which emerged before or after the registration of taxpayer's dissolution decision at the Register office), from the date the decision on taxpayer's dissolution was registered at the Register office. The text above points out an application of the dissolution effects – taxpayer no longer exists as legal subject and, implicitly, his rights and obligations also cease.

The abolishment of the act which was at the basis of the dissolution registration has the following effect: interest and delayed payment penalty are calculated between the date dissolution acts were registered at the Register office and the date it becomes irrevocable the dissolution decision (article 122^2 of the Fiscal Procedure Code).

e) Interests for payment facilities

Special law includes in the field of facilities: postponements, payment schedule files, exemptions, payment discounts, for the remaining fiscal obligation. According to article 123 of the Fiscal Procedure Code, for the period these facilities were granted are due (only – author's note) interests[24], excepting the accessories mentioned ad article 119 (paragraph 2) of the Fiscal Procedure Code[25].

5. Delayed payment additions

Delayed payment additions, analyzed here, were introduced in the special law, article 124^1, through the Government Ordinance No. 39/2010, mentioned above, having an applicability scope which is limited to fiscal debts titles of local budgets, law instituting nonetheless their exclusivity.

Delayed payment additions have a legal regime which is different from that of fiscal interest and of delayed payment penalties; they constitute an accessory which is also different from delayed payment additions replaced by fiscal interest.

In relation to them, law has instituted an unique quota, of 2%, from the value of the main fiscal obligations not paid at due time, calculated for each delay month or division of a delay month, starting from the day which follows the maturity term and until the amount of money is extinguished.

At this point, law leaves no grace period, sanctioning the non payment starting from the day which follows the maturity term of the main obligation, as it happens with interest, but takes as reference unit "the delay month" or "the division of the delay month", according to the case.

Even if from a procedural point of view is subject to the common provisions of article 119-124 of the Fiscal Procedure Code, instituted for interest and delayed payment interests, the delayed payment addition regulated by article 124^1 the Fiscal Procedure Code has a hybrid nature, borrowing elements from both fiscal interest and delayed payment penalty, law pointing out that it has both a reparatory and sanctioning function at the same time.

The existence of delayed payment additions does nothing but complicating the list of accessories of fiscal obligations, creating a non unitary legal regime for them.

6. Conclusions

Fiscal interest – civil interest. We exclude any similarity of fiscal interest with remunerative interest - regulated by Common Law, at article 1489 of the Civil Code, article 1 paragraph (2) of the Government Ordinance No. 13/201. Fiscal interest can be at most associated, according to its function, with penalty interest, which is legal, but without substituting it. Fiscal interest remains an institution typical to public law, bearing the latter's influence.

Fiscal interest – delayed payment penalty. They constitute accessories of fiscal obligation, are automatically applied, are generated by taxpayer's non adequate behavior and replenish the amounts of money due to public budget. Still, the different legal nature of the two separates them sometimes, [24] See, for the application of article 123 of the Fiscal Procedure Code, Methodological norms for the application of the Fiscal Procedure Code, points 118.1.- 118.6.

[25] According to which: "No interests and delayed payment penalties are due for the amounts of money which must be paid back as any type of fines, fiscal obligations – accessories established according to law, foreclosure expenses, judicial expenses, confiscated amounts of money, but also amounts of money representing the equivalent in lei of the confiscated goods and assets".

as their "tandem" is not generalized for all the situations provided for by special law. Fiscal interest has essentially a reparatory character, while delayed payment penalty has an accentuated sanctioning one, but both of them are integrated to financial legal accountability.

Fiscal interest – interest for the amounts of money restitution. Their names and common percentage, currently of 0,04% for each delay day, cannot lead to their overlapping. The interest for the amounts of money restitution is not mandatory, is not automatically applied and is granted only on the demand of the taxpayer-creditor. The hypothesis which generate such interest, but also the procedural aspects, make it differ essentially from the fiscal interest – due for the non payment of taxes and contributions, reconfirming the inequality of the subjects within the fiscal restitution relation. Moreover, as it is conceived, the interest for the amounts of money restitution has rather the legal regime of a restitution of the amounts of money which are not due within common law.

The existence, by lege lata, of the three types of accessories, creates a non-unitary regime of fiscal obligations: some may trigger interests, delayed payment penalties, while other only delayed payment additions, according to the public budget entitled to the debt title which generates such accessories. Moreover, the existence of delayed payment penalty and the fact that the latter is cumulated with interest, lead to an elevated value[26] of the accessories due, much greater than legal interest.

By lege ferenda, we plead for the unification of the three institutions analyzed in a common concept, which should be ideally called "delayed payment addition" and not be differentiated on budget categories, by observing, naturally, some particular situations, generated by the specificity of main obligation. Moreover, by lege ferenda, in order to render responsible the fiscal authority, we consider that is necessary to institute a legal unitary regime for fiscal interest and for the interest corresponding to the amounts of money which must be restituted by the public budget, if such amounts are certain and demandable.

It is interesting to be seen through the prism of analysis of economic-fiscal financiare if a competition is beneficial or not for the welfare of States and to what extent this competition will have a say in future developments and tax paradisurilor finanaciare offshore centres.

In conclusion, I appreciate that in order to survive successfully in the global economy of the future, offshore Jurisdictions should promote a healthy tax, competing on the basis of a transparent legislation and to eliminate the possibility of the existence of financial crime, in line with the requirements concerning cooperation in the field of international economic relations.

Introduction

To the context of the globalization of the world economy, the glue created between international tax system and refining strategies financial has created a climate for the optimum development of the offshore jurisdictions, which, due to lax law enforcement and fiscal regime very indulgent, bring a number of advantages of the location.

Purpose of the research is the analysis of offshore jurisdictions in order to determine the possibilities of use of their disadvantages in order to improve measures to combat tax evasion, as well as for the use of their advantages in order to reduce illegal migration and regular employment of capital through the analysis of specific cases of the use of offshore jurisdictions – Case Frabklin Jurado, The International Bank of Commerce and Credit International, American Express Bank, If The Company Enron.

The activities carried out within the framework of the offshore jurisdictions, leading to increased tax avoidance by default, with a particular emphasis on legal, lawful migration and illicit capital, causing financial instability, and by circumvention of financial control, financial crises.

Academic level, offshore jurisdictions utilization in the context of international financial mechanisms has not been tackled as a study in its own right, but was treated by specialists within the framework of any work that is based on a thorough presentation of the paradisurilor tax and\/or financial offshore centres, such as: George Cristian Buzan, Bisa, Adrian Manaila, Claude Dauphin, Stephen c. r. Munday, etc.

At the same time, some specific cases of the use of offshore jurisdictions and have been treated in a few specialty items, including: Center for Responsive Politics, \"Enron: Other Money in Politics, Les Echos\" Stats, \"Enron: la commission d ' enquete denonceune enrichir les dirigeants machine, the US Senate Report\" Report Kerry Brown \", etc.

Methodology of scientific research is based on the use of methods of analysis and synthesis, as well as to investigate evolutionary events and phenomena. The application of these methods to perform a thorough analysis of the issue under study.

The current method of avoiding tax in a jurisdiction offshore to provide incredible advantages to businesses for the development of a profitable business.

Jurisdictions that are part of the offshore system are characterized by a wide typology of possible entities registered in these locations[1].

Banking secrecy is a tradition for the development and operation of an offshore territory.

In the absence of cooperation regarding the exchange of tax information with foreign countries in general, and to those whose citizens are unlikely to have bank accounts in their country of residence for tax purposes, for the purposes of tax evasion, in particular offshore jurisdictions that reproached them tax law and not merely permissive, is not on the same level with the international regulatory systemthe system by which you can avoid tax evasion technique or that of money laundering.

Fiscal competition among transnational companies, the pace of technical progress and increase the risk of monetary fluctiatiile and the uncertainty of a tax haven[2].

Be it by sovereign countries (Switzerland, Lichtenstein, Luxembourg, Ireland, Monaco, Andorra, San Mariono, etc.) territories, either more or less autonomous (Jersey, Cayman Islands, British Virgin Islands, the Bahamas, Bermuda, Barbados, Belize, Panama, etc.), the opacity of the financial-banking sector allows simultaneous mislead, IRS and justice national in the case of non-residents, who consider tax evasion a crimesevere, punishable by the law of their countries (from large fines to jail).

Weak or non-existent tax, political and economic stability, prompting companies and banking and competitive enterprises, respectively, to be installed in offshore territories. The liberalization of the exchange of foreign currency in cash, as otherwise the banking and commercial secrecy are other major advantages that attract considerable fortunes in the territories. A highly developed financial sector in comparison to the size of a country, i.e., the weight function to economic infrastructure, communications and transport, are a guarantee for investments.

Money wasted by the different operators by mechanisms of tax evasion (money laundering), hitting directly in social projects that he rigged countries can develop at the level at which would impose the needs of society, given that most of them are financed from fees and taxes.

In general, states shall cooperate in the field of money laundering, and many of them have adopted stringent standards in this area, but the bank secrecy neridicarea in the guise of \"Confidentiality\", making extremely difficult communication between various foreign jurisdictions and territories, bearing in mind that tax law is very different in the face of the rigged States tax haven[3].

The frequency and diversity of transactions used for the purpose of money laundering has become increasingly conplexa, involving certain banking financial institutions as well as non-financial[4].

A classic case for the use of offshore jurisdictions which may not pass necitat is the famous case of Enron[5] who did a great vâlvă in 2001-2002.

Company Enron was founded in 1986 in Houston, Texas, USA, by the merger of the two companies producing natural gas.

The company took advantage of the removal of the Government under the control of the natural gas sector, which took place in the 1980s and started games scenes. The transformation from a producer of natural gas, in an intermediary in energy Affairs did that in a period of just 15 years, the company is located on the 7th place in the rankings of the largest 500 companies in the world[6] with a share of 25% of the world market in electricity and natural gas.

On 3 December 2001, the value of Enron stock at about collapses. 80 billion dollars to 220 million and the company has suddenly declared bankruptcy, though one year before announcing profits of 100 billion dollars. The specialists of the company made misleading public statements, some based on some unreal figures, all of these tactics in order to enforce high taxes to consumers through bold cost operations of getting electricty. At the same time, to maintain a course of actions the company announce huge profits and quarterly internal audits failed to reveal the fraud made by the company. External audits being done by Arthur Anderson that the methods used to try to protect the image of the company Enron[7].

Profits were obtained as a result of partnerships with other companies, the Commission of securities and stock exchange triggered a thorough investigation, and the end of 2001 Enron has reassessed the proceeds last 4 years announcing a reduction of more than 500 mln. $ than earlier.

The results of the surveys carried out have revealed and made by management of the company Enron, 140 managers were involved in fraud with skyrocketing wages cumulatively reaching $ 680 million, and two of them received sentences of 160 years in prison.

As a result of this scandal have been promulgated new laws in the u.s. that attempted a legislative correction of failure, increased control exercised by Government over the Securities and financial reporting.

The main conclusion of this extreme situations in which the company is that full and accurate reporting of financial statements is crucial[8].

One of the most interesting sentences from the USA which is based on the use of fiscal incentives, the paradisurilor was that of Franklin, a Colombian economist Jurado, a graduate of the Hravardului, which not only washing money for Jose Santacruz Londono, the exponent of the Cali Cartel brand, but has developed a very well thought-out scheme for money-laundering. Jurado was arrested in 1990 in Luxembourg, where enforcers confiscated several diskettes with data about 115 bank accounts from 16 locations (from Luxembourg in Budapest) and details of a vast money-laundering scheme[9].

Within the framework of the operation carried out by the famous economist is diferențiau five phases of the scheme that were created in order to legalize the amounts obtained from drug trafficking and to prevent confiscation. The Jury's strategy, phases of money laundering were carefully created, because the goods to pass from a high level of risk to the one below.

The first phase was originally a warehouse, because money was still very close to their origin and so very \"hot\", it shall be carried out in Panama.

The second step consists in transferring money from Panama in Europe. Jurado coordinate transfer of panamaneze u.s. dollars in American banks in more than 100 accounts of 69 by banks in nine countries: Austria, Denmark, United Kingdom, France, Germany, Hungary, Italy, Luxembourg and Monaco, with deposits between 50,000 and 1 million dollars. This step was followed by the transfer of sums of money in the accounts opened in the name of European citizens – to hide the account holder's nationality, European open under the name such as: Peter Hoffman and Hannika Schimdt, to increased surveillance of allocated accounts opened on behalf of Hispanic or Colombians.

The last stage represent the return of funds in Colombia – through investments by companies in the Legal Affairs of facade of Santacruz, such as: restaurants, construction companies, pharmaceutical companies and real estate.

According to a later report, the Jury had washed around 30 million francs through the accounts opened by the major banks in France. He noted that France deserved attention to and identified the French financial institutions that were accessible to money laundering. The highest score earned him, then Austria Hungary (because it wanted the Western capital) and the Channel Islands (which were a tax haven)[10].

An extremely important role in the economy of a tax haven is banking. In general, tax havens, develop a policy to encourage foreign banking activities, distinguishing legal regime for residents and non-residents[11].

In July 1991, over 12 billion dollars, representing assets of BCCI – were confiscated after investigators discovered evidence of widespread fraud. The Bank's collapse was not a surprise, but he was already provided. Checks were made on driving a few years in the United States and United Kingdom, but the actions taken by the Bank and the collapse of Bank inspectors have caused great shock waves throughout the financial system.

As the results of the investigation were made public, the most shocking was the bankruptcy itself, but the fact that the Bank was allowed as long as the operation without any intervention on the part of Governments and supervisors. The Bank did not discriminate in regards to its clients, providing services to drug traffickers, dictators, terrorists, frauduloşi merchants, arms traffickers and many others. Furthermore, the BCCI has not only worked on a system based on privacy and deception, but it deliberately sold to customers as essential part of banking services[12].

Agha Hasan Abedi founded the Bank for developing countries, at the time of the collapse of the BCCI was known in some circles as the Bank scams and international criminals – Bank of Crooks and Criminals International \".

Corporate structure by splitting, bookkeeping, regulatory controls, auditing, accounting by the intricacies of the internal structures of the BCCI group, he was able to get around frequently and rutinier legal restrictions on the movement of capital and goods.

BCCI was unable to commit or to facilitate a series of crimes, through means including numreoase companies use cover \"shell companies\" (for these companies is to act as a way to launder money or to hide from tax inspectors), exploitation of offshore financial centres and banking paradisurilor and its diverse corporate structure.

Surveillance system was weak at that time and this weakness was fully exploited by the Bank, which had divided operations between two auditors, none of whom have access to the picture of its activities, the position of which would have been able to give a true sense of involvement in the Bank and money washings in other forms of fraud and corruption. In addition, the BCCI has used the Cayman Islands and the Netherlands Antilles to create a maze of facade companies to form a curtain to cover the depositors and their activities. Although authorities such as the Bank of England have learned about criminal activity of BCCI, for two years have not made arrangements for closing them.

Most of the money transfers were made by BCCI Overseas, in Grand Cayman. When the new-yorkeze have prompted Bank BCCI to present data in Cayman, they were struck by a stone wall, on the ground of bank secrecy.

Finally, the US authorities have made significant progress in strengthening cooperation with the British Serious Frauds Office. Judge of Grand Cayman, a lawyer in the Midlands-England, appointed by the British Government, made an official visit \"collegiate\", these new Police Department but receiving only part of the information requested.

The company American Express (AMEX, Amexco) was founded in 1850 in New York as a delivery and courier company. Immediately after launch, the company has become the most successful express delivery company in the United States.

American Express has launched in the financial sector in the year 1882 in 1958, due to advances in technology, the company has managed to produce their first \"charge card\" (the predecessor of credit cards). The business has been run very well for this purpose, and now American Express operates in over 130 countries. Even if AMEX mainly focuses on financial transactions, the company is also known for other services, making it one of the largest travel agencies in the world. Moreover, the company is listed on the stock exchange in New York.

In 1974, it launched the blue box logo which has managed to impose over time and today one of the most famous and powerful 10 brands worldwide. In 2000, AMEX, Western Union and a subsidiary of First Data Corp. signed an agreement to send money from an agent of Western Union became possible and ATM with get[13].

To receive money, customers do not need a card. They only need to enter their identification number and the system will confirm the transaction. Datorităcombinației unique identification codes for each transaction, the process is extremmely assured.

First off the service is available only on the US market through a network of 6,000 ATMs of AMEX. After 150 years of existence, the AMEX is today a company with over 72.000 deangajati who achieved a net profit of USD 2.8 billion at 31\/12\/2004. At the end of last year there were almost 52 million cards in circulation carerealizau a volume of 300 billion dollars of transactions throughout the world.

Currently, ALL MAJOR payment cards are charged in 45 national currencies and accepted in approximately cincimilioane of locations in over 200 countries and territories[14].

The scientific study of the practicability of the face could contribute to developing and improving measures on combating tax evasion, as well as for the use of their advantages in order to reduce illegal migration and regular capital concepts of tax haven and tax evasion under the internationalization of national economies; the improvement of the methods of combating tax avoidance and reduction or suspension of the escape of lawful and illicit capital; as well as national practices in the application of certain tax advantages arising from the use of offshore jurisdictions.

Internationally it argues that offshore jurisdictions is not a way to tax fraud, but there are still professionals who argue that tax havens are ideal for those who obtain income goals[15].

Through these financial mechanisms and the transfer pricing practice, companies can afford the option of applying the taxation in a given country.

In this way the residents tax (natural persons or legal persons) in a State with high taxes can set up companies in the areas of taxation and benefit their business profits may accumulate in these areas. The owner of these companies may be subject to the laws of restriction of such types of operations (which can affect the effectiveness of these strategies), but a smart texturing shall compass coercive efforts may of these legal provisions. If the company making the distribution of profits, they will be charged at your destination and keeping the profits in the company, taxes are sometimes delayed or even avoided.

Conclusions

The volume of money laundering, and tax evasion techniques achieved through offshore jurisdictions are very hard to quantify, it is therefore necessary that the Member States should act to a reform of the international financial institutions and bodies to improve transperentei of financial flows and avoidance of international financial imbalances.

As a consequence, States with high\/normal taxation came into conflict with offshore financial centres, each side trying to protect their interests, respecting both the rules of international law. Onshore jurisdictions offshore financial centers accused of unfair tax competition and legal rules practice favours operations dirty money-laundering.

We believe that in future, offshore jurisdictions should promote a healthy competing tax, based on the transparency legislation to eliminate the possibility of financial crime as well as the creation of global financial imbalances.

CONFIGURING THE ROLE OF THE UNITED NATIONS SECRETARY-GENERAL IN THE PEACEFUL SETTLEMENT OF INTERNATIONAL DISPUTES. RELATIONS WITH THE SECURITY COUNCIL AND THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY

OANA-ADRIANA IACOB*

Abstract

In an international context embracing the idealist concepts of harmony, cooperation, structural peace, illegality of war, the United Nations Organization has created a system of peaceful settlement of disputes, based on principles of justice and international law. In this framework, the organs bearing the responsibility of peaceful resolution of conflicts are the International Court of Justice, the Security Council, the General Assembly and the Secretary-General. The latter has a unique position, triggering a spectacular evolution of its role in the maintenance of international peace and security. The challenges of the international environment and the outstanding ways in which they were addressed by the distinctive personalities that filled the function of the Secretary General, creating precedents and influencing its future development, have led to a continuous enlargement of its role. The purpose of the present paper is that of defining the role of the Secretary-General in the system of peaceful settlement of international disputes created by the United Nations, by analysing the relevant provisions consecrated in the Charter and by revealing and explaining the outstanding evolution of this institution, with an emphasis on the relations of mutual influence between the High Official, on one side, the Security Council and the General Assembly, on the other.

Keywords: peaceful settlement of disputes, Secretary-General, Charter of the United Nations, Security Council, General Assembly.

1. Introduction

The United Nations Organization proposes a system of peaceful settlement of international disputes that is complementary to the usual means of peaceful resolution, consecrated by the international law. [1]The peaceful settlement of conflicts in the UN system is based, according to the UN Charter, on principles of justice and international law, the organs responsible in this matter being the International Court of Justice, the Security Council and the General Assembly. In addition, the Secretary General's competencies, as well as its influent position and unique role make this institution suitable to international actions of peaceful resolution.

According to the UN Charter, the Security Council is primarily responsible for the maintenance of international peace and security[2] because, due to its selective composition and permanent functioning, it was considered to be more efficient when it came to dealing with potentially dangerous situations and inter-state antagonisms. A dispute can be referred to the Security Council if it has an international character and might constitute a danger to the international peace and security. In order to settle a dispute, the Security Council may adopt non-mandatory resolutions, containing recommendations, based on Chapter VI of the UN Charter. These recommendations may be general or specific. [3]Although not compulsory, these resolutions are politically significant and thus, in light of the general responsibility of maintaining the international peace and security, provided for by the Charter, Member States feel obliged to take into consideration any recommendation made by the Council and to examine in good faith the possibility of conforming to it.

After the Second World War the general mentality was that the most suitable structure, when it came to settling international disputes, was the Security Council, due to its five prominent permanent members. The General Assembly had rather limited attributions in this matter. Nevertheless the Assembly had been endowed with a general competence that allowed it to discuss and make recommendations on any questions within the scope of the Charter or relating to the powers and functions of any organs provided for in the Charter[4].

Although it may be true that, regularly, issues concerning the maintenance of international peace and security are addressed and decided upon within the deliberative organs, it is the Secretary-General who, in fact, has taken most of the initiatives to settle or prevent conflicts which were threatening the international peace. The Secretary-General of the United Nations has had one of the most spectacular evolutions in the history of UN's structures. Its contribution to the peaceful resolution of international conflicts is significant, covering a wide range of actions undertaken in accordance with the authority and prestige of this function. The original manner in which the different personalities that occupied this function addressed the numerous challenges of the international environment has influenced the evolution of this institution, increasing its political autonomy. With the expansion of its political space of manoeuvre towards fields that were traditionally under the jurisdiction of the deliberative organs, new tensions have arisen between the Secretary-General, on one side, and the Security Council the General Assembly and certain Member States[5], on the other. The different personalities who occupied this position have conducted an intense activity of promoting and developing the role of the Secretary-General, while trying to ensure the cooperation with the deliberative bodies, in order to maintain the institutional balance of the United Nations.

Within the institutional framework configured by the UN Charter, having in view the vague wording of the articles establishing the Secretary-General's attributions, leaving room for wide interpretations of its role, and also taking into consideration the constant international challenges that UN has to cope with, one can say that the High Official exercises a certain influence on the deliberative organs' activities. Defining influence as "the performance of an action by an agent that results in a change in some state of another agent" [6], it can be inferred that the Secretary-General's acts of influence on the political organs' actions are responses to the demands and expectations of the latter, as they are defined in a particular international context. It is important to note that any influence exercised by the Secretary-General on the main organs is also based on their acceptance and need. Using available resources consecrated by the UN Charter (such as the wording of a mandated assignment, the right to make oral and written statements before the principal organs, the regular or the requested reports and "the special right" of initiative before the Security Council provided by art. 99) and taking advantage of the neutral stance specific to its function that is often indispensable for the efficiency of the process of peaceful settlement, the office holders have had the opportunity to leave an imprint on the evolution of their office and of the Organization as a whole as well as on the general world order.

The present paper undertakes the task of defining the Secretary-General's role in the peaceful settlement of disputes by exploring its capacity to influence through means made available by the Charter, taking into consideration the historical evolution of the function and the existing research on the personal leadership styles of the office holders. This study will have in view the relevant literature on the influence of the Secretary-General – for instance, Gordenker's and Rivlin's edited work The Challenging Role of the UN Secretary-General. Making „The Most Impossible Job in the World" containing valuable studies on the Secretary-General's role and evolution, and Michel Virally's insightful analysis of the High Official's political role, Le rôle politique du Secrétaire Général des Nations Unies, published in 1959 in "Annuaire français de droit international" – as well as the existing research on the relationship between the personal qualities of the office holder and its political behaviour, explored by Kent J. Kille in his work From Manager to Visionary. The Secretary-General of the United Nations. The analysis of the function's evolution, from legal and historical perspectives, corroborated with the existing research results on the political behaviour of the Secretary-General will be used to determine the extent to which the distinctive occupants of the function, endowed with different personal features and placed in an ever-changing political context, have identified and used the possibilities to exert influence in the process of peaceful settlement of disputes.

2. The Secretary-General's competencies according to the Charter of the United Nations

The Secretary-General is the head of the Secretariat – UN's administrative and technical service – the chief administrative officer of the Organization, appointed by the General Assembly upon the recommendation of the Security Council, for a 5 – year mandate, with the possibility of renewal. The high importance of this position in the institutional structure of the Organization is apparent even from the appointment procedure. The designation of the chief administrative officer of the Organization implies a major political stake. It is, in fact, a legally organized political act which requires a minimum of consent or, at least, passivity on the side of the permanent Members of the Security Council. The permanent Members, because of their recognized right of veto, have, if not the power to impose their preferences, at least the ability to prevent an application. The different appointments that took place over time illustrate this negative capability and explain the generally neutral position of the states whose nationals have come to occupy this function. [7]

The statute and the powers of the Secretary-General are unique, specific to the Organization, without any equivalent in other international or internal structures.[8] This high official has a strategic position as head of the only international universal organization with a multidimensional purpose. "Through the Secretary-General and its office pass all the interrelations represented by the United Nations Organization."[9]

The Charter sets out the Secretary-General's competencies in a few articles with a rather vague wording. According to article 97 of the Charter, the Secretary-General is "the chief administrative officer of the Organization". Article 98 provides that "the Secretary-General shall act in that capacity in all meetings of the General Assembly, of the Security Council, of the Economic and Social Council, and of the Trusteeship Council and shall perform such functions entrusted to him by the other principal organs", which, naturally, may include those in the field of the prevention and peaceful settlement of disputes. The same article establishes that the Secretary-General shall make an annual report to the General Assembly on the work of the Organization. Art. 101 states yet other responsibilities of the Secretary-General, establishing its control over the appointment of the Secretariat's staff, while art. 100 emphasizes the necessity of ensuring the independence of the Secretary-General and of the Secretariat's staff from any possible influence of the Member States. However, of all the Charter's provisions, art. 99 is the one that confers the Secretary- General the possibility to exercise its direct influence upon the activities of the Organization, enabling it to bring to the attention of the Security Council any matter which in its opinion may threaten the maintenance of international peace and security.

As a fundamental principle of any administrative structure, the hierarchical power is the faculty recognized to the highest official of the UN structure to ensure the adequate functioning of the secretarial services, the proper execution of the instructions and the overall control of the Secretariat. As head of the administration, the Secretary-General shall prepare and implement the budget, direct the staff, manage assets and represent the organization in front of private or public agencies and bodies, outside the United Nations. [10]

The importance of the manner in which the administrative and representational attributions are accomplished, depending on the political context and the personal features of the office holder, is not negligible. Depending on the international context and on the way each of the occupants of this function has interpreted the role of the Secretary-General, some of them have tried to make suggestions regarding the administrative reform, observing the existing gaps and proposing solutions to redress them. Also, the Secretary-General could use the activities of representation and participation at the meetings of the deliberative organs to try to exercise a political influence and interfere in the decision-making process. On the other hand, some of the Secretaries preferred, for various reasons, to keep a low profile and to limit their activities to the mere execution of the administrative tasks.

In addition to the technical-administrative and representational responsibilities, specific to this function, the High Official undertakes other type of actions as well, in accordance to the Charter's provisions: good offices, mediations, consultations with government representatives, research in various fields, organizing of international conferences, information activities and coordination of peacekeeping operations.[11]

Although, the attributions consecrated by the UN Charter for the Secretary-General seem to have mainly a technical and administrative character, a co-reading of art. 97, representative for the executive-administrative character of this function, art. 98, opening the door to a measure of political responsibility, and art. 99, illustrating its true political, autonomous character in the maintenance of international peace and security, demonstrates the dual nature of the Secretary-General's role, deriving from "a unique mixture of independence and dependence".[12] Thus, the Secretary- General will act as head of the administration in the management of the Secretariat, while, on the international stage and before all UN structures, it will act as a high official vested by the UN Charter with a very special right: a right of diplomatic initiative, of political nature, consecrated in art. 99. In fact, art. 98 entitles the General Assembly and the Security Council to "entrust the Secretary-General with tasks involving the execution of political decisions even when this would bring him – and with him the Secretariat and its members - into the arena of political conflict." The political responsibility implied by art. 98 is different from the political authority accorded by art. 99, but in perfect conformity with its spirit. Of course any political stance taken by the Secretary-General must not depart fro the concept of "neutrality". Neither art. 98 nor art. 99 could be implemented without "the complement of art. 100 strictly observed in letter and spirit".[13]

The Rules of Procedure of the General Assembly, as well as those of the Economic and Social Council and of the Trusteeship Council have confirmed over time the extensive interpretation of the Secretary -General's competences. Therefore, the Secretary-General shall act in this capacity in all meetings of the General Assembly of the Economic and Social Council and of the Trusteeship Council, but also of their committees and subcommittees. The dispositions of the rules of procedure state the unity of the Secretariat and the primacy of the Secretary-General, regardless of any merger of the subsidiary organs. "Through the Secretary-General pass all communications between the Organization and any of its organs. By performing its attributions, the Secretary-General must do so that the activities undertaken by the different organs form a whole and ensure that this entirety functions in the best conditions and efficiently". [14]

As head of the Secretariat, one of UN's main organs, the Secretary-General disposes of a certain degree of power within the Organization, in the sense that it is endowed with attributions of control over the staff of its office and representation inside and outside of the Organization. "Externally, in the arena of world politics, he may have influence, but he has no real power. He may have influence as a moral voice or because he is well informed, being at the centre of diplomatic activity or because he is able to facilitate contacts between leaders who wield real power."[15] Although lacking any decision-making powers and despite the some-what limited attributions formally consecrated by the Charter, the High Official is still able to influence UN's policy. Through its strategic position, the Secretary-General often has the opportunity to influence the way decisions are taken and implemented in the Organization. Many of the activities that have become nowadays specific to this function, developed in time based on a broad interpretation of the Charter's provisions, triggered by the need to adapt the Organization to new international challenges. Therefore, the Secretary-General's role should not be judged solely in terms of the Charter's provisions as they only establish a framework, a "skeleton".[16]

3. The style of leadership and the degree of involvement in the peaceful settlement of disputes

If the Charter provides an invariable framework for the position of the Secretary-General, a "skeleton" that has not changed yet, the personal profile of the occupant along with the political context in which it operates constitute two variable elements of high importance for the proper understanding of this institution.

"Each incumbent brings to the office a different cultural background, life experience, personality, intellectual acumen, ideology and mode of operation. These factors play an important role in determining the manner in which a Secretary-General functions in any particular international political climate."[17]

The Secretary-General's role in the peaceful settlement of disputes was configured progressively and often on the basis of precedents created by the various office holders through their specific manner of addressing the international issues they had to cope with. Thus, the political behaviour of each occupant has the power to affect the authority and prestige of the function in a particular context, as well as its future evolution.

Previous researches on the political behaviour of leaders have identified three styles of leadership: managerial, visionary and strategic. Kent J. Kille used these previous findings in order to explore the Secretaries' distinctive ways of interpreting their role within the Organization and on the international arena and the extent to which each of them managed to make a difference in the evolution of their Office.

In order to distinguish between the different types of leadership styles, there have been identified six relevant features: the capacity to react (sensitivity towards the context and analytical abilities), confidence in the personal ability to influence events, need for recognition of efforts and labour, need to relate to others, internationalism (defined as attachment to the UN and desire to protect its values), emphasis on solution identification and task accomplishment.[18] All the office holders possess these qualities, to some extent. But in order to determine which of these traits are predominant for each incumbent and, thus, determine which style of leadership is more fitting, researchers have put to analysis primarily their spontaneous manifestations, for instance statements made during press conferences, focusing less on their previously prepared official discourses. On this basis there have been observed the past incumbents' inclinations towards a particular pattern of behaviour: the managerial style will register higher scores at the capacity to react and need to relate; the strategic style has as predominant features the capacity to react, the confidence in the personal ability to influence events, the need to relate and the internationalism, while the visionary style will focus primarily on the confidence in the personal ability to influence events, the need for recognition of the personal efforts, the internationalism and the emphasis on solution identification and task accomplishment. According to the results of this research, Lie, Hammarskjöld and, then, Boutros-Ghali are predominantly visionary, Thant, Waldheim and Perez de Cuellar are mainly managerial, while Annan is mostly strategic.[19]

Keeping these coordinates, we could determine the various occupants' degree of involvement in the peaceful settlement of disputes and the extent to which each of them contributed to the configuration of the Secretary-General's role. Thus, it has been noted that the managerial style is specific to those incumbents that prefer to receive and execute instructions and less compatible to activities of peaceful settlement of disputes, which imply a greater degree of independence and confidence in the personal ability to influence events. These office holders will limit their involvement in the peaceful resolution of conflicts to merely executing mandated assignments, without any intention to exert influence on the deliberative organs. Any independent initiatives would often be less efficient, lacking the necessary sustained effort.

The visionary style is probably the best suited for activities of peaceful settlement. If managers are ideal executants, visionaries are creators. They prefer independent actions and even when they are mandated an assignment they try to contribute to its shaping and give a personal interpretation to its modus operandi. Visionaries always try to exert influence and are in a constant search for solutions to the major issues that affect international peace and security. For instance, Dag Hammarskjöld's personality, the original and creative manner of approaching the international issues of his time, his confidence in UN's mission and values have played an outstanding part in the evolution of the Office, of the Organization, as a whole, and of the world's perception on its role on the international arena. The echo of its actions is still found today in the way some of the attributions of the Secretary-General are shaped.

The strategic style implies a rather moderate desire to influence. Strategists prefer consensus and act cautiously without forcing the events, waiting for the right moment to intervene, so that their actions would benefit from a favourable framework that would enhance their efficiency. Strategists opt for a slow, but certain evolution of their demarches.

[18] Kent J. Kille, *op. cit., p.*18
[19] Ibidem

A brief analysis of these patterns of political behaviour would lead us to the conclusion that the visionary and the strategic styles are more inclined towards an active involvement in the peaceful settlement of disputes, determining in greater measure the evolution of the Secretary-General's role in this field. Nevertheless it is important to note the fact that all the office holders possess features that are specific to each of the three styles and that can be activated in the sense of exerting a specific approach on international issues, when favoured by other factors such as the international context and the general evolution of international law.

3. The Secretary-General's relations with the Security Council and the General Assembly – potential influences of the decision-making process

Having in view the above-mentioned analysis of the incumbents' pattern of behaviour, it becomes obvious that the Secretary- General's relation with the deliberative organs varies in intensity and content, depending on the political context and the individual occupying the position.

Legally speaking, as we have noted in a previous section of this study, and also taking into account the further evolution of the Secretary-General as mediator and provider of good offices (imposed by a reconfiguration of the peaceful settlement of disputes system, as a result of the continuous developments of the international relations) the High Official's attributions in the field of peaceful settlement of disputes derive either from the assignments mandated by the Security Council and the General Assembly (art. 98) or from its voluntary involvement (under art. 99) on its own initiative or at the request of the parties to the conflict.[20]

3.1. Assignments mandated by the General Assembly or the Security Council, under art. 98 of the UN Charter

Considering exclusively the Charter's dispositions, it could be said that the Secretary-General is, normally, an executive body, subordinated to the instructions and decisions of the deliberative organs. The only exception is art. 99 establishing the Secretary-General's initiative function. This article has sometimes been interpreted as providing a specific legal basis for the Secretary's informal political activity. Initially, during the first decade of the Organization's existence, while the Secretary-General was evolving as a valuable agent of peaceful settlement of international disputes, the High Official would most often act under the Security Council's or the General Assembly's mandate.[21]

The further development of this function, based on the extensive interpretation of the Secretary- General's role in the UN's institutional architecture covering areas that were traditionally under the jurisdiction of the deliberative organs, has often generated tensions. The Secretary-General was caught between "the idealism and the hope that find their bright expression" in the Charter's provisions and the national interests of UN members, in particular those of the permanent members of the Security Council, as powerful, influential states, largely sustaining the Organization's financial and constitutional performance.[22] Sometimes, the Secretary-General's missions of peaceful settlement have been obstructed by constraints imposed by the Security Council, the General Assembly or important Member States. Some would argue that, sometimes, these very constraints helped protecting the impartiality and the reputation of the tenure, subject to various pressures.

[21] For instance, Resolution 203/14.05.1965 on the Dominican affaire and Resolution 294/15.07.1971 on the conflict between Portugal and Senegal gave such mandates to the Secretary-General.

[22] Simon Chesterman, Secretary or General? The UN Secretary General in World Politics, (New York: Cambridge University Press, 2007), p.9

It is important to notice that over the years the number of assignments has grown significantly. The magnitude and the wide range of executive functions entrusted to the Secretary-General have, in themselves, a political significance. In time, it becomes somewhat evident that the Secretary-General, as head of the Secretariat, one of the main UN organs and legally based participant at the meetings of the deliberative organs, is best qualified to execute resolutions, even if the given assignments surpassed the limits of simple administrative services.

When mandated such an assignment, there rise opportunities for the High Official to exercise its own influence on the way a certain situation is approached. Thus, the Secretary-General has "the power to interpret the mandate".[23] Of course, the given instructions can be more or less precise, more or less coordinated, but the Secretary-General often enjoys a certain autonomy in the performance of its attributions. Many assignments, because of their vague wording, leave the Secretary-General a significant freedom of appreciation and, sometimes, even the independence of entirely choosing the means of execution. Nevertheless, the degree of autonomy is highly dependent on the incumbent's personal features. Researchers of the Secretary-General's political behaviour have concluded that each style of leadership is different from this point of view. Visionaries, like Lie and Hammarskjöld, have the tendency to act more autonomous, strategists are more cautious, while managers, like Thant, Waldheim and Perez de Cuellar tend to act carefully, seeking the approval of the main organs. However, it is important to note the fact that each and every one of the Secretaries have contributed to the evolution of the function. Visionaries were the most creative and independent incumbents, leaving behind a precious legacy that was to be developed by their successors.

Placed in various international contexts, the Secretary-General's autonomy has proven to be a useful instrument, ensuring and preserving, as much as possible, the institutional balance and the effectiveness of the Organization. During the Cold War, the Secretary-General would often use its growing political independence in order to mediate the antagonistic positions of the two superpowers. However, through these actions, the Secretary-General often risked to undermine the very authority of his Office, if, for instance, he lost the support of one superpower or if the function itself became the object of an international dispute. Nevertheless, in this turbulent international context, the position of the Secretary-General knew the most spectacular evolution, from Trygve Lie, who founded the independence of the Office, and continuing with Dag Hammarskjöld, who, among other things, trying to avoid blockage of the collective action through the so-called "Peking formula", obtained the autonomy of the Secretary-General in implementing mandates on international peace and security. Also, the second Secretary-General prepared the ground for the establishment of the UN Emergency Force (UNEF), in order to put an end to the Suez crisis in 1956.[24] Seeking a creative use of limited resources – especially military resources - Dag Hammarskjöld, in partnership with the General Assembly's President, Lester Pearson, established UNEF, creating an original pattern for peacekeeping missions, the so-called "Chapter VI and a half" of the Charter, which have actually been used very often ever since. Important developments also occurred during the mandates of U Thant, Kurt Waldheim and Javier Perez de Cuellar, each of them trying to maintain the delicate institutional balance of the Organization.

The end of the Cold War brought an infusion of optimism, of expansive and proactive practice within the deliberative organs. The number of mandates establishing peacekeeping and peace building missions, as well as legal and administrative activities, increased.[25] At the same time, the political space available to the Secretary-General expanded, generating tensions that had to be coped with by the High Official (in particular by Boutros Boutros-Ghali and Kofi Annan).

[25] For example, in the five years after 1988, as many peace-keeping operations were authorized as in the previous forty-three years. (UN Press Release SG/SM/4748,13 May 1992, at 1-2)

Subsequently, the Secretary-General's efforts to mediate and to ensure the cooperation and the balance within the Organization have not diminished. From the ingrate position of reconciliation agent, caught between the interests of the Western states, facing new challenges to their security, international terrorism and nuclear proliferation, on one hand, and the interests of the developing states, troubled by other issues and having totally different priorities, on the other, the Secretary-General has sought to defuse the inevitable tensions.

In the field of international peace and security, over time, the Secretary-General had to assume increasingly numerous executive functions, while the practice of peacekeeping missions has charged the Secretary-General with responsibilities that were much higher than those initially envisaged by the Charter. In the absence of any tradition or indication coming from the deliberative organs, the founding principles on which these operations were conducted were elaborated by the Secretary-General himself. Many of the aspects regarding the peacekeeping mechanism were developed on the initial principles defined by Dag Hammarskjöld in 1956. Frequently, the vagueness of the mandate prompted the Secretary-General to provide its own interpretation to the resolution and to adapt the operations to the international situation and the local situation. Sometimes, the imprecision of a mandate on a peacekeeping operation triggered serious consequences. For instance, because of the inability of the Security Council and of the General Assembly to properly define the UN mission in Congo, in 1960, when the civil war was imminent and the threats of secession were pressing, Dag Hammarskjöld and his representatives were forced to solely assume the responsibility for the UN action in the field. The whole situation was extremely controversial and led to a serious financial and constitutional crisis within the UN. In this context, the USSR proposed to replace the Secretary-General with a triumvirate, with the risk of importing the antagonisms existing within the political organs into the executive, thus creating a blockage of its activity. Some years later, in 1967, U Thant decided to withdraw the United Nations Emergency Force which was established ten years earlier in the Middle East on the basis of a resolution adopted by the General Assembly without determining any time limit for its existence. The further attacks against the Secretary-General, following this decision, left a deep imprint on his work until the end of his mandate. As a result, peacekeeping operations began to be established for a limited period and subjected to a periodic review and renewal, every 3 or 6 months. Thus, at short intervals, the Secretary- General was to report to the Security Council, recommending the renewal of the Force, if applicable, describing any problems that had to be faced and making suggestions to improve its efficiency and to adapt its objectives to the changing context. Based on this report, the Security Council would make a decision. Thus, the Secretary-General's activity was to be periodically evaluated and its mandate reconfirmed.[26]

In the diplomatic field, the General Assembly and the Security Council have charged the Secretary -General with increasingly numerous and rather vague responsibilities, which, eventually, led to the gradual enlargement of the office's capacity to influence world events and of its independence. Very often, the Secretary was vested with mediation and good offices missions, which tended to fill in the gap created by the inaction of the normally competent bodies. The High Official was sometimes asked to commit to the urgent implementation of resolutions that were adopted years ago, to renew its efforts in order to reach a global solution to issues that were a few decades old, to promote "the implementation of the present resolution" in crisis that were completely beyond UN's capabilities. Often, especially in the context of the Cold War, the only form of action upon which the Member States were able to agree consisted of a Secretary-General's report on the situation that was to become the basis of a new resolution.[27] In such situations, regardless of the leadership style, the Secretary-General had to be more creative than usually and to assume a greater degree of autonomy. This is a double-edged situation as what could lead to the enlargement of its role, could also affect its credibility, with negative consequences on the long run. Thus, the involvement of the deliberative organs in the sense of establishing rules and limits in the Secretary-General's activity can sometimes have a protective effect.

[26] A. Pellet, op. cit., 1315

Confronted with controversial political situations, when receiving assignments from the deliberative organs, Dag Hammarskjöld took an emblematic stance: he addressed the dilemma of the Secretary-General's proper course of action when carrying out its tasks, by invoking the full regard to its international obligations under the Charter and the neutrality of its position, translated in the lack of "subservience to a particular national or ideological attitude." Hammarskjöld believed that in accomplishing its attributions, the Secretary-General should use the varied means and resources made available, of which primarily important are: the principles and purposes of the Charter and the body of legal doctrine and precepts, supplementing the Charter's principles, "accepted by states, generally and particularly, as manifested in the resolutions of the UN organs." In order to reduce the margin of discretion and ensure that its stance is representative for the opinion of the Organization as a whole, the Secretary-General should us constitutional means such as: "consultations with permanent missions of the United Nations safeguarded by diplomatic privacy" and advisory committees, "composed of representatives of the governments most directly concerned and representing diverse political positions"[28]. If even so the Secretary-General inevitably keeps a large area of discretion and risks to become subject of political controversy, Hammarskjöld considers that:

"The international civil servant cannot be accused of lack of neutrality simply for taking a stand on a controversial issue when this is his duty and cannot be avoided. But there remains a serious intellectual and moral problem as we move within an area inside which personal judgement must come into play. Finally we have to deal here with a question of integrity or ….a question of conscience." "... If integrity in the sense of respect for the law and respect for truth were to drive hi into positions of conflict with this or that interest, then that conflict is a sign of his neutrality and not of his failure to observe neutrality – then it is in line, not in conflict with his duties as an international civil servant."[29]

Experience has proved that the deliberative organs must be very careful when mandating an assignment to the Secretary-General. In order to ensure the efficiency of the Secretary –General's mandated assignments and to protect its credibility as an independent negotiator, the deliberative organs should abstain from using the High Official as a messenger when the actual intention is to use force for the settlement of a particular dispute.[30] Also, failure has taught UN the lesson of not giving the Secretary-General assignments which are hopeless because of the obduracy of the parties[31] or of the unwillingness of UN Members to supply the adequate funds and personnel[32] or, simply, because the international community is not really interested in a settlement in that particular moment[33]. Probably the worst mistake that could be made would be to assign the Secretary-General diplomatic functions as a way of shifting responsibility for failure or of dropping uncomfortable issues that some Members wish to forget, in order to create the illusion of action. In such situations, a solution would be that the Secretary-General is given the possibility to use a private or public way in order to decline an assignment known to be ill-conceived or insufficiently supported within the Organisation.[34]

Over the years, incumbent by incumbent, the Secretary-General's role in the peaceful settlement of disputes was configured as clearly separate from and, sometimes, even at variance with the policy of one or other of the deliberative organs. Nevertheless, while keeping a neutral stance on issues concerning international peace, the High Official had to be careful that his independence doesn't conflict with UN's definitive policy positions in order to ensure coherence and efficiency in all its activities. In order to act as a credible intermediary, the Secretary –General needs a wide margin of discretion. However, if a UN political organ expresses an obvious adversarial stance towards the actions of a state with which the High Official is trying to negotiate, the Secretary-General must retain, using diplomatic skills, the margin of discretion necessary for the proper accomplishment of the peaceful settlement activities.[35]

3.2. Regular or requested reports to the General Assembly and to the Security Council

An opportunity to exercise an influence on the way a certain dispute is approached also arises with the presentation of regular or requested reports to the General Assembly and the Security Council. Thus, the High Official can make suggestions on how the efficiency of the Organization could be increased, through the improvement of certain aspects that depend on the Secretary-General's involvement.

The Secretary-General has often used the annual report on the work of the Organization that had to be presented to the General Assembly, as an occasion to expose its points of view on various issues. This responsibility – consecrated in art. 98 of the UN Charter – has been interpreted in different ways by the office holders, knowing an interesting development. Inherited from the League of Nations, this disposition was slightly diverted from its original purpose. Initially, it was neatly placed within the framework of strictly administrative attributions. Obviously, the report had to be a « compte-rendu », without implying any decision-making opportunities for the Secretary-General. It was soon to be noted that although the report must remain impartial and objective, it could not be just a chronology or a mere description of acts adopted by the various UN organs. The Secretary had to somehow juxtapose the events and the reactions they triggered within the Organization as well as the subsequent decisions adopted by the UN organs. In addition, the High Official had to make note of the consequences implied by any of the aforementioned. In other words, the annual report could not lack a certain degree of interpretation of the international conjuncture and the role of the United Nations within it, as well as an evaluative and predictive tendency.[36] Thus, the annual report has gradually become less of an administrative report and more of a diplomatic document, in which the Secretary-General expresses its own view on the overall UN policy. Although the analysis could be rather descriptive, the magnitude and the complexity of UN's activities asked for an effort of synthesis, allowing a general overview of the international arena. Trygve Lie understood very well these requirements and conceived his first annual report as divided in two parts: a general introduction, elaborated by the Secretary himself and the actual report as a historic description of UN's activities undertaken during the past year, anonymously drafted by the Secretariat. Dag Hammarskjöld introduced a new element, by publishing separately a substantial introduction. The annual report, published 45 days before the opening of the session, as established in art. 48 from the General Assembly's Rules of Procedure, became a "supplement" to the introduction that appeared in the General Assembly's session. The report remained a purely technical summary, while the much-awaited event was, in fact, the publication of the introduction containing the Secretary-General's analysis and suggestions. "The supplement" has gradually become a working document, a mere repertoire of dates and references with no actual development. The real "annual report" was, in fact, the document in which the Secretary-General made a synthesis of the events and expressed his views on the functioning of the Organization, on its strengths and its limits. It is clear that such a synthesis implied a use of interpretational skills and a personal appreciation on the value and the opportunity of UN's adopted decisions as well as a value judgement of UN's action or lack of it and its subsequent consequences. Of course, as an impartial and neutral agent the Secretary has to exert a certain degree of prudence and reservation when drafting the report, but in the same time, it manifested a unique authority in this sense. Surprisingly, this way of conceiving the annual report has not been criticized, but rather appreciated by the General Assembly and the Security Council alike. Nowadays, it is no longer a mere text made available to delegations and the public, summarizing discussions, decisions and the most important texts on the issues treated by the United Nations during the year, but a genuine diplomatic document. This means of asserting the moral and political authority of the Secretary-General illustrates an important power of influence.[37] Some would argue that because it focuses on past events and situations, the annual report couldn't be an efficient means of exerting influence on the actual way of approaching issues. In fact, it creates an effective opportunity to enhance past suggestions and announce future ones.[38]

Given this evolution, it could be said that the annual reports, alongside other reports requested by the General Assembly and by the Security Council, can be effective instruments of exercising influence on the activity of the deliberative organs in the field of international peace and security. This does not mean that all the office holders have used them to this end. Having in view the personal features of each occupant, the evolution of the function and the international context which had to be coped with, some of the Secretaries used the reports to make important political suggestions in various fields, from the administrative reform to the major issues concerning the maintenance of international peace and security, while others were more reserved in expressing their opinions mostly in order to avoid antagonizing some permanent Members of the Security Council and, thus, endanger their office. Using the paradigm of the leadership style, it can be observed that visionaries and strategists are more likely to use reports to exert influence and assert their authority, while managers rarely shape the content of their mandate and, if they do, they immediately seek the approval of the political bodies.

3.3. Oral and written statements before the deliberative organs

The High Official's right to make statements is highly linked to UN Charter's provisions establishing some degree of political competence. Thus, if according to art. 99 the Secretary-General may seize the Security Council with any issue which in its opinion may threaten the maintenance of international peace and security, naturally it must have the right to say why and how it was estimated the danger of a certain issue. Therefore the Secretary-General must be endowed with the right to make statements before the Security Council whenever it finds necessary to take a stance against a potentially dangerous situation. Art. 98 providing that "the Secretary-General shall act in that capacity in all meetings of the General Assembly, of the Security Council, of the Economic and Social Council, and of the Trusteeship Council and shall perform such functions entrusted to him by the other principal organs", also offers a legal ground for this right, as a logical consequence of any participation at such events.

The Secretary-General's power to influence the activity of the deliberative organs through the exertion of the right to make statements, also has a legal basis in their rules of procedure. Thus, the Secretary-General, in addition to the responsibility of coordinating the Secretariat's specific services, in accordance to the deliberative organs' rules of procedure[39], also has the possibility of making oral and written statements on any issue under consideration and the right to suggest the insertion on their daily agenda of those problems considered by the High Official to be worthy of discussion within these organs. The corroboration between art. 98 and the General Assembly's Rules of Procedure[40] offers the Secretary-General, in relation to the plenary organ, prerogatives that are comparable to those conferred by art. 99, in relation to the Security Council. On the other hand, associating art. 98 with the Security Council's Provisional Rules of Procedure[41], the Secretary-General has the opportunity of intervening within this organ, without invoking the controversial dispositions of art. 99.[42]

[37] A. Pellet, *op. cit., p.*1316
[38] Michel Virally, *op. cit., p.*369

The Secretary-General often used its right to make statements within the Security Council and the General Assembly in order to make its views known. However, the exercise of this right in the General Assembly is very delicate in practice, as the Secretary-General risks to compromise its authority and prestige in endless debates. [43] Similarly, the High Official avoided for the same reasons, the explicit invocation of art. 99, which establishes the High Official's initiative function in front of the Security Council, although many of the activities undertaken by the Secretary-General in the field of international peace and security were based on the extensive interpretation of this article.

Of course, in this case as well, the extent to which the various office holders have used this right in order to exercise their influence depended on the international context and on the personal view about the function and its role. Researchers concluded that the incumbents with a predominantly visionary style would most often make statements in order to express political opinions and voice a point of view on a situation; also strategists would sometimes make use of this right to this respect, while managers would rather avoid taking a personal stance in their statements. On the other hand, it would be reasonable to affirm that regardless of any leadership style, the Secretary-General should manifest a great deal of prudence when intervening, even if the form of intervention is that of a simple statement within a wider political debate before the General Assembly or the Security Council. Hammarskjöld himself once stated that the Secretary-general should avoid taking a public stance on any conflicts between Member States. This discretion is dictated by a political concern: that of preserving the utility of the function.[44]

3.4. Article 99 – "letter" and "spirit"

Article 99 establishes for the Secretary-General attributions that lack any equivalent in other international structures: "the Secretary-General may bring to the attention of the Security Council any matter which in his opinion may threaten the maintenance of international peace and security". Obviously, the Secretary-General is endowed with a responsibility in the maintenance of international peace and security. To this respect, the High Official also has the duty to observe the evolution of the international conjecture in order to detect and evaluate potential dangers, using any available means (mostly those that don't imply a particular juridical habilitation): public information, communications from governments, any relevant contacts with officials or even particulars, the right to conduct investigations etc.[45]

[43] The occasions in which the Secretary-General urged the inclusion of a political issue on the General Assembly's daily agenda often had the opposite results than what it was expected, rather showing the limits of UN's activity than increasing its efficiency. This was the case of Trygve Lie whose proposal of the 20 year Program, in 1950, had quite a low audience. Similarly, Kurt Waldheim's attempt to include, in 1972, the "Measures to Prevent International Terrorism", on the Assembly's daily agenda, had a low impact.

Surprisingly, the article was adopted without difficulty in 1945, at the Conference in San Francisco, the states agreeing, in principle, to confer the Secretary-General an important political dimension. The Charter's authors' intention to consolidate the Secretary-General's political authority emerges from the interpretation of this article, given by the Preparatory Commission:"The Secretary-General may have an important role to play as mediator and as an informal adviser of many governments, and will undoubtedly be called upon from time to time, in the exercise of his administrative duties, to take decisions which may justly be called political. Under art. 99 of the Charter, moreover, he has been given a quite special right which goes beyond any power previously accorded to the head of an international organization: to bring to the attention of the Security Council any matter (not merely any dispute or situation) which, in his opinion, may threaten the maintenance of international peace and security. It is impossible to foresee how this article will be applied; but the responsibility it confers upon the Secretary-General will require the exercise of the highest qualities of political judgement, tact and integrity.[46]

Article 99 was to constitute the legal basis for the High Official's initiatives surpassing the Charter's provisions. The only debates generated, at the time, were limited to whether the faculty recognized by this article was, in fact, a right or an obligation, whether "may" should to be replaced by "shall". It was finally decided that the exercise of this power should be left to the Secretary-General, without being imposed as an obligation. The same discretion was left to the Secretary-General when evaluating issues that could be considered worthy of being brought to the attention of the Security Council. [47]

However, art. 99 provides for a discretionary right that could prove to be very difficult to exercise. For the Secretary-General to exercise this right, it would have to previously make a judgement on an international situation, considering it to be a threat to international security. This implies a personal appreciation and a political choice as there aren't any precise and universally accepted criteria upon which it could be determined whether a certain situation constitutes a threat to international security or not. Thus, if a group of states could consider a certain issue as representing a danger to international security, others could see it as strictly a matter of internal jurisdiction. By invoking article 99, the Secretary-General decides that such an issue is of interest for the international security and, therefore, should be discussed within the organization, anticipating a similar appreciation from the Security Council. This initiative could be full of consequences, in particular if the Secretary-General, overestimating its power of influence, brings to the attention of the Security Council an issue that one or some of the permanent members refuse to take into consideration. In such a case, by invoking art. 99, the Secretary-General could endanger the prestige and the reputation of its office. Therefore, the High Official must be cautious in implementing this provision for the following reasons: because it implies a value judgement on a situation that may be controversial; it anticipates a favourable response from the Security Council; but also because the Secretary-General would assume a risk by associating its office to any subsequent measures taken by the Security Council.[48] In fact, art. 99 gives the Secretary-General similar prerogatives to those conferred to the General Assembly, under art. 11 paragraph 3, with the difference that the Secretary-General does not have the same means to exert them as the plenary organ.

For all these reasons, the office holders have avoided using explicitly art. 99, this disposition being invoked, in the context envisaged by the Charter, only in the case of the Congolese crisis, on July, the 13th 1960, when Dag Hammarskjöld asked the Security Council's President to urgently convoke the Council, under art. 99. The Council was reunited on the 13th of July, the Secretary-General making, on this occasion, a long exposure in which he was justifying his decision to invoke art. 99 for the first time in the history of the United Nations and was asking to be granted an extended mandate that would allow him to take adequate measures in order to provide military assistance to the Congolese government. The fact was unprecedented.

Later, in November 1979, the Security Council was reunited again at the urgent request of the Secretary-General, Kurt Waldheim, stating that the prolonged detention of U.S. diplomatic personnel in Iran constituted a threat to the international peace and security. Waldheim did not cite explicitly art. 99, but situated his approach under the general exercise of the responsibilities incumbent upon him, according to the UN Charter. However, the Member States have rightly interpreted this initiative as an application of art. 99.[49]

In other cases, although this article was not invoked openly, its provisions have been used to draw the Council's attention on some issues and to make known the Secretary-General's point of view on serious situations that were not on the Council's daily agenda.[50]

Usually, when an issue that is considered threatening for the international peace and security is not brought to the Security Council's attention by any of the Member States, it means that the political obstacles are so high that the Secretary-General would, unnecessarily, compromise the reputation of its office, by taking a potentially controversial initiative. That is why art. 99 was rarely applied in its letter, but its "spirit" has allowed the Secretary-General to make full use of the means consecrated in the UN Charter, in order to justify an extensive interpretation of its function and exercise its prerogatives in relation to the deliberative organs and the Member States. Thus, using a dialectical interpretation of Articles 97 and 99, each of them reinforcing the other, the first UN Secretary General put forth, from the start, his right to freely intervene in the Council's discussions in order to offer his own interpretation on issues concerning the international peace and security and make suggestions.[51] Relying on the its spirit and on the need to collect all information in order to determine whether he should literally cite art. 99, the first Secretary-General also affirmed his right to conduct any research and investigation he considered necessary. If the Secretary-General may bring to the Security Council's attention any problem that could endanger the maintenance of international peace and security, an extensive interpretation of this provision could lead to the conclusion that the office holder has the responsibility to keep a high level of information and awareness on issues of international security that would, therefore, justify their independent initiatives of exploring potentially dangerous areas and situations, so that any decision to refer the matter to the Security Council would be thoroughly documented. When the Secretary-General gathers information on a dangerous situation or investigates an unstable area, there is no legal obligation to inform the Security Council on these details, unless those activities have been mandated.

Keeping the extensive manner of interpreting this article, one would conclude that the Secretary- General not only has the possibility of examining conflicts, but also the opportunity of intervening in their regulation. Thus, based on this provision, the Secretary-General disposes of wide competencies to initiate operations of inquiry, good offices or other forms of diplomatic activity, carried out with the scope of maintaining the international peace and security.[52]

To this respect, Dag Hammarskjöld considered that it was his responsibility to develop the full potential of this unique diplomatic instrument created by the UN Charter. Aware of the fact that he had a special vocation, Hammarskjöld, a true visionary, gradually elaborated an extensive theory on the role of the United Nations and of its Secretary-General. Adept of discrete reconciliation diplomacy, he also developed a theory on preventive diplomacy, giving a new dimension to the function of the Secretary-General and, thus, justifying all his personal initiatives when it came to appeasing potential conflict situations and preventing their deepening. Hammarskjöld's legacy is today an invaluable construction of great vision and bearing the mark of a lucid and penetrating spirit.[53]

Dag Hammarskjöld's theoretical construction (broadly reflected in his Introductions to the Annual Report) has influenced determinately the evolution of the Secretary-General's role, all of his successors taking their inspiration from his actions and assuming their political functions in conformity with the "spirit" of art. 99. Naturally, this considerable expansion of the Secretary-General's role was not always agreed. [54] In such a situation, having to cope with some resistance, U Thant, although more managerial and less innovative than his predecessor, reiterated the Secretary-General's diplomatic function, at the same time, enunciating the legal basis for his actions. In his opinion, seeking a supplementary support for his actions, this basis consists in the association of art. 99 and art. 33 (which requires that the parties to a dispute seek resolution by peaceful means).Thus, "if the parties to a dispute request or accept the Secretary-General's involvement, in order to fulfil the obligation consecrated by the Charter to seek a peaceful solution to the dispute, the Secretary-General is, manifestly, empowered to offer its contribution."[55]

U Thant had in view an extensive interpretation of art. 99, which would allow him to act only according to the will of the parties to the dispute, the Secretary-General's obligations towards the Security Council being limited to "informing" without "consulting". Progressively, based on this broad view on the Secretary-General's powers, the notion of "political responsibility" and than that of "moral responsibility" emerged. U Thant and Waldheim often gave expression to this tendency, considering that it was their "duty" to intervene, whenever they could, in order to seek a peaceful solution. Perez de Cuellar also gave a similarly generous interpretation to the Secretary-General's role. In his first annual report, he insisted on the necessity to intensify the High Official's preventive role, envisaged by art. 99 of the UN Charter and announced his intention to develop a wider and more systematic capacity of fact-finding in areas of potential conflict. [56]

Using the aforementioned theory on the Secretary-General's leadership style, it can be noted that visionaries like Lie and Hammarskjöld, being more likely to invoke art. 99 and to fully act according to its spirit, set the direction of evolution for their function, while their successors, although maybe less creative, had to take it over and expand it further, in order to keep a coherent stance on the Secretary-General's role. The result has been a continuous ten dency to increase it and enhance its visibility within UN's institutional architecture.

Thus, the Secretary-General's independent initiatives are the result of a gradual evolution of its role, influenced by the ever-changing international context, by the continuous necessity to adapt the institutional structures to the international realities and, last, but not least, by the outstanding personalities that occupied this function. The constantly growing responsibilities entrusted to the Secretary-General were often dictated by political circumstances and international crisis and its initiatives were sometimes imposed by necessities of the moment, but some of these had to become permanent features of the function in order to ensure its coherence and efficiency. Naturally, every Secretary-General had his own policy, his own view on the position and its role, but the invariable elements considered to be at the core of the function would always be integrated.

"It had become unremarkable for the incumbent to venture where States could not or would not go, guided solely by an understanding of the principles and purposes of the Charter. In effect, successive Secretaries-General had established a right to act on their own to safeguard what they perceived as minimum standards of world order."[57] It seems that only prudence, manifested in a given international context, and the political ability of an office holder, could limit the margin of initiative with which the Secretary-General is considered to be vested, in accordance with "the spirit" of art. 99.

4. Conclusions

The function of the Secretary-General, as it is presently configured, is mostly the result of a creative long-term process that, eventually, made available for today's office holder a repertory of practices defining a strong, influential role in the maintenance of international peace and security. The Secretary-General's capacity to exert influence on the decision-making process gradually increased along side its ability to master the various instruments provided by the UN Charter. Using the existing research results on the political behaviour of the Secretary-General when analysing its possibilities to exert influence in the decision-making process can lead us to a better understanding of the function's evolution. Thus, identifying an incumbent's leadership style and analysing its actions within a certain international context may offer a pattern of argumentation and "diagnosis" for its past and present behaviour as well as an instrument of prediction of its future reactions.

Generally, in relation to the political organs, regardless of their leadership style, the occupants of this function, whether they are acting on their own initiative or at the request of the parties to the dispute, whether they are mandated by the Security Council or by the General Assembly must coordinate their activity with that of the plenary and executive organs, in order to ensure the effectiveness of their interventions and to keep the institutional balance within the United Nations. There are situations in which the Secretary-General's independent activities subsequently obtain the official recognition from UN's main organs. In other situations, where discretion is essential, the High Official may be involved in informal consultations with the executive organ and some of the Member States.

However, the Secretary-General's power to influence and its unique role are the result of its growing independence and find their basis in its general neutrality. In a world where national interests prevail, the Secretary-General does not operate with the concept of sovereignty, enabling it to act as "impartial intermediary, investigator of abuses and voice of world conscience, at the same time" [58]. The office holders do not represent any state and should not defend the position of any political community.Unlike the deliberative organs, inevitably subjected to a combination of national interests, the Secretary-General can be a genuine interpret of UN's ideals. Its involvement in the peaceful settlement of disputes often has a discrete nature and its diplomatic services are considered increasingly reliable, being sometimes requested by the parties to the dispute. However, even so, the Secretary-General's activity in the field of the peaceful settlement of disputes, together with the Security Council's and the General Assembly's actions should be regarded as a whole aiming to maintain the international peace and security.

THE ROLE OF INTERNATIONAL NON-GOVERNMENTAL ORGANISATIONS IN HUMAN RIGHTS PROTECTION

RAMONA-GABRIELA PARASCHIV*

Abstract
One of the main concerns of democratic states and intergovernmental or supranational international organisations is referring to the respect of human rights. International nongovernmental organisations have also an important role in establishing human rights violations, boosting in taking measures for their removal, and also in the improvement of specific international regulations.
For awareness of the role of these organizations, it is necessary to investigate their involvement in activities of human rights protection, with the argumentation of the necessity in extending their actions regarding the cooperation with intergovernmental institutions and organizations, in order to prevent or terminate violations of human rights and to eliminate negative consequences arising from such facts

Keywords: human rights, non-governmental organizations, international community, defence measures of human rights, United Nations Organization.

1. Introduction

Throughout history, the cooperation between the states of the international community has been diversified, along with the relations among stated, thus creating forms of international coordination and collaboration, by the intermediary of transnational organizations.

Concerning the point of view of the quality of members, the international organizations may be:

- Inter-governmental organizations, created by agreement of the states;
- Supranational international organizations, which are created by the states, but their institutional bodies operate similar to the bodies of state power, administration or jurisdiction;
- International non-governmental organizations, which are situated between the public sector, because of the services it performs and the private sector, due to the manner of organization.

International non-governmental organizations have an old history, as in the year 1914 they had already founded 1083 similar organization[1]. They had, throughout their evolution an important contribution in sustaining the movements against slavery, for the rights of women or in other domain regarding the protection of human rights. As a result, the study concerning the role of these organizations in protecting the human rights, aiming at knowing the mechanisms and means by which they may intervene in the situation of the breach of these rights, presents a particular importance, as only by presenting these mechanism may the methods of action be improved in view of preventing the acts by which the respective values are negatively influenced, in the same time taking the best measures to avoid the negative consequences of the mentioned acts.

2. The appearance and characteristics of international non-governmental organizations

In ancient times, social philanthropic issues were left to the church, however, with the commencement of society's evolution, because of its impossibility to deal with the increasing level and complexity of social problems, the governments were compelled to assume more liabilities for the poor or the persons that faced different social problems. Similarly, the non-governmental organizations appeared which were permanently developing, thus reaching a functional division of liabilities between the state and the volunteering[2].

In the present numerous international non-governmental organizations such as: Amnesty International, International Committee of the Red Cross[3], Human Rights Watch, International Institute of Humanitarian Law, „Article 19" etc. develops an intense activity regarding the defence of human rights.

The notion of „non-governmental organization" began to be used more frequently after it was introduced in the constitutional documents of the United Nations Organization, in the year 1945, thus accepting the consultative role of the respective organizations[4], following their request to officially participate in the works of the bodies belonging to the United Nations Organization[5].

International non-governmental organizations represent international associations, without a lucrative purpose, created from a mixt or private initiative, which groups natural or legal persons with different nationalities, in conformity with the domestic law on the territory of which they are headquartered.

The notion of international non-governmental organizations is used for designating international organizations which were not founded by an international treaty[6], being created and administered by private persons, which do not officially represent the state. They are organizations of the civil society, that does not develop a political activity, but which functions in the public sphere, completing or influencing the activities of the government in the sense of improving the social activities from certain domains[7].

International non-governmental organizations are defined by certain common traits:

- Embody a legal personality, thus they activate in their own name;
- They are private, functioning separately from governmental institutions, but they may receive governmental support or include in their councils of administration members or representatives of the governments;
- Do not offer profit to the members, and if it is accomplished, it will be reinvested for the benefit of the organization;
- They control their own actions by procedures of internal management, benefiting from a high degree of autonomy;
- Involves a significant level of voluntary participation.

Although their quality of being a matter or international law is not explicitly acknowledged, in conformity with present regulations, the non-governmental organizations embody a legal personality, and in certain limits it contributes to creating the international law, in cooperation with certain intergovernmental organizations from the U.N.O system, thus acknowledging certain competences that are limited in the framework of relations of international law[8].

An argument in favour of considering international non-governmental organizations as a subject for the public international law would be that, as this quality was acknowledged in other (intergovernmental) organizations, not only sovereign states, it should be also acknowledged for non-governmental organizations, as the later will be able to freely exercise its activities, at an international as well as at a national level; until the present, however, the only legal instrument whose regulations are in favour of acknowledging the character of subjects of the international law of these organizations is the Convention on the recognition of the legal personality of international non-governmental organizations, adopted by the Council of Europe, in April 1968.

3. Categories of activities achieved by international non-governmental organizations in the domain of the defence of human rights

Non-governmental organizations have an important contribution regarding the observance of human rights, as they bring valuable information to the bodies of the U.N.O. which are commissioned to solve the issues in this domain, signal the acts that breach the human rights [9] and contribute to promoting and applying the norms that refer to these rights[10]; when they must deal with issues concerning human rights[11], the bodies from the system of the United Nations Organization frequently require the non-governmental organizations with a consultative status to supply information, especially upon the situations at hand [12].

[8] By the Resolution 1996/31, adopted on the 25th of June 1996, the Social and Economic Council of the U.N.O. was pronounced for acknowledging the consultative statute of non-governmental organizations in relation to the United Nations Organization, establishing many applicable principles in the relations between non-governmental organizations and the U.N.O., the manner of establishing consultative relations, the participation conditions of non-governmental organizations to the international conferences of the U.N.O. and to their preparation process, as well as suspension or cancellation of the consultative statute. By this resolution, the non-governmental organizations are acknowledged a certain capacity of international law, in relation with the U.N.O., however they did not acquire a veritable legal statute of an international subject in this respect.

[9] An example of the implication of non-governmental organizations in stating the infringement of human rights is the „Written Declaration" of the International Association against Torture, non-governmental association with a special consultative statute, presented to the Human Rights Commission at the 54th session, from the 17th of March, in which it is stated that the Association wishes to attract the attention of the Commission concerning the obstacles in implementing the Commission regarding the prohibition of torture. The negative aspects presented by the Association come from Spain and the United Nations of America, concluding that, because of the fact that underdeveloped countries, such as the ones presented below, have committed infringements of human rights, the Commission will have to act immediately. As a result, the Association demanded the Commission to denominate a special rapporteur to investigate these situations, as no other way of ensuring the liability of the countries that persisted in breaching he human rights, established by the treaties and conventions ratified existed

[10] In the framework of U.N.O., different control mechanisms within which the non-governmental organizations play a role of major importance were established. Thus, for example, when presenting the reports regarding the observance of human rights, by the state parties, a significant number of non-governmental organizations send the experts that are charged with examining these reports, information regarding the real situation from those countries, which are very useful for them.

[11] At the San Francisco Conference in 1945, when the United Nations Organization was founded, approximately 40 non-governmental organizations representing syndicates, women, ethnic groups and religious groups united their forces in order to impose a common language for the human rights, their lobbying resulting in the adoption of several norms concerning this domain, which were incorporated in the United Union Charter. Thus, in the Preamble of the Charter it is stated: „ the faith in fundamental human rights, in the dignity and value of the human individual, in the equality of rights of both men and women …", and in the art. 1 it is stated that one of the main tasks of U.N.O. is to promote „the respect for human rights and for the fundamental liberties of all the individuals".

[12] In some cases, the information presented to the Economic Council by the non-governmental organizations are based on specific requests which were addressed to them, such as the Resolution of the Social and Economic Council no. 1987/5 from the 26th of May 1967 by which information was demanded referring to the observance of rights contained in the International pact for economic, social and cultural rights.

Decentralized and diverse, they act rapidly upon issues that seem grave for the majority of the inter-governmental organizations, whose activity is, above all, bureaucratic and political.

In the framework of the U.N.O, the relations with the non-governmental organizations are regulated by the resolutions of the Social and Economic Council 288B(X) from 1950 and 1296(XLIX) from 1968.

Together with the expansion of non-governmental organizations interested in human rights the possibility of affirming themselves opened within all the relevant bodies of the United Nations Organizations. Thus, by means of the U.N.O. Conference regarding human rights from 1993, in Viena, the indispensable role of the non-governmental organizations within the protection mechanism of human rights was emphasized; as a result, certain humanitarian non-governmental organizations were also engaged to work together with the U.N.O, for the defence of human rights within the conflicts that exist on the planet[13].

These international organizations also participate, in the activity of specialized institutions in the defence of human rights, by supplying information from the states involved, by informing and involving the public opinion in cases of serious breaches of human rights or by putting pressure on international organizations, for taking certain measures such as: sending special rapporteurs, organizing work groups etc. Moreover, non-governmental organizations frequently elaborate reports parallel with those belonging to the states, in certain issues concerning the observance of human rights, which they present to the international institutions.

There exists an older practice of the cooperation between the United Nations, Council of Europe, Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe and certain non-governmental organizations, as the Council of Europe annually submits to the attention of the Council of the United Nations for Human Rights reports concerning its activity[14].

The Council of Europe had recognized from the year 1952 the importance of non-governmental organizations in certain domains of activity, as well as their contribution to these activities, by accepting to consult the respective organizations on issues that belong to the competence of the Council[15]. In the year 1972, the Committee of Ministers of the Council of Europe adopted the Resolution 72(35), which contains new regulations referring to the relations of the Council with non-governmental organizations, irrespective of the fact that they benefited of a consultative status or not.

International non-governmental organizations with a consultative status are liable to the Council of Europe [16]:

[14] There is a Memorandum of Understanding between the United Nations and the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe, one with the Bureau for Democratic Institutions and Human Rights and, also, many agreements with different organizations. U.N.O. is working with the Bureau for Democratic institutions and Human Rights at several projects, including, for example, founding national institutions in Central Asia and preparation courses, referring to human rights, for those responsible with the monitoring in Kosovo. Similarly, there were different forms of cooperation and exchange of information with the missions of the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe from Bosnia-Herzegovina, Croatia and Kosovo. The United Nations founded, along with the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe, joint human rights offices in Abkhazia, Georgia. All these forms of cooperation developed with the support of international non-governmental organizations, involved in the issue of human rights.

[15] The cooperation regulations between the Council of Europe and the non-governmental organizations are governed by the Resolution of the Committee of Ministers no. (93)38, in art. 2 of this resolution being stated that the consultative state will be guaranteed for the international non-governmental organizations, which are representative in their domain of competence and at an European level. In the present, more than 400 non-governmental organizations have a similar statute within the Council of Europe.

- To supply information, documents or notifications, that the General Secretary may require related to their domain of competence;
- To maximize the advertising of the initiatives taken by the Council of Europe or its achievements, in the domain of their competence;
- To submit every two years to the General Secretary a report within which the following must be identified: their participation to the works of different bodies of the Council of Europe (committees of experts, parliamentary committees etc.), to the manifestations organized by the General Secretary (reunions of general informing, sectorial reunions), to the reunions of groups belonging non-governmental organizations, on sectors of interest, which entertain relations with the corresponding sectors of the General secretary, as well as in the reunions, that were organized and to which the Council of Europe was invited to participate, thus also maintaining the actions performed in view of promoting the activity developed by the Council of Europe.

Non-governmental organizations are getting more and more involved in the activities of international inter-governmental organizations regarding the defence of human rights as representatives of non-governmental organizations participate in the works of these organizations and to the process of issuing certain norms of international law of human rights, by promoting new ideas in the filed or by proposals to adopt norms or amendments.

The involvement of non-governmental organizations in the redaction and adopting of the Statute of International Penal Court, fact which resulted in important consequences upon their direct participation before this court is noticeable Thus, in conformity with article 15 from the Statute of International Penal Court, the Prosecutor must analyse the information received from the part of non-governmental organizations[17].

An important role is played by the international non-governmental organizations before the international jurisdictions from the domain of human rights. Thus, they may be involved in the initiation of certain requests addressed to these courts [18], may support actions in their capacity of plaintiffs before an international jurisdiction, and their representatives may become representatives of the individual plaintiffs, in the litigations in front of the international jurisdictions, or even amici curiae, when they express their opinion upon several serious issues of general interest, regarding a certain cause or presents a report concerning the above-mentioned issues, before the court. These actions are possible, as, when flagrant and systematic breaches of the human rights occur, the international non-governmental organizations are better placed than the individuals in apprehending the competent authorities (national and international), as well as in the preparation and presentation of the communications necessary[19].

By this type of activities, non-governmental have considerably influenced the working methods and even the reasoning of several international courts, such as the European Court of Human Rights. Moreover, the participation of non-governmental organizations such as amici curiae influenced the regulation procedure developed before these courts, thus consolidating the equality of weapons in favour of the plaintiff.

Concerning the jurisdictional activity of the European Court of Human Rights, international non-governmental organizations may develop numerous activities in order to establish infringements on human rights. Thus, in conformity with art. 25 par. 1 from the European Convention of Human Rights, these organizations may file complaints referring the claimed violations of the Constitution, [17] This article already received a practical application, in the month of February 2003, when the non-governmental organization International Federation of Human Rights formally brought, the first case before the International Penal Court. It refers to the situation in the Central-African Republic, where the organization mentioned stated the certain executions, rapes, murders regarding the civil population were performed.

[18] Frequently the plaintiffs are guided by the non-governmental organizations to file complaints, when a right has been breached.

[19] Raluca Miga-Beşteliu, Drept internaţional. Introducere în dreptul internaţional public, Third edition (Bucharest: All Beck, 2003), p.206.

however only if they are the victims of those violations[20]. Moreover, non-governmental organizations may offer consultance or ensure the legal representation for persons who wish to file complaints to the European Court of Human Rights[21].

In the cases heard by the European Union of Human Rights, non-governmental organizations are permitted to submit short files amicus curiae, that ensure the necessary information to the analysis of the issues raised. In the virtue of the Rules of Court, „any person interested, except the applicant", may submit commentaries written on different specific topics. The individuals or groups, must, however, prove that they manifest an interest for the case presented and, similarly, that their intervention has bee done in the interest of a better legal administration[22].

4. Conclusions

Given the above-mentioned, it can be stated that, in the context in which the observance of human rights constitutes one of the most important problems of contemporary life, the role of the international non-governmental organization is becoming more and more important, even existing opinion that these are the „locomotives" in the evolution of the international law of human rights. Of course, not all NGOs will be able to make a significant contribution to human security or will even be interested in engaging with questions of human security.

Pressures from NGOs on state institutions are necessary in order not to limit their activities only in the adoption of laws. Relations between states and NGOs are difficult and deficient, without proper communication, and, although the authorities are open to promote human rights, however changes in attitude and mentality are necessary.

One of the main objectives of the United Nations is strengthening the advocacy role of NGOs in maintaining and supporting democracy, human rights, access to information, freedom of expression and media independence, judicial independence and fight against corruption, professionalization of NGO movement and the development of cooperation with the UN human rights.

Nevertheless, numerous international non-governmental organizations collaborate with the inter-governmental organizations and the international institutions for the defence of human rights, and over 1500 of these organizations have a consultative status in addition to the Social and Economic Council[23], thus contributing to the process of making decisions[24]. The non-governmental organizations are, also, involved in the activity of subsidiary bodies of the Social and Economic Council such as: the Human Rights Commission, Commission for sustainable development, the Commission on the Status of Women and the Subcommittee on Prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities.

The cyclic and unpredictable nature of international aid funding, the conflict with government inherent in addressing political threats to human security, and the costs and difficulties associated with building strong NGO networks are all obstacles to full and effective NGO participation in [20] The majority of complaints referred to the liberty of manifestation, right to association or public assembly.

[21] Non-governmental organizations may also help to elaborate complaints, however rarely file complaints before the court, as they generally appeal to lawyers to perform this task.

[22] Art. 36 par. (2) from the European convention of Human Rights, as amended in the Protocol no. 11, explicitly stipulates, what the intervention of a third party implies: an oral or written intervention form any person interested and who is not required, at the invitation of the President of the Court.

[23]The legal framework for the participation of non-governmental organizations to the works of the Economic and Social Council, is established by the Resolution 1296(XLIV) regarding the dispositions referring to consultations, which can be made in writing or orally, adopted by the Council on the 23rd of May 1968 and reviewed by the Resolution no. 31/1996. The Council acknowledges that these organizations must acquire the possibility to express their point of view, as they possess a special experience and valuable technical knowledge for the activities of the Economic and Social Council.

[24] For example, The Conference regarding the environment from Stockholm, in 1972, occurred subsequent to the pressures exercised upon governments by the non-governmental organizations, in this sense.

human security initiatives. Addressing these barriers will be one task for interested actors like the United Nations and the Commission on Human Security and will require the organization and facilitation of considerable dialogue between NGOs, governments and aid agencies. This will be a worthwhile task for such organizations to undertake, however. Despite the many pressures which NGOs already face on their time, the links which exist between human security and human development, and the connections and resources that NGOs stand to gain from their involvement in human security initiatives will all encourage NGOs to make a full and meaningful commitment to human security

However, we believe that in addition to the work of NGOs, it is necessary that people be more active in protecting their rights, knowing them. One of the solutions consists in heavily promote human rights in schools and also mass media has to draw attention to the problem and inform people how to defend their rights.

CASE-LAW ASPECTS CONCERNING THE REGULATION OF STATES OBLIGATION TO MAKE GOOD THE DAMAGE CAUSED TO INDIVIDUALS, BY INFRINGEMENTS OF EUROPEAN UNION LAW

ROXANA-MARIANA POPESCU[*]

Abstract
The priority principle of EU law in relation to the internal law of the Member States, a principle enshrined by the Court of Justice case-law and the principle of direct effect allow the national court to give full effect to EU law. Breaching the EU law by Member States draws under certain conditions their responsibilty for the breach thereof. Unlike public international law, the constitutive treaties do not contain provisions relating to liability of Member States for breach of EU law. As in other cases, the Court was the one that, over time, has defined a right of redress, which has its foundation in EU law and in the conditions necessary to engage the victims' right to repair.

Keywords: Liability of Member States, EU law, priority principle of EU law, Court of Justice, case-law aspects.

1. Introduction

The priority principle of EU law in relation to national law of Member States, jurisprudentially enshrined by the Court of Justice, and the principle of direct effect allow the national court to provide absolute effect to EU law. The non-compliance with EU law, by Member States, draws, under certain conditions, the states' liability for its breach.

Unlike public international law, the constituent Treaties do not contain provisions relating to the liability of Member States for breaching EU law.

As in other cases, the Court of Justice is the one that, over time, has defined a reparatory law, which is grounded on EU law and on the necessary conditions in order for the right to compensation to be committed, in the victims' benefit. Thus, the Court has supplemented this protection of litigants' rights, by enshrining the principle of state liability for breaching EU law. This principle applies when a Member State fails to transpose or when it incorrectly transposes an EU rule, but also for the breach of EU rules, with or without direct effect.

Next, we shall highlight the main moments in the consecration, by judicial way, of the principle of states obligation to make good damage caused to individuals, by breaches of EU law.

2. Francovich Judgement[1]

The Court of Justice enshrined for the first time, the principle of Member States liability for the breach of EU law in Francovich[2] Judgement, from 1991.

[1] ECJ Judgement of 19 November 1991, Francovich and Bonifaci v. Italy, C-6/90.

[2] Circumstances of the case: Andrea Francovich, part in the main proceedings in Case 6 / 90, was employed to the CDN Elettronica SnC enterprise in Vicenza. From his position, he had received only occasional payments, in advance, of the amounts which were rightfully his, as wages. Consequently, Francovich brought an action before the competent Italian Court, which condemned the accused company to pay a sum of approximately 6 million Italian liras. During the execution phase of the decision, the executor of the Court issued a report finding the debtor's insolvency. Under those circumstances, Andrea Francovich invoked his right to obtain, from the Italian State, the guarantees provided in Directive 80/987 or, alternatively, damages-interests. The Directive invoked has to provide employees a minimum of protection at Community level, in case of insolvency of the employer, subject to more favourable national provisions, regulating, in particular, specific guarantees for payment of wages. The Directive had to be transposed into national law of Member States, no later than October 23, 1983. By the Judgement of February 2, 1989, the ECJ found

By the Ordinance of July 9, 1989, registered at the Court on January 8, 1990, the national Court[3], under article 234[4] TEC, filed an application for a preliminary ruling on the interpretation of the third paragraph of Article 249[5] of the Treaty establishing the European Community and on Council Directive no. 80/987 on the harmonization of Member States laws on the protection of employees in case of insolvency of their employer. Thus, the national Court asked the Luxembourg Court if the Italian Government's liability for failing to transpose a directive, which had caused damage to an Italian citizen, could be committed, on the one hand, and if the individual could require an indemnity[6], from the Member State which had not fulfilled its obligation to transpose the directive, on the other hand.

Regarding the first question, the Court established that the directive had no direct effect[7], therefore people injured in their right, could not invoke before the competent national Court, the Directive provisions against the State.

We consider that the point of view of the Luxembourg Court is interesting for our study, more exactly the point of view regarding the second question of the Italian Court, namely the existence and extent of state liability for damages caused by the infringement of obligations arising from EU law. In its decision, the Court referred to the following aspects: the principle of extra contractual liability of a state; the conditions under which state liability can be committed, the principle of the obligation to compensate and state liability limits.

2.1. The consecration of the principle of extra contractual liability of Member States

We notice, to a careful analysis of the Court's Judgement that the Luxembourg Court starts in its motivation, primarily from highlighting the major principles developed by judicial interpretation. Thus, the Court reiterates that the Treaty establishing the European Economic Community creates its own legal order, integrated in the legal systems of Member States, which is imposed not only to them, but also to nationals of Member States[8]. The Court recalls that national Courts are obliged to apply EU law, to ensure the full effectiveness of EU rules and to protect the that Italy had not fulfilled its obligation to transpose the Directive. For details, see Sergiu Deleanu, Gyula Fabian, Cosmin Flavius Costas, Bogdan Ionita, "Curtea de Justiţie Europeană. Hotărâri comentate", (Editura Wolters Kluwer, Bucureşti, 2007), p. 233.

[6] Emphasis added.

[7] In its argumentation, the Court recalled that the provisions of a Directive may have direct effect only if they are unconditional and sufficiently precise. In this case, the examination of the accomplishment of those criteria was made by determining the beneficiaries and content of the guarantee, as well as the identity of the guarantee debtor. In terms of beneficiaries and content of the guarantee, the Court held that they were sufficiently precise and unconditional. However, regarding the identity of the debtor, the conditions are not achieved, as long as Member States may finance the public funds of the guarantee with exclusively public means, but also they may resort to the employers' contributions. As a result, the Court stated: although the directive provisions are sufficiently precise and unconditional, as for the determination of the beneficiaries of the guarantee, its content does not offer sufficient evidence for individuals to be able to invoke the provisions of a directive before national Courts. In this respect, on the one hand, these provisions do not specify the identity of the guarantee debtor and, on the other hand, the state can not be considered debtor for the sole reason that it has not taken the necessary measures to transpose the directive within the prescribed period.

[8] According to paragraph 31 of the decision: "We recall that the Treaty establishing the EEC has created its own legal system, integrated into the legal systems of Member States and which is imposed to their judicial organs, that the subjects of this legal system are not only the Member States, but also their nationals and that, as the Community law creates obligations for individuals, in the same manner the Community law can also create rights included in their legal heritage; these rights arise not only when they are specifically mentioned in the Treaty, but also under obligations that the Treaty imposes both to individuals, as well as to Member States and Community institutions".

rights that EU law confers on individuals[9]; next, the Court indicates that the effectiveness of Union rules, as well as the protection of rights would be jeopardized if the possibility of obtaining compensation was not recognized to individuals, in the case where their rights from EU law were violated, breach attributable to the state[10]. Moreover, the Court states that the principle of state liability for damage caused to individuals, as result of the infringement of Community law, is inherent in the system of the Treaty[11], and the obligation of Member States to make good such damage is grounded on article 5[12] of the Treaty[13].

In paragraph 37 of the Judgement, it is clearly stated that Community law imposes the principle under which Member States are compelled to repair the damage caused to individuals, by the breach of Community law, attributable to them.

After analyzing the Union Court's reply, we can say that the ground for state liability in this case, is found both in provisions of the Treaty establishing the European Community, as well as in the Court's previous case-law that covers the relation between EU law and national law of Member States, in general and the direct application (together with the direct effect), as well as the application, as a priority, of EU law before national law.

Thus, the principle of state liability was consecrated. This principle is specific to EU law and represents "a right to compensation in the benefit of individuals, allowing, as outlined in the doctrine, the material and financial concretization of Community rule"[14].

2.2. The conditions under which state liability may be committed Point b) of the Judgement intends to identify the conditions under which states can be held liable. According to the Court, while the state liability for damages caused to individuals by infringements of EU law, for which it is responsible, has its legal basis in the EU law itself, the conditions under which a right to compensation arises, depend on the nature of the EU law breach which is at the origin of the damage caused[15]. In this case, when a Member State ignores its obligation under the Treaty, to take all measures necessary in order to achieve the result required by a EU rule, the full effectiveness of that rule requires the granting of a right to compensation, if three conditions[16] are met, namely:

- the directive must create rights in the individuals' patrimony;
- the content of these rights must result from the directive provisions;
- the existence of a causal link between the infringement of any obligation, by the state and the damage caused to the person injured.

The Court considers that these three conditions are sufficient to give rise, in the individuals' benefit, to a right to receive compensation, right that is directly grounded on Community law[17].

[9] In this regard: paragraph 32 of the decision, according to which it should be remembered that, under the constant case-law of the Court, the national judicial bodies are responsible with the application of Community provisions, with ensuring the absolute effectiveness of these rules and with the protection of rights that they confer on individuals.

[10] Paragraph 33: It should be recognized the fact that the very effectiveness of Community rules would be jeopardized and that the protection of rights that they enshrine would be diminished, if individuals were not able to obtain compensation when their rights were breached by failure to comply with Community law, attributable to the State.

[11] Paragraph 35 of the Judgement.

[12] The current art. 4 TFEU. According to this article, Member States shall take all necessary measures to ensure the fulfilment of incumbent obligations, under EU legal rules.

[15] Paragraph 38 of the decision.

[16] These are clearly shown, in paragraph 40 of the decision.

[17] Paragraph 41.

The Judgement covers naturally, only those conditions under which the state is liable before individuals, for failure to implement or for incorrectly implement a directive. Thus, in Francovich Case, the Court's Judgement does not provide answers, but questions such as: may the state liability be committed in cases other than those when the state breaches obligations relating to the transposition of directives? Is the state liable only if it breaches a Union rule which has direct effect, or may its liability be committed also in other EU rules? Given that the conditions required are fulfilled, is the state liability lawfully committed (without checking other elements, such as: guilt, possible causes of removing liability)?

The Luxembourg Court of Justice answered at some of those questions, developing in time an important case-law.

3. Brasserie du pêcheur[18]

Francovich Judgement has the merit to have grounded the principle of European Union Member States obligation to make good damage caused to individuals, by breaches of EU law, but it "has also unleashed an avalanche of studies and analysis that whether noticed the attitude of the Court of Justice or they strongly contested it"[19]. It should also be noted that although the Court gave response to concerns about the protection of individuals' rights, by the proclamation of that principle, Francovich Judgement generated a series of new issues referring on the one hand, to the scope of the principle, and on the other hand, to the general conditions for committing liability. According to the General Attorney, Giuseppe Tesauro, the issue of state liability for infringements of Community law, very important both in terms of principles and consequences that a comprehensive and general definition of such liability might have for Member States, is complex and certainly has some traps, as demonstrated in the rich doctrinal debate developed in this respect, in recent years[20].

A key decision to ground the principle of Member States obligation to make good for damage caused to individuals, by the breach of EU law, was ruled in the Brasserie du Pêcheur Case [21]. In that case, since the Luxembourg Court had already established that the Member State was responsible for the infringement of EU law, Brasserie requested German courts to cover the prejudice suffered, meaning the profit losses caused by the restrictive provisions of German law. The national court, Bundesgerichtshof, ruled that, under the German law for Government's liability, the state did not have to be held liable for the inaction of the state legislative power, especially since it did not contain provisions covering the protection of rights of a third party. In this case, estimating that German law does not provide any basis for allowing a repair of the damage caused to the applicant, the German court sent to the Luxembourg Court a request for a preliminary ruling to [20] Conclusions presented at the meeting of November 28, 1995.

[21] Circumstances of the case: Brasserie du pêcheur SA, a French brewery based at Schiltigheim (Alsace), was forced to discontinue exports of beer to Germany in late 1981 on the grounds that the beer it produced did not comply with the "purity" requirement of the Biersteuergesetz ("BStG"). Further controls on retailers, made by the German authorities, who contested the compliance of the beer quality with the law, determined the only German importer of Brasserie du pêcheur not to renew the distribution contract. By Judgement of 12 March 1983, the Court held that the prohibition on marketing beers imported from other Member States, considered inconsistent with BStG, was incompatible with Article 30 EC. Brasserie du pêcheur brought an action against the Federal Republic of Germany for reparation of the loss suffered by it as a result of that import restriction between 1981 and 1987, seeking damages in the sum of DM 1.8 million, representing only a fraction of the loss actually incurred. The action being dismissed by lower courts, Brasserie du Pêcheur maintained the same conclusions in the appeal before the Bundesgerichtshof. As the infringement mentioned must be considered as an omission of the legislative body, because it did not change BStG in accordance with Community law, the Bundesgerichtshof points out that the damage reparation is provided in the Federal Republic of Germany, by the German Civil Code provisions – "BGB" and the Basic Law (Grundgesetz).

determine if the principle of state liability for damage caused to individuals, by the breach of EU law, damage attributable to the state, as shown in Francovich Judgement, applies also to the litigation brought before that court. More specifically, the Court was asked to answer the following questions:

- does the principle of EU law, according to which Member States are obliged to pay compensation for damage suffered by an individual as a result of infringements of Community law attributable to the state also apply where such an infringement consists of a failure to adapt a national parliamentary statute to the higher-ranking rules of Community law?;

- may the national legal system provide that any entitlement to compensation is to be subject to the same limitations as those applying where a national statute breaches higher-ranking national law, for example, for where an ordinary Federal law breaches the Grundgesetz of the Federal Republic of Germany?

- may the national legal system provide that entitlement to compensation is to be conditional on fault (intent or negligence), on the part of the organs of the State responsible for the failure to adapt the legislation?

- if the answer to the first question is affirmative and the answer to the second question is negative:

a) may liability to pay compensation, under the national legal system, be limited to the reparation of damage done to specific individual legal interests, for example property, or does it require full compensation for all financial losses, including lost profits?

b) does the obligation to pay compensation also require the reparation of the damage already incurred before it was held in judgement of the Luxembourg Court of March 12, 1987 (C-178/84) that article 10 of the German Biersteuergesetz breached higher-ranking Community law?

In other words, the Court had to determine if the State had any obligation to make good the damage and, if so, under what conditions and for which types of damage, towards individuals who had suffered prejudices due to the application of national laws contrary to EU law.

First, the Court had to determine if it was necessary, in that case, to define the obligation to make good damages caused by the application of a national law contrary to rules of the Union, given the fact that in Francovich Judgement, the Court had stated that the failure to transpose a directive, under certain conditions, was committing the state liability.

Secondly, it was necessary to determine if, subject to the reservation of limits identified by the Court, the conditions for liability were the proper conditions of each national legal order or if EU law required, at least, the sufficient substantive conditions in order for the defaulting Member State to be required to make good the damage caused. Also, in terms of causation, it was necessary to assess if, by its nature, the infringed Union provision allowed the individual to directly defend his rights in order to eliminate the already established illegality regarding the substance.

Finally, it was necessary to bring into discussion the procedural conditions regulating the right to compensation, and the criteria for evaluating the damage dimension.

What has the Brasserie du Pêcheur Judgement brought new? First, through this decision, the Court clarifies the principle of Member States obligation to make good for damage caused to individuals, by the breach of EU law and, on the other hand, the extension of the mentioned principle scope is found[22]. Thus, as for the clarification of the principle, we notice that the Judgement contains a list of general conditions to be fulfilled in order for the obligation of the defaulting state to be committed, namely:

- the breached rule of law must confer subjective rights on individuals;
- the breach must be sufficiently serious;
- there must be a causal link between the breach of obligation and the damage suffered.

In addition to this list, we find also the clarification of these conditions and the necessary tools for their adequate application. If, as for the first[23] and third condition, things are clear, with no difficulty whatsoever in their application, in the case of the second condition, its application (check) has encountered some difficulties. Why? Because we believe that it is quite difficult to give an objective answer on the following two questions: "what is a sufficiently serious breach"? and where begins the limit when the breach becomes sufficiently serious? This time too, the Court attempts and for the moment also manages to present a series of tools, which could be used to provide an accurate assessment of the gravity of EU law infringement, by the respective Member State. In this respect, according to the Court, the concrete analysis of each case must take into account the following factors[24]:

[22] Paul Craig, Gráinne de Burca,"EU Law. Texts and Cases" (Oxford University Press, London, 2003), p. 330.

- the degree of clarity and precision of the rule infringed;
- the extent of discretion that the rule infringed leaves to the national authorities;
- the intentional or culpable character of the rule infringed;
- the excusable or inexcusable character of any possible error of law;
- the extent to which the Community institutions attitude contributed to the infringement by the Member State.

And yet, what is a breach of EU law, given the tools provided by the Court? For example, a breach of EU law is manifest, meaning serious enough, if the state persists to infringe EU law, although there is a decision establishing this fact or a constant case-law of the Court, which establishes that the respective conduct represents a breach of EU law.

With regard to the extent of the principle scope, it follows from the content of the decision that the principle is applicable, regardless of the state body that has breached EU law.

Compared with Francovich Judgement, where the breach of EU law was represented by the failure to transpose a directive, in the Brasserie du pêcheur case, there was an infringement resulting from the fact that the national law was contrary to EU law.

4. Köbler[25]

Although the Brasserie du pêcheur Judgement brought additions and clarifications in the matter of EU Member States liability for breaching EU law, another aspect remained, however, unanswered, namely: does the Member States liability for acts of the judicial authorities represent grounds for committing liability? This issue appears because, from the content of the Brasserie Judgement, one can infer (interpret) that the principle is also applicable in the situation where the EU infringement is committed by a national Court. However, this interpretation does not result explicitly from the ruling of the Court. Thus, seven years after the ruling in Brasserie du pêcheur case, this aspect was also clarified in the decision to Köbler case[26].

[23] What is, however, "to create subjective rights in the individuals' patrimony?" How can it be checked, in practice, if a rule meets this condition? In the Brasserie du pêcheur case, the Court of Justice did not provide any definition, but only noted that in that case, the condition was fulfilled.

[25] ECJ Judgement of 30 September 2003, Gerhard Köbler c. / Republik Österreich, C-224/01.

[26] Circumstances of the case: Professor Gerhard Köbler had worked at various universities in Germany and Austria. In 1996, he requested the Administrative Court (Verwaltungsgerichtshof) to compel the employer to grant him an age addition, addition provided in Austrian law and taken into account when calculating the pension. Köbler showed that even though he had not worked 15 years at an Austrian university, he was meeting that condition of length of service, taking into account the years when he had been professor at other universities in Member States of the Community. He had demonstrated that it was meeting that condition of service, taking into account the years of activity from other universities in the Community. Mr. Köbler also claimed that disregarding the period in which he had been professor at other universities in the Community, constituted indirect discrimination contrary to Article 39 of the Treaty and Council Regulation no. 1612/68 on the free movement of workers within the Community. The Austrian Administrative Court, by the closure of 22 October 1997, required a preliminary ruling asking the ECJ if Article 48 TEC could be interpreted in the next situation: if when calculating the length of service, the seniority obtained in other European countries should be also included.

In this case, Köbler sued the Austrian state for compensation, showing that the Austrian Administrative Court had infringed EU law, causing him damage by not paying the proper addition based on seniority. The Austrian state defended itself arguing that the Administrative Court decision had not breached EU law, since the purpose of such bonus was the reward of employees' loyalty who had been working at least 15 years continuously, serving the same employer, meaning the Austrian state[27].

However, Austria's representatives argued that the state obligation to offer compensations could not be grounded on an ultimate ruling (as it was the Austrian Administrative Court ruling). In this dispute, the Court that had to rule on Mr. Köbler's claims, considered necessary to receive further clarification of the Luxembourg Court, in order to solve the case, which is why it addressed several questions to the Luxembourg Court of Justice[28], of which, relevant to our analysis, is the next: "does the Court case-law according to which the State liability is committed in case of Community law infringement, regardless of the Member State body which is being held liable for this breach (especially Brasserie du Pêcheur joined decisions) apply also if the alleged behaviour of the body, contrary to Community law stems from a decision of the Supreme Court of a Member State, in this case of Verwaltungsgerichtshof?"[29]

The Luxembourg Court gave to this question, a very clear answer, namely: the principle according to which Member States are obliged to make good damage caused to individuals, by infringements of Community law for which they are responsible is also applicable when the alleged infringement stems from a decision of a court adjudicating at last instance. That principle, inherent in the system of the Treaty, applies to any case in which a Member State breaches Community law, whichever is the authority of the Member State whose act or omission was responsible for the breach. It is for the legal system of each Member State to designate the court competent to adjudicate on disputes relating to such reparation. Subject to the reservation that it is for the Member States to ensure in each case that those rights are effectively protected, it is not for the Court to become involved in resolving questions of jurisdiction to which the classification of certain legal situations based on Community law may give rise in the national judicial system"[30].

In other words, the Court held that, given the "specificity of the judicial service" and the legitimate requirements of security in legal relations, the State liability for damage caused to individuals, by infringements of EU law in cases where the infringement resulted from a Court decision, was governed by the same conditions as any other infringement of EU law, by the state. Thus, the ruling "puts the judicial grounds for the developing of the law of Member States liability for infringements of Community law"[31], started by Francovich ECJ Judgement.

Köbler Judgement too represents only a stage in the evolution of the principle of Member States liability for damage caused to individuals, by infringements of EU law.

5. Traghetti del Mediterranea[32]

Three years after the ruling in Köbler case, on June 13, 2006, the European Court of Justice issued a new decision, which has the merit of having cleared conditions under which a Member State is liable for damage caused to individuals by infringements of EU law, as a result of decisions of national Courts adjudicating at last instance.

[32] ECJ Judgement, 13 June 2006, Traghetti del Mediterraneo SpA v. / Repubblica Italiana, C-173/03.

In the Traghetti del Mediterraneo[33] case, the Geneva Courthouse asked the Luxembourg Court to answer the following questions: does EU law, in particular principles set out by the Court in Köbler case, oppose to a national regulation, in this case the Italian law, which on the one hand, excludes any Member State responsibility for damage caused to individuals by infringements of EU law, by a national Court adjudicating at last instance, the breach resulting from the misinterpretation of EU law or from the incorrect assessment of facts or evidence and, on the other hand, is this kind of liability limited only to cases of intent or serious negligence of the Court.

Starting from the idea according to which excluding the possibility that the State responsibility would be committed when the EU law infringement resulted from the interpretation of a Union provision or incorrect assessment of facts or evidence, would prejudice the effectiveness of the liability established by Köbler decision, the Court answered both questions, as it follows[34]:

- Community law makes inapplicable the national legislation which excludes State liability, in general, for any damage caused to individuals by infringements of Community law, caused by a Court of last instance, when the breach is the result of a misinterpretation of a Community rule or an incorrect assessment of facts and evidence;
- Community law makes inapplicable the national legislation which limits such liability solely to cases of intentional fault or serious negligence by the Court, if such a restriction leads to the removal of state liability in other cases where a manifest breach of the applicable rule was committed.

6. Kapferer[35]

Remaining loyal to the principle of Member States responsibility for damage caused to individuals by infringements of EU law, the Luxembourg Court of Justice adjudicates again, in 2006, and the decision is part of the post-Köbler evolution of the principle mentioned.

In this respect, we bring to the forefront of attention the Kapferer[36] Judgement. In this case, the Court of Appeal (Landesgericht Innsbruck) filed a request for preliminary ruling. One of the questions was related to the fact if the national Court had, and if so, under what conditions, the [33] Circumstances of the case: in 1981, the shipping company Traghetti del Mediterraneo ("TDM") sued a rival company, Tirrenia di Navigazione. TDM wanted to obtain compensation for damage caused by the competitors because of practicing a low tariff policy on routes between Italy and Sardinia, respectively, Sicily, policy made possible by benefiting of public subsidies. TDM claimed that the granting of such public subsidies was an act of unfair competition, being prohibited by the Treaty establishing the European Community. TDM's action was dismissed, in turn, both at first instance, as well as on appeal and recourse. Considering that the judgement of the Court of Appeal was based on an incorrect interpretation of the provisions of Community law, TDM, company that, meanwhile, went into liquidation, sued the Italian state, before the Genoa Court. TDM requested the Court, the reparation of damages that the company had suffered because of the misinterpretation of the Court of Appeal. TDM also wanted to be demonstrated that the mentioned Court had infringed the Community law, by not complying with its obligation of asking ECJ for a preliminary ruling.

[35] ECJ Judgement, on 16 March 2006, Rosmarie Kapferer v. / Schlank & Schick GmbH, C-234/04.

[36] Circumstances of the case: as a consumer, residing in Tirol (Austria), Ms. Kapferer received from Schlank & Schick company (company established in Germany), a promotional material by which she was announced that she could win a prize of 3906,1 €. Receiving the award was subject to an order-test without, however, involving any commitment. Ms. Kapferer sent the order form to Schlank & Schick, but it was not possible to determine whether, in fact, she had ordered something on that occasion. By not having received the prize she thought she had won, Ms Kapferer brought an action against Schlank & Schick, before Bezirksgericht Hall in Tirol (the Austrian Court), seeking payment of € 3906.1, plus interest. Schlank & Schick claimed, under Regulation no. 44/2001 on case-law, recognition and enforcement of judgements in civil and commercial matters, that the Austrian Court had no jurisdiction, as defined in the Regulation, to hear the case. Bezirksgericht Hall in Tirol dismissed the application. Under those circumstances, Ms. Kapferer brought the case before the Landesgericht Innsbruck. Schlank & Schick did not appeal the first instance judgement, so in that respect, the judgement was final.

obligation to reopen a case and to invalidate a final and irrevocable decision contrary to EU law regarding the international case-law.

Starting from the idea that the principle of res judicata is recognized both in the legal systems of EU Member States and in the European Union, the Court stated that, in order to ensure the stability of legal relations and the proper administration of justice, it was important that Court decisions which would become final after having exhausted all appeals or after the expiry of their exercise periods, could not be brought again in discussion[37].

Thus, according to the Court, the answer to the question formulated by the Court of Appeal is negative, meaning that the principle of cooperation, provided by article 4 TFEU does not compel a national Court not to apply its own rules of procedure, in order to review and repeal a final and irrevocable decision contrary to Community law[38].

7. Conclusions

The principle of obligation of Member States of the European Union to make good the damage caused to individuals by infringements of EU law is one of the fundamental principles ensuring the full effectiveness of EU law.

The consecration of this principle is one of the most significant developments of the case-law, along with other principles, such as the direct effect and the priority of EU law in relation to national law.

Without the recognition of this principle, the direct effect of EU law would have probably been only partially effective for the exploitation of the legal rights conferred on individuals, by EU rules.

It should be noted that the affirmation of the principle of states responsibility for damage caused to individuals was evolutionary, if we consider the extension scope, starting from acts of the executive to all State authorities, whichever is their function, using, however, the same argument and logical line from Francovich Judgement and from other judgements fundamental for the shaping of EU law, as autonomous legal order.

In Brasserie du pêcheur Judgement, the Court held that the principle of state responsibility, being inherent in the system of the Treaty, was valid for any breach of EU law, whichever was the national body whose act or omission was responsible for the breach[39]. By this statement, the Court no longer acts only under the EU Treaty system, but also under the mandatory principle of the uniform application of Community law and of the useful comparison with state responsibility in international law[40].

THE ROLE OF THE EUROPEAN UNION CHARTER OF FUNDAMENTAL RIGHTS IN THE NEW EUROPEAN CONTEXT

OANA-MIHAELA SALOMIA*

Abstract

The Charter of fundamental rights of the European Union was proclaimed by the European Commission, the European Parliament, and the Council of the European Union at the European Council held at Nice on the 7 December 2000, was modified on 12 December 2007 at Strasbourg, and, today, according to article 6 in the Treaty on European Union, the Charter gained the juridical value of an constitutive European treaty.

The way it has been conceived, the content of the Charter reflects the Union's desire for the autonomy of the juridical order.

The Charter clearly states the fact that it solely seeks to protect the fundamental rights of the individuals with regard to acts undertaken by the EU institutions and by the member states in applying of the Union treaties. A protocol to Lisbon Treaty introduces specific measures for the United Kingdom and Poland seeking to establish national exceptions to the application of the Charter.

The new treaty provides a new legal basis for accessing of the Union to the European Convention on the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms.

Keywords: autonomy, rights, courts, institutions, European Convention.

1. Introduction:

The protection of the human rights at the European Communities and European Union level has been increased in the same time and in a complementary way with the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms and the case-law of the European Court of Human Rights.

The Cologne European Council (3-4 June 1999) entrusted the task of drafting the Charter to a Convention and she is is the end-result of a special procedure, which is without precedent in the history of the European Union and may be summarized as follows:

the Convention held its constituent meeting in December 1999*)* and adopted the draft on 2 October 2000, the Biarritz European Council (13-14 October 2000) unanimously approved the draft and forwarded it to the European Parliament and the Commission, the European Parliament gave its agreement on 14 November 2000 and the Commission on 6 December 2000, the Presidents of the European Parliament, the Council and the Commission signed and proclaimed the Charter on behalf of their institutions on 7 December 2000 in Nice[1].

The Nice European Council decided to consider the question of the Charter's legal status during the general debate on the future of the European Union, which was initiated on 1 January 2001. The Lisbon Treaty guarantee the enforcement of the Charter of Fundamental Rights, which are legally binding not only on the Union and its institutions, but also on the Member States as regards the implementation of Union law.

The European Union Charter of Fundamental Rights sets out in a single text, for the first time in the European Union's history, the whole range of civil, political, economic and social rights of European citizens and all persons resident in the EU.

They are based, in particular, on the fundamental rights and freedoms recognized by the European Convention on Human Rights, the constitutional traditions of the EU Member States (see the case of the European Court of Justice - Internationale Handelsgesellschaft, 11/70), the Council of Europe's Social Charter, the Community Charter of Fundamental Social Rights of Workers and other international conventions to which the European Union or its Member States are parties[2].

2. Content

In the doctrine it was sustained the idea that "the purpose of the Charter was that to emphasize the importance of the fundamental rights and their content in a easy way of understanding for the European citizens, in a critical moment, when the European construction was facing with a serious democratic deficit[3], obtaining thus, in our opinion, a more revealing nature than innovative*;* we are already mentioned that some of the rights of the Charter have been consecrated and guaranteed by the primary and secondary community law and by case-law of the European Court of Justice.

The Charter lists all the fundamental rights under six major chapters: Dignity, Freedom, Equality, Solidarity, Citizenship and Justice, in the light of the social and economic European Union priorities and in the respect of the Union approach values. The Preamble of the Charter sets the person in the core of European actions, affirms the European citizenship and the establishment of the area of freedom, security and justice.

Thus, being the result of an original procedure of elaboration, the Charter also confirms the fact that the EU started an unprecedented renewal process of the human rights protection4.

At present, the article 6 of the European Union Treaty, mention that "the Union recognizes the rights, freedoms and principles set out in the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union of 7 December 2000, as adapted at Strasbourg, on 12 December 2007, which shall have the same legal value as the Treaties". So, the Charter is compulsory for all 27 Member States, with some exceptions[5].

The Charter will be modified in the same way as the treaties, in accordance with the procedure stated in the new article 48: "The Treaties may be amended in accordance with an ordinary revision procedure. They may also be amended in accordance with simplified revision procedures".

Also, the Charter will get the same features as the treaty's provisions in connection with the national law: priority/preeminence, direct effect (which will not apply to all treaty's provisions), immediate applicability, direct applicability. We consider that the Charter's provisions must get the direct effect in order to assure the effectiveness and the respect of the fundamental rights, because the principle of direct effect enables individuals to immediately invoke an European provision before a national or European Court of Justice[6]. The direct effect principle therefore ensures the application and effectiveness of European law in the Member States. When a Member State does not respect fundamental rights when implementing Union law[7], the Commission, as guardian of the Treaties, has powers of its own to try to put an end to the infringement and may, if necessary, take the matter to the Court of Justice (action for failure to fulfill an obligation). So, in accordance with the Charter's provisions, Member States are bound by the Charter only when they are implementing Union law.

The direct effect of European law is, along with the principle of precendence a fundamental principle of European law. It was enshrined by the Court of Justice of the European Union. It enables individuals to immediately invoke European law before courts, independent of whether national law test exist.

However, the European Court of Justice defined several conditions in order for a European legal act to be immediately applicable. In addition, the direct effect may only relate to relations between an individual and a Member State or be extended to relations between individuals. The article 51 of the Charter state, in this view, that "the provisions of this Charter are addressed to the Member States only when they are implementing Union law"; it is a mention "more accurate and rigorous"[8] than the judgment of the European Court which determines the respect of the European law only when the Member States operate within the community law.[9]

In its Communication of 19 October 2010 on a Strategy for the effective implementation of the Charter of Fundamental Rights by the European Union, the Commission committed itself to strengthening the "fundamental rights culture" (a innovative concept, in our opinion) at all stages of the procedure leading to the adoption of legislation and other acts.

The Commission will check [10] the respect of the fundamental rights at the moment of the elaboration of its legislative proposal. Non-legislative measures adopted by the Commission, such as decisions, are also subject to checks on their compatibility with the Charter during drafting, even if there is no impact assessment. The impact assessments that accompany Commission proposals examine the impact of the proposal on fundamental rights when such an assessment is relevant. After the impact assessment, when the draft legislative proposal (or delegated/implementing act) is prepared, the Commission will check its legality, and in particular its compatibility with the Charter. The Explanatory Memorandums accompanying sensitive proposals will be reinforced by a summary of all the fundamental rights aspects contained in the impact assessment and the legislative proposal.

We consider that the Charter has an important external feature and the external action of the Union must take into account their provisions. Furthermore the title of Charter - "of the European Union" and not of the Union's institutions indicates its external dimension, which reaffirms the rights as they result „from the constitutional traditions and international obligations common to the Member States"; also, the Charter isn't addressed only to the European citizens, but also to the citizens of the third countries (article 15) or to all persons (article 2). In the context, the respect of the fundamental rights will be mandatory for the candidates or potential candidates States for the European Union accession (see the accession of Turkey).

The respect of the Charter will represent an important element within the external relations of the Union with the third countries, in particular within the development cooperation and the humanitarian aid. Every international treaty which will be concluded by the Union must be

[10] "Fundamental Rights "Check-List":
1. What fundamental rights are affected? 2. Are the rights in question absolute rights (which may not be subject to limitations, examples being human dignity and the ban on torture)? 3. What is the impact of the various policy options under consideration on fundamental rights? Is the impact beneficial (promotion of fundamental rights) or negative (limitation of fundamental rights)? 4. Do the options have both a beneficial and a negative impact, depending on the fundamental rights concerned (for example, a negative impact on freedom of expression and beneficial one on intellectual property)? 5. Would any limitation of fundamental rights be formulated in a clear and predictable manner? 6. Would any limitation of fundamental rights: - be necessary to achieve an objective of general interest or to protect the rights and freedoms of others (which)? - be proportionate to the desired aim? - preserve the essence of the fundamental rights concerned?"

compatible with the Charter, as a treaty of the Union (article 218 of the Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union), and it will be interpreted in accordance with their provisions. Since 90's all agreements on trade or cooperation with non-European Union countries contain a clause stipulating that human rights - the conditionality clause. There are now more than 120 such agreements and the most comprehensive is the Cotonou Agreement – the trade and aid pact which links the European Union with 79 countries in Africa, the Caribbean and Pacific (the ACP group). If any ACP country fails to respect human rights, European Union trade concessions can be suspended and aid programs curtailed. The European Union sees democratic political structures as a precondition for reducing poverty – the main objective of its overseas development policy and it applies the same principles to other partner countries[11]. So, this human rights clause's can facilitate the respect of these rights or can impose that the third countries should comply with them.

We consider that the Charter will activate the European Union Agency for Fundamental Rights, an advisory body of the European Union, which was established in 2007 by a legal act of the European Union[12]. This Agency helps to ensure that fundamental rights of people living in the EU are protected. It does this by collecting evidence about the situation of fundamental rights across the European Union and providing advice, based on evidence, about how to improve the situation. The European Union Agency for Fundamental Rights also informs people about their fundamental rights. In doing so, it helps to make fundamental rights a reality for everyone in the European Union. The Agency should refer in its work to fundamental rights within the meaning of article 6(2) of the Treaty on European Union, including the European Convention on Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms, and as reflected in particular in the Charter of Fundamental Rights, bearing in mind its status and the accompanying explanations. It considers that the close connection to the Charter should be reflected in the name of the Agency.

Another important European institution - The European Parliament appreciated the new statute of Charter in its Resolution of 14 January 2009 on the situation of fundamental rights in the European Union 2004-2008, which mentions that "the Charter constitutes a common basis of minimum rights, and the Member States cannot use the argument that the Charter would provide a lower level of protection of certain rights than the safeguards offered under their own constitutions as a pretext for watering down those safeguards". This Resolution welcomes article 53 of the Charter, which will enable the European Court of Justice to develop its case-law on fundamental rights, thereby giving them a basis in law which is vitally important in the context of the development of European Union law and stresses that the judiciary in the Member States have a vital role to play in the enforcement of human rights; urges the Member States to introduce a system of continuous training for national judges on systems for the protection of fundamental rights.

The Charter has also an important role in accessing of the European Union to the European Convention on Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms in accordance with the article 6 of the Lisbon Treaty (European Union Treaty), which statues that "The Union shall accede to the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms. Such accession shall not affect the Union's competences as defined in the Treaties". Also, the European Parliament welcomes, in its Resolution of 14 January 2009, "the prospect of the Union acceding to the European Convention, even if that accession does not bring about fundamental changes, given that "when questions relating to the rights and freedoms enshrined in the Convention are raised before the Court of Justice of the European Communities, the latter treats the European Convention as forming a genuine part of the European Union's legal system".

This accession will assure "a increased coherence of the human rights protection in Europe, because the European Court of the Human Rights could guarantee the harmony between the Convention and the Charter, checking the interpretation of the Convention by the judge of Luxembourg when apply the Charter"[13]; this value judgment imposes an analysis on the role of the two Courts in the field of human rights.

The Charter relaunched the idea of the accession to the Convention which had a specifically evolution at the level of the Council of Europe and the European Communities. The Court of Luxembourg opinion's – 2/1994[14] stated that the European Union has been not prepared, at that moment, for accessing, because the "accession to the Convention would, however, entail a substantial change in the present Community system for the protection of human rights in that it would entail the entry of the Community into a distinct international institutional system as well as integration of all the provisions of the Convention into the Community legal order. Such a modification of the system for the protection of human rights in the Community, with equally fundamental institutional implications for the Community and for the Member States, would be of constitutional significance and would therefore be such as to go beyond" the treaty's provisions (article 235).

At present, the European Convention on Human Rights is not directly bound on European Union institutions, but it will be once the process of accession to the Convention will be finalized; all Member States of the Union are directly bound by the Convention. Therefore, all proposals for legal acts of the Union that need to be applied by Member States must fully respect the Convention.

We mentioned already that many of the rights contained in the Charter correspond to rights guaranteed by the Convention, but it also protects certain rights that are not covered by the European Convention. The Charter precises that "the rights, freedoms and principles in the Charter shall be interpreted in accordance with the general provisions in Title VII of the Charter governing its interpretation and application and with due regard to the explanations referred to in the Charter, that set out the sources of those provisions".

Furthermore the Court of Strasbourg stated, in its case-law, the Charter as external source. For example, the article 9 of the Charter, which guarantees the right to marry ("The right to marry and the right to found a family shall be guaranteed in accordance with the national laws governing the exercise of these rights") "departs, no doubt deliberately, from the wording of Article 12 of the Convention in removing the reference to men and women"[15]. Or a dissenting opinion of a judge of the Court of Strasbourg[16] stated that it is obvious that the premise of the debate on genetic safeguards in a number of recent conventions and the prohibition on the reproductive cloning of "human beings" in the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union (Article 3 § 2, final sub-paragraph) is that the protection of life extends to the initial phase of human life. In conformity with this dissenting opinion, the article 2 applies to human beings even before they are born, an interpretation which seems to me to be consistent with the approach of the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union, and since France does not afford sufficient protection to the foetus against the negligent acts of third parties, "there has been a violation of Article 2 of the Convention". "As regards the specific measures necessary to discharge that positive obligation, that is a matter for the respondent State, which should either take strict disciplinary measures or afford the protection of the criminal law (against unintentional homicide)".

For that purpose, the Court draws inspiration from the constitutional traditions common to the Member States and from the guidelines supplied by international treaties for the protection of human rights on which the Member States have collaborated or of which they are signatories. In that regard, the Court has stated that the Convention has special significance (see, in particular, the judgment in Case C-260/89 ERT. Respect for human rights is therefore a condition of the lawfulness of Community acts".

2. There shall be no interference by a public authority with the exercise of this right except such as is in accordance with the law and is necessary in a democratic society in the interests of national security, public safety or the economic well-being of the country, for the prevention of disorder or crime, for the protection of health or morals, or for the protection of the rights and freedoms of others".

On the other hand, the judge of Luxembourg interpreted the community law in the light of the Charter's provisions, before acquiring the compulsory statute; for example, in the case C-275/06, when the community judge outlined the necessity to assure a balance between the various fundamental rights guaranteed by the community judicial order[17].

3. Conclusions

In conclusion, we consider that the Charter will get an important role in the new European Union context and development, at internal and international level. The Union European action must be above reproach when it comes to fundamental rights and the Charter must serve as compass for the Union's policies and their implementation by the Member States. So, the European Union institutions and Member States are obliged to respect the rights, observe the principles and promote the application of the Charter in accordance with their respective powers and respecting the limits of the powers of the Union as conferred on it by the Treaties.

This role of the Charter could be analyzed in the context of the actual procedure of the Union accession to the European Convention on Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms, because their provisions will be interpreted by the European Court on the Human Rights. Also, we consider that it is important and useful to elaborate a research on the application of the Charter's provisions by the nationals courts.

CONSIDERATIONS ON THE EXISTENCE OF DISCRIMINATION IN GRANTING THE STATE PENSIONS

MĂDĂLINA TOMESCU*

Abstract
Social protection is a way that respects human dignity. This is because each citizen is a part of society and he contributes to its development. In return, the society gives to him a social protection, materialized in social services including the pension he received after a full contribution stage.
This article attempts to demonstrate that the current public pension system violates the principle contributiveness by establishing the government's pension point value and application of discrimination in the way of granting the state pensions.

Keywords*: human dignity, pension, discrimination, pension public system, the right to pension.*

Introduction

The issue of calling into question the existence of discrimination in the field of pensions by the State.

Pension rights are a very important constitutional right. Throughout our active life, all of us contribute (without having the possibility of option), to establish the State social insurance budget. Thanks to this contribution we have at the age of retirement, sometimes earlier, the advantage of the right of property on a public pension. This is a form of respect for human dignity, but also a form of from the society for all our contribution to its development.

Therefore, political decisions should have to respect the seniors, without breaking their dignity. Ensuring a decent life and the financial independence of these categories of persons should be an important aim of each Government.

Unfortunately, the Romanian system for public pensions, confirms a lot of discrimination based on various criteria. All these discrimination are the root of much dissatisfaction of the current retirees. Therefore, I decided to examine at least a part of this discrimination with the hope that I will warn the Government to remove them.

1.HUMAN DIGNITY

The 20th century was witness to propagating the idea of democracy from the political class towards the most of the domains of social life. The belief that people are equals in dignity and rights was confirmed by the institutions of mass societies, especially by the diversion industry that develops the ordinary person's ability of placing itself instead of others and watching the life as they would watch.

Dignity represented from 1948 an often treated subject, situated between theory and practice, sometimes with sympathy, other times disdainfully.

Human dignity is guaranteed by the two important principles of international law that governs the object of human rights, equality and undiscrimination. Those principles postulate the right to exercise all the established rights and the ensuring of protection to every person when facing the possible abuses of the authorities. On the contrary, the unequality and discriminationare a negation of fundamental rights and liberties of the human person. "If discrimination and its incontestably the most flagrant manifestation- the rasism- continue, it is shown in a ONU document, we will not hope to to build up an international society founded on human being's dignity and value". Or, this object is connected with the Nations' purposes and its constitutive act satates this triptych : equality, undiscrimination, dignity- in its many articles. The peoples from United Nations- shown in the second line from the preamble of the Chart- declare themselves decided to be reaffirmed "a) the belief in fundamental human rights, in dignity and value of human person, in equal rights of men and women as well as of large and small nations". Under Art.13, The General Meeting is authorized to initiate studies and to recommend in order to "b) promote human rights achievement and fundamental liberty for all, without discrimination of race, sex, language or religion". The principle of undiscrimination is enunciated in art.55 point c) and 76 point c).[1]

Regarding the definition of the concept of human dignity, this realised mostly approaching the fundamental human values, as well as through the discovery of the rapport between dignity and the right to a decent life.

The dignity shows the value, the honesty, the moral merits, the degree of appreciation as well as the achieved rank by a person in society. In the Christian teaching, human dignity in a divine gift, that irrespectue of the conditions in which the individual lives, he has the God's image as an aexample. Within society we understand dignity as the self-sufficincy and freedom of thinking and also the individual's behaviour[2].

The human dignity considered as fundamental and the sum of all the rights, it has been defined as the sum of all the human values and of the respect towards the individual, characteristics which man receives from the moment he is born and lasts tilll after his death. It is not and it cannot be considered an object irrespective of race, origin, etc. In the presence of "human dignity" as a fundamental right of freedom of the press and the right o f liberty itself, the propety rights, to life, the right of expressing opinions, of religious believes, the right to a decent life, the right to correspondence and all the pther rights are built on human dignity, the corner stone of the civilisation and the entire society[3]. Not by chance, the dignity is considered a right that protects the individual and the image of the individual even after a person passed the limit between life and death.

Also, it can be said that the human dignity constitutes the keystone that puts together the right to exist, the right liberty and the social right of the community that are mentioned in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. Thus we find in this document affirmations according to whivh the human being is unique, irreplaceable, meant to a transcedent life, and not just a unity in a social entity. It has to be mentioned that the Universal Declaration of Human rights from 1948 recognises not only the individual rights of the human being, but the rights witih various human collectivities. The definition of the person as a being in communion, as a solidary entity, loving the neighbours, determines us not to dissociate the human rights by its duties or responsibilities.

So, the formal right on the other hand must be completed with the moral-spiritual dimension of human dignity. The dignity of freedom is conditioned by its ethic fondation, respectively of responsibility. From this point of view the person's rights corroborate with those of the neighbours'. The respect for our neighbour has to be at least equivalent to that we want for ourselves.

2. DISCRIMINATION

Discrimination is the different treatment applied to a person because this person belong, in real or supposed, to a certain social group. Discrimination is an individual action, but it constitutes a social paternal behavior, if the members of the same social group are similarly treated.[4]

According to the Government Ordinance no. 137/2000 discrimination is "any distinction, exclusion, restriction or preference based on race, nationality, ethnicity, language, religion, social category, beliefs, sex or sexual orientation, belonging to a disadvantaged category or any other criterion that has the purpose or effect the restriction of the use or removal of recognition or exercise, on equal terms, human rights and fundamental freedoms or rights recognized by law, in the field of political, economic, social and cultural or any other areas of public life"

From the sociological point of view, discrimination refers to actual behavior towards the other group. It can be observed in activities which removes the members of a group from opportunities offered another. Although the prejudice most often sits on the basis of discrimination, they may exist separately. People can have attitudes marked by prejudices, but which do not always give them way.[5]

The theories which place emphasis on social stratification suggest that discrimination is "the product of social stratification based on the unequal distribution of power, status and wealth between groups".[6] The dominant groups try to keep the position by discriminatory practices. Social psychology research has revealed that the members of groups with higher status tend to discriminate more than those of subordinate groups.[7]

The real conflict theory developed by Sherif (1956) argues that discrimination occurs in conditions of competition for limited resources between the two groups. In this context, individuals tend to favor the members of their group. Also, the social identity Theory developed by Henry Tajfel (1981) shows that individuals tend to discriminate for the group they belong to obtain a superior position to the other groups. This fact leads to a positive social identity at individual level. One of the areas in which discrimination is present often is the scope of public social services (for example, the social welfare services, health services, educational services, institutions intended to maintain public order). Discrimination is present here because of the discretionary power of the officials of these institutions (Michael Lipsky,1980).

In the analysis that he makes relations between officials of public institutions and their customers, Michael Lipsky[8] identified a number of situations which may arise to customers differentiated treatments and certain groups of customers that are potentially promote. Thus, the officials will be tempted to favor, in the distribution of resources, on customers who seem to have most likely eligibility according to the criteria of bureaucracy. Also, the bureaucrats will tend to favor the citizen that can get some gratification. In this case is the same size or other officials concerned with (for example ethnic or racial). Different treatment occurs especially when there are many resources for applicants and there is no procedure either control for the way in which they were assigned, also in a situation where officials must decide whether some customers respond better to that treatment than others. In the conditions under which public servants work involves a tremendous stress, they will call the stereotypes to simplify work and will act in accordance therewith.

The groups subject to discrimination and often on the centered most studies are: ethnic minorities, racial, religious, elderly people and groups of immigrants. There was a special concern for the discrimination practiced against women. In the last period a particular interest is given to studies about sexual minorities, discrimination of persons with special abilities, and the elderly. The most investigated fields of manifestation of discrimination were the educational system, the labor market, indwelling. These socially vulnerable groups become economically vulnerable (S.M. Miller, 1996). Those who are the target of prejudice and discrimination in a society which will encounter difficulties on integration in the labor market (there they will not find employment as qualified or will be paid at the lower level of those who belong to favored groups), they will have difficulty in obtaining public benefits. However, they are vulnerable in economic terms and they are included in the category of groups with high risk of poverty.

3.THE ENSURING TO RESPECT THE HUMAN DIGNITY THROUGH PENSION RIGHTS

The pension represent the most important performance of social insurance given within the public system. Any type of pension is given to the person entitled to the requested of the entitled person, of the designated representative by this with special delegacy , of the tutor or of his curator[9].

It can thus be said that because of the contributions paid by every person employed during his active life, pension in constituted in a gained right, Thus the citizen exerts a property right on the pension and the pension right. Also, pension both as right and element of private property, represents a claim of the state which forces it to pay and to protect[10]. From this perspective the quantum of tehe pension is considered that it cannot be negatively modified, because it is a gained right. Even in the Criminal law domain there is the principle of criminal law more favorable, all the more so in the domain of constituting the quantum on person's pension, if a recalculation is effectuated the more favorable pension is kept with the bigger amount). It is natyral to be so, because it is proper for the society to be thus thankful to those who contributed to the society developement , in their way.

But in the same time , respecting the Resolution 3137/XXVIII from 1973 (Romania was member of O.N.U. in that moment), the obligation of the sate is that to assure the aged persons, on one side, a decent pension-to assure a financial independence and a decent living, and on the other side , the employment opportunity according to needs with the discouragement of the discriminating politics and measures. Therewith it recommended that when they elaborate national politics and programmes to be respectful of the following principles:

- To edit programmes for the sged persons' welfare, health and protection, including measures to assure them to the utmost extent economical independence and social integration;
- To elaborate measures of social security to assure them a sufficient income;
- To intensify aged persons' contribution to economical and social developement;
- To dismay discriminating attitudes, politics and measures founded exclusively on age that the employment practices;
- To encourage the conclusion of cooperation agreements on social security for the aged persons;

[10] http://www.facias.org/documente/Petitie%20ONG%20Romania%20-%20abuzurile%20guvernului%20Boc.pdf

- To encourage the creation of employment possibilities for eged persons, according to their needs.

Between the 26th of July and the 6th of August 1982, in Vienna, took place the World Meeting dedicated to aged persons and convoked in order to constitute a tribune destined to start a programme for an international activity meant to assure economical and social security in their own country for aged persons. This because the Meeting estimated that the numaber of these kind of persons would increase spectacularly in the following 20 years[11], but that these persons represent an important human resource, both in the economical- social domain and in what concerns the transmission of cultural patrimony[12].

These measures are meant to promote and to assure the respect for dignity of aged persons, because their brutal removal from the work system and the neglect or their creative capacities, because of the age has dramatical efects on the entire society.

4. DISCRIMINATION IN THE FIELD OF GRANTING STATE PENSIONS

4.1. Equality versus equalization

The Constitution of Romania (1965), art. 20 established the right of citizens to material insurance of old age, sickness or incapacity for work. According to this article, the right to material insurance for manual workers and officials was done by pensions and sickness benefits granted under the social security system, and for members of the cooperative organizations or of other public organizations was done by forms of insurance held by the latter.

In application of this constitutional provision was adopted the law No. 3/1977 on pensions of State social insurance and social assistance. According to this law, the State guarantee for every citizen, regardless of sex or nationality, the right to a pension on the basis of the provision brought to the society development.

The pensions were established in relation to the quantity, quality and social importance of the work, which is laid down the principle of achieving a fair relationship between the proceeds of the pay and pension.

The criteria for differentiation in the level of the pension were made up of length of service, salary and working group.

Initially, law No. 3/1977 has provided for the calculation, as regards the criterion of retribution, as the average of the monthly salary. Then, by variations introduced since the year 1990, it was intended as a basis for this criterion, the average fee for a period of 5 years chosen by each worker, in the last 10 years of activity[13].

The funds required for pension's payment were established from contributions made up of units and from the amounts allocated for that purpose from the State budget. Employed persons contributed 2-4% of the monthly pension contribution for the additional pension. According to the law, the right to pension was imprescriptibly and not taxable.

The pension rights, when all the conditions were accomplished, was triggered by "Decision"which provided the monthly amount due under this law.

The legislator adopted the law No. 19/2000 on the system of public pensions and other social insurance rights, a normative act, which entered into force on 01.04.2001. The new legislation differs substantially from the law no. 3/1977. The first difference is represented by the principles underlying the public pension system: uniqueness; gender equality; social solidarity; contribution; the distribution; autonomy.

[13] Băjan, Doru, About the right to a public pension, http://www.consultingreview.ro/articole/despre-dreptul-la-pensia-publica.html

The big novelty is the pension point! Also, another novelty is the mode of regulation laying down the amount of the pension, determined by multiplying the annual average score achieved by the insured person during the period of contribution by the amount of a pension point in the month of removal to a pension.

In the form of the original law no. 19/2000 provided that the amount of the pension point was at least 45% of average gross monthly salary on economy, forecast for the year. This pension point is approved by the law of the State social insurance budget. In case of a deviation of more than 10% from the gross monthly salary on economy achieved compared with the forecasted, then it will re-calculate the amount of the pension point on the basis of a new forecasts of gross monthly medium salary on economy.

Contributions are due to make both of the employers and their employees being differentiated in terms of working conditions, the odds are approved annually by the law of the State social insurance budget.

Determined on the basis of the score and the value of the pension point was established the new amount of the pension, but the favorable amount for the person.

According to the law no. 19/2000, the pension is a benefit of social security and income replacement for loss of professional earnings as a result of old age, which represents a risk insured.

The pension rights were demonstrated by the "Decision" to set the average score achieved. Quantifying the value of the pension point is, however, from this moment, at the discretion of the State, it is losing the contact with the person's contribution to the social security budget over the life of the asset. The concrete amount of the pension becomes so dependent on public financial resources, which shall draw up by the Government, the annual budget bills through Parliament, and the majority of the approved annual budget laws, allocate them for this purpose.

There is a responsibility of the State, in this respect, to carry out the fundamental rights stipulated in the Constitution, has the reach of public and private property that belongs to and is the largest owner of Romania. Financial resources depend on the ability of the political class just to power/governance to manage this wealth.[14] Therefore, the taxpayer, despite lengthy contributions, has no control over the money which they were stopped on a monthly basis, the gross salary. So, there appears the next question: Why there must be a political involvement on the amount of pension a person? If the value of the pension have not exceed a percentage of maximum 45% of the gross average salary per economy, what happens to the rest of the money that helped the citizens of the (necessarily) the social insurance budget?

The answer is very clear. From my point of view there is a equalization of the citizens, and not in compliance with the principle of equal rights. This is because no matter the importance of the work.

4.2. Discrimination based on age criteria

4.2.1. The equalization of retirement ages for men and women

European Commission Program entitled "Supporting national strategies for safe and sustainable pensions through an integrative approach" includes a series of objectives, including the Equalization of retirement ages for men and women. Present in Romania at a seminar on the reform of pensions, organized by the Partnership for Equality Center, Susan Ward, independent consultant and author in the field of pension schemes in the United Kingdom, believes that it is very difficult to secure good pensions to those who worked for 40-45 years old, having a good job and secure income, but it is more difficult to secure decent pensions to those who have discontinued their work or have changed their place of work. This was referred to gender equality and the more flexible employment and career systems, because women are the ones that have most disruption in the period of employment or periods of employment without full time because of their role in the care of children and the elderly. Ms. Ward has referred to the EU legislation in the field of social security, in particular to Directive 79/9 which stipulates equal treatment for women and men in the social insurance system, which is the age of retirement, with a few derogations, and equal treatment on the labor market. A new EU directive prohibits discrimination, including age discrimination, which entered into force in 2006, being relevant at the time of the change of pensionable age.

In the same seminar[15] has talked about how the countries of the region have opted to increase the retirement age to solve financial problems faced by national pension funds. However, there are differences in the way in which this measure has been applied.

Thus, Hungary, Estonia, Latvia and Slovakia, Governments have taken the decision to balancing out the retirement age of women with the retirement age of men. In Bulgaria, Lithuania and Slovenia will shrink the difference between the pensionable age of women and men from 5 years to 3 years to 2 years.

Retirement age In the Czech Republic will be the same for women and men, except for women who have many children, who may leave earlier retirement. Romania and Poland keep difference of 3 and 5 years.

Although the removal of the difference between retirement ages may be considered by some women as unfair or unlike, the studies carried out have shown that this is justified (for various reasons), and that is one way of achieving gender equality in this area. These reasons are related to the interaction between the changes of orientation of reform, by individualism and retirement age. In countries where it was chosen by an individualization of pensions, the real value of "benefit" of a lower retirement age for women is indirectly being dampened; in other words, women receive lower pensions, because they will contribute five years less from the Pension Fund. A simulation carried out in Poland for 2050, on the old pension scheme shows that if you continue retirement women before men (women to 60 years and men at 65), women's average pension will represent 75% of the average pension of men. If women retire at the same age as men, women's average pension will be 81% of pension of men. The same simulation on the new system, shows that if they hold retirement 5 years before women with men, women's average pension will be only 57% of the average pension of men, while if the two groups the same retires, the pension age for women will be the average of 73% of that of men.

The conclusion can be that the new system- leveling the retirement age for men is the only way of protecting women against poverty at the old age. Although it is not the most pleasant of the options, the BIM study shows that maintaining the retirement age difference not only leads to disadvantages for women. This is the best argument to justify the extent of the Equalization of retirement ages[16].

The new law on pensions in Romania–law no. 263/2010 keep the difference in retirement age between men and women, in the art. 53. Thus, women may retire at 63 years old, while males can do it at the age of 65 years old.

4.2.2. Introduction of pillar II –private managed pension[17]

According to the Commission for supervision of Private Pension System (CSSPP), introducing 2nd pillar- pension private managed represents a significant reform of pensions, because it means "expanding databases system". Here is a first case of discrimination, whereas, according to law no. 411/2004, the contribution to this pillar is compulsory for persons up to 35 years old and optional for persons between the ages of 35 and 45 years. In my view, the contribute to this pillar private managed pensions would have to be optional or mandatory for ALL those who contribute money to the national pension system, regardless of age. The introduction of age classes shows discrimination on this criterion. In other words, if a person who has exceeded the 45 years old would like to subscribe to pillar II will not be able to do so, being considered... too old.

[17] http://www.csspp.ro/pilonul-2

Moreover, private managed pension may inherit, which is not valid for the public pension. Again, the age says: stop! What is different from a person who has more than 45 years to the one that is up to 45 years old at the time of the application of the law? Why does not have the same options? Answer: this person is too old; anyway ... no longer matter whether or not to leave any legacy...

In addition, another discrimination – all on the criterion of age – is just the introduction of this system, because the private managed pension "steals" of pension insurance budget a percentage (determined according to the political interests of a particular time), so this budget was a significant lack of money. Current retirees can see the situation can be considered true burden on the shoulders of the State, whose governmental activity now have no reason to deprive him of a property right – the property right on pension. In the name of an invented "crisis", the Government can now take ... charge lower pensions!!!

So, I asked myself: is it incidentally that Hungary chose undemocratic solution to nationalize the private managed pensions – 2nd pillar?

4.3. Discrimination based on the criterion of estate

Art. 14 of the Convention for the protection of human rights and fundamental freedoms "the prohibition of discrimination" obligation to ensure the exercise of rights provided for by the Convention, among other things, without any distinction on the "assets".

"Assets/fortune" is a property right which is protected by the first additional Protocol to the Convention.

All retirees regardless of the pension system are equal in quality for retirees with regard to the revenue obtained through the recognition of the fundamental right to a pension provided for by art. 47 of the Constitution.

By the law nr. 343/2006 was amended the tax code (approved by law No. 571/2003) fixing the taxation of the income of the monthly pension for amounts exceeding lei 1,000.

New obligations were imposed for retirees with income greater than 740 lei to pay health insurance contribution in the amount of 5.5% of the income by no O.U.G. 117/2010.

Within the meaning of art. 14 of the Convention for the protection of human rights and fundamental freedoms, such taxation only to the pensioners who carried out the pension income above a certain ceiling, means discrimination according to wealth, you can always be invoked in the courts of common law.

The pension is a good, consisting of a claim of the citizen towards the State, whose property is protected by the Convention for the protection of human rights and fundamental freedoms.

Through the taxation of pension, the State does reduce the amount of the claim of the citizen, and thus its property[18].

4.4. Discrimination based on… contribution

One of the fundamental principles governing the organization and functioning of the public pension system is contribution principle, according to which our social insurance funds is established on the basis of the contributions due from individuals and legal entities participating in the public system; social security rights are based on social insurance contributions paid[19]. In other words, you get how much money you contribute. However, it is just a trap, because the contribution principle is valid only if it is implemented from scratch. Or, as the sociologists say when doing an experiment "all things being equal". Only that "all things" are not nor may it be "equal"[20]. Therefore, this principle of contribution should be taken into account more relative, he can never be accepted as the only rule for the award of pensions in a civilized state and considered a "state with the rule of law".

Those of special systems did not have and do not have equal terms with other contributors. Due to their special status, policemen, the military and others have not contributed to the State insurance budget. They are not privileged, as some would believe. Special character was due to special conditions of work, which has limited rights that otherwise they would have had in civil life. In the case of the military and policemen, as in the case of persons in the National Administration of Penitentiaries, they made an oath to the Romanian people, so they were available to all their active period. I have to specify that the oath of allegiance was made in front of this people, not for those who have the power in the state temporary. Also, it ia very important to consider the danger they faced during their activity, as military, policeman or civil servant in National Prison Administration. Specific restrictions that prevent them from systems other than the income received from the service. And, while the system was designed so that there is no need for their contribution because their pension system was different from the other, as everywhere in the civilized world, the principle of contribution may not apply to them[21].

For all that, the law no. 119/2010 specifies in art. 3 alin.2 that „in the situation of the pensions (...) established based on special laws, the pension in public system makes considering carried out all the conditions specified by the Law no. 19/2000". In other words, even the legislator sanctions a lie, only for seeing made their political interest, meaning reduction the incomes of these categories of persons.[22]

Also, in the debate on the application of the law no. 119/2010 passed unnoticed provision of the article. 177 of the Law No. 263/2010, according to which, for military and similar frameworks, from the State budget will be charged the corresponding differences that these contributions, together with employers, must pay to the State insurance budget, net income of the staff have not to be affected[23].

The law also specifies that special pensions that have become "normal" and they have to be paid from the State insurance budget. Thus, in addition to a lie, this law promotes a great deal of discrimination, too. Pensions to these persons, who have not contributed, because the law at that time was required to contribute, will be paid only by those persons who have contributed and contribute, in accordance with the law to this budget. So, suddenly there was a great burden on the Social Insurance System budget and on the current taxpayers.

5. Instead of conclusions...

The pension system and the Social Insurance System needs a reform. This reform must not outline a political decision without coverage in real life. In our opinion, it has to regard a direct connection between the contribution that every active person deposits during his life and his pension. Also, it is important the fact that some categories, whose activity is extremely important not only for the citizens, but for the entire country, must benefits of a special abidance, because of the fact that their rights are not limited during his active life as employee.

IMMIGRANTS' INTEGRATION MODELS

CARMEN UZLĂU[*]
ANDREEA UZLĂU[]

Abstract

In the context of the European population aging trend, and while the birth rate is still at a low level, the immigrants may contribute to the support of the EU economy and to finance the national social protection systems. But this would be possible only if they have been fully integrated in the host countries, the integration policies being a task of the national governments. The European Union may still offer support and stimulation through financing, policies coordination and good practices exchange facilitation. The new measures should encourage local level actions, including cooperation between local authorities, employers, migrants' organizations, service providers and local population. Within the EU, there live 20.1 million immigrants (approximately 4% of the entire population) coming from outside European area. An important element of the common EU policy on immigration is the one regarding the development of a policy on immigrants' integration, which should provide a fair treatment within the member states, and guarantee rights and obligations comparable with the ones of the Union citizens.

Keywords*: immigrants, refugees, social exclusion, immigrants' integration policies and models, the European Social Model.*

Introduction

Integration problems have always been a priority on the political agenda of Europe, during the year 2010. On one hand, the European leaders accept more and more the importance of coherence between immigration policies and the integration ones and the efforts that have to be made by the migrants that have a legal residence and the host societies in order to ensure their economic, social, cultural and political participation. On the other hand, some Europeans' attitude about immigration and integration may lead to discrimination and racism, even if the anti-migration feelings do not have, often, links to the realities upon migration and its impact on economy.

Despite all the efforts, migrants are still facing some obstacles on their way to integrate in the European societies. In order to respond to these problems, the responsible ministries with integration met in 2010 in Zaragoza and re-stated their commitment on "the integration as an essential fact of the social development and cohesion"[1]. The Commission has launched a pilot project to identify the monitoring indicators of the integration policies results. Also, the Commission started to develop the so called "European modules", in order to support the national and local policies and practices in the integration matter.

At the national level, most of the member states have elaborated integration national plans and/or have set up consultative organisms, which may be questioned about integration issues. Some member states have modified their legal framework, in order to introduce tests for the third countries nationals, designed to evaluate the integration process. Legalizing the rights and obligations of the new comer migrants with the aid of an "admission and integration contract" went on in some member states. In many of them, a special attention have been paid to the necessity of learning the host society language and to counter the growing unemployment rates among the migrants, measures being taken in order to improve the access to a job. The trend to elaborate global strategies and monitoring systems to watch their results, have gone on as well in the most member states.

Supplementary efforts are needed in order to grow the integration efficiency. EU has to admit and to support the contribution of the migrants to the economic development, ensuring, in the same time, the social cohesion. Only through a progressive provision of an efficient social and economic integration of the third countries nationals that legally reside in EU, may lead to an acceptance of the migration idea on a larger scale, promoting the same time the fundamental European values. A synergy should be encouraged between the followed political initiatives in the context of the migration policy and the series of horizontal political initiatives for the provision of a proper and global political answer. For the Commission, an approach "from down to up", based on a well organized governance at the local/regional level, should be the best way to accomplish this goal.

Paper content

Migration is a global phenomenon, and the European continent is not an exception: all the European states are source, transit and destination countries, in different proportions. Recent estimations on migrants' population that live within the European economic area show more than 20 million foreigners, without the already naturalized or the illegal ones. An important element of the EU common policy on migration is the one regarding the development of a policy targeting the migrants' integration, and the right treatment of them on the member states' territories, as well as the guarantee of rights and obligations comparable with the ones of the EU citizens. From a macro perspective, the concept of integration regards a characteristic of the social system, of the society as a whole, and that is the intensity of the relationship between the parts (groups and individuals). During the last few years, the concept of social cohesion has been very used as an equivalent for integration.

The term of integration has a variety of dimensions, and the most important one regards the incidence, which includes, at its turn, two separate characteristics: frequency and intensity. For a proper understanding of the phenomenon, it is very important to know how these dimensions interact.

There are more theories about the migrants' integration process. One of them states that the migrants are assimilated by the new society, during two, even three generations, and, at the end of the process there are no more visible differences between the new comers and their children, on one hand, and the host society, on the other hand, only the names and appearance (skin color, etc.), maybe. The main obstacle in validating this theory has been the obvious fact that, even after a few generations, cultural differences may be observed between the migrants and their children and the host society. It is obvious, as well, that those communities, developed as a result of the immigration phenomenon wish to strengthen their own cultural identity, sometimes despite the fact that the members of these communities might have an active and full participation within the host society. Otherwise speaking, this active and full participation does not inflict necessarily, the abandon of the specific cultural identity. Thereby, what have been initially labeled as assimilation is proved to have two dimensions that do not necessarily concur, a structural dimension and a cultural one. The first shows the growth of the social participation of persons and groups within the wide society, especially at an institutional level (labor market, education, health system, etc.), while the second one represents the processes of values change and cultural identification of the migrants.

In the specific literature, when references are made to the institutional participation growth, the term of integration is used, and when we refer to cultural changes, acculturation is used to define it, a complex term which reflects the fact that total assimilation in the main culture is not the only option and, as well, it is not an absolute requirement for the success of the integration process. Social policies on migrants' integration regard mostly the institutional dimension, the ways to promote the migrants' participation within the major institutional systems of the society, and less the cultural dimension.

Integration should be understood as a process of active participation of the migrants in all the European society dimensions, process watched from two directions: both from the legal resident migrants in the EU point of view, and the host society one. This fact inflicts, on one hand, the responsibility of the host society to provide a legal framework with rights and obligations which may offer the possibility of migrants' participation in the economic, social, cultural and civil life, and on the other hand, the foreigners should respect and follow the fundamental rules and values of the European society and, in the same time, to actively participate at the integration process, without still losing their own identity (the main difference from the assimilation concept). Also, the European Commission indicates the main categories of immigrants which should benefit of the integration programs:

- Economic immigrants;
- Family re-unification immigrants;
- Refugees and persons that are granted with international protection

Because of the fact that the term "immigrants' integration" is a complex one, with multiple meanings, the differences between the states concerning its interpretation lead to different visions upon the social policies in the matter. However, even if the interpretations would be the same in each state, the social policies would still be different, because of the political and social circumstances, and also of the different histories relating the migration.

So, it is said that a distinction is useful between three major dimensions of the integration process: social and economic dimension, legal and political dimension and cultural dimension. Any policy related to the promotion of immigrants' integration must take into consideration these three dimensions. The ability to offer a broad explanation is limited for each dimension separately taken. That is why some authors have built models, in order to cover this complex process, models which attend to all the three dimensions.

In Europe, three models of policies can be distinguished, related to integration:

a. The model of the seasonal worker, for which Germany is the prototype. Migration process is mainly determined by the needs of the labor market, and the presence of the immigrants is only temporary. As a consequence, a legal status is not a necessity and nor a reflection on the possibility to facilitate the cultural diversity.

b. Assimilation model, for which France is representative. Immigration is considered to be permanent; migrants are welcome and get a legal status, under the condition of assimilating the behavioral models of the dominant culture. Immigrants are considered, first of all, as individuals, the concept of immigrants' community not being acceptable within this model.

c. Ethnic minorities model, for which Great Britain is the prototype. Immigration is regarded as permanent, but the immigrants are defined depending on their ethnic and cultural origin. They build their own communities, different from the existing ones, but the real challenge is to make these communities to live in harmony, within a multicultural society.

Castles developed another typology that tries to reconcile the different dimensions:

a. The model of exclusion based on differences, gathering Germany and the South Europe states;

b. The assimilation model, in Great Britain, France and the Netherlands;

c. The pluralist model, which can be found only in countries outside Europe, classic countries, which encourage immigration.

Despite the big differences from political and ideological point of view between the states, in all countries, within the social policies regarding migrants' integration, a point of interest is that, after granting the right of legal residence, access is facilitated, in equal conditions, to the labor market, establishments, education, health care, etc. Also, similarities can be found about the policies of citizenship granting, as well as about the efforts of countering discrimination, racism and xenophobia.

During the last few years discussions about the European Social Model are more often. All the European countries share common characteristics which, together, give birth to this Model. First of all, it is about a common commitment for social security and justice, full occupation of the labor market, universal access to the health care services, education, adequate social protection for special cases of disease, motherhood, aged people, unemployment and social assistance services in order to prevent poverty and social exclusion. These aspects are fully accepted by all European states and are included as basic elements of the legal and institutional framework and as objectives of the social policies as well. The European Social Model is based on the acknowledgement of the fact that social security and justice may contribute both to the economic efficiency and to the social progress. European governments usually embrace the idea that there is no opposition between the economic efficiency and social cohesion, but, actually, they are strongly related. In case of economic recession, the state might balance some social risks, as the unemployment, disease or disabilities risk, which the free market cannot cover at a satisfying level for all the citizens. Social policy measures have the role to reduce uncertainties created by a market economy, to strengthen the capacity of the individuals to adapt to the economic, technological and social changes, to provide the possibility to acquire new specializations and an equal framework of opportunities. Secondly, the European Social Model is characterized by a high degree of organization around some common interests, following the negotiation between governments, social partners and civil society regarding the aspects of social and economic policies. Fight against social exclusion is a primary objective on the EU agenda. The concept of exclusion has multiple dimensions and the measures that try to counter the social exclusion must cover a very wide area of directions, as: education, occupation, professional training, establishments, health care, social protection, etc. These measures are dedicated to the under-privileged groups, and immigrants and refugees are, in EU opinion, groups with high risk of social exclusion. Measures regarding labor force occupation and access to the social protection and assistance are considered to be the main ways to the social integration. From this point of view, the immigrants and the refugees are a target-group, as well.

National programs aimed towards the immigrants' integration are dominant in those countries where the majority of immigrants are accepted, based on the procedure of family re-unification or because of humanitarian reasons (based on the procedure of asylum), immigrants who usually do not have a work offer before entering the country and who rarely speak the host country language.

In its majority, the immigrant population feels almost the same necessities and needs services which should address them. There are, though, certain groups that need a special attention. We refer here to the refugees and to the persons that are granted with international protection, women and immigrants part of the second or third generation.

Although from many points of view refugees and persons granted with international protection are confronted with the same situation as other immigrants, issues related to the forced nature of the immigration and the special necessity of protection need a special approach of this group within the social policies for integration. It is important to remind that these persons did not choose to leave their countries for economic reasons, but for reasons of persecution they have been confronted with, and they need a supplementary support and special services in order to facilitate their integration. Integration programs addressed to refugees should be complementary to the usual social services and should be focused on the vulnerable groups within the refugees' communities. Certain specific requirements of the integration measures, limitations or obligations, which may be generally imposed to the immigrants, cannot be applied the same way to the refugees.

Local integration is one of the durable solutions to the refugees' problems and refers to their setting down, on long term, in the host country. Local integration, together with the volunteered repatriation and establishing into another country are considered to be one of the traditional durable solutions for the refugees and are based on the assumption that persons who have been granted with a refugee status would permanently remain in the asylum country. Integration is a process of dynamic change, which must be regarded from two perspectives: from refugees point of view, integration request a preparation in order to adapt to the host society's life style, without losing the cultural identity, and from the host society's point of view, a will is requested to adapt public institutions to the population's profile changes, to accept refugees as a part of the national community and to act for facilitating their access to resources.

Also, the integration is a long term process, which starts with the moment of arrival in the host country and ends when the refugee becomes an active member of the society, from legal, social, economic, educational and cultural perspective. In the countries with great experience in the refugees area, it often happens that the integration process to extend beyond the first generation.

Conditions related to the integration

EU member states have jumped to the conclusion that, for a successful migration policy, improving the integration process is compulsory. From this point of view, many countries provide integration programs for legal migrants who have been accepted within the national territory, sometimes on a period of few years. However, it must be noticed that the request in some legislations regarding migrants' "integration potential" has significantly increased recently. On the other hand, there are more situations nowadays when the "integration potential" has to be proved before immigrating, for example by passing a test of knowledge about language and society in the destination country.

The great majority of the EU member states do not impose integration conditions as general conditions (for all the immigrants or for the not-permanent residence request). Only three states have this provision in the legislation: Netherlands, France and Austria.

There is a trend to give the integration conditions a general character in the national legal framework, especially during the past two years. Starting with March 15th, 2006, with a few exceptions, each persons aged between 16 and 65 who wants to get a longer term residence in Netherlands and has to ask for a temporary residence permit (MVV - Machtiging tot Voorlopig Verblijf), has to pass a civic integration exam, abroad. This test is an oral exam about language knowledge and with questions about the Dutch society. Questions about life style in the Netherlands, geography, history, Constitution, democracy, legislation, language and need to know it, family life, education, health, work and income may be posed. The test would be held at the Dutch embassy or consulate abroad, and successfully passing it is a former condition to obtain the temporary permit. Examination tax is 350 EUR.

On July 24th, 2006, based on the Law regarding immigration and integration, an integration condition has become compulsory in France, as well. A "reception and integration contract" is requested to the new comer adults and foreigners between 16 and 18 years of age, who frequently enter French territory and who requested a residence permit. Only foreigners who do not want to settle in France, as students and seasonal workers, as well as people who have studied there for at least three years of secondary school, are not object of this condition. According to the contract, the foreigner would have to attend civic formation courses and, if necessary, language courses. Respecting the conditions of the contract is taken into consideration when a temporary residence permit should be renewed or when a long term residence permit is granted.

In Austria, the obligation to fulfill integration conditions has been introduced in 2002. Foreigners who ask for a residence permit are requested at their turn to respect an "integration agreement". This agreement consists of two modules: one concentrated on "acquiring the ability to read and write" and the other one on "acquiring knowledge about German language and the ability to participate at the social, economic and cultural life in Austria". A final exam, evaluated with "admitted", is required in order to respect the agreement. It must be noticed that this is a legal condition. Consequences for not respecting this obligation may be administrative punishment, financial disadvantages or, as a last method, expulsion.

It may be seen from the above mentioned, that the states pay the greatest attention to the language knowledge. More than that, Netherlands requires civic knowledge and France civic education courses.

The biggest difference between states is the way they apply the requests and the related legal consequences. Austria and France impose an obligation that almost all the immigrants (even if there are some exceptions) to attend an integration program. Moreover, the Austrian law says that immigrants have to pass a final exam; not respecting this provision is an offence and, the worst case, the immigrant might be expelled. In France, intentionally not respecting the contract might lead to the refuse of renewing a temporary residence permit or to grant a long term one.

On the other hand, Netherlands requests that the possible immigrant to learn the language and to acquire civic knowledge, during the period he is still abroad; oppositely, the permit would not be granted. We must say again that this condition is a general one, and, consequently, it is applicable to all immigrants. Fulfilling this condition by the immigrant means in the most cases, that he would invest some money, time and efforts in order to gain the requested knowledge. It must be noticed that opportunities to learn German and Dutch language abroad are more limited than to learn English, for example. Moreover, if a possible immigrant is coming from a rural area and/or an emergent country, this condition is even more pressing. In Netherlands, the integration monitoring system in 2006 showed an decrease of the MVVs, as a possible result of the abroad imposed test (TK 2006/07, No. 39; see also Country Report for Netherlands). Without being a surprise, the general immigration conditions related to integration are object for sharp discussions, both in public and in academic areas.[2]

The Justice and Home Affairs Council adopted on November 19th, 2004 in Brussels, the European framework on integration, stipulating, inter alia: "Basic knowledge about host society language, history and institutions is compulsory for integration; allowing the migrants to acquire these basic knowledge is essential for a successful integration". (JHAC 2004)

While the JHA Council speaks about "allowing the migrants", it may be noticed, looking the present legal provisions on integration that an alienation of the integration perception has happened, from a positive social measure toward its perception as a measure to limit the immigration (Besselink 2006), specifically, integration condition. Moreover, these conditions' efficiency is in doubt. For example, reading and learning a language abroad, where there is no possibility to practice it daily, would need a bigger investment than learning it in the host country, and consequently, it is not the best method to ensure the acknowledgement (Groenendijk, 2007). The language level required in fact by the national legislation, in order to pass the tests, is, however, much too low to allow the access on the usual labor market. Also, it is reasoned that these imposed integration conditions are not the solution for the integration related issues, as urban intendance and planning or for social and cultural isolation (Besselink, 2006).

Conclusions

Integration of the third country nationals which are legal residents remains a key issue, sometime polemic. Successful integration is essential because of humanitarian and cultural reasons. It is, as well, necessary in order to maximize economic and social benefits of the immigration, both for individuals and for the society. There is not only one mean to provide a successful integration, but it is obvious that more efforts have to be made both at the EU and at national and local level, for better results. Each migrant should feel at home in Europe, respecting its laws and values, and should be able to contribute to Europe's future.

Integration needs efforts both for the migrant, and for the society which accept him. Migrants should be offered the possibility to participate at the new communities' lives, especially with the goal of learning the host country language; they need access to the labor market and to the education and health systems and have the social and economic capacity to keep up. They must be aware about the fundamental values of the EU and of the member states, in order to understand the culture and traditions of the country they live in. Migrants' integration means a balance between their rights and the respect they owe to the laws and culture of the host countries.

Increasing the efforts for the migrants' integration improvement in the destination countries is a key part of the global approach of the migration, being linked to the commercial exchanges, as well as to the investment competencies and flows. Understanding this phenomenon must be improved and actions should be intensified from the point of view of social integration and social policies adaptation (especially in the health and education matters), economic and labor force integration and fight against xenophobia and social exclusion.

CONSIDERATIONS ON THE PHENOMENON OF DOUBLE TAXATION IN THE EUROPEAN UNION

ALICE CRISTINA MARIA ZDANOVSCHI*

Abstract
In the general context of economic globalization, international economic cooperation, the liberalization movement of goods, services, capital and persons, and the effect of the exercise of fiscal sovereignty, appears the phenomenon of double or multiple international taxation of income and assets, following the vocation of several legal systems, which contain legislative differences and can generate tax obstacles, such as, the laws of the country of origin of the revenue and the legislation of the country of destination of income.
Thus, more interesting becomes the study of the phenomenon of double taxation at EU level given the distinct presence of 27 sovereignties in full process of European integration
So, this paper aims to identify how the European Union handles the phenomenon of double taxation, making a shift from defining this phenomenon to identifying the legislation designed to avoid or eliminate the phenomenon of double taxation in the field of EU direct taxation.
Also, this paper deems necessary to stop a moment upon the fiscal harmonization and integration in the indirect taxation field of the European Union.

Keywords: the phenomenon of double taxation, direct taxation, European Union, fiscal sovereignty, avoidance of double taxation.

Introduction:

In the contemporary context of the liberalization of the movement of goods, services, capital and people, development and diversification of international economic and financial relations, moving from regional to a global plan of interdependence on the one hand, and in the context of the intensification of the integration process Europe, the European Union - Pillar I, on the other hand, it is considered a scientific approach to date this work.

The paper, entitled "Considerations on the phenomenon of double taxation in the European Union", is aimed at identifying how to manage the phenomenon of double taxation in the European Union.

For this purpose , I considered it necessary to structure this work on 10 chapters, for the present three important issues on the chosen theme in our opinion, they assumed, and i.e. (i) identifying the context in which they unfold and the phenomenon of double taxation appears in relation to the taxation at EU level, Chapter 1, (ii) identifying the management modality on the phenomenon of double taxation on the European Union Level by submitting legislative framework in current EU in the field direct taxation seeks fiscal harmonization at EU level and therefore eliminating double taxation and alignment of tax legislation by 27 different States, Chapters 2-9, and (iii) illustrating some aspects of indirect taxation in the European Union – value added tax (VAT), excise and customs duties, though, the phenomenon of double taxation is shown imposing taxes on only direct precisely because of this nature integration of the European Union, the Chapter 10.

Also, we watched the impact on the matter with changes made by Treaty of Lisbon with its entry into force.

Of course, this paper would not have been finished without a part of it treating the author's conclusions, thus, distinct from the paper itself, we'll present the conclusions we reached from the paper itself.

1. Taxation in the European Union and the phenomenon of double taxation

In the general context of economic globalization, international economic cooperation, the liberalization movement of goods, services, capital and persons, and the effect of the exercise of fiscal sovereignty, appears the phenomenon of double or multiple international taxation of income and assets, following the vocation of several legal systems, which contain legislative differences and can generate tax obstacles, such as, the laws of the country of origin of the revenue and the legislation of the country of destination of income.

Integration into the European Union (EU further)[1] imposed solving the problems related to fiscal harmonization[2], implicitly fiscal sovereignty[3], as well as the phenomenon of double taxation[4] and its prevention.

Remember, first, that EU fiscal policy is founded on the General Principles of the Treaty of Amsterdam respectively, Common intern market, non-discrimination and legislative approximation and on the freedom of movement of goods, persons, services and capital.[5]

Thus, harmonization of fiscal policy at European level is the result of the compromise made between the sovereignty of Member States and obstacles created by differences in the legal system for different categories of taxes and fees. The current level of harmonization achieved by the Member States clearly shows that the uniformity of taxes will not be spontaneous and will not evolve quickly.[6]

However, at the EU level, according to doctrine[7], cannot talk about politics generally applicable fiscally, despite the introduction of the Single Market and Economic and Monetary Union.

Also, EU is based on the Treaty on European Union (TEU) and the Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union (TFEU).

[3] The right to establish and collect taxes on a given territory was named fiscal sovereignty or, in other words, exclusive competence of the State in the field of taxation; right that the State does not share it with anyone and the manner in exercising this right should not be answerable to any court or international organization. Currently, this last aspect receives new nuances in the context of globalization. For more aspects regarding fiscal sovereignty see, in detail, Alice Cristina Maria Zdanovschi, "The concept of fiscal sovereignty" (communication presented at the Scientific Session of Teachers of Legal and Administrative Sciences Faculty, Christian University "Dimitrie Cantemir", (Bucharest, April 7, 2011).

European primary law of basic treaties in the field of taxation contributes through secondary legislation, namely directives and regulations[8]. But they are not concerned about taxpayer only for certain taxes that they had to adapt to ensure fundamental objective of "freedom of movement and non-discrimination". For this reason some taxes are in power of community institutions that created common rules on them.[9]

Also, Community directives into national law are part of positive law[10] and it stands under the direct control of the Court of Justice of the European Union (CJEU further)[11]. Thus, note in this regard on the value added tax (VAT) as it became a real court of last resort for fixing jurisprudence[12].

According to specialized literature[13], the general legal framework of the taxation at EU level could be justified by the overall objective expressed in the Treaty establishing the European Community (TEC further)[14] at article 3 according to which, certain tasks are required, and among them are relevant:

a) according to article 3 paragraph 1 letter c TEC, a functioning internal market characterized by the abolition of obstacles between Member States to the free movement of goods, persons, services and capital,

b) according to article 3 paragraph 1 letter h TCE, the approximation of the laws of Member States to the extent required for the functioning of the common market.

We still have to emphasize that with the coming into force of the Treaty of Lisbon on 1 December 2009, there were many changes in the founding treaties, thus, besides changing the name of the Treaty establishing the European Community, into the Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union (TFEU further), article 3 paragraph 1 TEC[15] was repealed and replaced[16] by articles 3 to 6 TFEU[17]. Also the communities' purpose was provided by former Article 2 TEC, now repealed and replaced on the merits of Article 3 of the Treaty regarding the European Union (TEU)[18].

So, on the basis of the general legal framework of taxation, as existing in the repealed provisions and continuing into the new form in force, in direct taxation matter have been issued a number of directives to remove tax barriers.

Thus, in light of defending and application of freedom of establishment[19], there is a common tax regime applicable to the founding companies and subsidiaries of different Member States, mergers, separations, transfer of assets and exchanges of shares between societies in different Member States and the transfer of the registered office of a European society (SE) or European cooperative societies (SCE), between Member states, interest rates and royalty payments made between the associated societies in different Member States, the arbitration procedure to avoid economic double taxation.

For all that, in the reasoning of such directives it shows that: "In a Single Market having the characteristics of a domestic market, transactions between companies of different Member States should not be subject to less favorable tax conditions than those applicable to the same transactions carried out between companies of the same Member State"[20], or "whereas mergers, divisions, transfers of assets and exchanges of shares concerning companies of different Member States may be necessary in order to create within the Community conditions analogous to those of an internal market and in order thus to ensure the establishment and effective functioning of the common market; whereas such operations ought not to be hampered by restrictions, disadvantages or distortions arising in particular from the tax provisions of the Member States; whereas to that end it is necessary to introduce with respect to such operations tax rules which are neutral from the point of view of competition, in order to allow enterprises to adapt to the requirements of the common market, to increase their productivity and to improve their competitive strength at the international level;

whereas tax provisions disadvantage such operations, in comparison with those concerning companies of the same Member State; whereas it is necessary to remove such disadvantages;

whereas it is not possible to attain this objective by an extension at the Community level of the systems presently in force in the Member States, since differences between these systems tend to produce distortions; whereas only a common tax system is able to provide a satisfactory solution in this respect"[21].

In the same vein a major importance, in our opinion, in harmonizing the laws for the functioning of the common market were the provisions in art.293 TEC. Thus, art.293 TEC ruled that Member States, as appropriate, will conduct negotiations for the abolition of double taxation in the Community for the benefit of their nationals. Today, after the entry into force of the Treaty of Lisbon, art.293 TEC was repealed as there was no correspondent in TFEU.

Concomitantly, keep in mind that this article found it's applicability in the Convention on Arbitration[22], which established a arbitrary procedure of avoiding double taxation, but it only concerns the avoiding of economic double taxation[23].

According to this Convention, there is no obligation for the Member States to effectively eliminate double taxation; bilateral arrangements are limited in foreseeing the efforts made by the States in eliminating them.

Therefore Member States shall keep full sovereignty on direct taxes bearing the responsibility in this area. Because while indirect taxes is affecting goods and services quite independently of national structures and institutions, direct taxes underlines national visions on fiscal equity; thus, direct taxes are closely correlated with characteristics of a national legal system, with that national identity; therefore the matter of direct taxes belongs to the Member States[24].

This is highlighted by the CJEU jurisprudence and then after commenting upon this jurisprudence both national[25] and international[26] reference materials.

Thus, in Case C-298/05[27] Columbus Container Services BVBA & Co. against Finanzamt Bielefeld-Innenstadt, Judgment of the Court of 6 December 2007, the Court decides the following:

"27. As a preliminary point, it must be recalled, that, according to *settled case-law, in the absence of unifying or harmonizing measures adopted by the Community, the Member States remain competent to determine the criteria for taxation of income and wealth with a view to eliminating double taxation by means inter alia of international agreements (see, in particular, Case C-307/97 Saint-Gobain ZN [1999] ECR I-6161, paragraph 57; Case C-290/04 FKP Scorpio Konzertproduktionen [2006] ECR I-9461, paragraph 54; and Case C-374/04 Test Claimants in Class IV of the ACT Group Litigation [2006] ECR I-11673, paragraph 52).

28. However, although direct taxation falls within their competence, the Member States must exercise that competence consistently with Community law (see Case C-265/04 Bouanich [2006] ECR I-923, paragraph 28, and Test Claimants in Class IV of the ACT Group Litigation, paragraph 36).

44. In this respect, double taxation conventions such as those envisaged in Article 293 EC are designed to eliminate or mitigate the negative effects on the functioning of the internal market resulting from the coexistence of national tax systems referred to in the preceding paragraph (Kerckhaert and Morres, paragraph 21).

45. Community law, in its current state and in a situation such as that in the main proceedings, does not lay down any general criteria for the attribution of areas of competence between the Member States in relation to the elimination of double taxation within the European Community. Consequently, apart from Council Directive 90/435/EEC of 23 July 1990 on the common system of taxation applicable in the case of parent companies and subsidiaries of different Member States (OJ 1990 L 225, p.6), the Convention of 23 July 1990 on the elimination of double taxation in connection with the adjustment of profits of associated enterprises (OJ 1990 L 225, p.10) and Council Directive 2003/48/EC of 3 June 2003 on taxation of savings income in the form of interest payments (OJ 2003 L 157, p.38), no uniform or harmonization measure designed to eliminate double taxation has as yet been adopted at Community law level (see Kerckhaert and Morres, paragraph 22).

Also, previous CJEU jurisprudence established certain rules[28]:

a) elimination of double taxation within the Community represents one objective of the Treaty,

b) apart of the Convention in 23 July 1990 concerning the elimination of double taxation in connection with profit adjustments in associated enterprises (Convention on arbitration), there are no

For this case see, www.eurlex.eu, accessed May 2009.

In that respect, also see, CJEU, Case C-194/06 Staatssecretaris van Financiën against Orange European Smallcap Fund NV, Judgment of 20 May 2008, where as has been observed in paragraphs 30, 32 and 48 of this judgment*, it is for the Member States to organize their systems for taxing distributed profits and to define*, in that context, the tax base and the tax rate which apply to the shareholder receiving them, and that, in the absence of any unifying or harmonizing Community measures, Member States retain the power to define, by treaty or unilaterally, the criteria for allocating their powers of taxation.

See also, CJEU, Case C-101/05 Skatteverket against A, Judgment of 18 December 2007, according to paragraph 19, although direct taxation falls within their competence, the Member States must none the less exercise that competence consistently with Community law.

[28] See in detail, Mihai Banu, Note to cause C-376/03, 144.

unification or harmonization to eliminate double taxation adopted at Community level or by Member States through multilateral conventions, under Article 293 TEC[29].

On the other hand, under Article 293 TEC, now repealed, Member States, joined, when necessary into negotiations between them looking for guarantees in the interest of own nationals, of eliminating the double taxation, by concluding of bilateral agreements[30] between them, which found inspiration from double taxation pattern conventions on income and wealth tax, drafted by the OECD.[31]

However, it is not for the Court competence, under art.234 TEC[32], to rule on possible violations of the provisions of this kind of Convention by a contracting Member State. Thus, the Court is unable to examine the relationship between a national measure and regulations of an agreement in order to avoid double taxation; this aspect does not fall in the Community law[33] area of interpretation. And because the scope of a bilateral tax conventions concluded by Member States is limited to individuals or legal persons specified therein[34].

According to law enforcement application priority[35] of EU law with regards to a report between conventions to avoid double taxation and Community law, within the European Union, Member States may not agree, by bilateral tax conventions against EU rules. In consequence, community law prevails over provisions of bilateral tax conventions. Aspect accepted in the specialized literature[36].

It may be noted, as was noted in the specialized literature[37], there is a "negative harmonization" by case law in matters of taxation. Thus, the Court, removing from application, by its jurisprudence, national legislation incompatible stipulations, cannot form a tax system compatible with the common Market; therefore this integration takes place in a negative matter, only by abolishing the incompatible systems without proposing an acceptable alternative[38].

Also, this "negative harmonization" is given in applying the article regarding non-discrimination and those regarding basic freedoms[39]. Thus, this articles, being applied directly to individuals or legal persons in the EU, they can be invoked directly before national courts which, under certain cases, may require a preliminary decision in Court. And decisions of the CJEU exceed the individual and leads to the harmonization of national tax rules.

However, the specialized literature[40] holds a Single European Tax opportunity, in the complex context of fiscal harmonization at EU level, process which represents the alignment of normative rules in taxation matter in Member States, to diminish and, if possible eliminate the negative effects produced by different tax systems between the Member States of the common market.

Regarding the opportunity of a single EU tax, a measure relatively recent taken at EU level is the European Commission proposal[41] to regulate a common system of calculating the tax base of companies operating in the EU - a common consolidated corporate tax base (CCCTB).

According to the Commission's press release[42], the purpose of this proposal is to significantly reduce the administrative burden of compliance costs and legal uncertainty currently faced by EU companies, which to determine their taxable profits must comply with up to 27 different national systems.

CCCTB objective is that companies benefit from a system of "single window" for submitting tax returns and to consolidate all profits and losses across the EU. Member States will retain full sovereign right to establish its own corporate tax rate.

However, the CCCTB is seen to be[43], at EU level, an important initiative in the elimination of obstacles that stand in the way of completing the single market.

However, an increasingly powerful harmonization was done on indirect taxes, consumption taxes, excise duties and tax that is value added. They are governed by common rules that define the criteria for settlement, cases of exemption, deduction rules, Member states keeping the right to establish rules of payment and control.

Common internal market being an area without borders required the dissolution of the mechanism of formalities and delays.[44] The abolition of tax frontiers required the replacement of the destination principle with that of the home country, bearing the tax burden taking place in the State where the goods and services were produced, no matter where they are consumed, showing importance for indirect taxes, especially VAT which has the largest share in them.[45]

However, the appreciation is that "these taxes stays a juxtaposition of national taxes, each tax retaining the essence of fiscal sovereignty; decisions in this area are continuing to be taken by unanimity, common standards staying powerless"[46]. In other words, a fiscal union is not possible; any state acts to prevent fiscal erosion, to keep its fiscal sovereignty. [47]

It is noted that under the Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union, especially the article 113 TFEU (ex-art.93 TEC) to ensure proper functioning of the single market, the European Union has harmonization competencies of the laws on indirect taxation, including the base and tax rates[48].

Also, in a first stage, the harmonization has taken the form of total suppression of customs duties between member states followed by the adoption of a common customs tariff and the elimination of taxes and measures equivalent to customs duties, realizing customs unification[49].

In light of the phenomenon of double taxation which can be found only in direct taxes, there is necessary an overview of the current legislative framework in the field of European Union direct taxation[50], thus preceded by a presentation.

2. Council directive 90/434/EEC[51] of 23 July 1990 on the common system of taxation applicable to mergers, divisions, partial divisions, transfers of assets and exchanges of shares concerning companies of different Member States and to the transfer of the registered office, of an SE or SCE, between Member States

This directive is destined to eliminate fiscal measures that could hamper business reorganization, and sets postponing capital gains taxation at the time of completing a merger or reorganizing of residents in European Union societies. Also, this directive was modified by Directive 2005/19/EC which brings important changes, real improvements[52], most of them related to the establishment of European societies and European Cooperative societies and they also can transfer their registered office without proceeding to their dissolution.

Thus, in this respect, the Directive establishes that transfer of the registered office of an SE or SCE does not lead in itself to any taxation of income, profits or capital gains to shareholders[53].

According to Article 1 of Directive 90/434/CEE, each Member State shall apply this Directive to the following:

a) mergers, divisions, partial divisions, transfers of assets and exchanges of shares in which companies from two or more Member States are involved;

b) transfers of the registered office from one Member State to another Member State of European companies (Societas Europaea[54] or SE), as established in Council Regulation (EC) No 2157/2001 of 8 October 2001, on the statute for a European Company (SE)[55], and European Cooperative Societies (SCE), as established in Council Regulation (EC) No 1435/2003 of 22 July 2003 on the Statute for a European Cooperative Society (SCE)[56].

3. Council Directive 90/435/EEC[57] of 23 July 1990 on the common system of taxation applicable in the case of parent companies and subsidiaries of different Member States

Under this directive the elimination of profits double taxation is tried between founding societies in Member States and subsidiaries in another Member State and to have it reducing the differences between national tax rules applicable to groups of societies organized at a national level of a Member State and groups of organized societies in EU.

According to article 1 paragraph 1 of Directive 90/435/CEE, each Member State shall apply this Directive:

d) to distributions of profits by companies of that State to permanent establishments situated in another Member State of companies of the same Member State of which they are subsidiaries.

Also, this Directive shall not preclude the application of domestic or agreement-based provisions required for the prevention of fraud or abuse.[59]

The Directive prevents the taxation of profit distribution to subsidiaries or, alternatively, allows tax deduction, and also exempts distributions of income from taxation by the parent company to source. So, a common system of taxation applicable to societies that have subsidiaries in different Member States was introduced.

And the effects obtained are the withholding tax repealed for profit distribution by owned subsidiaries in proportion of 10%[60] by a company in another Member State and the possibility that another Member State can tax the profits so distributed only if it gives the founding society a tax credit for the tax paid by the subsidiary in this respect.

However, according to article 3 paragraph 2 of Directive 90/435/EEC, Member States may not implement the directive if minimum participation rates that determine ratio between society-subsidiary are not kept for a continuous period of at least two years. Also, Member States shall have the option of replacing, by means of bilateral agreement, the criterion of a holding in the capital by that of a holding of voting rights.

Furthermore, notice the following issue, namely that this Directive shall not affect the application of domestic or agreement-based provisions designed to eliminate or lessen economic double taxation of dividends, in particular provisions relating to the payment of tax credits to the recipients of dividends.[61]

4. 90/346/CEE Convention on the Elimination of double taxation on profits adjustment between associated enterprises, known as the Arbitration Convention[62]

This Convention was signed by Member States under Article 293 TEC[63], introducing an arbitration procedure to prevent double taxation on profits adjusted between societies associated [58] For the purposes of this Directive the term 'permanent establishment' means a fixed place of business situated in a Member State through which the business of a company of another Member State is wholly or partly carried on in so far as the profits of that place of business are subject to tax in the Member State in which it is situated by virtue of the relevant bilateral tax treaty or, in the absence of such a treaty, by virtue of national law, see art.2 par.2 Directive 90/435/EEC.

And Finance Ministries of Member States in May 1999 signed a protocol extending the Convention, which entered into force on November 1, 2004, see, Nemoianu, "Avoiding double taxation.", 27; Petroşel, "Avoiding double taxation.", p.99;

Also, in 2006 was adopted a Code of Conduct for the implementation of the Convention on the elimination of double taxation in connection with the adjustment of profits of associated enterprises, OJ C 176, p.0008-0012, 28/07/2006.

(affiliated) from different Member States. The purpose of the Convention was to establish a resolution mechanism of disputes concerning transfer pricing and double taxation through arbitration, independent procedure where Member States may not agree on necessary adjustments.

The procedure under article 6 of the Convention would imply the transmission of a request by the taxpayer towards the competent authority of that State and this State will notify the other involved. If relevant authorities of both countries cannot reach a compromise on eliminating double taxation within two years of filing the application, then, according to article 7, an advisory committee will decide on the case within six months, according to art.11.

Concomitantly, the provisions of article 12 foresee that after a decision was issued, the Member States concerned may enter into additional consultation for another six months, but if they cannot agree on an alternative solution, the opinion of the Advisory Committee shall be binding. Also, the double taxation of profits will be considered eliminated under article 14, when:

a) profits are included in calculating the taxable income in a single state;

b) or profits paid in a state are reduced by an amount equal to tax paid in the other state.

5. The code of fiscal conduct in business[64]

According to doctrine[65], this code is a useful tool for reducing the extent of the preferential tax facilities treatment of local businesses or obstacles regarding business freedom in the EU, although it is not mandatory and directly applicable.

In the same opinion, the Council and representatives of the Member States adopted on December 1, 1997 a resolution on a code of business concerning the elimination of national fiscal measures which entail a significantly reduced lower level of taxation than any other Member States and which could influence the investment location. The code contains five commitments from Member States:

1. refraining – there will be no new damaging fiscal measures;

2. correction – the existent measures will be analyzed in order to eliminate negative effects in the shortest time;

3. exchange of information – Member States shall inform each concerning measures likely to have a negative effect;

4. evaluation[66] – Member States will organize a working group that will identify fiscal measures which shall fall under the Code;

[65] Idem.

[66] The analysis group was established on March 9, 1998 with representatives of Member States and the Commission. It identified 66 measures with damaging potential and submitted the list to the finance ministers of the EU Ecofin Council meeting of 29 November 1999. Furthermore, for the past years, several transitional periods appeared to remedy these issues, an example, the period of up to 31 December 2010 for the rules applicable to Belgian centers of coordination, or the taxation of international finances of the Netherlands, and up to 31 December 2011 for the free zone regime in Madeira.

The 66 potentially damaging measures can be divided into the following categories:

a) measures regarding the low levels of taxation;

b) measures regarding insurance activities taxation;

c) measures regarding transfer prices of in-group services;

d) measures regarding holding societies;

e) measures regarding partial or total taxation reduction of certain taxation income.

The code identifies five main characteristics which can lead to a damaging fiscal measure:

1. benefits are available only for transactions concluded with non-residents or for non-residents;

2. tax benefits are defined on the internal market;

5. promotion – Member States shall encourage third party countries repeal damaging or preferential fiscal measures.

6. Council Directive 2003/48/EC[67] of 3 June 2003 on taxation of savings income in the form of interest payments

This directive tries to eliminate distortions in the taxation on income savings.

The Directive tries to enhance control over taxpayers' income tax that have bank accounts and securities in an EU State other than of residence, and is evading taxation in both states, because the state where the accounts are held does not impose interest towards non-residents and the state is unable to detect them without them declaring the accounts.

According to Article 7 of Directive 2003/48/CE, this Directive shall apply to interest paid by a paying agent established within the territory to which the Treaty applies by virtue of Article 299 thereof.

The ultimate goal is the exchange of information on large scale to ensure tax payments on interest by taxpayers.

Also, similar measures were agreed with Switzerland, Lichtenstein, Monaco, Andorra, San Marino and the United States of America.

However, some states go through a transition period when a withholding tax may apply when the beneficial owner is resident in a Member State other than that in which the paying agent is established, so, Belgium, Luxembourg and Austria shall levy a withholding tax at a rate of 15% during the first three years of the transitional period, 20% for the subsequent three years and 35% thereafter.[68]

Also, according to Article 12 of Directive, 75% of tax withheld will be refunded to the resident State and the State where the tax is withheld retains 25% of income.[69]

[68] Art.11 Directive 2003/48/EC.

[69] As for eliminating double taxation, art.14 states that:

"1. The Member State of residence for tax purposes of the beneficial owner shall ensure the elimination of any double taxation which might result from the imposition of the withholding tax referred to in Article 11, in accordance with the provisions of paragraphs 2 and 3.

2. If interest received by a beneficial owner has been subject to withholding tax in the Member State of the paying agent, the Member State of residence for tax purposes of the beneficial owner shall grant him a tax credit equal to the amount of the tax withheld in accordance with its national law. Where this amount exceeds the amount of tax due in accordance with its national law, the Member State of residence for tax purposes shall repay the excess amount of tax withheld to the beneficial owner.

3. If, in addition to the withholding tax referred to in Article 11, interest received by a beneficial owner has been subject to any other type of withholding tax and the Member State of residence for tax purposes grants a tax credit for such withholding tax in accordance with its national law or double taxation conventions, such other withholding tax shall be credited before the procedure in paragraph 2 is applied.

4. The Member State of residence for tax purposes of the beneficial owner may replace the tax credit mechanism referred to in paragraphs 2 and 3 by a refund of the withholding tax referred to in Article 11".

The Directive eliminates the taxation on interest and royalties for transboundary payments between associated societies, based on a criterion of 25% stake the European Union by effective beneficiaries, provided they are made on the open market value and ownership control is to be maintained for a period of at least 2 years.

The Directive allows transitional periods for Greece, Spain and Portugal, Czech Republic, Lithuania, Latvia, Poland, Slovakia.

According to Article 2, for the purposes of this Directive:

(a) the term 'interest' means income from debt-claims of every kind, whether or not secured by mortgage and whether or not carrying a right to participate in the debtor's profits, and in particular, income from securities and income from bonds or debentures, including premiums and prizes attaching to such securities, bonds or debentures; penalty charges for late payment shall not be regarded as interest;

(b) the term 'royalties' means payments of any kind received as a consideration for the use of, or the right to use, any copyright of literary, artistic or scientific work, including cinematograph films and software, any patent, trade mark, design or model, plan, secret formula or process, or for information concerning industrial, commercial or scientific experience; payments for the use of, or the right to use, industrial, commercial or scientific equipment shall be regarded as royalties.

8. Directive 77/799/EEC[71] concerning mutual assistance given by the competent authorities of Member States in the field of direct taxation and taxation of insurance premiums

The Directive establishes rules concerning the exchange of information between Member States allowing the establishment of correct income and capital taxation. It does not impose an obligation to carry out investigations or provide information, if a certain State is restricted by its own law in this respect, for example commercial or state secrets. The information given will have to keep its secret character in the same measure ensured by the internal legislation.

9. Directive 76/308/EEC[72] concerning reciprocal assistance in the recovery of claims relating to certain levies, duties, taxes and other measures

This directive contributes to the harmonization of European tax systems. It requires an obligation from the Member States to collect the tax requested by another a Member State. The Directive aims to stop attempts by taxpayers to avoid paying tax obligations by settling out in another country.

According to the directive, enforcement provisions of the tax debt securities are automatically recognized and treated as directly enforceable in other Member States to expedite the collection. Member States shall treat such tax claims of another Member State as its own debts.

Although the phenomenon of double taxation is shown only in direct taxes, however, we would like to present EU integrationist character by illustrating some aspects of the indirect taxation in the EU.

10. Indirect taxation in the European Union

10.1. Directive 2006/112/EC on the common system of value added tax

Value added tax (VAT further) was instituted in the European Community since 1970.

According to doctrine[73], the purpose of this tax was to perfect national tax systems by replacing the production and consumption taxes applied in the Member States and to avoid the cascade imposition.

And, in some cases, the European Union decided that the operations subject to VAT and VAT tax base must be the same for all Member States. In terms of tax rates for VAT, there are still differences being recorded concerning the quantum in different member states.

Also, according to the same opinions, based on the provisions of article 93 EC Treaty (now, Article 113 TFEU) several directives were adopted on VAT (1-13); but the sixth Directive is most relevant, Directive 77/388/EEC of decided in the 17 May 1977 Council, concerning the harmonization of Member States relations, relating to turnover taxes - common system of value added tax: uniform basis of assessment[74].

Currently the basic rules of the European VAT system were established by Directive 2006/112/EC on the common system of value added tax[75].

According to section 4 of the preamble to Directive 2006/112/CE, the attainment of the objective of establishing an internal market presupposes the application in Member States of legislation on turnover taxes that does not distort conditions of competition or hinder the free movement of goods and services. It is therefore necessary to achieve such harmonization of legislation on turnover taxes by means of a system of value added tax (VAT), such as will eliminate, as far as possible, factors which may distort conditions of competition, whether at national or Community level.

Also, "(5) A VAT system achieves the highest degree of simplicity and of neutrality when the tax is levied in as general a manner as possible and when its scope covers all stages of production and distribution, as well as the supply of services. It is therefore in the interests of the internal market and of Member States to adopt a common system which also applies to the retail trade.

(7) The common system of VAT should, even if rates and exemptions are not fully harmonized, result in neutrality in competition, such that within the territory of each Member State similar goods and services bear the same tax burden, whatever the length of the production and distribution chain".

Under the provisions of The Directive 2006/112/EC, value added tax is considered a consumption tax. The ultimate goal of VAT is to tax consumption goods to final consumers.

The transferring of the tax burden on the final user, established by provisions of the Directive, is provided by the application of certain principles[76], namely: taxpayer principle; cost principle; VAT entry deduction principle; destination principle.

Regarding the level of tax rates, Member States applies a standard rate of VAT, which shall be fixed by each Member State as a percentage of the taxable amount and which shall be the same for the supply of goods and for the supply of services[77], but this standard rate may not be less than [78] 15%.

10.2. Directive 2008/118/EC on the general arrangements for excise duty and repealing Directive 92/12/EEC

Excise duties were introduced in early 1993 by Council Directive 92/12/EEC of 25 February concerning the general arrangements for products subjected to excise duty and on the holding, movement and monitoring of such products[79], in the context involved in the development of the internal market, which involved abolition of fiscal controls at internal borders between Member States. Over time, the legislation of this consumption taxes has been extensively modified to bring it up to date with the community directives, so the European Union harmonized the structure and set a series of minimum levels of excise duty.[80]

Excise taxes represent indirect consumption taxes or use of certain products, such as, manufactured tobacco, alcoholic beverages and mineral oils.

Currently, excise regime is established by Directive 2008/118/EC concerning the general arrangements for excise duty and repealing Directive 92/12/EEC[81], entered into force on the 15 of January 2009[82], and will apply throughout the European Union on 1 April 2010, at which date the Directive 92/12/EEC[83] is repealed.

For the implementation of the Directive, the Commission shall be assisted by a committee called "Committee on Excise Duties", according to article 43 of Directive 2008/118/EC. However, the rules of the Committee on Excise Duties are set out in Articles 5 and 7 of Decision 1999/468/EC[84] read in conjunction with Articles 43-44 of Directive 2008/118/EC.

According to article 1 of Directive 2008/118/EC the general arrangements for excise duty are established, directly or indirectly following certain products consumption:

a) energy products and electricity covered by Directive 2003/96/EC;

b) alcohol and alcoholic beverages covered by Directives 92/83/EEC and 92/84/EEC;

c) manufactured tobacco covered by Directives 95/59/EC, 92/79/EEC and 92/80/EEC.

Also, according to par.2 of art.1, Member States may levy other indirect taxes on excise goods for specific purposes, provided that those taxes comply with the Community tax rules applicable for excise duty or value added tax as far as determination of the tax base, calculation of the tax, chargeability and monitoring of the tax are concerned, but not including the provisions on exemptions.

Also, Member States may levy taxes on goods other than excise goods, provision of services, including those related to excisable products that cannot be characterized as turnover taxes. However, the collection of such taxes can not result in trade between Member States relating to border crossing formalities.[85]

Products shall be subjected to excise duty rates at the time of production, extraction or their importation in the European Union.[86]

[85] According to par.3 art.1 Directive 2008/118/EC.

[86] Art.2 Directive 2008/118/EC.

Excise duty shall be levied and collected and, where appropriate, reimbursed or remitted according to the procedure laid down by each Member State. Member States shall apply the same procedures to national goods and to those from other Member States.[87]

Also the directive established in art. 12 excisable products which are exempt from excise duty if they are intended for use[88]. However, these exemptions are subject to the conditions and limits set by the host Member State and Member States may grant exemption from excise duty by a excise return[89].

The Directive contains provisions on the production, processing and holding of excise products, and the movement and taxation after release for consumption.

Moreover, Directive 2008/118/EC specifies that to ensure the levels set by Member States is necessary for the competent authorities to be able to track movement of excise goods and, therefore, must adopt on a system for monitoring these products. Thus, according to the directive's preamble the computerized system established by Decision no. 1152/2003/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council of 16 June 2003 on computerizing the movement and surveillance of excisable products (OJ L 162, p. 5, 1.7.2003) should be used.

10.3. Regulation (EEC) no. 2913/92 establishing the Community Customs Code[90]

One of the aims of the European Union was to establish a common market[91], achieved by application and enforcement of the four fundamental freedoms, namely, free movement of goods, persons, capital and services. Free movement of goods[92] involved and calls for a customs union to address all categories of goods and involving the prohibition between Member states of customs duties[93] on imports and exports or other charges having equivalent effect, on the adoption of a common customs tariff in their relations with third countries and the elimination of quantitative restrictions or measures having an equivalent effect between Member States.[94]

The Customs Union[95] is defined in art. XXIV of GATT, as the replacement of a single customs territory of several customs territories. The customs union is characterized by the fact that the participating countries abolish tariff barriers between them, and in relations with third parties they apply a common commercial policy, based on a single customs tariff[96].

The customs territory[97] is described as the territory within which is in force a customs procedure, certain customs legislations. As a rule, the states customs territory corresponds to the [91] Common market or internal market comprises of an area without internal borders that must operate under the same conditions as a national market: goods, persons, capital and services to be moved into it with no border controls between Member States, following lack of border control example between regions of a state. See, Manolache, Treaty, 221.

[92] TFUE regulates this freedom to Articles 28-37.

[93] Customs taxes represent those duties, imposed by the state when things go over the borders, respectively for import, export or transit. The most commonly used are taxes on imports, because raising the price of goods, it will ultimately be borne by consumers, is restricting the import activity and it encourages the internal production; Dan Drosu Şaguna and Dan Şova, Fiscal Law (Bucharest: C.H. Beck, 2011), 242.

[94] These provisions, which regulate the customs union and the prohibition of quantitative restrictions between Member States, are directly applicable, and can be invoked before national courts, Manolache, Treaty, 224, 237 and next.

[95] Art.25 TFEU states:"between Member States Customs duties on imports and exports and charges having equivalent effect are forbidden.. This prohibition shall also apply to customs duties of a fiscal nature".

[96] Şaguna and Sova, Fiscal Law, 240.

[97] Art.3 Community Customs Code/UE defines the coverage of the EU customs territory, thus, according to art.3 par.3 "the customs territory of the Community/Union shall include the territorial waters, the inland maritime waters and the airspace of the Member States, and the territories referred to in paragraph 2, except for the territorial national territory. But during the interwar period, states have agreed to issue special customs regimes through territorial expansion or reduction of customs territories. Forms of expansion of the customs territory are the customs union and free trade areas[98], and the customs territory collapse is achieved by restricting the exemption from customs regime into force of a portion of a state, in this case, the customs borders no longer coincide with those of the State, these areas are called free zones.[99]

The customs union shall involve the prohibition on trade between Member States of customs duties and other charges having an equivalent effect. Prohibition of customs duties has a wider range[100], applying under Article 29 TFEU, not only to goods originating from a Member State, but also to those who come from a country that will be in free circulation between Member States once entered into the commercial circuit if the import formalities have been completed and any customs duties or charges having equivalent effect payable have been received in that Member State and have not received full or partial reduction of such fees and charges.

Customs duties on imports or exports or any charge having equivalent effect includes, as the CJEU decided that „any pecuniary charges, whatever their size and their application or name, which are imposed unilaterally on domestic or foreign goods because they cross a border and not in the strict sense of duty"; that the fee is not required for States benefit not discriminatory or protective effect, does not increase prices because it is minimal or that the goods in question are not in competition with foreign products, is without consequence[101].

Import duties on the Community Customs Code provides that these are customs duties and charges having equivalent effect on the importation of goods and import charges introduced under the common agricultural policy or under the specific arrangements applicable to certain goods resulting from the processing of agricultural products[102].

And export duties are customs duties and charges having equivalent effect on the exportation of goods and export charges introduced under the common agricultural policy or under the specific arrangements applicable to certain goods resulting from the processing of agricultural products.[103]

Community Customs Code or, in light of Lisbon Treaty, EU Customs Code, Article 4 paragraph 7 specifies the following:

" 'Community goods' means goods:

- wholly obtained in the customs territory of the Community/Union under the conditions referred to in Article 23 and not incorporating goods imported from countries or territories not forming part of the customs territory of the Community/Union. Goods obtained from goods placed under a suspensive arrangement shall not be deemed to have Community/Union status in cases of special economic importance determined in accordance with the committee procedure,

- imported from countries or territories not forming part of the customs territory of the Community/Union which have been released for free circulation, waters, the inland maritime waters and the airspace of those territories which are not part of the customs territory of the Community/Union pursuant to paragraph 1". And art.3 par.2 Community Customs Code/UE presents the territories situated outside the territories that are considered part of the Community customs territory, taking into account the conventions and treaties applicable in their part.
